OFFICIAL REPORT

Thursday, January 27, 1938

THIRD SESSION—EIGHTEENTH PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued from time to time to the twenty-seventh day of January, 1938, met this day at Ottawa, for the dispatch of business.

The house met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's secretary, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three p.m. on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

VACANCIES

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that during the recess I received communications from several members, notifying me that the following vacancies had occurred in the representation, viz:

Of Colin Alexander Campbell, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Frontenac-Addington, by resignation;

Of Daniel Alexander Cameron, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Cape Breton North-Victoria, by decease;

Of Hon. William Earl Rowe, member for the electoral district of Dufferin-Simcoe, by resignation;

Of Hon. Simon Fraser Tolmie, member for the electoral district of Victoria, B.C., by decease;

Of Joseph Achille Verville, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Lotbiniere, by decease;

Of Paul Mercier, Esquire, member for the electoral district of St. Henry, consequent upon the acceptance of an office of emolument under the crown;

Of Right Hon. Sir George Halsey Perley, G.C.M.G., member for the electoral district of Argenteuil, by decease;

Of William Michael Ryan, Esquire, member for the electoral district of St. John-Albert, by decease.

I accordingly issued my several warrants to the chief electoral officer to make out new writs of election for the said electoral districts, respectively.

NEW MEMBERS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the clerk of the house has received from the chief electoral officer certificates of the elections and return of the following members, viz:

Of Ralph Melville Warren, Esquire, for the electoral district of Renfrew North;

Of Matthew MacLean, Esquire, for the electoral district of Cape Breton North-Victoria;

Of Angus Neil McCallum, Esquire, for the electoral district of Frontenac-Addington;

Of the Hon. William Earl Rowe, for the electoral district of Dufferin-Simcoe;

Of Robert Wellington Mayhew, Esquire, for the electoral district of Victoria (B.C.);

Of Joseph Napoleon Francœur, Esquire, for the electoral district of Lotbiniere.

NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED

Ralph Melville Warren, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Renfrew North, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. Norman McL. Rogers.

Matthew MacLean, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Cape Breton North-Victoria, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. J. L. Ilsley.

Angus Neil McCallum, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Frontenac-Addington, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. Norman McL. Rogers.

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

It affords me much pleasure to greet you upon the resumption of your parliamentary duties.

The interval which has elapsed since the last session witnessed the coronation, in the month of May, of Their Majesties King George the Sixth and Queen Elizabeth. The event was one of special significance to the nations of the British Commonwealth. In the coronation service and ceremonial, recognition was given to the relationship between the sovereign and his peoples in the several dominions, as embodied in the Statute of Westminster.

Members of the government participated in the deliberations of the Imperial Conference which followed immediately after the coronation. The summary of proceedings of the conference will be placed before you at an early date for your consideration. It is the belief of the government that the opportunities afforded for the exchange of views and information on questions of common interest and concern, will serve to further the well-being of all parts of the commonwealth.

It is gratifying to note that, during the past year, there has been a further substantial advance in Canada's economic recovery. Revenues have reached new levels. Trade with other countries has materially expanded. There has been a general increase in employment and a marked decrease in the numbers receiving unemployment aid.

The recurrence, in a more acute form, of drought conditions in certain areas of western Canada has unfortunately made it necessary to provide assistance on an unprecedented scale. The government intends to continue its activities under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

In view of the success which has attended efforts to assist in the training of unemployed young people, it is proposed to extend the scheme during the coming year.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The Department of Agriculture has been reorganized and its services consolidated along lines designed to improve the standard and acceptability of Canadian farm products.

Arrangements are being completed for the inauguration of a national trans-Canada air service.

The National Employment Commission, the royal commission appointed to inquire into conditions in the textile industry, and the commission appointed under the provisions of the Veterans' Assistance Commission Act, 1936, have concluded their duties. The reports of these commissions will be tabled in due course.

The strains and stresses, which economic and social developments since confederation have placed upon Canada's governmental structure, have disclosed the necessity for adjustments which will enable it the more effectively to serve provincial and national needs, and to promote and preserve Canadian unity. My ministers are of the opinion that, with exact and adequate information, it should be possible for the appropriate authorities to work out satisfactory solutions. As a first step towards this end, a royal commission of inquiry has been appointed to re-examine the economic and financial basis of Confederation and the distribution of legislative powers in the light of the new conditions which have arisen in the past seventy years. The commission has already held sittings in many parts of the Dominion.

The cooperation of the provinces has been sought with a view to an amendment of the British North America Act, which would empower the parliament of Canada to enact forthwith a national scheme of unemployment insurance. My ministers hope the proposal may meet with early approval, in order that unemployment insurance legislation may be enacted during the present session of parliament.

Members of the House of Commons will be invited to consider the report of the special committee on Elections and Franchise Acts, and you will be asked to enact such legislation as may be necessary to implement such of the committee's recommendations as meet with their approval.

A measure will be submitted to extend the authority of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Legislation will be introduced with a view to furthering the principle of parliamentary control of the export of electrical power.

The international situation generally continues to give much ground for anxiety. My ministers have endeavoured, as opportunity has afforded, to promote international understanding and good-will. They have sought to join the efforts of Canada to those of other countries which are seeking by cooperation and conciliation to effect a settlement of questions and issues which concern the world's peace.

The administration has followed with deep interest the course of the negotiations being conducted with a view to the conclusion of a trade agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States of America. My ministers are fully alive to the importance of these negotiations, and to Canada's interest in their outcome.

In August last, the Canadian government approached the government of the United States with a view to extending and revising the trade agreement concluded between them in 1935. Exploratory conversations followed which have resulted in efforts to effect a new agreement on a broad and comprehensive basis. It is hoped that negotiations may so progress as to render it possible to submit the new agreement to parliament, for its consideration, during the present session.

With a number of other countries, adjustments have been made, during the past year, in our commercial relations in order to facilitate a wider exchange of commodities.

The government is convinced that, in seeking to cooperate with the United Kingdom and other countries in efforts to promote international trade, it is pursuing one of the most effective means of ensuring economic security and progress in Canada, and the betterment of conditions in other parts of the world.

Members of the House of Commons:

The public accounts of the last fiscal year and the estimates for the coming year will be submitted for your consideration.

Honourable Members of the Senate:
Members of the House of Commons:

In inviting your careful consideration of the important matters which will engage your attention, I pray that Divine Providence may guide and bless your deliberations.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business, except the introduction of bills, until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

HIS MAJESTY KING GEORGE VI

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY ON THE OCCASION OF HIS ACCESSION TO THE THRONE

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a communication from His Majesty King George VI, signed by his own hand, as follows:

Buckingham Palace.

Members of the Senate and of the House of Commons of Canada.

I thank you most sincerely for the assurances of loyalty and support contained in the address which you have presented to me upon the occasion of my accession to the throne. It is the dearest wish of The Queen and myself that our reign may be marked, under Divine Providence, by the blessings of peace and by a steady advancement in the welfare and prosperity of all our peoples: and in our labours to this end we shall be strengthened and encouraged by the prayers and goodwill of the Canadian parliament and people.

George R.I.

12th April, 1937.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY ON THE OCCASION OF HIS CORONATION

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have a communication from His Majesty King George VI, signed by his own hand, as follows:

Buckingham Palace.

Members of the Senate and of the House of Commons of Canada:

It is with feelings of deep gratitude that I acknowledge the message of loyalty and congratulation conveyed in your address of the 10th April which was presented to me by my Prime Minister of Canada on the 11th May.

The assurances of loyalty and devotion addressed to us on that occasion will always be an encouragement to The Queen and myself in the performance of our high task.

We were glad to know that the Speakers of your two houses were present at the solemn ceremony of our coronation. The participation in that ceremony of representatives from our overseas dominions fittingly marked the position of the crown as symbolising the unity and free association of the peoples of the British Commonwealth.

Throughout our reign it will be our constant aim to cherish and maintain, to the best of our powers, the heritage of justice, civil liberty, and ordered freedom which we have received from those who in past generations helped to build up this association of nations; and we rejoice to know that in our endeavours to promote, under Divine guidance, the welfare and happiness of our peoples, we shall be supported by the prayers and affection of the people of Canada.

George R.I.

29th June, 1937.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee consisting of Messrs. Casselman, Gray, Mackenzie (Vancouver), Power and Woodsworth, be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the standing committees of this house, under standing order 63.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council appointing the Honourable T. A. Crerar, Minister of Mines and Resources, the Right Honourable Ernest Lapointe, Minister of Justice, the Honourable Charles A. Dunning, Minister of Finance, and the Honourable W. D. Euler, Minister of Trade and Commerce, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled An Act Respecting the House of Commons.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to lay before the house the report of the joint librarians of parliament.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 4.25 p.m.

Friday, January 28, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

VACANCY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a communication from two members, notifying me that the following vacancy has occurred in the representation, viz:

Of William Samuel Hall, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Edmonton East, by decease. I accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct attention to the fact that climatic conditions in that part of the country are such that a winter election may be and in fact is an almost impossible task, and I hope that a date will be fixed that will make it possible, at least, for the will of the electors to be registered.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might say to my right hon. friend that the government will take note of what he has just said. We have, in fact, considered the matter already.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE, 1937

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table two copies in English and two in French, of the summary of proceedings of the imperial conference, 1937. Copies of the summary will be made available to the members of parliament through the distribution office of the House of Commons.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

TABLED BY MR. DUNNING—QUESTION OF REFERENCE TO PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Report of the Auditor General, volumes I and II, for the year ended March 31, 1937.—Mr. Dunning.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it was the custom in this house for many years, when tabling the report of the Auditor General, to move that it be referred to the public accounts committee; but when large numbers of reports were tabled that was for some reason overlooked on one occasion, and it continued to be overlooked except on one or two occasions. If the minister will look at the matter I think he will find that the correct practice is as I have indicated. Possibly it might be better for him to look into it and make a motion, if he so desires, on Monday. I suggest it is the regular practice that should be followed with respect to the Auditor General's report.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): My recollection is that last year, on a subsequent occasion, after the setting up of the public accounts committee, I made the motion referred to by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I shall be glad, however, to look into the matter.

TRIBUTES TO DECEASED MEMBERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since we last assembled here no fewer than six of our number have been removed by the hand of death. Three of the hon. members were supporters of the government; two hon. members, each a former minister of the crown, were members of the official opposition, and one hon. member belonged to the Social Credit party. This, I believe, is in the history of our parliament the largest number of deaths which have taken place, at any time, in the recess between the prorogation of one session and the opening of the next. It, undoubtedly, is accounted for, in part by the fact that the recent recess has been somewhat longer than the average. No fewer than three of the deaths have occurred in the present month.

It will I know accord with the feelings of all who shared the proceedings of the previous sessions if, before entering upon the work of this session, some expression is given to the loss which this house has sustained in its membership and some slight tribute paid to the memory of those whose lives and public services have been brought to a close, and who are so much in our thoughts at the present time.

The hon. members who have been taken from us, and the constituencies they represented, were: Mr. Daniel A. Cameron, Cape Breton North-Victoria, whose death occurred on September 4, 1937; the Hon. Doctor Simon

F. Tolmie, Victoria, B.C., who died on October 13, 1937; Mr. Joseph A. Verville, Lotbiniere, who died on November 20, 1937; the Right Hon. Sir George Perley, who represented Argenteuil, and whose death occurred on January 4 of this year; Mr. William M. Ryan, St. John-Albert, who died on the same day; and Doctor William S. Hall, Edmonton East, who died the day before yesterday.

Of this number, Messrs. Cameron, Verville and Ryan were supporters of the government. All three were members of the legal profession. Mr. Verville entered this house in 1925 and was here in all subsequent sessions. Mr. Cameron and Mr. Ryan came into the house only at the beginning of the present parliament. Mr. Ryan and Mr. Verville were each in their fifty-first year, Mr. Cameron was in his sixty-eighth.

Mr. Verville was born at Ste. Gertrude, Quebec, in 1887. He received his education at Nicolet college and at Laval university; from which he graduated as a notary. At one time he was mayor of St. Flavien, where he was residing at the time of his death. Although not a farmer himself, Mr. Verville represented a rural constituency. He took a keen interest in agricultural problems as well as in other matters of concern to his constituency and the province. He was a man of a retiring disposition. He did not take much part in the debates of this house, but he held strong convictions, and did not hesitate to express his views when he felt it was in the interests of his constituency that he should do so. His career has been ended prematurely, but he has left a record of service to his constituency which will be remembered not only by those whom he immediately served but by the people of his province generally.

Mr. Ryan was born in Saint John, New Brunswick, and was educated at St. Joseph's University and at King College Law School. He was created a King's Counsel in 1934. Before practising his profession as a barrister, Mr. Ryan had had considerable experience in journalism, both in his own province at Saint John, and at Regina. The experience gained in law and in journalism stood him in good stead when he came to this parliament. He had previously, on two occasions, unsuccessfully contested Saint John, but at the last election was returned by a large majority. Hon. members will recall that while here for only two sessions, Mr. Ryan took an active part in the discussions in this house, and also served faithfully on a number of committees. He gave evidence of outstanding ability. I feel that his death, occurring at the age of fifty years, closed a promising political career.

Mr. Cameron was born at Sydney River, Nova Scotia, in 1870 and received his training at Dalhousie university. If I am not mistaken he was at Dalhousie in the same years as my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). Mr. Cameron before entering this parliament had already had a fairly long and active career in politics. He had taken quite an exceptional part in the affairs of his native province. He also had had an exceptionally fine career as a member of the legal profession. It was to be expected therefore that, even in the short time he was here, he would render real service to this parliament.

Mr. Cameron's public life may be said to have commenced with his interest in municipal affairs. In 1900 he was elected a member of the Cape Breton Council. He subsequently in 1916 and the years immediately following represented Cape Breton county in the provincial legislature. In 1922 he was made a member of the legislative council, and became the leader of his party in that house. When the legislative council was abolished Mr. Cameron sought re-election to the legislature and was returned by acclamation at a by-election as the member for Victoria. While a member of the legislative council Mr. Cameron had also been a minister without portfolio in the government of the late Hon. George Murray. After his return to the legislature as member for Victoria he became provincial secretary in the government of the Hon. Ernest Armstrong, which position he held until 1925. He was returned again to the legislature in 1928. As already mentioned, he was elected to this house at the last general election.

I am sure hon. members recall the effective manner in which Mr. Cameron discussed public questions. In his contributions to the debates the evidence he gave of wide reading, knowledge and experience and his calm judgment, avoidance of extremes of language in asserting his position, all helped to make his words bring conviction, and to leave a real impression upon the house. His death is a distinct loss to this parliament.

Mr. Cameron, Mr. Verville and Mr. Ryan were all outstanding Liberals. They were strong and firm in their convictions, faithful to their party and its principles, and very loyal to my colleagues and myself. They had friends in all parts of the house, but their loss will be felt particularly by those on this side, and by none more than my colleagues and myself, to whose administration they gave such loyal and whole-hearted support.

As I said a moment ago, it is not, however, from this side of the house alone that familiar forms and faces have vanished. The Conservative party has lost two of its outstanding members, two gentlemen who for many years were among the foremost in the public life of our country. And the Social Credit group has experienced the first loss in its ranks. I hasten on behalf of hon. members on this side to express both to my Conservative friends and to my friends of the Social Credit party the sympathy which is felt by members of the government and its following in the losses which they have sustained.

Sir George Perley and Doctor Tolmie were, as I have just said, foremost for many years in the affairs of their party and prominent in the affairs of our country. Each of them had been in public life for a considerable time. Doctor Tolmie was returned five times to this house from the constituency of Victoria, British Columbia. Sir George Perley was returned seven times from the constituency of Argenteuil in Quebec. Doctor Tolmie served eleven years in this House of Commons, and Sir George Perley twenty-five years. Each of them had served in more than one administration as a minister of the crown and each had occupied, elsewhere, positions of high honour, trust and authority. While they were very different in many respects there were some distinct similarities in their characters as well as in their careers. Each of them had inherited an interest in public life and an aptitude for public service.

Doctor Tolmie's father, a physician, was one of the pioneer settlers of the Pacific coast, and was a member of the legislature of the colony of Vancouver island before the island became part of the province of British Columbia. Sir George Perley's father was one of the pioneer settlers of Upper Canada before the days of the Union. He too had seen service in public life. From 1887 to 1890 he was a member for Ottawa in this parliament. I might add that Doctor Tolmie's mother and Sir George Perley's mother in those early days each contributed much to the communities in which they lived. That service is still gratefully remembered.

Both Doctor Tolmie and Sir George Perley had natures which were kindly and generous. Each possessed a real capacity for making and holding friends. I doubt if either of them had personal enemies among their political opponents while each had many friends in all parties. Doctor Tolmie and Sir George Perley were alike in yet another respect, what I might term their modesty. Each despite the prominence of his position was anything but self-assertive. I do not think that either of them cared particularly for publicity, at any rate an undue publicity. Both too possessed another quality, all too rare. They were ready when the demands of the government or of their party seemed to occasion it, to efface themselves in order that they might be of greater service to others. In the difficult, most necessary but often thankless task of the work of political organization each of them rendered great service to the party to which he belonged.

Doctor Tolmie was seventy at the time of his death.

Doctor Tolmie's life, both in and out of parliament, was identified most closely with agriculture. He was born on a farm in Victoria in 1867. To the close of his life, he retained his love of the soil, and his pride in his association with the farming community. In addition to being a farmer and a breeder of pure bred livestock, he was, by profession, a veterinary surgeon. Before entering parliament, he served as Chief Inspector of Health of Animals Branch in the provincial service, in British Columbia, and later as representative, for British Columbia, of the Dominion Live Stock Commission.

Doctor Tolmie entered political life in 1917, at which time he was elected federal member for Victoria. He was returned to three successive parliaments, and in all, was elected five times to represent the constituency of Victoria at Ottawa.

In 1919, Doctor Tolmie was appointed Minister of Agriculture in the government of Sir Robert Borden. He held the same post in Mr. Meighen's administrations, in 1920 and 1926. While still a member of this house, he became the leader of the Conservative party in British Columbia.

Prior to the provincial elections of 1928, Doctor Tolmie resigned from the House of Commons in order the more effectively to participate in the campaign, and to contest a provincial seat. His party was returned to power, and he became Premier of British Columbia, which office he held from 1928 until the defeat of his administration in 1933. This reverse meant a temporary abandonment of his political career, but in the by-election of 1936, he was returned for the fifth and last time as a member for Victoria in this house.

Public duties were thrust upon, rather than sought, by Doctor Tolmie. He was a man of robust personality, and a modest and faithful public servant; a man of unimpeachable integrity, and possessed of a strong, homely common sense and ready wit. He will be remembered among those who have helped to build the Canadian west, and who have made an enduring contribution to Canadian agriculture.

Sir George Perley's death was so recent, and so very sudden, that it still remains something of a shock to all who knew him. In our references to him, I do not think Sir George would have wished us to strike a sorrowful note. In the manner of his passing, as in his life, there was much for which his friends may well be grateful. He had lived to the great age of eighty years. In appearance he was much younger. He had been spared any impairment of his faculties, or any prolonged suffering.

On New Year's day, which was a Saturday, Sir George had taken his part in the life of the capital. Sunday saw him at his accustomed place of worship. On Monday, the day before his death, he had been following his usual activities. That night, he passed away quietly in his sleep—"Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch about him, and lies down to pleasant dreams." As he had lived at peace with the world, so, in peace, he ended his days.

Sir George grew up in the picturesque surroundings of the Ottawa valley, in the days of the early lumbering industry. How long a career his was, how much of change he witnessed in its course, and how considerable the experience he brought to his public life, we realize when we recall that he was ten years of age at confederation, and had lived in Ottawa before it was chosen to be Canada's capital. He told us in a broadcast but a few months ago that he could remember the time when the settlement consisted of but two small struggling communities, one in Lower Town and one at the Chaudiere—separated by some two miles of poor road; while in between, there were practically no buildings, except the barracks, standing on the site of these Houses of Parliament.

Entering parliament when all but fifty years of age, Sir George Perley occupied, for over three decades, in years of war and peace alike, a foremost place in our public life.

I rather hesitate to attempt an enumeration of significant features in his parliamentary career, or the nature of his public services. As, however, few men, in the history of our country, have given more completely of their time, and of their lives to the public service than Sir George, it is, I think, desirable that, at this time, some mention should be made of the positions of great trust, honour and responsibility which he held in the course of his long and useful life, and in which, both at home and abroad, he gave so much of disinterested public service.

Sir George entered this House of Commons as the member for Argenteuil in 1904. He had previously unsuccessfully contested the constituency on two occasions. He became chief whip of his party in 1910. When Sir Robert Borden was returned to office in 1911, he became a member of the cabinet without portfolio. As early as 1912-13, Sir George became acting Prime Minister in the absence of Sir Robert Borden, and this position he filled time and again during absences from Canada of both Sir Robert and my right honourable friend. There quickly developed that intimate association between Sir George and Sir Robert which made him the most loyal and helpful of colleagues of the Prime Minister. He preferred, through the years that his party was in office, not to accept a portfolio at Ottawa, though, he was at all times, prepared, as a member of the government, to assist the Prime Minister and his colleagues, in an acting capacity, to the extent of his power, and exceptional opportunities.

Few prime ministers have ever had a more loyal and helpful colleague than Sir Robert Borden had in his friend, Sir George Perley. That helpfulness and cooperation was extended in equal measure to Mr. Meighen and to my right hon. friend during their years of office. May I here express to my right hon. friend the very sincere sympathy I feel for him in particular in the loss of one who shared his desk in this House of Commons, and with whom he was so closely associated in all his public duties.

During his visit to England in the early part of 1914, Sir George assumed the temporary charge of the then vacant office of High Commissioner for Canada. With the outbreak of the war, he remained in charge of this office, and added to the duties of it, those of Minister of Overseas Military Forces.

When he relinquished the latter post in October, 1917, Sir George accepted the appointment of High Commissioner for Canada, and remained in that office until March, 1922. He was, during the period of the war, and the years immediately succeeding, a member of the Imperial War Cabinet, a delegate to the Imperial Conference of 1917, to the Conference at Versailles, 1919, and to the Assembly of the League of Nations, in 1921.

Of Sir George's political career, it is perhaps sufficient to say that, throughout it all, he was true to the best traditions of public life, something which was never more needed than in these times of changing values and loyalties.

May I add this one further word with reference to a part played by Sir George in the proceedings of this house. His practical knowledge, and sound judgment of men and affairs, as I have already said, meant much to his party, both in office and in opposition. I should like to add that it meant much, as well, to all parties in parliament. In the nature of things, difficulties and differences are bound to arise between a government and an opposition, which, if they are permitted to develop and become acrimonious, are bound to destroy what is best in our parliamentary system of government, namely, the settlement of all matters by reasoned discussion, and the avoidance of unnecessary bitterness, or attempts at coercion in any form. In situations of the kind, Sir George always sought to exercise a moderating and a restraining influence, one which had its effect for good in the relations of all.

I have still to make mention of one more hon. member who has been taken from us since the last session.

It was only the day before yesterday that word was received of the sudden passing, in Edmonton, of Doctor William S. Hall, the member for Edmonton East.

Doctor Hall was in his sixty-seventh year at the time of his death. He was a dentist by profession, and his education had been gained, in part, at the University of Toronto. Like Mr. Cameron and Mr. Ryan, he entered parliament for the first time in 1935. It was his interest in the Social Credit movement which brought him to the fore, first as a candidate for the legislature of Alberta, in 1935, and, later, in the same year as a candidate for the House of Commons. He was not successful at the provincial election, but succeeded in winning a seat in the federal parliament at the general election. His participation in the affairs of this House was necessarily limited. Dr. Hall hardly had the opportunity to become familiar with public life, and we had only come to know him when he was called away.

In what I have just said of the six of our number who have been taken from us, I have necessarily enlarged somewhat upon the services of those who have been longest in public life, and whose part in public affairs has been best known.

Thinking, however, of all of them, one feels that each, in his own way, and to the best of his abilities, sought to serve his community, his generation, and his country. They were all good Canadians, and their names and their lives and their public services will be remembered through years to come.

I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, kindly to convey to the immediate members of the families of those of our number who have passed away, the sincere expression of the sympathy of this House, in their bereavement.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there has grown up a custom, now almost established as a parliamentary practice, whereby before entering upon the active work of a session we pause to contemplate the work of those who have left us during the recess. For many reasons I think it is a sound practice. The right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave one excellent reason when he said that it afforded us an opportunity to record upon the pages of Hansard the achievements in public service of those who have left us. But it serves another purpose; it serves to remind us of the brevity of human life, and of the unimportance of the individual in the march of time. A few months ago none of us could have thought that by to-day six of our number would have passed to the Great Beyond. Serving as it does those purposes this custom enables some of us who for a brief moment may occupy official positions in the house to record briefly the contributions which have been made to the public life of Canada by our former fellow members.

Three hon. members who have left us were supporters of the government of the day. I cannot think of Mr. Cameron other than as my old friend Dan Cameron. We were classmates at Dalhousie. He was a Cape Breton Scotchman, a highlander through both sides of his parentage, and was blessed with what I regarded as one of the most powerful intellects with which I came in contact. To some extent I think circumstances limited the operation of that mind, but when I knew him as a student I knew one whose very powerful mind made a deep impression upon me in those youthful days. He served for many years in a judicial capacity as a stipendiary magistrate at Sydney. In the public life of Nova Scotia, whether in the legislative council or the legislative assembly, he brought to bear upon the questions he had to consider a moderation, a dignity and a calmness of judgment worthy of emulation.

In ill health he came to this house, and we did not see the strength and force of the man. However on more than one occasion his independence of judgment was manifested when, on questions which did not affect high policy, he indicated that at the time he was not in accord with those who for the moment took a particular stand. It is a matter of great pride and satisfaction to me to think that an old classmate of mine was here, and that he sat not far from me. To me his passing was a real sorrow, for I had a deep and affectionate regard for him which I find somewhat difficult to express in words.

The late hon. member for St. John-Albert, Mr. Ryan, represented the county in which I was born. He had experience in the profession to which I belong, and was also a journalist of repute, knowing something of its troubles, difficulties and problems. I saw him last fall in his native city of St. John where he was engaged in an inquiry. At that time I had some discussion with him, little thinking I should never see him again. He had a warm-hearted disposition, an attribute of his race. While on some matters we actively differed, our differences never in any sense interfered with our personal relations. I realize, as the Prime Minister has said so very aptly, his leaving us was on the threshold of what promised to be a very useful career.

Of the third supporter of the government who has departed this life, Mr. Verville, I knew very little. I observed that he was a faithful attendant in this chamber, and, although he expressed himself seldom in this house, he took a great interest in all public questions. The fact that he was elected four times by his constituents is in itself testimony to the place he held in their affection and regard. That he had their confidence indicates that he was no ordinary man in a county the size of that which he represented.

On behalf of those with whom I am associated I wish to express to the government our very great sympathy in their loss of three supporters, gentlemen who gave promise of being extremely useful as the years went by in the discharge of public duties. Of their loyalty and devotion to their party and government I think nothing need be said; it was apparent on every occasion upon which the opportunity offered. To the families of these distinguished gentlemen we extend our sympathy in their bereavement. We recognize in those who now are lost to this chamber, men who had been chosen by the people under our democracy to represent them in this house of parliament.

To deal with the loss which the Social Credit party has sustained is quite beyond me except to say that I knew Doctor Hall by reputation. He resided at Edmonton, two hundred miles north of Calgary. His coming into this house to support the movement in which he believed was not unexpected when he received the nomination of his party. His careful attention to the debates in this house and his manifest intention at all times to make every possible contribution to the cause which he had espoused distinguished him as it does all those who so enthusiastically support their party. I trust I may be permitted on behalf of myself and those with whom I am associated to express my sympathy and sorrow.

To speak of the other two members who have left us is a task, if I may use that word, of great magnitude. Simon Fraser Tolmie had been known to me for many years. His father came to British Columbia by way of the isthmus of Panama. When I last saw Doctor Tolmie in his bed at the old farm not far from the centre of the city of Victoria he told me that he was born in that room; and in that room he died. He was born in the year of confederation, and had reached the age of seventy years.

Doctor Tolmie had a genius for friendship that few men have. He had a sense of humour and a ready wit. In the very nature of things his love of animals and of the land made him a respected and almost revered friend of agriculturists and cattle raisers. I think the tribute paid to him at his funeral in Victoria—I was not present but I read it—was as impressive a manifestation of grief on behalf of the people as could possibly be conceived. He was a friend of all men, and all men were his friends. It is not often that one may say that with sincerity.

He rendered two notable services to Canada. As Minister of Agriculture he had the courage to take steps that resulted in the eradication of mange from the prairies and ranges of western Canada. The steps that he took at that time caused much criticism, but he was determined to see the matter through, and he did. The result was that mange disappeared from our ranges.

The second service that he rendered to this country was of a different character. It must be known to all that for many years England declined to receive our cattle; an embargo had been placed against them on the ground of their health. When the matter was being discussed on one occasion at a meeting of the war cabinet in England an undertaking was given that this embargo would be removed at the termination of hostilities. This in passing enables me to pay a tribute to one whose memory is sometimes forgotten, the late Hon. Robert Rogers. He insisted at that time that the memorandum should be incorporated in the minutes of the meeting, and the extending of that minute on the record of the day's proceedings was the basis upon which subsequent action was taken by the British government to remove the embargo.

It will be within the memory of the house, Mr. Speaker, that the government in England was loath to permit our cattle to enter that country. The Minister of Agriculture, afterwards Lord Ernle, took a very strong view against us. I recall the debates in the House of Lords at that time. It was upon the investigation of the matter by a small commission, of which the late Lord Finlay was a member, that Doctor Tolmie rendered such conspicuous service to this country. As a veterinary surgeon he had special and expert knowledge. When he had concluded dealing with the matter it was the judgment of Lord Finlay and those associated with him on that commission that nothing more remained to be said. By these two distinctive services that he rendered to our country Doctor Tolmie has placed us under a debt and obligation that will not soon be forgotten.

He had no desire for the limelight of public life. The Prime Minister has very properly remarked upon his modesty in that regard. He became head of his party in British Columbia and subsequently premier of that province, but it was with a reluctance that was amazing. As he frequently said to me, he felt he would be happier in the discharge of the duties that he was so eminently qualified to discharge as Minister of Agriculture. I think he was happier in Ottawa than in any other part of the world. He was at his happiest at the University club, surrounded by his friends.

Doctor Tolmie will be greatly missed in that part of Canada in which he lived. He will be greatly missed by those who knew him as I was privileged to know him, by those who understood something of his fine qualities of heart and mind. His generous, open-hearted attitude toward life and material things made it impossible for him to accumulate anything during his lifetime. One might almost say of him, as was said of Pitt, that he lived without ostentation, and he died poor.

I wonder if members of this chamber realize how difficult it is for me to speak at any length or adequately of the Right Hon. Sir George Perley. I knew him as a member of parliament, as chief whip of his party, as a minister of the crown, as high commissioner, and as a colleague. An English writer said not long ago that it is very difficult to analyze the qualities that go into the making of a character. Sir George Perley inherited an instinct for business and for public service. He manifested his tendencies for business by actively entering upon the discharge of the duties that fell upon him on the death of his father, in connection with the properties that he inherited. His love for public service he manifested by offering himself for election, facing defeat on two occasions, and ultimately being returned seven times by a Quebec constituency while he himself was a resident of Ontario. Reviewing many statements that he made to me from time to time with respect to his own life, I think perhaps he found more satisfaction than in anything else in the thought that he had the confidence and support of the electors of a Quebec county while he himself resided in Ontario.

The combination of qualities that distinguished the Right Hon. Sir George Perley is not often met with in ordinary life. It is not a common thing to find a man of affairs, a man of very high attainments in the business world, willing and ready to give such service as he gave to the state. The distinctive attribute in the discharge of his public duties was thoroughness. I have seen him acting as minister for almost every department of the public service, and the thoroughness and method with which he carried out his duties were so commendable and so complete that I sometimes wish that every member of government had had an opportunity to study his approach to public business. He regarded the public purse as one would regard a private purse; he regarded public business as he would regard his personal business; and he brought to bear on the problems he had to meet in the discharge of public business the same consideration that he would have given to them had they been purely a private affair. Obviously that is not and never has been in Canada the most popular method of approach, but Sir George Perley insisted upon its being followed in his dealings with the various departments that he administered.

It is, of course, well known that when Sir Robert Borden formed his administration in 1911 he desired Sir George Perley to accept office as head of a department. That, at the moment, he was unwilling to do, and so he became minister without portfolio; but I know that at one time he was acting minister for five, if not seven, departments. His capacity for work was amazing—simply amazing. Those of my colleagues who recall him as Acting Prime Minister have some appreciation of his capacity for toil, for sustained hard work, for thoroughness and patience in the discharge of his parliamentary and public duties.

All this is the public side of a public man. But there was George Perley the man, who was my friend, faithful and true, loyal and devoted, of whom it is so difficult to speak. He was a man of great tolerance, of quiet generosity, one who contributed to social services without publicity. He gave a great building here in memory of his father and mother, to help those who are stricken as they move on through life. That was partly personal and yet an important part of the public side of the man. There was a quality that characterized his judgments, his counsel, his appraisals of others, which may be indicated by what I well recall his saying about a certain person of whom criticisms were being offered—"Ah well, you know, after all he may not be too bad." Always there was the thought that there was some good thing that could be said, and this quality was so often manifested in his private utterances.

His friendships were many. I think the loss by death of Sir Robert Borden affected him deeply, because, while not the same age, they had been closely associated in public life and public office, in sport, and in intimate family life.

I do think, Mr. Speaker, that what the Prime Minister said a moment ago should not be forgotten. It is well that fitting tribute should be paid when distinguished service has been rendered to the state by one who occupied such a place that it was unnecessary for him to seek public office in order to establish his position in the community in which he lived; for had Sir George Perley never held public office he would have been respected and admired and esteemed by his community. He was an Ottawa man. When the great fire occurred across the river in Hull, and it became necessary to solicit public subscriptions to help the sufferers, they pressed Sir George Perley to be chairman so that the administration of the funds might be beyond question, and that all those entitled to receive benefit from the generosity of a contributing public might do so. He was a man of integrity, and of rectitude, with a high sense of honour and a never-failing dignity. But in his personal life and in association with friends, his was the genuine nature of youth, and it was that boyish disposition that kept him ever young; for although he had attained the age of eighty years, none of us sitting here and looking at him could have thought for a moment that he had passed three score.

He has gone, Mr. Speaker, but he has left behind him an imperishable memory, a record of such varied achievements that the mere mention of them makes it seem almost incredible that they could have been accomplished by one man—member of parliament, chief whip of his party, minister of the crown, high commissioner, an overseas minister, a plenipotentiary at the signing of peace treaties, a member of the war cabinet; and the very large number of private enterprises, charitable, philanthropic and social, with which he was connected during all those years, I shall not trespass on the time of the house to name. But it is well that we should pause and think of one who served this country well, whose name was never touched by the breath of scandal or by the suspicion of failure in any respect of one who maintained the high standards of rectitude and integrity that he has left us.

Sir George Perley has left behind him, as I say, an imperishable memory, not only of the public service upon which he entered as a young man, but a memory in the hearts of all who knew him. The door-man at the hotel said to me, "You have lost a great man." I said "Yes." And he added that a friend to whom he was speaking said, "They don't make them that way now." "Ah," the other replied, "but it took seventy-five years to make him." There is great truth in that. He was the product of hereditary conditions, of environment and of great traditions. His life has left us the richer; and I agree with what the Prime Minister has said, that we should not mourn but rather rejoice that such a life has been given to us in all its amplitude of service, rendered modestly and quietly, and all its magnificant unselfish regard for others, without ostentation, without publicity. He served his day and generation; he departed without pain or sadness, though with a suddenness that has left a shock in the hearts of all who knew him; for I think few of us can realize, as from day to day we go about our tasks, that he has left us. I believe the words I can best use with respect to him were those that were given to me by one of my fellow members yesterday. They are these:

> Not stirring words, nor gallant deeds alone,
> Plain, patient work fulfilled that length of life;
> Duty, not glory—Service, not a throne,
> Inspired his effort, set for him the strife.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think there is nothing that can usefully be added at this time. I simply desire to associate my colleagues and myself with these words of esteem for our fellow members who have passed on. Doctor Tolmie, of course, and Sir George Perley had become almost institutions in this country. I need not add anything to the tributes which have been paid them except a personal word. Perhaps Sir George Perley was great above all other things in his kindness and consideration towards those about him. I can very well recall that in my first days in this house, he took the trouble to introduce some of us, who were at that time, younger members, into life here at Ottawa. I am not going to say anything with regard to other members whom I did not know personally so well. I am glad that, despite some of the rather sombre reflections which may come at a time like this, we do occasionally have opportunities when we can say good of one another rather than pass adverse criticisms. We desire simply to extend our sympathy to the bereaved families of our colleagues.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I have thought several times this afternoon, while listening to the words and enjoying the quiet and sympathetic tones of those who have spoken, what a beautiful thing humanity is when it is at its best. An occasion such as this is one of the rare occasions when humanity is at its best. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) can, I think, scarcely realize how good their kindly attitude towards their fellow members is, how it pleases and reassures us in times like these.

We of this group are not very well acquainted with the men who are being mourned to-day. We have to depend upon what others tell us, what we have read in the Parliamentary Guide and what we have learned here. Mr. Ryan and Mr. Verville were comparatively young men. The fine edifice of life and service for which each had laid the plan had only been completed enough to indicate the dimensions and nature of the structure; then these men were stricken and taken from our midst. Such comfort as we can find in a situation like this is, I think, rather well hinted in Robert Louis Stevenson's noble words:

> To travel hopefully is better than to arrive; and the true success is to labour.

Mr. Cameron, I conclude from what I have learned of him, must have been a strong, courageous, hopeful fighter, one who by careful and persistent self-discipline had acquired the ability to look through the darkest and most threatening gloom and glimpse signs of the silver lining. I fancy it was such a man as he that Browning had in mind when he wrote those inspiring words:

> One who never turned his back but marched breast forward,
> Never doubted clouds would break,
> Never dreamed, though right were worsted, wrong would triumph,
> Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,
> Sleep to wake.

With the leader of the opposition I agree that it is quite impossible for one who is new to this house to have as complete sympathy as one desires to have, because we can really sympathize only with those through whose experiences we have gone. We have never known what it is to pass through what the leader of the opposition has passed through in the loss of these good men.

To few, indeed, is it permitted to attain the age of eighty years. Of Sir George Perley it can truly be said that he was "full of years." Listening to the words of the Prime Minister and of the leader of the opposition, recounting the many acts which Sir George had performed, the many offices he had filled, and the honour he had gained, I felt we could also say that he died as full of honour as of years. They tell me he was buried in Ottawa; in this city his honour was striven for and gained. It is fitting, therefore, that in this city his remains should rest. The thought of him brought to my mind those fine words of Robert Louis Stevenson, when he was contemplating his own decease:

> Under the wide and starry sky,
> Dig the grave and let me lie.
> Glad did I live, and gladly die,
> And I laid me down with a will.
> This be the verse you grave for me:
> Here he lies where he longed to be;
> Home is the sailor, home from sea,
> And the hunter home from the hill.

The Hon. Doctor Tolmie was a man whom I had heard a great deal of as I had heard of Sir George Perley before I came here. I believe he was known favourably far and wide throughout Canada. I read about him, in the Parliamentary Guide, a passage which it seems to me it might not be unfair to him to read into Hansard:

> A farmer and breeder of pure bred live stock. President Dominion Holstein Breeders; B.C. Vety. Assn.; B.C. Holstein Breeders; Chief Inspector Health of Animals Branch, B.C.; Representative Dominion Live Stock Commissioner for British Columbia. Mem. Pacific and Union Clubs, Victoria, University Club, Ottawa. A Unionist. First elected to H. of C. at g.e., 1917. Sworn of the Privy Council and apptd. Minister of Agriculture, Aug. 2, 1919. Re-elected after assuming office, Oct. 27, 1919. Upon the formation of the Meighen administration, July 13, 1920, following the resignation of Sir Robert Borden, was re-apptd. Minister of Agriculture. Retired from office with the Meighen Government, Dec. 1921. Re-elec. to H. of C. g.e., 1921; Apptd. Dominion Organizer for the Conservative party in Aug., 1923; re-elec. to H. of C. g.e., Oct. 1925. Apptd. Min. of Agriculture, July 13, 1926.

No one needs to grieve overmuch because this man has been taken away. For us, I think there is cause for genuine regret. In a time when the farmer is more in need of sympathy than ever before in our history, in a time when possibly the west needs more sympathy and understanding than ever before in the history of Canada it seems untimely that this man, who understood the farmer and sympathized with him, who understood and sympathized with the west, should be called away. But in this matter, as in all others, we have to bow to the will of Him who doeth all things well.

It was comforting indeed to us to hear the kind expressions regarding Doctor Hall. One of the first things that came to my mind when I thought of Doctor Hall, looking back over his life, was a fine passage that appears in Drinkwater's play, Abraham Lincoln. Speaking of Abraham Lincoln, one of the chroniclers said:

> Shall a man understand,
> He shall know bitterness because his kind,
> Being perplexed of mind,
> Hold issues even that are nothing mated.
> And he shall give
> Counsel out of his wisdom that none shall hear;
> And steadfast in vain persuasion must he live,
> And unabated
> Shall his temptation be.

Of course, the loss of Doctor Hall was a painful shock to us. It has been written, "Where there is no vision the people perish." Singularly fortunate, I believe, are those people in the minds of whose older men vision comes. This man was one of a large class of elderly people in Canada, whose careful studies of realities have convinced them, first, that a change must come, and, second, that that change must take the shape of monetary reform. Once convinced, Doctor Hall courageously decided. The risk to his business and professional well-being he disregarded, and plunged industriously and firmly into the fight for a safer and more prosperous Alberta and Canada. In the struggle he spared neither time nor energy nor wealth. He became one of the first and foremost social credit leaders throughout Edmonton and the north. The more clearly men come to see the meaning of our times, the more they will realize that in a great and righteous cause the good doctor strove well and died striving. We have known and will remember our colleague, Doctor Hall, for his wise counsel, tolerant nature, and devotion to his family, to his church and to his country.

THE LATE SIR ROBERT BORDEN

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I need not remind the house of the loss which our country sustained in the death, in June last year, of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden. From October, 1911, to July, 1920, Sir Robert Borden was Prime Minister of Canada, a period of nine years, all but three months, years which included those of the great war with their exceptional anxieties and responsibilities.

When Sir Robert resigned the office of Prime Minister he intimated that he intended to relinquish his part in active politics, and as a consequence, when parliament dissolved in 1921, he ceased to be a member of this house. Sir Robert Borden had been a member for twenty-five years, and was sixty-seven years of age at the time of his retirement.

Though Sir Robert ceased in 1921 to be a member of parliament he did not cease to be interested in politics or to take an active part in public affairs. Indeed, the period of retirement which followed his activities in parliament afforded him an opportunity to place at the service of those who sought his counsel the great experience which he had gained in public life. His retirement gave him also an opportunity to devote his time and talent to the great causes which he had so much at heart.

In those years, I believe, Sir Robert found the real reward of the sacrifices which his earlier public services had entailed, for they gave to him not only the opportunities I have just mentioned, but they also afforded, what a man inevitably sacrifices in the course of great public duty, namely, opportunity for the quiet enjoyment of personal friendships and a chance to pursue with a degree of thoroughness not otherwise possible cultural interests; as well as many forms of public service. Those years of retirement were years of freedom and calm. They were shared with Lady Borden at their home, Glensmere, in this city, where together they enjoyed the beauty of its surroundings, its lovely view of the Rideau river, the society of their personal friends and the activities of the capital with which Sir Robert's life had been so intimately associated. Sir Robert there, too, regained in large part the health and strength which had been considerably impaired during the time he was in office.

The eventide of Sir Robert's life was not, ere its close, without its glow upon the horizon.

It must have been deeply gratifying to him to have lived to see the time when, despite the differences of view there were and will always be with respect to some of the acts and policies of his administrations, he had nevertheless gained a place in the esteem of his fellow countrymen which was altogether above party, and had won a position of honour not only in his own country but throughout the empire, and that his name was held in high regard in other countries as well.

I shall not say more. Sir Robert's life and work are already a part of the history of this country. There is moreover very little, if anything, which could be added to the many and deeply sincere tributes which have been paid his memory in this and other lands. I have felt, however, that hon. members of this house would wish to have recorded in the proceedings of this parliament some expression of the sense of the loss which, as representatives of the people of Canada in the House of Commons, we feel our country has sustained in the passing of a great Canadian who for twenty-five years was a member of this house, for nineteen years, the leader of the Conservative party in this country, and for nearly nine years the Prime Minister of Canada. Sir Robert's name will find an enduring place among those of our land who have sought to serve parliament, their party and their country and who have done so with outstanding devotion and high distinction. His name will find its place also among the names of world statesmen who had to do with empire councils at a time of war, and whose memories will be associated with Versailles and Geneva, and with the beginnings of the League of Nations.

It will, I am sure, be the wish of this house, that you, Mr. Speaker, convey to Lady Borden, who for almost half a century shared so fully and sympathetically the struggles and the achievements of Sir Robert's career, the expression of the sincere sympathy which is felt for her by all hon. members.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggested that the course he has taken should be followed this day, I felt that those of us who sit here are under a debt of obligation to him for having so publicly stated the claim of the late Sir Robert Borden on the regard and esteem of the Canadian people. Perhaps I knew Sir Robert Borden longer than any member of this house. He had one characteristic that marked him from his younger days, that is he was a man of infinite patience. I have never known a more patient man. I think there is one, perhaps more than one, hon. member of this chamber who was associated with him in government and who knows how patient he was with respect to matters that affected his country. He was a great lawyer, a great constitutional lawyer, and I venture to believe that, with the possible exception of Sir John Thompson, who ranked with him, no man who has ever discharged the duties of first minister of this country could prepare so excellent a state paper. I think that can be said with truth.

It was charged at times that Sir Robert Borden was indecisive. The truth is that he was cautious almost to the point of indecision, but once his mind was set, once he had arrived at a conclusion—sometimes taking a very long time to do it, weighing the pros and cons with great thought and care—nothing diverted him from his purpose. Once he had made up his mind that he was following the correct and proper course he was almost relentless in the pursuit of his purpose. He was jealous of this country and its honour and reputation. We have not produced a stronger Canadian. At times of stress and strain, when difficulties were multiplying, he never for a moment lessened his support—nay more, his advocacy—of the claims of this country to a measure of consideration that sometimes was denied and ofttimes questioned. Our position with respect to the peace treaty I frankly think we owe entirely to Sir Robert Borden. Those of us who know something of the attitude which he took, the manner in which he supported his views, and the vigour and strength of his advocacy, will realize what a debt the Canadian people owe to him with respect to the position of Canada at the negotiation of the treaty of Versailles.

Although I was a supporter of his government, I differed from him with respect to the railway problem of this country. But that did not in any sense interfere with our personal or political friendship. The last political speech that he made, as far as I recall, was made on behalf of the party with which I am associated, on the same platform as myself. During the long hard years in which we held office I think a week did not go by when I was in Canada that he did not either ring me up or send me a note about some matter which struck him as worthy of comment. When he was in the United States he frequently sent me clippings for consideration.

I agree with everything the Prime Minister has said; Sir Robert's last years, the years of calm, of reflection, of honoured position in the community where he was almost an oracle, were the happiest of his life. I saw him in his Gethsemane; for like most men he had to undergo not only violent criticism but worse during the years between 1908 and 1911. But he bore it with patience that was amazing and with fortitude that was exceptional. That during all those dark days he faced his troubles so valiantly was in large measure due to the fact that he found in Lady Borden a helpmeet in the truest and best sense in which that term is used in Holy Writ. She was a tower of strength in those dark days, even as she was a well of inspiration in the happier days that followed.

I am deeply grateful, not only on my own behalf but also on behalf of those who are associated with me here this day, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister has seen fit to express not on behalf of a party but on behalf of the people of Canada their sense of obligation, of appreciation and of thankfulness that God in his wisdom and mercy gave us such a leader at such a time, who was enabled by strength of purpose to give effect to firm determination with respect to the position of this country and its relation to the other communities of the world, apart altogether from the agonizing effort through which he went during the long years of the war.

It may well be that later in the history of some parliament some other recognition may be accorded to the memory of so great a man, but one thing is certain, that on the bead-roll of fame his name among Canadians will occupy a very high place, revered, respected and honoured, not only by his own day and generation and by succeeding generations of Canadians but by men and women who in his life of effort see evidence of a great goodwill on the part of a man who endeavoured—sometimes, he used to think, with great uncertainty—to bring about the creation of a league of nations by which great aggregations of people would be able to settle their differences by recourse to tribunals, even as man emerging from the state of savagery has been able to set up tribunals with which to settle his differences with his neighbours.

For that cause he laboured. He believed in it until the end, and if it failed it was through no fault of his. It has not yet failed, for as long as the idea prevails that nations may settle their disputes as individual citizens of nations settle theirs, his memory as an exponent of that great cause will endure amongst the peoples of the world.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, we desire to associate ourselves with the views already expressed. I believe this man was worthy of all that has been said.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 4.55 p.m.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the clerk of the house has received from the chief electoral officer certificate of the election and return of Joseph Arsène Bonnier, Esquire, for the electoral district of St. Henry, in the province of Quebec.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT

POSTPONEMENT OF REVISION OF EXISTING LISTS FOR ONE YEAR

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to amend the Dominion Franchise Act.

Mr. STEWART: Explain.

Mr. RINFRET: The effect of this amendment is merely to postpone for another year the revision of existing electoral lists. It is similar to bills introduced in past sessions.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

LANGUAGE QUALIFICATION OF PERSONS APPOINTED OR TRANSFERRED

Mr. WILFRID LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to amend the Civil Service Act.

He said: The object of this amendment is to provide that all employees of the federal government who are appointed to positions within a province or transferred from one province to another, either as temporary or p rmanent employees, should before being appointed or transferred pass an examination as to their knowledge of the language of the majority of the province. For instance, no one might be appointed to a position in the civil service in the province of British Columbi or Manitoba or Nova Scotia, unless he has the requisite knowledge of the English language, and no one might be appointed to a position in the province of Quebec unless he has the requisite knowledge of the French language.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISION AGAINST REFUSAL TO EMPLOY OR DISMISSAL FOR MEMBERSHIP IN TRADE UNIONS

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to amend the criminal code.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Explain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The purpose of this bill is to prevent employers from refusing to employ, or from dismissing employees, or conspiring with others therefor, for the reason that they are members of a trade union.

As it is lawful for workmen or employees to form themselves into trade unions and to bargain collectively, it should, as a matter of public policy, be unlawful for employers to seek by overt acts or intimidation, threats or conspiracy to prevent them from belonging to such trade unions.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

JURISDICTION OF RAILWAY COMMISSION IN CASES OF DAMAGES CAUSED BY ERECTION OF SNOW FENCES

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) moved for leave to introduce Bill No 5, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: This bill is the same that I introduced last session and which did not reach second reading on account of the short duration of the session. The object of this bill is to amend the Railway Act so as to place under the jurisdiction of the board of railway commissioners the assessment of damages resulting from the erection of snow fences by the railway companies.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT

JURISDICTION OF RAILWAY COMMISSION IN CASES OF DAMAGES CAUSED BY THE ERECTION OF SNOW FENCES

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6 to amend the Government Railways Act.

He said: This bill is similar to one I have just presented. Its object is to amend the Government Railways Act in the same manner.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I wish to address a question to the government and particularly to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). Has a substantial body of representations been made to the government for the repeal of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act; has a decision been arrived at as a result of these representations; and, finally, will the minister consider printing the report of the commission, together with proceedings and statistics, which he laid upon the table on Friday?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I think my hon. friend's question is really a request for the government to announce its policy with respect to a matter of possible legislation. As to the representations, of course representations pro and con with respect to the act to which my hon. friend refers have been made to the government continuously since that legislation was first enacted. I should not like the impression to go abroad that all the representations received have been against the continued operation of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Representations both for and against it have reached the government from time to time from various parts of Canada. I cannot make any pronouncement with respect to government policy in the matter; in that regard my hon. friend will have to possess his soul in patience until the government decides to introduce or not introduce amendments to the law.

With regard to the printing of the report which I tabled the other day, the government will be glad to give consideration to the matter, bearing in mind, however, that if the printing of such a report is ordered by the house it will be paid for out of the House of Commons vote.

Mr. STEWART: My reason for asking the question was that the report is not a very lengthy one, but it is one in which I know that a large number of members are vitally interested.

Mr. DUNNING: We will give consideration to the printing of it.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. J. N. FRANCŒUR AND SECONDED BY MR. R. M. WARREN.

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. J. N. FRANCŒUR (Lotbiniere): (Translation): Mr. Speaker, when I left you last summer, I did not expect to meet you here, at the opening of this session in the Speaker's chair. For two sessions you have presided over the proceedings of this house with a fair-mindedness and tact that reflect great credit on you. Allow me, at the opening of our parliamentary labours, to extend to you my best wishes; may you enjoy a very good health. I dare say no more, for I know that you are endowed with these virtues, namely indulgence and patience.

Scarcely two months ago I had no idea that I would occupy a seat in this chamber, but the house has to grieve over the loss of six of its members. Last Friday, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and leaders of other parties paid a tribute to the memory of those who have passed away. I shall speak only of my predecessor, Mr. Verville, a member of this house for twelve years, practising his profession among his constituents, at St. Flavien, right in the centre of Lotbiniere county, was in daily contact with the people whose confidence he had won and retained. In spite of his apparently pleasant nature, Verville was possessed of a tenacity and impetuosity which surprised his friends and baffled his opponents. His sudden demise, though foreseen by his intimate friends, caused unanimous regrets in the constituency and in the whole Quebec district.

Immediately after the decease of my predecessor, the government did not hesitate to call for an election on December 27 last, and the campaign started at once. My friends came to lend me a helping hand. I wish to mention right now the support given me by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger), the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Tremblay), the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Edouard Lacroix), the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Dussault), the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemount (Mr. Sarto Fournier) and the hon. member for Quebec West and South (Mr. Charles Parent). They placed before the electors of Lotbiniere not only one problem, but all the problems which the government has been called upon to consider and to try to solve since its return to power in 1935.

The speech from the throne mentions some new legislation. Before discussing the merit of the questions which are submitted to us, let me call your attention, Mr. Speaker, upon a public event which took place in the month of May. I am speaking of the coronation of our new sovereigns: George VI and Her Most Gracious Majesty, Queen Elizabeth. Not only the United Kingdom, the dominions and the other possessions of the British Empire, but the whole world paid the British crown a very real tribute of admiration. We are convinced that our new sovereigns will pursue the traditions of a dynasty which have given proof of their affection towards the people in respecting political and parliamentary liberties.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out the achievements of the government since 1935. Without special commitments, they undertook to work for the social and economic reestablishment of the whole country. Immediately after their return to power the government thought of the farming class, which I represent in this house. They endeavoured to develop our trade by negotiating forthwith with our neighbours, the United States, which are the natural market for our products, a trade agreement the good effects of which are already noticeable. Several other trade agreements have been made, namely with the United Kingdom, the other British possessions and some European countries. As we have already mentioned, by stimulating the trade and reducing the tariffs, we have increased the opportunities for work and thereby reduced the number of unemployed. The benefits of this policy were summed up in the address delivered by the president of the Royal Bank of Canada, on January 13 last, at the annual meeting of the bank's shareholders. This is what he said:

> Canada is a fortunate country. During the past century there have been more years when business in Canada has been on the up-grade or when prosperity has prevailed, than in any other part of the world. This fact was brought out in a careful study which analysed the activity of business in each important country. During 1936 the rate of recovery in Canada was phenomenal, and the high level attained in that year was maintained in 1937. In spite of the moderate recession at the end of the year, induced by uncertainty of the business outlook in the United States, the volume of activity in most lines of business compares not unfavourably with the record year of 1929, and in many lines, particularly mining, new high records have been established.

You will notice that this is not the evidence of a political partisan or of an admirer of any one in this house, but the testimony of a business man, who, before making such a statement, must have analysed the conditions. The conclusions which he arrives at are an encouragement for the present administration and should urge them to follow the course they have entered upon. The financial question is another very important issue. For the last two years the government has been striving to end the era of deficits. It is a difficult task, but the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) seems to face it with so much energy that we may soon hail a balanced budget.

Then, the statement made by the hon. the Minister of Finance on the first of January last was most gratifying. May I quote an excerpt from his survey of the economic conditions:

In my budget address last February, I expressed the belief that we could keep the overall deficit down to $35,000,000 for 1937-1938 and that we could attain our goal of a balanced budget in the following year. I am still confident that these expressed objectives will prove to be conservative. Had it not been for the western drought, we should have had a balanced budget this year.

He goes on to say:

I think I may say that the year 1937 has seen considerable progress made, not only in the restoration of our normal economic conditions but also in the strengthening of our national finances. We still have problems to solve, but the progress already made leaves no basis for discouragement.

That is a statement deserving to be brought to the attention of the electors of the constituency which I have the honour to represent here.

During that campaign, my fellow members of this house and I discussed all those problems, and at a mass meeting held at Saint-Flavien on the 19th of December last, my constituents even had the honour of welcoming the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) who was accompanied by the hon. the Minister of National Health (Mr. Power), and on that occasion, the right hon. the Minister of Justice delivered a speech which the people of the constituency of Lotbiniere, nay, which all the provinces and even the whole country had been awaiting. Mr. Speaker, the right hon. the Minister of Justice did not disappoint his audience. Speaking for over an hour, he placed before the province and the country the true problem on which the electors were called upon to vote on the 27th of December, and in a straightforward manner, he recalled what the government had done, emphasizing at the same time the main issues which, in such a campaign had to be considered and decided upon.

I need not add that, on such occasion, he was given a tribute not only of admiration but also of trust, because, speaking as a leader of the province of Quebec, as a statesman, he was able to place the problems in their true light without paying any attention to those appeals to passion and prejudice with which, ever since the beginning of the campaign, our opponents had endeavoured to sway public opinion.

[Mr. Francœur.]

But I must admit that they did not care to say anything about the government's record from 1935 to the present time. Two main issues were discussed. At first, they brought up the question of secession, thus reviving a subject which dated back several years; they said that the province of Quebec, in order to enjoy her autonomy, her privileges and her rights, had to withdraw from confederation. The other important issue was the national defence question.

Incidentally, I should point out that the government's opponent was not a Conservative, since the Conservative party had not seen fit to put in a candidate. A nationalist-independent candidate entered the lists. We did not hesitate, my friends and I, to discuss that issue of secession, we stated that the province of Quebec—and in this we knew that our feelings were those of the majority of electors—did not wish to withdraw from confederation, but wanted to remain in it as long as not only the letter but also the very spirit of confederation was adhered to.

Seeing that such an argument had not much effect upon the electors, our opponents stated that they would leave aside for the time being, the secession issue, that they would abstain from any agitation over that matter in order to examine and dwell upon the reasons why the province of Quebec should have greater antonomy.

Mr. Speaker, that school appealed to very few serious-minded men in the province of Quebec, but enlisted the support of a few young people eager to get on, of a few young men thwarted in their ambition, and I may add, of the dregs of nearly every party who believe they can seize the avenues of power by reviving that issue of the withdrawal of the province of Quebec from confederation.

But I may state in this house, to the representatives of other provinces of the dominion, that the province of Quebec means to continue as a member of the confederation, as long, I repeat, as the British North America Act is adhered to, and provided Quebec is treated like the other provinces of the dominion. Moreover, I had the opportunity to recall, even during the last campaign, the attitude I had taken on that issue, long before the last appeal to the electorate.

In 1909, when I had the honour of being requested by Sir Lomer Gouin, then premier of the province of Quebec, to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne in the Quebec legislature, the problem had already arisen, as a result of a nationalistic campaign. May I quote here the answer I made to those who sought directly or indirectly to stir up strife in connection with the confederation act:

Without denying his origins, without abjuring his language or his faith, without forgetting the traditions of his race, every Canadian should, instead of shutting himself up within the narrow confines of a retrograde provincialism, rise higher, widen his outlook, aim at the ideal of a Canadian nation in the broadest and most generous sense of the word. With this objective the self-governing provinces, while operating within their powers, will show greater cohesion and each one, in the ardour of mutual emulation, seeking to become the main factor of common progress, will ensure general prosperity. Because of its traditions, its geographical situation, its boundless wealth, our province should hold first place in the dominion and should be, if we so wish, the principal factor of this general prosperity. . . . Such is the noble and patriotic aim to which we should devote all our efforts.

The problem arose again later on, and in January 1918, answering those from other provinces, especially from the western and the maritime provinces, who were asking us what we of the province of Quebec wanted, I said:

What we want is to live and let live. To live while observing not only the letter of the constitution but especially its spirit; to live according to our tastes, our temperament and our mentality; to live as free citizens conscious of our duties and of our responsibilities; to live while working for the progress and development of our province, in the conviction that we are thus ensuring the progress and development of the country; to live while maintaining our language, our beliefs, our traditions, our institutions and our laws; in short, to live as loyal Canadians devoted to the British crown. To let live: giving to others the respect we ourselves demand; recognizing to them the liberty they claim in the exercise of their own vested rights; leaving them free to speak and teach their mother-tongue, to preserve their beliefs and their traditions, and even fighting with them, if need be, for the defence of this heritage which they cherish as much as we do. . . . Thus it is that we shall become a truly Canadian nation in which shall prevail that "strong community of interests constituted, as has been said, by the consciousness of sacrifices that each has made and is ready to make again." We would thus be protected against the causes of ruin which threaten us from within at the same time as we ward off dangers from without. We should then appear as a nation bound not solely by common interests, but also by a true union of hearts and minds.

Such were the considerations which we put forward throughout the last campaign in Lotbinière county in replying to those who, stirring up strife, ignoring the policies and accomplishments of the present government, endeavoured to turn public opinion and capture the vote of the people.

The other problem is that of national defence. In accepting to stand for Lotbinière county, I did not hesitate to tell the electors that I intended on this point to support the policy of the present government, because I considered that a citizen's first duty is to defend his country. My friends and I stated at every public meeting that we were in favour of defending our country, that we believed that the first line of defence was now in Canada, but that we did not want to contribute one cent for arming or equipping an expeditionary force, in short, that we do not intend to take part in foreign wars. Thus did we present the question and thus did the electors of Lotbinière understand it. The answer they gave on December 27 last shows that they wish, like all other citizens of Canada, of whatever race and whatever religion, to exercise the first duty of all citizens, that is the defence of his country.

The vote given in Lotbinière on December 27 has received various appraisals. It would serve no useful purpose to repeat here all the comments to which it has given rise. Some saw in the verdict a deeper meaning than the electors wished to give to it, going so far as to say that the voters of Lotbinière had declared themselves militarists. Others said that the result had no significance whatever and that it did not indicate approval of the government's policy.

Mr. Speaker, the vote cast in Lotbinière on December 27 last on the question of national defence means that the French Canadians of the province of Quebec want to do their duty. They are ready to contribute their share of the expenditure required for the defence of the country, but nothing more. They are not militarists. They want peace just as much as any citizen of any other province, but they also wish to see all needed measures taken for the reorganization of our militia according to the government's plans in order to ensure peace within and prevent attack from without. Such, I repeat, is the way the question was presented. And such is the way the electors of Lotbinière have understood it. At every meeting not only the older men, but especially the youth of the county, in great majority, applauded the statements made by the members of this house who assisted me in the campaign on this important question of national defence. That does not mean, though, that the province of Quebec wants the government to enter into the armament race. The result of the election means that Quebec is conscious of its duty and aware of its responsibilities and wishes, according to its means and in the light of the new conditions, to furnish its share of the expenditure essential to ensuring peace within the country and to prevent attack from without.

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne foreshadows measures of considerable importance. I do not propose to discuss them now.

The government has wisely stated in that speech that in the matter of amending the British North America Act they intended obtaining the approval of the provinces in the matter of unemployment insurance; in the event of a constitutional amendment being necessary—and there are those who doubt its necessity—they proposed doing likewise. The house will be called upon to consider these measures.

Another question which is agitating public opinion at the present time is that of the export to the United States of electric power from the provinces. I am sure that the opportunity will be afforded us during this session carefully to consider this question which deserves the serious attention of the house.

I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to speak at length. For some months past, not only in the province of Quebec but in all the provinces of Canada, journalists and others have been dwelling on the necessity of safeguarding Canadian unity. As I stated some moments ago, Canadian unity can be obtained only by respecting the constitution which governs us. To my mind, the confederation act should be treated with great prudence. Our constitution, as we know, was the result of a compromise and the fathers of confederation intended that it be not interfered with for many years. Not very long ago the question of whether the Canadian confederation offered prospects of enduring was still discussed. I think that after seventy years it is possible to answer that question affirmatively. But, as I said a moment ago, let us not lay hands on the British North America Act without the most careful consideration. It is particularly necessary to take account of the powers assigned to the central government and to the provinces.

The honour of proposing the address in reply to the speech from the throne I owe to a county that, ever since confederation, has remained faithful to Canadian Liberalism. Immediately after the victory the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) very kindly asked me to propose this address. It is an honour which I owe to the electors of Lotbinière and for which I am grateful to them. At the same time I offer my thanks to the right hon. the Prime Minister who particularly wished, I believe, to show his appreciation of the unswerving fidelity of the voters of Lotbinière to the principles and ideas which he has upheld in this chamber and elsewhere with such brilliance and success.

Someone has said:

Nations are not, any more than individuals, the result of spontaneous generation; they are the outcome of a long succession of efforts, sacrifices and devotion.

Every Canadian should ponder these words and be governed by them. He should strive by constant effort and sacrifice, by untiring devotion, to preserve the heritage of our political liberty, of our institutions and of our laws. It is in Canadian Liberalism, to which their attachment never ceases to grow, in their broadness of outlook, their love of freedom, their tolerance, their respect for all opinions and all rights that our people will find the ideals which uplift and strengthen their soul and sustain them in their struggle towards the realization of their destiny.

The men who uphold Canadian Liberalism to-day are the worthy successors of those who, in the ranks of their party, have no other aim than the greatness of their country. They have just received a new and striking expression of confidence which this house will surely ratify.

Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to propose:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to offer the humble thanks of this house to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both houses of parliament; namely,—

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Baron Tweedsmuir of Elsfield, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Member of the Order of the Companions of Honour, Governor General and Commander in Chief of the Dominion of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

Mr. R. M. WARREN (Renfrew North): Mr. Speaker, in rising to second the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne, may I first be permitted to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on behalf of the citizens of North Renfrew for the honour conferred upon us. There is no doubt that in conferring this honour he had in mind the paying of a tribute to the memory of an old and staunch friend, the late Doctor Matthew McKay. Doctor McKay was an unusual character. In his profession he served the poor just as readily and willingly as those who were able to pay. He always took an intense interest in public affairs. I suppose there had not been an election held in the last sixty years in which he did not take an active part. He was progressive in his ideas and always striving to raise the standards of the poorer classes.

During the past year we have lost many useful public servants. I am sure we all greatly regret their passing, but their works remain to keep their memories fresh.

In the speech from the throne mention is made of the coronation. It must have been pleasing to the Prime Minister and his ministers to know that while they were taking part in the festivities in England, all across the Dominion of Canada, in every city, town and hamlet, citizens from all walks of life were gathered together to rejoice and celebrate as was being done in England. This must have been pleasing also to Lord Tweedsmuir, the representative of our king, George VI. We have followed with intense interest the travels of His Excellency during the past year. A gentleman who is so anxious to gain first-hand knowledge of the remote parts of Canada must be a useful servant, not only of the people of Canada but of His Majesty the King.

Mention is made also of the tragic crop failures in Saskatchewan and southern Alberta. It is hard for us to realize just what these successive crop failures mean. There is not only a loss of purchasing power to thousands of farmers, but also a reduction in the revenues of our railways. Then in addition the thousands who have been left without any means of support must be cared for.

There is one feature of the handling of this situation which I think is worthy of mention. The government decided, I believe rightly, that it would be much cheaper to reduce the number of live stock in the dried out areas to the minimum rather than to import feed to carry them over the winter. The stock was gathered together and taken to feeding grounds in Manitoba. They were then graded and each animal was sent to the proper market. It appears to me that that was good business on the part of the government. As we all know, there are speculators who are ready to take advantage of the distress or lack of knowledge of the farmer, but the opportunity of taking that advantage was eliminated by the action taken by the government. Much of this stock was sold by auction at the yards in Manitoba and the returns from the sales were made to the farmers in the dried out areas.

We are glad to report that the condition of our farmers generally is gradually improving. Back taxes are being paid up and cars which have been locked up are again being taken out. Telephones which have been disconnected for some time are now being hooked up. The new agreement entered into between this government and our neighbours to the south has had a great deal to do with improving the condition of many of our Canadian farmers. To quote a few examples: In 1935 we sold $12,987 worth of alfalfa seed to the United States; in 1937 this had increased to $826,507. Of cattle we sold in 1935, $5,617,861 worth; in 1937 this had increased to $13,553,064, an increase of 141 per cent. Of horses we exported in 1935, $630,331 worth; in 1937 the export had increased to $1,309,535, an increase of 107 per cent. Of live poultry we shipped in 1935, $14,535 worth; in 1937 this had increased to $833,235. The percentage of increase in this case would be so great as to look rather ridiculous, so I have not worked it out. Of cream, in 1935 we shipped $7 worth; in 1937 the value of our shipments was $191,911, and even at that we did not nearly fill our quota.

These results do not appear to have interfered at all with our trade to the British Isles. We find that, as regards the export of cattle, in 1935 we shipped to Great Britain 6,704 cattle; in 1937 this had increased to 9,610, an increase in the numbers shipped of 43 per cent. In 1935 the value was $428,838; in 1937 it was $858,347, an increase of 100 per cent. Of cheese we shipped in 1935 527,196 hundredweight; in 1937 we shipped 811,815 hundredweight, representing an increase in quantity of 53 per cent and in value of 97 per cent.

There is in Renfrew county, and, I suppose, in a great many other counties throughout Canada, quite a number of farmers who to a considerable extent depend upon forest products for their living. We have now reached a stage where we have a market for any of those products. No longer is our pulpwood rotting at the sidings and our mature timber deteriorating in the woods for lack of a market. Yet we as farmers have a great deal to learn, particularly as to the proper preparation of our products for market as well as the proper method of marketing them. It is comforting to know that in this regard the government proposes to give to the farmers of this dominion every possible assistance. I will give a small example of what may be accomplished in this respect During the last two or three years the live stock branch of the federal government has been responsible for the organizing of some twenty-six associations throughout the province of Ontario which handle eggs and poultry on a graded basis. This business is done at the very minimum of cost. The farmer who brings in his product knows he is going to be paid for it on a graded basis, and that the grade he gets at the grading station will be accepted on any market. It is estimated that this has resulted in an increase of three cents per dozen to the farmers who deliver eggs to these associations. That is only a beginning, one small beginning, perhaps, but there are many opportunities; for the field is so large. It is some comfort to know that throughout Canada, outside this house as well as among many hon. members, men are studying and grappling with these questions, and it is to be hoped that the farmers generally will cooperate to bring about better methods of marketing our products.

We have heard a great deal during recent years of the problem of unemployment, and it is some comfort to know that the figures of the past year show a decrease, in this respect, of 213,000 persons receiving relief, representing a decrease of 21 per cent as compared with 1936. In thinking of this question, or for that matter any other, one is likely to be more or less influenced by local conditions; and I am glad to be able to report that, as compared with 1934, in the north riding of Renfrew relief has been reduced by 85 per cent. I am also pleased to be able to report that for the last seven months of 1937 we have not had any employable men in receipt of relief. I do not think that conditions are particularly abnormal in Renfrew county, but I want to take this opportunity of paying a tribute to the active employment officials and to employers of labour in that county. We have officials who are not afraid or unwilling to go out and hunt jobs for men, and employers who are willing to give a man a chance to get experience and to become hardened up to his job after some months of idleness. We have had splendid cooperation from our officials and our employers of labour. This condition is not anything of a miracle; it is, I believe, something that might be accomplished in a great many municipalities if the same effort were put forth.

A great deal is said on public platforms regarding the problem of youth. In the rural districts, particularly in those of North Renfrew, this has never been much of a problem. Our boys and girls, apparently, are capable of going out and finding their own jobs. We have had some very happy experiences, particularly during the past year, of young fellows who, having drifted away to the mining areas or the woods, have come back in shining cars, well dressed, with a sufficient competence to enable them to marry local girls. The neighbours get together and give them a grand reception, showering them with gifts, and away they go to become home builders in Canada.

I suppose this problem of youth is one that has to be faced in the towns and cities. During the last session there was a move on the part of this government to train the youth of Canada, and now upwards of fourteen thousand of our young people are receiving training on a fifty-fifty basis as between the province and the dominion government. These young people are being trained in industry, in forestry, in domestic work and in many useful callings. I note that this work is to be carried on, and that a school for the training of girls is to be opened this week, I believe, in the city of Ottawa.

I have often wondered why more of our young women do not take up this line of work. It is true that most of our girls prefer to be office workers or school teachers, but it is often very true that the girl who is willing to go into a good home and do domestic work has more money in her pocket at the end of the year than the office girl or the school teacher; and in engaging in such work she probably gains about as much in culture and really useful learning as she would in a ladies' college.

It is important, I suppose, that we should know what our young people are working at; but it is much more important that we should know that they have an opportunity to work at some useful occupation. I am glad to observe, therefore, the indication in the speech from the throne that the government will continue to deal with this problem. This is only the beginning, and I feel confident that what is now being done will develop into something that will be of great benefit throughout the dominion.

In the collection of revenues, there have been no new sources of taxation this year, so that if we have an increased revenue that is a sure indication that conditions have improved. If there is an increase in revenue in all branches, that again should indicate that the improvement is general. Now what are the facts? In a statement issued recently by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) we are told that in the first eight months of the fiscal year our revenues had improved over those of the previous year by 18·8 per cent; or, stated in figures, our revenues were up by $57,200,000. The total for those eight months was $360,330,000, or the highest ever recorded.

The use of the mails ought to be a fairly true indication of conditions, because when conditions are exceptionally bad, people hesitate to buy postage stamps. In the Post Office Department, however, we have a wonderful machine that delivers our mails in sunshine or rain, every day, in rural as well as in urban districts, a machine that manages somehow to take care of the great increase in the amount of mail handled during the Christmas rush. And what is the situation in that department? The Post Office Department is operated, not for profit, but for service, though if it can show a surplus so much the better; for a surplus naturally helps the taxpayer, whereas if there is a deficit it has to be paid by the same taxpayer. We have a surplus in the Post Office Department of $3,735,976.73, the highest on record.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that in sixty-nine years this particular department has shown forty-two deficits as compared with twenty-seven surpluses? It is gratifying, therefore, to know that there is a surplus in the Post Office Department; it undoubtedly indicates more favourable conditions among the people. In the matter of revenue, it is also worthy of note that the great increase has come from our external trade. Our external trade is largely responsible for the improvement; and there is one feature in this connection which must cause a tingle of pride in every Canadian, and that is that Canada, a nation of eleven million people, now occupies fourth position among the exporting countries of the world.

It should also be of interest to the Canadian people that during the past year new trade agreements have been arranged with fifteen different countries, and that negotiations in the direction of liberalizing trade have become almost continuous. I am sure there is nothing that would do more to prevent war and to put an end to the fear of war than fair trade agreements. I hope that the example set by the Department of Trade and Commerce will be emulated by all the nations of the world.

We have in Canada at present a royal commission of inquiry which apparently has been causing a measure of unrest in the minds of some people lest changes which might be proposed would create disharmony between provinces. Undoubtedly their fears are uncalled for. I had the pleasure of attending a little dinner the other day at which were present members of this house from almost every province in the dominion. The impression I gained at that dinner was that if the matter is left with hon. members on this side of the house, harmony and unity will prevail.

Taking the good with the bad I believe this government can face the coming year with great courage and optimism and hopefulness. I doubt whether in the history of Canada any government ever more fully enjoyed the confidence of the people. This sentiment is clearly felt as one travels here and there throughout the country; one gathers it not from Liberals alone, but from members of different political parties. The people feel an assured confidence that this government is carrying on and will carry on in the best interests of our great dominion. If any proof of that were required we have sufficient in the fact that since this house met last year six vacancies have been filled, five of which were filled by Liberal members. One went to the opposition, but even that was due to the generosity of the government in allowing an acclamation.

I take great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in seconding the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Francoeur) for an address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I greatly regret that an accident in transport prevented me from hearing the undoubtedly admirable speech in which this motion was moved. I heard a portion of the address made by the hon. member who seconded the motion, and if the whole speech relied, as much as did the part I heard, upon his imagination, I am quite certain it was an admirable performance.

The speech from the throne might well have been an address prepared before the war; but in these days it is difficult to understand any such document being submitted to a responsible parliament in the British dominions. It leaves such uncertainty in the minds of those who read it; it contains so many provisos, and at times is couched in language so ambiguous, that one cannot be sure whether it was a product of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) when opposing the Committee for Industrial Organization or of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) when supporting it.

With the first paragraph of the speech I think we can all agree. The most important event of last year in our world was the coronation of the king and queen; and that during the past year they have succeeded in so performing a very difficult task as to command the admiration and respect of their own peoples and the esteem and regard of the world is something with which we are all well pleased. It strikes me as a matter of singular importance that a young man and a young woman should have offered their lives as lives of service to the people in the manner in which the king and queen did at the coronation. It has been well said that the spectacle of the coronation was not only a great pageant, it was more; it was a service so deeply moving in all its aspects as to impress men and women with the magnitude of the task undertaken by the king and queen as well as the duties and responsibilities that rest upon their subjects.

But when we have dealt with that we cannot forget that at the same time there met an imperial conference. If one reads the records of that conference as they were presented to us a few days ago it is difficult to understand what it met for. But if one reads the reports in the newspapers he finds a somewhat deeper significance. If the speech of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) as reported in the press—and not in the proceedings—is to be taken as being of value, he undertook to interpret the will of the chief executive of a foreign country to those who were assembled with him as representing the British commonwealth of nations. I do not pronounce upon the authenticity of those reports; it is not for me to do so, but they appeared at some length in leading journals, and doubtless there was some foundation for their being thus printed.

But there is one thing upon which we can all agree, and that is the pride and satisfaction we feel in the knowledge that the British commonwealth has withstood so many shocks during the year through which we have passed. Menaced as it has been on more fronts than one, it has still stood four-square to all the winds that blow, and we know that whatever else may be said, the greatest assurance we have for the maintenance of our democracy and our institutions lies in the preservation of that commonwealth of nations amongst the peoples of the world. There may be ample opportunity on a later occasion to discuss matters connected with the imperial conference of 1937. I do not propose to enter upon a discussion at this moment with respect to these matters. But it is of course of singular importance to us as well as to the other dominions that for the first time the new sovereign was crowned as king, and his consort as queen, of the overseas dominions by name, as indicated in the speech from the throne. The imperial conference did and does afford an opportunity to discuss problems of common concern to everyone who lives within the commonwealth. That the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) availed himself of that opportunity is not unexpected. Those who have had the pleasure of reading his utterances, such as those delivered in Victoria not long since, will realize the striking effect they had upon his mind.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Even the minister himself laughs loudly as he recalls the effect upon his mind as indicated by his speeches delivered on those occasions. About that I shall have something to say before I resume my seat, but there is one thing that did not take place at the imperial conference with respect to defence. That was that responsible people should publish in this country the extent of the provision we have made for the defence of Canada. When I read in the press, as I did, a statement that had about it every sign of having been authorized by someone, as to the character and type of the defences we are erecting on Vancouver Island and on the mainland, I wondered if at the imperial conference the minister was told that this might be desirable. Those who are responsible for these publications, to which I shall refer presently, have done a grievous wrong to this country, for they have published to the world the size, calibre and weight of the guns we are to use, and what their prospective range may be. No such thing has ever happened in any country that I know of in the world before, and I do suggest that the Minister of National Defence at least did not learn that rule of strategy at the meetings of the imperial conference.

I should like to say how much I rejoice, as do those who are associated with me, in the gratifying progress of this country during the last twelve months. The upward trend began in 1933. The president of one of our banks pointed out that last year the progress was greater than in any other year excepting the progress in 1934 over 1933. It is desirable to point out, it seems to me, that there has been little departure, by the new administration, from the policies of the government that formerly held office, and that at the end of two years, entering upon the third session, they, in common with other governments of the world, rejoice because of a prosperity which, during the last twelve months, was very great indeed. But it has been interrupted. It will be found that the report of our exports in the months of November and December last shows that they have decreased as compared with November and December of 1936, and it is also well to recall the fact that the favourable trade balance which we had with the United States, amounting to over $50,000,000, has been altered to an adverse balance on visible commodities amounting to several millions of dollars.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to some of his utterances in 1929 and 1930. He will recall how, in those days of buoyant trade and expanding revenues he, as Minister of Finance, pointed out that all was well; yet within a few short months a nation that depended upon its external trade found its favourable balances destroyed, with adverse balances created and depression upon us unequalled in the history of the country. It is true that the depression was not limited to Canada, but it cannot for a moment be denied that the conditions that exist in this country, to which the Minister of Finance referred in 1929 and 1930, are conditions that obtained in 1937, and the interruption of that seeming prosperity—for I call it but seeming when it depends upon export trade—in November and December by a falling off in our export trade to the extent of many millions of dollars, cannot be explained solely by the lessening of wheat exports. When we contemplate these matters those of us who remember that history has an unfortunate habit of repeating itself must reflect as to what steps are being taken by the government of the day to provide against the conditions of which these are symptomatic signs. You have it in the United States; you have it here.

It is worthy of note, further, that the seeming prosperity to which attention is directed with respect to export trade as well as with respect to domestic activities is not unconnected with the armaments being provided by the nations of the world. I wonder if trouble has been taken to investigate the extent to which our export trade, to which reference is made, depends upon the production of war materials by nations that are providing armaments for their own defence or for aggressive purposes. I wonder if that is being considered. I wonder if the government realize that upon an analysis of those figures, which properly may be made at some future time, it will appear that the prosperity to which we allude depends in no small measure upon the armaments that are being created by the nations of the world, for the production of which Canadian raw materials are being acquired.

That in itself should make the minister pause and reflect, for I recall that in 1930 he reduced the sales tax in the face of a positive deficit. Then when he came into office he increased it from six per cent to eight per cent.

But, Mr. Speaker, I want to go a step further. As I came in the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Warren) was referring to the great revenues that this country has been producing, and he pointed out that not in the history of Canada had we ever raised so much money as national revenue as we have collected during the last few months. Stripped of verbiage, Mr. Speaker, that merely means that the Minister of Finance imposed higher taxes per capita upon the people than have ever been imposed upon them before. That is all it means. There is only one method by which money can be collected. That method is by taxation. I was blamed once for directing attention to that fact. The taxes imposed upon the Canadian people during the last few months have been higher per capita than at any time previously in the history of this dominion. Yet we rejoice and say, "Behold, the great revenues we have taken from the Canadian people. We have retained the excise tax that we railed against when we were out of office. We have retained the three per cent excise tax upon commodities coming into this country." Before the previous government went out of office it removed it with respect to Great Britain and the British Empire. "We have retained our sales tax, not at the old rate of six per cent but at the rate of eight per cent," which in itself has been a tremendous tax upon business. "We have retained the three cent postage rate," and the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, who rejoiced over these great revenues, must have reflected upon the fact that while in days of great depression, in order to maintain the service, it was necessary to make the rate three cents per ounce, in these days of abounding prosperity, the same rate must be retained. Rather than boast of the surplus with respect to the Post Office Department he should have said, "I regret that there has been no increase in the amounts paid to rural mail carriers. I regret that there has been no reduction in postal rates." I recall that last year I asked the minister whether or not he thought it was likely that he would be able to make any such reduction, and he regretted that it would not be so. Now his faithful follower comes and says, "Behold the surplus; behold the surplus!" Is it the purpose of the government to conduct the Post Office Department simply to create a surplus, or is it the purpose to render a service to the public? Can they rejoice because men who were poorly paid when the minister was not in office are now paid at the same rate? It all depends upon where the minister sits.

So far as I have been able to see, the Minister of Finance has not remitted the stamp tax on cheques, nor have I heard of a remission of the excise tax. Who within the sound of my voice can for a moment forget the pathetic tale which was unfolded day after day about the iniquitous sugar tax? Why, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) must recall his fervid eloquence as he told the people of this country of the sad plight in which they were put, because the sugar tax was reduced only from two cents to one cent per pound. There it still remains. Incredible as it may seem, it is the same one cent per pound. Doubtless at an early day, if an election is imminent, the Minister of Finance will reduce or abolish it, just as in 1930 he reduced the sales tax from two per cent to one per cent. I mention these matters because they seem to have a direct bearing upon the observations made in the speech from the throne.

Mr. WARREN: May I ask the right hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. BENNETT: I think it might be desirable for the hon. member to resume his seat.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the right hon. gentleman the hon. member may ask a question.

Mr. BENNETT: When I have finished the hon. member may ask any questions he wishes.

I have observed, of course, the reference made to the conditions under which we live in western Canada. The prosperity that has been so apparent in some parts of Canada has not been apparent in western Canada, except in the Turner valley. There has been a lack of moisture for which, in days gone by, the members of the present government would have charged the then government with full responsibility. We do not charge that lack of moisture to their account. We do not think, for instance, that a magic wand could be waved by the Minister of Agriculture by which he could reduce the Department of Trade and Commerce to a mere nonentity, will provide moisture for the stricken areas of the west. And we have some doubt as to whether or not a Shaw report would be capable of doing it. I feel quite sure, however, that if we could set up the machinery suggested by that report we might be able to provide, shall we say, some provincial premier with larger powers such as were proposed with respect to a high commissioner.

However, I have only this to say with respect to the administration of the act: It is still a politically administered act. At the proper time and place I should like to bring to this chamber a number of communications, provided the reading of them would not worry the house. But with respect to the relief afforded to those who have been so unfortunate as to live within the areas in question, it is quite clear that this government has divorced itself from some of its responsibility, and has left it with the provincial administration.

I shall give an illustration of what I mean, one which may be multiplied many times over. In their wisdom the government may decide that a herd must be reduced; we will say from twenty to ten. The order goes forth, accordingly. The reason is obvious; it lies in the difficulty of providing fodder and feed for the purpose of taking care of twenty head of cattle. The number is reduced to ten, and feed is provided accordingly. But unfortunately—and I say unfortunately, because I am prepared to support my statement with cases, days and dates—when an individual believes that his herd should not be reduced to ten he has recourse to a political effort, and I suppose he cannot be blamed for it. His efforts may induce the authority to say that for the ten may be substituted fifteen. That has been going on constantly. In case after case and community after community men have gone down and said, "It is desirable that John Smith should not be cut down to ten. He is a good fellow; he has great influence; we do not wish to lose his good will. Let us permit him to retain the fifteen he says he must have." It is not altogether unexpected, but our complaint is that these matters should be subject to a purely political administration. The other day in a small community a friend of mine who was a stranger to that community found three inspectors operating. One was in the local area, one was in the combined areas and there was a superintendent—to inspect the inspectors. I assume that is a very difficult task in times like these.

These conditions are inevitable if the conduct of business is left to purely political sources. To quote the language used on many occasions by the first minister, human nature being what it is we are not surprised that this goes on. If any hon. members have any doubt upon it they can verify the facts in a very few minutes.

I repeat that when the money of the taxpayers is being spent in this way it certainly should be done by some independent commission, so as to prevent not only the opportunity but the temptation for political administration. However, I am not so young that I do not realize how difficult it is for governments to withstand the pressure brought to bear, as in this instance, when herds are being cut down, when fodder is to be provided and representations are made as to the desirability of making exceptions in the cases of Smith, Jones or some others. When we multiply that procedure the effect is to create dissatisfaction and dissension and a measure of unhappiness and uneasiness in the community, area or province, and I suggest it is a procedure which should be avoided. I make the criticism because it has come to my attention that there have been many such cases, and that they have not occurred by accident but have been done by design. Knowing something of political considerations as they affect the judgment of men, I am simply pointing out that the government should take steps to prevent action of that kind being taken.

The Department of Agriculture has desired to expand its activities, and I suggest without regard to the provision of the statute—for after all, there are statutes which have to do with the powers of ministers, statutes which state that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has one power and the Minister of Agriculture another. All ministers, under the statutes creating their departments, are supposed to discharge the duties devolving upon them and arising from those statutes. We have a singular circumstance here, for we have the statute creating the Department of Agriculture and indicating the work that that department is to do, the definite purposes for which it was created, the duties which it is its responsibility to discharge. I was going to read them, but I shall not take the time to do so. The Department of Trade and Commerce has certain obligations. The obligations of the two departments do not agree, of course.

I would point out that there has not been a time in this country when there has not been some measure of conflict between these two departments. On the one hand we have the Department of Agriculture contending that it is interested in goods or commodities after they have left these shores. On the other hand we have the Department of Trade and Commerce, with its emissaries in all parts of the world, contending that the duty devolves upon them of seeing to the distribution or sale of the commodities which the Department of Agriculture has properly prepared for sale.

The Minister of Agriculture appointed a commission to go to England. I observe from the report of that commission that the report is made to the Minister of Agriculture. That report deals with matters overseas, matters which under the statute come properly within the purview of the duties of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is not for me to determine how these matters are to be settled, but it is my duty to point out the fact that there is conflicting authority. I recall that the Minister of Agriculture warmly espoused the cause of the Committee for Industrial Organization in a recent provincial election, while the Minister of Labour was censored by at least two papers for, as one paper said, butting into the Ontario political situation and stating that he was opposed to the attitude of Mr. Hepburn with respect to the Committee for Industrial Organization. I cannot but think that this is a clear manifestation of an effort by the Minister of Agriculture to see what can be done in the way of having the Committee for Industrial Organization unite the forces of the high commissioner's office in London with those of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this country. I cannot explain it in any other way.

I fancy the Minister of Agriculture has his little joke as he reflects at night upon the achievements of the day. He has been able to bring a measure of order out of chaos. Applying the C.I.O. principle to his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his legionnaires, and to the Minister of Labour and his wide-scattered army, he has been able to achieve a measure of success as is indicated in the speech from the throne by these words:

> The Department of Agriculture has been reorganized and its services consolidated along lines designed to improve the standard and acceptability of Canadian farm products.

Where? At home or abroad? That is where the fine Italian hand of the Minister of Agriculture is at work, in leaving out any reference to where the acceptability of Canadian farm products is to be improved. Is it to be among the peoples of the world? That is the job of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, so let us leave it out. Do we traval abroad? Do we set up our new standards for use here or somewhere else? Perhaps the Prime Minister will explain why no reference is made in this document to the community to which the statement refers.

It looks like a brilliant stroke to talk about reorganizing the Department of Agriculture, but I have not seen any statute which authorizes this reorganizing. I can remember that the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) pointing out on more than one occasion that there must be statutory authority for anything that is done, yet we have the reorganization of this department without any statutory authority. The law as it stands upon the statute books has not been altered, and it indicates with certainty and clearness the authority of the respective ministers. I regard this as important. It is the old story as to where the authority of one department begins and the authority of the other ends—there is nothing new about it. If this is to be determined, as it should be finally, then it should be done by statute and not otherwise. If it was done by order in council presumably the order in council would have been laid upon the table in order that we might understand and appreciate the extent to which reorganization had been carried out. I thought I had among my papers a typewritten statement of the duties of the two departments, but I do not seem to be able to lay my hand upon it. However, there will be ample opportunity to discuss the matter on another occasion.

The next matter that engages the attention of the house at the instance of the government has to do with the air service, about which we will hear more when the minister proceeds with his bill. According to the bill which appears upon the order paper we are about to enter upon an ambitious scheme of transacting air business outside of our own country.

Reference is made in the speech from the throne to the work of three commissions. One commission was appointed under the provisions of the Veterans' Assistance Commission Act, 1936; another was appointed to inquire into the textile industry, and then there is the national employment commission. The national employment commission has made a report to which apparently the chairman has given very careful attention. It might be a matter of inquiry as to why no steps are being taken to implement this report. If the commission was of the importance indicated, why has its report not been implemented? Why does the speech from the throne not indicate that it is proposed to do so? From the language of this document it would appear that the commission has concluded its labours and is now to go out of business.

I come now to the commission appointed to inquire into the textile industry. This commission was appointed two years ago, shortly after the present government came into office; we are now at the end of January, 1938, and the report of the commission has not yet been filed or tabled in the house. There was a tariff board to which this matter might have been referred. Those of us who have followed the language used by counsel who appeared on behalf of the government when attacking the industry and the officers of the industry wonder why one who was selected by the government to represent it on many occasions during the progress of the grain inquiry finds it not inconsistent with his sense of decency to become a director of the Dominion Textile Company.

Mr. DUNNING: That is quite wrong.

Mr. BENNETT: The press carried photographs of Mr. Ralston along with that announcement.

Mr. DUNNING: I am quite sure that my right hon. friend's statement is in error and that he would not want to do an injustice to any individual by making such a statement.

Mr. BENNETT: It was so stated in the Financial Post.

Mr. DUNNING: In addition, Colonel Ralston was not counsel on the textile inquiry.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that he was. I said he was counsel on the grain inquiry. I also said he had joined the directorate of the Dominion Textile Company; and in the Toronto Financial Post, as well as in the daily papers of Montreal, his photograph was published with the statement that he had joined that board.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my right hon. friend that I saw the report, or one of them, to which he refers, and asked Colonel Ralston if the report was true. Colonel Ralston said to me in reply that his name had been placed on the board of directors but that he had refused to accept an appointment.

Mr. BENNETT: I am very glad to hear that, for the simple reason that it seemed to me to be wholly inconsistent with the discharge of the duties of counsel to the government of this country on the grain inquiry for him to occupy such a position, when counsel for the dominion in the textile inquiry had denounced those companies in the terms in which he had. Those who followed the language used in the denunciation of the textile companies will understand exactly why I make that statement. I am very glad indeed to hear what the Prime Minister has said; I regret to say that I do not think it has attained much publicity, but I trust that this publicity will end any question that may arise in that regard.

But let us go a step further. Why has this matter dragged for two years? Why, when the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) was so insistent with respect to an immediate inquiry—which was granted—has two years elapsed and no report been made? There was a tariff board, to which it was not referred; this special commission of one man was set up for the purpose of making the inquiry and side by side with that there was imposed upon him the further duty of making an inquiry which took him out of Canada as well as over every part of this dominion. I should like to know why. There are many people in this country who would like to know why. And why should we not yet have the report to which reference is made? It is said of these commissions that reports will be tabled in due course, and the other day we did receive one report, or I think two, but that on the textile industry has not yet come to hand. It will be recalled—the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) will remember—that the same commissioner was making a report on the grain act. That report has not yet been received. Presumably it was quite as important as any other that could be made with respect to one of the major industries of this country.

We are next referred to the stresses and strains that this confederation has encountered during the last seventy years and to the work of the royal commission that is dealing with problems connected with those stresses and strains. I have had occasion more than once to refer to this commission, and I will observe that on two occasions, at least, the adjectives that I used were somewhat misplaced and the remarks I made with reference to one member were attributed as a reference to another. I think I had better clear up at once any misapprehension there may be. I was opposed to this commission. I still am, and nothing has more clearly vindicated the soundness of that judgment than what has taken place since it came into being. Behold the spectacle of a commission opening its proceedings in the new provinces of the west and every one of those provinces making demands upon the federal exchequer, which very naturally have their effect upon those who are responsible for the conduct of government in the older provinces where the population is more numerous and their contribution to revenue consequently greater. But the real difficulty about that commission as compared with a conference is this, that in the one case you have an immediate reply made to what is said. You have that debate, that discussion by which a misstatement cannot go unchallenged. That was the whole benefit of the discussions with respect to confederation. The other day one of the newspapers referred to "the commission on reconfederation"; and it is true that this commission is given power to deal with the distribution of legislative powers.

Now, in dealing with that matter it must be clear that no one excepting the provinces themselves is in a position to speak with any authority with respect to their views. What can be done in the progress of debate? Many a view is put forward which is challenged by the federal power. A discussion ensues and usually an accommodation is arrived at. It is said that the genius of British government is the power to arrive at an accommodation when diverse views are being presented. Here there is no opportunity for that sort of thing. Here there is no opportunity for that discussion between representatives of the federal power on the one hand and the provinces on the other which is essential to sound understanding. And if there is to be a conference afterwards between the provinces and the dominion, think of what has been done to make that conference abortive; think of what has been done to nullify and defeat the very purpose for which it came into being. You have already prejudged your position ex parte. You have done it without affording the opportunity for that fruitful discussion and debate which alone will enable agreement to be arrived at.

Apart altogether from that, I did protest against a commission which undertakes to redefine constitutional powers being composed of members of one shade of political opinion. I want to make it abundantly clear that I have the most profound regard for the chairman of that commission. Not only that, I said on one occasion that if a vacancy were to occur in the office of chief justice of Ontario, it being the duty of the prime minister to make the recommendation, I should have recommended Mr. Rowell for that position. I so stated to the then chief justice. But that does not detract from the fact that Mr. Rowell in public life or as a private citizen was a man with strong political views. That is what I said. And I say with respect to the editor of the Winnipeg Free Press, Doctor Dafoe, that he is a man who has managed by one means or another to insult all those who do not share his political opinions. He has been doctor in chief and physician extraordinary to the Bracken government ever since it came into office, and he had the pleasure the other day of having them appear before him and say that if something was not done, they would default. Presumably now, as physician in chief to the whole dominion, he desires to apply a remedy with a like result.

With regard to the gentleman who represents the maritime provinces, I repeat that for bitter partisanship I have never known his equal. I say further that he published a book recently and sent the proofs of it for revision to many people throughout this dominion, and from beginning to end it was a tissue of misrepresentations and false statements that had to be corrected in order that it might have a semblance of truth attached to it. That is the position with respect to it, and I know whereof I speak.

Mr. MARTIN: That is not true.

Mr. BENNETT: Let there be no misunderstanding with respect to it.

Mr. DUNNING: What was the book?

Mr. BENNETT: I think it had to do with the foreign policy of the right hon. the Prime Minister—it was a tissue of misrepresentation, of inaccurate statements, untrue statements—I use the word deliberately, and any one who wants to see the proof can verify what I have said.

Mr. MARTIN: I have seen it.

Mr. BENNETT: And when it is corrected I have no doubt it will be put on a proper basis, because corrections have been made in some instances by those who are in a position to make them. What is more, copies were sent to many people in this country—

Mr. MARTIN: I am one of them.

Mr. BENNETT: That indicates a lack of prescience on the part of the author, because he knew there would be no doubt of what the hon. member would do as to agreeing with anything he might say.

In its very nature, this commission must be harmful rather than helpful in dealing with this problem. Look what you have done already. You have heard the claims of Manitoba, of Saskatchewan, of Alberta, of British Columbia; you are about to hear the claims of the eastern provinces; and now you have the two central provinces, through their premiers, already taking a definite position in the matter. This is what we have, instead of a meeting together as our fathers did at Quebec when they were forming this constitution—or meeting together as they did in the United States to frame the American constitution. Would there have been an American constitution had it been made a matter for a commission? No; the people of the American colonies met together; and those who have read the record that Madison kept of those proceedings realize how constitutions are framed. They realize that accommodation is indispensable, that accommodation can be arrived at only when men have an opportunity at once to controvert an opinion or to assail a position that is taken by an adversary. I take one view, you take another; I meet you at once with my argument and you meet me forthwith with yours in reply; and along a middle course we arrive at an accommodation. That is the manner in which our constitution was framed; that is the way in which it was done at Quebec. Those who have followed the debates of confederation and know the inner history of the subject as recorded by Macdonald in some of his correspondence will realize how difficult it was, in the very nature of things, to arrive at a conclusion.

Now let us look at the western position. The western position relied, more perhaps than upon anything else, upon a brief prepared by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), at a time when he did not occupy that position—a brief prepared on behalf of the province of Nova Scotia, and entitled, A Submission on Dominion-Provincial Relations and the Fiscal Disabilities of Nova Scotia Within the Canadian Federation. I hold the document in my hand, and I make this statement, that in respect of the presentation on behalf of the western provinces reliance has been placed upon this very document, showing how unkind, unjust and unfair we, as a dominion, have been to these provinces, because figures were given by the minister to show the extent to which the tariff, in his opinion, had operated to the detriment of these communities.

Let us go a step further. Setting out the basis upon which he proceeded, he took the tariff as it stood in 1930, taking it after it had been revised, and despite the fact that those who were concerned about it had said they would not increase their prices. Nor had they done so, except with respect to raw materials; and, as is well known, it was but a temporary tariff to meet an emergent situation. The Minister of Labour, with great care, sets out the whole historic side of confederation; then proceeds to show, in his own inimitable manner, the extent to which, as he says, the situation which he describes is attributable to the tariff. He takes, for the purpose of arriving at his conclusions, the prices of the goods plus duty, not what was actually paid, but what would be paid; and he computes therefrom, in a cumulative way, the losses sustained by these provinces by reason of the tariff. The figures are set out in great tables, and these tables have now been made the basis of the claims set up on behalf of the western provinces.

Let me ask this question: Is it consistent with our idea of democratic government that a Minister of Labour should remain in a government that has been practising the same sort of tariff policies with respect to these provinces as did the government of which he complains? That is what I put to the house. Let us have no misapprehension about that. If these tariffs were wrong at that time, then they are wrong now. They are just as wrong in the hands of a Liberal government as they would be in the hands of a Conservative administration. And yet the hon. gentleman sees fit to sit as a member of the present government and see the province, whose brief he presented on that occasion, continue to be the victim of these tariffs. He sees the rest of Canada the victim of these tariffs, and he has not a word of protest. Has his voice been heard in this house, since he came here, demanding that these tariffs be wiped out? Has he asked that they be abolished? I have not heard it, nor do I see anything suggesting it anywhere on the record of Hansard. You will find, perhaps, one or two moments when he had some little hesitancy about the soundness of his own conclusions, but at page 98 of the brief he says:

> The most accurate index of the varying rates of provincial consumption is afforded by the statistics of retail sales in Canada and its provinces as published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. On the basis of these figures the rates of provincial consumption in the various provinces are as follows—

> The next step in the calculation is to apply these percentages, representing provincial rates of consumption, to the total figure representing the gross value of protected goods manufactured and consumed in Canada, viz., $2,061,787,041. The results thus obtained indicate the consumption of protected goods of Canadian manufacture in the various provinces:

Prince Edward Island	$ 9,896,577
New Brunswick	62,472,147
Quebec	490,292,958
Ontario	817,704,740
Manitoba	141,438,591
Saskatchewan	141,644,769
British Columbia	182,880,510

> In order to obtain the figures representing the cost of the tariff in each province in terms of enhancement of prices due to protection the same procedure is followed as in items "3" and "4" of the preceding computation. When the comparative world prices are computed and the average ad valorem duty of 26 per cent in 1931 is applied to the results thus obtained the following tabulation sets out the provincial distribution of the cost of the tariff in terms of enhancement of prices to consumers in the various provinces.

Is it any wonder we have stress and strain when a member of the government puts up that sort of plea to the west? Is it any wonder there is friction? Who created it? Who created the cry of "east against west"? I shall presently refer to an observation of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) but this is what the present Minister of Labour said with respect to the enhancement of prices:

Province	Enhancement of prices due to tariff
Prince Edward Island	$ 2,042,150
Nova Scotia	15,784,124
New Brunswick	12,891,077
Quebec	101,171,562
Ontario	168,732,723
Manitoba	29,185,740
Saskatchewan	29,228,285
Alberta	27,909,396
British Columbia	37,737,247

> In order to indicate more clearly the comparative position of the several provinces in relation to tariff costs, it is desirable to place such costs on a per capita basis. The following table gives the computation of the per capita distribution of tariff costs by provinces for the year 1931:

Province	Per capita tariff cost
Prince Edward Island	$23 20
Nova Scotia	30 78
New Brunswick	31 58
Quebec	35 20
Ontario	49 17
Manitoba	41 69
Saskatchewan	31 71

Then follows a recapitulation in which the tariff subsidy per capita is set out. The tariff subsidy in Ontario is $64.32 per capita; in Quebec, $46.23; in Manitoba, $28.44; in Saskatchewan, $3.55; in Alberta, $11.22; and in British Columbia, $32.03. There is the statement made by the present Minister of Labour, which is the basis upon which the claim is being made by the four western provinces before the Rowell commission. With respect to Nova Scotia he closes in this glorious manner:

> By segregating the figures of the above analysis, which apply to Nova Scotia, it is possible to present a recapitulation which will indicate the effect of the Canadian tariff on manufactured goods upon the income of this province for the given year 1931.

Total tariff cost in terms of enhancement of prices to consumers in Nova Scotia	$15,784,124
Total tariff subsidies in terms of enhanced prices chargeable by manufacturers of Nova Scotia	9,487,493
Net loss	$ 6,296,631

Now, sir, I note that on one or two occasions as the minister proceeded towards the end he became a little doubtful whether these figures would stand close analysis, and so he used the word "presumably" on more than one occasion.

Here we have this beautiful spectacle. A minister of the crown's presentation of the tariff of this federal authority; this tariff which he averred was enhancing prices, tiring out the consumer by an unreasonable burden that he could not carry and survive, made the basis of redistribution of legislative powers on the recommendation of a royal commission that his government appoints. Now, sir, since when was it the habit of a government to appoint a commission and then prepare the ammunition with which to destroy the value of its work? Since when was it regarded as sound, both from the standpoint of the country as a whole and from that of individual provinces, to have the case prepared by one member of the government made the basis of the case against the policies of the government itself? That is the story. But when the Prime Minister in the speech from the throne asks his excellency to indicate that:

> The strains and stresses which economic and social developments since confederation have placed upon Canada's governmental structure have disclosed the necessity for adjustments—

I ask him now and I ask the government whether or not they are, in the face of what is before us, going to abandon this tariff? Is it to be abandoned? Has the Minister of Labour no further use for tariffs in his position as minister and, if so, why does he whose statement is the foundation of the claim before the Rowell commission remain a member of the government? I do not know. But what I do know is that this statement, this brief of his, is the basis of the claim made upon this federal power in the four western provinces, and I assume it probably will be in the provinces by the sea.

Let us go a step further. Why have we to-day the disharmony that at present exists in this confederation? Has there ever been a day in the history of confederation in which there has been such lack of unity as exists to-day? Do hon. members recall the great Toronto gathering just before the last general election when there was broadcast from the eight provinces the demand for another Liberal government? The happy family! They could not have foreseen the C.I.O. and Beauharnois and other such matters in their true light. They could not have foreseen the shortage of power—they may have foreseen a shortage of ammunition. But, let us ask ourselves this question: Is it right or just or fair that they should complain of this lack of unity and harmony in this confederation when they have themselves laid the foundation for it? Take our western provinces, take Alberta and Saskatchewan; when they were made into provinces they were told that they were not to have their natural resources, that they should be paid a sum of money for them. There were those of us who said: This is not adequate, it is not proper, you are not going to have one province of one kind and another of another kind. In the end that view prevailed, and the government of that day brought down an agreement by which they left with the provinces the money that they took in lieu of resources and also turned the resources over, and then provided that they could make a claim for the resources they lost between the time they got paid for the whole and the time they got part of them. That commission made a report indicating millions of dollars to go to Saskatchewan, millions of dollars to Alberta; and in the case of Manitoba just before the election will anyone ever forget how the Prime Minister of that day, the Prime Minister of to-day, handing over this cheque for over four million dollars, indicated what a fine thing it was to have a government that was prepared thus to remember with this little nest-egg the little province of Manitoba? There is the story. Is it any wonder there is difficulty? Other provinces of course found themselves in a position of inferiority with respect to receipts from the dominion, and what happened? We had the Duncan commission and the Duncan report.

Mr. DUNNING: It preceded the one my right hon. friend has just referred to.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it came before, but if by using the words "we had," it was intended to indicate that it was after, I correct that. You had the Duncan report from the maritime provinces, and that report gave certain financial benefits to the provinces by the sea with a provision that they could be heard before a commission with respect to additional sums. They were heard by the late government, and a report was made that they were entitled under the terms of that document to additional sums.

So you have the maritimes and you have the three western provinces, but British Columbia was untouched. Why? Mr. Justice Martin was appointed to report with respect to railway lands, and the railway lands were turned over to British Columbia. But did you ever look at the figures as to receipts by British Columbia as compared with the other provinces? In the end the government of Canada paid to British Columbia on account, in order to make it somewhat like the other provinces, $750,000 a year. Thus, in order to create some sense of equality, you had these sums paid to the maritimes, to the western provinces and to British Columbia, while the position of Quebec and Ontario was unchanged. One must remember that in the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier an interprovincial conference was called for the purpose of considering these very matters, and Sir Wilfrid carried through this house a petition which declared that it was a final and irrevocable settlement made between the provinces and the dominion. The petition went to England, and there those words were struck out through the efforts made by Sir Richard McBride on behalf of British Columbia.

Now there is no responsibility attaching to any government other than Liberal ones in respect to these matters. They made these settlements; they created the western provinces; they deprived them of resources; they gave them money instead of resources; then they gave them resources and money. I am not complaining that the western provinces got this money, but I point out that the methods employed created a situation that brought about the stresses and strains to which the speech from the throne refers.

But there is something more. Let us see what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) says—and I always commend him at least for this, whatever else I do not commend him for, that when he was confronted with this situation he at once realized that it was creating those stresses and strains. These words of his I have not forgotten; I wish every hon. member would keep them in mind.

Mr. GARDINER: Fourteen years old.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and they represented then the sound judgment of one who had not become so much the politician he now is. These are his words, speaking to an audience of United Farmers of Manitoba:

> The most harmful slogan ever introduced into the consideration of western public matters was the cry, "Down with eastern vested interests," which has developed into an attempt to organize the east against the west and the west against the east. Members of the party to which I belong, in the past were responsible for the introduction of that cry, and I pledged myself as a leader of that party to put forth every effort to remove from the appeals of the organization to which I belong, any such unworthy sentiment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: It must be gratifying to the minister to hear the applause with which those about him receive this reference to his past. In any event I congratulate him upon that statement. Unfortunately I have heard those appeals from so many platforms in western Canada, made by all types and kinds and under all conditions.

Perhaps the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) would like a little past history. I have it here beside me. In Saskatchewan he too dreamed dreams and saw visions of the east eating up the west. I do not know whether it was the seven lean years or the seven fat years spoken of in Revelations coming up and devouring them, but at any rate the east was gobbling up the west, and the hard working, toiling west was but the victim of the avarice of the east.

Well, the Minister of Agriculture in those days set his foot and his voice against that sort of thing. That was commendable, but the evil to which he directed attention was not stopped just because he thus spoke. It may have been stopped by his immediate followers; I know not, but I know that in the province in which I live that was not so. Those of us who are familiar with the great Progressive campaign of 1921 will remember that a minister whom I do not now see in his place headed that great cause, and certainly at that time in his view the east was very avaricious indeed.

That is another cause, Mr. Speaker, of the stress and strain and the arousing of these animosities. Think what the cumulative effect of it all must be. Here we have great leaders of public thought, the great leaders of the Liberal party; we have a minister of the crown in a Liberal government of to-day, and we have all these matters being proceeded with.

Then, sir, we have something else. We have invidious distinctions being made in the treatment of the western provinces. That is another cause. We disallowed the statute in the province of Alberta, and properly so, that prohibited the right of access to the courts. We disallowed a statute of that province with respect to banking, but did we disallow the statute in Ontario that provided that recourse to the courts could not be had? We did not.

There are other matters to which reference will have to be made presently that have brought about these stresses and strains. One cannot treat provinces differently with respect to the same matters without involving oneself in difficulties, and if these people complain of discrimination, as they do, there exists one more cause for stress and strain. Take them all together. I of course cannot speak with any degree of authority as to what may be in mind, for instance, in the province of Ontario, but perhaps the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Agriculture, who took such prominent parts in the recent by-election there, may be able to give us some information on that point before we rise.

Mr. STREIGHT: They made a good job of it.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman says they seem to have made a good job of it, but just what the job was yet remains to be known.

Now, sir, I do submit to the house and the country that it is easy to see the cause of the present disunion and disharmony, which have never been so great in the history of this country, even in the days of 1887, when Mr. Fielding appealed to the electors of Nova Scotia for the breaking up of confederation; not even then, because after all the west was but little settled; two provinces did not exist at all and the others had not attained their present population. The Liberal party have dealt with these matters on a purely political basis. The editor in chief or president of the Winnipeg Free Press pointed out some years ago, in dealing with tariff matters, that the Liberal party had dealt with the tariff purely as a political matter, a vote catcher. That was the way he put it; how many votes would it get? In dealing with the problems of the west, with our natural resources, with the subsidies we were to get in 1905 and in subsequent years, they dealt with those matters on the basis of pure politics. If we had a right to our resources in 1926 and 1928, did we not have a right to them in 1905? These are acts of Liberal governments. These are the things that have brought about the stresses and strains which have resulted in the disunity now confronting us. It is known by all who get below the surface that that is so. Remember this, that those who in days gone by pleaded that the resources should be given to the provinces when they became provinces, were condemned, but they lived long enough to see the men who condemned them accept their proposals.

Then we proceed to the next point, the very point that the Rowell commission has been appointed to deal with, namely the distribution of legislative powers. In the speech from the throne we are told that with respect to one item, namely unemployment insurance, it is to be brought about by an amendment to the British North America Act, and the cooperation of the provinces has been sought. Who represent the provinces? Is it the government at the provincial capital? Do the members of the executive represent it, or the electors? How do they amend the constitution in South Africa? How do they amend the constitution in Australia? In neither case can it be amended unless an opportunity is afforded the people at least to express their will. Am I to take the voice of the premier of one of the provinces? Am I to take his view and amend the constitution of this country accordingly? Am I to take the view of five other premiers with him and amend the constitution accordingly? Am I to take the views of these premiers as representing the electors? Is that dictatorship or democracy? Which is it? What right have I to say that a premier of a province and his government represent the will of the people with respect to this matter? It has not been submitted to the electors; they have had no opportunity of dealing with it or of expressing their will with respect to it. Have I a right to deal with the question in that way? In this house there are members from these provinces. They represent the electors of the provinces with respect to federal matters, and their views must be quite as important as the views of those who constitute the governments of these provinces, unless indeed the will of the legislature is expressed, and even if the will of the legislature is expressed, what then?

I happened to be in Australia when they were dealing with the amendment of their constitution with respect to a vital matter. What happened? First of all, they settled what the question should be, and then by plebiscite they submitted it to the people of the whole commonwealth. It is provided that on the one hand there must be a majority of the people to support it and, on the other, there must be a majority of the states which are agreed to it. Applying this principle to Canada it would mean that we should have a plebiscite to amend our constitution, if we want to amend it, and that a given number of the provinces should have returned a majority in favour of the change. What right has any government to proceed upon the assumption that the premier of a province has said, "I agree to the change"? What about the people? What about the electors? What about the members of the assembly supporting that government? The premier of New Brunswick says, "I am going to consult the legislature." Well, that is going a step farther towards democracy—but it falls there. Why? It falls because the issue is not submitted to the people in terms.

When one considers the manner of amending the constitution of the United States it is not by a reference to the vote of the people, but by the voice of the House of Representatives elected every two years, the voice of the Senate, and the voices of the members of the legislatures of the several states, whether their chambers be one or two.

It is well known, of course, that the case with respect to unemployment insurance was not presented to the courts. No one knows that better than the Minister of Labour. It was not, for the simple and obvious reason that admissions, which constituted the basis of the judgment of the court, were made.

I quite agree it is desirable that there should be a national unemployment insurance act. We enacted such a measure, but it fell by the wayside because it was referred to the courts when it should not have been. In a moment or two I propose to make further observations on that point, in connection with another matter. It was referred to the courts, and without the concrete facts being placed before the courts admissions were made which, as I say, constituted the basis of the judgment which declared the legislation bad.

How are we now to proceed? How are we to petition his majesty? On what basis shall we do it? Who is going to give us the authority? We do not require any; can we go ahead on our own. If he so desires, the Prime Minister may introduce a petition. If it passes this house and the Senate, it may go to London and become law. He says he is seeking the support of the provinces to that end, and the reference in the speech from the throne concludes with these words:

> My ministers hope the proposal may meet with early approval, in order that unemployment insurance legislation may be enacted during the present session of parliament.

We all share that pious hope, but how is it to be done? One premier has said, "I want to see a copy of the bill, first." We know a bill cannot be introduced, because it has been declared to be ultra vires of this parliament, and therefore no bill which he could see can be introduced. That avenue of escape seems to be cut off.

I direct attention to the matter because it seems to me that we must arrive at some fundamental understanding as to how amendments to our constitution can be made. Until this moment I have not had an opportunity to congratulate the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) upon his being made a member of His Majesty's Privy Council. That he deserved it goes beyond question, and that he honours the position he occupies is well known. I do wish him many long years of happiness in which to enjoy his new honour and the new title which goes with it. Strenuously opposed as he is to titles, I shall still insist upon addressing him as the right hon. gentleman. I do suggest to him that here is an opportunity for sound statesmanship. This constitution of ours cannot continue in its present form; we all know that. We must agree on that point. How are we going to amend it? That is the question we must ask ourselves. Let us get away from the political side of it.

I was greatly interested in reading the story of the constitution of South Africa. Very able men, among whom were General Botha, General Smuts, Mr. Schreiner, and Mr. Merriman had to do with it. They were very careful to go back to their states with the proposals in order that they might be sure that when the constitution was agreed upon it should represent the views of all the people. What are we going to do? Someone has suggested that there must be a majority of the provinces in agreement. Does that mean a majority of the premiers? Would that be a sound principle to follow? On the other hand, if we follow the principle which has been followed in most British dominions there will be an opportunity for the people to express their views with respect to it. How is that to be brought about?

I suggest the right hon. the Minister of Justice might spend some time in devising a method. I know of nothing which would meet with more ready response than a workable plan of dealing with this difficult constitutional question.

What is more, I do not understand how he can hope to give effect to the provisions in the speech from the throne and at the same time attach any importance to the findings of the Rowell commission, because this is sui generis with many matters which have to be dealt with similarly, in view of the judgments of the courts. That being so, how are we going to pick out one, and leave the others alone? Should we not have a comprehensive plan which would be ample to deal with the whole situation?

I come to a point which to me is a very painful feature of the speech from the throne. It deals with two matters, one with reference to the elections and franchise acts, and the other the export of power. I am going to connect the two somewhat closely. I do so with some hesitancy, but I feel I owe a duty to this country and that I must discharge it. In the first place, this country is suffering from electoral corruption.

During the summer I travelled from the Atlantic to the Pacific on more than one occasion. I have discussed the trend of events with many people, people who were not partisans but were calm observers. Never in the history of this country has corruption been so rampant electorally as it is to-day. It is not a case of $5,000 or $10,000 in a constituency, but it is a case of large sums of money for corrupt purposes.

I recall the sermon of one minister of the gospel who dealt with the matter in one of the provinces. I recall his observation that after a certain event there were a great many five dollar bills available, and that by reason of that condition there was a prosperous time in the community in question. People gave the names and the days and the dates and seemed to be rather proud of the fact that they got it. What are we going to do to deal with that situation? The election act has to do with it in many ways.

Contributions to political parties are not in any sense censorable. I know of men who make contributions to political parties the same as they do to their churches. But a levy is an entirely different matter. When an organizer goes to a contractor and says that he wants one or ten per cent, that is a levy and not a contribution. What is more, I say that it threatens the very life of this state at this moment.

I am going to remind the Prime Minister that there are two matters which he must not forget. First of all, there is the question of the export of power. The statute confers upon the governor general in council the power to grant or refuse a licence for the export of power or natural gas. Parliament has placed that duty upon the governor general in council. Parliament has decided that that duty should be discharged by that authority. Not long since the Prime Minister said that he did not desire in any sense to be dictatorial about these matters, and the net result was that this matter is referred to parliament.

Let us see what this reference amounts to. I read these words:

> Legislation will be introduced with a view to furthering the principle of parliamentary control of the export of electrical power.

Parliamentary control means the voice of the commons, the senate and the crown combined together. This means a statute that either repeals or amends or in some way modifies the existing statute. As I say, parliamentary control means control by parliament, which is the crown and the senate and the commons. If legislation of that character is to be introduced it must be recalled that this house has already given unanimous approval to a bill of that kind.

The power sought to be exported is power which would be derived from the Beauharnois undertaking. That is number one. If parliament is to pass upon this matter it must be a free parliament. As I say, parliamentary control means the commons and the senate and the crown, but we have something further than that. We know that in the exercise of its power parliament has seen fit to declare that the Beauharnois undertaking is a work for the general advantage of Canada. This parliament has jurisdiction and the power to deal with the whole situation.

There is a history connected with Beauharnois that is not to be forgotten. Evidence has been given under oath that shares in this enterprise are in the hands of members of the senate and that at least one of them received $200,000 for the Liberal campaign fund from the promoters of the enterprise and made a profit of $529,000 out of an investment of $30,000. That is written on the record. The shares acquired were 800 units of the Beauharnois syndicate at a price of $30,000. These became 1,600 units in the second syndicate and as was his right, the senator subscribed for 1,600 further units in the name of J. R. Lefebvre and that made his holdings 3,200 units. On the whole transaction he realized, as of December 17, 1929, $529,600 profit and 14,040 shares of class A stock of the Beauharnois Power Corporation Limited.

Then it goes one step further. Mr. Sweezey returned to give further evidence that Senator Raymond had received from him some $200,000 for the campaign fund of the Liberal party. I put this to the house. There is a situation where the treasurer of the Liberal party—Senator Raymond has been appointed treasurer of the Liberal party—and the head of the organization, Senator Lambert, met the cabinet only a few weeks ago, and we now have this obligation that must be dealt with by parliamentary control, meaning the senate the commons and the crown.

In view of what I know of the character of the methods by which contributions are made—they are no longer contributions but levies—I say the time has come when we must provide methods under our electoral law which will not permit such a situation to continue. I am not hypocrite enough to say to the members of this house and the people of this country that I do not know that contributions are made to all parties. A contribution is one thing, but a levy of a certain per cent is another. The time has come when this must stop. The contractors themselves are complaining.

Mr. HOWE: As one who places a great many contracts for this government I ask the right hon. gentleman to give me a specific instance of a levy.

Mr. BENNETT: I can give the minister as many as he wants, but I am not going to do it here and now. What is more, I know of levies being made in connection with Canadian National Railways contracts.

Mr. BRADETTE: That was under Mr. Manion.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it was not; it was in the last few months. Let us have no misunderstanding about that.

Mr. HOWE: The right hon. gentleman has said either too much or too little. This matter must be threshed out.

Mr. BENNETT: It can be threshed out any time you want any committee of this house that you desire to appoint to go into the matter.

Mr. BRADETTE: Right now.

Mr. BENNETT: Do not make any mistake about that. I say the time has come when this thing must stop. Look at the vast sums of money thrown into by-elections. For instance, out in Victoria a parson who had some influence with the younger people was hired by the Liberal party to make broadcasts. As far as I can find out, the Liberal candidate never heard of him.

Mr. HANSON: As my home is in British Columbia, I hope the right hon. gentleman will tell the truth as I always respect his opinions.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend will respect them now more than he ever has.

Mr. HANSON: I hope so if the right hon. gentleman follows the truth.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

Joseph Arsène Bonnier, Esquire, member for the electoral district of St. Henry, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. Fernand Rinfret.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. J. N. Francœur for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. BENNETT: When the house rose at six o'clock I was directing attention to those paragraphs in the speech from the throne that deal with the amendment of the elections and franchise acts and the introduction of legislation to further the principle of parliamentary control of the export of electrical power, and I pointed out that the treasurer of the Liberal party is a member of the senate, Senator Raymond, whose connection with the Beauharnois transaction I had mentioned, without going into detail. I observed that the new senator, recently appointed, is to remain as head of the Liberal federation, according to a statement made to the press by the Prime Minister, and I pointed out that that combination of circumstances, having regard to what had transpired in this country, was such as to make it open to very grave censure on the part of those who are concerned about the supremacy and maintenance of our democratic institutions; that the real danger to democracy was not from communism and influences of that kind, but from forces from within, from electoral corruption and forces of a similar nature. I do not propose to do more than to lodge this vigorous protest and once more to assert that mere contribution to political parties and their fortunes is one thing, and a levy is another. I desire to make that point as strong as possible in order that there may be no misapprehension of the point I desire to leave for the consideration of this chamber.

From that there necessarily rises some consideration of the paragraph in the speech which deals with our external relations. I had occasion to point out some few months ago that our minister to Japan made a statement to the public press in which he indicated that the war now being waged by Japan against China was not one in which Japan was concerned except for the purpose, as was said, of bringing decent government to China. In the Daily Star, Toronto, of August 12, 1937, the Hon. R. R. Bruce, our Canadian minister, was made to say:

> Japan's invasion of China is seen as "simply an attempt to put her neighbour country into decent shape, as she has already done for Manchuria. Conditions in China are very bad. They lack constitutional government and their rulers are just self-appointed war lords. Japan's improvement of Manchuria is causing many Chinese from other parts to flock there for protection under some form of constituted government."

The interview then proceeds with other matters. I understand that on a succeeding day the minister stated that that was not an accurate report of what he had said. We are bound to accept that statemer' but we do know, from what he said on many occasions while he was in Canada, that that is substantially the view which he entertains. I protest against our minister taking sides against China in this conflict, bearing in mind, as we must, that China was attacked without any declaration of war, that unfortified cities and towns have been bombed, and that innocent women and children are being killed by the thousands. It is also to be remembered that Japan was a signatory to the pact of Paris, the Kellogg-Briand pact, which we discussed in the house on one occasion. At that time the then prime minister, who is again the Prime Minister, intimated that that pact should be set up in every schoolhouse of the country. It has been summarized in a single sentence, "The signatories renounce war as an instrument of national policy." Broadly put, that is what they did; they renounced war as an instrument of national policy. Notwithstanding that, China was attacked without a declaration of war. That was the finding of the League of Nations, of which Senator Dandurand is a distinguished member, representing this country on that occasion, as well as when Manchuria was attacked and the Lytton commission reported as it did. Bearing in mind these facts I deprecate greatly that this country is represented by one who has declared himself to be thus strongly aligned with the forces of Japan against China. The matter is far too serious to be discussed in an acrimonious sense, but I think the Prime Minister will agree that we should not have it appear that we are not neutral but are instead lending the support and weight of our influence to Japan in this war against China. I think this circumstance is to be deprecated very greatly and it is open to no other construction in view of the known attitude of our minister, who returned some time after the Toronto statement and is now, I believe, in Tokyo. It will be within the memory of this house how great was the importance we attached to the Kellogg-Briand pact, and that all of us agreed with the statement made by the then Prime Minister and with the position he took with respect to the matter.

We might bear in mind that in Great Britain the Archbishop of Canterbury presided over a great gathering in London at which vigorous protest was made against the treatment received by women and children in China, and that other nations have seen fit to express themselves in terms of detestation of the manner in which this conflict has been carried on. I believe we should not permit it to be said that the thought of trade has dulled our sense of honour. That is a statement which is made in some quarters, that we are lacking in appreciation of the magnitude of the questions involved and are permitting ourselves, for the sake of the material that is being sold, to take no notice of what is transpiring in the far east. We have a very great interest in that matter, and if it were not that I think it might be misconstrued I would use very much stronger language than I have done as to the conduct of Japan with respect to women and children in China. Those states which are still members of the league and took part in the debate decided that Japan had no defence to make for her unprovoked attack upon China. Under these circumstances I think we should at least indicate in some way to the world that, though we are not actively participating in any diplomatic or other action which has been taken, we are not for that reason supporting the position of Japan against China.

I desire also to discuss the position of some of our own missionaries who have found themselves in a precarious position, located as they are in some parts of China. I know that appeals have been made to governmental agencies for their protection. I am not inclined to discuss the matter in any censorious spirit because I recognize the magnitude of the difficulties that have to be faced. On the other hand, if we are to maintain neutrality we should at least do it in such a way as not to leave an impression on the minds of Chinese and others that we are favouring the cause of Japan merely for trade purposes.

It cannot be forgotten by those who are familiar with our history that the migration from Japan into this country of Japanese subjects is governed by what is called a gentleman's agreement. Now, sir, I ask you what importance can attach to a gentleman's agreement when there is a violation of what is admittedly a national treaty—at any rate so far as we are concerned—according to the finding of the League of Nations, and other bodies as well, that there has been a repudiation of the terms of that treaty, an utter disregard of the responsibilities under it, and that war without declaration has been resorted to. I think that the sooner this so-called gentleman's agreement is terminated the better it will be for this country, so that we may not find ourselves in a most difficult position in consequence of reliance upon it.

But there is another side of the matter to which I direct attention. During recent months much has been said regarding the knowledge possessed by Japan of the condition of our Pacific coast and of other matters that have to do with this dominion. I was astounded the other day—and I am sure the Prime Minister must have taken cognizance of the matter—to find the following statement published by the Canadian press:

B.C. System of Defence Forms Big Triangle of Fortifications.

Anti-aircraft Guns to Be Placed at Albert Head and on Island Highway.

According to unofficial sources these undertakings may include:

1. Naval guns on the south coast near Victoria.

2. Anti-aircraft guns, magazines and other buildings at Albert Head, a few miles from the Esquimalt naval base.

3. Anti-aircraft emplacements about six miles from Victoria on the Island Highway, on the breakwater outside Victoria harbour, and at Trial Island on the Vancouver Island coast.

Then follows a description of the size of the guns. The closing paragraph reads:

Two six-inch naval guns will be set up at Ferguson Point, commanding the narrow entrance to Burrard Inlet (Vancouver harbour). Unofficial sources say similar emplacements will be established also on Point Grey headland, commanding the entrance to English Bay, which skirts urban Vancouver.

It is perfectly clear that this statement came from the department in some way.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not from headquarters, I can assure the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. BENNETT: I said, from the department in some way.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As a matter of fact the statement is not accurate.

Mr. BENNETT: But I know that, unfortunately, part of it is accurate. Here is publication to the world of the defences that are being made by Canada on the Pacific coast, and I am certain, from what I know, that this will be cabled at least to Japan. I do say that in the interests of this country and as a matter of fair play with the permanent force, the members of which are vitally concerned—because it is a reflection upon themselves—an investigation should be held and responsibility brought home to the man who gave out that information. I am perfectly certain that if the Prime Minister were over here and I were in his position he would demand that an investigation should be had, because in the eyes of soldiers in this country this is one of the worst possible offences. I have heard men express the u'most wonder and amazement that it could happen; for the Canadian Press is a responsible organization. There would be no difficulty, if a proper investigation were held, in having it disclosed from what source that information came, and the man who gave it should no longer receive a cent of public money. I believe the Prime Minister would agree with me—and I am saying this not acrimoniously, but only as a citizen of the country with, I believe, the same interest that everyone else has in the maintenance of those defensive works on the Pacific coast. I merely direct attention to the matter in the hope that the government will announce that they have taken steps to have it thoroughly investigated by a properly constituted tribunal so that the person who gave out the information may be punished, at least to the extent of not being retained in the public service of Canada. I do not think that is too strong a statement, having regard to the seriousness of what is involved.

I am quite aware that the article is so worded as to leave it open to several constructions at some points, and that doubtless some part of it is inaccurate. But it was the subject of editorial comment in the coast papers and has been much discussed throughout the country. Under these circumstances, and having the imprimatur, at least, of the Canadian Press as authority for the statements that have been made—because we know how careful they are not to give, shall I say, publicity to a statement that has not behind it some authority from some source—this news item, I suggest, should be the subject of an investigation, and I think the minister would be well advised to see that a court of inquiry is set up without delay in order that the matter may be dealt with.

This enables me to make an observation with respect to a matter that was brought up this afternoon by the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Warren). He suggests that wars result from restrictions of trade. The exact opposite is the case. The most eminent economists are of the opinion that free trade is always responsible for that class of warfare.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; and if hon. members will think for a moment they will see the reason why. With free, unhampered competition the struggle for markets becomes notorious and open, with resultant difficulties. It can be said of every war of recent years that it was not engaged in by countries that followed protection as a policy. Take the great Russo-Turkish war in which England and France participated. That was in the days of free trade in England. The Boer war was a domestic war to which we need not refer in this connection. The Franco-Prussian war could not be said to have been a war arising out of tariffs, nor could that be said of the Danish war or the Austrian war. I know that at least one eminent authority is of the opinion that it is because of freedom of competition, because of cutthroat competition—and these words "cutthroat competition" came into use in consequence of that very practice, the reckless, ruthless cutting to the very quick—that wars have been provoked. They have not resulted from the development of national tendencies in the sense of preventing markets being taken by others, because no question of competition then arises. If you have a protective system by which the commodities of other countries do not find free access to your market, then the likelihood of competition between countries that can come into your market without restriction is far less than it otherwise would be. I do not think there can be any doubt about that.

I do not intend to deal at length with the questions which arise in connection with the trade treaties that are proposed to be made between Great Britain and the United States, or the revision of the treaty between Canada and the United States. Canada has no right in any sense to be concerned about any treaty that Great Britain desires to make with the United States of America; that is the business of the United States and Great Britain. They are quite capable of transacting their own business without assistance from us. But when it comes to the question of a treaty between Canada and the United States then we have a different set of considerations. I ventured to point out a year ago that the agreement which we made with the United States was a lopsided one. Events apparently have justified my view, for now we are to revise the agreement. In order that there may be upon the record a fairly clear statement of the situation I am going to refer to the conditions under which that trade agreement was negotiated. The periods of time that have to elapse between notice being given and negotiations commencing have been quite clearly stated, and it must be clear to everyone that the agreement now in existence was not negotiated by the present administration. The additional thirty days, the two weeks, the period of time within which oral hearings might take place, all these periods elapsed before this government came into office. The negotiations had been completed; the question was whether or not this country was prepared to accept the proposals.

Now let us look for a moment into that, because it becomes of the utmost importance. Remember this, Mr. Speaker, that the proposals made by the Dominion of Canada were contained in a letter which was dispatched to the Department of State by the minister from this country. First we asked for a mutual undertaking to maintain during the lifetime of the agreement the unrestricted free entry of commodities now on the free list of either country. That related to newsprint and matters of that kind. That was agreed to or conceded. That will not be changed, for reasons I am presently to give. Then followed:

(b) The mutual concession of tariff treatment as favourable as that accorded to any other foreign country; this means that Canada would extend to the United States its intermediate tariff involving reductions from the present rates of duty on some seven hundred items, including both natural and manufactured products, together with a number of further reductions below the intermediate tariff rates through the extension to the United States of concessions made by Canada in trade conventions with foreign countries.

That means the most favoured nation treatment accorded to Canada by the United States and to the United States by Canada. We offered that free and unrestricted benefit. Then we proposed:

(c) The reduction by fifty per cent of the existing United States rates of duty, as authorized by the Tariff Act of 1934, on a specified number of natural products, including inter alia lumber, fish, potatoes, milk and cream, and live cattle; a number of other agricultural products, and several minerals both metallic and non-metallic.

(d) The reduction of the existing rates of duty by the United States on a number of partly or wholly manufactured products of Canada, including some processed natural products and certain products in which hydro-electric power comprises an important element in the cost of production.

(e) The reduction of the existing rates of duty by Canada on a number of natural and partly or wholly manufactured products of the United States.

That letter, as will be remembered, was dated November 14, 1934, and in pursuance of the provisions of United States law to which I shall refer, the negotiations were carried forward. The time began to run, the thirty days, the two weeks, and other fixed periods, until finally we reached a point where, the tariff board having made its report, we were ready to complete the undertaking if we thought it desirable. Having offered these benefits without restriction, our contention was that anything in the way of quotas accorded to Canada was wholly unsatisfactory.

We told them frankly that, having given them the benefits we did, we did not think it fair to suggest that it was an even deal if we, with a population of 11,000,000 people, had to take quota benefits. In other words, we were according the intermediate tariff and the most favoured nation treatment to 125,000,000 people, and those 125,000,000 people suggested that they were not prepared to give us the same concession, but would only give a concession that was limited by quotas with respect to many items which are of vital concern to Canada—the cattle quota, the cream quota, fish and potatoes, shingles, lumber and other commodities. We were not prepared to agree to those terms. And there the matter ended. The government went out of office, and the present administration coming in executed an agreement, in which there is one item which had not been finally settled at the time the old government went out of office.

Now let us examine for a moment just where we are with respect to this trade agreement. In the first place, the tariff that now prevails in the United States is a Republican tariff, a tariff imposed in the days of President Hoover. It is the highest tariff in the history of the United States. When the president suggested that he proposed to deal with trade agreements, the personnel and temper of congress was such that it became apparent at once that the senate would not give the requisite two-thirds vote to approve any such treaty. So legislation was enacted that conferred upon the president the power to make, not treaties, but trade agreements. These trade agreements were to be subject to certain definite limitations, limitations of such a character that I think it desirable that we should understand what they are.

First, no item upon the free list could be changed into a dutiable item and no item upon the dutiable list could be changed into a free item. In other words, no free items could be granted by the President of the United States in trade agreements that were not free at the time the agreement was made. Second, the maximum reduction in tariff that the president was authorized to make was fifty per cent of the existing tariff rates. And those tariff rates were, as I have pointed out, the rates of the Republican party. The tariff with that fifty per cent reduction, which is the maximum reduction possible, in many cases is far higher than the rates under the Underwood tariff. It will be recalled that the last Democratic tariff in the United States was the Underwood tariff, and under it we had free entry into the markets of the United States for a large number of our commodities.

But the United States did not stop there. In their law conferring this power upon the president they declared further that before any bargain was made of any kind it was essential that there should be afforded an opportunity to all those who might be concerned to express their views as to the effect that such action would have upon their national life. Now the effect of that is to afford to citizens of the United States opportunity to appear before the tariff board to deal with every proposal. Not only will the business men of the United States have opportunity to file briefs during a period of thirty days, but during the first two weeks after that they will have opportunity to make oral argument as well before that tribunal. No such power resides in this country. In other words they have that advantage over us.

The items that have been noted in the press with respect to this trade agreement are items that are covered for the most part by the existing agreement. First of all dutiable items cannot be made free, and sir, we have given all we have to give unless we are prepared to make specific reductions of tariffs which will extend to twenty other nations, including Japan, under the favoured nation clauses. That is the position. There is nothing more we can give the United States. Without restriction and without limitation we have given them everything we have to give except one thing, that is, reductions in specific items under our tariffs. For that we have obtained only the opportunity, not to get free entry of any item now subject to customs tax but to get reductions up to fifty per cent of United States tariffs as they stood before any such agreements were made.

But, Mr. Speaker, we want more. We want other things; as the discussions already indicate, we want many things. How are we to get them? There is nothing more we can give the United States except specific reductions of tariff items, but we are told that what we are to do is to sell our British preference for these benefits. That is the story. Without going into it in detail, the sole, simple question is: What price? And the price means the concessions we are prepared to make from the British preference in order that we may get something for which we have given already everything we have to give on our own account.

In addition, of course, our ports are affected. That matter was discussed last year and I am not going into that question to-day, but I do point out that we are asked now to say what we are prepared to pay by abandoning the preferred position we have in the British and empire markets, in order to get concessions from the United States, having given them everything they demanded in the first instance, and having been willing to take half a loaf instead of standing firm. We accepted quotas from people to whom we gave unlimited entry in return on everything.

I need not discuss these matters at length, because it will be time enough to do so when the agreements come up for consideration, but certainly the broad principle is there and all the casuistry in the world cannot get away from it. Our ports are affected. We have lost the advantage of direct shipment. That will be gone.

Mr. HANSON: How do we know?

Mr. BENNETT: Because we have done it already under the old agreement.

Mr. HANSON: I do not think the government we have to-day is going to give anything more than it has to.

Mr. BENNETT: This government gave up the ten per cent reduction which was conditioned upon the importations being through our ports. That is provided for in the existing agreement. I do not desire to take up the time to go into the matter, but if the hon. gentleman will read the agreement he will find it written there in letters not of gold but, I should say, of silver. That is the situation, Mr. Speaker. You cannot change it by argument or discussion or casuistry; it is there in those terms. We gave all. We got what we received with restrictions. We are now told that it is desirable in the interests of world peace and for other reasons that we should surrender part of the preference which we enjoy in the markets of Great Britain and the other parts of the empire. It is a matter for the government to decide as to what price it is prepared to pay and receive for making these concessions.

Then there is the suggestion in the closing paragraph of the operative part of the speech:

> The government is convinced that, in seeking to cooperate with the United Kingdom and other countries in efforts to promote international trade . . .

And so forth. That makes it desirable for me to make this observation, which is a summary of the statement by the Federation of British Industries. What difference is there between a volume of trade, amounting in the aggregate to a given sum, between Great Britain and Canada and between Great Britain, Canada, and the United States? If the volume of trade between Canada and Great Britain is X, when the United States takes some of the commodities that we have to sell and sells its commodities instead, Canadian trade becomes X minus, and the minus represents the plus of the United States. What is the addition to international trade? Have you increased it? This is what you have done: You have taken away from Canada that part of the trade which has gone to the United States, unless indeed you increased the volume of trade between Great Britain and the United States and did not lessen the trade between Canada and the United States, which enables me to say this: There is but one stable market for agricultural products left in the world. That is the market of the United Kingdom, and that market has practically reached its maximum. Why? Because the population is no longer actively increasing. Statisticians tell us the population of the United Kingdom will reach its peak within a short time. In the second place they are promoting, by every means within their power, the development of their domestic production of chickens, butter, milk, wheat—on which they are paying a bonus—eggs, pigs and all such commodities. To the extent to which the United Kingdom can supply their own wants they are doing so. Under these circumstances how can we afford to take a part of the trade we now enjoy, in pigs and wheat and various other agricultural products such as apples and lumber, and hand it over to our great competitors to the south, thus enabling them to get that portion of the trade which we lose as a result of our own action?

That is the position. I submit that it cannot possibly be changed unless indeed we are prepared to say that, having free access to those markets until 1940, we propose to stand by our position. Under the terms of article III of the agreement we have a fixed preference in regard to the very matters in which we are deeply concerned, such as wheat, butter, cheese, apples, pears, canned apples, eggs, condensed milk, milk powder, honey, unwrought copper, timber of all kinds, fish, salmon, asbestos, zinc, lead and patent leather. On all these we have a fixed margin of preference under the law as it now stands, and that condition will remain until 1940, unless we are prepared to surrender these advantages. Shall we abandon this fixed margin of preference on agricultural products, which are so vital to our life? The margin with respect to hogs, bacon and matters of that kind is provided for by a special clause. Shall we abandon these for the purpose of now getting from the United States what we should have got when we gave them all that we had to give?

I do not propose to traverse at greater length the general details of the speech from the throne, but I do desire to make a few general observations with respect to the situation in Canada at the present time. It is admitted by everyone who gives thought to the matter that these are days of great difficulty. In fact, in the speech from the throne it is indicated that such is the case.

We must now consider our own position, in the light of that situation. However, before going into that matter in detail may I turn to one which I believe I have overlooked. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that I may be forgiven for returning to it. Recently a by-election was held in the constituency of St. Henry.

The hon. member who succeeded in that contest was introduced this evening. In furtherance of what I said to-day may I point out that speaking in that campaign the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) stated that Montreal needed a Canadian National station. He asserted that the hole in Dorchester street would be closed up. On the following evening the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) said, "If you do not get your station Mr. Houde will be responsible."

Let us look at the other side of it—and I ask the Prime Minister to think of this matter carefully. The construction of the station would involve an expenditure of several millions of dollars. That is a matter for the government to consider. It is for them to determine whether or not the finances of the country are such that the taxpayers can afford to assume this added responsibility. That is not a matter with which I shall deal at this time. However I am dealing with the fact that the promise was made by the Secretary of State and, on the following evening, was supported by the Minister of Public Works. Can we afford to have promises of that kind made in a by-election, or any other election? What is more, the Secretary of State was very careful to say that he did not make that promise on his own. He was too careful a man to do that! He is reported to have said that if they wanted the hole filled up their duty would be a very simple one. He hoped that they would discharge that duty in the proper manner—and, apparently, from what we have seen to-night, that was done.

Let us go a step farther. Coupled with this was the question of unemployment relief. In the Montreal Gazette of January 15, 1938, we find a report of a meeting held in the city of Montreal on the previous evening. In that report I find this:

> So long as there are unemployed there will be direct relief for men, their wives and children.

So said the Secretary of State.

> We will do our part, and if the municipal powers, and provincial powers should become fatigued, be tranquil. While there is a single unemployed, the federal government will see to their sustenance. It is not an independent who will do that. It is not a man isolated from all parties who can do anything. He may make eloquent speeches, even enact farces, but I am authorized to repeat to you that as long as there are unemployed in Montreal, even if we are alone, the federal government engages itself on honour to give sustenance to him, his wife, and children.

That is the position.

The same may be said with respect to the building of a subway under the Lachine canal. Here we have three things: We have the Canadian National station; we have the subway under the Lachine canal and we have the promise that if the province fails or if the municipalities fail, the federal government will see to it that sustenance is given to the men, their wives and families. That, he says, he is giving, not on his own. He has said, "I give that to you," and makes the statement that "the federal government engages itself on honour to give sustenance to the unemployed, his wife and children."

May I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), an hon. member who comes from a city which is finding it very difficult to deal with the situation, that his troubles are solved. Everything is over now. He need not worry any more. The province of Manitoba has said it cannot carry the burden, and the city of Winnipeg says it cannot do it. But here is the promise of the government of Canada to do it, with respect to Montreal, and it cannot avoid the same responsibility with respect to Winnipeg or Calgary or Vancouver.

I am asking whether the government of Canada is prepared to say that it will carry out such an undertaking with respect to Montreal, and not carry it out with respect to Vancouver or Winnipeg or Calgary or Toronto or any of the other great cities in Canada? We now have no occasion for any further worries. They are past. We have that unity and determination which will ensure that there will be no further difficulty with respect to the poor and the unemployed, their wives or their children, in any of the cities of Canada. When I read that I rejoiced, because I knew that although the province of Alberta cannot help Calgary any further and although the citizens cannot provide any further moneys, the great Dominion of Canada, through its Secretary of State, speaking on behalf of the government, has bound itself in honour to provide for unemployed men, their wives and children. I rejoiced that the city of Calgary was now safe for the rest of the hard winter.

That would be true, also, with respect to Winnipeg. Winnipeg need worry no longer. They need not be concerned when Mr. Bracken, premier of Manitoba, says to them, "We cannot give you any further assistance." Under great difficulty, as is known, they did give assistance to Winnipeg for the month of January. That month ends to-day. Now some one else will provide. Now we have intervention by the Secretary of State when, in a by-election, he says, "The federal government engages itself on honour to give sustenance" to the unemployed, their wives and children. He points out that those people will receive sustenance from the federal authority.

Of course that means the expenditure of considerable money—but that is not a matter of moment in a by-election of such importance as that which took place in St. Henry. Because the government is bound, doubtless the Minister of Finance will foot the bill. That surplus to which the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Warren) referred this afternoon will have vanished into thin air, like the dew before the morning sun.

It may be somewhat amusing that this should be so—but there is the record. The amazing thing is that upon that record apparently the people were greatly impressed, for we find that in that particular section of the constituency they gave the very large majority of about 5,000 to the hon. gentleman who took his seat this evening. So it would seem that the labours of the Secretary of State were not in vain, nor were those of the Minister of Public Works.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Those hon. members from western Canada who are saying, "Hear, hear" must say so with great joy, because they know their trouble is now ended. When I hear the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden), I realize how he must feel about it.

But from another angle the matter has a somewhat different aspect, and I feel quite certain that when that aspect has been traversed and appropriations made the feeling will be different. The government cannot say that in Winnipeg the workmen, their wives and families will be neglected, but that in Montreal they will be cared for. The federal government cannot espouse such a doctrine as that. Clearly it is not a case of the old, worn five cent piece; that doctrine is no longer in vogue. It could not be said to be that, in any sense. It is however a declaration of high policy in which the government commits itself to care for men, women and children, or for all those who may find themselves in want in the great cities of Canada. That I am sure is a statement with respect to which every representative of a city in Canada, and especially representatives from western Canada, will rejoice and be exceeding glad. For my part, I thank the Secretary of State and the government for taking so noble an attitude. I am sure the Minister of National Defence will be highly regarded in Vancouver when he is able to tell his constituents that thanks to a by-election in St. Henry there will be no further difficulty or worry with respect to the wants of the workmen, their wives and children in that great city. That it involves a large sum of money is a matter for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to settle.

[Mr. Bennett.]

I was about to point out that no one in this country can help being concerned over the conditions that exist. There never has been a time when we had greater disharmony and lack of unity among the provinces that comprise confederation. Admittedly the circumstances that surround us, leave much to be desired. We have large numbers of unemployed, although they are fewer than they were. In addition to that, we have large numbers on relief. The figures would indicate that they have increased by 80,000 during the last month or so. That is a substantial increase. The cause for a large number of these people being on relief is attributable to conditions other than the drought conditions which have obtained in the prairie country.

We have a situation in this country where we find the formation of organizations that contemplate a dictatorship such as fascism on the one hand, or communism, on the other. Hon. members may have observed in a Montreal daily the picture of a large number of men giving a salute in the approved Nazi form.

An hon. MEMBER: They were boy scouts.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, boy scouts, but apparently this matter is taken much more seriously in the province of Quebec. From what has been said and done there it is quite clear that this thing is regarded as being of great importance. I directed the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) to-night, as well as a few days ago, to the fact that the mails of this country had been intercepted and papers taken therefrom. It is quite clear under the law that that should not happen. In the United States that was the cause of a long and protracted struggle in the state of Illinois. Is such a situation to continue in Canada?

We have the formation of these bodies and we hear talk of fascism and other forms of dictatorship. The other day I was reading a report by a gentleman who has written a great deal on public questions. He said:

> A world ended in 1918. Another is struggling "powerless to be born." It is between these worlds that we are to-day, with two great forces even now at grips as to which shall control the world of to-morrow. These forces are liberty or some form of "compulsion."

Being a country of only eleven million people, all we can do is to endeavour to improve our position in the light of our experience. We have abundant revenues brought about by heavy taxation. That is admitted. Whether or not relief can be given from that high taxation is a matter that the government must consider. We have provinces claiming the rights of sovereign states. To quote the language of a commentator, the central government seems to have abdicated and permitted its power to go to the capitals of the various provinces. That is a condition which I think cannot possibly continue.

No man who is familiar with the history of the United States can fail to remember the great struggle that took place between the states and the central power. The suggestion that the states were sovereign powers was put forward by Calhoun and Hayne. The great debate in the senate between Webster and Hayne was to decide whether they should have a strong union or whether there should be a group of sovereign states gathered together in a loose form of government. That was the issue, so effectively dealt with in the reply of Webster. Hundreds of thousands of copies of his speeches were circulated in every part of the union, and the cry that had gone forward for the establishment of sovereign states ended.

For some strange reason there is a recrudescence of that very struggle in this country. There is a growing opinion that each province is a sovereign state and that unity in the sense of Canada as a whole is something that cannot be understood. It will be recalled that Clay always said that he was not of Kentucky or Virginia, that he was of the United States. He tried to make it clear that union was the essential thing. The United States ended that great struggle with a civil war, but there are none of us who contemplate such a possibility in Canada. But if we are to have a strong and vigorous Canada we cannot consider the possibility of there being nine sovereign states.

The only way we can secure that liberty which we hold so dear as against any form of compulsion is by maintaining with all our power the necessity of a strong central state. Canada is our country, not New Brunswick or Alberta or Saskatchewan. The nation is Canada, not the provinces that comprise it.

One of the reasons why we have these conditions at the present moment is the fact that in the minds of the people there exists the thought that all that could be done by the central power is not being done. That is the view they hold. When questions come up that should be decided by the executive, what do they do? Instead of deciding them, they refer them to the courts. The courts have no powers with respect to these matters. The Supreme Court of Canada is only advisory, and, what is more, it is not a court of original jurisdiction. The constitution gave us no power to create other than an appellate court in the Supreme Court of Canada. If under peace, order and good government we endeavour to set up a court, we cannot do so because section 92 contains the specific provision that the administration of justice and the establishment of courts belong to the provinces. That is the position.

When we refer to the courts the question of whether or not a given measure that was never a statute is or is not within the competence of a legislature, in my judgment we are taking a course that is injurious, if not inimical, to the preservation of the central power. Think of what we have done! The province of Alberta passed a statute or thought that it had done so. It got through the legislature, but when it came to the lieutenant-governor, he declined to assent. It then came down reserved to be dealt with by this government which had the power to say yes or no as the lieutenant-governor is a federal official. This was decided in the days of Governor Letellier.

Now what has happened? Instead of the government dealing with it, we have this anomaly, this precedent established—and think what it means—that a legislature which has to meet a few weeks from now will not know whether the action it took was taken properly or improperly. One can understand the idea of referring to a court a statute, because it represents the legislative effort of a legislature; but to refer something that is neither fish, flesh, fowl nor good red herring to a court for an advisory opinion is to beg the very question itself and to escape responsibility which justly belongs to the executive. There is no doubt with respect to that. Think where it leads. The question of referring these matters to courts is not one that should be lightly considered. Every question could be referred to the courts.

I find that away back in 1889 the late Sir John A. Macdonald was confronted with a similar situation, and the matter is dealt with in his correspondence. He was dealing with a question of tremendous import and of grievous difficulty. What had he to do? He found himself confronted with the Jesuits' Estates Act. There was an agitation asking him to disallow it. Did he listen to it? He asked for an opinion of the law officers in England, whether or not it was constitutional. His minister of justice, the late Sir John Thompson, was clearly of the opinion that it was constitutional. Then what happened? Lord Atholstan, who was borne to his last resting place to-day, conceived that it would be an easy way out of the difficulty if the matter were referred to the supreme court. He said, "There is the way out. All you have to do is to refer it to the supreme court," and he presented a very powerful petition to that effect to the government of the day. Sir John Thompson considered the matter and wrote a letter to his prime minister in which he pointed out that in his opinion a government should not shirk its responsibility, but face it. Then it was that Sir John A. Macdonald wrote this letter to Sir John Thompson—bear in mind that this was only twenty-two years after confederation. The Supreme Court Act had been placed there at the instance of Mr. Edward Blake. This is in part the letter:

I have made a note on the margin on the 10th page, merely for the purpose of calling your attention to the grave danger of the practice of summary application for advice to the Supreme court being resorted to. It would quickly grow, and a dominion ministry, careless or ignorant of constitutional principles, might on every question of public interest, for popularity or some sinister purpose, freely use the power of reference. A Mercier government would leave every question to the Supreme court, if it thought the courts below were adverse to its wishes. And it would be an inducement to pack the Supreme court with its partisans, imitating in that respect the government of the United States.

The courts below would gradually be ousted of their jurisdiction, and a new star chamber formed. I don't think this at all an imaginary danger. Lastly, I doubt the policy of alluding, as is done on the 16th page, to what is stated in some quarters, although not in the petition, but I don't feel at all sure that I am right in my doubts.

That is the letter of one who was regarded as a father of confederation. He pointed out, very properly I think, the bad practice which comes from shirking and evading and escaping responsibility by referring a matter to the supreme court, whose opinion, mark you, is advisory only; more, it is not that of a court as such but of the judges persona designata for the purpose of giving that opinion; that is all. Under those circumstances you have unrest, distrust, suspicion. I say to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that while I agree with him wholly in his disallowance of the statute denying rights to the courts in the province of Alberta, I almost ventured to be impudent enough to suggest to him that, having disallowed that statute, he should leave the banks to fight out their questions with the courts. I recall that when I was at the bar I was defending an action brought by the province of Alberta against the Royal bank in connection with the Alberta and Great Waterways Railway in which a deposit of some six million odd was changed from being a time deposit to the credit of the province's general account. The action succeeded in the courts of Alberta: then it was that the bank in question applied to Sir Robert Borden for disallowance. Sir Robert Borden fixed a time at which argument was heard. I did not appear, so I can speak about it frankly. They made a lengthy argument; the matter was considered by the committee of the privy council, and finally advice was given that the matter, then being in the courts, should be left in the courts and the power of disallowance should not be exercised. That gave the bank the chance to fight the case to the privy council, where, as is known, they succeeded. But the point I desire to make clear is that if we get into the habit of escaping the responsibility that belongs to the executive—and I am not saying that in an offensive sense—the very conditions to which Sir John A. Macdonald alluded will inevitably follow. If on the other hand we exercise the power promptly, and say —as I tell the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice quite frankly I think we should say—to all the world that any provincial legislation which denies the right of any citizen to go to the courts will be disallowed by the government as a matter of policy, I believe it would serve a useful purpose, and would avoid the criticism being urged that in one case you did one thing and in another case, another.

As a distinguished journalist said the other day, there are two things we must deal with in this country. One is, to use the language so prevalent in these days and so apt, we must conquer poverty. I am well aware of the words of Holy Writ, "The poor always ye have with you." That is true. But we can lessen poverty. The other day I had a letter from Taber, and I confess that I found it difficult to continue work. Here was a family whose children were without clothes, and, covered with rude coverings, who kept warmth in their bodies by staying in bed; the father was without work and could not get it; he had been a miner when they were carrying on operations there. I could cite countless cases of this kind. I could mention similar cases in other parts of Alberta that came within my own immediate knowledge in the weeks I spent there during the last few months. Cannot we as a people do something to remedy such conditions? I think we can. The work may be slow, it may be difficult. Take, for instance, the proposals made by Mr. Purvis. He suggested a large scale operation which he thought would bring about an improvement in conditions, and the conditions that he says should be improved are those under which initiative is being destroyed by lack of employment and by payment of relief. Some steps have been taken for the purpose of lessening the numbers on relief. But everywhere about me as I travel around this country—and I have travelled over it twice this year with that object and others in view—I have heard, in places, where I did not expect to hear it, a tale of pessimism and despair that I find difficult to understand, and of poverty that I believe we can conquer if we have the will to do it. I do not believe we are so bereft of statecraft, of courage and of enterprise that we cannot do it.

There is another point, and it is a vital one just now. There is no recurring depression in sight, but depressions move in cycles and with rapidity. We know what happened in the United States. We have seen its reactions in curtailed exports in November and December, and I doubt not we will again see in January, with, of course, the consequent reductions in revenue. But what are we doing to prepare ourselves to meet such a situation when it comes.

I have travelled about the British Empire in the last two years and have been struck with what has been done in other parts of the commonwealth to deal with these problems. It is true that conditions are different in each dominion, and what is true in one cannot be said to be true in another. It is true that the conditions which prevail in Australia do not necessarily prevail here. But when I studied the way in which they dealt with these matters, notwithstanding that they depreciated the value of their pound to $4, I realized, as those who have read Professor Copland's report, or The Fight of the Plans, must realize, that in that dominion they faced the problem with courage. Surely we have the same courage. Some people say, "Look at what is being accomplished to-day in New Zealand." Well, I shall not discuss that because there was a deficit there last year despite all their efforts to the contrary. In South Africa we find an abnormal condition, that country being extremely rich in gold. I realize, therefore, that differences exist in the various parts of the empire. But I am convinced that there are methods which might be resorted to, even though they might be experiments, that are worthy of the consideration of the Canadian people; and I believe that if the government took a strong lead with respect to these and commanded, as they would command, the support of men in every part of the house, they would be amazed at the results that would follow.

I know the difficulties that men are experiencing in understanding problems connected with monetary policy. Every day someone asks me questions with regard to monetary problems. When the Prime Minister was appealing to the people of the country, what was it he said he was going to do? He was going to wage a great battle against the money power. That was his statement. I did not make that statement; it was his. Well, even the most violent partisan will find it difficult to-day to discover the field of activities, to locate the terrain in which that war is being carried on. And there is no emulation here of the Japanese, because here we have not a war without declaration; there has been a declaration, but I have not seen any sign of hostilities.

We remember the occasion on which the British delegation was here in 1932, and I have no doubt most hon. members have read the reports of the speeches made at that time by Mr. Chamberlain, and by the representatives of India and other parts of the British Empire. In 1933 we saw the same thing—and always, running through it all, there was the idea that something should be done whereby conditions would be in some degree improved. But what are we doing about it? Is export trade going to bring about the improvement? Well, we have had a very heavy export trade, and I am sure the Minister of Labour is saddened when he looks at the numbers on relief, and the numbers receiving assistance from the state.

Mr. ROGERS: There has been a very great improvement.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly there has; otherwise the country would be relieved out of existence. But there has been no improvement in the last two months; there are eighty thousand more unemployed to-day than there were a month ago.

Mr. ROGERS: That is explained largely by the seasonal decline.

Mr. BENNETT: But there has been always a seasonal decline; this is not a new season, 1938, that has come about especially for the Liberal party. The hon. gentleman would no doubt say:

> Now is the winter of our discontent
> Made glorious summer by this sun of York.

At any rate we have always had a seasonal decline. But is there anything that this parliament can do? Are we incapable of making progress in monetary reform? Are we incapable of progress in relation to security? What does lack of security mean? I read the other day that the president of the Board of Trade in England had made this statement, that no longer were English people worried about ownership, but only about the question of security. What about labour? What about the conditions that exist in the markets in the United States? What we have to face is lack of certainty—insecurity. That applies everywhere. Why is it that to-day we have such enormous aggregations of capital in the banks —capital unemployed? Why is it that to-day the banks have such enormous investments in our securities? Is there lack of confidence in our ability properly to function as a producing country? The answer must be apparent to any man who takes time to think. And what are we doing? We are taking our resources out of the ground—resources that we shall never have again—and shipping them out; and then we talk about our vast export trade. But that vast export trade is not doing anything comparable with what would be done for the relief of unemployment if we were fabricating that raw material in our own country.

Where does that raw material go? What is done with it? Do we buy it back? What about asbestos, nickel, lead, zinc, lumber and pulpwood and paper? What about all these articles? What about importations into Canada of commodities made from raw materials that left this country? What are we doing to provide ourselves with adequate defences, not against the enemy on our coast, but against the enemy of our economic life? I ask these questions in all seriousness, because I have not forgotten that there was a time when I sat to the right of the Speaker. I have not forgotten the criticisms that were made then, or the suggestions that were poured forth. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) said, "We have $170,000,000 odd of gold; we can manage with a twenty-five per cent coverage and pay our national debt in part and provide for great public works, if only we are given the chance." And no dumb man has ever been dumber than the hon. gentleman has been in that respect ever since. Apparently there are others besides myself who have memories and can recall what the hon. gentleman has said on various occasions. But, I repeat, are we doing anything? I was chided because I did not do anything; we were chided because we did not do anything. But we did not make the promises that were made then.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: We did not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: It is gratifying to think that the tension on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite has been relieved by the first smile in which they have been able to indulge for some time. Mark you, I do not say for a moment that these hon. gentlemen are not as greatly concerned about the human side as we are. It used to be charged against us in days of black depression that we did not do this and we did not do that. Go and look at the revenues; look at the number of people able to contribute to the taxes of the country at that time; consider the problems that confronted us then, and look at the condition in the world and in Canada to-day and tell me this—

Mr. DUNNING: They have the ability to pay to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I am saying.

Mr. DUNNING: Then they are that much better off.

Mr. BENNETT: I was about to say that they are that much better off, but that the government of the country is making no provision for the continuance of that condition. I have not forgotten that only seven or eight years ago the present Minister of Finance stood where he now sits and I heard his May-day budget speech in which he talked about the glorious prosperity of this country; yet he knew, or ought to have known at that very moment, that the country was being plunged into the greatest depression it ever experienced. He must have known it—

Mr. DUNNING: I had not the omniscience of my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman may not have had it, but at least he professed it. It is pleasing to have him admit that he had not.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the face of these conditions, in the face of the world interest in the problems that concern not this country alone but the whole world, we find on the part of this government inaction. Inaction! A statement that foreign trade will solve our difficulties, when they know as well as I do that the moment the buying power of those who take our products ends, that moment our prosperity departs. They know that; every man knows that is what happened in 1929-30. When those who have been buying our products can no longer buy, then our prosperity vanishes. I believe in foreign trade; I desire foreign trade; but I desire foreign trade only as the complement of the development of our own life and provision against any onslaught that may come to our economic life by reason of the fact that we cannot market our products abroad. When you say it is other than that you cannot but know what the end must be. It cannot be otherwise.

But this government has done nothing. With respect to monetary policy it is just the same old tale: the fight with the money power is still to be joined, the great struggle is about to commence. It is always about to commence but it has not commenced. Tomorrow or the day after peradventure we shall indeed engage them, if the day be not stormy or the signs unpropitious. Peradventure we may be able to increase our paper money five or six times over what it now is and enable the fortifications of Vancouver island to be erected.

An hon. MEMBER: How about the guns?

Mr. BENNETT: An hon. gentleman wants to know about the guns. I commend to him that poem of Kipling's about the guns. When he has read that he probably will have a clear understanding.

I see no possibility of this government initiating anything that looks toward the amelioration of the condition of the people. They are content to say that all you have to do is to establish foreign trade, and supplant the representatives of the Department of Trade and Commerce by those of the Department of Agriculture. That is all there is to be done; when that is done all is accomplished. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have to do something more than that. We have to establish security and confidence. What happened to your loan in London the other day? What happened to it?

Mr. DUNNING: Does my right hon. friend want to know?

Mr. BENNETT: Well, he reads, and he is familiar with the method by which these matters are dealt with. The underwriters took forty-nine per cent of it, and large blocks were taken off the market to prevent its going to a larger discount than it did. You have to compare the 3½ per cent loan offered by this dominion with the 3¼ offered by Australia.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my right hon. friend mean to say that there is less confidence in London in Canadian loans than in Australian?

Mr. BENNETT: I mean to say that there is less confidence in this Canadian loan than there was in the Australian loan.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend cannot possibly have the facts.

Mr. BENNETT: The underwriters did not get forty-nine per cent of the Australian loan, and they did of this.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. HANSON: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: The great financier from Skeena will be well advised to confine himself to something he knows. That is all that may be said with respect to that.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall have an opportunity to give the facts on some future occasion.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no difficulty about the facts; I am familiar with them.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to move an amendment to the address:

> We desire respectfully to express regret that the speech from the throne does not indicate that the government has taken or contemplates taking efficient measures to deal with unfavourable economic conditions in Canada, and that no legislative action is proposed to deal effectively with the prevailing uncertainty and insecurity resulting from the inadequate incomes of large numbers of our people.

The real truth is that today, despite what may be said with respect to prosperity, the average incomes of the people of this country are wholly inadequate to maintain decent life and the amenities of life in their homes. Let the government explain why it is that the incomes of the people of this country are wholly inadequate to supply their wants; the unemployed, the hundreds of thousands on relief. Let us hear the adequate explanation. Then will begin, I am sure, that great struggle, so long hoped for, of the giant against the money power, by which it is to be shaken to its very foundations and torn asunder, so that peace and good will will reign amongst the sons of men.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to extend my heartiest congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the motion for an address to his excellency in reply to the speech from the throne. Both hon. members were known to us before their entrance into this house. We knew them as gentlemen who had each played an important part in the affairs of his own province. The hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Francœur) was for many years a member of the Quebec legislature. He was for a time Minister of Public Works in the Quebec government, and, for nine years, Speaker of the legislative assembly. Those of us who had the pleasure of listening to him this afternoon will agree that his experience and attainments in political affairs and in his chosen profession were amply reflected in the eloquent and able address which he delivered.

My hon. friend from Renfrew North (Mr. Warren), as we know, played an active part in municipal affairs, having served as reeve of his township and for many years as a member of the Renfrew county council. He has as well been a member of the Ontario legislature and, as in the case of the hon. member for Lotbiniere, his address this afternoon afforded evidence of the experience which he has already attained in public life. His address has made apparent that we have had added to our number one who is particularly interested in the well-being of the farming community; one who has a broad interest in questions of the day and an hon. member who is well able to participate effectively in the discussions of the house.

I should like, in addition to welcoming these two new members to the house, to extend a welcome also to the other members who have entered parliament for the first time at this session: the hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria (Mr. MacLean); the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. McCallum), and the hon. member for St. Henry (Mr. Bonnier). We shall have with us in a few days, I hope, the hon. member for Victoria, (B.C.) (Mr. Mayhew), who, unfortunately, is indisposed at the present time. All these gentlemen, will, I trust, have useful careers in this parliament in the service of their country.

There is one other hon. gentleman who I am also glad to see again in his seat in this house, our friend the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). With his usual modesty he did not permit himself to be reintroduced to the house. May I say to him that we are glad to see him back again in the fold, as I am sure he is glad to be back. I have no doubt that, after his little escapade last summer and autumn in provincial politics, he has come back a much wiser though perhaps a somewhat sadder man.

Now may I say to my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) that we all enjoyed very much some of the humour of his speech. We have been entertained by his digressions in many directions, although it has been a little difficult to follow him in some of his denunciations, exclamations, innuendoes and insinuations. I am not going to try to follow him along that devious course. I was however somewhat surprised that he was not a little more courteous to one of the hon. members who has just come into this house, who he had heard speaking for only a very few minutes and who he would not permit even to ask a question when, in the mind of the hon. member for Renfrew North, the right hon. gentleman himself was misconstruing what that hon. member had just been saying.

My right hon. friend said that the hon. member for Renfrew North had been drawing on his imagination for the facts. Well, there are some things with respect to which we need not draw on our imagination to be perfectly sure of the facts. One is that the present administration received from the people of this country the largest majority that any administration has had in the history of Canada. Nor do we need to draw on our imagination to recall that while for a time my right hon. friend was the leader of a very large party, he got at the end of one term of office one of the worst defeats any prime minister ever received. Nor do we need to draw on our imagination for a further fact, one which I think is also important, in view of what my right hon. friend has had to say by way of crititcism of the government, particularly with reference to what he says we have failed to do, in the matter of improving conditions. Let me ask: How has the country itself viewed the actions of the government since it took office? We have had seventeen by-elections since the general elections of 1935. Of that number my right hon. friend has carried three and the present administration fourteen. Of the three which my right hon. friend and his party have carried, one was in the city of Victoria. Since that by-election, there has been a second in this same constituency and the seat has been lost by my right hon. friend's party. One of the other two was the by-election which returned my hon. friend from Dufferin-Simcoe, of whom I spoke a moment ago. Evidently he was quite overcome by the few kindly remarks which were made about him, for he has left the chamber. The hon. member was allowed to leave this house by one of its doors and to come back unopposed by the same door.

There is still another fact to be kept in mind, it is not something imagined. While the present government was returned to power after the general elections of 1935 with the largest majority any administration has ever had in the history of Canada, to-day, at the beginning of the third session of the present parliament, we enjoy an even larger majority than we had at the time we came into office.

It is the country's opinion, I value. So, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to devote too much time to what my right hon. friend has said about our failure to help meet the situation as it exists in this country. He has said a great deal about unemployment, which he states is continuing. May I remind the house of what my right hon. friend told the electorate when he was appealing to them and when they returned him to office in 1930? He promised that he would end unemployment or perish in the attempt. Far from perishing, he is here in livelier form than ever.

My right hon. friend talks about the number of unemployed, but the numbers of unemployed to-day are very different from what they were during his period of office, fortunately for the people and for the incomes of the people, to which his amendment to-night relates.

I was pleased, as we all were, to hear the reference the right hon. gentleman made to Their Majesties the King and Queen. Those of us who were privileged to attend the coronation ceremonies were deeply impressed by what we witnessed in Westminster Abbey. Even more impressive, however, than the consecration by their majesties of their lives at that service, is the devotion which they have shown to the public service in their high post of duty since his majesty's accession. I doubt if at any time in the history of any country there have been upon the throne a king and queen more devoted to each other and to their subjects, and whose lives have been more completely consecrated to the well-being of their fellow men, than King George VI and Queen Elizabeth. The affection in which they are held in the old land is already all but equalled by the affection entertained for them in all parts of their great empire.

The speech from the throne affords, I think, an appropriate opportunity for a reference to the recognition given in the coronation ceremoney to the complete nationhood of the Dominion of Canada. I confess that as I listened to the oath which was administered to his majesty, and heard his majesty promise to obey it, I felt great pride as a Canadian to hear for the first time in history my own country in relation to the crown mentioned in terms exactly the same as those applied to Great Britain itself. The oath administered at the time of the coronation ceremony was as follows:

> Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the peoples of Great Britain, Ireland, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa, of your possessions and the other territories to any of them belonging or pertaining, and of your empire of India, according to their respective laws and customs?

The reply was:

> I solemnly promise so to do.

That oath marks the end of a suggestion, remote or otherwise, of anything in the nature of subordinate or colonial status. It is the enunciation by the crown itself of the complete nationhood of Canada on equality, so far as status is concerned, with all other nations of the British Commonwealth.

I found it somewhat difficult to follow the observations of my right hon. friend with regard to the imperial conference. So far as I am able to recollect, his observations were to the effect that speeches were reported to have been made by me, or that something had appeared somewhere referring to me, purporting that, at the imperial conference, I had acted as the chief interpreter of the views of the chief executive of another country with respect to that country's relationship with Great Britain.

Why did my right hon. friend not come right out and state that some Conservative papers, here and there, have been saying that Mr. Mackenzie King was seeking to be of some service to the President of the United States in connection with his desire to conclude a trade agreement with Great Britain. That is what he meant, but he did not say it. He left it as a sort of vague impression, one which has been fostered right and left in the press supporting my right hon. friend. In fact, in an editorial in one of the papers of this city there appeared the statement that, when last year I visited Washington as the guest of the president, the purpose of my visit was to discuss the proposed trade agreement with Great Britain, that I had gone very fully into the whole matter with the president and with the secretary of state, and that I had then gone to the imperial conference and at the conference had been the advocate for the United States with respect to an agreement with Great Britain.

May I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. members, that at the time I visited Mr. Roosevelt at the White House in the early part of last year, and had the privilege of discussing a great many questions with him in an intimate way, the subject of a trade agreement between the United States and Great Britain was never so much as mentioned. The same is literally and absolutely true with respect to any conversation I had with the Secretary of State for the United States at that time, or with any member of the United States government.

It was from the British Ambassador in Washington, and from our own minister in Washington who, in turn, had received his information from the British Ambassador, that I learned for the first time that for some little time there had been explorations, negotiations, conversations, whatever the proper description may be, with respect to the possibility of a trade agreement between the United States and Great Britain. It was information given, not with any request attached to it, but a simple statement of the fact that these two countries were contemplating negotiations and had begun discussions.

When, with some of my colleagues, I was present at one of the sessions of the Imperial conference in London, the matter was brought up, not at my instance, as was stated from some inspired source, but by a minister of the crown in Great Britain. The question was discussed openly before the representatives of the empire countries there represented, in which number Canada was included. We were told of the nature of the negotiations under way and were asked to express our views with regard to them. I need not say to this House of Commons that any expression of views from any of my colleagues or myself was wholly to the effect that, while Canada was anxious in every way to be of service in the matter of furthering friendly relationships among different countries, we would necessarily wish to see that every privilege we enjoyed in the British market was fully protected, and that any change which might be made in that position could be made only as the result of what in our opinion were adequate compensations therefor.

I do not propose to-night to go into the matter of trade negotiations between Great Britain and the United States, or for that matter into trade negotiations between Canada and the United States. I shall have something to say on these matters at a later date. Part of the business of a leader of an opposition is, so far as possible, to draw out the government in advance of the time at which discussions on certain subjects may properly take place. The time to discuss these trade matters is when we have something concrete before us for deliberation.

I should, however, make it abundantly clear that any trade negotiations between Great Britain and the United States were begun and entered into by those countries themselves. Of necessity we have to take notice of them. We have an agreement with Great Britain and one with the United States, each of which will expire shortly. In fact, the one with the United States runs to the end of the present year, and is subject thereafter upon notice to complete cancellation at the end of six months. The agreement with Great Britain expires in 1940.

It is necessary for a government at all times to have regard, not only for today but for to-morrow, to have regard to situations which may arise not in the immediate present only but also in the future. Under these circumstances I would ask any hon. member this question: When other countries belonging to the British Commonwealth of Nations have declared their willingness to cooperate helpfully, if it is possible so to do, in the furtherance of trade relations between the two greatest trading countries of the world, in a manner which it is hoped will help to serve the interests not only of these two countries but of all parts of the British Commonwealth and other nations as well, should Canada be the one to sit back, like a dog in the manger and say, "We will have nothing to do with either of you in transactions of the kind"? I wonder where we would be in the course of another year if that were the attitude we chose to take.

If that is the attitude he would take, it is a fortunate thing for Canada that my right hon. friend is not in office to-day. I tell him that, strongly as he may feel about the importance of having a wall around this country, the walls which have been built up around different countries are more than anything else, responsible for the unrest throughout the world at the present time. The world will get through its present difficulties, not by nations adopting an attitude of non-cooperation, but by all countries being as helpful as they can and in as many directions as possible. Particularly is this true with respect to matters tending to improve conditions in international trade.

The next topic to which reference is made in the speech from the throne is the improvement in Canada's economic condition. The facts of recovery are so evident, I had thought I would not say very much on this subject, but the amendment of my right hon. friend forces me to make some observations. He has moved the following in amendment:

> We desire respectfully to express regret that the speech from the throne does not indicate that the government have taken or contemplate taking efficient measures to deal with unfavourable economic conditions in Canada, and that no legislative action is proposed to deal effectively with the prevailing uncertainty and insecurity resulting from the inadequate incomes of large numbers of our people.

The amendment regrets that the speech from the throne does not indicate that the government have taken or contemplate taking efficient measures to improve economic conditions. Why should the speech from the throne state that the government contemplates taking efficient measures to improve economic conditions? Look at the facts and figures with regard to the present conditions in Canada in comparison with what they were when we came into office and see what they disclose. They speak more eloquently than any words in the speech from the throne could. If we inserted in the speech from the throne the exact words calculated to avoid my right hon. friend's amendment he would have criticized us at once. He would have told us that instead of putting any such words into the speech from the throne it would have been much better to have enumerated the statistics which would verify the fact that an improvement had taken place.

He said that within the last little while there had been a falling off of trade with the United States, that there had been a setback to some extent, and that the balance of trade was not what it had been. My right hon. friend knows very well that the falling off this year in exports to the United States and other countries is due, more than anything else to the unfortunate drought which has been experienced in western Canada. In the past year, the United States had a surplus of grains, feed and fodder, whereas Canada unfortunately, as a result of intense drought had no exportable surplus. A year ago that situation was entirely the reverse. At that time we had a surplus of these commodities and drought in the United States necessitated large imports of them from Canada. Because of drought, Canada did not have a normal quantity of wheat for export in the closing months of 1937. The exports of wheat in December, 1936, were valued at $25,256,000, whereas in December, 1937, they were valued at only $10,121,000. In the one item of wheat there was a decrease of $15,000,000 or 60 per cent in one month. This decrease was due in part, to the fact that the dominion had not been able to produce the wheat required for export. We hope that this condition will not recur in the present year, and there is strong reason to believe that it will not. If conditions should again become what we hope they will, then unquestionably sales to the United States and other countries will be appreciably increased as a consequence.

Mr. BENNETT: The exports that have just been mentioned were not to the United States only.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They were Canadian wheat exports, but a very large part would have gone to the United States if we had been in a position to sell.

Notwithstanding what my right hon. friend asserts in his amendment, there is abundant evidence of substantial progress. The speech from the throne refers to the new levels that have been reached in revenues. Revenues are a fairly good index as to whether or not conditions have improved. For the first nine months of the fiscal year 1935-36, the total ordinary revenues of Canada amounted to $288,000,000. In the same period in 1936-37, they had increased to $339,000,000. In 1937-38, they totalled $401,000,000. The figures for 1937-38 showed an increase of 18 per cent over the 1936-37 period and 39 per cent over the 1935-36 period. In 1937-38, the revenues of this country were the highest that they have ever been for a similar period in any year.

These figures supply the answer to my right hon. friend's amendment. They indicate the degree of relative prosperity in this country when compared with what it has been in the past.

Let us take the figures with respect to trade. The total trade of Canada for the calendar year of 1937 was the highest since 1929, which was one of the best years. In 1935, the last year my right hon. friend was in office, the total trade of Canada amounted to $1,389,000,000. In 1936 it amounted to $1,663,000,000, and in 1937, $1,934,000,000. The 1937 figure shows an increase of $271,000,000 or 16 per cent over the 1936 figure and $545,000,000 or 39 per cent over the 1935 figure. For those who insist that the important factor is the balance of trade, let me state that Canada had a favourable visible balance of trade of $316,000,000 for the calendar year 1937. For the first time since 1921, Canada regained her position as the fourth greatest exporting nation in the world.

Yet to-night this new doctrine of no advantage in export trade, is put forth quite evidently to help combine the Tory party with those of the Social Credit and other groups who sit to its left.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know my right hon. friend did not say it, but I am saying it. I know what he has in his mind.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say there was no advantage in export trade.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend has so many doctrines that it is hard to keep track of them, but, according to the latest one put forth to-night, it is a mistake to think of international trade as being a good thing.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say any such thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend said that it led to war.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what I said either.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend may have his eyes on the Edmonton East by-election.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I am not thinking about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He may be hoping that between now and the next general election he can succeed by some doctrine of economic nationalism in finding an alleged solution of all problems. He evidently hopes to bring these two parties into a working combination. The Conservative party will be brought into this combination on the basis of high protection, and the Social Credit party will be brought in on the basis that their experiment can succeed only where there is no contact with the outside world.

My right hon. friend came into power in 1930 on the cry that he would end unemployment in a short time. He went out of office five years later because he had not succeeded but had made the situation worse. He left us with a pretty heavy legacy. We have, however, tried to do our best, and have succeeded to a considerable degree. What is the position with regard to the increase in employment and the decrease in unemployment? More persons were employed in Canada on January 1, 1938, than at the corresponding period of any previous year in the history of Canada. That fact is disclosed by the figures of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics with regard to employment by firms employing fifteen or more persons. The index number for January 1, 1930, stood at 119·1; in 1938 it was 121·4. I want to repeat that fact: More persons were employed on January 1, 1938, than at the corresponding time in any previous year.

What about unemployment? Unemployment was lower in December 1937, than in the same month of any year since the beginning of the depression. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics estimate of unemployment in Canada for the month of December in different years is as follows:

A very substantial decrease. The relief figures at last also show a marked decrease. There is always a time lag between reemployment and the corresponding reduction in relief. This was evident a year ago, despite the substantial increase in employment at that time. The figures for this year are as follows: The total number afforded direct relief, including dependents and those receiving part time relief, for the month of December, 1932, was 1,243,000; December, 1936, 1,119,000; December, 1937—no longer in the million—down to 970,000. This reduction in the relief figures has taken place notwithstanding the drastic increase in relief in Saskatchewan due to drought conditions. The total of the direct relief for the province of Saskatchewan alone—which helps to show where the numbers are—ran up from: in December, 1935, 176,000; and December, 1936, 230,000, to 400,000 in December, 1937. The total estimated population of Saskatchewan in 1937, it should be borne in mind, is 939,000.

Now what do these figures of the increase in employment and increase in trade indicate? They indicate that a consequent improvement has taken place all along the line of our economic life. Carloadings, for instance, have materially increased. In fact, they have been the highest this last year since 1930. The gross operating revenue of the railways has been the highest since 1931. In the year just closed, industrial production and the volume of business in Canada have attained unprecedented levels. I will not go into details, they can be given at some other time if necessary. If you are to gauge economic improvement and progress, what are the indices by which you will do so? One is the increase in revenues, another is the increase in trade, another is the increase of employment, and another is the decrease of unemployment. In every one of these, the record is exceptionally good. While undoubtedly much remains to be done, this much at least is clear: our policies have been in the right direction. We have heard my right hon. friend to-night describe an individual case of hardship and distress. There are too many of these cases, but, thank heaven, there are not anything like the number to-day that there were when he was in office Things are very different indeed. We are witnessing gradually an improvement of conditions, not as quick an improvement as we should like, but as rapid, apparently, as the circumstances of the times have made possible. It may be that some hon. member can make a suggestion which will serve as a cure-all for the ills of to-day. We have heard a good many of them in the past. Heretofore when most of them have been tried, they have not been too successful.

My right hon. friend spoke of the employment commission and asked why, the commission having made its report, we were not acting upon its recommendations. Well, there have been several recommendations of the commission which have already been acted upon. I shall not anticipate what the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) may have to say, but I might point out to the house that, when we came into office, there was no registration of the unemployed on relief in this country. To-day the unemployed have been registered from the Atlantic to the Pacific. In this particular, we know where we are at in dealing with this problem. This registration was one of the initial recommendations and subsequent accomplishments of the commission. When we came into office there were from one side of this country to the other relief camps in which single unemployed men were massed together in great numbers. These camps were becoming more and more hotbeds of unrest and dangerous discontent and were proving anything but helpful to those who were the members of them. Happily, these relief camps have completely disappeared. The men who were in them have, in considerable numbers, found employment elsewhere or have been receiving training to fit them for honourable occupations in some business or industry in which they may wish to engage. Another recommendation of the commission, put into operation by the government had to do with youth training projects. Up to the present, 26,000 unemployed young people have received, or are receiving training in various types of useful and profitable work. Then there has been the scheme for placing large numbers of single unemployed men on the farms, helping to supply the farmer with labour which he needed, helping to supply these men with work, remuneration, and the comfort of a home. Thousands have been placed in these positions. Moreover, under the home improvement plan, another recommendation of the commission acted upon by the government, 34,000 loans have been made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), all of which have helped to provide employment to large numbers of those engaged in the building and other trades.

These are some of the things which have been done under recommendations of the employment commission. The final report of the commission reached the government only a day or two ago. That report is being translated and is also being set up in type at the printing bureau. The government has assumed that hon. members will wish to have the report in printed form as soon as it is tabled. We assume that the house will desire to order a number of copies. But we are anticipating that order by asking the bureau to go ahead with the printing, so that as soon as the report can be tabled in both French and English, it may be immediately available in printed form to all hon. members.

The same is true with respect to the report of the textile commission, which is now in the hands of the translators. It was not received until shortly before parliament opened. As soon as it is translated and printed it, too, will be laid on the table. My right hon. friend has complained about the length of time it has taken for that report to be completed and signed. It is true that it has taken longer than the government hoped it might. My right hon. friend has spoken about Mr. Justice Turgeon being employed upon another report, which has to do with the grain trade. It so happens that Mr. Justice Turgeon has an exceptional knowledge of matters pertaining to the grain trade, and when it was thought advisable to have an investigation made into the subject of the wheat board and its operations. it was, I think, a matter of general opinion that to undertake that particular work, no better person could be secured in Canada than Mr. Justice Turgeon. The matter being as important as it was, the government felt that, notwithstanding the fact that he had undertaken the onerous task of conducting an inquiry into conditions in the textile industry, it would ask him to undertake the other task as well. He has had a very heavy time of it, but I think that when the house receives the reports which will be presented to it there will be every reason to believe that it was worth waiting a little longer to get the results we shall obtain in that way.

I pass on to the next subject, which is one that seems to afford my right hon. friend considerable amusement, namely the relations between the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Agriculture. No doubt he has in mind some of the experiences he himself underwent when he was head of a previous administration and had to do with officials in different government departments. The matter is a very simple one. I think the press in some cases has looked upon it as one that, with the aid of their own imaginations, could be exploited with interest to the public. They have sought to make out that there was a sort of government crisis arising out of different points of view being held by officials of various departments. May I tell my right hon. friend and other hon. members exactly what the facts are?

As my right hon. friend has said, there has always been a question as to just where the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture in the matter of preparation of products for marketing ended, and where the jurisdiction of the Department of Trade and Commerce with respect to marketing and sale began. There is a point at which the two come more or less into pretty close contact; and when they do, the officials of the departments concerned are apt to come into close contact as well. If there happens to be the slightest comment which can be construed as a suggestion that some department has not quite measured up to the mark, immediately it is taken as a reflection upon the officials of a particular department.

My colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), appointed Mr. A. M. Shaw, along with other experts, to prepare a report on certain aspects of the United Kingdom market and Canadian agricultural products. That report was printed and distributed. It so happened that it contained some inaccuracies. It also contained some statements that were a bit ambiguous and capable of being misconstrued. That being the case, strong exception was naturally taken to certain phases of the report. However, when these matters were brought to the attention of the government, the Minister of Agriculture himself immediately suggested that there should be a committee, which would be composed of representatives of the Departments of Trade and Commerce and of External Affairs, as well as of his own department, to go over the report to see wherein for the sake of accuracy, statements might require revision. That has been done and the report has been changed to that extent. The report had been printed and distributed to the extent of some five thousand copies, six thousand in all having been ordered. When the matters to which I have referred were brought to the attention of the government, the minister himself suggested to me that it would be inadvisable for him to continue the distribution further. He said he would retain what copies remained undistributed. That part of the report which contains constructive suggestions, with respect to production may later be made available in another form. That is where the matter stands at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: Was there an order in council?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With respect to the report?

Mr. BENNETT: No, with respect to the consolidation of the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With respect to the consolidation of the department, that has been a matter of internal organization in the department, the minister managing his own department and arranging its affairs within the terms of the law.

So that there may be no mistake about the line of demarcation between the functions of the two departments, may I say what my understanding of it is—and I think it is correct. The marketing of agricultural produce in so far as it relates to Canada is a matter that belongs entirely to the Department of Agriculture. There can be no doubt about that. There are in Canada provincial departments of agriculture as well as the federal department, and it is necessary for the minister so far as the federal Department of Agriculture is concerned, to have supervision over the entire work of marketing throughout all parts of Canada. As Minister of Agriculture, he is equally interested in seeing that all agricultural commodities for sale in foreign countries are so processed, packed, classified, packaged, transported and inspected, that there can be no doubt regarding their quantity and quality when they reach the market. In other words, he has to see to the quality and acceptability of the commodities that are exported.

Mr. BENNETT: "Acceptability" might be open to a wrong construction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "Acceptability" in this sense, that the effort of the Minister of Agriculture is to ascertain the particular form and the quality and the kind of commodities most desired in the markets of the world. The jurisdiction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce begins with the matters of trade and of sale. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has to do with the business of sales, the business of trade in foreign countries. There need not necessarily be a conflict between the two. The line of margin where possible differences may arise, or at least have arisen in the past—they need not in the future if proper safeguards are observed—is with respect to the borderline I have described, where the Minister of Agriculture sees to it that products reach the old country and are there in a form for marketing that will be acceptable, and the part which the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his officials play in seeking to advertise these goods and to gain for them the widest possible sale.

All along there have been a number of inspectors in the old country, under the Minister of Agriculture, to inspect live stock and commodities as they reach that country. They have been there since 1912. It is proposed that there shall be—in fact the government has agreed to it—a commissioner to supervise the work of these various inspectors, and who is to be free to travel in foreign countries for the purpose of gathering information which he can send to his own department to be of assistance to the minister in having agricultural products prepared as necessary and in the manner most desirable. That is the extent to which his organization is expected to operate beyond the bounds of Canada; the rest of the work is all under the control of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

That brings me to another matter which has been the subject of discussion, to which my right hon. friend referred when he was speaking to-night, namely that in some way the supervision of advertising had been taken from the High Commissioner for Canada, Mr. Massey, because of the estimates for that purpose having been transferred from the Department of External Affairs to the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not mention advertising.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What was it my right hon. friend had in mind?

Mr. BENNETT: I had in mind the question of the relation between the two departments in connection with the high commissioner's office. The statute says he shall act as agent for Canada in connection with all business.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What my right hon. friend says is correct; the high commissioner's position is that of agent for Canada with respect to all departments. However, my right hon. friend will recall that prior to 1933, I think it was, the Minister of Trade and Commerce brought into the house estimates with respect to the work of publicity overseas, and he himself changed that arrangement and had them brought in by the Minister of External Affairs, which office he held, because, as I understand it, he felt, from representations which the Hon. Mr. Ferguson had made—Mr. Ferguson was high commissioner at the time—that there was need for closer coordination of effort with respect to publicity in the old country, and that there should be more immediate control by the high commissioner. He believed that he himself was in a better position than anyone else to bring about the desired result. When we came into office Mr. Massey continued the work which Mr. Ferguson had carried on in that regard; and Mr. Massey has done that work as efficiently and effectively as could be expected of any high commissioner.

What is the change that has been made? In reality none, so far as Mr. Massey is concerned. Mr. Massey's position remains exactly as it is with respect to the supervision of the work of publicity. He will be assisted in the future, as in the past, by an advisory committee composed of representatives of the departments interested. The only difference is that instead of my presenting, as Secretary of State for External Affairs, the estimate for overseas publicity, advertising and the like, in the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, these estimates will be presented hereafter by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. BENNETT: Instead of the high commissioner's office?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, instead of their being presented in connection with the vote for the high commissioner's office they will be presented with the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That change was made at my own instance after the experience I went through in the house last year in presenting the estimates to the house. After having endeavoured to tell this house about the overseas advertising publicity campaigns, and the like, I said to Doctor Skelton, the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, that I did not see why I should have to do this, that it properly belonged to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and that I hoped that, when the estimates were prepared this year, that vote would be submitted in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. BENNETT: Then there is no change at all?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no change at all, and the effort to have it appear that in some way there has been some difference which accounts for the change is as erroneous as it could possibly be. I think that what was felt most keenly in connection with the Shaw report was that references, which were not intended in any way to relate to the advertising campaign which Mr. Massey had put on for the Canadian government in England, were construed as relating to that campaign. They did not refer to that campaign at all. I think it has been generally conceded that that work was done most efficiently and effectively. It is very much to Canada's interest that it should be distinctly understood in the old land that there is nothing but the highest approval on the part of the government, and I believe on the part of the opposition and all hon. members of the house, of the campaign put on by Mr. Massey in the old country in the last year or two. In fact one of the strongest endorsations of that campaign came from the other side of the house last year.

In order that there could be no difference of view, and that the matter might be presented more clearly to the house when parliament met, I submitted a recommendation on the 25th of this month, and an order in council was passed with respect to advertising and the promotion of trade overseas, defining the relation between the work of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the high commissioner's office regarding advertising in the United Kingdom. The recommendation adopted is as follows:

1. All financial provision for governmental assistance to the promotion of Canadian trade abroad (including any appropriations for advertising and trade publicity) shall be made in the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce and shall be subject to the supervision of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

2. An advisory committee on trade publicity overseas shall be set up of representatives of the Department of Trade and Commerce, External Affairs, Agriculture, Fisheries, whose duty it will be to assist in securing effective collaboration between the several departments concerned with special aspects of government advertising and publicity policy abroad.

3. The advisory committee on publicity in the United Kingdom established under the chairmanship of the High Commissioner shall continue to carry out the work it has been doing in connection with the vote for government advertising and publicity in the United Kingdom.

With the permission of the house I should like to table the order in council.

I hope this will clear up the situation. I deplore very much the criticisms that have been made of the high commissioner in London. I think they have been most unfair and unjust.

While speaking of the high commissioner, may I refer to one other criticism that has been made. It has been alleged anonymously that Mr. Massey did not show the attention he should have shown to some Canadians who were in London during the period of the coronation. I believe if it were left to hon. members who were in London at the time of the coronation to speak for themselves, they would agree with me that the high commissioner did all that any man could have possibly been expected to do in meeting the difficulties with which the high commissioner's office was faced at that time, and that what Mr. Massey and his small staff accomplished was really most remarkable in face of the situation as it existed. The coronation and the imperial conference made exceptional demands on the high commissioner's office. I wonder if hon. members realize how great that additional obligation was. There were arrangements for invitations to and the placing of Canadians in the abbey; the allocation of 4,800 tickets for Canadians to view the possession on the line of march, as well as the financing and administration of the sale of those tickets. This involved the writing of approximately 30,000 letters by a small staff hurriedly improvised for the occasion. There were arrangements for the erection of the stand at Canada House, the allocation of 525 seats thereon and the financing of this enterprise through receipts from tickets. This was entirely a Canada House initiative. Canadian visitors registered at Canada House during the coronation period to the number of 7,360. Efforts were made to assist them in a variety of ways, securing them accommodation, tickets for luncheons, hospitality, and looking after their mail. Approximately 30,000 letters were distributed or readdressed, to visitors by the Canada House staff during this period, while some 13,000 invitations to official, semi-official and private functions were arranged. The high commissioner himself entertained at his own house during the coronation period some 2,000 Canadian visitors. I submit that with a task of that size thrown upon the organization at Canada House, what was accomplished in the circumstances was truly remarkable.

Before leaving this subject, I desire to refer to an insinuation, if not a statement made by one newspaper correspondent, that money voted by this parliament for publicity purposes had been used by Mr. Massey as high commissioner for entertainment and social purposes. I deny that statement emphatically and totally. I wish to add that if more statements of that kind appear in future, the government will not hesitate to institute prosecution of those responsible for them.

Mr. BENNETT: It could not happen anyway.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, certainly not.

There will be other opportunities to discuss the work of the royal commission appointed to deal with dominion-provincial relations. I should like, however, to say at once that the criticism my right hon. friend has directed against the personnel of the commission is not so much a criticism of individuals of this particular commission as it is a criticism of all royal commissions. It is a criticism of the integrity of men who undertake judicial duties. My right hon. friend knows as well as anyone living, better than most people, that any attack of the character upon the judiciary would be wholly indefensible.

Mr. BENNETT: This is not judicial duty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: These are judicial duties, very much so. The commission is presided over by a chief justice of one of our provinces. I was surprised that my right hon. friend should make the attack he did upon the personnel of the commission. He has told us to-day that he did not make the criticism of the chief justice attributed to him. But he did, I think, include him as belonging to the pack of Grits to which he referred. He now nods his head to that effect. But the chairman of the commission was not so classified at the time he was President of the Privy Council in Sir Robert Borden's government. I think the present administration has shown pretty clearly in this appointment as in the appointment of Mr. Dafoe, the attitude of those who were supporters of Sir Wilfrid Laurier throughout the whole of his leadership. We have not been hidebound by a narrow or bigoted party point of view. We have sought to take what we believed was the right and large view of liberalism in this country. May I ask my right hon. friend a question? I suppose there is no greater political partisan in the country to-day than himself. And I think he would agree that there are few men in Canada—and I say this with pride and pleasure—who are more admirably equipped intellectually and by high legal attainments and learning for a position on the bench than himself. Would he regard the fact that he had been in politics, and is to-day the bitter partisan that he is, as evidence that he was wholly unsuited to occupy a position on a royal commission or wholly unsuited to occupy a place on the bench? The judiciary of this country is filled with men who at one time or another have occupied seats in this House of Commons, who have been extreme party men or perhaps I ought to say very sincere party men, who fought their political battles in the open, feeling that others believed in their integrity and sincerity of purpose. When they have gone on the bench or have acted as members of royal commissions or have been given other positions of honour and trust and confidence, they have sought to bring to those positions the integrity which their fellowmen had come to know and admire while they were sitting in parliament.

The same is true of the gentlemen who have been appointed to this royal commission. There is not in this country a man, with the possible exception of the chief justice of Ontario, who has given more careful thought and study to constitutional questions than Doctor Dafoe. I do not believe there is a man whose integrity of mind and purpose is stronger and firmer or more respected than that of Doctor Dafoe.

No one knows better than my right hon. friend that this commission is not deciding on the future constitution of Canada. The work of the commission is concerned with the finding of facts and the expressing of opinions in reference to those facts. Whether or not the opinions reached prove to be wise and such as to commend themselves to the judgment of others will depend upon what those opinions are, in the light of all the facts put before the commission. My right hon. friend says we should have had the matter so arranged that there would be a convention where, as soon as one opinion was put forward, in the very next moment it could be combated by another. I wonder what would be accomplished at a convention of that sort, where every time a speaker got up to make one proposal from one province he would be combated by someone with a counter proposal from another province. It was precisely to avoid that sort of thing that this commission was appointed, and that is the reason most commissions are appointed. The commission will make its investigation thoroughly, as it is doing now, with respect to facts and opinions from coast to coast, being prepared to receive any representations presented to it in a responsible way for consideration. All this information will be at the disposal of hon. members of this house and the members of provincial governments when estimating the value of the opinions of the commission. Whether or not the government itself will accept the views of the commission, or the opinions of any commission, is by no means certain. The government like everyone else, will wish to study the report. We are not obligating ourselves in advance to accept whatever this or any other commission may recommend or suggest. The terms of reference have been drafted in specific terms to make clear that what the commission is expected to do is to give opinions and the grounds for those opinions, and endeavour so to elucidate matters that when public bodies come to deal with the great questions with which the commission is concerned, they will have accurate and adequate information before them.

I venture to say that the commission has more than justified its establishment already, if for no other reason than that the country sees to-day, as it has never seen before, the reasons for the differences that exist between different parts of Canada and the difficulties in the way of meeting the various situations that arise. I venture to say there is not an hon. member of this parliament who has not already had his eyes opened by the representations that have been made to the commission in different parts of the country; as to what was expected of the government at Ottawa; as to what is to be expected in years to come, and as to the impossibility of the acceptance of some of the proposals that are being advanced. It is just because the whole situation is so complex and involved that it is necessary to have a commission to sort out the material and go through it in a thorough manner, reviewing it so that it can be taken up intelligently by those who later will have to deal with questions of policy.

So far as policy is concerned, what is to be done with the information that will be put before parliament as a result of the work of the commission, is a matter that will come up entirely independently of the commission. Anyone who says that we are seeking by means of the commission, to change the constitution of this country, and that we are thus in fact changing it, is stating something that is wholly without foundation. The commission has been appointed, not to change the constitution, but to examine facts with regard to economic conditions, financial responsibilities and the like. There is a difference between changing and examining. When it comes to the question of change, this parliament and the legislatures of the different provinces of Canada will have their full say in the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: The order in council speaks of the distribution of legislative powers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, the commission is empowered to examine into the distribution of legislative powers, but not to change them. My right hon. friend knows that no commission can alter the distribution of legislative powers. He knows that this parliament is the only body which can do that with respect to the constitution of Canada. His time would be much better spent, and his great knowledge of these questions better utilized, if he sought to show wherein it might be possible, step by step, precept by precept, here a little and there a little, to bring about changes that are going to be in the interests of Canada as a whole, rather than trying to add to difficulties by suggesting, because different views are finding expression, that the commission is rendering a disservice to Canada.

I never listened to anything so—I was going to say "puerile"; I hope my right hon. friend will not mind the word—

Mr. BENNETT: Not at all, considering its source.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —as his statement with respect to a document which had been prepared by the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) for the government of Nova Scotia, which evidently has been much appreciated by the citizens of other parts of Canada as well as of the maritime provinces. My right hon. friend says that this document is going to upset the constitution, and set the east against the west. My right hon. friend went a long piece out of his way to attack the government when he had to do it in that roundabout fashion over the head of the present Minister of Labour in reference to a matter that related to the maritime provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: No, in it he referred to the other provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I know. And may I say this to my right hon. friend, that the Duncan commission, as he will recall, had to deal, among other things, with problems that affected the relations between the dominion and the provinces through a commission having primarily to do with the maritime provinces. If evidence were needed as to the service that a commission can render in just those very matters, nothing better could be cited than the work of the Duncan commission itself, because it helped in very large part to meet some of the conditions with which it was faced.

My right hon. friend appointed a commission himself. He appointed a good many; but the one I have in mind in particular is the commission that inquired into railways and transportation. At the head of that commission he placed the chief justice of Canada, and on the commission he appointed a number of other gentlemen who were known to have very definite and fixed ideas with regard to certain phases of transportation. When he appointed the members of that commission, was he doing so in the belief that they would not act in a wholly honourable manner in discharging their duties, and give to the country the best of their intelligence by way of a careful and just analysis of all the evidence that was put before them? Unless he is prepared to say as much in regard to the commissions which he himself appointed he should not begin to criticize other people from motives which they find it difficult to understand.

Mr. BENNETT: My right hon. friend is wrong. I was not criticizing motives; I was simply saying the method was wholly inapplicable to a constitution; that is all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think we shall agree to disagree, but may I say this last word in regard to the value of the evidence that may be given before the Dominion-Provincial commission. I do not recollect any too well much of my early classical training, but there is one sentence in Cicero which has left a lasting impression upon my mind. It is: "Magna vis veritatis qua facile se per se ipsa defendit." As my latin may not be too easily understood, may I give the translation. It is: "Great is the power of truth which of itself so easily defends itself." That is the way in which the work of this commission will be judged, as will the work of every other commission. We will judge what is best in any situation from the truth itself. The truth will be easily defended because of itself it defends itself, once the facts are adequate and clear.

Mr. BENNETT: And my right hon. friend will remember, "What is truth"?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a question which has not yet been answered.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But we are getting nearer the answer every day.

My right hon. friend's attention was next directed to the course the government is taking with respect to seeking to have a national system of unemployment insurance enacted by parliament as speedily as possible. I was amazed to hear his observations on the subject. He said, "How do you ever expect to amend the constitution? How do you expect to pass an unemployment insurance measure? Are you going to take the word of the premiers of the provinces? Are you going to listen to provincial governments? Are you going to take the approval of legislative assemblies of the provinces, or will you take the word of the electors?" He sought to leave the impression that all of these were necessary before a measure of unemployment insurance could be brought into parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was the inference left.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, that is not what was said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I find it difficult to tell what my right hon. friend does say, but I do point out—and I do not think he will deny it—that it was he who, only a year or two ago, introduced a national unemployment insurance bill into this house. He drove it through the house, without asking the premier of a single province what he thought of it. He never asked the members of provincial governments in any of the provinces what they thought of it. He never thought of referring a copy of it to the legislative assembly of any of the provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He never thought of giving the electorate in any of the provinces a chance to say a word about it, nor was he willing to permit the electorate of Canada to say anything about it. He was determined to jam it through the House of Commons, at no matter what cost—and he did that very thing.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely my right hon. friend knows better than that. He is putting into my mouth words which I did not use. What I did was to introduce and carry through the house a certain measure, on the assumption that the house had sole jurisdiction to act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend, who usually stands behind the courts—and I believe he is right in so doing—would not allow the courts even to look at his measure. He knew that there was a statute which provided that the supreme court might be asked to express an opinion upon matters of that kind.

To-night my right hon. friend has had a great deal to say about the extent to which the provinces have been arraying themselves against the central government. I will tell him where the responsibility for that lies. I tell him that it began during the time he was in office, and because of the methods he adopted while in office. He was the man who in office tried to take the management of public affairs from the control of parliament, and to handle them himself. He was the one who, in the first instance, instituted quasi dictatorship in the conduct of public affairs in Canada. It was he who brought down and put on the statute books the so-called social reform legislation to which I have referred, although he knew, and was told over and over again by the opposition of the day, that he was attempting to deal with something which came within provincial jurisdiction, and that the provinces would so regard it. Notwithstanding that fact, and notwithstanding the position which had always been taken by parliament, he insisted upon putting through the new deal concocted between himself and the then minister to Washington, and did so in large part much against the will and wish of his own party. He insisted on jamming these measures through parliament. That is what antagonized the provinces.

That is what has given rise to a suspicion in the provinces that, so far as Ottawa is concerned, there is a desire to get everything into our own hands. Instead of attempting to do things in that way, the present administration has sought to go about the matter in the only way in which it can be speedily and satisfactorily solved, namely to communicate with the provinces themselves, with the constituted authorities in each province, hoping that they may see the reasonableness of the position taken by the government, and extend their cooperation so as to enable the necessary amendment to be made to the British North America Act. That cooperation would facilitate the early introduction of the legislation. If it cannot be brought in as a result of cooperative effort between the provinces and the dominion, I fail to see how else it can be done. That is the one and only method, and if that method had been taken at the start by my right hon. friend, instead of his adopting arbitrary action the results might have been different at the end of his term of office.

As leader of the opposition, at the beginning of the parliament over which my right hon. friend presided, I urged him to do that very thing. Had he sought an amendment to the British North America Act at that time, some seven years ago, and had an unemployment insurance measure been then introduced, we might have had such a law on the statute books five years ago. If there has been delay, such delay is due, first of all, to the years of inaction of my right hon. friend the present leader of the opposition, and, second, to the wrongful methods he adopted in seeking when in office to bring such legislation into being.

I now pass on to the next subject mentioned, namely the elections and franchise acts, and the export of power. Here may I say at once that I believe my right hon. friend went out of his way to do something he was not in the least called upon to do. He said he proposed to join these two subjects in what he had to say, and then proceeded to talk about political corruption in Canada. His statement was that he wanted to end that corruption. Well, for five years he had the elections and franchise acts under his control. Furthermore, he put through legislation with respect alike to the franchise and elections. Why did he not at that time put into the legislation those provisions so necessary to prevent corruption, if it was possible to do anything more than was done?

Mr. BENNETT: It is there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend comes along today and speaks as though there were some sinister connection between the desire of the government to amend the franchise and elections acts and the other subject he has mentioned. He knows very well that there is no connection whatsoever between the two subjects. He knows, further, that so far as the franchise act is concerned this House of Commons was committed at the last session of parliament to bring in legislation in accordance with certain recommendations of a committee, and in the light of what it thought was needed properly to amend the act. We are now fulfilling a promise made at the previous session.

My right hon. friend would have the country believe that this has something to do with the export of power, a subject which was not even thought of at the time the government was dealing with the franchise measure. He makes the observation that while out in British Columbia at the time of the recent by-election he heard a clergyman say, or that someone else had heard a clergyman say that he had been paid by the Liberal party to talk over the radio. Well, now we are talking about things we have heard, may I say to the right hon. gentleman that I heard from a number of sources that the Tory party thought they had a good chance to win the seat, until the right hon. gentleman came along and made a speech in which he introduced the trade issue. He said, "This is the issue, and you must decide the by-election upon it." After he had been heard, his supporters threw up their hands and said, "The thing is lost; the other party will carry the day." And that was exactly what happened. I do not know who paid my right hon. friend to go out there to make the speech, but I do know he went all the way from Halifax to Victoria and, by himself, succeeded in losing the seat for his party. There is just as much justification to talk about political corruption in the payment of preachers by the Liberal party in the Victoria by-election as there is justification in talking corruption as respects what my right hon. friend said when he himself tried to preach to the electorate in Victoria.

I do not think that we should copy the Tory party with respect to the management of elections and payment to party funds. My right hon. friend knows that there is no one in this parliament more ready to join him or any other hon. member in seeking to bring about such reform as will make political corruption as impossible as it can be made than myself. I shall welcome and the government will welcome anything that can be done to make it impossible for any man or any party to gain political advantage in that way.

When my right hon. friend talks about the effect of promises and their influence on political campaigns, even in connection with by-elections, he must realize that it takes a long time to untrain the minds of the people with respect to the practice of making promises. I have in my hand Hansard of 1930. I well remember that just after my right hon. friend came into power it took me a couple of hours to read the promises which he had made from coast to coast during the elections then just concluded. He referred to something being said about a station in Montreal and to one or two other things. I should like to quote from an article which my right hon. friend wrote, signed and had published in MacLean's magazine in 1930 under the heading, "The Election Issues as I See Them." Speaking of stations, here is what he had to say about transportation, one of the many subjects he dealt with in that article:

> We pledge ourselves to the improvement of the whole scheme of Canadian transportation northward by the completion of the Hudson Bay route, and the construction of such branches as may be necessary to render it most readily available to every part of Canada; to the Pacific slope by a Peace river outlet, and east and west by the development of the St. Lawrence waterways, and we pledge ourselves to aid existing traffic channels and to increase port facilities on the Great Lakes, Hudson Bay and the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and to the establishment of a national highway system.

That was only one pledge out of 300 or more of the same order. They were not made in one by-election campaign; they were made in a general election in every constituency in Canada. My right hon. friend had better go back to Sunday school for a while before he begins to lecture this House of Commons on election promises.

Mr. BENNETT: Every one of those was carried out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Those who make promises sometimes find it difficult to carry them out. I do not believe in making promises myself. I agree with my right hon. friend when he says that we should discourage that sort of thing as much as possible, but I say that he is the last one who should try to teach anyone that particular lesson.

My right hon. friend appeared to be critical of the government with regard to the position taken in connection with the export of power. Has the course we have taken been of a character to deprive parliament of control? He says that whatever is to be done must be done by an act of parliament, an act that will pass the Commons, an act that will pass the Senate and an act that will be assented to by His Excellency the Governor General. He is going to get his act and it will help in making effective the control of this parliament with respect to the export of electrical power.

May I say that I think it ill becomes him to bring into a debate on this subject in the manner he did to-night the names of any members of another house.

Mr. BENNETT: It was as officers of the Liberal association.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I wished to do so I might have pointed to my right hon. friend's deskmates who sat on either side of him in past years, and who while members of this House of Commons were treasurers and organizers of his party.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. Organizers and treasurers of his party. And referring to the Senate, what about Senator McRae?

Mr. BENNETT: He was not in the Senate; he was not appointed until after. He declined to have anything to do with the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to know since when it has become a crime, political or otherwise for an honest, honourable man to hold the position of treasurer of a political party? I should like to know since when it has been made a crime, political or otherwise, for a gentleman to give his time as president of a party association?

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what was said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was the insinuation.

Mr. BENNETT: There was no insinuation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I resent it very strongly. I say that it was unworthy of my right hon. friend to make the references he did. I believe that on reflection he will regret having done so. Every one who has had to do with politics knows that no political party can be managed without some of its members performing the duty of treasurers. The fact that a man is made treasurer of a political party is usually a mark of the confidence which his fellow men have in his integrity and honesty. My right hon. friend knows that the position of president of the National Liberal Federation, a body which commands the confidence of young and old alike from one coast to the other, is one of the highest offices of honour and trust a man can hold in this country. It is an office of trust and responsibility, and the fact that a man holds such an office should commend him highly to the favour and regard of his fellow men.

Let me return to what I was saying about the export of power. If this government were seeking to deprive parliament of its control over the export of power, then we might be challenged as to our reasons for so doing, but the action we have taken has had the effect of reserving the question for a fuller measure of control by parliament.

I shall say only a word about the export of power as the whole matter will come up in full discussion when the bill is introduced. On April 17 last, an application was received from Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated asking for a licence to export a certain quantity of electrical energy. Some of my colleagues and myself were leaving at that time for the imperial conference, and speaking on behalf of the government I stated that it would be impossible for us at that time even to consider the application. The law of the country as it stands gives to the government the right to issue licences for the export of power. The executive has to take the responsibility for granting or refusing to grant a licence, but the authority is there. We would have been taking no new authority to ourselves had we granted a licence to export power. As I have said, I took the position that it was impossible to consider the application until the entire government had had a chance to review the whole situation. I declined, on behalf of my colleagues and myself, to have anything to do with it until we had returned to Canada after the conference and it was possible to hold a meeting of the full cabinet.

An application in due form had been sent to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) by the Cedars Rapids Manufacturing Company, a subsidiary of Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated, asking for the right to export 40,000 horse power. That was the application which we had not found it possible to consider prior to going abroad.

Mr. BENNETT: Was that a public body or a private enterprise?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: For export?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, the export was to the United States. I believe it was to the Aluminum Company of America at Massena, New York.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I understand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At any rate the matter was very carefully considered by my colleagues and myself. On August 14 I replied to a communication which had come formally from Mr. Norris, president of Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated, asking if the application could not be granted. The letter dated Prime Minister's office, Canada, August 14, is as follows:

Dear Mr. Norris:

I wish to acknowledge your letter of August the 10th, just received, with reference to the application of the Cedars Rapids Manufacturing and Power Company, a subsidiary of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, for a licence to export 40,000 horsepower to the United States for sole use by the Aluminum Company of America at Massena, New York.

The representations in your letter have received the most careful consideration of my colleagues and myself. I regret, however, that the government is not in a position to grant the licence, at the present time. In view of the broad question of policy involved and the fact that the export of power to the United States has been debated at length in parliament on several occasions, the government is of opinion that an opportunity should be afforded at the approaching session for a discussion on the subject, before any final action is taken with respect to the application of the Cedars Rapids Manufacturing and Power Company.

Yours sincerely,

W. L. Mackenzie King.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the Prime Minister would file the letter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: He can put it on Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I intend later to file all the correspondence we have had with reference to applications for export of power.

Mr. BENNETT: It would make the reply much more clear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Early in November I was waited on in my office by Mr. Powell, president of Aluminum Limited, of Montreal, in company with Mr. Geoffrion, his counsel. They asked if it would not be possible for the government to grant a licence to Aluminum Limited for the export of power. It was practically the same application as the one to which I have already referred. A few days later, a reply was sent to Mr. Powell on my behalf by Mr. Read, the acting Under-Secretary of State in language almost identical with that which I have just read. Mr. Powell and Mr. Geoffrion interviewed me on November 2. Mr. Read's reply was sent on November 12. On November 29 the Hon. Mr. Hepburn waited on myself and members of the government to ascertain whether the Dominion government would grant a licence to the Ontario Hydro Commission for the export of power. All I wish to draw attention to is this, that the government had in August, and again in November indicated in writing its position with respect to the granting of licences. On both occasions it had stated that no licence for the export of power would be given by the administration until after the matter had been fully discussed in this parliament and the question of policy further and fully considered here. When the premier of Ontario met with my colleagues and myself, and preferred his request, we read him the communication that I have just read to the house, outlined the nature of previous discussions on the subject of the export of power in this parliament, and indicated that, while we were prepared to consider the additional information that he had just then put at our disposal, we could not at that time consider granting the application in view of the government's position as previously adopted with respect to the two earlier applications, and as set forth in the communications to Mr. Norris and Mr. Powell.

Mr. BENNETT: Pardon me, what quantity was involved in the Ontario application?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have forgotten at the moment, but I believe it was 90,000 horsepower.

Mr. EULER: No, 120,000.

Mr. BENNETT: It was 90,000 to 110,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall speak on this question later and at that time give full particulars. What I wish to make perfectly clear to-night is this, that the government had determined and laid down its policy before it had any knowledge whatever that the Ontario government was contemplating applying for a licence, or of the negotiation of a settlement of its differences with some of the power companies. We made and could make no alteration in that policy when the premier of Ontario called upon us. When I told the premier that it was impossible for us to meet his wishes and gave him the reasons which I have given to the house to-night, naturally he was disappointed. My words to him were simply that, as an executive, we were the servants of parliament, not its masters. That is the position which this government is going to continue to take with respect to the export of electrical power from this country. It may be that there are circumstances and conditions which will justify one view or another with respect to what is most advisable as to the export of power. That may be discussed very fully and freely in this house. The words, however, injected by my right hon. friend into this debate which would seek to link in any way the present administration and its attitude towards the export of power with any matter which pertains to the franchise, are wholly uncalled for and wholly unworthy on his part.

The hour is late, but I wish to avoid if possible speaking in this debate again to-morrow. If the house will grant me a few minutes, I shall briefly conclude what I have to say.

Mr. BENNETT: Go on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend has spoken about the international situation. I agree with him whole-heartedly when he deplores much that has taken place in China, the way in which women and children have been treated in that country, and many other of the incidents which have marked the conflict there. I should not confine these feelings to what is happening in China. I also agree wholeheartedly with him that we cannot be too careful at this time of all times, to refrain from doing anything or saying anything which in any way can cause our neutrality to be suspected. These are dangerous times in the affairs of the world. My own feeling is that much of the unrest in our own country, many of those things that we describe as affecting the unity of Canada, are the result of a contagion of ill-will which has spread itself over the globe—inevitably, because ill-will is contagious just as good-will is contagious, and the one can only be offset by the other. It behooves us in this country of ours, blessed as we are in our geographical position, blessed as we are in our neighbours, blessed as we are in being part of the great British commonwealth of nations, to be very careful and very guarded in everything we do and say at this time.

If in some particulars it may seem to hon. members that the government is not going as far as it might go, is not doing some of the things which it might do and which many of us in our hearts would wish to do if we had the power necessary to back up our acts against all possible consequences, let them remember that there are other powers in this world as well as Canada which have great concern in the world situation, that other powers are deeply interested in all that happens in China as well as in Europe, and that if great powers like the United Kingdom, France and the United States think it wisest in the present world situation to refrain from taking some steps which might be construed in a different way than they would wish to have them construed, perhaps we ourselves are not acting unwisely, either in their interests or our own, in being equally cautious. Any one who has followed the attitude of the British government and some other governments towards the situation in Spain must have been impressed with the fact, that time and time and time again these governments have refrained from asserting themselves in an extreme way, lest their action might provoke a still graver situation. They have remained seemingly silent under grave provocation. There are times when it takes much more in the way of courage to remain silent in the face of seeming or actual insult and injustice than it does to be outspoken and to strike out from the shoulder. These are times when all the restraint that can be exercised by a country, a government or by members of parliament should be exercised. I do hope that, in the course of political discussions in this house during the present session, hon. members will think twice with regard to whatever they may have to say on foreign affairs, and ask themselves whether, in view of the attitude which great nations such as England, France and the United States have thought it wisest to adopt, we ourselves should seek to outrun them and attempt some of the things that go much farther than they are prepared to go.

With respect to the remarks attributed to the Hon. Mr. Bruce, may I say at once that no one regrets more than Mr. Bruce himself does that there should have been by him even so much as a mention of the situation in the orient. He so expressed himself to me, and in reference to the article referred to by my right hon. friend gave a statement to the press which I think ought to be put on record:

> I would not be so indiscreet as to make a statement of that kind. The statement is entirely misleading. It is a misinterpretation of my remarks, although I do not consider that it was done with any deliberate intent.

I talked over the situation with Mr. Bruce, and I believe that, in so far as he may have spoken at all in private conversation with people in different parts of the country or with others, what at most he did was to indicate in some cases what he believed was in the mind of Japan; not that he was giving his view of the situation but that he was seeking to interpret, to those who could not comprehend the situation, what from the Japanese point of view the situation was considered to be. That, I would say myself, might just as well have been left unsaid. I agree with the criticism which the leader of the opposition has made to-night as regards a member of the diplomatic service having said anything at this time with respect to a situation so critical as that between China and Japan. But I do not think that we need enlarge upon it to any extent. I do not believe that the Chinese government or the Japanese government could for a moment think that this country was seeking to take sides in the unfortunate differences which have arisen and the conflict which is in progress. I believe they understand that our decision is to be strictly neutral, to hold ourselves in a position where, if opportunity does offer, and some word of ours can help to shorten the conflict, to minimize the struggle, that word will be given in season and may prove of value.

Mr. Bruce has intimated to me that after the coming summer he would like to be relieved of his position as minister to Japan. When he accepted the position he did so with the understanding that it would be only for a year or two. He took the post to oblige the government. Sir Herbert Marler was being appointed to Washington and it was difficult to find anyone wholly qualified to take his place in Tokyo. Mr. Bruce has an understanding of conditions on the Pacific coast which very few men possess. He has a wide knowledge of affairs. Above all he has a disposition and a nature which can be relied upon not to antagonize those with whom he is brought into contact but to further cooperative effort.

Mr. Bruce has done exceedingly well in Tokyo. Reports from those who have met him, reports from our own people who have been in Japan while he has been there, make clear to me that his service to Canadians in or passing through Japan has been a very real one, and certainly the reports we receive from him have been extremely helpful to the government. It is true that his sight is greatly impaired; but there have been men whose sight has been impaired, but whose judgment has been all the keener, perhaps as a consequence. Mr. Bruce is of that type. He is accustomed to bring about him into conference each day those who are close to him in the legation, and through other eyes and the confidences imparted to him, he obtains, I believe, pretty much all that can be comprehended at the present time by any minister in regard to the situation in the orient.

May I conclude with this one word to my right hon. friend with regard to the advantages of international trade and what he said in his remarks as to the danger of international trade leading to war. As I have already said—

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What was it he said?

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman will read it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me, then, put in it this way. His advocacy to-night has been of what we may term economic nationalism.

Mr. STEWART: Not at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think so.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite the opposite.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did he not say that greater freedom of trade leads to war?

Mr. BENNETT: No, he did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think he did, and I believe a good many others in the house think he did. At any rate, a difficulty I find in my right hon. friend's argument is this. When he was speaking of the agreement made with the United States he seemed to want to take credit for the whole agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes; and in that connection he was for the moment assuming that an agreement was a good thing. He sought to point out how it had come about as the result of the work he had done before.

Mr. BENNETT: The work the government had done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, if this greater freedom of trade is a bad thing, why did his government try to do anything? I think my right hon. friend has let the cat out of the bag to-night. I do not believe he ever meant to put through an agreement with the United States, simply because he believes in economic nationalism and economic imperialism. Had he remained in office, that agreement would not exist to-day.

Does my right hon. friend recall what he said just before he came into office in 1930? Does he recall what he said as to how he would get into other markets? He was not going to take the slow way of seeking entry by agreement into foreign markets. He was going to blast his way into the markets of the world. And now he comes and tells us that this business of blasting one's way into world markets is all wrong. What we need, he now says, is not to get into the markets of the world; we need as a country, to be in a watertight compartment where we can work out our experiments; experiments to be worked out between the Conservative party and its new allies the Social Credit party in the west.

On motion of Mr. Blackmore the debate was adjourned.

It being twenty minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 1, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 7, respecting Industrial Loan and Finance Corporation.—Mr. Vien.

Bill No. 8, respecting Central Finance Corporation, and to change its name to Household Finance Corporation of Canada.—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City).

CANADA SHIPPING ACT, 1934

CONTROL OF SHIPMENT OF MUNITIONS BY SHIPS REGISTERED IN CANADA

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 9, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, 1934.

He said: This amendment to the Canada Shipping Act sets up machinery by means of which the government can control shipments in Canadian vessels of arms and war materials to belligerent countries if and when such control is deemed necessary.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROPOSED AMENDMENT RESPECTING OPERATION OF MOTOR CARS

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 10, to amend the criminal code.

He said: This bill deals with motor cars and the criminal code in relation thereto. It is not the same bill as last year's. I think that if it gets a second reading it should go to a committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

APPLICATION OF PROVISIONS OF CHINESE IMMIGRATION ACT, REVISED STATUTES, 1927 CHAPTER 95

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 11, respecting Japanese immigration.

He said: This bill is very short, containing only two sections. It proposes to place the Japanese nation on the same plane, as regards immigration into Canada, as that occupied by the Chinese during the last fifteen years. It is strictly moderate in its language, is non-provocative, makes no reference to current events in the east, and I think has the support of ninety per cent of the people of British Columbia.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NIAGARA RIVER ICE JAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): As an emergency matter I should like to ask the government a question, notice of which I have already sent to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin). It relates to the ice jam in the Niagara river. The question is: Will the government take up with the government of the United States and the governments of Ontario and New York state the question of erecting joint regulation works in this river to prevent the recurrence of the abnormal conditions which have recently arisen? The matter is an urgent one because the light and power and transportation of nearly the whole province of Ontario is threatened.

Also, has the minister any ice-breaking plants for use on lake Erie and the Niagara river from lake Erie to Chippawa and Niagara to Queenston similar to that used in the St. Lawrence river? As I say, I sent notice of this question to the minister, but I do not see him here.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The minister is absent; the acting minister is present, but I think the question is of such length that it should be examined carefully before any reply is made. Possibly my hon. friend might wait until to-morrow for a reply.

CANADIAN LOAN IN LONDON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Before the orders of the day are taken I think that in view of some of the statements made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) yesterday with reference to the recent Canadian loan in London, a statement is desirable in order that the house may be in possession of the facts in relation thereto.

My right hon. friend stated that there was "less confidence in this Canadian loan than there was in the Australian loan"—I quote from Hansard. The facts are that the last Commonwealth of Australia loan issued in London was offered on November 17, 1937. It was for the amount of £11,409,954 and for a term of sixteen years, callable in thirteen years. The coupon was not 3¼ per cent but 3½ per cent, and the loan was offered to the public at 97 to yield approximately 3·75 per cent to maturity.

Furthermore, the underwriters were left with 67 per cent of the issue on their hands, and initial quotations began at a discount of ½ per cent from the offering price.

In contrast, the Canadian government loan was a £10,000,000 3¼ per cent loan, maturing in twenty-five years, callable in twenty years. This 3¼ per cent twenty-five year loan was offered to the public at a price of 98½ to yield approximately 3·34 per cent to maturity. It will be noted that in spite of the much longer term the yield on the Canadian loan was much more favourable to the borrowing government, 3·34 per cent as compared with 3·75 per cent in the case of Australia. It will also be noted that the head of the underwriting syndicate in each case was the same banking firm, R. Nivison and Company.

The right hon. leader of the opposition referred to the fact that forty-nine per cent of the Canadian loan was left in the hands of the underwriters, and stated that "the underwriters did not get forty-nine per cent of the Australian loan." He must have been misinformed. The fact is that sixty-seven per cent of the Australian loan was left in the hands of the underwriters.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not dealing with the same loan.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps I should make some reference to certain comments which have appeared in the London financial press in connection with the basis upon which the underwriters of the Canadian loan made their allotments. Subscriptions received by the underwriters would have made it possible for them to allot a larger proportion of the issue than they actually did allot. Apparently, however, the underwriters preferred to limit maximum allotment on any one cash application to a moderate amount, believing that more effective distribution of the new issue and a more stable market would thereby be obtained. As our issue was underwritten, this matter of allotments of subscriptions was the concern of the underwriters and not of ourselves, but I think everyone will agree with the soundness of the general objective which the underwriters apparently had in mind.

I thought it desirable to place these facts on record.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): If I might be permitted, the Australian loan to which I referred was not the loan of November. I was dealing with the prior Australian loan which was at 3¼ per cent, as the minister himself knows. I very much regret that the Australian loan of November 1937 is one with which I was not familiar at all. I am very glad the minister has made it clear that the Australian loan of November 1937 was sold on less favourable terms as far as the public is concerned than our own.

But I was going to ask on the orders of the day that the minister make a statement with respect to our loan, setting out what the position was. What he has now said is what I said last evening, that the underwriters saw fit to limit the allotments so that there would not be sales that would depress the market below the three-quarters of one per cent that they received as their underwriting compensation. I think if the minister will look at the Australian figures compared with ours he will see that at the time they did issue their 3¼ per cent loan it was on more favourable terms than ours, but perhaps it is not fair to compare what took place some time ago with what took place later.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend will understand that I naturally assumed he was comparing comparable things, two issues reasonably close together. In judging of market conditions I assumed he was taking two issues at about the same time.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not aware of the other, unfortunately.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, January 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. N. Francœur for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Bennett.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): We are met, I believe, Mr. Speaker, in one of the gravest years in the history of our dominion. I think the events of the next year will abundantly prove that to be the case. Therefore I believe it is most important that all of us should work together with the greatest possible earnestness, forgetting such matters as political struggles. In the debate yesterday, although the speeches were excellent and amusing and fine displays of parliamentary oratory, there was altogether too much jockeying for political advantage. We should cease endeavouring to gain political advantage at least while we are in this very trying time.

As a case in point of this political jockeying let me mention one instance. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) chose to interpret the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) as showing that he was opposed to foreign trade, and he concluded, I judge from his remarks, that the leader of the opposition was in agreement with the social credit group in attaching small value to foreign trade. Now I assume that the Prime Minister was sincere in that remark. If he was he manifested a lack of knowledge concerning social credit, for the social credit advocates have never disparaged the value of foreign trade. All they have done is to urge upon the people that we must not look to foreign trade alone for the complete solution of our problems. Perhaps it would be instructive if I were to read one or two little quotations. I do not wish to read quotations to any extent this year, but since this matter has been raised it is of vital importance that the country should know just where the social credit people stand. First I should like to refer to Major Douglas himself, as the founder of the movement. I am quoting from his book called Economic Democracy, at page 145, where I read these words:

> It must be evident therefore that an economic system involving forced extrusion of product from the community producing, as an integral component of the machinery for the distribution of purchasing power, is entirely incompatible with any effective league of nations, because the logical and inevitable end of economic competition is war.

That was what I understood the right hon. leader of the opposition to contend, and that is our contention. Trade, of course; if we have a surplus of wheat and another country has a surplus of bananas, of course trade the surplus of wheat for the surplus of bananas. But if the people producing apples wish to trade their apples for our beef; if we already have apples and we not only refuse to accept their product but go into the world market and endeavour to displace their product with our apples, then we put them in a position which ultimately will lead to war. There can be no question regarding that.

In order that everyone may see that this belief is held by the Canadian social credit movement let me quote a statement of the Douglas Social Credit Bureau of Canada, with headquarters in Ottawa. I am not saying that this organization is identical with the one which I represent, although I see no difference between the two. I am merely quoting what is said here. This statement is issued under date of February 1, 1938, and bears exactly upon the situation under consideration:

> Under a social credit administration foreign trade would be distinctly encouraged but the transactions between countries would be balanced. There would be no need for the so-called "favourable balance of trade." Imports to Canada would be a distinct advantage, for under social credit adequate purchasing power would be distributed to enable Canadians to purchase the imports, thereby increasing the standard of living and diversifying the products available.
> Imported goods are, so far as real wealth is concerned, equivalent to goods produced by home industry and exported goods are equivalent to goods consumed.
> Under existing conditions one nation can only expand its foreign market at the expense of other nations; and as an expanding market is, under the present system, a matter of life and death for all nations, the ensuing scramble for markets inevitably culminates in war.
> Ralph L. Duclos, President.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that these extracts sufficiently clarify the position of those who believe in social credit with respect to trade, and I maintain that any attempt to misrepresent to the people of this country the meaning of the contentions of the followers of social credit is an action distinctly contrary to the interests of Canada. If we want the truth—and as the Prime Minister very well said, we do want the truth—certainly that is not the way to get it. I support both those statements, without making any statement myself with regard to trade, except that I endorse the remarks and the sentiments contained in those two excerpts.

Perhaps I may be just a little more truculent than usual because for two years in the province of Alberta we have experienced the most deliberate, the most malicious, the most unjustifiable attempt to drag all sorts and kinds of red herrings across the path. Anything and everything that could be done to deceive the people has been done. No attempt at all has been made to give them the truth. We may laugh about that, but that is the fact, and it can be verified over and over again. I am not going to bring up any unpleasant matters this afternoon, but that statement stands. If we want the truth there is a way to get it. I cannot recall the exact words used last night by the Prime Minister but, as he said, the truth will stand and it is the truth we want.

An hon. MEMBER: How about the twenty-five dollars?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is another bit of it. Isn't that a brilliant attempt to get the truth?

I was impressed with the remark of the leader of the opposition with regard to righteous elections. I believe that statement, although it was not pleasant, raised a question which the people of this dominion must settle, or, as the right hon. gentleman said, our very national existence is endangered. What do we mean by democracy? Do we not mean an appeal to the people so that the people, informed, intelligent and calm, may through their ballots express a considered opinion as to the policy which the government should follow in carrying on the affairs of the country? Is that not what we wish? All we need do is just think of what has been done in far, far too many constituencies throughout this country, in order to realize that the policy pursued by both the old line parties has been diametrically opposed to that, the object being under all conditions to deceive the people and confuse them so they do not know what it is all about.

I come from a province, Mr. Speaker, where we have grappled with this problem with great earnestness since 1921. In that year we commenced to fight our elections with the nickels and dimes of the people. The social credit victory in 1935 was won almost with the very lifeblood of the people, and since those sacrifices were made by poor, suffering men and women, in order to get a government which would represent them, we have had attempts made to override the will of the people by the most despicable forms of deception. We know what democracy is. We started this thing in 1921 and we have continued it even to the present time. Every cent that is used to fight a social credit election in Alberta comes out of the pockets of the poorest people in the province, fighting earnestly for the right to live and believing still in the principles of democracy.

The propaganda which has gone on and is going on to-day in the province of Alberta is a standing disgrace to the people of this dominion. I say that without fear of any kind of successful contradiction. We are seeing perpetrated upon the people of that province and the people of the whole dominion a monstrous iniquity. Somewhere there is a solution to our problems. Do you know where the solution is? If the answer were to be given from your own soul it would be, "No, I do not; I wish to heaven I did." How are we going to find that solution if we persist in discrediting everyone who comes forward with a new idea? Political trickery has been resorted to. I had not intended to mention the subject. However, the right hon. the leader of the opposition raised the question, and I believe I should make some observations. Out in our province there exists a government duly elected by the considered thought of the people of Alberta. Every conceivable device has been exercised to prevent that government from doing what the people put it there to do. This summer there was formed a despicable organization called the People's League, very aptly called by Premier Aberhart the people's slavery league. That is exactly what it is. In that league were participating the Liberal and Conservative leaders of the province. In it were found some leaders in the United Farmers of Alberta group, and some others. There is no gainsaying that fact; there it is.

At least partially as a result of the operations of this organization Mr. E. L. Gray was elected in Edmonton as a representative of the People's League. Then they turned to the provincial constituency of Lethbridge, and by a sufficiency of red herring dragging, and the exercise of other devices beneath my notice, they succeeded in electing another People's League candidate. Three days following his election Mr. E. L. Gray, on behalf of himself and the Liberal party, withdrew from the combination. He was completely disgusted with its behaviour. However they had succeeded in electing two men, and the elections were noised across the country as evidence that the Aberhart administration was losing the confidence of the people of Alberta.

I ask any fair minded man or woman in the house, and I realize that all hon. members could be so classed, if he or she regards that as decent procedure in Canada. Is it in accordance with what you consider sound behaviour on the part of men who pose as the leaders? That is all I ask; you need not answer it, but just think it over.

May I now proceed to mention some misrepresentation which took place last night. I shall not say it was deliberate; I am almost certain it was unconscious. However there was at least the intimation, or something which gave me the impression, whether the Prime Minister meant it that way or not, that he attributed the unrest in Canada, in which five of our majestic provinces have participated, to ill will which exists in other parts of the world. He has suggested that that ill will has come into our country and that we have become contaminated with it. Well, that may be a good political move, but in my judgment it is as far from the truth as it could possibly be. I shall not say it was a deliberate misrepresentation, but I must say that it manifested a great lack of consideration.

Before dealing with this matter at greater length may I refer for a few moments to the kind words used by the leader of the opposition in advocating some of the avowed principles which we hold dear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No doubt there may be a good deal of merriment in that connection. There was a time, however, when the principle of the abolition of slavery in the English speaking world was laughed at. They laughed at that time, just as hon. members across the chamber have laughed today. Because there were men and women who stood out sternly and self-sacrificingly through the years in the defence of those principles, they finally prevailed. The same is true with respect to the secret ballot, and in connection with many principles which today we value and prize, and which make our democratic institutions both beautiful and hopeful. So it is with the principles I put before the house. The day will come when all will recognize that, absurd as they may seem today, those principles are sound.

I know not why the right hon. the leader of the opposition made the statements to which I have referred, but no matter why he made them I wish to thank him for them. If he has come to see the light, it is greatly to his credit. I wish to give credit where credit is due.

Before commencing a discussion of the causes of the strains and stresses which are so painfully manifested in the dominion I should like briefly to deal with the question of recovery. Speaking generally I find it beyond my power to comprehend why men as intelligent, thoughtful and well informed as hon. members sitting opposite can be satisfied with such specious reasoning regarding recovery. I was positively amazed to hear some of the observations made yesterday, and especially when one can find from any informed source a complete confutation of every statement that was made.

For example, there is not one of the South American republics which has not had as satisfactory recovery as has Canada, and during the very years in which the Liberal administration has held office in this country. The little country of Chile, which was looked upon as the most hopeless spot in a hopeless world, after the crisis of 1931, has had a phenomenal recovery. Was that because the Liberal party were in power in Canada? Let us be at least careful. Let us spend our time at something profitable. Let us face realities.

According to the best authorities the reason for recovery was the very rapid increase in rearmament. Around fifteen billions of dollars is being poured out to-day by the various nations of the world, and the demands for raw materials which can be turned into war machinery are tremendous. Those demands have melted or, shall we say, unfrozen the great masses of goods which were waiting for buyers. As a result of that change the countries have felt free to lower their tariff restrictions and to begin to trade. There can be no successful contradiction of that statement. I could quote authorities which could not be disregarded by any person who has any interest in his reputation for accuracy. I could quote authorities in our own country. We could turn to the report of the 106th annual meeting of the Bank of Nova Scotia held recently, which was published in the Ottawa Citizen of January 28. There it is stated clearly that the recovery was due to rearmament, and that it is general throughout the world.

How in the world can men arrogate to themselves or to their party complete credit for the achievement of something which is world wide. In the same report there is the statement that to a great degree economic conditions in Canada are dependent upon those in the United States. Witness recently the depression in Canada, and the recession which began in the United States on August 15. To say that one political party in Canada has solved an economic problem, and caused recovery, is reckless and beyond excusability.

Then, there is a further difficulty which has to be considered. I value optimism. We could not live without it; but let us be careful of our optimism. Around us to-day there are signs of recession. According to the figures which I have, already in the United States thirty billion dollars worth of wealth has been swept away. In Great Britain we find that between November 15 and December 15, 1937, unemployment was increased by 166,204. Notwithstanding that their armament preparation race is at its height and their re-housing program is under way, there were 90,000 more unemployed in December 1937 than there were in December 1936. There is a reason for this increase in the number of unemployed; let us try to find it. Some may say that the occurrence was seasonal, but such is not the fact. In 1936, from November 15 to December 15, there was an increase of 30,000 in the number employed, but for the same period in this year we find a decrease of 166,204. Any one who desires to be at all judicious must bear these facts in mind before he rushes to make any reckless conclusion. Evidence of this statement may be found in the Christian Science Monitor of January 22, at page 9.

What was the cause of the recession in the United States? I am not going to take the time to discuss the matter at any length, but I should like to direct the attention of such hon. members as may not have noticed it to the October, 1937, letter of the Royal Bank of Canada. There they will find a well-developed analysis of the situation by a careful thinker. He shows that whereas in 1936 the President of the United States put that country into debt to the extent of $4,500,000,000, scattering the money around generously through the WPA and CCC programs, yet increasing the purchasing power of the people, in 1937 he changed his policy considerably. In that year he went into debt to the extent of only $1,500,000,000, and the result was the beginning of a depression the end of which no one can see. Does that not show that the secret of recovery or of avoiding depression is the spending of money? About half way down in the second column of his letter this gentleman sets forth this principle. I shall just quote a few words out of their context, but the meaning is as I have given it. He states:

> It would seem that the government will be compelled to increase its spending or, as an alternative, to permit a decline in national income.

Where will the government get the money to spend? If it must borrow that money, then it will be creating a disaster because the debt is already beyond the power of the people to pay under the present economic system. How can the United States ward off a fall in the national income in the midst of the greatest era of prosperity this world has ever seen? That is the problem we are facing, but I am going to leave it at that.

There is another matter which I think should be considered carefully. Last year I supported the government in its move to rearm for Canada's defence. I am confident that that was a wise move and I think the evidence is that we were sound in our judgment. I did not take the occasion to point out at that time to the house that I am unalterably opposed to war. I did not point out that I believed that some time we are going to have the fulfilment of that great scriptural passage wherein the prophet says:

> —and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruninghooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.

If the time has not come when we can do that, when do hon. members of this house think it will come? How can we do it, is the question. I maintain that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was on sound ground when he said that our trade policy is provoking war. I urge hon. members not to become disgusted with that statement before they hear the reason why it is made. It will be noticed that we are exporting a great deal of war material. I do not intend to argue the soundness or unsoundness of that policy, but I do want to say that the people in my part of the country are very averse to that sort of thing. I cannot, without the greatest revulsion and horror, think of sending lead to Japan in order to make bullets with which my sons may be killed. Even the most callously inured to these things must be incensed at that sort of thing. To name only a few of the most vital materials used in the preparation for war, let me direct attention to the fact that we are exporting aluminum, copper, lead, nickel and zinc. Our exports to Japan in 1936 and 1937 of these materials were as follows:

Aluminum	$1,494,039	$3,458,321
Copper	56,710	714,720
Lead	3,140,296	4,297,536
Nickel	1,223,677	4,053,712
Zinc	1,099,737	1,169,799

When I consider that every dollar's worth of that material is helping the Japanese to destroy the Chinese I fail to be warmed with any enthusiasm when contemplating that increase in our trade.

Here is another thing which I believe hon. members will find interesting. I intend to spend most of my time in discussing this matter because, after all, it is dear to my heart. I am not a pacifist in the sense that I want peace at any price. I realize that we must have some defence, but I realize also that there are fundamental causes of war which people of our intelligence should be able to discover. An effort should be made to remove these causes but we probably do not realize what they are.

Let us consider why Japan is attacking China. The information I have is up to date as far as I have been able to find out. The area of Japan is 150,000 square miles and her population totals 70,000,000 people. She has 2,900 people per square mile of area. Hon. members of this house need only think of what it would mean to have 2,900 people for every square mile of their constituencies. Then take Great Britain, with a population of 2,200 to every square mile; or China, with 1,300 people to every square mile.

Mr. BENNETT: Or Belgium.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have mentioned only three. The figures I have quoted give us a picture of the conditions Japan is struggling against, and I am going to ask hon. members now, frankly: Can you see how in the world international trade is going to help Japan—the kind of international trade that we are getting? Just let us see.

The resources of Japan comprise the following, and all this has a bearing on the question: Japan has small coal deposits; considerable iron ore, of a poor quality; some copper, and some water power, about one-fifth of the amount Canada has. She cannot send her people abroad, so that emigration is no solution for her difficulties. What is her solution? Manifestly, she must import raw materials, manufacture them and sell the finished products in the markets of the world. We know—we have the figures brought to our attention—at what ridiculous prices Japan has been able to sell her products abroad. For example, she can sell at as low as $6, a bicycle that we would sell here for $50, and she is doing that in an attempt to get into world markets. We have raised tariff barriers against her. "Very well," the free traders will say, "that is where our trade will come in." Yes, but wait a moment. When these Japanese bicycles come to our shores, it is found that we are already manufacturing bicycles, and instead of lowering our tariffs to admit bicycles we raise our tariffs to keep them out. The result is that Japanese have turned from us in desperation, and that has gone to the point where it has maddened the people of Japan.

Here are figures which I have found astonishing, of Japanese imports and exports, showing that her balance of trade has been getting rapidly worse since 1931. Taking 100 as a basis for 1931—these figures will show her difficulty in maintaining a balance of trade in her favour—the index figure stood at 89 in 1932, 83 in 1933, 73 in 1934, 71 in 1935, and 68 in 1936. It was time Japan did something, was it not?

I am going to ask frankly, what were we doing to help Japan? In the light of what I have quoted from Major Douglas, and the Ottawa Social Credit Bureau, I ask what were we doing to help Japan? If we were not consciously courting war, we were certainly doing it unconsciously. The figures I have quoted mean that in 1936 Japan had to give for the same quantity of imports, 47 per cent more, in quantity of exports, than she gave in 1931. Now we see why the right hon. leader of the opposition says that our cut-throat competition will cause war.

My time is rapidly expiring, but before I sit down there is one extremely important point upon which I wish to touch, and that is the causes of the strains and stresses. I shall not have time to develop this subject at any length today, but in future discussions I am going to rise and lay before you, my fellow-Canadians, as an advocate from the province of Alberta coming here to plead in the interests of justice before the high court of parliament, the reasons why we are forced to make these strains and stresses that we are making—and they have nothing to do with ill will against any other country, I can tell you that.

In the first place, this government has not removed poverty. I am not saying that under the existing financial structure they could do any better than they are doing. In fact, I am pleased with the progress this government has made under the existing financial structure. But I say that your financial structure is wrong, fundamentally wrong, and you will never solve your problems until you change that financial structure, whether you think so or not.

The possibilities which we have at the present time make it a disgrace to us to consider the continued existence of poverty in our midst. Take the Brookings Institution discoveries. It has found that in the peak of the boom in the United States, the people of that country were able to buy only eighty per cent of the productive capacity of the United States. Now, will any member of this house, who thinks he knows, tell us why that was? Without any addition to their industrial equipment or any addition to their labour, they would have been able to increase their production thirty per cent. Will anybody who thinks he knows tell us why they did not do it? You only need to become aware of these things and the very blood in your veins begins to boil.

A similar condition existed in Canada. There is no question about the facts which I have given from this report. Our wage level is a disgrace considering our opportunities. In 1935, according to Mr. Horace L. Seymour, B.A., B.Sc., writing in the Canadian Unionist for November, 1937, sixty per cent of the Ontario workers receive less than $900 a year. Keep that figure of $900 in mind until we get some more facts and see how it makes you feel about the way your province and your dominion is being managed. The United States government, on July 11, 1937, issued to the press a report in which it was set forth that a family of four in the United States required $30 per week, if they were to live decently. Now living conditions in the United States are easier than they are here.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has exhausted his right to speak.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Just one more remark, Mr. Speaker, if the house will permit me.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The United States government made the statement that in order to live decently at all a family required $1,250 a year. All you need to do is to think of the contemptible pittance you are giving your unemployed; think of the disgracefully low income which your people are receiving for their work; think of the starvation income upon which your farming population has to live; and then you will see what I contend without any fear of successful contradiction, that your standard of living is far lower than it needs to be.

I am going to say only one thing more in closing. I am leaving out a great deal that I had intended to say, which I shall have to leave for another occasion. Here is a man you may not agree with. Here is Professor R. F. Irvine, M.A., for twenty-five years professor of economics at Sydney university, Australia, an orthodox professor of economics, and he solemnly uses these words in 1933:

> I believe that the principles put forward by C. H. Douglas are not only sound, but that they provide the only practical way of escape from the tragic fate which otherwise awaits the whole of western civilization.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I heartily concur in the protest of the last speaker (Mr. Blackmore) against the shipment of materials of war from Canada to Japan, and we shall take an early opportunity of bringing this matter before the house.

I shall not attempt to follow the arguments advanced in the Prime Minister's lengthy speech; I am afraid it would take more than my forty minutes to correct some of the implications of his statements. He assumes that revenue is an index of prosperity; I suggest it may be only an indication of oppressive taxation. He assumes that the total production or national income means the general welfare; it may mean simply the opportunity for the wealthier to become still more wealthy. He assumes that the total volume of trade is an indication of national greatness; it may simply show how thoroughly we are being exploited.

I agree heartily with the wording of the amendment as proposed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I should like to congratulate the Conservatives on their seeming conversion; possibly our efforts throughout the years have not been altogether wasted.

The speech itself seems to run true to form—Liberal form. There is very little constructive legislation adumbrated. We are told that there is to be sought an amendment to the British North America Act to enable the dominion government to enact a national scheme of unemployment insurance. But why should we not ask for an amendment that would give us the right to amend our own constitution in any way we may please; or better still, why not assert that we have such a right? Where are all the fine phrases of the imperial conference of 1926? You will recall this language in reference to the self-governing communities:

> They are autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

After all that, we are going, cap in hand, asking that we may be allowed the right to amend our constitution in one particular. I hope that some day in Canada we shall acquire a little bit of dignity. I wish the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) could have given a lead in that direction.

I was almost hoping that we might have had in the speech some reference to safeguarding the civil rights of our people. Very shortly before the close of the last session I brought to the attention of the government the serious curtailment of our civil liberties through the so-called "padlock law" of Quebec. I may say that our worst apprehensions have been realized; for between November 9, 1937, when the law was enacted, and January 27, 1938, the act has been applied some fifty times. Let me show what that means in the individual home.

A few days ago I had a personal letter from a friend of mine whom I had known many years ago in the west when she was engaged in social service activities. She wrote telling me that her home had been raided by the provincial police. I quote a paragraph:

> They didn't get any of the works of Marx or Lenin but they took your biography and a number of social research pamphlets. They also took a book on Spinoza written by a young Columbia professor whom I know, with his autograph in it, so I'm afraid Mr. Duplessis and his friends are not up on the fine points of the Labour movement. Among other subversive literature they took a copy of the magazine "Time" which happened to have Leon Trotsky's picture on the back of it and another dangerous bit they got was a copy of "Current History." I was able to rescue a book on the South Seas by Robert Louis Stevenson and also a novel by Dostoyefsky.
> They found a book of German Fairy Tales and were quite surprised that we could read Yiddish.

Apparently the provincial police had confused German and Yiddish. This is simply typical of the class of literature that has been seized in recent months in the homes of Canadian people in the province of Quebec. I have here a list which I will not take time to read. I ask, have we no right to expect that the government of Canada will protect its citizens? I called attention on March 30 to this situation. Let me read a summary of my position. I said:

> I would ask in closing: What might we expect from the Minister of Justice in a Liberal cabinet? First of all, I think a declaration that the Quebec act is ultra vires and as illegal as a sit-down strike. In the one instance the minister undertook to interpret the law; why should he not do so in this much more important case?
> Second, we might expect a statement that there are legitimate means of protecting Quebec against lawlessness and violence. We have that, as I think he will tell us, in the criminal code. . . .
> Third, there should be the emphatic assurance that the resources of the dominion will be used to protect the rights and liberties of all Canadian citizens—even in Quebec. . . .
> Fourth, I suggest that the minister should assure us that there will be a reference to the supreme court in order that we may know what rights we have. I point out once more that such action was taken by the government in respect to certain social security measures. Surely similar action might be taken in the present instance.

What had the minister to say in reply? He pleaded that the bill had not come formally before him. Surely he cannot any longer make that plea. Secondly, as regards disallowance as a possible course of action, he said:

> For many years the power of disallowance has not been resorted to by the government of Canada. . . .
> I would not say the same condition would apply to provincial legislation, but it has often been stated by the courts that within the sphere of their own jurisdiction the provincial legislatures are sovereign. I do not think that in a federation such as this the power of disallowance could easily be exercised by the central government. I believe the provincial legislatures feel that they are still supreme and sovereign within the sphere of their jurisdiction.

Since that time the power of disallowance has been exercised by the dominion in the case of Alberta. If it can be done with respect to Alberta when it concerns financial measures, why not with respect to Quebec when the matter concerns the liberties of the citizen? The minister goes on to say:

The hon. member suggests that there should be a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. As I have said, I was surprised to hear him make that statement, because he criticized the government for having referred to the Supreme Court of Canada acts of our own parliament; now he wants us to take an act of the legislature of Quebec and refer it to the supreme court. All I can say with regard to his suggestion—and the hon. member certainly does not expect me to say more—is that it will receive the most serious consideration.

Well, there have been some eight or nine months for consideration, so I should like the Minister of Justice to take an early opportunity of informing the house what action the government propose to take to safeguard the interests of our citizens in the province of Quebec.

With regard to the economic situation, the speech from the throne says:

It is gratifying to note that, during the past year, there has been a further substantial advance in Canada's economic recovery.

I suggest that that sounds very much like the echo of a bank president's annual address. The yardstick used is the same, that is, increased resources and expanding trade. I should like to suggest that prosperity in Canada is very spotty indeed. There are many of our communities that have not experienced the slightest return of prosperity. It is unfortunately my duty to present the darker side of the picture. The position of my own constituents, which is that of vast numbers of people throughout the country, shows that there is anything but prosperity at the present moment. Take the case of my own city of Winnipeg. We in the west have recently had to prepare some statistics in regard to this matter, so fortunately the facts are available. I quote from the submission of the city of Winnipeg to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations:

Up to the end of 1936, property abandoned by the former owners and reverted to the city through tax sale procedure was valued at $7,500,000, and represents over 33 per cent of the area of the city. In addition properties valued at $6,400,000 have been sold for tax arrears, but have not yet come into the city's hands.

Or again:

Many properties in good condition have been demolished by the owners in order to escape taxation. These include residences of the class which may be termed the mansion type, amongst which were the former homes of such well known citizens as Sir Augustus Nanton, Sir William Whyte, Sir Daniel McMillan, the Honourable Robert Rogers, and so on. A number of other houses of the same type have been abandoned by the owners and are now owned by the city. In addition many business properties have been torn down including the former Hudson's Bay departmental store on Main street, occupying half a city block. It is also significant that title through tax sale proceedings has or can be taken to many valuable business properties situated in the very heart of the city, including Robinson's department store, almost at the corner of Main street and Portage avenue, the Forum block, the Walker theatre, the Playhouse theatre, and many warehouse and other properties. Each of these properties have been at one time valued at over $100,000 at least, and some of them at very much more.

Or again:

Salaries and wages of all employees, including teachers, have been reduced on the average by about 15 per cent.

Or again:

Many essential services, including street maintenance, the provision of adequate fire protection equipment, etc., have had to be neglected. The amount expended in 1936 for those services fell short of normal requirements by at least $300,000.

Or again:

The Bank of Canada report finds that there is not now available, for either the city or the province, new sources of revenue through taxation.

And again:

The Bank of Canada in its report on the finances of the province made early this year states that Winnipeg on account of being the chief urban centre of the west has been called on to bear a disproportionate share of the relief burden. The report goes on to say that eighty-four per cent of all direct relief expenditures in the province have had to be made in Winnipeg and suburbs. An analysis of Winnipeg relief cases made some months ago showed that of 6,837 families on relief 959, or fourteen per cent, had come to reside in Winnipeg since 1930.

And again:

The city has thus not only exhausted all sources of revenue, but has also reached the limit of its capacity to borrow for relief purposes, and unless aid is immediately forthcoming from the dominion or provincial governments, a major crisis will be inevitable at the end of the year.

These are serious statements, coming from the city of Winnipeg itself. As hon. members know, western cities do not like to advertise their poverty. Alderman E. D. Honeyman a few weeks ago—someone prompts me that he is a Liberal, but I was speaking of him in his capacity as alderman—speaking in committee of the whole of the legislature of Manitoba, stated that there were 5,000 families on relief, that eighty-five per cent of the cases were willing to work. I was not so greatly moved yesterday when I heard the Prime Minister speaking of all the schemes the government has set up to help the unemployed. Of course these schemes are doing something, and I welcome them as far as they go, but they do not begin to touch the fringe of the unemployment problem in this country. I repeat that in my own city there are 5,000 families on relief, and I may say that 1,000 of these are recent arrivals in the city, many of them from farming districts. And eighty-five per cent of the cases were willing to work. I should like the Minister of Labour to take an early opportunity of explaining a situation of that kind, and bringing forward some adequate provision to meet the immediate needs of the unemployed. It is not sufficient to say that there are fewer unemployed now than there were a year ago; that does not help those who are to-day in the bread lines.

Again let me give a few facts with regard to the rural part of my own province. I fancy that people in the east have not yet realized the condition of the rural west. I quote again from statistics given in Manitoba's case as presented to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. For the year ended June 30, 1937, it was estimated that there were 868 school teachers in Manitoba in receipt of a salary under $500 per year. These represent twenty per cent of the total teaching force of the province and forty-two per cent of the rural teaching staff. School inspectors report rapid deterioration in school buildings owing to inability to finance repairs. They also report deficient equipment in a large number of schools. At the present time, mainly for financial reasons, 237 school districts are being administered by official trustees, and these districts have been operated on the average only 100 days yearly. In dealing with the municipal financial situation it was submitted that land, the main source of municipal taxation, could not bear any further burden of taxation.

The effect of this condition on individuals is indicated in another section of the same report. Surely matters of this kind are of as much importance as the fact that we are assuming a high position among the nations in the total volume of our trade. What are the social effects of the present situation throughout the province of Manitoba with respect to individuals?

(1) Incomes have declined to a point below the average for Canada; and net profits from private enterprise in agriculture, except in the last two years, have in many cases disappeared;

(2) For large numbers of our citizens, private indebtedness has been found too heavy to be borne, necessitating the continuance of debt adjustment laws by the provincial government and of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act by the dominion;

(3) For many taxpayers arrears of taxes are beyond their capacity to pay;

(4) Production of agricultural products by farmers has been maintained largely by drawing upon capital reserves, by permitting heavy depreciation in equipment, by dispensing with all but a minimum of hired labour, by a large degree of dependence upon family labour, and by a distinct lowering of living standards;

(5) To many individuals opportunity for employment has disappeared; a long repetition of disappointments has brought discouragement, loss of hope of improvement in economic conditions and the acceptance by some of radical views which find expression in various forms of political protest, in the hope that a change might bring about better conditions.

Again let me remind hon. members that these are by no means irresponsible statements. I think they may be taken to represent the facts of the situation.

At this time I shall not go into the proposals that the government of my province make with regard to the provincial debt and interest burden or with regard to the allocation of responsibilities as between the dominion and the provincial governments. I pass on for a moment to the question of unemployment, and in view of the facts that I have related with regard to my own city and province, which might be supplemented by the facts with regard to unemployment in other provinces, I ask what effective action is being taken by this government that has been in office now for two or three years. The other day I came across a pamphlet entitled The Voice of the People, a reprint of the statements issued to the press by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King on the night of the general election, October 14, 1935, and issued by the National Liberal Federation of Canada, 114 Wellington street, Ottawa. I quote:

To-day's election discloses that the people share the view which the Liberal party has all along maintained, that unemployment is Canada's most urgent national problem.

It was the pledge to deal with unemployment, according to the Prime Minister's own statement, that elected the Liberals to office. A few weeks ago we had the interim report of the national employment commission, which recommended that the primary responsibility for the relief of distress should remain with the municipal authority and/or the province. So here, after two years, it is a case of "as you were." Back again goes the responsibility upon the provinces and municipalities which, as far as the west is concerned, are absolutely unable to carry those burdens. Forgotten seems to be the "work and wages" program. Even relief is now considered as primarily a municipal or provincial program. Of course it may be said that this is simply the report of a commission and that it need not necessarily be the policy of the government. I hope that may prove to be true, but I very much fear that a report by a commission along this line will be considered to have absolved the government from directly undertaking the burden of unemployment and relief.

The problem is still acute. I shall not take time to read the figures, but I would point out that according to the interim report of the national commission, relief for unemployment can come only through measures that involve dominion government action. I give several points mentioned in the report:

> In fact, the stage was in considerable measure already set for recovery since stocks of consumers' goods and raw materials had fallen to normal, or were well on the way to becoming normal;
> Community savings had again accumulated and capital was beginning to press for investment;
>
> Banking policy had resulted in low interest rates;
>
> Abandonment of the gold standard had put the Canadian dollar on a more or less comparable basis with that of its competitors in the production of goods for export;
> An increase in the price of gold and the discovery of new gold mining areas was proving a stimulus almost equivalent to that provided by an entirely new industry;
> An accumulation of obsolescence in plant and equipment was becoming increasingly evident.

May I point out, Mr. Speaker. that these are factors that do not come under the control of the provincial governments. They come under the control of the federal government. I am not now saying that the Liberal government is wholly to blame for this situation; not at all. I think the former government was very much to blame, especially in the case of the gold standard, but I do say that the recognition that these are factors that enter into the unemployment situation is clear evidence that the dominion government cannot escape responsibility with regard to the question of unemployment.

There is a very interesting passage that occurs in another section of Manitoba's case, in which reference is made to the effect of federal monetary policy on western Canadian economy:

> To the seller of goods abroad, however, there are two factors that determine the price the seller receives for his production. These two factors are: first, the price of goods in the foreign import country, and, second, the rate of exchange. The rate of exchange is equally important in determining how much that price yields him in his own country.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

In a preceding section I find this passage:

> —the annual income to the grain growers of Manitoba upon their grain exports was $6,000,000 less than if the Canadian dollar had been kept in line with the Australian pound.

I submit that keeping the Canadian dollar in line with the Australian pound is not a matter than can be affected by any action the province might take. It is a dominion affair, and the effect of a wrong policy on the part of the dominion government has tended to worsen conditions in the west. Hence I think the dominion government is clearly responsible.

Let me make one other reference from Manitoba's case, and that is the effect of the federal tariff policy on western Canadian economy. It is very strange, Mr. Speaker, that it should fall to me to present this phase of the matter to a Liberal government. I should like to know why the Liberal members from the west are not doing it. I hope they will take an early opportunity to present this phase of the case, because remember, this Manitoba case is in effect presented by a Liberal government—a progressive Liberal government, if you like to call it that. I would hope that the case for the west with regard to lower tariffs would be backed up by the western Liberal members.

There are one or two passages in the statement that I should like to present. The right hon. leader of the opposition quoted the Minister of Labour. I shall not further embarrass him by quoting anything he said with regard to Nova Scotia. However, I shall quote the following from Manitoba's case:

> The following tabulation brings together the results of our detailed calculations by commodity groups of the estimated increased cost per farm in western Canada due to tariff on imports from the United States:
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Automotive equipment and fuel. .. | $ 27 19 |
> | Machinery, implements, etc. .. .. | 18 45 |
> | Building material.. .. .. | 7 16 |
> | Household equipment and furniture | 12 00 |
> | Clothing.. .. .. | 24 41 |
> | Food.. .. .. | 20 57 |
> There are approximately 290,000 farms in the three prairie provinces and we have estimated the added cost per farm per year as roughly $100. Therefore, the total added cost borne by western farmers is 29 million dollars per year.
> The weight of this burden may be judged by the following comparisons: The total municipal and school tax burden in western Canada was 44·5 million dollars in 1933. This figure includes city, town, and village taxes. It is no exaggeration to state, therefore, that the cost of the tariff, to farmers only, is equal to what the whole population of western Canada now pays to maintain local government and education. The Searle Index calculates the average real property tax on western farms at $69.85, which, if compared with our estimates of an added tariff cost per farm of $100, indicates the relative weight on rural life of local taxes as compared with the burden of national tariff policy.

I would urge that it is high time that we no longer allow matters of monetary and tariff policy to drift, when they affect so adversely large sections of our community.

As I look over the speech from the throne I can find no indication of anything along new lines which would materially affect the welfare of the great masses of our people. To me that is the most serious aspect of the situation. Apparently we have gotten into a rut. Comfortably situated in Ottawa, we seem to be content to go over and over great masses of figures. We do not realize what they mean in terms of human welfare and human suffering.

A short time ago I came across a report in the New York Tribune of an address on the constitution delivered by President Roosevelt. It is not without application to conditions in Canada. It states:

> The constitution of the United States was a layman's document, not a lawyer's contract.

I suggest that if the British North America Act is to be considered a lawyer's contract, in spite of the suffering which must be endured by a great number of our people, partly at least because of the inflexibility of that document, then there is a bad lookout for Canada. Mr. Roosevelt continued:

> Less than two years ago fifty-eight of the highest priced lawyers in the land gave the nation, without cost to the nation, a solemn and formal opinion that the Wagner Labor Relations Act was unconstitutional, and in a few months the supreme court overruled them.

I would invite the attention of the Minister of Justice to that statement. Are we to go on indefinitely allowing our people to suffer economically because there was a constitution drawn up some seventy years ago which may have been fitted to the needs of our forefathers, but is not fitted to the needs of Canada to-day? One concluding pregnant sentence is this:

> We will no longer be permitted to sacrifice each generation in turn while the law catches up with life. We can no longer afford the luxury of twenty-year lags.

I commend that to the attention of the Minister of Justice. I commend it to the attention of my legal friends in the house, and indeed to all others. We in Canada have been affording ourselves the luxury, here referred to as "twenty-year lags." We have been going along with old economic policies as well as an old constitution. Meantime the world has been moving with wonderful rapidity. Our people have suffered because the house and parliament has not had imagination enough to alter its policies to meet the new needs which this century has thrust upon us.

Mr. R. J. DEACHMAN (Huron North): Mr. Speaker, I always listen with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). He is a man of great faith. This is an age of grave doubts, and we must at least have some admiration for those men who still retain some of their old faith.

Almost three years ago the Social Credit party in Alberta was elected, with great promises. I venture to suggest that no party has been a more complete failure, so far as carrying out its promises is concerned, and yet my hon. friend remains absolutely unshaken, with a faith that laughs at impossibilities and cries it must be done.

A year ago last summer I was startled to find in my morning paper a report of a statement which had been made by my hon. friend in some small town in Alberta. He suggested that hundreds of millions of years ago providence had contemplated the idea of bringing into existence the province of Alberta and that there would be a great leader raised up to direct the destinies of that province. That leader was Mr. Aberhart. Hundreds of millions of years ago means at least two hundred million years. I do not know the condition of the earth at that distant date. It may have been without form and void; it may be that it was still in a stage of fervent heat. Perhaps it had begun to calm down a little and it may be the first crude forms of life had begun to develop. There may have been a slight movement, a bubble in the primordial ooze, and perhaps providence looking on, waved a hand and said:

> There little creature, don't you cry;
> You'll be Aberhartan by and by.

Even though I speak thus kindly of my hon. friend, I want also to call the attention to something else. He said today that we should work together with the greatest earnestness and fairness. He believed that we were all fairminded men. I hope he will be able to live up to the creed which he has laid down. Last winter there was some discussion in this house about a bonus to be paid upon the production of sugar beets. I opposed that because I do not believe in tariffs or bonuses. If an industry in my constituency demanded a bonus, I would let it go and take my chance on being defeated. But I have heard on other occasions from friends of mine, who had it direct from the lips of the hon. member for Lethbridge, that he could not understand why I was opposed to the bonus being paid unless I was in the pay of the sugar interests. It is rather humorous to think that I would be in the pay of the sugar interests, but I suggest that my hon. friend ought to be careful.

I do not treat his statement with the sternness with which I might regard it if it came from a member of one of the older political parties, such as the Conservative or the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. After all a moral code is a product of slow growth. First, there are certain moral conceptions and it takes time to develop them. After all the Social Credit party is the youngest party in the House of Commons and it has not yet established its own code. It has not reached the condition where it can stand on honest convictions and antipicate that others will do the same. I suggest to my hon. friend that when he makes a statement such as that, he does not measure me; he measures himself. There is still some truth in the old couplet:

> Now, as of old, Man by himself is priced,
> For thirty pieces Judas sold himself, not Christ.

I shall be glad now to turn to something more entertaining. The Conservative party is developing new leaders, and I am glad to see them. I would not for one moment suggest that I should be glad to see the old leader disappear, because after all the older he gets, the more I like him. Prior to 1935, when my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) laughed at all, he laughed at other people. In 1936, having thrown off the burden of office, he laughed spontaneously and naturally. In 1937 he laughed with others. From personal contact and from what I have heard from others, this year he laughs at himself. He must have had abundant reason to laugh at himself when he went home last night.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) has moved down closer to the front. I congratulate him. He is getting nearer to the throne, and I do not think he will ever get very far away from it. He ran away a little too far last summer, but the results were not happy. Then we have the outside leader of the Conservative party, a new man who has come upon the scene. I do not know whether he is the heir apparent, the heir presumptive or merely the pretender to the throne. He made a speech some time ago in Toronto upon which I must congratulate him. That speech contained some sentences which convinced me that I have converted him and that he now has some doubt as to the value of tariffs. A Conservative who has the dawning of doubt with regard to tariffs is a valuable asset to the Dominion of Canada at the present time. We ought to welcome him to our midst. I am not sure that the conversion is complete, because his speech contains some strange dogmas. However, it is a very interesting speech and I should like to read a few sentences from it. He said:

> In the beginning, the disadvantages of the national policy eclipsed its advantages. To build a Canada of great and equal opportunity meant hard work, especially at the outset;—

I agree with that. He continues:

> —meant hardship, especially to the primary beneficiaries of freer trade. Our infant industries needed protection, if they were to prevail. Our labour needed protection, if it was to survive. But the foundations of a higher standard of living for the future, meant at that time, higher costs of living to the consumer. The producer of natural products paid twice over.

An hon. MEMBER: Who said that?

Mr. DEACHMAN: Mr. Herridge, the former minister to the United States, the aspirant to the throne. Where is the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), the man who occasionally whispers an invocation for higher protection? Where is the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol)? Where is the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey)? Mr. Herridge speaks as a father who is chastizing his child and says: I hate to do this; it hurts me more than it does you, but it will be good for you in the end. His speech continues:

> This was unavoidable, if you like. But none the less it was a strain upon the scanty resources of a pioneer community. It is to the eternal credit of Canadians that they saw the vision of a greater Canada, and endured.

I can imagine the members of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association enduring while they were permitted to charge the consumer two prices for the things that they had to sell. In order to build a Canada of great and equal opportunity, it was necessary to divide the country into two classes—even the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) was not accused yesterday of doing that—those who received payment and those who paid the bills. There is another touching passage here:

> So up went the tariff, undoubtedly beyond that point where ends the public welfare and begins those high profits of special privilege which feast upon the public welfare.
> And thus the tariff became a wall dividing east and west, industry and the primary producer, labour and the farmer. It ceased to be protection and became the perversion of the high morality of Canada first.
> The Conservative party put up tariffs. It misemployed a noble principle.

Isn't that good?—the noble principle being that of charging the consumer two prices.

> The national policy became discriminatory.

It was born that way.

Admit it gracefully.

I wonder if my Conservative friends will admit gracefully that the national policy became discriminatory—no, not "became" but always was. Then he goes on to say:

Therefore, when labour is protected the farmer must be protected likewise.

It took them sixty years to find that out. It was twenty-four years before they realized the truth about reciprocity, and even then they could not vote for it. But it took them sixty years to realize that the farmer must be protected alike with labour. It goes on:

And so his turn comes round at last. His protection is also a minimum wage. His minimum wage will be a minimum price level. In this way, labour and the farmer unite and become the joint guardians of our security.

I wonder if you could ever find a more delightful thing than that. The manufacturer, the protected interests, are still to be permitted to exploit the community. No change in that. But the government is to undertake the task of guaranteeing the prices of the products which the farmer produces, and so we will have industry exploiting the farmer and the government recompensing the farmer for the exploitation of industry. That is the new protection; that is the new national policy. Well, that will not last very long so far as the Dominion of Canada is concerned, but it does bring to the attention of the house a very serious matter. Even the Conservative party realizes the danger which confronts this country in connection with agriculture, and that is a story which I now desire to present.

For sixty years we have budgeted fairly steadily for depressed agricultural conditions. We have the fruits of that situation today. The average farmer in the province of Ontario —I am dealing now with the Ontario farmer because I happen to represent an Ontario constituency, but what I am going to urge in regard to the Ontario farmer ought to be applicable to the other provinces, although in the present circumstances Ontario is the pick of the bunch. Conditions here are better than in the other provinces, partly because of natural advantages, climatic conditions and so forth. The average farmer in the province of Ontario, according to the census of 1931, had an investment of $7,273. He had 119 acres of land. The value of his production per farm was $1,585 in 1930; that is gross production and takes no account of the cost of production or of the cost of living. It represents the value of the products produced on the farm, available for sale or for consumption on the farm. In 1932 the value of production had sunk to $964; that is, it declined by $621 in two years.

Permit me to say this for the benefit of my Conservative friends: This problem is too big to make it a partisan issue, and I am not charging the former government with the entire responsibility for the decline in the value of farm products which took place during these two years.

In 1936 the value of farm production had risen to $1,335, still a decline from 1930, but a substantial increase of $371 over the low level of 1932. I am going to be fair in this also, and say that the government cannot take the full credit for that increase, because part of it was the result of natural causes, and agriculture is still left in a depressed condition, which is something still to be faced.

As I have pointed out, that was the gross return. Then the farmer had to pay taxes on his farm, averaging $100. He had to buy feed, costing $80; fertilizer, $15; spraying materials, $3; seed, $24; power and light, $6; labour, including board for labour, $155. Then there should be an allowance for maintenance and operating expenses of implements, including gas, oil, twine, repairs, and so forth, which would amount to at least $100. Threshing would average $25, and the depreciation on his buildings and equipment would amount to at least $165. With an investment in his farm of $7,200, he ought to be entitled to five per cent interest, and if you add all these items of expense together, you have $973 of expenses on that farm. If the farmer was not getting interest on the money invested, he was paying interest on a mortgage, and if all these items are deducted from his income of 1936 the average farmer's net income in the province of Ontario was $362, or less than one dollar per day.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I wonder what you are going to do for an industry which has sunk so low that the total earnings, per farmer, are $360 a year. That is less than the pay which this government gives an office boy starting to work in the government service. Is there courage enough in parliament to say and to do something about this? Do you not think we have a problem there, a tremendous problem, as it exists at the present time? I wonder what we are going to do about it.

Let me put it another way. Let us take it upon an index basis. It is difficult to compare farm earnings with industrial wages, and in this case remember that I go only so far as an index will go. You must consider it as an index and nothing else, but yet it is an indication of real conditions.

Taking industrial wages at 100, and farm earnings at 100, in 1926, we can come to a fair approximation of farm earnings in the following years by comparing the relative prices which the farmer received for his products with the wages which the industrial worker received. There is no substantial variation in the volume of farm production during those years, and the reward of the farmer is dependent largely upon prices.

It stands this way: Industrial wages, 100 in 1926; 104·3 in 1932; 109·8 in 1935. Farm earnings, 100 in 1926; 83 in 1930; 59·5 in 1932. In other words, the earnings of the average farmer in Ontario in 1932 represented a decrease of 40·5 per cent from the level of 1926, while the earnings of labour went up during the same period by four per cent. Please note that I am not finding fault with the wages of labour. I am not saying that the earnings of labour are too high. I realize that while this was going on, while the farmer was paralysed, while his earnings had decreased over 40 per cent, labour was largely unemployed. But I raise this question—how far can labour go in increasing its wages while the farmer stands as he does. There is the difficulty which labour must face. You cannot have the rate of wages of labour steadily increasing over the years when you have at the same time the income of the farmer almost cut in two.

If we take again the cost of living and the value of farm produce at 100 in 1926, the cost of living in 1932 stood at 81·4 and the price of farm produce at 48·4.

These are conditions that call for the attention of the House of Commons, not of one political party only, but of all. I have given the prices of farm produce, and I want to point out that in the normal operation of the law of supply and demand the price of farm produce ought always to stand at a higher level than the price of manufactured products. There are certain basic reasons for this: First, mass production lowers the cost of manufacturing. Mass production is always possible in industrial production, but rarely possible in agriculture. Second, the mechanization of industry goes forward more rapidly than the mechanization of agriculture. Greater resources in capital and greater capacity for employment of technical experts in the development of research assist progress in manufacturing. Manufacturing is driven forward towards the lowering of costs of production—not necessarily of selling price—much more than agriculture. Third, fluctuations in volume of production and price are, to a large extent, under control in manufacturing. This gives greater stability and permits lower costs. Fourth, production, per unit of capital invested, is greater in manufacturing than in farming. Fifth, interest rates are lower for the industrial borrower than for the agricultural producer. That ought to aid the manufacturer still further in producing at a low cost, while the farmer is naturally faced with a higher cost of production.

In view of all these facts we cannot expect that the price of farm produce will decline, as will the price of manufactured commodities; and for that reason the situation should be changing steadily in the direction of the farmer and not in the direction of the manufacturer. Why does this not happen? I am not going to be positive in that regard, because I want the house to explore and find out why, but I think there are some reasons which are quite obvious and the house ought to be able to discover them.

What is the result of the changes I have pointed out? Let me mention one fact which I regard as of great importance so far as farm life in Ontario is concerned. In 1931, according to the census, there were in rural Ontario, in the age group from twenty to twenty-nine, 115,000 males and 87,000 females. According to normal expectancy, taking the age group from twenty to twenty-nine—that is, the group in which most marriages take place—we should have had 124,709 males and 111,822 females in 1931. That was the normal expectancy. Actually there was a decrease of 9,000 males. The decrease in the number of females was 24,000. The young women had deserted the farms.

What is the reason for this? The reason is that the young woman was no longer a valuable economic unit on the farms of Ontario. The cost of living was high and she had to make a living. The female population moved away from the country to the city. Those of my hon. friends who are bachelors know, as perhaps the married men, too, know, that when the young women leave the country there inevitably follows a decline in the social activities of the people, for the young women are the life of the community, and so you have a serious social condition in the rural life of Ontario. Economic conditions have destroyed the normal balance of population. Moreover, there is a constant tendency for the young men to leave the country and go to the city. This is one of a number of aspects of the general situation that has developed as a result of agricultural conditions in Ontario. Another is the fact that our standards of education are declining, at any rate, so far as rural education is concerned.

Mr. WALSH: Does the hon. gentleman say that education is declining.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I say that the standards of education in the rural communities are declining as compared with the standards in the city schools.

Mr. WALSH: Will my hon. friend amplify that statement?

Mr. DEACHMAN: Yes, gladly. My hon. friend, I understand, is a teacher, and I think he will realize that where salaries are low one is not likely to get the same standards of training among teachers as where higher salaries are paid; yet I find that among male teachers, in 1935-1936, the average salary in the country schools was $848, while in the urban schools it was $1,922. Even my hon. friend would not work as hard for $848 as for $1,922.

Mr. WALSH: Is my hon. friend differentiating between the grade of diploma held by the teacher receiving $800 and the grade of diploma held by the teacher receiving $1,900?

Mr. DEACHMAN: What I have given has reference to public schools, and if there was a difference in the matter of diplomas it only shows, what I am contending, that the country school cannot afford the high-salaried teachers who are employed in the cities. There are, in Ontario, something like 750 schools in which the average attendance is less than ten, and I venture to suggest that my hon. friends will appreciate how extremely difficult it is to provide the same high standards of education in such schools as exists in city schools, which have the advantage of better equipment. Inevitably, where there is a decline in rural wages, the earnings of the farmers, the standard of education will decline, not because the people want it to decline but because there is not the economic capacity to pay teachers.

I come to the question of remedies. I shall not discuss this question, because all I want the house to do is to realize the problem. I should like hon. members to appreciate the problem from the economic standpoint and to give full consideration to this fact, that if the entire rural population of Canada, or of the province of Ontario, must expect a low level of recompense for its work, then it follows inevitably that the burden will be felt by industries which will lack purchasing power; it will be felt by the railways; it will be felt in every phase of our life in Canada.

It is exceedingly difficult to obtain the facts. The story I have given to-day is not very clear, it is not very definite, because the facts are not available upon which to base a conclusion. Do hon. members realize that the latest available record of earnings of farmers goes back to 1920 when the index of prices was 160 as against 80 to-day? There were some reports prepared in 1931-32 by the Ontario Agricultural College. I endeavoured to get these reports but have not yet been able to obtain them as their circulation was banned by the government of Ontario at that time because the story they told was too tragic. They did not want the facts to be known. The same thing has occurred in the United States; when they start to investigate the living standards of the farmer the investigation collapses before it gets very far. But I contend that we ought to have these results.

Many will dispute these contentions in regard to the condition of the farmer. Some say: After all, the farmer is not trying to make a living; he is trying to live a life; he has a house of his own and all that. But I ask the government to give some time and attention to the problem. Let us make an analysis of the earnings on one hundred sample farms in Ontario, and a number of farms in other provinces. Let us take a fair selection, get the record and examine the facts. This would be a simple matter; we could use the facilities provided by our district agricultural representatives. It is possible to adopt a simple form of accounting and find out what the farmer earns. With a record like that, continued over a number of years, I am positive that we would have sufficient facts to convince any party or any government that the big problem before the people of Canada to-day is not, as some people say, the railway problem; it is not the unemployment problem; it is none of these problems—the real problem is to bring the standards of agricultural life up to such a point that when this nation goes forward—under a Liberal government, I hope, if a Liberal government is faithful to its trust, but otherwise under some other government—it will go forward by a united movement all along the line, not simply raising by artificial means the reward of the few, while others are compelled to pay the added cost. I read from the address of the Hon. W. D. Herridge given in Toronto recently. I cannot agree with it. I do not think the problem can be solved in the way Mr. Herridge suggests, by a fixed price for agricultural products. There is no hope that way. I believe the movement should be towards freedom. Emerson said:

> The basis of political economy is non-interference. The only safe rule is found in the self-adjusting meter of demand and supply. Do not legislate. Meddle and you snap the sinews with your sumptuary laws—give no bounties.

I pass that on to my friend the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore).

Make equal laws and secure life and property. Open the door of opportunity to talent and virtue and they will do themselves justice and property will not be in bad hands. In a free and just commonwealth property rushes from the idle and imbecile to the industrious, brave and persevering.

I would not subscribe to all that; yet it is a safer, surer guidance than sumptuary laws, planned economy, fascism, communism or any other ism. But with a measure of freedom, helped to some extent by the correcting influence which government can exert, I am sure that standards of living for the farmer can be raised and he can be brought to an equality with the rest of the people of the dominion. If we fail in accomplishing this we have not solved the one great problem facing Canada. It must be settled or life itself has failed in this great nation.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I want to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I do that because I noted in their tones an undeniable conviction, and at the same time great fluency of delivery, which I think merit praise even from a humble member of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

In the months preceding the opening of parliament the speech from the throne has been awaited with a good deal of eagerness by the people of Canada. During the first session of this eighteenth parliament the government was to a large extent finding its feet. In the second session its eyes and those of our legislators in general were turned chiefly towards the coming coronation and the imperial conference which came directly after it. But this third session, and the program of governmental legislation presaged in the speech from the throne, provide a real test of the government of the day.

In my first speech in this chamber and in some other addresses I made here I expressed my desire to be helpful in connection with legislation coming before the house from time to time. I think hon. members cannot complain that I have been narrow or bitter or unfair in my criticism of governmental legislation, nor have I any intention of pursuing a different course in my remarks to-day. I believe that criticism of a government's program should be of a constructive nature. Our duty as legislators, representing our constituents, is much broader and goes much further than a mere attempt to make political capital or to seek tactical political advantage.

I think I echo the feelings of most people in the country to-day in saying that. Wherever I go I find a growing feeling that the work of this house and the legislation it enacts are of much greater importance at this time than ever before, and call for the undivided attention and patriotism of men on both sides of the house to make that legislation workable and beneficial to our citizens. The spectacle of governments assailing governments, section fighting against section and men manoeuvring for political advantage may make front page news and be a great "break" for the papers in some respects, but it does not come within hailing distance of a real attempt to solve the great problems which face our country at this time. There is much talk of national unity, but I should like to see more work towards that end as well. I sometimes fear that by so much talk we may talk ourselves into nine different countries instead of working ourselves into one. I leave that suggestion with hon. members, because after all our talk will not avail much unless we work towards that end.

My purpose this afternoon in dealing with the speech from the throne is to stir this administration into producing more far-reaching and effective legislation on behalf of the great masses of our people. I do not think the speech from the throne can be regarded as of a kind likely to bring much sunshine and happiness to the great mass of Canadians. Like my right hon. leader I feel that surely something can be done within the precincts of this house by the administration now in power towards attempting, in any event, to bridge the gap between plenty on the one hand and poverty on the other. I am not taking a defeatist attitude in this regard. I have confidence in our Canadian people, whether they be Liberals or Conservatives or belong to some other group represented in this chamber. I am confident that what I suggest is the desire of the Canadian people, though sometimes we may disagree as to the methods which should be employed in attaining that end. By delay and overcautiousness in this country are we not contributing to the growth of radical thought and feeling? In order to do a proper job in a country such as this, in my opinion governments must keep abreast of the times. They must not go further than public thought but neither must they lag behind the general feeling that exists in the country over which they govern.

With regard to one of the major points dealt with in the speech from the throne, unemployment insurance, may I say that I doubt if there is one man—or one lady—in this chamber who is not fully in accord with the introduction of unemployment insurance to help our workingmen. I doubt very much if the sentiment of the house is not overwhelmingly in favour of unemployment insurance, but may I suggest with all deference, Mr. Speaker, that this question has been before the people of Canada for a great many years. I was not so active in public life when the Liberal platform of 1919 was drafted, but in that platform I read a reference to social legislation such as unemployment insurance. It would appear to me that the years of prosperity in this country between 1921 and 1930 was a period when unemployment insurance could have been inaugurated. If that had been done it would have worked out to the great benefit of the working people of Canada. I make that suggestion for this particular reason that after all the working people become annoyed from time to time at the delays which occur, from whatever causes.

During the very difficult years following 1930, when the depression was nearing its end, an attempt was made by the previous administration to introduce an unemployment insurance measure. After it was brought in, as hon. gentlemen are very well aware, its constitutionality was questioned by the then opposition. Shortly after the measure was enacted the Conservative administration was defeated at the polls. Now we are in the third session of this parliament and only now are we getting the legislation which, in my opinion, we should have had many years ago and which, if it had been brought into being at that time, would have built up a fund which would have been immensely worth while to the working people.

Now I should like to add a word of counsel, of caution and of warning to the government of the day. In all fairness and all friendliness may I suggest that they should give right of way to the unemployment insurance legislation at this time, putting it ahead of all other types of legislation, so that not one more minute may be needlessly wasted before we do something for the working people.

In the speech from the throne I notice some mention of economic recovery. It is true that Canada has shared in the general world movement during the last few years, but I think we should be cautious in our remarks with regard to the betterment in economic conditions, because, to my way of thinking at least, to some extent our increased trade rests upon the temporary foundation of world war preparations. Suppose the war preparations should cease; just what provision is this administration making for the protection of the people of Canada if that trade should disappear to any great extent? Those are some of the matters which this government should take into very careful consideration, so that we may survive if at any time in the near future this trade stimulus should decline.

I should like to say also that we cannot risk our entire economic future upon outside markets, important though they may be. After all, the home market is also important, especially for those of us who represent agricultural ridings. The home market for the producers must be protected, and a national policy of self-preservation must, in my opinion, be inaugurated in order that the dangers I have pointed out may not have to be faced. In the last three months we have seen how quickly this country reacts to outside influences and how sensitive is our national economic set-up to conditions prevailing across the border to the south. So I say that we should make every effort to put our own house in order first. Then, when that has been done, we may seek those stimulants to trade which will bring to our people a greater prosperity in the years to come.

In the speech from the throne—and I should like to address myself particularly to the western members in this regard—mention is made of the activities carried on under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. During the past year many western farmers and their families have come to the county of Peel, which I represent in the house. Without any flattery whatever I should like to say that one would have difficulty in finding a finer type of rural Canadians or better farmers than these western people who have come to our county. On many occasions I have heard members from the west rise to great heights of oratory and enthusiasm, as only a western member can, on behalf of the men and women whom they represent. After having seen these migrants to our county may I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that they well deserve all the praise that has been given them in the house. I believe also that this movement has created a new understanding between the east and the west. So far as my personal knowledge goes, it has done more to create a real national unity and an effective interprovincial understanding than all the words that have been uttered in this house and the other legislative chambers in our country. May I express the hope that government activities under this act will not be necessary after this session has been closed, and that good crops and the necessary moisture will be found in those dried out areas of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba. I trust that 1938 may be a banner year for the great grain growing population of western Canada.

Mention has been made in the speech from the throne of the training of unemployed young people in Canada, such training to be conducted under the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act of 1937. It will be recalled that on September 14, 1937, an agreement was made between Ontario and the dominion under the youth training scheme, and $90,000 was made available for the training of young men and women in agriculture or allied pursuits. Five hundred young men were taken as a maximum for the purpose. When they went to the farms they were paid $10 per month, and the farmers who took them in and gave them board and lodging received the same amount. This was to be continued for six months.

Anything I may have to offer with regard to the scheme will be by way of helpful suggestion to the government, and could not be regarded as a definite criticism. I would address my observations particularly to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), under whose supervision the operation of the act comes. However there have been some minor criticisms which possibly should be brought to his attention for correction, in the event of the same condition arising in the future. There is no profession, vocation or calling in connection with which applicants must be chosen with greater care than in that of farming. Farming is a most difficult type of profession. Only those of us who have come from the farms and understand farm problems can realize the full importance of what I say. To a great extent one must have industry, perseverance and a genuine desire to be a farmer, if he is to succeed in the training. All those factors are most important. Although the Minister of Labour is not in his seat, may I say that the greatest care must be taken in choosing the young men who are to train and thereafter may be expected to take their part in the future agricultural life of Canada.

Every farmer member must know of instances where urban dwellers have gone outside the cities to attempt to do farm work. Some of them have been good farmers. As I stand here this afternoon I can remember several young men, Englishmen, Irishmen and Scotsmen, who have worked for us on our farm from time to time and who to-day own their own farms in Ontario, and can be classed as good farmers. On the other hand there were others who came to the farms who wished only to fill in time until they could obtain other jobs within the town limits or within the limits of a city corporation. May I repeat that we must be careful in our choice of the men who are to be trained to do this type of work.

Some men have come out to the farms in the years gone by to attempt to learn farming, and even after years of experience they have been known to commit that unpardonable sin of hitching the tugs to the double-tree before the wagon tongue goes in to the neck-yoke. I notice the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) laughs; perhaps he has never committed that unpardonable mistake.

Mr. DUNNING: I have, and I have done it on a cold morning, too.

Mr. GRAYDON: On the other hand, there are those who have come to the farms with scarcely any experience, but have had a great desire to be good farmers and who, by using their own common sense, have known enough even to turn a scotch collar upside down before putting it on over a gelding's head.

I mention these points simply to emphasize to the Minister of Labour the great care which must be taken in connection with choosing the young men who are asked to learn this most intricate of professions. May I add that, in my view, so far as possible friction should be avoided between those young men who come to the farm under a scheme such as this and the elder, more experienced and skilled labourers who have spent all their lives on farms, sometimes earning not much more than the young men who are about to study the art of agriculture. The general scheme of youth training must however commend itself to all of us.

For some reason or another the demand for unskilled labour seems to have diminished to some extent. No doubt many hon. members have had the experience I have had in attempting to place men in different jobs. At times we find it difficult to fit men into jobs because they lack some kind of technical training. Attention should be turned not only to the question of youth training, but, so far as finances permit, to the training of other people who may be fitted into the various niches of industry or other places in which, by virtue of their present lack of skill, they are not able to be absorbed.

Representing one of the greatest agricultural sections in Ontario, the county of Peel, I am interested in the Shaw report on overseas marketing. That report opened the eyes of many farmers in Ontario and, no doubt, in the other provinces. I shall not attempt to deal with the publicity which has attended the publication of that report. Not only does it reveal the faults in the present system but, more important to the farmer, it shows the definite possibility of future overseas markets. After all there can be no question that for the farmer the United Kingdom offers one of the greatest markets in the world.

I would ask the government so far as possible to assure us of some aggressive scheme for the standardization of products, and of an equally aggressive campaign for selling our products overseas. I do not know whether it is general in all constituencies, but there is a feeling among farmers, one which has been expressed to me on many occasions, that perhaps less money might be spent by the government in some other departments and that a little more might be spent in the Department of Agriculture. The view is held that greater expenditure might be made in connection with the extension of domestic sales as well as the sales of products in other parts of the world.

We have read in the paper where congress voted almost a million dollars for one particular type of advertising in connection with one class of farm product. All hon. members know what the citrus fruit advertising has done for the growers in California and other states. In this country I believe we might reduce the estimates of other departments of less importance, and allocate more money to advertising the products of the farm in our domestic as well as in our overseas markets. We should show people that for deliciousness and general food value our Canadian farm products outclass anything in the world.

The speech from the throne has dealt with the Veterans' Assistance Commission Act. The last report brought down made some mention of the imperial veterans. I should like to suggest to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) that he might find it profitable to arrange for a conference between officials of the Ministry of Pensions in the United Kingdom and the department here. Out of such a conference might come something which would improve the status of the imperial veteran in this country.

I was interested to note the extensions which are to be made in the trans-Canada air service. We are fortunate in the county of Peel in having the village of Malton picked as the site for the Toronto auxiliary airport. We had a feeling in that county that when the authorities were looking for something good, they would come to our constituency. They have not failed us in that regard. We are hoping to be on the direct line of trans-oceanic traffic in the years to come and I believe that the choice of Malton for an airport was a wise one.

Mention is made in the speech from the throne of a revision of the trade agreement between Canada and the United States. As the provisions of the new agreement have not been definitely decided upon I should like to make two or three suggestions to the government, which might be kept in mind when negotiations are in progress. There are a considerable number of fruit and vegetable growers in my riding and these men are much concerned over the possibility of the lowering of the tariff or the relaxation in the imposition of the regulations with respect to added value for duty. These people have suffered to some extent—perhaps I should say to a large extent—because of the agreement which went into effect on January 1, 1936.

The figures show that as between 1935 and 1937 there has been an increase of 50 per cent in imports of fresh vegetables from the United States. Our growers can supply the Canadian demand. They are not asking for special privileges, but they feel they have made a greater sacrifice in promoting freer trade between these two countries than any other industry in this dominion. Imports generally from the United States increased 30 per cent in the period 1935 to 1937, but imports of vegetables increased, not 30 per cent but 50 per cent. I cite these figures to show that these growers are entitled to some consideration. The tariff as it stands at present is not sufficiently protective and they are anxious that by the new agreement no additional burden shall be imposed upon their business.

According to the latest statistics, there are more young trees planted for orchard purposes in the county of Peel than in any other county in Ontario. This means that the orchard men of Peel are planning for the future. They are counting on a continuance of the preference which they now have in the overseas markets. I ask the government to exercise every care and caution to see that nothing is done to interfere with the preference which our fruit now enjoys.

In my closing remarks I should like to refer to three types of taxation, all of which are regarded as important in the riding which I represent. During the regime of the previous administration, a two-cent tax was placed upon sugar. That tax met with some outcry, especially from hon. members who now sit on the government side. In the next year the tax was reduced by one-half, but the one-cent tax has remained in force ever since. I submit that we do not give enough consideration to the effect that such taxes have upon the women of our country. After all the housewives should be considered. This tax is actually a burden upon the housewives of the dominion. Last year I suggested that this tax should be removed and I hope that I shall not be a lone crusader this year when I ask the government to consider this matter when the budget is brought down. This one-cent tax should be taken off sugar in order that some relief may be given to the housewives of our land.

The county of Peel is the home of the greatest cut flower industry, not only in the dominion but I think I am safe in saying in the world. No sales tax is imposed on agricultural products, but the full tax of eight per cent is imposed on horticultural products. This tax must be very difficult to collect because of the great number of small growers. The result is that it is to some extent discriminatory in its application. I suggest that this tax should be eliminated. I make this plea, not only on behalf of the large concerns in Brampton and elsewhere, but also on behalf of the workingmen who are engaged in this industry in great numbers. They are anxious that it shall prosper in order that they may derive some benefit from that prosperity.

I should like to bring to the attention of the house a matter which has not been referred to so far. I refer to the increase in the cost of radio licences. With all fairness to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) and to the general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, for both of whom I have the greatest respect, I make the plea that there should be no increase. I sat in at one meeting of the special committee which dealt with radio broadcasting in 1936. I was elected to take the place of the late Mr. Plunkett, the former member for Victoria City. It may be that I did not know the general set-up of radio broadcasting, but at that time I felt that an opportunity should be given to the nationally owned broadcasting corporation to justify its existence. The report of that committee was concurred in unanimously by the House of Commons.

There has been, however, a growing discontent with our national broadcasting corporation. Whether or not this is justified, is not for me to say at this time. The people are now to be asked to pay an increased licence fee, not only on the sets upon which they previously paid a fee but upon the radios in their cars and any additional sets they might have in their homes. There has been a storm of indignation over this increase and I think it should be brought to the attention of the government, if they have not already heard the rumblings in the press and from other sources.

I trust the government will take an early opportunity to remedy this matter. If our national broadcasting system is to be a success we must first gain the confidence of the radio listening public in this dominion. We must be careful not to impose what people are apt to regard as nuisance taxes. Speaking for myself, I would rather pay $70 in gasoline tax, which I do every year, because I seem to notice it less, than be asked when the 31st of March comes round to pay the radio licence fee. That may seem peculiar, but human nature is human nature, as someone said in the debate yesterday. I would urge upon the government the importance of maintaining confidence in our nationally owned broadcasting system, and may I suggest that the raising of the licence fee will not tend in any way to increase confidence in the system. I ask the government at this time not only to refrain from increasing the licence fee by fifty cents, but very earnestly to consider wiping out the fee altogether and raising the funds required from some other source.

May I just say in closing that while the speech from the throne foreshadowed a number of very important projects which will be under consideration by parliament this session, undoubtedly it left out one very important matter, and that was any reference to legislation which would tend to bridge the gap, that inequality between incomes in Canada, which I mentioned in my earlier remarks this afternoon. Surely this great assembly of men and women representing all parts of this dominion, coming here with one idea in mind, that of bettering the condition of our people, can find in the legislative machinery at hand a powerful and effective instrument for bringing about a greater equality of income in this country at this session of parliament.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ARTHUR J. LAPOINTE (Matapedia-Matane) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I shall make my remarks brief, in order not to delay the adoption of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I wish first to offer my warm congratulations to the honourable members who moved and seconded the motion. I was delighted to hear these speakers express themselves with such ease, eloquence and precision.

The third session of the eighteenth parliament has just opened in an atmosphere of confidence and optimism. Instead of the disquieting situation in which the country found itself under the former administration, we are able to note today remarkable progress in all fields of national activity, thanks to the present government's policy built on common sense and cooperation.

In spite of the acrimonious remarks of the right honourable the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), many of his friends cannot help admitting that we are today on the road to true restoration, with all due deference to my honourable friend from Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens). As the right honourable the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said last night in the course of a speech for which I wish sincerely to congratulate him, there is still much to be done; important problems remain to be solved, but I honestly believe that the Liberal party has reason to feel proud of what it has accomplished during the period of slightly over two years that has elapsed since its accession to power.

Among the difficult problems awaiting solution there is that of the anxious and bewildered young people of this country who, during the past six or seven years, have seen the collapse of their ambitions and the vanishing of their fondest hopes. Today practically all avenues are closed to youth. Every position is filled, and when perchance a vacancy opens there are hundreds of applicants for it. I know many heads of families who have made great sacrifices to educate their children. Some of them spent nearly all their savings to give to their sons an education that would permit them to attain in due course to important positions. All that is left to them now is the consolation of looking at gilded diplomas hanging to the walls.

I know of no spectacle more tragic and distressing than that of our idle young people who, because of their idleness, are exposed to many dangers. The depression has affected the morale of the younger generation and I look upon the problem of youth as the most pressing one that we have to face. Indeed, the delay in solving it may lead to the most disastrous and irreparable consequences.

Since a nation's youth constitutes one of its most valuable assets, governments have in that regard duties and obligations which they cannot avoid. I wish however to congratulate the honourable the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) for the action he took last session in having one million dollars voted to assist the youth of the country. It is a most worthy object and I was happy to note in the speech from the throne the government's intention to continue this wise policy this year. I hope that even more will be done.

As the representative of a rural constituency, I wish particularly to draw the attention of the government to the distressing situation of the young people of the rural districts. During the two years or more that I have had the honour of representing the electoral division of Matapedia-Matane in this house, I have received over five thousand applications for positions and assistance of all kinds, a large number of which came from sons of farmers. It is because I understand the deep distress of the young people from the country communities that I appeal to this house to-day on their behalf. I venture to hope that my appeal will be heard by those who are charged with the responsibility not only of the future and the welfare of our youth, but of the progress of our agricultural population as well.

In spite of a substantial improvement there are still in each parish of my constituency from 75 to 150 young men of an age to establish a home of their own, but who for lack of resources are unable to do so. Their fondest desire would be to follow the example of their parents and become useful citizens earning their living by their labour. Instead of that they have become a heavy burden and an object of anxiety for their parents.

People seem to forget that agriculture is Canada's basic industry, and I am under the impression that we have too often, in the past, neglected it for the benefit of other large industries, which resulted in drawing a large number of our rural youths to the cities, attracted as they were by the prospect of an easy life and by the mirage of delusive pleasures. But scientific endeavours with a view to improving our machinery soon brought about overproduction, and, therefore, unemployment. To-day, it seems to be an established fact that our factories, with their improved equipment, when they are running full time, are able to manufacture in a few months what we can consume in a whole year. Therefore the manufacturers will be more and more inclined to reduce their employees, and the cities will require a lesser number of workingmen. Consequently, there is an urgent need of directing our young people toward another sphere.

Desertion from the land has caused great social unrest, and, to a large extent, made for the economic chaos from which we have so much suffered for the last few years.

According to the statistics, the population of the province of Quebec, at the time of the census, on June 1, 1931, was 2,874,255, or 27·7 per cent of the total population of Canada. People residing in the 25 towns of more than 10,000 inhabitants made up 46·26 per cent of the total population. By adding the residents of incorporated villages of more than 1,000 inhabitants, the percentage of the urban population would be 54·51. And if you add to that the population of all our rural municipalities of less than 1,000 inhabitants, the percentage would then be respectively 63·1 for the towns and 36·9 for the countryside. Our rural population, in the province of Quebec, has been steadily decreasing for the last sixty years. According to the census of 1871, there were then 80·5 per cent of the people on the land, and 19·5 in the towns. In 1931, the percentage of the rural population had dwindled to 36·9. However, during the ten years between 1921 and 1931, the population of the province of Quebec had increased by 21·76 per cent. Where did the surplus of our rural districts go? They helped to swell the number of workers in the cities, and later the number of unemployed on relief, which meant a burden for the government, instead of an asset to the country.

Mr. Speaker, such conditions cannot last much longer without necessarily endangering the economic future of this dominion. I humbly suggest that the best way to put an end to these unfortunate conditions would be to improve the lot of our farming class, and to assist in establishing our farmers' sons, either on old farms which could be parceled out, or by opening new rural districts. Some time ago, the very eminent bishop of Rimouski, Mgr. Courchesne, pointed out that our forests that had for years supplied the mills in the Matapedia valley would soon be depleted, and that the people would of course have to go back to the land. Even if the keeping of our youths on the land must entail great sacrifices on the part of the nation, we should make them. It shall be the salvation of our young people. As I look all around, and as I endeavour to see through the future, I see no other means of really improving the conditions.

Undoubtedly, I realize that the young people in our rural districts may not all feel the call to the land, but I know a large number of young men in my county who would be anxious to get established as farmers, provided that the conditions were more favourable, and that they would get the necessary assistance.

The Auger-Rogers plan disclosed at first great possibilities for the province of Quebec, but we soon realized that the rural districts could not easily avail themselves of that plan, because the municipalities are too poor to contribute their share. Although it was stated that the Quebec government would assume the share of those municipalities which would be unable to pay, I believe that in our rural districts there were very few people who could avail themselves of that plan, and the towns seem to be the only ones to benefit by it.

Mr. Speaker, we do not seem to realize the actual conditions which obtain in the rural districts. While we grant the cities millions of dollars for public works and relief, our unemployed in the countryside must, most of the time, depend on public charity. Anyone who will look through the list of relief works undertaken this year in the province of Quebec under the Tremblay-Rogers agreement will notice that outside of a sum of $1,000 granted the constituency of L'Islet, not a cent was provided for the counties east of Levis. Not that I wish to blame the hon. Minister of Labour, who sits in front of me for I know that the choice of these undertakings is left to each province; but I would like, however, that it be well understood that the cities of Montreal, Quebec, Three Rivers, Sherbrooke and Levis are not the only spots in the province of Quebec where there is unemployment.

I shall now turn back to the main object of my observations. In the previous speeches which I had the privilege to make in this house, I always advocated a back to the land movement, because I thought, as I still think, that it is the best way to solve the unemployment problem in our rural districts. In this respect, however, I am in perfect agreement with the bishops of the province of Quebec, who have just made a stirring appeal for land settlement.

I had much satisfaction in learning, through the press, that in April next a great radio campaign on agricultural training will be launched in the province of Quebec by "Le Réveil rural," whose chief founder and energetic president is my esteemed fellow member from Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard). No better qualified man could have been selected as the head of that organization than the author of Vieilles choses et vieilles gens, who for nearly a quarter of a century has laboured so heartily on behalf of the farming community. Some people will no doubt claim that the back-to-the-land movement, the land settlement policy has not always yielded satisfactory results. Possibly, but we should also bear in mind the mistakes which were made in the past and could be avoided in future.

In order to promote the development of new land settlement districts, it would be necessary, at the outset, to provide adequate means of communication with the older centres, instead of letting the poor settlers flounder over wretched roads. Again, those worthy people would have to be paid more regularly the salary and the bonuses to which they are entitled, instead of having to wait several months for them. I think the federal government should, along with the Quebec government, assume the whole cost of carrying out the Auger-Rogers plan, and that municipalities should not be called upon to contribute. In my opinion, under such circumstances, that plan would be an ideal one. Greater care would also have to be exercised in the selection of lands for settlement, and more attention should be given to the choice of settlers. In the past, farmers' sons have all too often been overlooked in land settlement schemes, while settlers were being looked for among the cities' unemployed. The latter, not all but a good number of them, had no natural turn for farming. They were not, either, prepared for the hard work and the numerous hardships that are part of a settler's life. Many among them had no greater ambition than to escape for a time their wretched conditions and take advantage of the opportunities offered by the governments. That is why, after a year or two, and in some cases after a few months only, they flocked back to the cities.

Before thinking of getting rid of the cities' unemployed by putting them on uncleared lands, let the authorities first put a stop to the migration of people from the farms by giving our farmers' sons practical help in becoming settlers. These young men are better aware of what is expected of them. For many years, they have, under the supervision of their parents, become acquainted with farming. They know that the constant and persevering exertions of a courageous settler are nearly always rewarded, even if in some cases results only come after a long time. In the province of Quebec, especially, if farming seldom brings wealth to those who make it their life work, it does, at least enable courageous and persistent people to live in easy circumstances, while bringing them independence, quiet, peace and happiness.

I am pleased to say that most of the settlers in my constituency have displayed much courage and perseverance. Thanks to their unremitting efforts land settlement has had a wonderful progress in our district. A few newly-established parishes will soon vie with the older ones. In these troublous times, when people are more interested in enjoying themselves and leading an easy life than in making sacrifices, these worthy settlers, true to ancestral traditions, did not hesitate to plunge into the forest in order to establish a home and make room for their descendants. These unheralded heroes deserve our admiration since they are thus promoting the development and the greatness of our country.

When, looking over the map of my constituency, I notice a vast district, comprising the townships of Laverendrye, Catalogue, Gravier, Clark, Casault, Lagrange, Bontet, Duniere, Richard, Cuocq, Leclerc, Joffre and Baribault, which have never been opened to settlement, I cannot but think that all the unemployed of my constituency could find work there. I reflect that there would be good prospects for all courageous and proud young men who are not afraid to face those hardships and sacrifices which, sooner or later, must be the lot of those who wish to succeed in life. I reflect that there would be good prospects for all our spirited young men in whose veins is still flowing the blood of the early settlers who opened to civilization the shores of the St. Lawrence. And I know, Mr. Speaker, that these young men are still numerous in my constituency, but they are awaiting the time when the government opens the way to those areas and helps them to make a start. Let us not forget that the future of our country is in the hands of our young people. And it seems to me that we would be remiss in our duty if we did not do everything in our power, if we did not take every means at our command for the salvation of our youth.

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude, since I stated at the outset that I would not speak at any length, but I do hope that the government will consider my suggestions.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): First, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address upon their efforts to paint a silver lining in a murky and heavy cloud. During the past few months I have listened to many speeches by prominent Liberals, including members of the Liberal cabinet, and perhaps I might be pardoned if I termed the majority of those speeches as of a vainglorious nature. My reaction, and I believe the reaction of an ever-increasing number of people in Canada, is a feeling anxiety, bred by the belief that this much vaunted prosperity rests upon a foundation which is not only unsound but altogether undesirable. It appears to me to be a lamentable state of affairs when the prosperity of a country such as Canada should have to depend to such a large degree upon the volume of our export trade rather than upon the demand of the home market.

The excuse, of course, is offered that in Canada, where we have a comparatively small population, that population is not able to absorb the total production of the country. However that argument can be tenable only if the present population are having their wants adequately met. Would anyone in the house suggest for one moment that the domestic and social requirements of the people of Canada are being adequately met to-day? Would anyone suggest for one moment that the masses of the Canadian people are receiving a sufficient quantity of food to afford them a decent standard of living? Would anyone suggest, for instance, that the masses of the Canadian people possess a sufficient quantity of clothing? I refer especially to children in the rural areas, who in many cases have to travel two, three and four miles in sub-zero weather wearing clothing totally unsuited to withstand the rigours of this climate. Once more, would anybody in this chamber suggest that the housing requirements of the people of Canada are being adequately met? It is not necessary to travel very far from this chamber to find people living in very undesirable quarters, and in this dominion I have seen people living in hovels that would make the pigsties at the central experimental farm here look like palaces. That being the case, Mr. Speaker, there can be no justification for our exports exceeding our imports to the extent that has been the case in the past.

Some people take the stand that our main trouble arises from the fact that we have a small population, and they advocate that we should have increased immigration. But recent statistics show quite clearly that an increase in immigration does not necessarily mean an increase in population. It stands to reason that unless we are going to make social conditions in this country of a desirable nature, people are not going to stay. In that case the result of immigration is merely a floating population, with people coming in one door and going out the other. Then, again, if we are going to bring industrial workers into this country, those industrial workers, utilizing the modern equipment available in Canada to-day, will be able to produce goods greatly in excess of those their purchasing power will buy, so that the demands of the home market will not be increased in relation to the production of the country. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that foreign trade and immigration will not solve the problem, we once more stress the fact that we should stimulate the home market so that the people of Canada may be able to consume to the utmost of their desires or to the full capacity of industry to satisfy those desires, whichever may come first.

I do not wish it to be thought that I am denouncing the value of foreign trade. As the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has already stressed, we realize full well the value of foreign trade, but what we criticise is the policy of this government with regard to foreign trade. The Liberal party appear to take the stand that they are willing to allow a low standard of living in Canada in order to make available a greater quantity of goods for export. I do not say that this is the deliberate intent of the Liberal party, but this appears to be the result of their policy. We take the stand that the correct function of foreign trade is the exchange of the surplus of those goods that we can produce most economically for the surplus goods of other nations that we cannot produce economically or in sufficient abundance.

Why is it that the home market of Canada does not create an effective demand for the production of Canada? We have stressed the reason on several occasions in the house and no doubt will continue to do so in the future. The principal reason we have emphasized is that the producers of consumer goods are not able to create an effective demand for the total of their production. Therefore it becomes essential that additional purchasing power shall be issued outside industrial systems in order to make up that deficiency. The first time I spoke in the house I referred to the fact that a definite relationship should be maintained between the production of capital goods and the production of consumption goods, and I pointed out that this relationship should be so adjusted that salaries, wages and dividends paid out in the production of capital goods would be equal to the deficiency of purchasing power that existed as between the total prices of consumption goods and the total effective demand of the people. Perhaps I might quote from a very interesting article that appeared in the Canadian Business magazine, entitled Is A Major Depression Ahead, because it carries out what I have just been saying. At page 18 the article states:

At the beginning of this article, we mentioned that it was difficult to foresee what would check the present downward spiral of decreasing purchasing power. . . . Until now, the disequilibrium between revival in the capital goods industries and those catering to a consumer demand has been one of the stumbling blocks to sound prosperity.

It is quite evident that the necessary relationship is not being maintained to-day, and until steps have been taken to increase the purchasing power of the people it is quite obvious that the people of Canada are being deprived of the goods that are available or that can be made available.

What is mainly responsible for the present partial recovery? On this question I think it is only right that we should be perfectly frank and face the situation as it exists. As some members have already stated, the main reason is the fact that the major nations of the world are spending millions upon millions of dollars on armaments. Here I should like to refer to the October letter of the Canadian Bank of Commerce. Referring to this question the letter points out that this foundation is not only unsound but is also undesirable. I quote:

Moreover, it had become increasingly apparent that most nations were drawing heavily upon their immediate and future resources to engage in rearmament. This program, though giving an immense impetus to world business, must eventually result in a substantially increased financial burden. With world armament expenditures estimated this year at the colossal sum of 15 thousand million dollars, and fully half of European industry devoted in varying degree to armament activity consequent upon the 8 thousand million dollars apportioned for this purpose by five major powers, world industrial production soared in recent months above that of 1929, while international trade rose practically to the level of that year. Yet, as will be seen from the following account of economic developments abroad, strains and stresses have become more evident, and have had something to do with the recurring "incidents" and "crises" which recently brought people everywhere to the most anxious frame of mind in many years.

Following that argument I do not think anyone would try to say that our prosperity today is based upon either sound or desirable foundations. I listened with a great deal of interest to a speech made a few months ago by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). I had the opportunity to hear his voice from the screen of a moving picture theatre. On that occasion he indulged in the common practice of throwing bouquets at the Liberal party, and he pointed out that the prosperity and partial recovery in Canada was to a great extent due to the fact that the mining industry had considerably increased production and export. I believe his figures indicated that the production of minerals had increased in the last two years from $190,000,000 to about $350,000,000. At the present time I believe the figures are considerably higher than that.

As has been pointed out in the Bank of Commerce letter, the present prosperity in Canada has been brought about to a large extent by the armament programs of foreign nations, and those programs have accounted for the marked increase in demand for our minerals. Those increased demands are due entirely to the warlike activities of foreign nations. The inconsistency in the minister's speech, so far as I was concerned, was when he said, in order to round out the picture: "Let us pray for international peace." If international peace comes the market vanishes, and down we go into the depths of depression. So much for the Liberal party's policy of increased foreign trade on that basis.

We are well aware that at the present time a wave of horror and repugnance has swept across the civilized world because of the actions of Japan in committing atrocities in China. That reaction has become evident through the demands by many organizations and individuals that boycotts be instituted against goods imported from Japan. Yet we in Canada are today supplying the major portion of certain essential minerals Japan is utilizing in the production of those armaments which are creating destruction in China.

The hon. member for Lethbridge quoted figures to show the amount of minerals being exported today from Canada to Japan. It seems to me that we are taking a most inconsistent stand. In view of the fact that we are deliberately aiding and abetting Japan in her actions through the export of tremendous quantities of minerals, we are not in a position to criticize the action of Japan in China. It has been said that if we were to place an embargo upon the minerals to be exported to Japan there would be a danger that that country might declare war on Canada. I am glad to say that New Zealand has had the necessary courage to take that very action, and has placed an embargo upon the export of scrap iron. I realize that the amount of minerals exported by New Zealand may be small, when compared with Canadian exports. No doubt that is the reason why we are not prepared to place an embargo upon these exports. Apparently we are more interested in the profit derived by these industries than we are in helping to save human lives.

I believe an ever increasing number of people are beginning to realize that the prosperity of Canada should be based not only on a sound but on an honourable basis. We cannot be proud of a prosperity brought about by the export of minerals to a country such as Japan, in the light of her activities against China today. I would suggest that Canada should lead the world by putting her own house in order.

Let us briefly review the situation. To-day there is a chronic shortage of purchasing power in the hands of many Canadian people. Second, our potential production is considerably in excess of the present effective demand of the people; it is not in excess of the physical demand, but it is in excess of the physical demand backed by money. Third, a large number of national projects are sorely needed throughout the dominion. Then, one might well ask why in the name of common sense and Christianity, in a democracy such as this, we do not put those national projects into operation so as to make certain necessary services available to our people, and thereby distribute the purchasing power so sorely needed to make an effective demand against the goods available in Canada to-day.

I was interested in a statement by G. D. H. Cole, Professor at Oxford university, which appeared in the Sunday Pictorial. He was referring to conditions in England which, I suggest, are applicable to Canada, and stated:

> Nevertheless, despite rearmament, there is a danger of employment falling off. House building is past its peak. Traders in many lines are carrying very heavy stocks.

I would refer particularly to the last sentence, in which reference is made to stocks carried by traders. There are people who say, when it is suggested that social credit proposes to put purchasing power into circulation, that there would be no goods to meet the demand. I would point out that, as Cole says, the traders are carrying heavy stocks of goods. He continues:

> It will not do to be overconfident, as the government appears to be, that rearmament activity alone will be enough to prevent a slump from happening. What, then, ought to be done? The answer, I think, is simple; and I shall proceed to set it out here.

I suggest that the answer might well apply to Canada.

> Keep money cheap and plentiful . . . get plans ready. Prepare and have ready to start without any delay plans for house building, school building, road making, electrical development, and so on, so that these schemes can be used to provide employment and put money in the consumers' pockets the very moment there is any sign of the demand for labour falling off.

I suggest that we might well take that advice and prepare a plan to put national projects into operation in Canada, not merely for the purpose of producing work but for the sake of providing services required. Then the money paid out through these projects would help to make up the deficiency of purchasing that is so chronic to-day.

Last session the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) stated that in his opinion public works were not a permanent solution. Of course hon. members in this section of the house readily agree with him in that statement. They cannot be a permanent solution, because eventually all necessary works will be completed. Then, whether one likes it or not, the inevitable solution must be a social dividend paid as a supplement to wages. That is, as the hours of labour are reduced, as eventually they would have to be, reduced wages can be made up by a social dividend, or by a reduction in price, through a price discount financed by the federal government.

Of course the question immediately arises: How will these projects be financed? I would point out that that question does not come very well from the present Liberal government. Hon. members in this corner have stressed time and again how we believe those projects should be financed, namely by the use of national money. Two years ago hon. members in the group to which I belong refused to support an amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) because that amendment involved a vote of want of confidence in the government. At that time the Liberal party had made certain definite promises with regard to monetary reform, and we thought that if those promises were implemented a considerable improvement could be brought about in conditions throughout the country. Therefore at that time we refused to support the amendment. To-day we find a very different situation. After two years not only has the Liberal party refused to carry out its promises but, in a statement he made last year, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) showed clearly that what he actually meant was not what the people thought he meant. Therefore we shall take great pleasure in supporting the present amendment of the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett).

What was the statement made by the Prime Minister during the election campaign? What was the statement that echoed from one end of this dominion to the other? What was the statement that was hurled as a challenge from every Liberal platform? I think that statement is within the memory of all of us; it was, "currency and credit in terms of public need." The Liberal candidates in that election did not leave the people of the country in any doubt as to what was meant by that expression. They told the Canadian people how national projects would be put into operation throughout the country and how those projects would be financed by the national credit. The Prime Minister has since shown quite clearly what was in his mind when he made that statement. I refer hon. members to page 3806 of Hansard of 1936, as follows:

. . . there will be employment for all provided out of funds which this bank, by some mechanical process or other, will turn out. I want to make perfectly clear that that kind of thing has never been expressed by any person speaking with authority on behalf of the Liberal party.

A large number of Liberal candidates in the last election told the people that that was exactly what the Liberal party proposed to do, and yet the Prime Minister states that no person had any authority to make a statement of that kind on behalf of the Liberal party. It would appear that a number of totally irresponsible Liberal candidates were running around during the last election and some of those candidates are now members of the house. I am not saying that they are irresponsible; I am simply taking the statement of the Prime Minister that any Liberal member who made that statement is irresponsible.

The Prime Minister has not been very clear in his definition as to what currency and credit in terms of public need actually mean. However we find that during the election he made this statement on a number of occasions, to be found at page 3805 of Hansard:

A central bank is necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people.

Does any hon. member suggest for one minute that that is being carried out today? Would any hon. member suggest that the domestic and social requirements of the Canadian people are being adequately met? That is what was promised by the Prime Minister during the election campaign. As those promises have not been implemented, we urge the government that they be implemented immediately in order that national projects may be started adequately to take care of the domestic and social requirements of the Canadian people.

The Prime Minister evidently anticipated a certain amount of difficulty in implementing this promise because, as has been referred to by the leader of the opposition, he has said that Canada is faced with a great battle between the money powers and the powers of the people, a battle that will be waged in the next parliament. We in this corner of the house have been waiting patiently for that battle to materialize.

On behalf of this group I can promise that if that battle should ever materialize the government will have our full support.

Instead of such a battle materializing it would appear that this government has been engaged in a love feast with certain financial powers or money barons of this country. This would seem to be borne out by the action of the government in running to the assistance of the bankers in Alberta when certain legislation was passed. That action is especially strange in view of certain promises made by the Prime Minister during the election campaign. I should like to quote from a speech which he made in Saskatoon in 1935, as follows:

In Alberta at the present moment the government was launched on the experiment of social credit. "I hope with all my heart that they will be successful," said Mr. King, assuring the audience that if he was returned as Prime Minister of Canada, Alberta would be assured of the greatest freedom in carrying out its experiment under the Liberal policy of not interfering with the rights of the provinces.

That was the attitude of the Liberal party during the election campaign. Apparently that was still the attitude of the Liberal party prior to March 30 of last year, when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) made the following statement in reply to a question by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) regarding the padlock law:

If, as the hon. member suggests, it is ultra vires, then the courts will so rule. The courts will declare that it is ultra vires, and it is better that the courts declare than that the Minister of Justice do so because there would be no appeal from disallowance by the minister.

Many people in Alberta believe it is a great pity that the Minister of Justice and the government have not continued to think as it was evident they thought on March 30 of last year. One wonders why there was a sudden change in policy on the part of the Liberal government with regard to Alberta. That change apparently took place shortly after the members of the cabinet returned from the coronation. It makes one wonder whether that change was the result of the delegates to the coronation absorbing some of the atmosphere of financial imperialism which they encountered in England. It makes one wonder whether that change was the result of their rubbing shoulders with Hitler in Germany.

We in this corner are not in a position to know just what was the reason for that change in policy, but we are in a position to judge what the results have been. One of the results of that change has been a distinct discrimination against Alberta. This discrimination is resented by the people of Alberta all the more because it comes as a culmination of many previous acts of discrimination against their province by this government. Perhaps I should review briefly some of those acts of discrimination.

I should like to take hon. members back to April 1, 1936, when Alberta defaulted on certain maturities. It will be remembered that Alberta asked financial assistance from the federal government in order to meet certain maturities. Certain other western provinces also asked for assistance and the federal government agreed to give this assistance provided the provinces became a party to a loan council. It was generally recognized at that time that should the province of Alberta become a party to a loan council, all chances of putting social credit into effect in that province would be killed.

I have referred already to the statement of the Prime Minister that he hoped from the bottom of his heart that Alberta would be successful in that experiment, and that nothing would be put in the way of Alberta to prevent it from succeeding. In view of that statement it seems strange that shortly after, the government should try to saddle a loan council upon Alberta, knowing that if the province accepted such a council it would be impossible for social credit to succeed. That does not appear to be a consistent or sincere attitude.

The premier of Alberta realized only too well that if the province became a party to the loan council it would be impossible to proceed with social credit. The government of Alberta had been elected on the definite understanding that they would try to implement social credit, and therefore when the federal government issued their ultimatum that the province would have to support the loan council in order to receive financial assistance, Mr. Aberhart had these two alternatives before him: Either he had to default or else he must betray the people of Alberta who had put him in power. I think he is to be congratulated, Mr. Speaker, upon having had sufficient courage to refuse to betray the people of Alberta and to follow the course he did.

Now on the question of discrimination, where the discrimination comes in is this: Shortly after Alberta had defaulted, the loan council plan was modified and again submitted to the provinces of this dominion. Some of the western provinces had refused to become a party to the loan council as it was first proposed, but after it had been modified they agreed to become parties to it. The point I want to stress is this, that Alberta was never given a chance to become a party to the modified loan council before she defaulted, and that is where the rank discrimination comes in.

Second, we all realize to-day that had Saskatchewan and Manitoba received the same treatment that Alberta received, both those provinces would have been forced to default. There is no question about that.

Third, there is the question of the Quebec padlock law. When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked the government to disallow certain legislation of the province of Quebec, we were told that the government did not consider it advisable to disallow that legislation, that it was better to allow the courts to decide upon it. Yet when the Alberta legislation came up for review, this government evidently decided that it was wise to run to the rescue of the bankers rather than allow them to fight their own battles.

Mr. DOUGLAS: It all depends whose chickens are stolen.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, one was the social credit province of Alberta, and the other was a Liberal province.

I should like now to say a few words about the Rowell commission, because there again we consider that rank discrimination has been shown against the province of Alberta. The Rowell commission was formed for the purpose of trying to bring the provinces closer together, and it was essential for that purpose that an impartial body of men should be appointed to the commission. But what do we find so far as western Canada is concerned? Two western men were chosen, Mr. Dafoe and Mr. Angus. Mr. Dafoe has consistently attacked the principles of social credit, and has made slanderous and libellous attacks upon Major Douglas, Premier Aberhart and members of his cabinet. Mr. Angus was employed by the so-called Economic Safety League during the provincial election to attack the social credit candidates who were running in that election. Was it likely, therefore, that these two men would command the confidence of the people of Alberta?

Is it likely that they will be able to deal impartially with evidence that comes before the commission from that province?

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to touch very briefly on a subject that I had not intended to deal with tonight because I had not thought I would have the time, and because it can be dealt with better and in more detail upon some other occasion, and that is the question of feed in the drought area. I see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in his seat. I had quite a bit of correspondence with him on this subject. While fully realizing the magnitude of the problem he is trying to handle, I deeply regret that the federal government should have considered it necessary to impose the restrictions they did regarding the supply of feed relief in the drought area at this time.

We know that in many parts of the drought area—I am especially familiar with conditions in the constituency I represent—many farmers, particularly in the eastern part of my constituency, are no longer farming land. They dare not plough up the land on account of soil drifting. They have succeeded in keeping off relief by keeping five or six milk cows, and that is practically all they have to depend upon for a living. They are raising no crop, and they deserve to be congratulated upon having kept off relief in the past. But to-day many of them find themselves without any feed, and they have had to apply for assistance. They were told that they could not get any assistance unless they cut down their small herd of cows to two, if they have a family of two children, or three or four if they have three or four children. The result has been that these farmers have been thrown on relief, and it is very hard to see how they will ever be able to get off relief.

I know the reason has been given that there was not a sufficiency of feed to make it possible to carry a greater quantity of stock, but I am satisfied that when the spring comes we shall find thousands upon thousands of tons of straw that have never been used. Why? Because the amount of money allowed in payment for that straw is not sufficient to cover the cost of baling and hauling the straw to town. All the farmer is paid is $3.50 a ton.

Mr. GARDINER: $4.50.

Mr. QUELCH: The farmers who live quite a distance from town cannot bale the straw and haul it to town and cover the cost of handling it. They are better off keeping the straw at home. I have spoken to many farmers with a large amount of straw, and they have told me they have not been offered a price for straw which would pay the cost of handling it, that they could not possibly handle it at the price offered.

Mr. GARDINER: The provincial government are handling that.

Mr. QUELCH: It has to be financed by the federal government, and the federal government will not pay more than that. Again, some of the farmers have Russian thistle which will do for cattle that are not milking, and if the federal government had made money available to buy grain, there is plenty of grain available. It is not as if this condition had arisen just this year or last year, because, Mr. Speaker, in the constituency I represent it has been necessary to give drought relief in every single year since 1918.

Mr. GARDINER: If the hon. member will permit me, the regulations he refers to are the regulations which were presented to us by the provincial government.

Mr. QUELCH: I understood that there were definite regulations laid down by the federal government as to the conditions upon which that money would be granted.

Mr. GARDINER: The terms of the agreement are that the regulations shall be made by the provincial government and be approved by us.

Mr. QUELCH: And what were your regulations?

Mr. GARDINER: They made the regulations and we approved them.

Mr. QUELCH: Did you leave it wide open?

Mr. GARDINER: We did not do anything about the regulations except to approve them.

Mr. QUELCH: In that case you must accept the responsibility. But I received information from the minister of agriculture in Alberta, from which I understood the conditions were quite different. I shall not go further into that matter now, because a better time will be when the estimates come up and the matter can be discussed in greater detail. I shall then be prepared to discuss it at greater length, and there are many questions I should like to ask.

We are supporting the amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the opposition because we feel this government has had plenty of time to implement its promises of monetary reform and yet has failed to implement them. The Prime Minister has definitely told us that what the people thought he meant is not what he meant, and we know now his real stand also on the question of currency and credit.

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, following the example of those who have already spoken in this debate, I wish to offer congratulations to the mover (Mr. Francoeur) and the seconder (Mr. Warren) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, upon the acceptable way in which they discharged the task which was assigned to them. Both of them referred to the second paragraph of the speech from the throne, which mentions the coronation of their majesties, and I concur most heartily in the sentiments expressed by these hon. gentlemen and others regarding that happy event, and desire to express my own hope that their majesties' reign may be a peaceful, happy and prosperous one. The participation of so many Canadians in the coronation celebrations, both at home and abroad, would seem to be an indication to their majesties and the world that Canada is proud of her position within the British commonwealth of nations and that she is ready to stand shoulder to shoulder with other parts of the empire whenever difficulty or danger may threaten.

I listened this afternoon with a good deal of interest to my hon. friend from Huron North (Mr. Deachman) as he described what he conceived to be the conditions in agriculture to-day. He painted a dismal picture, but I am certain that that picture was not too harshly presented, and later on in my address I shall discuss this matter at greater length. Before doing so, however, I should like to say a word or two about a matter that was mentioned by the seconder of the address (Mr. Warren), namely, the benefits that Canada has derived from the trade agreement with the United States, which went into operation two years ago.

Many of our Liberal friends are taking great credit for the beneficial results of the agreement, particularly in regard to agriculture. It cannot be denied that in certain lines of agriculture our exports to the United States have greatly increased. This is particularly true of cattle, our exports of which have more than doubled in the two year period. To say, however, that this increase was due wholly to the one cent reduction in the tariff on our cattle seems to me to be scarcely correct. Owing to certain policies which were followed by the present administration in the United States in curtailing production, a scarcity of cattle ensued in that country in the past two years, and this scarcity has caused the price of cattle across the line to rise to an exorbitant figure; so that even if we had not enjoyed the one cent reduction in the rate on cattle entering that market, I am sure that there would have been a very large increase in our exports. During the last few months, however, the price of cattle in the United States has dropped off to a great extent, and there has been a corresponding reduction in our exports. I fear that there will be a corresponding reduction next year, and that our exports will be disappointing in that respect.

I have before me a list of some fifteen farm products which enjoy a lower rate of duty than formerly in the United States tariff. The exports of every one of them increased during the year 1936; but of the fifteen, the exports have been reduced in the case of ten during 1937 as compared with 1936, and it seems to me that the same condition is responsible in this case as in the case of the falling off in cattle exports during the past few months; that is to say, the price in the United States has dropped in these particular lines of products. As time goes on and another year is passed we shall find that the exports in these particular lines will have been very disappointing indeed.

For the first thirty years of this century, in our dealings with the United States we had an unfavourable balance of trade of approximately five and a half billion dollars. This is a vast sum of money; it is greater than our national debt, and about five times the total agricultural production in the dominion last year. This flow of money out of the country has greatly retarded our progress, and it has had a grave effect upon our economic and industrial life as well as upon the population generally. When the change was made in the tariff in 1930 this unfavourable trade balance began to improve, and it gradually dwindled until in the years 1934, 1935 and 1936 we had a favourable trade balance of some $120,000,000. Immediately after the present trade agreement with the United States went into effect, however, a change became apparent, and in 1937 we had again an unfavourable balance of trade of some seven or eight million dollars. The significance of these figures cannot be overlooked. The effect of the tariff changes in 1930 was to discourage imports and to keep our money in our own country, whereas the effect of the present agreement has been to encourage imports again so that once more we are facing a definite flow of money across the border.

I would refer to paragraph four of the address, wherein reference is made to a substantial advance in economic recovery in Canada. Everyone, regardless of his party inclinations, should, and I believe will, rejoice in every evidence of returning prosperity. Expanding revenues and increasing trade are desirable, and to the extent that they are a reflection of better times everyone should be gratified. It is impossible, however, to agree with the contention of many government supporters, which is so often expressed, that the depression was due to Conservative policies and that any recovery which is now taking place is to be ascribed to Liberal administration. The downward trend in business and revenues, in employment and trade was not confined to Canada but was world wide and was well under way before the late government took office, just as the upward swing began before the change of government in 1935.

The conclusions that are so often voiced by supporters of the present administration with regard to better times in consequence of expanding revenues and trade seem to me to be too optimistic when we consider conditions that prevail in Canada. There is still an abnormal number of people on relief; unemployment figures are still very great; agriculture is in a lamentable state of insecurity, and the prosperity about which we so often hear seems still to be lurking around the corner.

I wish now to devote a few moments to a discussion of the position of our great basic industry, agriculture. The seventh paragraph in the speech from the throne reads:

> The Department of Agriculture has been reorganized and its services consolidated along lines designed to improve the standard and acceptability of Canadian farm products.

This is the only reference in the speech to agriculture and it is significant that no mention is made in this paragraph of any betterment of conditions in the agricultural industry. When the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) announced last year that he was going to organize a marketing division in his own department, many people were hopeful that some good would be accomplished, but I am afraid that their hopes have been more or less shattered in the last few days.

I had the privilege and the pleasure the other evening of listening to an address delivered by the Minister of Agriculture before the Canadian Council of Agriculture and broadcast over a nation-wide hook-up. In the course of that address the hon. gentleman said that the marketing division in his department had now been organized and that the government's marketing policy had been formulated. I am glad to see that he is in his seat, so he will understand that I have no desire to misquote him. He outlined his policy to the gathering that evening, saying it was fourfold in its nature. First, he announced that the government would give assistance to and cooperate with the provinces to improve production. Departmental activities, both provincial and federal, have been directed chiefly towards this very object for many years past, and, I may say, with good results; so it was only to be expected that the department would continue its activities in this direction, although sometimes farmers say they are surfeited with pamphlets and advice some of which is not too practical. Secondly, the minister stated that the marketing division intends to extend and improve the grading of farm products for export. Once again may I say that such a course was only to be expected, because there has been gradual advance along those lines for many years. His third idea was to adopt a national mark for Canadian products which are to be exported. I am free to say that I believe this is a step in the right direction. Lastly, he stated that an agricultural commissioner is to be sent to London to further sales of Canadian farm products and to provide information to Canadian exporters.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not use the word "sales."

Mr. SENN: Well, at least to provide information to exporters. Is that a fair statement? It seems to me this will be a duplication of services which are already provided by the Department of Trade and Commerce, that department having had representatives in England for many years.

Mr. GARDINER: May I call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that, as he knows, I read the speech the other night; it is all in print and there was nothing at all said about sales or promotion of sales.

Mr. SENN: Well, at least I understand there is to be a commissioner sent to London for certain purposes.

Mr. GARDINER: An agricultural commissioner.

Mr. SENN: To provide information, as I understand, to Canadian exporters regarding marketing matters in the mother country.

Mr. GARDINER: No, I said to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SENN: Very well. I listened carefully to the whole address. I could not grasp it all because the minister was talking very rapidly, but I saw a report of his speech in the newspapers and I can say that as far as the sales part of his remarks is concerned I took that from the report in the newspaper. It is very disappointing to me, and I know to others, that nothing further has been formulated in this respect. The policy as announced by him I think would not justify the organization of a marketing division, or accomplish much in solving the farmers' chief problem, to which I shall presently refer.

At this point I should like to say that when discussing this question I am not speaking of the wheat farmer of the west. Frankly, I do not understand his problem. Wheat growing stands almost alone as a branch of agriculture in Canada, because a large proportion of our wheat crop must be exported. In all other lines of farm production the great bulk of our goods is consumed in this country. I wish it understood that I am referring to those other lines of agriculture rather than to the problems of the wheat grower.

Standards of living on the farm have gradually changed during the past thirty years, and I am glad to say that the change has been for the better. The average farmer to-day enjoys many of the advantages of city life, while escaping some of the disadvantages. With the coming of the motor car, of hydro, of rural mail delivery, with the building of better highways and the installation of labour saving machinery, living conditions on the farm have naturally improved. But this has resulted in a corresponding increase in outlay. In addition, due to various causes, the farmer's cost of production has increased materially. Unfortunately the revenue derived from the average farm to-day has not increased to the same extent as has the farmer's cost of living. For years many farmers have been forced to live beyond their income in a vain attempt to keep pace with changing conditions.

It is often said that a farmer, like anyone else, should live within his income. This should be so, but if the average farmer is to keep his boys and girls on the farm he must see that they enjoy the same privileges as the young people of other classes in the community. The farmer in Ontario and the eastern part of this country too often has had to deplete his resources or perhaps to go into debt, hoping vainly from year to year that times would improve and that there would be a change for the better in farming conditions. As a result of this the census of 1931 showed that there has been an exodus from the rural parts to the city, and that our urban population now exceeds our rural population. But, more serious still, during the same period there has been a gradual and alarming depreciation in land values, amounting in some cases to as much as 50 per cent. Many farmers who a few years ago were fairly well-to-do have found their equity in their holdings partly or wholly wiped out, while others who have grown old and have been forced to retire from active work find that the income from their holdings today is not sufficient to provide for their old age.

I now intend to make a statement which may be challenged by those engaged in other lines of industry, but I am sure my friend the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) will agree with it. It is this; The prices realized by the farmer for his products today do not bear a fair relationship to other commodity prices. Occasionally scarcity has raised the price of farm products to high levels, but generally speaking when there is a surplus in any line of farm production prices fall to an unprofitable level. Price fluctuations are very rapid and violent, and a proper equilibrium has not been maintained between prices realized by the farmer for his products and prices he has to pay for other commodities and for labour. There seems to be also a gradual widening of the margin between prices received by the farmer and those the consumer has to pay for his products. The result is that farm revenues have not kept pace with production costs and the increased cost of living and the additional expenditure necessary to maintain the newer standard of living to which I referred.

The other night the Minister of Agriculture in his address made another statement with which I entirely agree; in fact, I intended to make use of it myself before hearing him. He said that the new wealth created each year by primary production helps to maintain the buying power of the country and is in large measure the controlling factor of distribution. Now the farmer is the greatest producer of primary wealth in Canada, so it is important that his revenue should be as great as possible in order that he can purchase his share of other merchandise. It is most necessary that a proper balance should be maintained between farm and other commodity prices, but I fear that balance will not be maintained so long as the law of supply and demand has full scope in determining farm prices. As I have already said, rapid and violent fluctuation in farm prices has been the rule rather than the exception.

The farmer has to make his plans many months before he places the finished product on the market. A year must elapse from the time his wheat is sown until it is ready to harvest and market, and the same or even more time is required to produce and market almost any of his other products. During that period prices fluctuate and even the greatest prophet cannot foresee price levels a year or more ahead. Moreover much of the farmer's product is perishable and must be marketed when it is ready, regardless of what the price level may be. So whether prices are determined by the law of supply and demand or by manipulation, as some people say they are, the revenue of the farmer is most uncertain and bears little or no relation to his cost of production.

This fact has been recognized in many countries, several of which have made attempts to stabilize and maintain farm prices at reasonable levels. Under the present administration the United States made the experiment of curtailing production in order to overcome surplus conditions and raise prices, with at least some temporary success. Australia put into effect what is known as the Paterson scheme, bonusing exports in order to maintain a reasonable level of domestic prices. Great Britain established the quota system in order to maintain prices by means of quantitative regulation of imports. France, Germany and Italy have bonused the production of cereals within their own countries and have erected impassable trade barriers with beneficial results so far as production and prices are concerned.

In Canada the former administration took action to halt the downward trend of wheat prices. It was only an emergency measure, but it was successful in returning many extra millions of dollars to the pockets of the western farmers. The Natural Products Marketing Act, which was condemned by the Liberal party when in opposition and which lately has been declared ultra vires by the courts, was devised for the purpose of assisting cooperative marketing, and it cannot be denied that some of the schemes operated under this legislation were highly successful, notably in raising prices to tobacco growers of Ontario and Quebec and the fruit growers of British Columbia.

Many lines of industry in Canada, with the exception of agriculture and other primary industries, have adopted some method of price maintenance. No doubt my hon. friend from Huron North, who spoke this afternoon about the condition of the farmers, will not agree that this is a sound practice, but I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am not finding fault with such a system. I believe it is here to stay and nothing can be done that will change the situation as it presently exists. Labour has its union scales of wages and its hours of labour. Civil servants and employees drawing salaries have fixed incomes. Lawyers and doctors have schedules of fees which are more or less rigidly maintained. Prices of manufactured goods bear a close relationship to the cost of production. We have minimum wage laws. We have a railway board which sets the rates charged by our public utilities, having regard to cost of operation. There are fair wage clauses in our government contracts, but I should like to direct the attention of the house to the fact that there is no provision that fair prices shall be paid for farm products purchased by public institutions.

It is only reasonable to suggest, therefore, that agriculture stands alone in that its price structure is not constant and is determined by factors which the individual farmer cannot control and which are too often unsatisfactory and unfair. The policy of relying upon foreign markets as a solution for the problems of the farmers in my judgment can never be successful. With the exception of wheat and cheese, from 85 to 95 per cent of all Canadian farm products find a place in the domestic market and are consumed here. It seems to me the domestic market is the farmers' most valuable asset. The price realized in foreign markets for the small remaining surplus that must be exported determines to a large extent what our domestic price shall be. Unfortunately in foreign markets our products come into competition with goods produced in other countries where climatic and other conditions ensure a low cost of production. Therefore we cannot expect that a fair or satisfactory price structure in Canada can be maintained upon this basis.

Personally, Mr. Speaker—and I am speaking for myself alone—I see no reason why farm prices cannot be regulated in this country along the same lines as the prices are regulated in other industries that I have mentioned. It is already being done in the fluid milk field in a number of provinces and in the tobacco growing areas of both Ontario and Quebec, and has been successful in both cases. It is worthy of note that those engaged in the collection, grading and resale of fluid milk and tobacco have not suffered in any way by the stabilization of prices to the grower. Different schemes, of course, will be necessary to stabilize prices in different lines of agricultural production, but I am confident that by experiment and study such methods can be devised. It is needless to say that such schemes would be impotent unless the farmers' home market were safeguarded from exploitation through the influx of foreign goods. I repeat that the domestic market is the farmers' most valuable asset. It can remain such only if it is carefully preserved and if some reasonable and stable price structure for farm products is devised.

These are the reasons why I was disappointed with the policy of the new marketing division, as outlined by the Minister of Agriculture. I am not condemning these policies merely for the sake of fault-finding. I believe other policies could have been adopted which would have been much more satisfactory and worth while. May I say to the house that I am making these proposals simply because I believe they constitute the only constructive remedy for the stagnation which exists in the agricultural industry of Canada at the present time.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, it is with a good deal of misgiving that I rise to make a few observations. When I entered the house this session it was with a feeling of reverence and awe that I looked to my left, to see vacant seats formerly occupied by men for whom I had high respect, who are now in another place. Somebody asked who was going to be next. Well, after all, it does not matter who is next. When men have served their God and their country and are busy doing good things it does not matter who is next. So it is up to us to see that we do the things worthy of the highest and best in manhood.

My first impression of the speech from the throne was very fine. As I stood in the senate chamber and tried to hear the governor general deliver his speech my first impression was that it must be a very fine one because there was not a senator in the chamber who shook his head nor was there a beautifully adorned lady who was not enjoying it to her heart's content.

However, as I listened later to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) my impression was to some extent changed. I thought it could not have been such a fine speech after all. I find that the right hon. gentleman is reported as follows at page 25 of Hansard: "We have retained the three cent postage rate." I do not know whether the right hon. gentleman or any other hon. member wants to reduce the rate. If he does, then there is one very good way to do it, one which I suggested last year. Let us begin at home, and reduce our franking privilege. I do not think there would be a dozen men in the house who would wish to do it.

I must say that I commend the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) for his hearty cooperation with us at the head of the lakes in striving to improve our rural mail delivery, and to extend it so that men will not have to travel ten miles to get their mail.

What I have to say will be in the form of a few suggestions to some of the ministers. First, I should like to commend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) for the way in which he has stuck to his task. I commend him, first, because the relief camps have not been reopened. To my mind those camps were only an emergent measure and they had long outlived their usefulness and had become a curse. When I saw a young university student who had passed with honours in his second year engineering course receiving only twenty cents a day in Thunder Bay district, or anywhere else in Canada, I realized that an improper condition existed. I believe the propagation of communism was removed when those relief camps were put out of business.

May I point out to the minister, further, that many hon. members have had delegations wait upon them from the youth movement of Canada, impressing upon us the necessity of continuing the training of our unemployed youth. I hope the minister will not permit anything to come in the way of continuing that training, so that they may be fitted for worth while tasks.

I should like to make another suggestion to the Minister of Labour. While I know it is not within his sphere to curtail the hours of labour, and while I know that is a matter within the control of a provincial government, yet I do believe that the hours of labour must be cut down. If a man working in an office from nine o'clock to twelve o'clock earns a half day's pay and if by working from one o'clock to five o'clock he earns another half day's pay, I say the blacksmith, the sheet metal worker, the machinist, or the paper worker should have his hours of labour cut down accordingly, because it is just as necessary that he retain his health. I would suggest that all unorganized labour should work no more than eight hours per day, and that unorganized labour should have the right to organize anywhere without the danger of losing their jobs. I am sure the Minister of Labour will agree with the statement of the President of the United States that low wages are suicidal, and he would also agree with the hon. member for Fort William that unemployment is slow murder.

May I congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon the provision in the speech from the throne for an unemployment insurance measure. We hope before very long there will be a measure providing for state medicine, something about which we shall hear more a little later on. It is true that many attempts have been made to pass this kind of legislation, but I do not think there is any hon. member who will doubt the sincerity of the Prime Minister in his efforts to have unemployment insurance provisions made effective. Had he been otherwise disposed, he would not have brought the matter before the house so early in the session.

Unemployment insurance affects keenly the workers at the head of the lakes who are connected with operations of the board of grain commissioners. There are grain samplers, weightmen and other employees of the board who cannot make a decent living because they are given three months holidays or more without pay. Those men are not receiving any more than a living wage at any time, and because of their enforced idleness they suffer undue hardships. They are returned men.

May I mention one example respecting a man who was laid off because of only seasonal employment. The man's wife had baked a ton of flour the previous winter, but this winter she has not been able to bake, and he has had to turn in and do the housework. I do not believe the government wants our returned men to live in other than comfortable circumstances. I believe if the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) would keep an eye on the board of grain commissioners he would get food for thought.

I am sorry the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) is not in his seat. I shall not say he is in a better place, but I do know that he is in a very fine place, because he is helping the Canadian Legion in convention in the city of Fort William. There are one or two points I should like to direct to his attention. Some returned men have found it very difficult to get a proper pension. I do not speak without facts. I visited Ottawa and in particular the Department of Pensions after the session closed. I was well treated, and when the facts were placed forcibly before the department the pension in which I was interested was increased. Unfortunately before the man received his first increased cheque he had passed on to his great reward.

I could give the story of another man who lived on Empire avenue. Although he had no difficulty in securing jobs he could not hold them, because he was not in fit physical condition to work. I visited him daily in the hospital and I know he was a beaten man. We have good doctors in Fort William, just as there are in Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa. One of our doctors made the diagnosis that the man in question was suffering from abscesses on the liver, caused by shrapnel. The doctors in another city laughed at him. When the man passed on I advised his widow to have a post mortem performed, and on performance of that task shrapnel was found in the liver. He did not receive a decent pension, and as a result he, his wife and family were forced to live in poverty. I am going to place the case in the hands of the Minister of Pensions and National Health because in my view she should receive some compensation for the hardships she had to endure during those years when her late husband should have been on full pension. I feel this very keenly. These returned men are wards of the dominion government. If they cannot obtain a decent job with a living wage they should receive an adequate pension.

I know another man who because of his war wounds and the number of operations he had to undergo never was able to have a really comfortable moment. At the time of his death this man was receiving a pension, but this was cut off when he died. His widow and four children are finding it extremely difficult to get along.

I view with alarm any action taken by any province to curtail the freedom of the press or freedom of speech. I think we have a right to keep our eyes open. I do not think any press can be kept provincial in scope. I speak from experience because at the head of the lakes we gave a welcome to two communists. I am far from being a communist, but I believe in freedom of speech. The city council of Port Arthur permitted one of the leading communists of Canada to speak in that city. I do not suppose anyone who heard that man speak was not disappointed. He got off a lot of wise cracks, but those who went expecting to hear a great speech delivered were disappointed.

The city council of Fort William permitted a leading communist from the Clyde to speak. Many in that city threw up their hands and said we were doing a terrible thing. The worst thing that could be said about this man was that some people could not understand his Scotch burr. Again many people were disappointed because they expected to hear some great things. Instead of that man propagating communism, he did the very opposite. As I said a few moments ago, one of the principal causes of communism in our part of the country was the relief camps, but they have since been abandoned.

There are a few things of interest to us at the head of the lakes. I am not a free trader, although I come very close to being one when tariffs affect us at the head of the lakes. We suffer because of the coal subventions. There is a large plant at the head of the lakes which cost about $3,000,000. To-day that plant is hardly operating and the employees are on part time. While I live in the east I am really a westerner. I know something of Alberta and Saskatchewan, but although I love the great west and the breezes of that country thrill me to the core, I do not like to see western coal coming down to within a few miles of Fort William to the detriment of our workers. I believe I can trust the government to right this matter.

Another difficulty with which we are faced is the freight zoning by the railways. I do not know much about this matter, but I am told that the flour mills at Winnipeg can ship their product to Toronto and the east just as cheaply as the mills in Fort William. I expect that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) will see to this matter in the future. I believe he will remedy it if it can be remedied; if not, he will be man enough to tell us.

I should like to pay a tribute to the Minister of Lands and Forests of Ontario, the Hon. Mr. Heenan. He has done much to solve our unemployment problem. Three years ago I led nearly 600 unemployed from the labour hall to the relief office in Fort William. Last year I stood and watched 1,500 men, most of whom were previously unemployed, heading for the dining-hall of a pulp and paper mill.

I should like to leave one thought with the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). I should like to think that I shall be living fifteen years from now so that I might see the iron mines of my district pouring forth their precious ores. It is not generally known that iron ore that can be very easily mined is to be found in large quantities at the head of the lakes. I am not saying this in an endeavour to have hon. members invest in these mines any loose cash they might have. If hon. members have any spare money, the best thing they can do with it is to support some decent church that is serving this country or to put their money in a bank where they may be sure of getting it back again.

I should like to make a suggestion to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in connection with the large Canadian nickel. This coin should be made either smaller or larger so that it will no longer look like a quarter. I have heard it described as the great deceiver. I asked a porter on a Toronto train how he liked this nickel and he told me he would rather have a quarter any day, that he got too many nickels.

I have another suggestion to make which perhaps may not get very far. Some hon. members have been in the house for a long time, but there is no more chance of their getting to the senate than there is of my visiting the moon. My suggestion is that a pension should be provided for those who have served their country faithfully. I believe that members of the house have as much right to a pension as any other civil servant.

I believe the Prime Minister was wise in not granting a licence for the export of power and thus giving people the chance to ask why he did not get something for the campaign funds. I believe he is right in allowing this parliament to have its say. If it has its say, then it must accept the responsibility.

I think it is our duty to endorse any group of workers who are making an effort to make better citizens of Canadians. I want to pay a personal tribute to the Oxford group. During the Christmas season these workers put out a magazine entitled The Rising Tide. They have shown that if a man places his trust in the almighty dollar, he will soon bow to the power of that dollar, but if he places his trust in the Almighty, he will be in the rising tide and of some use to the country.

On motion of Mr. Coldwell the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 9.43 p.m.

Wednesday, February 2, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

COPYRIGHT AMENDMENT ACT, 1931

FURNISHING OF LIST OF DRAMATICO-MUSICAL OR MUSICAL WORKS OWNED OR CONTROLLED— PUBLIC RADIO RECEPTION OR GRAMOPHONE REPRODUCTION

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 12, to amend the Copyright Amendment Act, 1931.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LORD'S DAY ACT

PENALTY FOR DIRECTORS AND OFFICERS PERMITTING VIOLATION OF THE ACT

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 13, to amend the Lord's Day Act.

He said: The purpose of the proposed amendment is to provide for penalties against corporations or directors or officers thereof who either violate or cause their employees to violate the Lord's Day Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CORRUPT ELECTORAL PRACTICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) during his speech on the address in reply to the speech from the throne raised a grave issue—

Some hon. MEMBERS: What is the question?

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. I must ask the hon. member to put his question immediately if he has one to direct to the government.

Mr. PELLETIER: My question is: Is it the intention of the government to have the matter raised by the leader of the opposition concerning corrupt electoral practices referred to the committee on privileges and elections under standing order No. 63, or referred to some other committee of this house for investigation?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) informed me before the house opened of his intention to ask a question with respect to corrupt election practices. As he apparently is not familiar with the law on the subject or the rules of the house with regard to procedure in such matters I have drafted a statement which I shall give in reply to his question.

Parliament has made statutory provision for the investigation of corrupt practices at elections. Under the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, chapter 50, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, any person who has the right to vote may present a petition to a judge of a supreme or superior court, setting out these practices, and, if a deposit of $1,000 is made, an investigation may be held. Under the Corrupt Practices Inquiries Act, chapter 51, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, twenty-five or more electors may present a petition to the House of Commons charging the existence of such practices, and, if a deposit of $1,000 is made, the house may direct the government to appoint a commission for the purpose of making an inquiry. The commission in either case must submit a report to parliament, and under standing order No. 79 it is provided that if it appears that any person has been elected by corrupt practices the house will proceed with the utmost severity.

Since parliament passed the above legislation the committee on privileges and elections has never held any investigation with respect to the election of members. In the present instance no specific charges have been made and no petition has been presented to the house.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I think the statement that the committee on privileges and elections has never held an investigation is not correct; in the case of Huron North there was an investigation.

"CANADA, 1938"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) and through him to the government. The question is, whether it is not possible again this year as in previous years to have "Canada, 1938" delivered to schools, convents and colleges free, without the charge of ten or twenty-five cents.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I had no notice that my hon. friend was about to ask this question. I am not sure that I can answer it at the moment, I do not know how many of these books have been printed, but I shall be glad to make investigation and let him know the outcome.

NIAGARA RIVER ICE JAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Acting Minister of Public Works): Yesterday the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) directed two questions to the government, the first being:

Will the government take up with the government of the United States and the governments of Ontario and New York state the question of erecting joint regulation works in this river to prevent the recurrence of the abnormal conditions which have recently arisen?

In reply I may say that the situation arising from the recent ice jam is such an extremely unusual one, even for the Niagara river, that the possibility and warranty of effecting any measures to prevent or mitigate a recurrence would require careful study on the part of the interests which have been adversely affected. Regulation works which were proposed by the international board of engineers at the outlet of the Niagara river in connection with the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway scheme would not appear to be of any benefit to a situation such as has now arisen.

The second question was:

Has the minister any ice-breaking plants for use on lake Erie and the Niagara river from lake Erie to Chippawa and Niagara to Queenston similar to that used in the St. Lawrence river?

The answer is that no such ice-breaking equipment is provided.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. N. Francœur for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Bennett.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in the speech from the throne the government take a great deal of credit for improved economic conditions throughout the country. They point to mounting revenues and increased export trade. I should like to ask in what fields these increased revenues and export trade lie. They arise largely, I submit, through the exploitation of Canada's mineral wealth, often by foreign corporations. What accounts for the demand for these minerals? I submit again that it is war in the far east and in Europe and the vast rearmament programs that are seen everywhere throughout the world. Indiscriminately at the present time we sell to both aggressor and victim, although I might add that often only the aggressor can obtain the supplies that he needs. We refuse to supply a legitimate government in Spain with men and goods, yet we are exporting large quantities of goods to Japan for use against China. Our export figures to-day represent, in part, the price that is being paid by the mangled bodies of women and children in congested Chinese cities, and I say further that prosperity based upon such factors is deceptive and will not last. It is disease, not health, that enriches Canada, and wealth thus gained must bring its own nemesis eventually.

A Liberalism which boasts of such trade is not the Liberalism of Gladstone, who in a previous century thundered against the atrocities in Armenia and elsewhere. During Christmas time I saw a cartoon which illustrates what I mean. It showed a picture of Santa Claus, labelled Canada; below there was a country labelled China. Santa Claus was riding in a Japanese plane, showering Christmas gifts—bombs made in part from materials obtained from Canada—upon the Chinese. So I say that a government which boasts of such trade returns and at the same time allows present conditions to exist in the great stricken areas of western Canada without doing something effective to meet those conditions, should not boast.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

I should like to say something about conditions in the province from which I come. Men and women there have sown for years and have failed to reap. We know that. After recent trips over the prairie provinces I would say that conditions there are reaching the point where many of our people are in a state of despair. From year to year we have drifted along with relief costs mounting and nothing done on a wide scale to meet the situation. On another occasion, when a resolution standing on the order paper in my name proposing a comprehensive inquiry into the possibility of widespread irrigation and water conservation projects is before us, I want to go into that question rather more fully. It is sufficient to say now that I have been all over the area more than once this year and have been greatly depressed by what I have seen there.

Much more was I depressed last year to see that the government were not taking effective steps early enough—and may I emphasize those words "early enough"—to meet the situation that was upon us last summer. At the end of June in the town of Rosetown, in my own constituency, I addressed a meeting of farmers and business people at which resolutions were passed urging the government to take immediate and effective steps to retain in its present position the grain that was then in the elevators in that constituency, in order to protect the people of that area. A week later I attended a meeting of over a thousand farmers in the town of Perdue. I may say that it was not a partisan meeting. I did not know it was being called. I was invited to it, as were also the former Conservative member for the constituency and the Liberal candidate in the last election. There again resolutions were passed pointing out the situation and emphasizing the need for the conservation of the seed and feed then in that area. Those resolutions were forwarded to Ottawa, yet my observation was that in the weeks that followed the elevators were virtually emptied of the grain that was there.

I know I shall be told that one reason was that the cash price of wheat at that particular time was higher than the futures price and that the elevators could not be expected to retain that grain against future need. On the part of the elevator companies I say that was perfectly natural. I say further, however, that the government, if it had wished, could have closed the speculative market; it could have discontinued the trading in futures and indemnified the companies involved, if necessary, against subsequent loss due to that governmental action. But it allowed that speculative market, about which I have complained from time to time, to continue to operate. The government, which had destroyed the effectiveness of the wheat board method of marketing, again remained inert in the face of the impending crisis. Can we wonder if the farmers believe the statement that the party now in office at least to some extent was a beneficiary in connection with campaign funds from members of the grain trade? That is a suggestion which is made from time to time. The other evening in the house we heard a more specific statement by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and, later, briefly mentioning the matter in his speech, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that he would like advice as to how the situation could be dealt with.

The time has come, in the interests of clean and decent government in Canada, when political parties should be compelled to publish the sources of all their campaign funds—all of them—in order that we may know the interests and influences behind the election of governments in this country. In any event the two things the farmers believe the grain trade desired have been accomplished, namely the virtual abandonment of the wheat board method of marketing, and the subsequent sale to grain brokers, on the speculative exchange, of the grain held.

The result of the condition to which I have referred means that the government has had to ship in grain for feed and, in the spring, will have to ship in grain for seed. This means that farmers unfortunate enough to have neither seed nor feed, or only one or the other, will be penalized both ways on that account. Then, had the government had the board in operation, it could have relieved the situation for the man who had a little crop to sell. Only yesterday I received a letter from a constituent at McGee, in my constituency, in which he complains to me that when grain is delivered in a wagonload lot farmers have to take the future, not the cash price. I believe I understand why that is so. Nevertheless, because of the unusual situation in connection with cash and future market prices, it means a loss of from twenty to thirty cents a bushel for those men who are delivering small quantities of grain at various times. Delivery to the wheat board could have protected these men who have a little grain to sell in a year when every cent counts.

Further, in June, July and even in August the government did not act quickly enough in regard to the matter of feed fodder. They failed to secure the necessary feed, and the result is that to-day herds of cattle and horses have been disposed of or destroyed. Undoubtedly some will starve on our western plains this winter. So that the whole of our live stock industry in many parts of Saskatchewan, consisting of herds founded with a great deal of difficulty, expense and care, will be destroyed. The very basis of that part of our economic life will at least to some extent be destroyed.

Yet there was feed. I am told that hay remained uncut in Manitoba. I did not see it; but as I travelled through Manitoba during the first week in September, across the Portage plains where nature had been bountiful, I did see no less than fourteen large straw stacks burning at one time.

Mr. GARDINER: Infested with sow thistle.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wrote the Minister of Agriculture about it, and his reply now is that it had sow thistle in it.

Mr. GARDINER: I saw it on the same day.

Mr. COLDWELL: I know there is some sow thistle on the Portage plains, but, too, I have seen hay which had sow thistle in it, shipped from the northern to the southern part of my province. Of course, if the reason stated by the minister is the correct one it puts another complexion upon the story. I do know, however, that the government did not act quickly enough in obtaining the necessary straw and in providing the men and equipment to bale and ship it.

I have spoken about the cattle. Of the poverty, misery, despair and want in many Saskatchewan homes I do not wish to say much to-day. Later in the session there will be opportunity for such discussion. May I say just in passing that those of us interested in the condition of the Saskatchewan people are grateful for the efforts of the people in the other provinces who sent into Saskatchewan large quantities of foodstuffs for distribution through a voluntary committee. But when I hear boasting from the government side about prosperity I think of those people on the prairie, and I realize that after all the boasting is pretty hollow.

May I repeat what I have said before, that the condition is not entirely due to drought. The brief on behalf of Saskatchewan filed only a few days ago before the Rowell commission clearly proves my point. I know that when both in and out of the house I have made that statement on previous occasions, it has been questioned. But in the presentation of an excellent brief the government of Saskatchewan has shown that, as is so often said, one or two good crops will not rehabilitate the condition of the people in that province.

The drought was but the last of a long series of economic disasters, including a long period of low prices when at times our farmers obtained only twenty cents a bushel for No. 1 wheat delivered at local elevators.

I would add that upon the rehabilitation of this region in no small measure depends the entire economic structure of Canada. In a country such as ours we cannot reduce hundreds of thousands of people to peasantry, and at the same time have the great industries in eastern Canada, and the great transportation systems, in a prosperous condition. That simply cannot be done. Yet there are those who would advise us to resign ourselves to a low standard of living and the virtual peasantry to which I have just referred.

For example, I notice that the report of a speech by the Minister of Agriculture before a group of prominent Quebec Liberals at the Reform club in Montreal on January 17, appears in the Montreal Gazette in these words:

> There were one million people living in the drought affected areas, said Mr. Gardiner. Were they to be moved? He did not think so, but they would have to become accustomed to conditions. After all there was nothing specially new in the western situation. Farmers many years ago had been "on relief." His own grandfather in Huron county, Ontario, had received governmental assistance.

If we accept that philosophy, we are in effect accepting a philosophy of despair. Our grandfathers were in poverty, our fathers were in poverty and, therefore, we must get used to the poverty with which we are surrounded. That is the interpretation I would place upon those words.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not the correct one.

Mr. COLDWELL: I shall be very glad to have the minister correct it when I am finished. That is the philosophy which is being put forth in certain parts of Canada. I regret very much that this statement should have been made in eastern Canada, in the city of Montreal. I have had an opportunity of speaking there and I know that many people in that city do not appreciate or understand our western situation.

I believe that much can be done to improve the condition of agriculture. We could plan our production more wisely and guarantee a better standard of living to our farmers and to the great masses of people in the cities. From time to time we in this corner will be glad to contribute any ideas that we may have which may tend to bring about those improved standards.

If we got to work and grappled with the situation we would be able to find a solution for many of our economic and social difficulties. As our leader (Mr. Woodsworth) said yesterday, I believe that prosperity in this country is spotty, unsound and insecure. Because I believe that, I am going to support the amendment of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I intend to take that action because I believe the present government is engaged in what amounts to a policy of social and economic drifting. To drift is to court disaster and endanger the foundations of our democratic institutions.

Let us not forget that everywhere democracy is being attacked. A few years ago we might have said with Sinclair Lewis, "It Can't Happen Here," but today we know that it is being said by many that our democratic institutions are inefficient and unsatisfactory. The drifting of this parliament in the last two years lends colour to that accusation. When unemployment is rampant, when poverty and misery are widespread, when the legitimate aspirations of our young people are thwarted, then it would seem that the existing order, no matter what it may be, is threatened. I am in agreement with those who criticize this drift.

In common with the rest of the world we must move in the direction of a more equitable distribution of wealth. That would in my opinion ultimately involve the social ownership of the principal means of production and of our resources, but as a realist I know that at the moment possibly this and some other countries are not prepared to take a step of that kind. But there are other steps which could be taken and my criticism is that we are not taking those steps. Before the last election we heard hon. members who now sit on the government side say that national control of currency and credit must be utilized for the common good. Yet nothing has been done by this parliament although we in this corner have from time to time introduced resolutions dealing with this particular matter. There are steps we could take if we would, but we are doing nothing to alleviate the conditions with which we are surrounded.

If that alleviation is attempted we in this group are prepared to cooperate. Ever since I have been a member of the house I have appreciated that sitting around me on all sides were members who desired to do something for this country. Yet we do nothing. Again and again we talk in terms of our respective political parties when we ought to be talking and thinking in terms of this dominion and the citizens thereof. Because year after year passes with parliament doing nothing people are lending ready ears to all kinds of subversive propaganda.

Who can say that a Canadian form of nazism is not raising its ugly head across the country? To refer again to the Montreal Gazette, that paper published recently a picture of Canadian nazis drilling under the direction of retired regular army officers. The inside pages contained photographs of the office of the organization with the swastika on the wall. There was also a photograph of the leader of the movement in the province of Quebec. We hear a great deal of the dangers of communistic propaganda, but to my mind Canada faces a grave danger to-day from nazi propaganda and the fascist forces which are being used by powerful interests. It is obvious that these organizations have large sums of money available for literature and uniforms. I shall not deal at any length with the padlock law in the province of Quebec, as that was gone into fully yesterday.

The same kind of thing can be found elsewhere in Canada. Looking back to last April we find the Liberal premier of Ontario saying to a group of people, "You shall not organize in the association of your choice." The institutions of this country are said to be British, and under British institutions we are said to be free to organize. Looking back into history I remember reading of an occurrence in 1834 near the place where I was born. A group of agricultural labourers led by a local preacher, George Loveless, who was also a labourer, endeavoured to bring about some improvement in their lot. Six of them were arrested and cast into prison. They were tried and the judge in passing sentence used these words: "Not for anything that you have done nor, as I can prove, that you intended to do, do I sentence you to seven years' transportation across His Majesty's high seas." Not for anything you have done nor, as I can prove, for anything that you intend to do. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in effect those are the words that were used in this province last April in connection with an organization there.

But see what happened. History, may I remark, sometimes repeats itself. At that time, 103 or 104 years ago, the first Liberal government sat in power in England; to-day in Canada a Liberal government sits in power; and again, in effect, the same thing is being said in Ontario and Quebec—not for anything you have done nor, as I can prove, for anything you intend to do, do I stop you from doing these things. Yet out of that came one of the greatest social and economic movements that the world has ever seen—the rise of the great British trades union movement, and the rise of the great cooperative movement. Democracy must be preserved, and if it is going to be preserved, these rights must be assured to our people, and pressing reforms must be made to alleviate their condition. Theories of many types we may hold, but the cry is for practical and immediate solutions of the problems that press the Canadian people at the present time. In the west the cry for an effective rehabilitation plan goes up, and may I say to my friends from constituencies in eastern Canada that no longer can the west be regarded as a sort of rich colonial possession to be exploited by other parts of Canada or by foreign lands, but if they will examine the matter they will find that that has been to a degree the history of the west. We have no secondary industries established there.

In connection with social reforms, the other day, the Prime Minister chided the leader of the opposition for his failure to enact constitutionally unemployment insurance and other social measures. I should like to remark that some of the difficulties that we are meeting today are because in those years when business was on an upswing, between 1921 and 1929, if you like to take the years of Liberal administration, social measures, and unemployment insurance in particular, formed planks in the Liberal platform, and yet none of these measures was enacted nor was any preparation made constitutionally to enact them.

Exploitation of the farmer and the worker everywhere has been carried on by industry and finance, and it must be stopped if our national unity and well-being are to be preserved. We saw what that exploitation was to some extent in the textile probe; we also had an illuminating inquiry into the high prices of agricultural implements, and one of the things I am anxious to know this session is what we are going to do about these matters. Are the two reports that were made on those subjects simply to be filed and be of record, and be forgotten, or is the government going to bring down legislation to deal effectively with the problems which those reports indicate do exist? If such action is forthcoming, the speech from the throne remains silent about it, and I must say that the inaction of the government in the past two years in the fields to which I have referred does not lead me to expect them to do very much. In fact, their record fills me with some misgiving.

There is, I know, a feeling of satisfaction on the government side of the house regarding the recent by-elections, and I do not want to take away from hon. members opposite any of the glory they take to themselves from those results; but I will say this, that when ministers go into Montreal and say, "We will fill the hole on Dorchester street," when they say, in effect we will spend millions of dollars right alongside this constituency, or when their supporters go right across the country to British Columbia and say in Victoria, "It would be well at this time if this city were represented in the Liberal caucus because there are large defence appropriations to be considered,"—when these things are said, some at least of the glory of winning by-elections fades out of sight. The tragedy is that our Canadian electorate falls for that kind of campaigning.

But in spite of any victories the government may have won, there is grave unrest throughout this land, and that grave unrest is particularly apparent among our youth, who are denied the opportunities of life which we ourselves had when we were young. I meet a good many of them across the country, well equipped, but unable to find an outlet for their legitimate ambitions, their training and attainments. Thus far, I would say to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), our attempts to deal with that problem have been quite feeble. These young people cannot lead normal lives, cannot marry and settle down and make homes as we could do, and so the very fibre of our society is being destroyed; its very foundation, the home, is being undermined. People look to this parliament for a lead and for a solution, and if they are not given a lead and some hope of a solution, then democracy in this country will be in danger.

Last session parliament did very little because of the haste to bring the proceedings to a close in time for the coronation and the imperial conference. But this session is a challenge to us all. Surely there are enough members in the house who realize the situation—I know there are but very often party discipline prevents them from expressing themselves as they might otherwise do—who must wish to indicate their dissatisfaction, and I would say, let them do so by voting for the amendment rather than for the motion. In that way we can make our protest effective in the only manner in which protests by members of parliament can be made effective, and that is by our votes on the floor of the house. If a sufficient number did that, we might find ways and means of compelling the government to consider taking effective steps; and, may I add, with the clouds of war and of recession or depression, whichever you like to call it, gathering in the distance, we dare not continue to drift along for another session. With the poverty and the misery, and the devastation even, that exists in large sections of this country, we must not let a false prosperity here and there deceive or blind us to the real issues.

I know, again, it will be pointed out that dividends have increased. Truly wealth is becoming accumulated; monopoly holds us ever in a firmer grip. On the other side, these piling dividends and wealth accumulations are paralleled by misery, by want, by despair, by the denial of opportunity, and all the rest of it. And we must, in this parliament, discover ways and means of increasing wealth for the great masses and of redistributing that wealth and purchasing power among the masses of the people. It seems to me that the problems before us fall under two heads: internal—thinking now of what the papers have published lately—and external peace; and, second, social security. These, it seems to me, cover the whole fields of foreign policy, rehabilitation, debt, purchasing power, housing, pensions for the aged, opportunity for youth, and the like; and parliament should not rise this session, even if we sit here for a whole year, until some solutions have been found. If the government fails, as it has so far failed, to formulate an effective policy, then let us, the members of the house, forget our party differences and our pet ideas—

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. COLDWELL: —and cooperate with the Canadian people, as they would expect us to cooperate, to bring about a better condition. I hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) say "Hear, hear." I am glad to hear him say it.

Mr. DUNNING: I was welcoming your willingness to abandon your pet ideas.

Mr. COLDWELL: I know the Minister of Finance has his pet ideas also, but I suggest that he, with the rest of us, forget those pet financial ideas which he holds so strongly.

So, Mr. Speaker, I would recommend to the house support of the amendment rather than the resolution.

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques-Cartier): Before I present to this august assembly the few remarks which I have prepared for this afternoon, I wish to protest against the extremely bad lighting arrangements we who sit in the fifth row enjoy here. I am very well acquainted with the fact that the hon. members who sit here, and I suppose the same can be said of those who sit opposite in the same row, are men of such talent that they will eventually move to the second or even to the front row, but those who succeed us will have the same trouble. My vision has declined a good deal since I came here. I do not want any of my hon. friends to go blind for lack of a slight expenditure which this country can well afford, and I do hope, sir, that you in your official capacity as presiding officer of this chamber will draw the attention of the powers that be to this very bad condition and have it remedied as soon as possible.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, you will have the kindness to allow me to add my very sincere congratulations to those that have already been offered to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both of these gentlemen have acquitted themselves with great credit and fully in accordance with the best traditions of this parliament. Both have delivered eloquent and patriotic speeches which were duly appreciated by hon. members and which proved the sagacity of those who selected them for the discharge of this important task. Other speeches, all very interesting, followed. Hon. members will forgive me if I do not refer to every one of them; I shall limit myself to a very short reference to the speech made by the right hon. the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Bennett), and the one made by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). These two gentlemen occupy the highest places in Canadian public life, and what they say is always listened to with the greatest possible attention.

It was evident that the right hon. the leader of the opposition was not pleased with the speech from the throne. He found fault with it from beginning to end, with one sole exception, if I am not mistaken, and that exception was the reference to the coronation of their majesties. If this important event had not been referred to, the leader of the opposition apparently would have been willing to drop overboard the whole speech, lock, stock and barrel. Upon any stranger totally unacquainted with Canadian politics who might have been within hearing distance of the right hon. gentleman the effect of such a clever attack would have been stupendous—that is, until that same stranger heard the reply of our revered leader, the Prime Minister. The leader of the opposition conjured up such a heavy smoke screen that the speech from the throne had become almost invisible behind it, but the Prime Minister in his eloquent reply completely disposed of this smoke screen and rapidly chased it out of sight. This is most remarkable because the Prime Minister's reply apparently was based solely on notes which he took during the attack, while his worthy opponent must have had plenty of time to prepare his well planned assault.

An interesting revelation was made to this house by the right hon. gentleman who with such talent leads the opposition. Please see page 40 of Hansard and read what the right hon. gentleman has to say about the trade agreement with the United States. It is evident that the government over which he presided—I am not quite sure that this is correct, but we will say, the government over which he presided—did discuss a trade agreement with the United States. And why should he not have discussed a trade agreement with our neighbours? It is not we of the Liberal party who will find fault with such a move. We have always favoured closer commercial relations with our southern neighbours of the great American republic. If the Tory party saw fit in the interests of Canada to borrow that plank of the Liberal party, well and good. But I could not help thinking, and surely other hon. members, and Canadians throughout the dominion, cannot help thinking that the Conservative party or its very able leader must have undergone a change of heart, because in the ears of those of my generation who cast their first vote at the general election of 1911 there still rings the battle cry of the Tory party in that election, a battle cry that rang throughout Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific—"No truck or trade with the Yankees!" I am glad to learn of that change of heart. Canada is on the American continent, c'est un pays d'Amérique, and we should have pleasant business relations with our neighbours to the south. Apparently the Conservative party shares our view of that part of the Liberal policy, and of course that makes it unanimous.

There is no doubt about the improvement in conditions generally. There is equally no doubt that we have not yet reached the goal which we are seeking, but we believe the Liberal party has the policy best suited to attain that result. Better trade relations with the rest of the world will permit us to dispose profitably of the production of Canadian farms and Canadian workmen. The efforts of the present government in that direction are already bearing fruit, and the Canadian public notes with deep satisfaction that that same government is ever on the alert, constantly seeking ways and means of further improving conditions and of improving them for all. The Liberal policy is not designed for the specific benefit of any particular class, but has everyone in mind. The county of Jacques Cartier which I have the honour to represent has considerable farming area, and truck gardens and market gardens are numerous. There are also several important manufacturing establishments. It is in a small way a cross-section of Canada. If I am correctly informed, two-fifths of the population are of English descent, and therefore the county is bilingual. We all live happily together without friction concerning language or religion. Notwithstanding any political differences, my best efforts are directed to maintaining and improving this harmonious state of things.

We are glad to get a fair share of the benefits accruing to Canada, thanks to the wise administration of the present government. But, sir, material progress is not everything; it is not the sole thing to aim at. It is also necessary that peace and harmony reign in the country. It is indispensable that the different sections of Canada respect and esteem one another. It is essential that the rights of everyone be respected. In a word, all citizens of Canada should be good Canadians. That applies in public life as well as in private life. The ancestors of those of us who live in lower Canada entered confederation as partners, with all that word implies both as to obligations and privileges. No province in this confederation should be treated by the others as a poor relation; that would result in the destruction of our present national structure, and the beautiful dream of our forefathers of creating a great nation by the union of all the British territories lying north of the United States would be shattered forever. I repeat, our ancestors joined confederation as partners. And their descendants are willing, nay eager, to continue on that basis; only on such a basis of equity, justice and British fair play can confederation continue. Persons in positions of authority in either the national or provincial capitals who walk about with chips on their shoulders are not serving the cause of national unity. In politics one should be ready and willing to put water in his wine when occasion calls for it. Only in heeding and practising the words of the Master, "Peace on earth to men of good will," can Canada become a great nation.

Confederation became an accomplished fact through the acceptance of an act called the British North America Act. This act has been operative since July 1, 1867. It has been amended from time to time, chiefly I believe on account of territorial changes. At the present day there is a demand that it be amended again, this time to give the dominion government the right to pass social legislation. It is quite possible that after seventy years the act may be in need of revision, although the average Canadian citizen must wonder as to the necessity for such revision. Be that as it may, the call for amendment has been strong enough to cause the federal government to resolve to investigate conditions. The government therefore appointed the Rowell commission, which is now at work touring the dominion to hear all and sundry who desire to offer suggestions, cures and panaceas for the correction of our economic and legislative ills, real and imaginary. Probably there will be another opportunity to speak on this subject later, so today I content myself with saying that the British North America Act should not be amended without the consent of all the participants to its creation; I mean all the provinces. No one in this parliament, I am sure, wants to impose anything upon the provinces; no one wants to violate provincial rights; no political party to my knowledge has any such plank in its platform. On the contrary, all hon. members of this house are very respectful of such rights. But after seventy years it is within the realm of possibility that improvements are desirable in that act—I prefer the word "improvements" to the word "amendments." Those who want unemployment insurance are citizens of their respective provinces, as well as of the dominion. No one can be a Canadian without being at the same time a citizen of one of the provinces. As a Canadian an individual is perhaps enabled to take a broader view of things in general than he would get from a purely provincial point of view, just as the man who has seldom left the locality in which he was born gets a broader conception of things when he travels and visits other communities.

It is, I hope, unnecessary for me to state that I use the word "provincial" in no disparaging sense whatsoever. A lot of trouble would be avoided if we knew one another better within the boundaries of our well beloved country. And as it is generally Quebec that is considered different I think that occasion should be taken by those of our fellow citizens who live in other provinces to visit Quebec and get better acquainted; and the reverse should also take place, that those who live in Quebec should arrange to visit other parts of the country. Some universities in the great province of Ontario have already made a good move in that direction, by holding summer schools at different points in Quebec. This idea of citizens visiting different parts of their country is not a new one. Years ago I saw that Signor Mussolini had arranged to give free wedding trips to Rome to newly married couples. However, I am not suggesting that we should go that far yet.

The leader of the opposition spoke the other day of political corruption. I sincerely hope his party is with him in his opposition to political corruption, because again that would make it unanimous, because we have always been against corruption from the start. I hope the right hon. gentleman will transmit that conviction to his party managers in the county I have the honour to represent—they are badly in need of it.

May I state that there are different forms of corruption. One form is gerrymandering, and that has been practised by hon. gentlemen on my left with an art deserving of a better cause. They are past masters at it.

Mr. SPENCE: That is old; we have had that before.

Mr. MALLETTE: Well, it has to be repeated so as to sink in, and I hope it will sink into the mind of the hon. member. If the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) is willing to correct it, I hope he will get the ear of his revered leader and ask him to support me in my efforts to change the boundaries of the county of Jacques Cartier to more nearly where they ought to be and would be if common sense had been the guide when the redistribution was made in 1931. My hon. friends are experts at that game. I know it is not new; the hon. member is very kind in reminding me of that. I remember reading about it years ago in the Reminiscenses of Sir Richard Cartwright, who was no young chicken, and he said that in those days they did not call it gerrymandering, but "hiving the Grits." As far as Quebec is concerned, they are not hiving the Grits but hiving the Tories. But in hiving the Tories injustice is sometimes done. I have no objection to Quebec having some Tory members; it is a good thing, but I hope that in future redistributions common sense will prevail, as I am sorry to say it did not prevail in the last redistribution. If the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition wants to know about the corrupt practices of his organizers I have a suggestion to make to him. It is simply this, that one of these evenings when the house is not in session he call together in his office or in his rooms at the Chateau—or over in Hull—a caucus of Liberal members. Every one of us will be able to give him some very illuminating stories of the way some of the Tory organizers go about it. I dare say the right hon. gentleman is not acquainted with such things personally, because usually it is good practice for those leading political parties not to have such knowledge, but when the word "corruption" is brought up we have to get down to the bottom of the matter, and I hope my suggestion will be followed.

In Quebec the clergy have been making a splendid fight against electoral corruption, but in my opinion corruption should be dealt with at other times as well as during elections. I think a start should be made in our churches, universities and schools. Of course it would take a generation or more to educate the people, but it would be well worth while, because after all such things as dishing out whisky to right and left at election time, so that in the end nobody gains anything, should be stopped, and the sooner that is done the better for the respectability of elections and the respectability of politics in Canada. I am quite willing to do my share, as far as that goes.

If I am not mistaken, Mr. Speaker, some hon. member has raised an objection to the construction of a subway under the Lachine canal, which was very much discussed in the by-election in St. Henry on January 17, which resulted in another remarkable victory for the government now in office. It is easy to understand why that subway played such a prominent part in that by-election. The division of St. Henry is in the southwestern section of Montreal. It is cut almost in half by the Lachine canal. It is not the fault of the people who live south of the canal that the canal was constructed; it was the fault of the Lachine rapids and the canal was built because it is impossible for ships to pass through the rapids westward. The people living south of that canal have a great deal of trouble at times to cross over. They have a bridge at Cote St. Paul, a bridge about a mile away at Ville St. Pierre and a bridge about a half or three-quarters of a mile below at Atwater avenue, so it is only natural that the people in that section want a subway to be constructed under that canal. The canal is a federal undertaking, built, I presume, by the federal government or by its predecessor before confederation, and the people living in that district are simply the victims. It seems to me that we might better have spent our money in building that subway instead of giving it out in doles. This is a chance to correct that mistake. I mentioned that matter myself during the by-election, and I sincerely hope that work will be undertaken. This is no new suggestion. The former member for that constituency, Mr. Mercier, worked very hard in that connection also.

Reference has been made as well to the Canadian National terminal in Montreal. Well, that terminal was part of a scheme for the improvement of railway conditions in Montreal, begun by Sir Henry Thornton, involving a good many changes in the location of the tracks and the erection of a station worthy of the metropolis of Canada. Immediately after the election in 1930 work was stopped, we were informed under instructions from Ottawa. I hope the gentlemen who know all the facts in this connection some day will come out in the open and explain exactly what happened and why it happened. If that is done the political fortunes of some people in Montreal will suffer a good deal, but truth will be served. So I hope that some day either in this house or outside of it—it does not matter so long as we are told—we may hear exactly what happened at that time.

My views in connection with that station are simply these: Bonaventure station in Montreal is a sight. You know, the word "sight" may have two or three meanings, and in this case you may take the worst. The Canadian National, in addition to showing a deficit, is of some use to this country, and it should have a decent terminal in Montreal. I believe this matter should be looked at from the point of view of the interests of Canada rather than the selfish interests of Montreal or my constituency. There should be a station at Montreal adequate to take care of the needs of the travelling public. In December, 1936, just before the municipal elections in Montreal, a strong delegation from that city came to Ottawa and interviewed the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe), the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), if I am not mistaken. I was present, together with nearly all the members from the district of Montreal. I gave my views then, but I do not mind giving them again. I believe that station should be built, and moreover I believe it should be built for the Canadian people, not merely for the Canadian National Railways. I may shock some people both here and outside the august precincts of this house, but I believe the Canadian Pacific should have access to that terminal also. The Canadian Pacific is a very large contributor to the upbuilding of this country, and it should be so arranged that a traveller coming to Montreal by way of the Canadian Pacific and wishing to transfer to the Canadian National should be able to do so at the one station.

[Mr. Mallette.]

I believe also, Mr. Speaker, that the terminal should be within easy reach of the harbour and the aviation field. I am sorry that the Montreal airport is so far from the centre of the city. I know it was built by a Liberal administration, but I do not know why it was placed so far away when there are many suitable locations much closer at hand and much more convenient to the travelling public. I was of the opinion that the terminal should be made available also to the automobile bus lines that make Montreal their headquarters, but unfortunately that is impossible now because the Colonial Coach Lines and the Provincial Transport at last are erecting their own terminal opposite the Windsor hotel. We should not let any more opportunities of this kind escape us. Let us go ahead with this work, which is not antagonistic to anybody but is simply in the interests of Canada as a whole. In my humble opinion it is far better to give work to the people of Montreal than to give them the dole.

Yesterday the hon. gentleman who represents Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) presented his views in regard to a famous law in the province of Quebec known as the padlock law. I hold no brief for the government of Quebec; I do not believe they would trust me with a brief anyway, but I will say that it is quite possible that this law is capable of being amended, since it was passed in a hurry and may not be drafted quite properly. At the same time it represents, in a raw way, the point of view of the population of Quebec. Our people do not want communism. They will not have communism. They will fight communism. We believe in democracy; we are satisfied with Liberalism and Conservatism. There are some people who are talking about reorganizing the province along corporative lines, but most of us do not know much about that doctrine, and we are not scared. The matter is being studied by people who know what they are talking about, and when the time comes they will let us know the result of their studies.

The question of repealing the padlock law should be left to the people of Quebec; this government should not exercise its power of disallowance. If a demand comes from a strong section of the people of Quebec then the matter might be considered. However, one of these days the people of Quebec will have an opportunity to say at the polls whether or not they are satisfied with the government that passed that law, and it will be time enough to deal with the matter then. That is my point of view in that connection.

In connection with our views on communism I want to quote from Le Devoir of November 2, 1937. This is an extract from an address given by His Eminence the Cardinal Archbishop of Quebec, speaking at the coliseum in Quebec city. The extract is as follows:

(Translation)

Freedom of speech

Under the mask of freedom of speech we are asked to listen to the most perverse doctors: Sophism and Hypocrisy. Freedom of speech, yes, but not freedom to outrage our social conceptions to insult our traditions, our principles and our religion.

Freedom of speech? Yes, indeed, but as it is practised among honourable people and not among imbeciles or brigands.

Freedom of speech! Are you in favour of freedom of the air? But do you extend that freedom to foreign appliances of war or strategical observation? Do you permit the plague-stricken, the germ-carriers to pollute, under pretext of equality, the pure air that surrounds us? Liberty, quite, but does liberty mean folly, connivance, unbridled licence?

We know very well that in a country like Canada, with such a sparse population, there are many things still to be accomplished. One of them is the abolition of slums in the large cities. The problem may not be a federal one, but sooner or later it may have to be linked up somehow with the Dominion Housing Act. By way of loans the dominion government helps to build houses; it also helps to repair them. Some day it may be called upon to help in some way towards the elimination of slums, and their replacement by decent buildings. In a country such as ours, one of such stupendous size, one in which there is so much unoccupied land, I believe every family should own its own home, and that our legislation should tend in that direction. A better distribution of wealth would do away with communism, and most of the other evils.

The employment commission has finished its work. May I say at this time that in my opinion it did good work, and it is to be hoped that some other agency will continue the good work which has been begun. I am pleased to be in a position to pay my tribute publicly to the men and women connected with the employment commission. In the constituency I have the honour to represent two of the schools for youth have been opened, one at Ste. Genevieve and the other at Macdonald college. We realize that this is just a trial but it is our sincere hope that great good will be the result. Those schools are operated under the Rogers-Bilodeau arrangement, and we hope that they will prove of the greatest possible benefit.

It is remarkable that the establishment of those schools coincides with the recommendations made by the Jeunesse Ouvrière Catholique, all of which can be read in a book entitled Un Moteur et des Ailes, which was written by M. Emile Benoist, at one time a member of the press gallery.

We have been subjected to propaganda from many sources in favour of immigration. I am thankful that in the speech from the throne there is no reference to any immigration program. It seems to me that the time is not yet ripe for it.

The last year and the present year mark the centenary of an important historical event in Canada, namely the rebellions in Upper and Lower Canada. There may be some difference of opinion as to whether or not the men who took up arms should have done so. I for one am convinced that if they were alive today they could have settled a similar dispute without resort to arms. Unfortunately they chose to do otherwise. However, whether or not we share the opinions they held as to the advisability or otherwise of resorting to arms, I think there can be only one stand we can take with respect to men who have been willing to die for their political opinions. Some died and some were hanged. That is the way political offenders were punished in those days.

About this time of the year one hundred years ago my own grandfather was in gaol as a rebel. He was a rebel because he believed in representative institutions for this country. Like many others, he was fighting to obtain what we now enjoy and what we are now trying to retain. The fact that that old gentleman was put in gaol as a rebel because he held those views is something of which I am very proud. I am sorry it has been left to me to be the first to mention the matter in parliament; in my opinion it should have come from higher quarters. But I do not want the descendants of those men who lived in Upper and Lower Canada to think that the heroes of 1837 and 1838 are the forgotten men of 1937 and 1938.

Now, a word as to armaments. The results in by-elections since the session of 1937 have been interpreted, in many quarters, as an unqualified endorsation of the program of this government with respect to national defence. Undoubtedly the electorate has expressed its confidence in the King administration. But please do not think that expenditures for armaments are, of themselves, the first and foremost cause of the popularity of the government. Do not jump to that conclusion. Undoubtedly the people of Canada will consent to sacrifices required for the defence of their national soil. The guarantees given by the Prime Minister and his colleagues during the last session, and given again by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in Lotbiniere and by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) in St. Henry that these expenditures are to be made solely for Canadian defence, have been accepted, because our citizens do not wish to be at the mercy of a coup de main by international hoodlums. But they have been accepted solely on the ground that they are expenditures for the protection of Canadian interests in Canada. Let us make that very clear. There is no desire, as I said before, to join any expedition to acquire oil wells or minerals which may be found elsewhere, in territories which are not British Let us understand that.

Before taking my seat I wish to speak with respect to the budget. The people of Canada are hoping for a balanced national budget. While I am not attempting to give advice to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), who I see smiling in his seat, I shall take this opportunity to place upon Hansard a quotation from one of the works of one of the best known authors. I do so because I believe the quotation, at least to a certain extent, deals with budgets. In the session of 1936 we were given quotations from Carlyle almost every day. In that session Carlyle was certainly the popular author; he was quoted right and left, every day. There were no such quotations in 1937. I shall not quote Carlyle, because I believe the quoting of Carlyle in this chamber should be left entirely to the intelligentsia who ornament the front seats on both sides of this house.

I shall quote from another author whose works are well known not only where English is spoken, but where it is read. We know there are many people who can read a language but who cannot speak it. In plain language this author has been a man of the masses, a man of the people. Had he been in Canada, undoubtedly he would have been a Liberal. The house will understand, of course, that I refer to the well beloved Charles Dickens, and I read a quotation from David Copperfield for the consideration of the house and the special consideration of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. BENNETT: Waiting for something to turn up?

[Mr. Mallette.]

Mr. MALLETTE: The quotation is this:

> My other piece of advice, Copperfield, said Mr. Micawber, you know: Annual income twenty pounds, annual expenditure nineteen nineteen six, result happiness. Annual income twenty pounds, annual expenditure twenty pounds ought and six, result misery. The blossom is blighted, the leaf is withered, the God of day goes down upon the dreary scene and—and in short you are forever floored.

I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate my neighbour, the hon. member who sits beside me (Mr. Mallette) upon his remarks and reiterate what he said with regard to the lighting in this part of the chamber. I thank him for the kind remarks he has made about the fifth row. I have no doubt that he was referring to this part of the chamber when he made mention of the intelligentsia. I should like also to congratulate the mover and seconder of the motion for and address in reply to the speech from the throne upon the manner in which they have conducted themselves. They have shown themselves worthy of the honour conferred upon them.

It has been gratifying to note that a further recovery has taken place during the past year in the trade of Canada. However, this increased trade does not seem to have brought about an appreciable improvement in the standard of living of our people. Improved conditions were noticeable up to October of last year, but they did not continue for the last three months of the year. Evidently we are following in the footsteps of the United States. If that country cannot stop itself going into a business tailspin, I hope we in Canada will be able to do so.

There is no doubt that the depression in the United States caused the dumping of a great deal of surplus stock into Canada at Christmas time. There has been an increase of $112,000 in the imports into Toronto alone for the month of January this year. Increased imports have affected our domestic production by way of diminished sales. The speech from the throne states that there will be an extension and revision of the trade agreement with the United States. I think any further concessions that it is contemplated we should give, should be very carefully considered by the government, in view of the fact that the unemployment situation in the United States is much worse than it is in Canada, they having some 10,000,000 workers unemployed at the present time. We must also remember that the average rate of duty on all imports into Canada in 1937 was only 13·7 per cent. The average rate of duty on imports into the United States was 60 per cent. Even with the full reduction of 50 per cent which they are permitted to make, the average rate of duty would still be 30 per cent or 16 per cent higher than ours.

The population of my riding of St. Paul's is made up to a large extent of the finest type of industrial worker. They are dependent upon industry for their livelihood. At the present time considerable apprehension exists as to what action will be taken in respect to the lowering of our tariffs. This feeling of insecurity and uncertainty has had an adverse effect on business generally. If the government contemplates lowering tariffs it seems to me that it is only fair that the men in charge of our industries and the workers should be so advised and consulted. If not, they should have such knowledge. The heads of industries with extensive capital investment and payrolls of millions of dollars find themselves without knowledge of the negotiations with which to prepare a case for their industry against further tariff concessions to any outside country.

One class of industry in which some of my constituents are employed has a payroll of $25,000,000. A manufacturer of this class on which so many of my constituents depend for a livelihood has a well managed concern and pays highest wages. A reduction in the tariff might jeopardize this industry and the livelihood of many of my constituents. If there was a cessation or reduction in wages the wives and families of these workers would be seriously affected. This industry purchased $2,000,000 worth of raw materials from Australia and $3,000,000 worth from New Zealand. These purchases constituted 24 per cent of Canada's purchases from Australia and 58 per cent of the purchases from New Zealand. In addition this industry purchased manufactured products from other industries in Canada to the extent of many millions of dollars. Surely the heads of such an industry should have some intimation as to what is to be done with respect to tariffs. Profits have been too small to absorb the additional costs, due to a decreased output which would follow a tariff reduction.

The desire of labour is security based on a steady annual wage and continuous employment. A basis of factory production calculated to eliminate unsteady employment must of necessity be founded upon confidence in tariffs remaining established for a reasonable length of time. There are other classes of industries throughout the country, upon the continuous operation of which the industrial workers depend for their living, they and their wives and families. It is only through continuous employment that a higher standard of living can be obtained—and it must be obtained. There should be more cooperation between governments and industry and business in general. This is absolutely necessary at least for the sake of the workers.

No mention has been made in the speech from the throne of any social legislation other than that with regard to unemployment insurance. When we consider the consequences, both economic and humanitarian, with respect to slums and the lack of low cost housing, as borne out by facts, and the experience of countries of the older lands in this respect, we can understand it only as the laissez-faire policy of the government. What is to become of those unfortunates who through no fault of their own cannot earn enough with which to pay the rent of a decent home?

What about social legislation? The great social service of preventive medicine is functioning to try to keep them healthy and has kept thousands living, but no effort is indicated on the part of the government to help them, now that they are living, to make themselves happy and good citizens.

Something must be done. It is no wonder that we have communism and many other "isms" in this country. The stability of a country arises out of the home. Our people must be made home-minded so that their children may be given the opportunity of becoming good Canadian citizens. I intend to say a word or two on this matter later on. I intend to do all I can to eliminate the conditions which one sees to-day.

On November 15, 1937, an order in council was passed making the outport of West Toronto a port. This order was to become effective on January 1, 1938. Up to the time of the passing of this order in council no public body or organization in the city of Toronto, so far as I know, had been consulted. Perhaps the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) thought that this radical change was of so little importance to the city of Toronto as to be not worth bothering much about.

I do not wish to decry the immediate estimated saving of some ten or twenty thousand dollars by the elimination of duplicate reporting or the like, for I think that is meritorious. But in passing I would ask, will there be a saving, when one considers the perquisites of a growing baby? And how, babies grow! Are two head offices cheaper to maintain than a head office and a branch? I do not see how that is possible. I do not wish to discuss now the merits or demerits of the case, but a principle is involved. The board of trade of Toronto had knowledge of the order in council some time after November 15, and they wrote the minister on December 3, setting out their case. The minister's reply was dated December 8.

The board again wrote on December 23, setting forth further arguments and requesting that until certain information in reply to questions asked of the minister had been made known to the public, the matter be left in abeyance. I shall take the opportunity at some future date of reading these questions. The minister replied on December 30, refusing that request. The board of control also wired the minister on December 29, making a similar request.

There are organizations of public-spirited citizens in Toronto, such as the mayor and board of control, the board of trade, and the Toronto industrial commission, who are only too glad to give the benefit of their counsel when asked. There are also members of parliament representing the city of Toronto.

The request made by the city council and the board of trade was, I think, a reasonable one, and it should not have been cast aside as of no value. I think they have a better opportunity to appreciate the effect of such a change as this. That is their job. I think that a city of the size and importance of Toronto has a right to more consideration, cooperation and confidence in a matter of such import.

Now a word about broadcasting. Is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation making itself an agency for encouraging the very thing which it was created to discourage, that is, the extension of radio advertising, and particularly of advertising which does not originate in Canada? To encourage such advertising has an adverse effect upon Canadian enterprise through making the corporation's facilities available to American advertisers at rates which a commercial enterprise could not begin to consider. If this is so, it seems to be a serious misuse of public revenues and credit.

Does not the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation take an entirely unjustified advantage of the daily press by promoting Sunday advertising? If a newspaper published a special Sunday edition, it would be promptly prosecuted. I understand that by the radio corporation's activities some $200,000 worth of newspaper and periodical advertising has been seriously affected. Has it been considered what effect this will have on labour, on employment?

Occasional features which have been introduced by the broadcasting corporation are satisfactory; but where does the $1,500,000 revenue from licence fees go? And where will the extra $750,000 go?—and it may be $1,500,000 extra, when one takes into account the taxing of duplicate sets.

The reception is no better for the vast majority of listeners, and the programs are no better than they were.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the money obtained in licence fees should go for the improvement of Canadian programs and Canadian information, and if necessary Canadian advertising, and to help develop Canadian talent—that is, if the licence fee is to be collected at all.

Our democracy has not failed, but it is not functioning properly. Corruption must be eliminated, or democracy will fail. I cannot let this opportunity pass without drawing attention to the danger. The democratic countries of the world to-day are the only countries in which freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of religion and personal liberty remain.

We in Canada have the privilege of living in a democracy, but if we are to continue to enjoy that privilege the people of this country must realize the obligations they have in return for that privilege.

The man who comes in smiling like a Cheshire cat on election day, after voting, and says, "Well, I have done my duty," has only exercised his privilege; but has he realized the obligation he has for the privileges he enjoys under our democracy? We are supposed to have government of the people, for the people, by the people.

One of the troubles to-day is the apathy of the public with respect to current politics in this country. People say: I don't take part in politics because it is such a dirty game. If this be true, who let it get that way? Apathy on the part of the public—no realization of their obligations. We have a great many problems which are more or less taken for granted by the public and are very little understood, but which we are told are to be solved by governments.

The public must take an active interest in politics, without remuneration, not for the sake of patronage, but in defence of democratic principles, as a part of their obligations, if democracy is to survive.

What are governments for? Lord Baldwin has said that the consensus of opinion is that governments are for the attainment by the people of the highest degree of well-being and virtue.

How many people realize that for every dollar they spend in Canada they get less than sixty cents value, the balance being taken in taxes in some form or other? When governments pay, it all comes out of the pockets of the people, either in taxes or in reduced wages. Why is it that people who are generally thrifty in the management of their own domestic affairs, when it comes to public matters seem to think that governments are Christmas trees for money to be picked from?

Governments are always influenced by votes, and votes come from people with varying degrees of intelligence. Some say that the franchise is too wide. Be that as it may, it is a fact, not a theory, and we cannot alter it. It is therefore necessary for those with a certain degree of intelligence to inform and influence those who are not so intelligent, and in turn to be influenced by those with greater intelligence. Votes should not be influenced in any way except by reason, if democracy is to survive. It is the public's obligation to inform themselves accurately upon the various aspects of the problems coming before them; in other words, to take an intelligent interest in public life. It is the duty of members of parliament, and of the press, to inform their public accurately and truthfully. If one reads the history of the decline of the Athenian democracy, one must realize that it was brought about by just the same conditions as exist today,—patronage, apathy, and leave-it-to-George. In the words of the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, now Lord Baldiwn of Bewdley:

> The Greeks talked incessantly of equalities and butchered each other for it;
> We are not quite as bad as that yet.
> . . . of freedom, and lived on the labour of slaves. Freedom of speech was stifled and public men who refused to advocate pleasures for the multitude were banished. Politicians rivalled one another in bribing the electorate. There was an unemployment problem and a policy of public works, payment to jurymen, free seats at the theatres. Those who had triumphed over tyrants in turn became despotic. Those who had been oppressed became in turn oppressors. Those who had denounced luxury and idleness in individuals succumbed to the temptations of riches when shared out by the state and by and by Plutarch records that the Athenians from being a sober and thrifty and self supporting people, turned into lovers of expense, intemperance and license.

The attitude in this country taken by some institutions and businesses in frowning on the activities of their employees in politics for fear of the effect it might have with respect to themselves on the party in power, the unconscious coercion they feel, is to say the least bad for democracy; it is not democracy functioning. Our democracy is worth fighting for. The peace of the world is not attacked by democracy. Another of the difficulties encountered in attempting a solution of our problems is the lack of confidence and the suspicion existing between institutions, labour, industry and departments of government. I am sure that a closer cooperation and frankness is necessary for a better feeling of security throughout the country. I plead that every effort be put forth to preserve our democracy and make Canada the best place in the world in which to live. A real effort is necessary and a lot of hard work and effort by us all.

I support the amendment.

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): It was not my intention to participate in this debate, but having listened to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) I felt I could not remain silent, in the face of the charges he has brought into this house. The words of the hon. gentleman indicate that there has come into his possession evidence of irregularities and corruption in the matter of government contracts. He contended that certain amounts of money were being levied on contractors. He said that he could produce evidence in so far as Canadian National Railway contracts were concerned. Apparently many people in this country are being compelled by means of such levies to contribute to funds for political purposes, resulting in corrupt practices.

Today I directed a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and I regret to say that I cannot believe the answer is satisfactory to members of this house. It seems to me that there are other ways and means of getting at the truth of this matter than those enumerated by the leader of the government, and I suggest to him that a committee of this house should be instructed to investigate the matter. It is not necessary to appoint a new committee. Under the rules of the house we have a standing committee on privileges and elections, and a reference by the government to that committee would compel the leader of the opposition to make good the charges he has made in this house. In my belief it is absolutely necessary that we should do that. If the matter is allowed to remain in its present position a stigma will be left on this house, a stigma that should be removed, and I feel sure that all hon. members will join me in demanding that a proper investigation of these charges be made.

So far as we in the province of Alberta are concerned, our people pay for our election; they elect us themselves, and we are responsible to them. We were under the impression that the old ward politicians' tactics of the past had more or less disappeared. It seems to me we have no other course than to see that these charges are thoroughly investigated. We do not believe for one moment that any leader of a political party in this country would knowingly permit such a thing to go on; rather it is done by supporters of political parties without the knowledge of the leaders of those parties, and undoubtedly it will be the desire of the leaders concerned to have this matter threshed out. I noticed that when, the other day, the charges were made by the leader of the opposition, hon. members, and particularly the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) were quick to resent the accusations. It was said that Canadian National Railway contracts had been tampered with. The Minister of Transport would certainly be the first to wish to know whether such things have been going on. I do not believe any cabinet minister, past or present, would knowingly permit such practices; therefore the matter should certainly be looked into.

I might add that our young people can have no faith in our institutions if matters of this kind are to be hushed up and passed over. It is our duty to act in such a way as to build up their faith in our institutions. Is it possible to do so if, knowing that a member of this house is in possession of documents which prove political or electoral corruption, we allow those documents to remain unseen and unknown? It is quite true that it is possible for an individual to put up a deposit of a thousand dollars or some such sum in order to have charges of corruption brought before the proper authority. It seems to me that, of all people in this country, the man who made the charges is best able to produce the thousand dollars. But whether that is so or not, there is no reason why the thing should be done in that manner. The house possesses the necessary facilities to investigate this matter, and in my opinion an investigation should be made.

There will be an occasion later on, I am sure, to touch upon the various subjects mentioned in the speech from the throne. When those subjects are brought down will be the time, in my opinion, to express approval or disapproval of what the measures contemplate. My sole purpose in rising is to say that if we remain silent with respect to the charges to which I have alluded we shall be guilty of connivance in regard to the things which are said to have taken place. I do not believe it is the desire of any hon. member that such a condition should prevail.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I had not intended to take part in this debate, and I am simply filling in on behalf of the opposition. I wish to say a few words, as representing the man on the street, to the man in the cabinet. I looked over the speech from the throne and I am very much disappointed that nothing more satisfactory has been presented to parliament, at a time when we have so many roving commissions, travelling like minstrel shows all over Canada. Provided they could sing a bit and blacken their faces they would be more successful as minstrels than they are as political commissions, which get nowhere and are appointed for no other reason than to postpone action by the government of the day on questions with which they will not deal.

I realize that it is the function and duty of the opposition often to criticize the government of the day. We as an opposition are disappointed. I realize that the cabinet consists of some very able men, and that we have a government of Canadians. But realizing this I regret to say that in the speech from the throne the man on the street, the large number of people on relief, and the municipalities that are finding the burden of taxation on real estate becoming intolerable, are very much disappointed that something of a practical nature has not been done. In this country with its vast resources, if we solved the problem of distribution, there should be no one starving. But there is not a word in the speech from the throne about this great problem of distribution. In fact I am surprised that the speech from the throne was not delivered in the debating society of the university of Toronto or the mock parliament at McGill.

In passing I wish to congratulate the Commonwealth of Australia on its 150th anniversary. I should like to see a delegation from Canada visit our sister dominion on this occasion. They have decided that Australia for all time shall be a white man's country. They do not believe in separatism. They realize that an armed Britain is the greatest defence of the peace of the world, that Britain stands as trustee for the peace of the civilized world.

Lord Milner once said that money-bags are proverbially short-sighted. Our money-bags were short-sighted when they called for the appointment of the Rowell commission. I have a high regard for Chief Justice Rowell. I believe if he were a one-man commission the results would be better. But I do not believe in these commissions at all. It seems that this government believes that a commission a day keeps the unemployed away; that appears to be the principle on which all these roving commissions are appointed. The members of this parliament might as well all go home; owing to these commissions we have no powers, we cannot force anything to a vote. Our powers are taken away and handed over to the house of Rowell and Dafoe, of whom the latter, from what I have known of him as a free trader and his stand on the grain trade and other matters has been one of the chief foes, on some questions of the prairie provinces. Last session and the session before I brought to the attention of the house my submission that constitutional and parliamentary and law reform was one of the most important matters before parliament. The government said they were going to appoint a commission. I wish to take issue with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in regard to his statement that the chairman of that commission is a judicial officer. That point was raised in the Gamey-Stratton case. Sitting in the city hall in Toronto were Chancellor Boyd and Chief Justice Falconbridge, and it was decided that as members of that commission those gentlemen were no longer judges, they were not entitled to the title given them in the law courts, they were just commissioners, and were called Mr. Chairman or Mr. Commissioner.

There are too many of these judges leaving the bench. Hon. members will remember the customs scandal some years ago when three judges, Mr. Justice Roy of Quebec, Mr. Justice Brown of Regina and Mr. Justice Wright of Toronto went up and down this country for a year and nine months, leaving their judicial duties. The work of the courts in Ontario is becoming congested today; several judges have died and others are out on these roving commissions.

The time has come when parliament should regain its powers. I agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) in what he said about this matter, that the government of the day, with so many Liberal governments in power in the provinces, should have settled these matters sitting around a table with them. I do not agree with what has been said in praise of the work of the fathers of confederation in the British North America Act, far from it. I believe they were the most short-sighted body of men that ever got together in a room at any time anywhere. Look at the resulting provincial situation. There never should have been any provincial legislatures. I wish to speak of the fathers of confederation with respect, but when we see the way they launched these provincial legislatures on the country it is difficult to admire them. They do not have all these governments in Great Britain. The result of having them here is that we have overtaxation and overgovernment. We have 10,000,000 people; Great Britain has 47,000,000, but they get along with one government there. They did not have state legislatures in Australia until recently. The confederation act should be recast. That is what I understood this Rowell commission was appointed for, but now we find that it is a roving omnibus commission on everything. I noticed the members of the commission around Ottawa for some time and now I read that they have gone east. But wise men come from the east. The star of this commission is in its decline. The municipalities have simply been humbugged in submitting briefs to it. The commission had the former German chancellor here to advise them, probably Gandhi will be the next witness called by them.

Royal commissions are a favourite resort of the present federal government for postponing action when action is imperatively required. Take the burden of taxation on real estate; are we to wait three or four years before getting relief from that? There is the prison commission, the textile commission, the commission about automobiles, the tariff commission; it seems to go around in a circle, but no relief comes to the unemployed. Now it is proposed we should have a new flag. Let us get rid of the black flag first. The unemployed and the farmers on relief do not want reports of a commission when they see the black flag flying in front of their houses and are put out on the street; they have the facts. So have the returned men who fought for men in and out of this house. This commission will achieve nothing. I had a big pile of books that I threw away the other day, reports of various commissions made since I have been a member of the house. They will achieve nothing—that is why they are appointed—except a boost from the corporation press. They are only advisory in any event, and as soon as the advice is given it will be discarded and the report pigeonholed. The Prime Minister said they were appointed to get the facts, but they will find out nothing that the country does not know already. They may well be described as a minstrel troupe. Some of the briefs that have been handed in are made up from pamphlets and booklets and government reports as old as this country. They are a commission in a Pickwickian sense—with apologies to Pickwick.

In all common sense, if we view the situation, everything depends upon the instructions which have been given by the government of the day. The personnel of these commissions has been chosen for political purposes and political expediency; the interests of the people are being overlooked, just at a time when action is needed on many important matters. For instance, to-morrow a deputation of mayors is coming to Ottawa to interview the government.

Ten years ago the leader of the Progressive party and I proposed that one-third of the cost of relief should be borne by the dominion, one-third by the province and one-third by the municipality. That system was tried out and found to be practical. I think we were right then; I still think so. As my leader has said, if the Liberal premiers had sat around a table for stocktaking they would have obtained far better results. Sickness and unemployment insurance was part of the Liberal platform of 1921. If there had been a round table conference that question could have been dealt with satisfactorily, instead of having these commissions act according to the expediency of the moment.

In England today, Mr. Speaker, they have a radical government, although it is called Conservative. They have had a survey made and they are going to nationalize the coal mines. Not very long ago we appointed the Tory commission to investigate our coal question. The chairman, I always thought, was Tory in name only, and I was sure of that when I read his report, which deals with everything except the spread in price from $5.25 a ton in 1905 to $14.50 last year. The report says nothing about a national coal supply. With the cold weather we have in Canada and the way our resources are being squandered the next generation is going to face a scarcity of coal. Conservation is one of the most important things in this country. I should like to see not a report issued by a royal commission but a survey made by the government towards the end of nationalizing the coal mines of this country. It is only during the last seventy-five years that science has discovered the power inherent in coal, oil and falling water. We have nationalized the falling water, from which we obtain light, power and transportation. This country is the richest in the world in power, possessing 42,000,000 horse-power, of which only one-sixth or 7,000,000 horse-power have been developed. The water supply in our municipalities has been nationalized, but that is as far as we have gone. When I first came into the house I suggested that our oil should be nationalized so that a pipe line might bring Alberta oil to the people of the country. The nationalization of the coal mines in England, which is expected to be consummated by the summer of 1942, will cost the mother country $332,250,000. The commission we appointed, with all its experts, did nothing.

Back in 1922 and 1923, when I proposed a national coal policy for this country so that the fuel consumed in Canada would be mined under the British flag, whether in Wales or Alberta or the maritime provinces, I was laughed at. I proposed a system of bonuses, subventions and subsidies. There was laughter and ridicule in the house, but at last that suggestion was adopted, and today two million tons of coal are being moved economically from the maritime provinces to the head of the lakes. We can thank the leader of the opposition for supporting that policy and putting it into practical effect. Now I want to see a report made along the lines I have suggested.

I do not see the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) in the house. A few years ago I called his attention to the question of income tax. After it was discovered in Washington that Mr. Pierpont Morgan, the Van Sweringens of Cleveland, and other wealthy people paid no income tax, I asked the minister if he would not consider having an inquiry into the matter of income tax here, but he never even answered my question. Now, if you ask me, again he has been weighed in the balance and found wanting as a minister in his treatment of customs matters in Toronto. Over the protests of the mayor, the city council, the board of trade and other civic bodies, and over the heads of government supporters from Toronto, his department has gone to work and divided the port of Toronto, causing great chaos in that city. I believe it is the duty of a minister of the crown to consult local people in connection with a public utility of this kind. I am not saying anything about the ability of the minister, far from it. I have no personal quarrel with him. I believe he has a hard department to handle, but I was sorry to see him take that action without consulting the people interested.

On more than one occasion, Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill with regard to newspapers. I am surprised at the way this parliament is treated by the Canadian press. Turn to any of our leading newspapers and you will find four or five pages about some prize fighter; there will be great ballyhoo about professional athletes of all kinds, but you will see only about a column or so devoted to the House of Commons and the problems that concern this country. I am afraid the press of Canada are following the press of England. The only independent newspaper they had over there that would speak out for the empire was the Morning Post, and now it has lost its identity, having been sold to the Telegraph. I am free to admit, as I said in speaking to my newspaper bill, that in peace and war alike the press do fine work, but in the present condition of affairs in Canada I believe it is the duty of the press to support the government when right as far as possible and do what they can to educate the people in connection with public affairs. I think that is a duty the newspapers owe to the people of this country, in these days of stress through which we are passing.

I have referred to the question of direct relief and the high tax rate that it has brought about. To-day no one wants to own real estate. Millions of dollars of additional taxes for relief have been placed on Toronto real estate, and I do not know how the people are going to carry on. Of the Toronto tax rate four or five mills are devoted to the care of the unemployed, the ill and the suffering, although a federal burden. Speaking of the sick, parliament spends about three and a half million dollars on the health of animals, but what about human health? We have had epidemics of infantile paralysis; we have many other diseases that are widespread; yet all we spend on public health is $442,000 out of $600,000,000. The other day we read in the press about a poor woman in Nova Scotia who was very ill during childbirth. A doctor tried to reach her but, through no fault of his own, was unable to save her life. When we read such things in the newspapers, and see the very high death rate from different diseases we should realize that the time has come when, instead of having a national skeleton health department, we should have one that will be adequate to take care of this most important work. I hope parliament will take a forward step in this connection.

I hope the Department of Labour will bring forward within the very near future some plan which will provide index figures for families with incomes under $1,200, with the cost of food, rent and other expenses. The minister is continually tinkering with his relief bill, so that the municipalities do not know where they stand. I am asking for a stable policy. The people do not want relief; they want work.

There has been mention of the government's policy of defence. I hope that some day in Canada we may have a generation of Canadians who will think far enough ahead to save Canada by careful preparation rather than by wasteful and bloody sacrifice such as we have known before. In its defence policy the present government has done everything by fits and starts, and has done nothing right. An armed Britain is the greatest security we can have for the peace of the world. We are not dependent upon the Monroe doctrine or upon a pan-American doctrine. If we were we would have cause to be sorry some day.

We must depend upon an armed Britain because we have practically no air force, no fleet and only a very small armament. In many ways Canada is in grave danger to-day. On the other hand many of the proposed expenditures are wasteful. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) is not in his seat, but speaking at the St. Henry by-election on January 12, he said, according to reports in the Quebec and Ontario press:

> Our outlay for armaments is only seven per cent of our national budget, a modest expenditure. Some of our cannons are very venerable; much of our artillery is still drawn by horses. We must modernize, and that is just what we are doing.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) proposed to complete the building of the Canadian National station. Further, he agreed to take away level crossings. I do not blame him for making those promises, when speaking in a by-election contest. At the same time, speaking as the acting-Minister of Public Works to-day, he should have realized that from Niagara-on-the-Lake to Queenston and Lewiston and lake Erie to Chippawa the Niagara river is a navigable stream, and it is the duty of the government to have ice-breakers to keep it in proper condition. The ice could have been regulated, just as it is regulated on the St. Lawrence river. However, I sometimes think the minister does not want to do anything for Ontario. It is all right to spend huge sums, millions of dollars, for development in the Richelieu river canal, but when it comes to protecting power companies on the Niagara river in Ontario, which are owned by the municipalities or by the province, from this great danger, he has not a cent to offer.

In my view one of the results of the rise of dictatorships has been the silencing of pacifists the world over. If any people could be held responsible for bringing the British Empire almost to the verge of destruction, they are the ones. However for the last while we have not heard much from them. I hope some steps may now be taken to tell the country something about Canada's defence policy. What is Canada's defence policy? Does anybody know what it is? No, nobody knows. I have been trying to find out what member of the government is in charge of Canada's external affairs and foreign policy. The present government appears to object to the constitutional, traditional principle whereby all questions of Canada's foreign policy and the administration of its external affairs and of this great trust must be put before the House of Commons by the government in power. Will we have opportunity to challenge some of the actions of our government?

It is all very well to be dependent upon the United States, but may I point out that in the August, 1937, issue of the English Review there has been a criticism of that policy:

> We have recently seen a great push in favour of the American trade agreement. "What is our trade with the dominions compared to what our trade with the United States might be?" is the slogan, and we are adjured in many quarters to drop the substance of preference for the shadow of American goodwill. It is just as well for us to remember the occasions since the war when we have altered our policy in the hope of pleasing Americans of the United States. The first of these was the establishment of the league of nations as part of the Treaty of Versailles. We agreed to this at the behest of President Wilson; France only consented on condition that Great Britain and the United States of America gave her a joint guarantee of security. The ink was hardly dry upon the parchments when the United States of America refused to honour President Wilson's signature, and alike repudiated the Versailles Treaty, the guarantee of security, and the league of nations. The next great change in our policy "to please the Americans" was at Washington in 1922, when we abandoned our alliance with the Japanese, who had been our invaluable and faithful allies for nearly twenty years. The result is the loss of Japanese support and friendship, but no gain in America of either. One more notable instance of the pursuit of American goodwill and failure to attain it was seen in the Irish Treaty. We were told by the promoters of this affair that "if only we would give way in Ireland" to the gunmen who had been murdering the British "the last resentment of America against us would die away." We gave way to the gunmen. Ireland is more embittered than ever and the United States of America just as unfriendly. This new proposal comes from a set of people who will join with any project likely to damage this country. In this case the motive force is Gold. America buys gold, South Africa produces large quantities yearly, Canada and Russia are also gold producers. The power behind the movement to get us into an American treaty is the power of the gold producers, backed by the gold manipulators of the world. They want us to buy American goods in order that she may buy their gold.

That is from a leading review in England, and is written by a great man.

[Mr. Church.]

With respect to the Anglo-American pact may I say that I am not one of those Conservatives who on all occasions wishes to apologize for this party's action in defeating reciprocity in 1911. Reciprocity in those days would have made a Lazarus out of every man in Canada, and of a country that Laurier had said he made a nation, just as it would have made a Lazarus out of every returned man who fought at Amiens, Vimy Ridge or any other field of Canadian glory.

I am not in favour of handing over our own market to the Americans or to any other people. I believe in the policy of Joseph Chamberlain, that great man who introduced in 1906 the policy of imperial preference. Had those policies been carried out thirty years ago we would not have had the war which broke out in 1914.

The British trade agreement was ably secured by the present leader of the opposition in 1932, which gives him the leading place in history. By bringing about the Ottawa agreements the present leader of the opposition in that year made the dream of Joseph Chamberlain come true. What did the present Prime Minister in England have to say about it at the Conservative convention there. He said that as a result of that treaty the trade from the dominions to the motherland had increased by 41 per cent, and the trade from the motherland to the dominions had increased by 46 per cent. There had been a corresponding increase in international trade. That was the result of the treaty which was made by my right hon. leader, and which was thus twice blest. Are we going to give up the advantages we gained from it over to the United States? Certainly we are not going to give it up for something that is uncertain.

The Anglo-American treaty is not commercial. Rather it is a political treaty brought forward in an effort to gain support for the government. A very fine gesture has been made by President Roosevelt. It was a gesture to try to get out of the supreme court difficulty. It is well known that he is in wrong with the cotton growers of the south and the farmers of the middle west, with respect to his new deal policy. It will be just a political treaty and will last only three years as the Republicans have announced that they will abrogate it if they are returned to power. Australia and New Zealand are looking at this proposed treaty with a great deal of doubt.

When I look at the counters in the departmental stores in Toronto I can see why our home market is ruined with goods there from foreign countries. Canada is being made a dumping ground for cheap and shoddy goods from about thirty countries of the world to the loss of our steady home market. The result is that no home market exists. I stand where I stood thirty years ago on the Conservative platform, our own work for our own workmen and our own markets for our own products. That is as true today as it was then.

This Anglo-American treaty is not a commercial treaty; it is political in all its aspects. We should make every effort to see that its terms are not carried out. Are we going to make a similar mistake and enter into the same sort of haphazard treaty? Are we going to enter into a treaty which will do more harm than good? If we do we will soon see the mistake we have made on the war debt policy. Canada is a commercial country; England is a commercial country, and the British Empire is a commercial empire. Our problems are commercial and it is the duty of our statesmen to draw closer the commercial ties between the various parts of the empire. That is what our statesmen should be doing instead of giving away their markets to the United States or clamouring over the strife in Europe.

This government must decide its attitude toward industry. Is industry in this country to be fettered and bound? Industry should be run by those who understand it, not by a lot of amateurs and university professors who sit on the different commissions. I object to too much interference by the state in the conduct of business. At the same time, I believe that labour should be given a larger share of the profits and rewards of industry.

To go back to this Anglo-American treaty. The senate of the United States may take away from the president the power he possesses now to make these agreements.

I am glad the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is in the chamber as I have something I should like to draw to his attention. I am much concerned over the great loss of life in motor accidents. A committee of the House of Lords was appointed to look into this question and after it had made its report it was found that the number of accidents in Great Britain decreased considerably. The time has come when we should make an effort to stop this loss of life. A committee of this house should be appointed to inquire into this matter. If we were to put up wooden crosses for those who have lost their lives and those who have been injured in Canada during the past five years we would not have room to place them outside the parliament buildings even though they were put only two inches apart.

The time has come when the people of this country expect results from the party system. Unless we get busy, no one knows what will happen in 1940. I have been told by some that there will be an election this year, while others have said there will not. Who will win then? That reminds me of the battle of Dundee where some said, "we ran," others said, "they ran" and others said, "nobody ran." Unless the government get busy they will hear from the working people of this country.

The British dominions are being threatened by this proposed agreement. This Anglo-American treaty is more political than commercial. It is one of the results of the European situation and the race in rearming. We have lost two of our best allies in Italy and Japan and this is one of the results of our diplomatic reverses. This gesture is being made toward the United States as the result of the foreign policy of Great Britain. For generations the policy has been that trade should follow the flag, but that seems to have been thrown overboard. This treaty will destroy empire preference and empire cooperation and union. We are taking a backward step in the matter of preference from the steps taken in the days of Joseph Chamberlain, Sir John Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier. This is a heading that appeared in the Washington Post of November 17, 1937:

> Trade Treaty Between U.S. and Britain is Imminent
> Call to Negotiations Due Momentarily in Reply to Fascist Moves
> Political Meaning to Rival Economic

This agreement will destroy the structure of the Ottawa agreements. It means a breaking of faith with India and the other members of the empire.

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, upon perusing very carefully the speech from the throne the one thing that struck me was its vagueness. It would appear that the Liberal party, now that they have attained power, have lost many of those fine qualities of which they spoke so glibly in their days of opposition. I have made a point in the last few days of going through some old Hansards, and I find that in the Liberal party there are many extremists; but that was when they were in opposition. That was when they were appealing to the electorate. But not now—that is all forgotten.

The question of trade has been dealt with, and some indication given of new agreements to be made. It was said in this house the other day, or at least implied, that the social credit people do not value trade. Let me say here and now that we have never minimized the value of trade. We recognize its value, but we also recognize the unnatural restrictions on trade because of the shortage of purchasing power in the hands of consumers in every part of the world. We do not, however, look upon trade as a solution of our economic ills. We do not believe that a market in Japan for Canadian goods is of greater value than a market in Canada. It is our belief that the people of Canada should be fed first, that they should have access to the goods that can be produced in such abundance in this country.

Living conditions in this country have not improved since this government came into power to the extent they would have us believe by their jubilant speeches made across this country in the recent by-elections. We would probably have more sympathy with the government if it was through their efforts that trade had been increased, and if commodities which have been sold in greater volume had been natural commodities, commodities that were going to add to the happiness and health and wealth of the peoples of the world. But I say, Mr. Speaker, that the goods which have been shipped out of this country, and which are responsible for the slight increase in production and some semblance of prosperity, have been metals to be used for armament purposes. I think it is a terrible price for the Canadian consumer to pay, in order that he may have a job to-day and perhaps one to-morrow, that we should better our conditions by supplying Japan with war materials which to-morrow may be used to shoot down and destroy Canadian youth. If that is the only kind of trade we can depend upon, if that is the only way we can have brief prosperity, then I say the price is too great.

There is one subject I want to discuss in the short time at my disposal, and that is the attitude of this government with regard to the province of Alberta. What we have endeavoured and are endeavouring to accomplish there at the present time is exactly what was advocated by the present Prime Minister when he was appealing to the electorate in 1935—to issue credit in terms of public need. The difference, however, is that we meant what we said but the Prime Minister did not, or probably the Prime Minister did not have the same public in mind. I know that the people of western Canada, and I have travelled over it extensively in the past year, have not been the beneficiaries of any new financial policy. I have seen no credit in their hands. The only credit they have is real credit; that is, the ability to work, the ability to construct; but they have never had the opportunity of applying that all-important financial credit to their real credit in order that they may enjoy the wealth of the Dominion of Canada.

The province of Alberta brought down to the legislature three measures that were passed by the house but were disallowed by this government. I wonder what this Liberal government is going to do about the padlock law of Quebec. Is there one rule for the west and another for the east? Is Quebec privileged? The difference, Mr. Speaker, is that the padlock law was going to close up and destroy those organizations which had banded themselves together for the express purpose of making their way out of their terrible conditions.

It struck me as rather strange the other day when I read in the press of a minister speaking in Quebec about communism. Last year I attended a public meeting in this city where again they expressed their horror of communism. I fear communism far less than I fear the laissez-faire policies of the Liberal government, because communism is the cause of nothing; it is an effect. I am not defending it. I am not a communist, but I believe that in a democracy every section of society has the right to express its opinion and the right to enjoy the same privileges as anybody else. They have the right to be wrong. I look upon the padlock law of Quebec as the first step towards a fascist state. There has been no effort made on the part of this government to disallow that law, but it moved with great rapidity to disallow the Alberta legislation. Of course, the difference was that the measures we proposed were against that all-powerful organization, the money organization.

May I, Mr. Speaker, ask the Liberal government to give us at least some indication of when they are going to bring down some measure of monetary reform and tell us when they are going to issue credit in terms of public need? We still have thousands of unemployed people in this country; we still have thousands of our fellow-citizens living under deplorable conditions while at the same time we have available all kinds of building material, all kinds of human labour and all kinds of machines, and at a time when there is no question about the need for better conditions. Unfortunately the Liberal government has not yet issued credit in terms of public need. I say again this year, as I did last year, that if you are depending upon trade agreements and expanding markets to bring about prosperity, God help the people of Canada. I question the sincerity of the Liberal government. When I saw the Prime Minister come into this chamber on the first day leading with pride the new Liberal members, I thought it might have been more appropriate if the leader of the opposition had led them in, because I have always contended that the present leader of the opposition was the leader of the Liberal party, since it was through his failures that they got where they are. On the other hand it is just as true, I think that the Prime Minister is the leader of the Conservative party, because it is through the failures of this government that the Conservative party will go back again.

Mr. STEWART: Fifty-fifty.

Mr. POOLE: The other day the leader of the opposition, turning in the direction of the Prime Minister, said something to this effect, "I do not see any great difference between your policy and the policy which I pursued." I agree. The only difference between them is the height of the tariff wall. They have never yet dealt with a real issue; and if this speech from the throne is any indication of their activities this coming year, the Canadian people can expect no great measure of reform from the Liberal government.

At the beginning of my address I said that in the Liberal party there were extremists. I find in Hansard of February 1, 1934, at a time when the Liberal party sat to the left of the Speaker, the following extract from one of the platform addresses of Mr. J. A. MacMillan:

> I am not an extremist, but I believe that the same authority that came into our homes during the war and took our sons from the knees of their mothers, because there was a national emergency, should not be afraid to take similar steps to bring to the aid of the nation all surplus wealth. We conscripted men, why not money? There is now another national emergency that will have to be faced resolutely and squarely, if the country is to weather the storm. One of the ways out of the difficulty would be to get rid of the terrible burden of interest by paying off a substantial portion of the national debt, and this can only be done by conscription of wealth.

The speaker was not a social crediter or a member representing the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation; he was a Liberal who now sits on the government benches. What has happened since that platform address was delivered? Just one thing. The Liberals have come into power, and now, I suggest, they are afraid to tackle this problem, afraid to deal with the cause of depression. That cause is definitely money, purchasing power. There is no such thing as a depression. A "depression" would suggest that we are short of goods. If we were short of goods there would be no unemployed. We have plenty of goods; we have also plenty of people who cannot get the goods; and the only purpose of our productive machine, our whole economic machine, is to enrich life by making available to the people all those things that can be produced by the knowledge of men.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 3, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

JURISDICTION OF RAILWAY COMMISSION OVER TELEPHONE TOLLS AND SERVICES

Mr. WILFRID LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 14, to amend the Railway Act (telephone tolls).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CORRUPT ELECTORAL PRACTICES

INQUIRY AS TO COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE ALLEGED LEVIES IN CONNECTION WITH RAILWAY CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): Before the orders of the day are called I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Will the government appoint a committee to investigate alleged levies made in connection with Canadian National Railways contracts?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. member place his questions on the order paper, where they can be answered in the regular way. Questions asked on the orders of the day should be confined to matters of exceptional significance or urgency.

DRILLING OF UNIFORMED CLASSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe)? In the Montreal Gazette of January 31 there is an item accompanied by photographs showing uniformed classes drilling under former officers of the regular army. May I ask the minister whether this matter will be investigated, and whether he will consider applying section 99 of the criminal code which authorizes the governor in council to prohibit military exercises, movements or evolutions?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I have seen the newspaper article and the photographs to which my hon. friend refers. I will take his question as a notice, to be answered to-morrow if possible.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. N. Francœur for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Bennett.

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, before we adjourned last night I endeavoured to point out to the government the vagueness of the government policy as represented by the speech from the throne. I also dealt briefly with living conditions, as well as the discrimination shown against the province of Alberta. In view of the remarks of the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) I should like to make a few observations. May I say to him that Alberta never failed. The question between that province and the dominion government is a constitutional one. I have clearly in mind, however, the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), uttered some two or three years ago, when he said that his policy would be "Hands off Alberta." Since that time, however, beyond all question we have seen evidence of discrimination. Only two years ago the dominion government refused to meet the maturing obligations of the province of Alberta, while at the same time it met the obligations of the other provinces. Recently it disallowed acts of the Alberta legislature, but it has not seen fit to disallow the so-called padlock law of the province of Quebec.

The question I asked last night, and which I emphasize today, is this: Is the government going to disallow a measure brought down in the Alberta house, a measure which definitely forms part of the mandate given to the Alberta government in 1935, and which they are entitled to carry out, and on the other hand allow Quebec to get away with the padlock law, which deprives sections of Canadian citizens of the right to express themselves?

While in the house I have heard much talk about democracy. What kind of democracy have they in Quebec? While we are on this question I should like to place on Hansard a few extracts from The Instructor, a magazine published in Quebec, which deal with the same question in a different way. I quote from the speech of Sir Edward Beatty, one of our foremost businessmen, delivered at Vancouver, in which he says:

> The leadership we need in this country is not that of outstanding national figures making resounding speeches. It is the leadership of ordinary men and women in their own small spheres.

The article goes on to make this comment:

> That sounds like the right note; but is it as good as it sounds? Will any man or woman in the employ of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or in the employ of any of the companies under the control of the financial group of which Sir Edward is an important member, venture to make a move in any direction until Sir Edward leads the way?
> It is not so long since an eminent scholar, Arthur E. Morgan, left the position he held as principal of McGill University under the chancellorship of Sir Edward. The reason was not made public but rumour persists that Principal Morgan had to leave because he permitted and defended free speech on the part of his staff. Did Sir Edward support him? Or did he let him go? He went.

Mr. Morgan went. The Toronto Globe and Mail takes up the question in an editorial in which comment is made upon the speech of Sir Edward made at Queen's university when at that institution of learning a few weeks ago he was given an honorary degree. The editorial offers the following challenge to Sir Edward:

> Certainly no professor should be silenced merely because his words are likely to offend wealthy university benefactors, or because he has departed from the beaten path of hitherto accepted theories.

I contend that there is too great an effort in Canada to silence the views held by some people. We want free access to information, and further we want free speech. The government should move with the greatest rapidity to disallow the padlock law of Quebec.

Yesterday I spoke briefly about living conditions. Today I was handed a list of figures which I find most interesting. They relate not to the standard of living of people in western Canada, but to that of people living within a few hundred yards of this chamber, in the capital city of Canada. The following table sets out the monthly relief ratio for the city of Ottawa:

For a family of two. . .	$21.77	plus $10 rent
For a family of three. .	$26.32	plus $11 rent
For a family of four. . .	$30.77	plus $12 rent
For a family of five. . .	$36.07	plus $13 rent
For a family of six. . .	$40.41	plus $14 rent
For a family of seven. .	$44.63	plus $15 rent

Out of that meagre sum people have been trying to exist for the past six or seven years. These men are endeavouring to support the democratic system. Is this the kind of freedom we are to have in Canada? Is this the kind of freedom and the kind of democracy I am asked to support? The kind of freedom and democracy I support is the one which will reflect happiness in the lives of all the people.

The instructor sets out another set of interesting figures, and, when compared with the figures applying to the most destitute of our race, they are astonishing. I find that the president of an insurance company in Canada receives $200,000 per year, while the lowest paid vice-president—and there are several of them—receives $160,000 per year.

In Canada we have heard a cry raised against people who are classed as radicals or communists. May I point out to hon. gentlemen on the ministerial benches and to the private members of the house that while they are in the city of Ottawa they ought to visit the soup kitchens in this vicinity. Go into the homes of the people who are dependent upon help. We must conclude that when these people have no freedom, all this talk about freedom and democracy is stupid. Their freedom is limited by the distances they can walk, because they have no money to go anywhere else. They are denied the recreation which men and women should have, and yet they are just as worthy of consideration as presidents of insurance companies and other big business executives.

When I said the speech from the throne was vague I meant just that; it contains nothing. I have spoken briefly about financial reform. Let me once more place upon Hansard the views stated at one time by the Prime Minister, because while I am a member of the house he will never be permitted to forget the promises he made. I read from a pamphlet issued by the Liberal party which, under the heading "Mr. Mackenzie King," states:

> The right hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, leader of the Liberal opposition in the house, in opposing the Bank of Canada bill clearly enunciated the policy of the Liberal party upon the issue and control of national currency and national credit. Condemning the Bennett Bank of Canada bill, Mr. King said:
> "I want to take very strong exception to what the government is doing. They are declaring for a privately owned and privately controlled bank.
> This is going to an extreme . . . which will be found to be very much against the public interest."

With that I agree. I quote:

> Repeating the policy enunciated by him on February 27, 1933, he said:
> "The Liberal party believes that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only but to direct concern to the average citizen.
> It stands for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national bank to perform the functions of rediscount and the control of currency issue considered in terms of public need."

That means relief needs, giving to these people a chance to live. That is what the Liberal government was elected for. Platitudes concerning democracy or expressions of contempt and hate for radicalism will not change by one iota the conditions that exist. This is a job that should be done this session, not the next. The people of Canada will become tired of promises; they will soon weary of listening to high sounding phrases just before an election. They are beginning to question the sincerity of the government. The very foundations of the things we love so well are apt to be destroyed. If you want to stamp out radicalism and communism you will have to go to the breeding grounds. You will have to go to the soup kitchens and visit the poor families in western Canada who are shackled down with debt.

There are many ways in which our national credit can be used without inflation. It is not necessary to have a rise in prices over and above the volume of goods. We have sufficient national wealth to enable us to build highways and carry out the necessary housing schemes. We should be able to reduce the debt of the farmer and give him a chance to live. Some consideration should be given to the men who have homesteaded and pioneered in this country.

The first step the government should take should be to abolish all kinds of relief. There should be a program of national development, which could be carried out through the use of the credit which the bankers have always used. We could use our own credit and our own national resources. We should try to develop the youth of our country to make their lives happier and richer. If we do that, communism and radicalism will disappear like the mist before the morning sun.

I am surprised that any hon. member who sits on the government benches should question what is being done in Alberta. If we fail in Alberta it will be because the Liberal government did not keep its promise to keep its hands off Alberta. We know what we are about.

Another condition that has developed during the past six or seven years is the lack of training of our youth. In the last few years at least four new trades have developed. Diesel engineering and refrigeration are only two of the newer trades. If we were to use our national credit to-morrow and bring about a real prosperity, if we were to do all the things that should be done, we would find that there was not a sufficient number of trained men available.

We speak of money credits, but the greatest credit we could have is the intellectual and physical resources of the nation. The youth of the country is our greatest asset, but their development has been neglected in the last few years. Let us call a halt to this befogging of issues; let us get down to causes and not effects. Let us carry out the principles which we have been sent here to carry out. Let us act in the interests of all people, not only of some. When we issue credit, let it be to all the public, not to just a part.

Many Liberal members have advocated monetary reform, but they have been very quiet since they have been in power. Now is the time to do it. They will never be able to do it in opposition. All they will be able to do then will be to point out what should be done to those in power, as I am doing now. We cannot wish our national problems out of existence. They cannot be remedies by platitudes or fine speeches. What is needed is the necessary legislation to make these things possible and the first thing that should be done is the issue of national credit. This credit should be used to build up national assets. When this is being done consideration must be given to the question of prices. The necessary machinery must be provided to keep prices down to reasonable levels. We should increase the value of the dollar and increase the volume of goods produced.

So on behalf, not only of the people of western Canada but of the other poor people in this country who have been ignored and who are defenceless against those who are criticizing them for their radical tendencies, I make this appeal to the Liberal government: For God's sake show some leadership. Any legislation brought down for monetary reform will be supported by hon. members in this corner. We are ready to support any program which will provide work for the people, which will build up again the morale of our youth. If you want to maintain democratic institutions, I suggest that you act in a democratic way and carry out the mandate of the people. You should give these people a hope of a new life and of greater security than they have ever known before. It is quite possible to provide a standard of living commensurate with our ability to produce.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, we have entered upon the third session of this parliament, and we are now considering the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne. The first session was devoted largely to repealing legislation passed by the former government. There was an apparent disposition to destroy the legislation which the previous government believed was in the interests of the people. The second session went by without any really constructive legislation being enacted. In this, the third session of the eighteenth parliament, the people of Canada are looking forward to legislation calculated to deal with the more pressing problems that confront the country.

We looked for some indication of this in the speech from the throne. One or two matters were mentioned, such as the economic recovery, the condition of trade, and the strains and stresses which have been placed upon Canada's government structure, the latter being dealt with under the heading of the appointment of a royal commission. I think it is not unfair to say that the speech from the throne is disappointing in that it does not contain more in the direction I have indicated. It is really a pale, pallid, anæmic imitation of what we had a right to expect at this time.

Reference is made in the speech to the imperial conference recently held in London. That conference had an extensive agenda, and one would have expected that after weeks of deliberation in the conference this government might well have had something concrete and definite to present to parliament as a result. For instance, in the opinion of thoughtful people, and those in this house I believe belong to that class, I think the time has arrived when there should be submitted to parliament a well-considered scheme of immigration. I know that at the present time this subject is a difficult one, but for the ultimate development of Canada there is undoubtedly need of a substantial increase in our population.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is the hon. member speaking for his party or for himself?

Mr. STEWART: I am speaking for myself, as I assume my hon. friend is.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am glad to know it.

Mr. STEWART: I say that we have in Canada a nucleus around which could be built a much larger population than we now have, and while it might be undesirable in certain respects that large numbers should be admitted, still I do think we should be developing a plan for bringing into Canada, placing them in areas where they are required, selected immigrants of a class and kind that can be easily assimilated and who will fit into our national development.

I am sure that at the imperial conference the subject of defence was also discussed, but we have no reference to any policy in connection with defence in these troublous times. These are two subjects, Mr. Speaker, upon which I think we might have expected some pronouncement from the government in the speech from the throne.

Reference is made in the speech to the coronation. Those who had the privilege of attending and witnessing that splendid spectacle will never forget it. It had a peculiar significance. It was a magnificent demonstration of the strength, unity, and dignity of the British commonwealth of nations, all coming together and taking part in a solemn dedication. We believe that their majesties are firmly established in the affection and confidence of the vast numbers of their subjects, and we recognize Great Britain today as the greatest single national influence making for peace and security. I am sure that as a member and partner in this great commonwealth of nations, we all agree that it is our privilege and our duty to keep in constant communication and consultation with Great Britain, and to cooperate so far as circumstances will permit in achieving that peace and security which this world so sorely needs, if indeed it is possible to achieve it at this time. The impression made upon the world must indeed have been most favourable, the coronation coming, as it did, just after a great constitutional crisis. The two taken together must have convinced the representatives of the different nations of the world assembled in London of the strength and capacity of the commonwealth to which we belong.

The next subject referred to in the speech from the throne is that of economic recovery and trade expansion. That has been dealt with so thoroughly by many speakers who have preceded me that I do not propose to discuss it at any considerable length. Emphasis is placed upon our expanding revenues. So far as these indicate an increase in the volume of our trade it is a matter for satisfaction, but so far as our expanding revenues are attributable to increased taxation the condition is not so satisfactory, because, as we all know, the revenues of this dominion are derived from taxation, and the people of Canada are groaning today under the weight of taxation that they have to bear in the various fields.

We used to hear a lot about nuisance taxes. But we still have them. We used to hear from our friends opposite that the revenue required for the operation of radio should be obtained from a tax on tubes or by some means other than through a licence fee. It was suggested that the licence fee of one dollar should be abolished. It was raised to two dollars, and that was pointed to as an act of injustice and unnecessary taxation. But a recent proposal was to raise the fee to three dollars, and finally a compromise apparently was reached at $2.50. So that to those who thought the licence fee of one dollar should be wiped out, and that two dollars was an excessive charge, $2.50 now seems to be just about right. And not only is it $2.50 for a radio licence, but $2.50 is to be exacted in respect of every radio which one may have, whether in his house, in his car, or anywhere else.

If one had time to analyze the extent of our trade expansion it would be found that a substantial part of it is due to the negotiation of the empire trade agreements that were completed in 1932. There is no doubt that our increase in percentage is greater on our trade with the empire than in any other direction, and the cumulative effect of the working of these agreements over a period of four or five years is very important in connection with our trade expansion. There will be an opportunity at a later time to go more extensively into details in connection with this matter. Suffice it for me to say at the moment that we have a preference in the best and most extensive market in the world, a preference that was acquired after years of effort by both political parties. Let us see that that preference is preserved, and in our commendable anxiety to expand our trade in other directions let us be careful that nothing is done that will detract in any way from the great and permanent advantages secured by that undertaking.

New trade agreements have been negotiated. That is of course satisfactory, but I would suggest to the government that they are inclined to place too much emphasis upon the foreign market. There is an old saying that far-away fields look green, but sometimes when you arrive at those far-away fields they are not as fresh and green as they appear from a distance. In our desire to secure foreign markets let us not overlook or neglect or endanger the great home market. It is a market which is under our control, it is ours, it cannot be taken away from us unless we give it away, and it consumes a very large portion of our natural products. Already there is alarm on the part of primary producers of agricultural products in the dominion that in the negotiation of trade agreements their interests may be adversely affected. I have had representations in this connection from vegetable growers and other primary producers; and I hope that the government, in the negotiation of these treaties, will not open too many doors for entry into our own market, which it may be difficult to close. It is all very well to say that tariffs should be lowered, but it is in times of depression that these tariffs are most needed. Living as we do beside a nation of 130,000,000 people, immediately a depression sets in there is an inevitable tendency to dump on the markets of Canada the products of that country, and it is then that a tariff reduced below a reasonable level fails to protect Canadian producers.

I say again, we have the home market; let us appraise it at its true value—for I fear we do not always appreciate its value. Let us be careful that in our agreements we do not barter it away, that we do not leave it, in the times of depression which will inevitably come, in an exposed and defenceless position.

Reference is made to prairie drought rehabilitation. This is the continuation of a policy which was started some years ago; it is commendable, and I hope that the results will be satisfactory. The same remark applies to youth training. The Department of Agriculture reorganization is hardly worthy of mention in a speech from the throne. Such reorganizations take place from time to time, and I have looked in vain for any new policy or anything different from what has prevailed in that department in the past with respect either to administration or to the marketing of farm products.

Reference is made to the reports of commissions that have been investigating subjects referred to them from time to time. A great deal has been said, and some of it with force, to the effect that governments are inclined to pass over to commissions responsibilities and the discharge of duties which in the ordinary course they should assume themselves. That is not always true. Commissions are in some cases useful and helpful. But I submit that at least one of these commissions is an expensive and a useless duplication of existing machinery. I refer to the commission appointed to investigate the textile industry. As hon. members know, we have a well-constituted, well-established tariff board set up in an independent position, free from political influence, with all the machinery, staff and equipment required for the investigation of conditions in connection with any industry in the Dominion of Canada, competent to discharge that duty, and from day to day discharging it on references to it in the ordinary course by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) or by the government. We naturally ask ourselves, why was this competent organization not entrusted with the duty of investigating conditions in the textile industry? It would appear to be within the scope of its authority and in the line of its duty; it would appear to be an undertaking for which it has special qualifications.

Another objection which I take to this investigating commission is that at times its proceedings appeared to have a political slant. Of the other commissions I have no similar remarks to make. As to the veterans' assistance commission, we have been expecting a report from it for a long time; we pressed for it last session but for some reason we were not able to get it. The national employment commission is of a different type. It has made a report which will be read with interest by hon. members. From time to time interim reports have been made, and statistics have been gathered and classified; that appears to have been the principal work of the commission. We hope that as a result of its report we shall have some action by the government which will help in the solution of this question.

The facts about unemployment as I gather them are these, that it began its last cycle in 1929, continued in 1930, and has been with us since. The extent of it in 1929 and 1930 was not appreciated or understood by the government of the day, and accurate, reliable statistics were not available at that time. I have endeavoured to follow the proceedings of this government and of this commission, and I can find no really effective change in the policies that were adopted from 1930 to 1935 to deal with this very difficult problem. In fact, in what is being done I see a tendency on the part of the government to back-track and to pick up some of the policies which they condemned in the years I have referred to. They condemned, of course, the camps, and having condemned them they abolished them, with the result that we find travelling up and down the country on the trains men who ring doorbells and beg from house to house—men who when these camps were in existence found a comfortable lodging and proper care and attention.

The speech from the throne refers to the appointment of a body of investigation known as the Rowell commission, and in that paragraph it refers to the stresses and strains that have developed in confederation and the need for Canadian unity. We all agree that these conditions exist. Some of them are the results of changed and changing conditions and of misunderstandings in a federal constitution, with a divided authority, the line of demarcation being in some cases difficult to define. Another cause is the temptation, for purely political expediency and advantage, to proclaim conflicting policies in different parts of Canada on fiscal and other questions. There is an old saying that if you sow the wind you will reap the whirlwind. A political party may advocate in some parts of Canada, no tariff, in other parts of Canada, a low tariff, and in still other parts and at other times a tariff for revenue, and free trade, wherever such appeals may be advantageous; and that party may secure power on the strength of such conflicting appeals. But the advantage is temporary. You may for a time criticize and condemn an expenditure of eight or ten million dollars for national defence, and later—not very much later—attempt to justify an expenditure of thirty-five millions for the same purpose. When such a policy is adopted it is easy to understand why there are differences of opinion, why there is misunderstanding, and why there are these stresses and strains that have developed over a period of years.

Unfortunately the present government and some of their supporters have adopted this policy in years gone by; they have sown the wind and we are now reaping the whirlwind of misunderstanding and enmity and national divisions in Canada. There is a lesson in this for us all, for every party, and a lesson for the individual. I hope that we shall take it seriously to heart. This should be avoided if the spirit of confederation is to be preserved and if we are to develop harmony and a national outlook. Parochial, provincial and sectional policies, if they ever had any value in Canada, have outlived their usefulness, and through them we cannot deal with and solve the problems that confront us to-day.

A subject that is mentioned in the speech from the throne is the amendment of the British North America Act, our constitution, now seventy years old. This is a subject that must be approached with great care; it is a subject that must be dealt with if we are to go forward, if we are to achieve the objects of confederation, and if we are to discharge our duties and responsibilities at this time. We must go slowly, with patience and tolerance, with good will and a sympathetic desire to understand all the conflicting views and interests. At the outset there should be, in my opinion, unanimous assurance that the rights of minorities as defined and set out in the British North America Act will not be the subject of discussion and will not be a matter for consideration in the revision of the constitution. If this is done and if the amendments are properly considered, I am sure the same courage and faith that were manifested by those who framed our constitution will enable us to solve our present problems.

As regards unemployment insurance, I think it is long overdue. It was, I believe, a plank in the platform of the present government as far back as 1919; and now, almost twenty years after that time, they are proceeding to deal with it. We had a law providing for unemployment insurance. Efforts were made to establish a scheme, but that law was destroyed by premature reference to the courts on material that was by no means exhaustive and definite or concrete. Unemployment insurance will not give any immediate relief to a very large number who find themselves out of work; it will be limited in its application and there will be a lag between the time of its enactment and the time it comes into effective operation.

Another matter is the export of electrical power, a subject which I submit is of great importance to this dominion. During the years that have passed in this century, from time to time commissions of conservation, governments, and others familiar with the production of hydro-electric power in Canada have emphasized its value, its importance to the development of the country; and from time to time it has been pointed out that the interests of Canada demand that as far as possible this valuable resource should be retained for the benefit of the Canadian people. This has been the policy of succeeding governments, and I hope that when the matter comes up for discussion we shall approach it from that standpoint; that we shall deal with the question entirely upon its merits and not be influenced by challenges, threats, propaganda or lobbying, even though these proceed from the premier of a great province in the Dominion of Canada.

There are one or two other matters to which I wish to refer briefly, matters more or less of local interest. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was passed in 1934 and was brought into force in different parts of the dominion at different times during that year. Its objects were the very worthy ones of keeping efficient producers on the farm; of enabling them to effect compromises or reductions of their liabilities; of bringing the best possible results to the creditors at the same time, rather than having the assets liquidated to the disadvantage of both. A large number of proposals have been submitted under the act. The return brought down recently by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) carries the operation of the act up to March 31, 1937, and as of that date 26,543 proposals had been submitted, of which some 19,000 had been disposed of. The average reduction on the secured debt was 28·78 per cent and on the unsecured debt 44·14 per cent. The total average reduction on both was 30·69 per cent. The total debt dealt with in this way was $107,500,000 odd and the total reduction about $33,724,000. A large number of these applications remain to be dealt with yet. During the year preceding March 31, 1937, there were 5,776 applications dealt with, and on that date there remained to be considered some 4,261 applications, while new applications filed during the year numbered 5,407. It would seem that the applications disposed of almost equal the new applications received.

Mr. DUNNING: Rather more last year. They have speeded up quite a little bit.

Mr. STEWART: I would expect that to be the case last year; I think the minister is right. My personal knowledge agrees with his statement in that respect.

This return gives detailed statistical information which is very interesting. It is well known, Mr. Speaker, that it was not the intention that this act should remain on the statute book for all time. It was passed to meet an emergent condition which existed, a condition which to some extent has cleared up since that time. I am going to ask the minister to consider very carefully the situation, to review the statistics for the past year and to decide whether in his opinion and in the opinion of the government the time has not come when the operation of the act should be limited to the applications that are now on file. I should judge that it would take a year or so to clear those up. The minister might also consider whether it would not be wise to have the act repealed on this basis in certain of the provinces and allow it to remain in force in other provinces if that is deemed advisable.

Mr. DUNNING: Would my hon. friend permit a question there? That is a very interesting suggestion. As a lawyer how would he regard that suggestion from the constitutional point of view?

Mr. STEWART: I should not think there would be any real difficulty, because the act was brought into force in different parts of Canada at different times. I should think legislation might be introduced that would terminate the operation of the act, we will say, in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, when the applications now pending before the boards of review in those provinces have been dealt with, and allow it to go on in other parts of the country, if that is thought necessary.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my hon. friend would be good enough to look into that phase of it.

Mr. STEWART: I shall be glad to do so, but it is not my responsibility to decide as to that. I am making these suggestions because a number of farmers have told me that they believe the operation of the act, while beneficial and useful, in the province of Ontario has practically reached the limit of its usefulness, and that in their opinion it is standing in the way of their securing new loans. Not only do they advocate its repeal for that reason; at the same time they suggest the repeal of provincial moratorium laws along the same lines. I admit that it is a complicated and difficult subject, that conditions are not the same in all the provinces, and I am asking the minister to take the matter into consideration in the light of the circumstances. I know he must have a substantial body of representation asking for action along the lines I have indicated.

Mr. DUNNING: Every day since coming into office. on that question.

Mr. STEWART: And possibly some in the other direction also.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, in both directions.

Mr. STEWART: The statistics are interesting in some of the provinces, as to the total cost of the administration of the act.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, I was serious in asking him to consider the constitutional aspects of the suggestion he made, because I value his judgment. The act was sustained, I take it, on the ground that it fell within the federal power with respect to bankruptcy, and I am suggesting a careful examination of his suggestion in the light of that fact and of that judgment. I am not offering an opinion. I know my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition, will complain if I again state that I am not a lawyer. He will say that is perfectly obvious. Perhaps it is, but we are all anxious to do the best we can with this very difficult problem, and this is one of many suggestions that have been advanced.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not obvious; it is apparent.

Mr. STEWART: I think the minister has been studying law recently, and perhaps in a few years he will be a fairly good lawyer.

The other matter to which I should like to refer is not dealt with in the speech from the throne. It is a matter not only of local concern to the constituency which I represent; it is of importance to the whole dominion. As many members of the house are aware there is in course of construction at Ivy Lea an international bridge—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry, but the hon. gentleman has exhausted his time, unless he has the consent of the house to continue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. DUNNING: It would be too bad to cut the hon. member off in the middle of Ivy Lea.

Mr. STEWART: There is in course of construction an international bridge crossing the St. Lawrence through the Thousand islands. This crossing is unique in that from one bridgehead to the other, including the connecting roadways, it traverses a distance of about six miles. In building the bridge they have crossed the channels where they are narrow and, where suitable, use of the islands, has been made. A request has developed for the establishment of a national park at the bridgehead in Canada and another at the bridgehead in the United States. If this matter is dealt with properly by the federal government it will work to the great advantage of the dominion. I am told that about one-third of the population of Canada and about one-fourth that of the United States is within three hundred miles of the bridgeheads. I need not emphasize the value of the tourist trade, and I must point out that we have here an opportunity of attracting to Canada, over this unique route, a large volume of the tourist traffic from the densely populated areas I have indicated. I do not propose to develop the matter further than to ask the government to give it careful consideration. The idea involves the acquiring of a property known as Hill island. This property is used for farming purposes. It is not extensive or of great value, but if acquired it would prevent the establishment of cheap hot-dog stands, and would tend towards the preservation of the natural beauty of the scenery among the Thousand islands, which form one of the wonders of the world equal in attraction to the falls at Niagara. I have communicated with the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) and shall not discuss the matter further at this time.

For the reasons given by my leader in the very able and interesting speech he delivered in this debate, I propose to vote for the amendment moved by him and which I seconded.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne upon their able first presentations in this chamber.

May I take this opportunity to thank the government of Canada for the efficient manner in which they handled the distressed conditions in the drought area of western Canada. I want, too, to thank all the people of Canada for the great contribution they made to that part of the country at that distressing time. Had they known the exact situation of the people in the drought areas, and had they been able to see what I saw during the summer and fall, they would have realized the position in which those unfortunate people found themselves, and would feel amply repaid for what they have done. It is unfortunate that those who made the contribution were not privileged to hear the expressions of appreciation I have heard of the help given to the drought area by citizens of other parts of the dominion. I would hope that in any national calamity of the future, that which is now the drought area may be able to do a similar kindness for any other part of Canada which finds itself in a position as distressing as that of the people in the drought area during the past year.

During the course of my observations I intend to touch upon only one subject, because I believe it is far more important than any other to the people of the three western provinces. I want it clearly understood however that I am not directing my remarks to any one section of Canada, but that I am criticizing the people in every section of the dominion who are taking advantage of a certain situation.

In the development of any country the purpose is generally to arrange matters so that the people within that country may have available to them all the advantages which they should enjoy, so that none will be oppressed and all may have a more abundant life. As I understand it, democracies are formed so that there may be majority rule, at the same time safeguarding minority rights, with the understanding that the government is to give equal opportunity to all and special privileges to none. Democracy abhors regimentation; it abhors privileges or special favours for the few as against the many. It glories in freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom for all the people to carry on their natural vocations and to have the fullest and freest life possible within that democracy.

Do we, who call ourselves a democracy, enjoy these privileges? Have we just laws, fairly administered, which carry out the spirit and the purpose of confederation, or has the greed of some, through the formation of pressure groups, by the use of propaganda, by the stirring up of racial and religious hatred and at times by the threat of loss of employment, forced upon many the rule of the few; has that greed given special privileges to some at the expense of the many? I contend that has been done in Canada, and the agency which more than any other has been responsible for bringing about this condidition, has been what is known as the protective tariff system.

When confederation was formed customs rights were turned over by the colonies to the dominion for the purpose of raising revenue. These rights have now become a trade control instrument, an instrument employed to regiment the people, to force them to purchase only in certain places and from certain people at prices set by those people for their benefit. The protective tariff is a tax upon the consumer of this country; it is a disguised form of subsidy to the industries of Canada. I believe it is against the spirit of constitutional government and parliamentary procedure.

When a tax is levied in this country, first of all it must be sponsored in the House of Commons by a responsible minister of the crown. It must be introduced in open parliament where all the elected representatives of the people may have the right to know the amount and the extent of the tax before the executive is given authority to levy. Every tax imposed should have due regard to the amount of revenue that is necessary for his majesty's government. It should be levied in such a way as to provide the greatest amount of revenue at the least possible cost to the people. It should be levied in such a way as not to discriminate between the subjects of his majesty.

The customs tariff bills levying taxes upon imports invariably are brought down in accordance with parliamentary usage by a responsible minister of the crown. The direct effect of the protective tariff is to levy upon the people of Canada an altogether different tax from that levied by the customs tariff acts. Customs tariff acts levy a tax upon imports, but the effect of the protective tariff is to levy a tax upon goods manufactured and sold in Canada. This latter tax is not levied by parliament. It is not levied by means of a measure sponsored by a responsible minister; it is not levied having regard to the need of public revenue for the carrying on of government, it is levied by the executives of the manufacturing companies in this country who have no responsibility whatever to the consumers upon whom the tax is levied.

In effect the protective tariff is a subsidy, and it is open to even more serious objection as being an evasion of the provisions of sections 53 and 54 of the British North America Act. If this tax in the form of increased prices to the consumer was properly levied and was to be paid over to the manufacturers as a subsidy, clearly it would fall within the provisions of section 54 of the British North America Act, and could not be levied without being first recommended to the house by message of the governor general and brought down by a responsible minister who would give all information with regard to the amount of the subsidy and its purpose.

Every year subsidies are approved by this parliament. We grant subsidies to Canadian steamship companies because we believe them to be necessary in order that a strong merchant marine may be built up for the benefit of national trade. Subsidies of this kind are brought down in the way I have mentioned. Contrast with that the procedure of granting subsidies under the protective tariff system. A customs bill is introduced in parliament by a responsible minister, the stated object of the bill being to levy a tax on imports, ostensibly to supply needed revenue for the public requirements. Although it is not so stated in the bill, it is understood that the main object is to grant a subsidy to private industry in Canada. This subsidy is to come not from the treasury of Canada, but from the consuming public. It is to be paid direct by them to the manufacturer of goods. These bills are passed every year without the members of the House of Commons or the public generally having any knowledge as to how great the subsidy is to be. I claim that the levying of taxes in this way is against the spirit of constitutional government and parliamentary practice as carried out in this house.

Many speeches have been made both in and out of this house to show the effect of this protective tariff tax upon the people. Reports have been made by experts to show the average tariff imposed, but it is hard to get the total cost of this tax to the people of Canada. We all know that the average rate of tariff is about 25 or 26 per cent, and that the sales tax is eight per cent. In 1936 the sales tax provided $122,000,000 in revenue, whereas the tariff, averaging 26 per cent, provided only $83,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not 26 per cent.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): What is it, 25 per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: It is not quite 13 per cent.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): You are taking in all the free items.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The average tariff I am referring to is that given by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) to the Jones commission. That was the average tariff on dutiable goods.

Mr. DUNNING: For what year?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): 1931. The Minister of Labour made a report to the Jones commission sitting in Nova Scotia which showed that the average ad valorem duty at that time was 26 per cent. He has been criticized for giving that figure. It has been said that the figure was too high, but my criticism is that it was much too low.

The consumer in Canada is more affected by the tariff on finished articles than by anything else. He is more affected by the tariff on goods manufactured or produced in Canada, and after all that is the high tariff. The 26 per cent that the minister used at that time was got by taking the average tariff on all imported goods, many of which were imported by manufacturers for further processing, and many of which were lower tariff goods because they were not competing with goods produced in Canada.

Again, in the very high tariff brackets, there is much less volume of trade on account of the height of the tariff. That again makes a difference in your average. Of course, if you had a tariff that was altogether prohibitive, it would not enter into the picture at all. Therefore I say that the rate of 26 per cent as used at that time by the Minister of Labour was a low, and not a high, figure. It is therefore fair to say that the people of this country paid at that time an average of 26 per cent more, by reason of the tariff, for the goods that they purchased. The figure may be lower now, and for the purposes of my argument I will take the figure of 20 per cent, instead of 25 per cent. Then what do we find? The salaried people, the people in the primary industries, and the wage earners of this country are paying 20 per cent more for the goods that they purchase than they would pay if it were not for that protective system.

Mr. EDWARDS: Where would they get the money to pay for them?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): You do not pay for goods with money.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I am not going to be diverted from my argument, but I shall be glad to answer any questions my hon. friend wishes to ask after I have finished my speech.

Take the figure of 20 per cent as the average tariff. What does that mean? It means for the farmer growing wheat on the western plains, which gives him the money to buy the goods he needs to purchase, that he has to give one load out of every five in order to bolster up some of the secondary industries of this country through the protective tariff system; or one head of cattle out of every five, one head of sheep, one head of hogs out of every five. The farmer's wife, when she gathers five dozen eggs, turns over one dozen to the protectionists, and one pound of butter out of every five that she churns. The fisherman on our coasts or on the lakes is in the same position. He makes a donation of one-fifth of his catch to carry the protected industries in this country. The logger and the lumberman can figure that every fifth blow of his axe, or every fifth cut of his saw, is his contribution to the protected industries. The miner working down in the dark can ponder the fact that every fifth ton of coal he raises is his contribution to Canadian protected industries. It matters not where you go in Canada, you will find that this protective system is taking one-fifth from the doctor, from the lawyer, from the street-car conductor, from the bus driver, from the stenographer, and from every wage earner. That is what they have to pay to carry the secondary industries that are supported by the protective tariff system.

It is said that the tariff is the mother of trusts and monopolies, and I believe that is true. You will find that our people say it is very difficult to deal with monopolies. It is. But at least we can stop protecting them and giving them more control.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) next makes a submission to the tariff board, let me suggest that he ask them to find out at what rate of duty the government can raise the greatest amount of money for their purposes. I do not believe that a submission on that basis has ever been made to the tariff board. Let the tariff board determine the amount of money that it is costing the people of Canada to raise the $83,000,000 that was received in tariff taxation last year. Let the tariff board find out the exact extent of the cost to the people of Canada of carrying uneconomic secondary industries. They can do it, and we ought to have some figures on these questions at this time. The protective tariff has fostered in this country secondary industries many of which are inefficient and unnatural to our economy, and this has placed a heavy burden upon our primary producers.

In Canada to-day we have four geographical divisions: the maritime provinces, comprising Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; Ontario and Quebec, which we in the west ordinarily call eastern Canada; the three prairie provinces, which are ordinarily called western Canada, and British Columbia.

That part of Canada lying east of the great lakes, this central part, has fine agricultural land; it has in large part a wonderful climate; it has great waterpowers for the development of electrical energy; it has lakes, canals and rivers, furnishing cheap transportation for imports and exports to and from world markets.

That part of Canada comprising the three prairie provinces extending from the eastern boundary of Manitoba to the western boundary of Alberta, is a large plain or prairie country admirably suited to the raising of small grains and live stock. We have there, as you have in eastern Canada, lumbering, fishing, mining and agriculture as our primary industries. But we have no lakes or rivers or canals for cheap transportation. We have little electrical energy. We have a severe climate, and we can grow only some of the things that we need to use. Our costs of transportation are high and our rail hauls are long. In western Canada we can manufacture or process only those natural products which it is cheaper to process there than to carry an added weight of raw material to a more favourable position for manufacturing, because we have to travel over such long and costly transportation routes. Therefore there is little chance of building in the three prairie provinces any great manufacturing industry. A protective tariff can help them in no way. On the contrary, it increases the cost of production of every one of our primary industries. In western Canada to-day we have come to this position, that we must cut our production costs or quit. We cannot go on paying an added amount of twenty or twenty-five per cent, for which we get nothing in return, and be able to make a living, much less a profit.

I came to this house in 1925, almost thirteen years ago. I have consistently and persistently endeavoured to have tariffs in this country lowered. I have finally come to the conclusion that no matter what party is in power we can never get a tariff that will be satisfactory both to the three prairie provinces and to the rest of Canada. If it is low enough to suit the prairie provinces it will be too low for the rest of Canada; if it is high enough to suit the rest of Canada it will be too high for us to be able to carry on in our western country. Having come to this conclusion, let me say that I am just as sincere now in advocating what I am about to advocate as I have been with regard to the tariff in past years. I do not believe that we in the west can carry on under the present protective tariff system. I do not believe we have the right to place obstacles in the way of any other part of this country. If the people elsewhere in Canada believe that it is best for their economy to have a protective tariff system, by all means let them have it. I say you have a right to your opinion, you have a right to that policy, but for your own part of the country, not for mine. If we have come to the place where advantages to one part of Canada become a great disadvantage to another part, there must be some way of straightening out that situation. Nobody here will deny that, as a free trade area, western Canada would develop greatly, it would prosper and grow, and would thereby help to develop the whole dominion. I admit we have no right to try to prevent the rest of Canada from having a protective tariff provided they think that that is best for their economy, but I am just as emphatic in saying that they have no right to place in the way of our part of the country obstacles on account of which we cannot carry on and prosper.

There has been in Canada a lot of talk of secession. In parts, there has been more thought than talk. The protective tariff has driven a wedge into confederation. I do not know how long it will take, but sooner or later a split will come. I am not advocating it. I am endeavouring to save Canada from it. Is it just or fair that parts of this dominion that are endowed by providence with a much more equable climate, that can raise many fruits and vegetables which in our severe climate cannot be grown at all, should, endowed as they are with this boon, ask us to contribute further in their behalf? Is it just or fair that the people occupying a territory within the dominion where transportation costs are low, where electrical energy can be freely developed, where there are many natural advantages, should be allowed to take a heavy tribute from their less fortunate brothers in this confederation?

I repeat that the protective tariff system placed upon this country by parliament has been a great detriment to the three prairie provinces. They cannot carry on under a system such as we have to-day; and here and now I say, for the people of western Canada, that we demand fair play within this confederation. We are a British people, and no British people have long remained inside a country and stood for what we are standing for to-day. We demand justice. We demand a free trade area in the three western provinces of Canada.

Mrs. MARTHA LOUISE BLACK (Yukon): While congratulating the hon. members who moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I have wondered if they realized the compliment that their government has paid them. It is somewhat over thirty-five years ago that a former hon. member of this house told me he had been selected by the then Mr. Wilfrid Laurier, leader of the Liberal party, to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne. This young man, afterwards a commissioner in the Yukon territory, was at that time only twenty-one years of age. It was a privilege and a compliment that he will pass down to his children and grandchildren.

I have listened with a great deal of attention to the previous speaker. The hon. member lived in the Yukon in the very early years of his life. I thought, as I listened to his statement on the conditions of the middle prairie provinces, that he was either very brave or very foolhardy. Time will tell which.

We in the Yukon have perhaps fewer problems than the majority of people in Canada. We have fewer desires; our main desire, our chief wish, is to be let alone. That we seem to have gained in some small measure. We would ask the government, however, for consideration of old age pensions. Men and women living in the Yukon territory work for their living or they starve; as long as they are able to work they work. Young and old alike, they feel that if they have the strength and ability they must work rather than accept help from the government or from individuals. But when old age comes on or ill health strikes them, then they do ask that the government help them. Twenty dollars a month is given in the Yukon. It is given more in the form of a dole than as an old age pension, and our people there who are obliged to accept it find fault with the way in which it is passed out. There are many Yukoners who have lived there since 1896, 1897 and 1898, who are now too old or too poor in health to work. They would like to go to the coast to live. That is impossible; no matter how long they have lived in the Yukon or how hard they may have worked or no matter how diligently they may have helped in building up the mining industry in that country, if they leave the Yukon the government does not give them that paltry sum of $20 a month. While I realize that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has burdens which he sometimes thinks are almost too heavy to bear, I should like him, if he has an odd moment to spare now and then, to consider what $20 a month would mean to the Yukoners who would like to finish their days on the coast. The increase in population is very small. We had from March 1936 to March 1937 eighty-eight deaths, largely of men and a few women who had been in the Yukon since the very early days, who had worked there and lived and died in the country they had grown to love.

Recently there has been considerable talk about air mail in the north. I heard a Vancouver man, a friend of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), say that Vancouver had finally awakened and emerged from the tomb when the people there asked that an air mail service be established from Vancouver to the north. It was only a few short days ago that the first trip was made from Vancouver into Dawson, Yukon. The ship was piloted by W. S. Holland, a very well known pilot. The only passenger was the president of Northern Airways who owned the plane—George Simmons. On the way to the Yukon they stopped at Ashcroft, Burns Lake, Telegraph Creek, Atlin, Carcross, Mayo and finally Dawson. The trip was made with these stop-overs, in winter weather, in wind and storm, in less than forty-eight hours.

This is the logical air route from Vancouver and the coast cities; for over ninety per cent of the mail and freight going into the Yukon goes via Vancouver. Why not send it by that route as far as we possibly can to help to build up the coast city of Vancouver? When men or women, in the fall, wish for a surcease from the cold weather, they wish to spend their winter holidays either in Vancouver or in Victoria or some other city on the coast; and when one reads in the newspapers of the temperatures in the prairie provinces one wonders—"Coming from the Yukon, why go to Edmonton?"

The tourist traffic is a matter of vital importance to us. The local government does comparatively little to build it up, but what it can do, it does. The one transportation company there does its very best in every possible way, but it is hampered every season by changing river conditions. Every time the ice goes out, every time there is high water, there are new river beds both in the Yukon and in the Stewart and the Mayo rivers. It is impossible for new pilots to come in and carry on as the old pilots have done. A year ago last summer we lost two of the finest vessels in the fleet. This summer we were fortunate, both in regard to steamers and in the air. In fact, not one of the three concerns in the Yukon, owning the fleet of ships we have now, has ever suffered a fatal accident, which I think is probably a record for most enterprises of this kind.

I have seen in the newspapers recently, and have heard considerable talk, about the increase in the radio licence fee. This pronouncement of mine may not be very favourably received by either friends or enemies, but I do not think that $2.50 is too much to ask.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mrs. BLACK: I would rather have the applause come from this side, but I think I hear someone say I won't get it. However, we in the north want better music; we want better broadcasts; and if the labourer is worthy of his hire, surely we can afford to pay that $2.50, with all due apologies to others.

[Mrs. Black.]

The territory of Alaska is beating us in one respect; I refer to the care of game. At present we have no bounty on wolves, nor have we had for a number of years past. The territory of Alaska has a large bounty. We want all the tourist trade we can get, not only the ordinary visitor who may come in—and we had over 4,000 last year—but the big game hunter as well. They are the people who bring the money. The big game hunter coming into the Yukon and going into the Kluane and other districts never spends less than from $5,000 to $10,000, and that money is largely spent locally. We feel, therefore, that not only the local government but conservation committees and the federal government should consider ways and means of protecting our game by paying bounties both on wolves, which are a horrible menace to larger game, and coyotes, which are a menace to birds. Only three or four years ago bands of wolves attacked great herds of caribou, and my husband saw hundreds of caribou lying dead on the ground. They had been killed by wolves. The wolves do not eat the carcass; they sever the jugular vein, drink the blood, eat the entrails, and the carcass is left to rot. Our game will not last forever and we should endeavour to protect it.

Speaking of game naturally brings me to the fisheries and the fur trade. When I went to that country thirty-five or forty years ago I saw small creeks when the salmon were coming up the Yukon river to spawn, and I saw these creek beds so filled with salmon that one could almost walk across. Now, however, whether it is owing to the wheels and the traps that are used by the Indians on the lower river, or whether it is due to the canneries that are operated in the open water by the Japanese, our fisheries have gone down rapidly. A few years ago the value of our production reached about $70,000, while in 1936 it amounted to only $14,000. That is bad for the country and bad for the natives, who depend upon the wild game and fish for their food.

There is some talk, of course, among far westerners in regard to the Japanese question. It is a matter that must be approached very delicately but, as I have read my history, Holland, followed by Portugal, Spain, France, Great Britain and finally the United States, went into the orient following the cannon. They did not want us, and now I am just wondering if we are not reaping what we have sown. Perhaps it is not so easy for us to think that we have to suffer for what our forefathers did, but if we have that feeling we had better think of what those who are coming after us may have to suffer because of our actions in many ways. I believe it was a member of the British House of Commons who, while making a speech, said they must do a certain thing for the sake of posterity. He was immediately followed by another member who threw up his hands and asked, "After all, what has posterity ever done for us?"

In the north our exports consist principally of minerals and some furs. The Yukon produces 1·8 per cent of the fur pelts that are placed on the market in Canada, so that our production of fur does not amount to very much. We do send out gold, silver, lead, coal and a very small amount of petroleum. The present high price of gold, silver and lead, is what has saved the Yukon mines. The Yukon Consolidated Company in the Dawson district employs about six hundred men. The Treadwell Mining Company, in the Mayo district, employs perhaps four hundred men. If those mines were closed down the Yukon would be almost on its uppers. Mining is carried on now in mines that had been abandoned because of the low price of gold. A few years ago $16 was the average price received, but now with gold at over $30 it is possible to work property that could not be operated a few years ago.

I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), if I may, on the new silver coins. The ten cent piece and the twenty-five cent piece, or the two-bit piece, as we call it in the north, are artistic and beautiful, but I have yet to see a coronation silver dollar. I have asked for one at five different banks and the answer has been, "We have none." We all know that British Columbia and the Yukon depend on silver production to a large extent. How easy it would be to help those miners in some degree. I do not know that it would be possible for a government to order a bank to give so many silver dollars when a person gets a certain amount of money, but if that were possible it would help us. If we were patriotic enough to think not only of the farmers of whom the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) spoke, but also of those silver miners, when we go to a bank to cash a cheque for $25 we might ask for five silver dollars. I believe our silver dollars are not large enough to be called cart-wheels. They are not awkward to carry, at least so I have been told, though as I say I have yet to see a coronation silver dollar and—of course I was in the north—not until about five months after the jubilee did I see a jubilee silver dollar, when one was very kindly sent to me.

I see on the order paper a notice of motion by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) regarding the appointment of a deputy chairman of committees. I feel very keenly about this question. As many hon. members know, I was intimately associated with a former Speaker. His deputy was an invalid during the four years that he served. I have kept a diary for over forty years, so I am very sure of my ground when I make the statement that the deputy was not in his seat for more than twelve days during any one of those four sessions. The Speaker had to ask members of his party to take the chair, and there are many hon. gentlemen here who helped out that Speaker. It is a difficult task to sit in the chair and listen to the talk of 245 members, day in and day out. If I may be allowed to say so, my sympathy is always with the Speaker, especially when I am speaking, and I should like to see a deputy chairman appointed and paid, because the workman is always worthy of his hire.

Foreign goods entering the Yukon come directly through Vancouver. Every cent of customs and excise is paid in Vancouver, to the federal government. Last year $160,000 was paid into the federal treasury, through the port of Vancouver, on goods sent in to the Yukon. There is no telling how much duty was paid on goods coming from other parts of Canada, but in any case I think the Yukon has been a pretty fat plum for the province of British Columbia. The telegraph system in northern British Columbia has always been charged to the Yukon. That is not right; it should not be done. The Yukon has been a very happy hunting ground for that province. According to the Handbook of Canada for 1938, which contains a summary of the value of production in Canada according to provinces, the value of production of British Columbia is given as $187,087,995. There is a note at the bottom of that statement which says, "This includes the Yukon." The per capita net commodity production of Ontario for 1935 is given as almost $286; British Columbia produced about $250 for each citizen—and as I said before that includes the Yukon—while poor little old Alberta, whose hardships we have been hearing about for years, had a per capita net commodity production amounting to $203. I am rather losing my sympathy for those Alberta people. In 1935 the Yukon produced $1,263,567 in gold; $90,165 in silver; $7,250 in lead; $3,483 in coal; $25,575 in oil, and $230,070 in furs, making a total of $1,620,114. We have a population of less than 5,000 men, women and children, but for the purposes of computation I shall place the population at 5,000. If we divide $1,620,114 by 5,000 we have a per capita net production of $340. I do not think the Yukon has much to be ashamed of.

There is considerable shipping industry in the Yukon. There is this difference, however, that the money spent for the maintenance of lights and buoys in other places is not spent with us; the companies spend their own money.

I am sick and tired of the whispering I can hear with respect to the great expense the Yukon is to the federal government. If the truth were known, and if hon. members on both sides of the house would study the question, they would find that for years the Yukon has pap-fed the federal treasury. Of course there have been some injustices in the Yukon, owing to the change in the political complexion of parties in power. Those changes are to be expected. The Conservatives come in and harass the Liberals; the Liberals in turn come in and harass the Conservatives. That always happens. Perhaps I believe, as much as anybody else, that to the victor belongs the spoils. Possibly it is too bad that that is so, but until we sprout not our wings but our pin feathers, it will last.

I must say however that I do deprecate conditions in the Yukon which have arisen because of personal animosities. I do not like to speak of these things, because at my age I am not looking for trouble. I want life to be as pleasant and easy as it can be, not only for myself but for everyone else. But I firmly believe the time will come when those of us here and those in the government at home will reap as we sow. If we are unjust, if we are unchristian and dishonest, we will reap exactly as we sow.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne contains reference to the coronation in the month of May of Their Majesties King George VI and Queen Elizabeth, an event of special significance to the nations of the British commonwealth. We find, too, in the speech from the throne a review of the progress made along certain lines during the past year. We are reminded that the royal commissions which have concluded their duties will submit their reports. It indicates what legislation will be brought down during the present session.

Then, the following paragraph appears:

> Cooperation of the provinces will be sought with a view to an amendment of the British North America Act, which would empower the parliament of Canada to enact forthwith a national scheme of unemployment insurance. My ministers hope the proposal may meet with early approval in order that unemployment insurance legislation may be enacted during the present session of parliament.

We are in favour of any legislation which will improve the economic conditions of the working man in Canada. We are in favour of legislation designed to give a greater measure of economic security to our working population. However, we will have to wait until the bill is brought down before we can arrive at a proper understanding of the government's proposals.

It must be pointed out that certain provinces of Canada are not prepared to relinquish any of their power to the federal parliament. There are forces in the country which are attempting to centralize power in the parliament of Canada. For a number of reasons we are absolutely opposed to this, because we believe if it is done grave disturbances would be the result and confederation itself would collapse. If power were centralized in the federal parliament we would have a few men forming a cabinet, with powers almost as great as those exercised by Mussolini and Hitler. True, a measure of control would be exercised by other hon. members, but it is well to remember and to consider the fact that more than sixty per cent of the voting strength in the house is controlled by members from Ontario and Quebec. In fact, Liberal members from those provinces outnumber the members of all parties from western Canada.

Practically all our great financial and industrial institutions have their headquarters in Quebec or Ontario. The interests of those provinces are not the same as those of the western or maritime provinces. Certain policies of trade and tariff have increased the prosperity of Ontario and Quebec to a greater extent and sometimes to the cost of other parts of Canada.

When engaged in an investigation in eastern Canada on the effects of tariff the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) brought to light the fact that the enhancement of prices due to tariff costs in western Canada amounted in one year to approximately $124,000,000. The following table will serve as a comparison of the tariff costs and tariff benefits in the three western provinces:

	Tariff costs to the people	Tariff benefits to the people
Manitoba..	$29,185,740	$19,910,971
Saskatchewan. ..	29,288,285	3,275,850
Alberta.	27,909,396	8,211,148

While the west paid millions in tariff costs, Quebec gained $31,685,885 and Ontario gained $51,989,761. The west has suffered from the great disequilibrium in prices as between the manufactured goods of eastern Canada and the primary products of western Canada, as well as from high interest and freight rates.

As an instance of that, may I mention the farmers of western Canada who sell their wheat to the cereal plants in the east? We will suppose they sell at $1.20 per bushel, or two cents per pound. That wheat is puffed and sold back to the consumers, some of whom are the original producers in western Canada, at a price of 67 cents per pound. So we have the farmer who sold his wheat for two cents a pound buying it back for 67 cents,—two cents for the wheat and 65 cents for the puff. We know, too, that farmers have sold their hides for just enough to buy a pair of shoe laces. Whole carcasses have been sold, returning to the producer scarcely enough to buy a pair of shoes. We know, too, that the west has suffered from high freight and interest rates. It is a matter of common knowledge that agriculture, the great industry of the west, has suffered to a greater extent than the large industrial, commercial and particularly the financial institutions which have their headquarters in eastern Canada, principally in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

The province of Alberta has no member in the cabinet and no one acceptable to that province was appointed to the Rowell commission. In fact, the personnel of the commission was criticized by the leader of the Conservative party.

Little has been done by this parliament to enable the coal producers of western Canada to increase their markets, particularly in eastern Canada. It is felt that these injustices cannot be corrected by relinquishing any of the powers now possessed by the provinces.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) was reported in the press as having said during the recent by-election in Quebec that the Liberal party has always stood for the preservation of provincial autonomy. I was encouraged by his remarks. It is my opinion that the Minister of Justice recognizes the need of maintaining provincial autonomy if we are to avoid fascism or communism. The minister also expressed himself last year in the house as being opposed to fascism or communism; in fact he said he hated them both. I suggest to the Minister of Justice that if he hates communism and fascism he should do everything in his power to safeguard the autonomy and sovereignty of our provinces. The preservation of the democratic rights of our people can best be maintained by safeguarding the sovereign powers of the provinces.

The Minister of Justice is reported in Hansard of March 30, 1937, as saying he was surprised that an hon. member would suggest the disallowance of provincial legislation. Recently certain acts of the Alberta government were disallowed by the governor general in council. I ask this question of the minister: Why were the padlock laws of Quebec and the Ontario legislation dealing with power contracts not disallowed? Judgments pronounced by the supreme court and the privy council have clearly established the fact that the provinces have jurisdiction over social measures. The parliament of Canada maintain that they have jurisdiction over banks and the issuing of money.

We find many provinces, like hundreds of municipalities and hundreds of thousands of our private citizens, unable to support financially many of the social reforms that they may feel are necessary. The Liberal government assured the people of Canada before the last election that if they were elected money and credit would be issued to meet the needs of the people. If, in the opinion of the government, unemployment insurance is necessary and desirable, then let the government finance it by issuing money to the provinces under terms satisfactory to all. Why should the provinces be asked to give up any of their powers? We do not want a dictatorship in this country. In fact, I will go so far as to say that if the financial institutions of Ontario and Quebec will keep their hands out of the pockets of Alberta, that province will do all right.

The speech from the throne also contains the following paragraph:

> The government is convinced that, in seeking to cooperate with the United Kingdom and other countries in efforts to promote international trade, it is pursuing one of the most effective means of ensuring economic security and progress in Canada, and the betterment of conditions in other parts of the world.

However, in spite of the great increase in world trade, which has equalled in volume, if not in money value, some of Canada's best years; in spite of a favourable trade balance, we have failed to bring about the improvement in our economic conditions which many of us were hopeful would be brought about. Do we have to feed all the world before we ourselves can eat? We still have our great housing, unemployment and debt problems. For years the United States enjoyed an extensive foreign trade. In thirty years that country piled up favourable trade balances estimated to be in excess of $27,000,000,000.

The United States holds billions of dollars' worth of foreign bonds. Has all this brought prosperity to that country? Has all this solved their economic problem? The answer is definitely, no. We cannot hope to find in foreign trade alone the solution of our economic problems. Foreign trade is desirable, but let us concentrate our attention a little more on the development of our home markets.

We believe the solution of our problems lies in the proper ordering of our monetary system, which in our opinion should be adjusted to reflect facts and our real ability to produce and distribute the wealth of goods and services we can produce. We know that the west can consume more of the products of the east, such as fish, maple sugar, fruit, lumber, etc. The east could consume more of the products naturally produced in the west. But first the purchasing power of the people, both in the east and west, must be increased. Under our present monetary system, under present conditions, foreign trade will not provide the necessary purchasing power to achieve the results we desire. The trade balance of more than $300,000,000 benefits the great masses in Canada very little.

I repeat, the Liberal party promised monetary reform, but I find no mention of monetary reform in the speech from the throne. It is conspicuous by its absence. Surely the Liberal party is not of the opinion that the present monetary system is meeting the needs of the people. Surely it does not believe that our monetary system has been adjusted to reflect facts, to reflect our collective ability to produce and distribute goods and services. We still have a chronic shortage of purchasing power among the masses. We still have slums and we still have hundreds of thousands of unemployed and relief recipients. Our educational and health facilities are being undermined. Our great burden of private and public debt is still with us and in some cases increasing at an alarming rate. Surely the government intends to take further action to correct these ills.

We are pleased to see in the press the statement that the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) is to introduce legislation to assist the war veterans. I sincerely hope he brings in such legislation as will really solve the problems and difficulties facing this body of Canadian citizens.

The government points to increased revenues, but these, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) pointed out, simply mean increased taxes. A man came to me a short while ago and told me he was receiving $12.50 a month with which to keep a family of five. That meant he was receiving eight cents per day per person. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) collects an eight per cent sales tax on many of the commodities this unfortunate man has to buy.

Since the revenue of the government is up, and particularly that of the Post Office Department, which shows a profit of more than $3,000,000, I sincerely hope the government will consider increasing the wages of the low paid postal employees. We feel that a reclassification of the mail men, those who deliver the mail, should be favourably considered by the government. I shall have more to say to the minister on this matter later on.

I sincerely hope that the charges of political corruption levelled at the Liberal government by the leader of the opposition will be cleared up, because charges of this sort have a tendency to break down the people's faith in our democratic institutions.

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne, now before us for consideration, is a remarkable document. It gives to the members of the house no definite idea of the legislation they will be called upon to consider. There was a time in this country when the speech from the throne gave to the house and the country a definite intimation of the legislation that would be presented during the session, but the document now before us appears to be skilfully drawn with the evident intention of mystifying the house as to the government's program. As I said, it gives to the house and the country no definite idea of the legislation that is going to be presented during the session. Indeed, so barren is the speech from the throne that it puts me in mind of the frame of a turkey that one might see on a platter the morning after Christmas—just a sorrowful skeleton. It would appear that the government has no policy for dealing with the questions of supreme importance that are facing the country and demanding the attention of parliament. I speak particularly of the problems of unemployment and relief. Why, in normal times, should we have the amount of unemployment that we have to-day, and the amount of relief that we have to provide? These are really better than normal times because the greater prosperity we are now enjoying has largely been brought about through the purchase by other countries of war materials of every description from Canada, and so we have normal times but our prosperity has been augmented by the purchase of these war materials.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in speaking the other day, seemed to take great satisfaction in comparing present conditions with those of the dark days of the depression, but to my mind his comparison was very unfair. We have in Canada a debt that is a veritable nightmare, and there seems to be no solution coming from the government for the reduction of that debt. We have also a railway problem which it will take the very best brains of this country to solve, and let me point out that this railway problem is the child of the Liberal party. It was the Liberal party that built the roads which afterwards became bankrupt and were taken over by the dominion. It was a Liberal government that brought to Canada Sir Henry Thornton at a salary of $75,000 a year, with expenses, which very often mounted to as much as his salary, and it was a Liberal government that permitted him to go on the wildest spending spree that ever was known in any civilized country. During his term of office as president of the Canadian National he added to the debt of the railway $460,000,000, and almost ruined it financially; and not only did he almost financially ruin that road but he did a great deal of injury financially to the Canadian Pacific Railway, because they thought they had to keep up with the Joneses. During Sir Henry Thornton's presidency, money was spent lavishly, in building palatial hotels the like of which one would not see elsewhere on this continent, buying up branch railways, building ships, creating great parks. Money was spent as if it could be gathered off the trees by the roadside.

We have also a housing problem in this country. I have no objection to the government building houses for poor people, but I would point out that an abundance of money is lying idle in our banks to-day, drawing one and a half per cent, money which people would be only too glad to invest in the building of homes and houses throughout Canada if only a man could build a house, pay the taxes on it, and then rent it and make a profit. But he cannot do that to-day. Neither can he build a home and sell it for what it would cost to build. That is why we are short of homes.

How is it that the governments are getting the easy money they are getting today? They are getting it because the people of this country have lost confidence; they have no longer a sense of security in Canada, and they are afraid to put their money into agriculture or industry. They leave it in the bank, drawing one and a half cents on the dollar, and the government comes along and gives two or three cents on the dollar for the use of it. But if our people had confidence in this country the government would not be getting money so easily; our people would be building homes, and industry and agriculture woud not lack for money as they are doing today.

We have in these days provincial unrest such as we have not had since confederation. While the government is numerically strong, it would appear to me that it is morally too weak to grapple with the serious problems which confront Canada at the present time; it appears to be allied with the big interests and the money barons, and neglects the farmers and the working people, and it is doing nothing to better the condition of the average citizen.

The fathers of confederation gathered together the provinces on the northern half of this continent and formed them into a federation known as the Dominion of Canada. They had a vision of building up this country into a great nation that would be the pride of the British Empire, building it up from the French and British stock that was here, representing two of the finest civilizations in the world. They looked forward to a united, happy people, to Canada becoming a great nation, with a strong central government. One of the powers that was given by the fathers of confederation to the central government was the power, under the British North America Act, to disallow any provincial legislation if the parliament of Canada felt that it was not in the best interests of the country as a whole. But what do we see happening now? This "happy family" of provincial and federal Liberal governments seems to have brought about such unrest and distress and disquietude from one end of the dominion to the other, that the very foundations of confederation and of our democracy are being shaken. What did we see in Ontario not very long ago? We saw the government of that province repudiating their solemn contracts. But that was not bad enough, for in repudiating the contracts they robbed thousands of investors of the money they had invested in power bonds. That would have been bad enough, but after robbing these people of their rights—for they brought these securities because the seal of the province of Ontario was attached to them—the Ontario government passed a law prohibiting the owners from appealing to the courts for justice. We in this country are proud of the fact that the poorest man in it, as well as the wealthiest, can appeal to an impartial court and get justice. Where was the dominion government, which had authority to disallow such an act as that? Here were citizens robbed of their property and denied the right to appeal to the courts for redress.

Then in Quebec they have passed a statute; I do not know what it is but I am told it is a padlock law, and from what I can learn about it, in that province a man's home is no longer his castle. Under British institutions a man's home is sacred to him; no officer of any government has the right to go to his hearth and take away the literature he is reading. Action of that kind is an infringement of the liberty of the British subject. I ask, why was nothing done about that?

We come to Alberta. We find that that province passed certain laws which the federal government felt were not in the interests of the people, so immediately they disallowed those laws. I am not finding any fault with the disallowance of them; in fact I rather agree they should be disallowed. But the point I want to make is, why was Alberta treated one way and Ontario and Quebec another way? These are the things which are causing distrust and dissatisfaction in this country. If we want to preserve our democracy we must have a strong central government that will not shirk its responsibilities.

It would appear that the present government is staking its very existence on international trade and the export market, to the utter neglect of our home industries and our home market. In this connection I should like to point out that at the last session several hon. members called the attention of the government to the fact that a serious menace to our domestic dairy industry had arisen because of the importation of vegetable oils. Some years ago parliament deemed it necessary and proper to forbid the importation and sale of oleomargarine, because it was coming into competition with butter and lard. Today we are faced with a much worse menace in the sale of domestic shortening made out of these vegetable oils that are shipped in. In 1933, 81,000,000 pounds of vegetable oil were brought into Canada; by 1936 the amount had increased to 195,000,000 pounds. In 1932, 61,000,000 pounds of shortening manufactured from these oils were sold in Canada, and in 1936 the amount had risen to 103,000,000 pounds. In eastern Canada the dairy industry is what wheat growing is to the west—though dairying is now being followed in western Canada as well—it is our staple business. Looking over the government returns, I find that in each of the last ten years the value of the dairy products of the dominion exceeded by some millions of dollars the value of the wheat produced. We have a very large industry to protect. Now this vegetable oil is brought from tropical countries where native labour is very cheap; it is landed at a few cents a pound, and is refined and manufactured here to the immense profit of a few large concerns but to the detriment of the producers of our butter and other animal fats. The United States impose a duty of 3½ cents a pound against animal fats imported from Canada, and they levy the same duty against vegetable oils brought into the United States. So while our market is a dumping ground for these oils, our animal fats are excluded from the United States.

I listened this afternoon with great interest to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross). He made a very clear statement, and it was a pleasure to listen to him, but I cannot agree with his arguments. I believe that if we followed the policy he enunciated we might as well all pack our bags and leave this country, because industry, to a larger extent than agriculture, must take up the slack of unemployment. Industry and agriculture must work hand in hand. The farmer buys the product of the factory, and the men and women engaged in our industrial life represent the best market that our farmers have for their produce. I repeat that industry and agriculture are partners in the development of this dominion, the one supplying markets for the other.

I think all hon. members will agree with me that it is the first duty of any householder to see that those dependent upon him are housed, clothed and fed. Likewise it is the duty of any country to feed and clothe its citizens as far as lies in its power and to buy nothing outside if it can be profitably produced at home. But what are we doing? In Canada to-day we are producing surpluses of every foodstuff that can be profitably grown in this country. What about clothing ourselves? Fifty per cent of our people are wearing garments that are imported from a foreign country where the standard of living and the scale of wages are far below those enjoyed by Canadian workmen. We shall never have prosperity until we learn to clothe ourselves in the same way that we have learned to feed ourselves. I have never worked a day off my farm, and it is my experience that the man who is a success as a farmer buys nothing that he can produce himself. If he can produce an article he should produce it, and not buy his eggs, butter, or cheese elsewhere. The same policy must be adopted by the country as a whole so far as clothing ourselves is concerned. By so doing we shall build up a wonderful market for our agriculturists. The present government's tariff tinkering has in many instances slowed up our factories. I know of several of them to-day where the hands are working on short time because such great quantities of goods have been dumped into Canada from other countries.

A great deal has been said about spending public money in order to produce prosperity. That cannot be done. There was an example of that sort of thing in the country to the south of us, where billions have been spent; and they are worse off to-day than when they started. You might as well try to pull yourself out of the mire by tugging at your bootstraps as try to bring about prosperity by spending public money. When the money is gone, where are you? What we want to do is to build up agriculture and industry and give our people work. That, and nothing else, will bring prosperity. A great deal of the prosperity we enjoy to-day is due—and it is rather a sad reflection—to the purchase of war materials.

I want to say a word about by-elections. The Prime Minister seemed to find great satisfaction in declaring to the house that the government had carried practically all these by-elections. Well, if the reports that come from the constituencies where the by-elections were held can be verified by facts, it was no credit to the government that their representatives were returned, because the reports go to show that bribery and corruption unprecedented in Canada were carried on in these ridings. The right hon. gentleman twitted the Conservative party for losing these by-elections. We are not numerically strong on this side of the house, but we are here honestly; and the leader of the Conservative party was never forced to stand up in the house, after revelations had been made by a commission, and say: This has put my party in the valley of humiliation. We would, therefore, just as soon be numerically weak as have strength of that kind. One man said the other day, "Oh, your party is dead." I replied, "It may be dead, but Conservatives are very staunch Christians and they believe that there will be a glorious resurrection."

Mr. FINN: On the last day.

Mr. THOMPSON: Yes, the last day of this government.

Mr. FINN: Which will be years hence.

Mr. THOMPSON: The Canadian people are alarmed at the prospect of some change being made in connection with the imperial preference which we enjoy at the present time. Why should Canada make any great effort to get markets in the United States? I am willing to sell to people in the United States or to anyone else who will buy from me at a fair price; but there is not one agricultural product that we are exporting to-day to the United States of which they have not a surplus that they are exporting. Furthermore, our markets there have no stability; they depend upon the whim of government. When the government changes, the tariff policy changes. We have had some experience in this regard with the American people. There is no stability about any agreement made with the United States so far as trade arrangements are concerned. Take the British market, on the other hand. The British people are obliged yearly to buy hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of foodstuffs which they cannot possibly produce. That is where the stable market is; that is the market we should encourage.

Let us for a moment look at the British preference. It was first brought to the attention of the British people by the late Joseph Chamberlain, one of the brightest minds of his day, and it had been the dream of every Prime Minister of Canada from confederation down to get some preference in that market. But they failed. It was a herculean task to get Great Britain, whose proud boast it had been that her ports were all open to the commerce of the world, to break away from her old moorings and to declare a tariff against other countries. It was a tremendous task, but it was accomplished by the present leader of the opposition, (Mr. Bennett) then Prime Minister of Canada, at the Ottawa conference in 1932. At the conclusion of that conference it was agreed that the delegates should go back to their respective parliaments and ask them to endorse the agreement, and every government in the empire endorsed it at once, except Canada. They knew they had received what they had been longing for; they knew it was a good bargain. But what was the spectacle in Canada? The present Prime Minister, (Mr. Mackenzie King) then leader of the opposition, kept us here week after week denouncing that treaty and declaring that if he ever got into power he would repeal it. But it was made law in Canada by forcing a vote through the house, with every Liberal member, with the exception of one man, voting against it. That man will go down in history as the only Liberal of sound judgment of that day.

These British preferences have kept Canada solvent and her farmers from bankruptcy. Take one commodity, pork. When these preferences came into force pork was selling at from $3.75 to $4; at once it went up to $8, and the price has been hovering between $8 and $9, having been as high as $10. We have a preference of $1.50 on apples; we have a preference of six cents a bushel on wheat. The British Empire produces within its own borders everything that mankind requires. Why not build up within our own bounds a great nation, trading among ourselves, and buying outside only those things that we cannot produce? That is what will make this country prosperous.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1938-39

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1939, was presented by Hon. Charles A. Dunning (Minister of Finance), and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at this time of course I cannot make the customary motion referring these estimates to the committee of supply, because that committee is not yet set up and cannot be set up until the debate on the address concludes. At the appropriate time I shall make the motion of reference. In the meantime, due to the fact that there is a complete change in the form of the estimates this year, I desire to ask the indulgence of the house so that I may make a brief statement with regard to the estimates in order that hon. members may have it before them in Hansard to-morrow morning when they are studying the estimates.

In the budget speech of last year I made an attempt to show the percentage distribution of our revenues and expenditures, but found it necessary to point out that the form of our estimates and appropriations made it impossible to achieve accuracy in such calculations. I then stated that before another year had passed I hoped to be able to introduce such changes in our procedure regarding estimates and accounts as would make it possible to determine more accurately the real costs of the various services of government.

I am glad to be able to announce to the house that the main estimates for 1938-39, which are now being tabled, are being presented in a new form, with what I believe is a greatly improved classification and with much greater detail. The purpose of the revision is to facilitate a greater control over expenditures and to present a clearer and truer picture of the operations of government.

The need for revision has been recognized for years, in that items in the estimates did not reflect the cost of services. In this respect they were actually misleading, because, with few exceptions, they were supplemented from civil government or other appropriation of a general character. Other defects included provision for numbers of distinct activities under one general item, and assembly of items under obsolete captions without relationship to existing departmental responsibility. The principal object of the revision is to give to parliament, by removal of these defects, a reasonably accurate estimate of the costs of functions, assembled under the departments responsible for administration.

Application of this principle involved rearrangement of votes and disappearance of the civil government and miscellaneous sections. It also involved selection of the distinct services or projects on which the taxpayer's money is spent and insertion of an item for each. As all expenses cannot be allocated on this basis, the remainder for the department or branch has been included under an item for administration of the department. As comparison with estimates of the previous year are always of first rate importance to parliament, these have been shown in each instance. The amount entered for 1937-38 is the sum voted for that particular function, though it may have been authorized under several general or specific votes for that year. Any member interested may obtain details of these allocations of former votes in committee of supply.

The new form is composed of two main sections. The first, to page 53, is made up of items to be included in the supply bill, together with statutory appropriations, each of which is marked with the letter S. The second section, from page 54 to the end, is for the information of parliament and will not be in the supply bill. In the first section, division by items has been with the object of showing clearly the cost of the various services carried on by the government. The second section, which is entirely new, is designed to furnish parliament with detailed information as to how the various proposed votes are to be spent. For convenience the page number of the details is printed opposite each item.

In effect, items in the first section will become votes which must be administered strictly in accordance with their terms and amounts. On the other hand, the details by objects of expenditure contained in the second section may be varied to meet administrative requirements. In general, they will be the basis of classifications compiled by each department at the beginning of the fiscal year under the terms of section 26 of The Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act. These classifications are submitted to the Department of Finance at the beginning of the fiscal year, and may not be amended except with approval of the treasury board.

The ruling principle of this revision has been the endeavour to furnish the cost of functions. At the same time, it has been necessary to give due consideration to the requirements of administration, accounting and audit, since all are necessary to a full measure of parliamentary control. While the new form is an attempt to meet all essentials, it is not regarded as final. Rather, it is believed that experience in operation and consideration here will suggest further improvements for future years.

I need not say that the changes which have been made have resulted in a great deal of work during the past year for all the departments and for the treasury board. It will be clear, also, that the larger number of votes will probably increase the work of my colleagues and their departmental officials in getting their estimates through the house. We have, however, received the cooperation of all departments in making the revision possible, and I trust that the changes which have been introduced will, after study, commend themselves to the house.

This explanation appearing in Hansard in the morning, Mr. Speaker, together with copies of the estimates which will be distributed to hon. members as soon as the distribution office can arrange it, I am sure will enable hon. members to achieve a thorough understanding of the revision itself and particularly of the objects which it is sought to attain.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. J. N. Francœur for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Bennett.

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): When the house rose for the dinner recess, Mr. Speaker, I was discussing the imperial trade agreements. I wish to repeat that in my opinion they were the greatest accomplishment of the Canadian people in the last fifty years. They were something we were all proud to get. They have benefited all classes of our people, and they are something that the Canadian people as a whole wish to guard zealously.

If at this session something is not done to increase the prosperity of the masses of our people we may have some trouble in Canada which we do not anticipate. We look at Italy, at Germany and at Russia; we say these things cannot happen in this country, but when we realize the dissatisfaction that exists to-day from the Atlantic to the Pacific, who can tell what will be the outcome.

There is another question to which I should like to direct the attention of the house. I refer to those underpaid men who deliver the mail in our rural sections. Last year this question was brought to the attention of the house but nothing was done. We have no more faithful servants in the Dominion of Canada than the men who daily, rain or shine, deliver the mail at the farmers' gates, but they are the most underpaid class in this country. All they ask is fair treatment. I should like to suggest this to the government, that they put the rural mail carriers on the same basis as the men who deliver mail in the cities. A salary is set for those men; positions are advertised, at $1,200 a year, or whatever it may be. The government say: "Here is a position worth so much money," and they select from the applicants the man whom they consider best qualified for the position. In the country they say; "You fellows bid against one another and we will give the job to the man who bids lowest." I think that is an injustice. These men in hard times have been bidding rural routes down for less than half the proper amount. Why not establish a mileage percentage? A route is surely worth so much per mile. Advertise for the drivers and select from the applicants the man best qualified, not the man who puts in the lowest estimate on the value of his own services.

I have very little time left in which to speak. In the few minutes left to me, however, may I say that we are living in a country composed of men of different races, different creeds, and different nationalities, and the greatest task lying before the statesmen of Canada to-day is to weld these peoples together into one harmonious whole in building up a great Canadian nation. We all have something to learn.

Nothing annoys me more than to hear one class of our people speaking against another class. We must learn that the man at our right hand or at our left hand, whether he worships at the same altar as we worship at, whether this is the land of his birth or the land of his adoption, or whether he speaks the same language as we speak, is after all a brother Canadian and one who is building on the same foundations as we are, the foundations laid by the fathers of confederation, a structure which we hope may be the pride of the whole British Empire.

Let us throw aside these petty differences and let us judge our political questions on their face value and not in the manner they are too often judged. I am sorry to say that in my opinion the present government does not possess the courage to grapple with the momentous questions which present themselves to-day. Faced with responsibility, they choose to shirk it. They say, "Oh, we will appoint a royal commission," and they keep on saying this until, in order to prevent collisions, traffic officers have to be called in to regulate the commissions on the road. They say, "We will refer it to the courts," or "Let parliament settle it," or "Let George do it"—anything to evade responsibility. If in this session legislation is not brought down to improve conditions in which our people find themselves I would call upon the ministry to resign. I would say: Give the people of Canada a chance to elect a government which will have the courage and fortitude to do its duty by the people.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with what I have to say on the address in reply I should like to join with other hon. members who have spoken, and with those who have not spoken, in offering a word of welcome to the mover and seconder, who are new members in the house. I think there could be no time more fitting than the present for two men with experience in the two older provinces of the dominion to come to the house. We are considering changes in our constitution which have to do with the relationship existing between the dominion parliament and the legislatures of the provinces, and I am sure the two men coming to the house at the present time, one with experience in the old province of Quebec, and another with experience in the legislature of the old province of Ontario, will add greatly to the strength of the house in dealing with questions of this kind. The manner in which each of them acquitted himself in moving and seconding the address must add to the welcome which hon. members will extend to them.

In listening to the address of the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), I was of course interested in the remarks he had to make relating to the department I have the honour to administer, and more particularly was I interested in the pleasure he seemed to get out of referring to the activities having to do with the relations between myself and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and myself and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) during the past summer.

With reference to the Minister of Labour I wish to say only this, that we are in entire agreement with regard to all matters having to do with labour, even with regard to the Committee for Industrial Organization. During the late fall I had occasion to discuss in the province of Ontario the activities of the former federal government, which held office prior to 1935, and the activities of the present government of Ontario in dealing with labour matters. I had occasion to call attention to the fact that on every one of three occasions on which the former federal government came into Saskatchewan to deal with labour questions the result was that certain persons were taken to the graveyard, others to the hospital and still others to gaol. But whatever else may be said of the present government of Ontario, they have settled their labour troubles without cracking any heads, without sending anyone to the penitentiary, and certainly without sending anyone to the graveyard.

Mr. LAWSON: A tribute to the people of Ontario.

Mr. GARDINER: The activities of the government in power prior to 1935 extended not only to Saskatchewan but to other provinces, and with similar results. In making those comparisons it was not necessary for me to refer at all to the Committee for Industrial Organization. In settling labour troubles in Canada we have been able to deal with them in the manner in which the Minister of Labour has stated is the proper way to deal with them, and on all those points I agree with the Minister of Labour in the federal government.

One other matter which is of great importance has to do with the distribution of feed and fodder in the drought areas of western Canada. I should like to read to the house, in order to recall the statements made, what was said by the leader of the opposition in connection with this matter. The right hon. gentleman said:

I feel quite sure, however, that if we could set up the machinery suggested by that report we might be able to provide, shall we say, some provincial premier with larger powers, as were proposed with respect to a high commissioner.

However, I have only this to say with respect to the administration of the act: It is still a politically administered act. At the proper time and place I have an enormous number of communications I should like to bring to this chamber, provided the reading of them would not worry the house. But with respect to the relief afforded to those who have been so unfortunate as to live within the areas in question, it is quite clear that this government has divorced itself from some of its responsibility, and has left it with the provincial administration.

Then the right hon. gentleman proceeded to give what he looked upon as a statement of what might occur in the drought areas of western Canada. I wish to state for his benefit that I think, after I have reviewed the method of administration which has been set up, he will realize no such situation could have developed in the drought area and have been dealt with in the manner in which in his address he stated certain cases had been dealt with.

Before doing that, I should like to call the attention of the house to the fact that the leader of the opposition states that he has in his possession numerous communications, from western Canada I assume, containing complaints based upon cases similar to that which he submitted to the house. I have in my office several files of communications containing complaints and expressing appreciation of what has been done in the drought area. I have had a search of the files made, but I could find no complaint similar to the one brought to the attention of the house the other day by the leader of the opposition.

That being the case, what I want to point out is this: If after the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars—it will extend into millions—in western Canada, it is being insinuated that money is being wasted through the distribution of feed and fodder, then the leader of the opposition is the only one connected with the affairs of the house who has had sufficient information to stop that expenditure of money. Instead of placing his information before the department which I happen to administer, for political reasons he has been talking about the matter up and down the length and breadth of Canada. Finally he has brought it into the house, not in the form of a charge or by reading correspondence, but by saying that he has numerous letters which he will present some place, somewhere, some time, after the money has been spent and any loss incurred. Any hon. member, whether sitting in opposition or otherwise, who receives that kind of communication should place it immediately in the hands of the responsible minister in order that an unnecessary expenditure of money may be stopped. The right hon. gentleman goes on to say:

His efforts may induce the authority to say that the ten may be increased to fifteen.

There are no such figures in connection with any of the regulations that have gone out from this department. He continues:

This government is not doing it, but it is being done by the provincial government. However, the effects are reflected upon us because we are providing the money with which these matters may be taken care of. That is going on, and it is only natural that it should.

With all due respect to the leader of the opposition, I say that if there are cases where it is going on they have not been brought to our attention. I refer to the type of case of which he has been speaking. If it is going on, it should not be going on. If it is going on, I would say that it is not going on with more than five per cent of the people of western Canada who have been given assistance by this government. There is no reason for a member of the house who holds the high position which the leader of the opposition does, to say at this stage, when we are in the middle of the season, "it is only natural that it should." It is not natural that it should. The right hon. gentleman continues:

These conditions are inevitable if the conduct of business is left to purely political sources.

And again:

I repeat that when the money of the taxpayers is being spent in this way it certainly should be done by some independent commission, if possible, so as to prevent not only the opportunity but the temptation for political administration.

I intend to deal with those statements by outlining to the house what has happened during the past few months by way of criticism outside the house, and also by outlining the method of administration set up and what has been accomplished under that method. About October 6 last the leader of the opposition made a statement in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, which was reported by the Canadian Press, in which he levied charges against me as Minister of Agriculture in connection with the administration of relief in western Canada. The right hon. gentleman was reported as having said that I was building up an enormous political machine through the administration of relief.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. GARDINER: And my right hon. friend says, "Hear, hear." He then proceeded from Charlottetown to Brandon, Manitoba, where he made almost the identical statement. He then proceeded to Regina. I then thought it about time that I paid a little attention to this matter, seeing that he was in my home province. I sent a statement to the press pointing out that the administration of relief was being conducted through the municipalities in Saskatchewan. Speaking to an audience in Regina the right hon. gentleman came back with the reply, "Yes, it is turned over to the municipalities, but the municipalities are only a cog in the Liberal political machine."

In Saskatchewan there are some 301 municipalities with councils of six; there are somewhere in the neighbourhood of seventy-eight or seventy-nine towns with councils of five; there are some 400 villages and hamlets with councils of three, and there are some eight cities with the usual city council. He was saying that the members of these councils throughout the province were simply cogs in the political machine of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan. There is no one in that province or outside it who believes that. I am certain that my friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, some of whom come from Saskatchewan or of the Social Credit group, two of whom come from that province, will not admit that the councils in the municipalities which they represent are composed of men who are cogs in any political machine, Liberal, Conservative or otherwise. If I had the time to-night I could recite the conditions existing in many of these councils and convince even the leader of the opposition that his statement was not correct.

What I wanted to point out was this: When the leader of the opposition spoke in Charlottetown and Brandon he placed the blame on my doorstep; when he spoke in the city of Regina he placed the blame on the doorstep of the councils who he said were only a part of the Liberal political machine in that province; when he spoke in Vancouver he repeated the statement. But when he comes into the house, after having gone all the way across Canada, he does not say the Minister of Agriculture is to blame; he does not say the councils in Saskatchewan are to blame; he says the provincial government is to blame. But he does not say it is the provincial government of Saskatchewan or the provincial government of Alberta that is to blame; he does not say that he checked the cases in the federal or provincial departments; he simply makes the blanket statement that something has happened somewhere which is not exactly right. When he reaches the point where he can be faced by the administrators of the department he then lays the blame at the door of a provincial department that is miles away.

In order to indicate whether or not there has been a political set-up in connection with the organization I should like to call the attention of the house to what has happened in connection with the administration of relief in the drought area. In 1936 we determined very early in the season—not as early as this year—that some assistance would have to be given in the areas which had been dried out in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta over a period of some five or six years. We took the number which had to have assistance on September 1 and adopted those people immediately as the particular care of the federal government. We said to the provincial governments that we were prepared to enter into an agreement to deal with those particular municipalities and provide them with feed and fodder and direct relief. I am dealing only with feed and fodder at the moment because it is in connection with this that the attack is made. As time went along and other municipalities found it absolutely essential that they receive assistance, they would submit their requirements to the provincial government, the provincial government would consider them and if they passed upon them favourably they would turn the matter over to the federal government. We examined into conditions existing in the municipality and determined finally whether it should be admitted or not. We started off with, I think, somewhere about 105 municipalities in Saskatchewan, about nine in Manitoba and about sixty or seventy in Alberta. Then we added to them from time to time until we came to the middle of the month of February, and by the end of that period we had a considerably larger number of municipalities admitted.

What I want to point out to the house is that we found this weakness in that method, that many of the municipalities had to wait for days and weeks, and on occasion even a month, in order to get a final decision from Ottawa after all the inspections had been made; so this year we determined upon a different line of action in order to take care of that area. The Minister of Labour and I, together with a representative of the Saskatchewan government—and when we were in Alberta we got into touch with those who were interested in the matter there—drove over that whole area. We skirted the boundaries of it all, passing first along the United States boundary; then we went up to Medicine Hat, from there to Brooks, from there to Hanna in Alberta. Then we went down the Goose Lake line to Kindersley, then north to Battleford, from Battleford to Saskatoon, and from Saskatoon down the east side of Long lake to the city of Regina. In that drive I think we covered somewhere in the neighbourhood of 2,500 miles in order to find the boundaries of the area that would require assistance this year, and we located them fairly closely.

We also had information from the municipalities and the provincial governments as to the requirements of these different areas, and finally we made an arrangement of this kind with the provincial governments: We said to Alberta: We are prepared to take in fifty-two municipalities in this province, beginning with the first of September, and carry all the costs of providing feed and fodder and direct relief for these fifty-two municipalities to the thirty-first of March next. We went into Saskatchewan and said: We are prepared to take care of 170 municipalities in Saskatchewan, bearing the entire cost of providing feed and fodder and direct relief from the first of September to the thirty-first of March.

Application was made from Manitoba on behalf of three or four municipalities, but we took the position that three or four municipalities—and I think the number might have been extended to probably nine or ten had the matter been pressed further—or even nine or ten municipalities requiring relief in one whole province did not constitute a problem sufficiently great to warrant the federal government stepping in and taking care of them. In other words, we said that in view of the fact that Manitoba had had a good crop over the greater part of the province they should be able to take care of the requirements of nine or ten municipalities this year. May I say that when the other two provinces get anywhere near the position that Manitoba occupied this year, it will be the policy of the government to stop giving this assistance to Saskatchewan and Alberta.

When we adopted those 170 municipalities in Saskatchewan and fifty-two in Alberta, there was still left a very considerable area outside. In Saskatchewan there are eighty-nine other municipalities that are almost as bad this year as any of the 170 municipalities were in the worst years they went through prior to 1937. Conditions are almost as bad as they were in the worst part of the province in 1931, or in 1934, 1935 or 1936, and the drought has extended over the whole of Saskatchewan this year. The province said to us: We are not in a position entirely to take care of that other area, and they asked us in the first instance to pursue the same policy as we had followed last year. But we suggested this change, that this year we would allow them a definite cash grant to take care of the area outside the 170 municipalities in Saskatchewan and outside the fifty-two municipalities in Alberta, and that we would give $1,000,000 to Saskatchewan and $100,000 to Alberta, and would expect them to find any additional money that was required beyond that $1,000,000 in Saskatchewan and $100,000 in Alberta to take care of the situation. That is the policy we have been following this season. We have one hundred per cent of responsibility in the 170 municipalities in Saskatchewan and in the fifty-two municipalities in Alberta, but the provincial governments are taking care of the administration of relief in the whole area, taking care of any costs over and above the cash we have granted to them outside the federal area, and they are entirely responsible for deciding the time at which these municipalities shall come in throughout the year and for carrying on negotiations with regard to them.

I wanted to make that plain because there is just the possibility that the leader of the opposition has been getting his information from the area that is outside the federal area altogether, and if so, any criticism of his remarks here would naturally come from the provincial government rather than from this government. But any criticism with regard to the other area, the area in connection with which we keep a close check on expenditures—by "we" I mean the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Finance, through the check which the auditors are making—concerns the federal government because we are taking responsibility in connection with all expenditures there.

As to the suggestion that a commission should be set up, this is not the first time such a suggestion has been made. As a matter of fact, a commission was set up previously so far as Saskatchewan is concerned. A commission was set up there in 1931, during the period when the last government was in office at Ottawa; and when the leader of the opposition says, as he did in the words I have just read to the house—

> I repeat that when the money of the taxpayers is being spent in this way it certainly should be done by some independent commission, if possible, so as to prevent not only the opportunity but the temptation for political administration—

—I say, Mr. Speaker, that we do not have to look ahead to see what the right hon. gentleman might do if he were in charge of government, because we have only to look back to see what he did do. He was in charge of this matter from 1931 to 1935, and there were relief areas in Manitoba in those years; there were relief areas in Alberta, and there was a considerable relief area in Saskatchewan, but not so great an area in any of those years as we have had to deal with this year. What did the previous government do with regard to the matter? They set up a commission, yes, but they set up only one commission, and it operated in only one province. They did not set up a commission in Manitoba; they did not set up a commission in Alberta; they set up a commission in Saskatchewan, the only province that had a government which was favourable and friendly to the government then in power at Ottawa.

Mr. BENNETT: May I correct the hon. gentleman? He is in error. The commission was set up by Saskatchewan and named by it; there was no commission in Alberta or Manitoba because of the limited nature of the relief operations that were carried on there. They were carried on by the provincial governments and we gave them assistance.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and those areas were somewhat limited as compared with other areas during last year. I have no doubt some of the criticisms of which the right hon. gentleman speaks, are coming from Alberta. I venture to say that I have as many criticisms from Alberta as I have from Saskatchewan with regard to administration, and I assume he has too. In so far as the matter of principle is concerned, if we are spending say a million and a half or two million dollars in Alberta and seven or eight million dollars in Saskatchewan, it is just as essential that there should be a commission in one province as in another, and it always has been so from the beginning. But in so far as the leader of the opposition is concerned, when he was in office he appointed or stood for the appointment of a commission only in the one province which had a government that was friendly to the government at Ottawa.

Mr. BENNETT: We did not spend any money for Alberta or Manitoba except through the provincial government.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, we have not spent any money in either Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta except through the provincial government.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes, you have.

Mr. GARDINER: Now the right hon. gentleman is suggesting that in one province we should spend through the commission and in the other provinces, I suppose, spend through the provincial governments. I have on my desk a list of the people the commission employed. Do hon. members know how many were employed by the commission or rather by those who were administering its affairs? It might be well at this stage to point out the way these commissions are usually set up. The commission was set up in this manner in Saskatchewan. They took five men, all of whom were busy men, all of whom had their own businesses to attend to, made them a commission, and said, "We are going to make you responsible for administering relief in the province of Saskatchewan."

Mr. BENNETT: There was a woman besides.

Mr. GARDINER: One of the commissioners was running a whole banking system in the province. Another was carrying on an important business. There was one woman, the wife of a farmer, and every one in the house knows how busy the wife of a farmer is. These people were put in charge of the administration of relief in Saskatchewan. Well, they did what any one does under such circumstances. They went out and hired a group of men to administer relief. Do hon. members know whom they hired? They hired the organizer of the Conservative party from Moose Jaw to take charge of the work; they hired the organizer of the Conservative party from the city of North Battleford to take charge of the field staff, and they hired another organizer of the Conservative party to take charge of the distribution of food relief. They put these men in the office. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, how many men and women they hired during the time they were operating? Eight hundred and thirty-nine. They did not stop there. They would not work through the councils of the municipalities. They went out into the municipalities and selected a senate for those municipalities, an appointed body to do this work. They took one man and made him a paid official, and then they had four persons selected from the municipality to sit in the central office or some other room—they usually hired another room in the town where the municipal offices were—and administered the relief of the province in that way, the council sitting one day and considering the affairs of the municipality, and this selected body of the commission sitting another day and considering the matter of the distribution of relief in the particular place. The paid officials formed a field staff in the pay of the province, and all the money for the payment of relief was provided by grant made by the right hon. gentleman's government from Ottawa.

I do think, with the system we have now under which this government is paying, when we are at the peak of our movement, forty-five men, our administration, in matters of cost at least, compares very favourably with the eight hundred and thirty-nine that the leader of the opposition had through the province in charge of relief at the time he was in office.

Mr. BENNETT: It is necessary to correct that. The eight hundred men were not employed by the federal government, nor were any of them. They were employed by the commission which was appointed by the province.

Mr. GARDINER: That is quite right, Mr. Speaker, but I happened to be leader of the opposition in Saskatchewan during the time this was going on, and I know whom they selected in my constituency. During the time I had been conducting elections in that constituency I had had three opponents, and every one of them was represented among those employed. The opponent in the previous election of the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) who represented the same seat in this house, was employed, and two out of the four men I have mentioned lived in the same municipality.

Mr. BENNETT: But they were not employed by the federal government.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, the right hon. gentleman did not make very many checks on how they were employed. Apparently he was not so concerned about checks then as he is now. We have forty-five men going about seeing that these things do not happen.

When we came into power in Saskatchewan, what did we do? I mention this because the right hon gentleman, speaking in the city of Regina, had called to his attention by a previous speaker that there had been no criticism in Saskatchewan while that commission was in office, and I think he repeated the statement at the Regina meeting, that he understood these were prominent citizens and that there had been no criticism. I believe I spoke in pretty nearly every town in Saskatchewan during the time the former provincial government was in office, and I did not miss any opportunity in any town of criticizing them, just as I am criticizing them now, pointing out to the people exactly what I am pointing out to the house, namely that a commission cannot properly check such an administration. As a result, when the election was over every man who had stood for that kind of commission administration in Saskatchewan was defeated, and all but five of those who opposed it were elected. When we came in, of course we dismissed the commission and set up the organization that is there to-day.

There was one other criticism that was made, not by the leader of the opposition but by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), to which I wish to call attention. He said, as reported on page 106 of Hansard of February 2:

> Much more was I depressed last year to see that the government were not taking effective steps early enough—and may I emphasize those words "early enough"—to meet the situation that was upon us last summer. At the end of June in the town of Rosetown, in my own constituency, I attended a meeting of farmers and business people at which resolutions were passed urging the government to take immediate and effective steps to retain in its present position the grain that was then in the elevators in that constituency, in order to protect the people of that area.

And then he says he was invited to another meeting:

> There again resolutions were passed pointing out the situation and emphasizing the need for the conservation of the seed and feed then in that area. Those resolutions, I am told, were forwarded to Ottawa, yet my observation was that in the weeks that followed, the elevators were virtually emptied of the grain that was there.

I have been in both of these towns, Mr. Speaker, and indeed in most of the towns in Saskatchewan. I want to point out that there are a thousand and more pool elevators in that province. There is one at every important loading point in the province, and those elevators have the grain in them. If there is any grain there the pool elevators, by themselves, will have more than fifty per cent of it, because they take in approximately fifty per cent. Located as they are in both the north and the south—and they are about the only elevator company that is so located—a large percentage, I would say at least sixty per cent and probably seventy-five per cent, of the grain that is moved from the northern areas of the province to the southern areas or that is retained in its possession in order to take care of the farmers' needs, is held in the pool elevators. For that reason I suggest to my hon. friend that the elevator companies that owned the grain belonged to the farmers who wanted the grain.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would ask the minister if he expects the pools to carry a load which properly belongs to the government.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. COLDWELL: Because of the position of the market at that time in relation to cash and future prices. The government cannot expect the pools for ever—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COLDWELL: —to carry this business for the country.

Mr. GARDINER: It is quite all right. No, Mr. Speaker, I do not expect the pools to carry what ought to be carried by the government, but I am going to point out to the hon. gentleman in a moment that we did not leave it to the pools to carry it either.

Mr. COLDWELL: Why blame them?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not blaming them. It was my hon. friend who blamed them, and I am going to read something else he blamed them for which is more important. My hon. friend said yesterday afternoon—I had better read it now, because it just covers his point—

> On the part of the elevator companies I say that was perfectly natural.

It is strange how nearly the language of the hon. gentleman approximates that of the leader of the opposition. I say, Mr. Speaker, that no elevator company in western Canada has ever done any such thing at any time; it has never taken grain out of Saskatchewan when it was needed by the farmers of Saskatchewan. That has never been done either by the pool elevators or by any elevator company. To continue with the quotation:

> I say further, however, that the government, if it had wished, could have closed the speculative market; it could have discontinued the trading in futures and indemnified the companies involved, if necessary, against subsequent loss due to that governmental action.

Let me tell the house what we did do. We gave certain instructions to the wheat board, about which my hon. friend has something to say. Without any blowing of trumpets, or waving of flags, or answering letters from people who make criticisms at times when criticism does more damage than good, we instructed the wheat board to get the wheat needed for seed next year, without telling anyone that they were getting it, and to put it into the storage elevators or, where it was not advisable to do that, to keep it in storage where it was. In other words, the wheat necessary for seed next year was provided in very large part long before my hon. friend attended these meetings at all. So that so far as early action was concerned, the fact is that while these meetings were being organized we were busy doing the job. The hon. gentleman goes on to say:

> But it allowed that speculative market, about which I have complained from time to time, to continue to operate. The government, which had destroyed the effectiveness of the wheat board method of marketing—

As a matter of fact, we made it very effective in order to do the thing he is worrying about.

> —again remained inert in the face of the pending situation. Can we wonder if the farmers believe the statement that the party now in office at least to some extent was a beneficiary in connection with campaign funds from members of the grain trade?

Again, the language is very similar to that used by the leader of the opposition; and, again, it is only an insinuation and not a charge. To the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) I would say that when he has been longer in the house, or it may be in some other house, he will realize that when a man across the floor throws out vague insinuations in his remarks he is not making a charge. When a man makes a charge in the house he stands up and places his constituency at the disposal of his electors. The leader of the opposition has not made any charge of that kind in connection with anything, within my hearing, since I have been in the house, and I do not think he is very likely to do so on this particular occasion. The hon. member says further:

> That is a suggestion which is made from time to time.

He does not want to take responsibility for it; no, he never does want to take responsibility for anything like that. He throws out an insinuation and has it spread broadcast to do all the harm it can to the party he opposes, and his objective is reached. To continue the quotation:

> The other evening in the house we heard a more specific statement by the leader of the opposition, and, later, briefly mentioning the matter in his speech, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that he would like advice as to how the situation could be dealt with.

And the hon. gentleman leaves it there.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, read on; read the next sentence.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, he has something else to say, but not with regard to that. He says:

> The time has come, in the interests of clean and decent government in Canada, when political parties should be compelled to publish the sources of all their campaign funds—all of them—in order that we may know the interests and influences behind the election of the governments in this country.

I assume that by this he means that opposite their names you should put the amount you have collected. Well, I believe that there are some hon. members who have had some experience in politics, and I have no doubt they will agree with me when I say that if you published on the front pages of the papers any amount of money that you collected for campaign funds, whether $5,000 or $500,000, before night there would be twenty times as many men to take it away from you as there were contributors. Yes, and someone suggests that even some members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation would be there to get some of the Liberal funds. Further, the hon. gentleman says:

> The result of the condition to which I have referred means that the government has had to ship in grain for feed and, in the spring, will have to ship in grain for seed. This means that farmers unfortunate enough to have neither seed nor feed, or only one or the other, will be penalized both ways on that account.

The federal government is paying the bill so that the farmers will not be penalized on account of feed.

Mr. COLDWELL: But the taxpayers are paying it and the farmers are taxpayers.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and the federal government represents the taxpayers of all Canada. We shall have to worry about more people than those that are getting feed and fodder; it is because we are worrying about these people that we have had these forty-five men checking up both grades of feed and distribution in the areas in which the feed is given out, and where we have had complaints we have sent out the mounted police. I will say further that if my hon. friends, whether they sit in the Conservative opposition or in the ranks of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation—

An hon. MEMBER: Which is the same thing.

Mr. GARDINER: Someone says it is the same thing. I say that if hon. gentlemen, whether among the Conservatives or the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation or the Social Credit group, will bring to our attention any complaints they think should be investigated, and will produce sufficient evidence to warrant it, we will send the mounted police out to look into all those cases in regard to which there are complaints.

There are one or two remarks I wish to make with regard to the criticism that we did not act soon enough. I have on my desk a list of orders in council and the dates upon which they were passed. My hon. friend says that in the latter part of June he went through the area and knew that conditions were difficult. I was in the area in the early part of June and was aware of the difficulty, and I came back to Ottawa and placed before the government the conditions as they existed out there at that time. We discussed the matter in council and on June 24, 1937, passed the first order in council to deal with it. That order in council had to do with the shipping of live stock out of the drought area. We passed a second order in council on July 22nd, authorizing agreements with the provinces for the purpose of dealing with the provision of feed and fodder. On July 23rd we passed an optional marketing plan, and on September 29, a food distribution plan. Governor general's warrants were issued in order to cover the cost. On August 6, there was one for $5,900,000; on September 29, $7,640,000; on September 29, $1,000,000; on October 29, $6,850,000, for feed and fodder in Alberta and Saskatchewan. I quote these dates and figures to indicate that action was taken in the last week in June by order in council, and orders in council were passed from time to time as required to take care of the situation.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister file the orders in council?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I have copies before me. I said a moment ago that we started at first with a shipment of live stock, and I wish to explain why that was done. The only legitimate criticism that I have heard with regard to the matter of policy is to the effect that if we depleted the breeding stock of that area we would be doing a disservice to the people there instead of a service. In order to show that nothing of that kind has happened I shall submit a few figures to the house.

The drought area in Saskatchewan is composed of crop districts 1, 2, 3, 4, 6 and 7. The cattle population of that area in 1931 was 726,000 head. The live stock population of the same area in 1935 was 833,000 head, an increase of 107,000. After five or six years of drought in that area there was more live stock there than in the beginning. Some people may say that is a reason for criticism, and it may be at this stage, but I am not sure that it was at that stage. In 1931, when the first crop failure came, those who were considered to be experts in agriculture, whether provincial or federal, said they thought it would be a good thing to get the people of that area into live stock and particularly into cattle, and they encouraged people, instead of taking their milk out of a can, to get a cow. Of course if you get one cow you are likely to have two the next year, and so the increase goes on. These people in that area obtained cattle and those cattle began to increase.

Mr. BENNETT: Some were brought in from the outside, too.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, some were brought in. At any rate in the drought area of Saskatchewan in 1935 there were 107,000 more cattle than in 1931. In Alberta in 1931 there were 491,000 cattle in the drought area. In 1935 there were 621,000, again an increase of about 130,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps it would be fair, would it not, for the minister to say that there was no drought area where those cattle were during the years immediately preceding 1937, which to some extent accounts for the increase in both Alberta and Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, that is true, and these dates I am giving are for June 1 in each year. I am giving these increases not by way of criticism but rather to answer the criticism that is now made, that the area has been depleted of cattle.

In 1936 in the drought area of Saskatchewan we had 826,000 head as against 833,000 the previous year. In other words, on June 1, 1936, a decrease was shown amounting to some 7,000 head. In the drought area of Alberta, as of June 1, 1936, there were 606,000 head, a decrease of about 15,000. Then there was quite a decided change by June 1, 1937. I am not going to say that this was due to the fact that there was a change of government in the interval There was a change of policy, and I think the change of policy was advised by people who were getting more and more information as time went along. Finally they came to the conclusion that this thing was becoming so long drawn out that the shipping in of feed and fodder was much more costly than it would be to provide the amount of relief that would be afforded by having the extra numbers of cattle. So by June 1, 1937, before we started our operations this year at all, the number in the drought area of Saskatchewan was down from 826,000 to 796,000, a decrease of 30,000 in that year. In Alberta the number dropped from 606,000 to 534,000, showing a greater decrease than in Saskatchewan, due largely to the fact that in Alberta there are large ranching areas, and the ranchers were dealing with the situation as they found it.

Mr. BENNETT: And the area in Saskatchewan is much larger.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. In the one province there are small farms with a few head of cattle and in the other there are large ranches with many head.

I might give the total figures for both provinces. In 1931 we had 1,188,000 head of cattle in the entire province of Saskatchewan. In 1937 we had 1,441,000. In other words, we still have 252,000 head more than we had in 1931, so if that number of cattle are still in Saskatchewan no one can say that the country has been depleted of cattle. On June 1 last there were more cattle in Saskatchewan than there were in 1931. In Alberta we have a similar situation. In 1931 there were 1,124,000 cattle and in 1937 there were 1,457,000, or an increase of 333,000.

Now let us look at the figures with regard to shipments during 1937. I said a moment ago that we considered it necessary to get many of these cattle out, and I want to explain why. In the latter part of June we went to the provincial government and asked them to prepare immediately an estimate of the number of cattle in the province and of the number of cattle with which the families in those areas could get along. We also asked them to estimate the cost of obtaining feed and fodder for the total number if they all remained and to estimate the cost in connection with the number that they considered the farmers could get along with. After they made that survey they came back to us and said, "If you allow a family of five in Saskatchewan to keep two cows, and you increase the number from two up to four, depending upon the size of the family; if you allow the same family to keep one beef animal and allow them so many chickens, so many pigs and so on, just what is absolutely essential in order for them to get along, you will require a million tons of fodder to feed that live stock, along with the horses that must be left there in order to put in the crop next season."

Anyone going over that area, as some members of the house did, during the month of July, would see that there was no feed in that area in that month. There were no signs of feed at all. Any feed that was in that entire drought area was in the form of old straw stacks carried over from a previous year, and even those were only around the rim of what had been the drought area, because in some sections there had not been a crop for five or six years. So at that time you could see there was no possibility of figuring that there would be any fodder out of that area at all, and it looked as though we would have to import a million tons of fodder into the drought area. Some of our friends say there is plenty of fodder in Manitoba, but the best records we can obtain from the statistics branch indicate that Manitoba produces only three-quarters of a million tons of fodder in a year, and this was not a good hay year in that province in spite of the fact that their grain crop was good.

Mr. BARBER: What about British Columbia?

Mr. GARDINER: There is very little in British Columbia, when you compare the number of farmers in that province with the number in Saskatchewan. There are 70,000 farmers in this area about which I am talking in Saskatchewan alone, and when you start to supply the necessary feed and fodder for 70,000 farmers the little you would have in British Columbia, and even the surplus you would have down east here, if there were no other surpluses available, would not go very far in feeding that stock. So they went into Manitoba and got a line on all the surplus fodder that was there; they went into Alberta and got a line on all the surplus fodder that was there, and the estimate was that we could not get more than 300,000 tons from the two provinces combined. I may say that estimate has not yet been fulfilled, and is not likely to be fulfilled by the end of the season.

Realizing that, the provincial government determined that they would have to go outside those provinces, so they went into the state of Minnesota and bought all the hay they could get and had it shipped into this area. Then we made arrangements with the railways whereby they cut the rate almost, though not quite, in half as between the western part of the province of Quebec, the province of Ontario and the drought area, in order that hay might be shipped in from the eastern part of Canada to the drought area. With it all they hope to be able to get into the drought area this year somewhere in the neighbourhood of 300,000 tons of fodder for the live stock of that area.

I can quite understand people complaining. I can quite understand people saying that the hay was not there early enough, but I want to say this: Instructions went out from my office, knowing western Canada as I do know it, that no hay was to be delivered until it was absolutely necessary to have it there. I was much more concerned about having hay there in the middle of February than I was in having hay there last October. I was much more concerned about having hay there on the first of March than in having it there on the first of November, when there was no snow on the ground. But hay was in position to move, all the provincial government could get of it, at all times. It has been moved, and in practically every area in Saskatchewan and in Alberta it will be found they have feed and fodder for the numbers of live stock indicated in the figures which were given out at that particular time.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. He may continue, but only with consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. GARDINER: Those numbers were there, and that amount of fodder was required.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand a million tons of fodder was required.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, one million tons.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and you were able to get only 300,000; is that right?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, but I should like to finish the point.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I wanted you to do that.

Mr. GARDINER: About the second to last week in July we had rain in the area which had been affected by drought, and that rain resulted in the growth of some of the seed which had been put in the ground early in the year. It resulted also in the growth of Russian thistle. Russian thistle is a little more than ninety per cent salt, and it does not make particularly good feed. However, if it is cut at the proper time of the year live stock will consume it. Mixed with straw it makes a passable food for live stock. The farmers of that area cut the Russian thistle, along with any little bit of growth which they found on the field. They piled it up and, I assume, would have in the neighbourhood of probably 100,000 or 200,000 tons. It is hard to estimate the amount that is scattered over the area. That has been added to what was shipped in, and by rationing the whole supply, along with increased grain, we hope there will be sufficient to carry the live stock through.

Mr. BENNETT: Will it interfere with the minister if I ask a question?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. BENNETT: What would be the reduction in herds that would take place by the arrangements which were made by the government as to the numbers which were to be kept?

Mr. GARDINER: I have those figures. I might point out that those cattle that are there, and particularly in the condition they are in, would not sell on the market for more than $10 or $15 per head at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: They are unsalable, in fact?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, they are now. There was a time when probably some of them could have been sold. However, to-day they are unsalable. When you are shipping hay from Ontario with a $10 freight rate on it; when you pay $7.50 for the hay and feed an animal a ton and a half—which our friends out west say is not enough—and when that animal is worth only $17 after you have fed it, you can readily see that you have your winter's work for nothing.

In order to avoid that kind of thing going on, and the live stock dying before spring, we undertook to do two or three different things. In the first place, one of the orders in council I mentioned provided for the shipment of cattle out from the area, under provisions whereby the federal government pays all the freight from the farmer's home to some feeding fields which he may be able to find in Manitoba or Alberta. Then we pay the cost of shipping the stock back in the spring. A provision is made whereby we send the breeding stock of persons who can find places to send them, and who have the money to feed them after they are moved.

Mr. BENNETT: Do you supply no fodder in those cases?

Mr. GARDINER: No, not in those cases. I shall deal with the pasture at Carberry in a moment. It was suggested to us that some horses might be fed more cheaply by taking them to the Carberry pasture, and putting them in there. In those cases we paid for the cost of caring for the horses in pasture through the winter, because it is cheaper to feed them there than to feed them in the drought area itself.

On July 23, we passed an order in council setting up what is known as the optional marketing plan. This was a new experiment in connection with this work. However, we thought that in view of the fact that the live stock population had been increasing in the area, we should get the number down. We felt that the government should handle the stock. So, on the basis of the information the government had gathered with regard to the needs of the farmers, we drew up a set of regulations, and those regulations ran somewhat in the terms I have already mentioned to the house.

A farmer with a family of five could keep two cows and, on an average, nine horses. Farmers with larger families could keep up to four cows, depending upon the size of the family, and in addition one beef animal, a certain number of fowl and some hogs. We said to the provincial government, "We would like you to go out to the municipalities, any one of the hundred and seventy the dominion government is going to take care of, and say to them, 'We want you to get your live stock down to these numbers, if you expect the government to supply feed this winter. If you do not expect the government to feed them, you can keep all you like. On the other hand if you do expect the government to feed your live stock this winter we want you to get that live stock down to these numbers' ". Then we were told, "But there are no buyers, and those that are here are beating down our prices." We said, "All right; if you will arrange to asemble the cattle at points we will name we will send men there to grade them. Immediately they are graded we will pay you the Winnipeg price for those cattle in the town where they are graded." That applied to all cattle, with the exception of those ready to go to the butcher. For the butcher cattle we paid the Winnipeg price, less freight. On the canners, on the breeding stock, and on feeder steers, we paid the Winnipeg price at the local market.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the total expenditure?

Mr. GARDINER: I shall come to that. We purchased approximately 90,000 cattle, and those 90,000 were bought in 250 municipalities in Saskatchewan and Alberta. I have the figures for each province, but I believe it is unnecessary to give the details. However the fact is that 90,000 head were purchased.

Mr. BENNETT: At what expenditure?

Mr. GARDINER: At a cost to the government of $340,000, net. That works out to an average of about $3.80 per head on all the cattle we handled. Those cattle were handled in three different ways. The canners we sent immediately to the abattoirs, and took what we could get for them. We had paid a flat price of one and a quarter cents and sent them in and sold them. In previous years we had guaranteed a flat price of one cent, whereas this year we paid one and a quarter. May I say that we got out a lot better than we expected. During the early part of the period, before we got the pasture at Carberry, we had to ship the feeder cattle to the stockyards. However, during the later part of the season we had the pasture at Carberry, which consisted of 130,000 acres of grass land. We shipped the cattle there and let them run on the grass a couple of weeks to freshen them up. Then we classified them into carloads and asked the eastern and American buyers to come and bid on them at auction sales.

They were sold outright and taken away and we pay half the freight, if the farmer who bought them keeps them somewhere in eastern Canada and feeds them for three months. Through that policy we got rid of 90,000 head from the area. Under the half-freight policy we got rid of another number. All told, under the government policies we moved 160,000 head out of the area.

In addition to that, a considerable number of cattle were sold in the ordinary trade. The figures I have before me show that the total number of cattle taken out of the drought area in 1937 was 474,000 head.

I should like to give the number of cattle and calves taken out of Alberta and Saskatchewan. They are:

	Alberta	Saskatchewan
1937..	450,746	611,574
1936..	472,917	401,626
1935..	340,936	335,772

From Saskatchewan we took out 200,000 more in 1937 than in 1936, and 276,000 more than in 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister indicate as a matter of record what the cattle population of those provinces was at the end of 1937? I realize this would be only an estimate.

Mr. GARDINER: I gave those figures a few moments ago, but I can repeat them.

Mr. BENNETT: Do not bother repeating them.

Mr. GARDINER: The total cattle population of Saskatchewan in 1931—

Mr. BENNETT: I was referring to the population after the shipments out in the manner indicated had been made.

Mr. GARDINER: I tried to get those figures, but I am sorry they are not complete. I should think the figure would be somewhere near what it was in 1931. There will be as many cattle in that area at the end of this season as there were in 1931. This brings out the point I started to make, that there is no danger of the cattle population being depleted by anything that is done this year or has been done in previous years. I think this is sufficient to answer the concern which appeared to be in the minds of those who have discussed this matter earlier in the debate and I hope it will settle the question in so far as those who may discuss the matter later on are concerned.

There is only one other matter I should like to deal with before I take my seat, namely the distribution of food in this area by the federal government. Approximately a million dollars has been spent in the distribution of food. There have been one or two criticisms of this work, which criticism I regret but which I do not think it necessary for me to bring to the attention of the house. On the whole, much has been said to commend this matter to the house.

The principal criticism which came from the drought areas in previous years has been that the relief schedules provided for the different-sized families have not been sufficient. I think any one can understand why that criticism has been made.

These families have been accustomed to running out to the garden to get whatever vegetables they required, or to the henhouse to get whatever eggs or fowl were needed, or to have recourse to meat supplies on their own farms. They probably used food much more liberally than other people who might have had to be more careful as to obtaining the food or using it after they had obtained it. There was some difficulty in placing vouchers at the beginning of the month to carry a family of five or ten through to the end of the month.

There is one matter raised by the leader of the opposition which I shall discuss later on in the session. We have had in mind the development of a marketing branch in the Department of Agriculture. For the benefit of those who have been discussing this question during the debate, I may state that we had in mind the fact that between 80 and 90 per cent of the food products of this country are consumed in the country. Therefore we consider it necessary to spend probably 80 or 90 per cent of the money we do spend in order to grade or to classify or to package our products on products to be used in Canada rather than anywhere else. Some of the money voted last year and the year before was for the purpose of setting up an organization in this country to take care of marketing and an organization in the old country and in other countries to check our products to the consumer in order to see that the standard was maintained.

One thing which has always appeared strange to me is the fact that while we claim to make the best cheese in the world in Canada—I think it is acknowledged in the British market that Canadian cheddar cheese is the best cheese made for general purposes—our production dropped from 220,000,000 pounds in 1900 to 100,000,000 pounds in 1935. This decrease in production has been gradual all through the years, no matter what policy was in force or what government was in power. In 1907 there were 190,000,000 pounds of Canadian cheese consumed in the British market, whereas in 1935 this consumption had dropped to 52,000,000 pounds. In so far as New Zealand was concerned, the British market used 27,000,000 pounds in 1907 and 197,000,000 pounds in 1935. In other words, the positions of Canada and New Zealand had been reversed about exactly during those thirty years.

When I came into the department I made some inquiries as to why this was the case. I went to England and the first morning I was there I walked out on the Strand. One-half mile away, facing a stretch of street through which more people walk than any other similar stretch anywhere else in the world, I saw this sign, "Eat New Zealand cheese." Under those words was something about New Zealand butter. Out on the street I saw a bus going by bearing a sign, "Eat Australian lamb." Then I saw another sign, "Eat Australian butter." I walked all the way down to Canada House without seeing the word "Canada." Even when I got there I could hardly see it as it was so bleached out that it could not be seen unless you made a special effort to look for it on the stonework across the top of the door. I make no reference to any government that was in power previously, or to the present government; all I say is that in this modern age you cannot sell Canadian or any other products by that method when you are in competition with a country using the opposite method. The sales of New Zealand and Canadian cheese I think will demonstrate that fact to the satisfaction of any one who examines the figures.

This state of affairs was changed to some extent when the "Canada Calling" campaign was put on. The cheese producers of Ontario, with the assistance of the Minister of Agriculture of the Ontario government of that time, cooperating with the dominion government, sent their secretary over to England to advance the sale of cheese in that market. The result is that the figures show that exports of cheese to the British market last year increased by about 15,000,000 pounds, if I remember rightly, and this year they have gone up an additional 14,000,000 pounds. This year we have sold something in the neighbourhood of 81,000,000 pounds of cheese, whereas we sold only 52,000,000 pounds in 1935. I do not like to comment upon the fact that we took something away from someone else, but the fact remains that sales of New Zealand cheese went down during the same period.

It might be interesting to the house to know that of the sixteen countries in which records are kept, Canada consumes the smallest amount of cheese per capita; yet we are trying to convince the world that we produce the best cheese in the world. There were 74,000 families in western Canada who were not accustomed to eating cheese, but this year they are in the position that they will eat any good food you give them.

Mr. BENNETT: They had to eat it this year.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, as my right hon. friend says, they had to eat it this year. We went into Ontario and into Quebec, where we purchased the best cheese we could buy in the fall of the year and shipped it out to Saskatchewan, and we put an average of thirty pounds of cheese into each of these 74,000 homes in the drought area of Saskatchewan and Alberta. We did that, Mr. Speaker, not only to provide them with good food but as an advertisement for the good cheese which is produced in eastern Canada. So that bill might be in part charged up to advertising the merits of eastern Canada cheese.

I also remembered that in my early days in Ontario I used to go down to the corner grocery store and see those piles of dried cod looking very much like the snowshoes that are used to-day, and just about as hard and dry. I have never seen any of it in western Canada. We conceived the idea of taking some of this good food that will keep well out in the cold, dry climate of Saskatchewan and Alberta, and putting some of that in these homes. We put an average of forty-four pounds of this dried fish into each of these homes, and along with it we sent thirty different recipes showing how it could be prepared, knowing that many of the people there would never have seen it before. We considered that also good advertising for the products of the maritime provinces.

We found that in the province of Ontario, around the city of Toronto, some people had produced too many vegetables, and we went into those areas, bought these surplus vegetables and shipped them west. We did the same in areas around Winnipeg, and I want to add my word of appreciation to what the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) who spoke earlier to-day, had to say. For every car we bought, people living around these areas sent three or four more cars as a gift to the people in the western drought area. Then we bought apples in Nova Scotia and in British Columbia and shipped them in. With some two thousand cars of all these supplies sent in to that area, by gift and purchase, containing beans, fish, cheese, vegetables and fruit, the people of that area had something in their pantries and their basements to draw upon when they were getting near the end of their vouchers for supplies, with the result that there have been fewer complaints coming out of that area this year than have come in any previous year. I might add that I do not think anyone in that area has been overfed as a result of these supplies being sent in. When you find 74,000 families in need of assistance—and with an average of five to a family that would be over 370,000 people—and when you give this assistance as well to those who otherwise would have gone on relief and to those who should have gone on but did not, these people I think will be feeling more kindly not only to governments as governments but also to the great mass of our people in other parts of Canada who made possible the sending in of these supplies.

In conclusion I would say, Mr. Speaker, that if we want to cure communism, which has been talked about; if we want to stop people dressing up in uniforms and holding up their right hand or their left hand—I do not know which it is—and saluting someone else; if we want to make people satisfied with the country in which they are living, I think this method of spending a little money in order to give satisfactions that are not otherwise possible for people who are going through great suffering is the best thing we can do, and the more of it is done the better it will be for our country and the better for those of us who come to this house.

I appreciate this extra time which the house has accorded to me to deal with this question, which is very near to the hearts of everybody in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister be good enough to table to-morrow the orders in council to which he referred, and would he indicate under what authority the wheat board purchased the seed grain, in view of the fact that the limitation is imposed that purchases shall be from the producers only? Second, he might indicate whether they bought wheat or futures.

Mr. GARDINER: It was done not by way of purchase but by way of exchange of contracts held for the actual wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. DUNNING: Retention, not purchase.

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, to avoid vain repetitions, it is not my purpose to make any major comments on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, but in the manner somewhat of an intellectual Autolycus, a snapper-up of unconsidered trifles, I want to make some special references to things which I have noticed.

The Bank of Canada, the central bank of our country, authorized by the government to be the custodian and guardian of the people's currency, has recently issued the bilingual notes. Canada is already a fully established commercial country, and the fine arts and printing industry is definitely and well established here, and can be said, I think, to be second to none. The British American Bank Note Company is probably able to produce as excellent a bank note as any other bank note company in the world. Then why is it, Mr. Speaker, that in launching these notes in a public issue they should be of such a nature as to cause considerable distress and demand continuous acuteness of attention because of their faulty identification? Since coming to the house this session I have already from the cash desks of the house received change for a two-dollar tender instead of a five-dollar tender. True, the error was immediately corrected, but it indicates that there is something wrong with the currency when one is liable in the rapid handling of money to make such mistakes. I think greater care should have been taken in the production of these notes, not only as to their colour but as to their type, and I do hope that in any future printings these same mistakes will not be repeated.

A great many people in this country, a great many more than we are disposed to think, are colour blind as to one or more colours, and when you have your five's and your one's so closely related in colour, green and blue, it is not at all unlikely that in certain coloured lights mistakes will be made. Not only that, but the backing of certain of the notes is very confusing alongside the old issue. I think if the matter is carefully considered by someone in the interests of the currency issue, we shall soon determine that something should be done.

Another thing, in somewhat happier vein. I desire very sincerely to congratulate the government and everybody more particularly connected with the stone carving which has been executed on the front porch or entrance of this stately building. More particularly do I feel satisfied and pleased that the supporters are symbolic. I remember when I left here last session learning that they would probably be, if not Atlantes, then typical of our historic past. The choice of the symbolic supporters for the shields is in my mind more permanently acceptable and I think will prove to be truer to the heraldic significance. Especially was I delighted to discover that the eastern escutcheon is left polished and uncharged. May I hope and have faith that that is left there so that our neighbour whose destinies lie in the isle so long ago discovered by the doughty Bristol rover John Cabot will recognize our quality as a nation and join us and blazon his charges on that waiting shield. Again, let me express pleasure in the treatment of the bosses around the stonework of the building, and with particular reference to the delicate idea which placed the initials of Edwardus Rex and the Roman numerals VIII on the boss immediately over the foundation stone of the Victory peace tower. These things are worth remembering while we are struggling with our political issues, because they represent to us sermons being carved in stones as well as in the hearts of our people.

But there is another matter of an entirely different nature to which I wish to refer. It is almost exactly two years ago since the hon. member for Nanaimo stood in his place to make his speech in somewhat similar case as to-night. In those exciting moments he definitely proclaimed and orientated the political parties in the house and declared, with W. S. Gilbert, that:

> Every little boy and gal
> That comes into this world alive
> Is either a little Liberal
> Or else a little Conservative.

[Mr. J. S. Taylor.]

Nor was he nonplussed at the obvious question: Where, then, is the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation? Let me read just a few words from that speech, on page 181 of Hansard, February 13, 1936:

> If the house is composed of Liberals and Conservatives, where does this puny group of seven orientate itself? The answer is really simpler than the question. For the first time in the history of this august parliament we have come to a truly foundational opposition by a coherent group; and we, sir, are that foundational opposition and that small group, the outgrowth of the long continued and persistent efforts of our respected leader. . . . We are the scientific students of economics which in this day and age of the downfall and portending holocaust of capitalism must discover to the world the personal advantages, the national security and the universal brotherhood which underlie as foundation stones the social structures and the social culture and advancement of the system of society called socialism.

Nor was he to know that within five months of that night he would be placed on suspension by that coherent group and thrown into line for complete expulsion in February of 1937. And so, sir, to be consistent and honest, I say with the deepest regret that in British Columbia at least the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is not a coherent group, nor does it represent any longer a truly foundational opposition to the existing so-called capitalist parties. Tragically, there has been lost to the cause of the constitutional and transitional development towards socialism the greatest mass movement which Canadian politics has ever experienced. I am not talking in spleen or in personal antagonism when I state those facts. I have been too closely identified with the very commencement of the movement in British Columbia to be in doubt of what I say. But I declare with sorrow that the ambitions and machinations of dogmatic and doctrinaire Marxian socialists brought about control of the British Columbia party's convention in 1936 and left no resting or abiding place for the socialists of a liberal structure of mind who would otherwise, in the enthusiasm of their desires, have provided added strength and intelligence to the new and greatly promising party. Whatever my personal thoughts may be, I shall not here lay blame on any particular person or persons, but I have little admiration for the intelligences that could conceive of the possibility of dominating one structure of mind by another without giving it even the opportunity of expressing itself or voicing its discontent. Of course this brings me to the unequivocal statement that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is losing ground in British Columbia and, I would say, in every other province where the same or similar conditions obtain.

It must be apparent, sir, that if I am correct, and there are two structures of political mind, the Liberal and the Conservative, then these must be present in the interpretation of socialism as well as of capitalism. And they are, but not in the manner of the man in the street, who classifies the parties in their approach to socialism as conservatives, liberals, radicals, modern socialists, doctrinaire socialists, communists. The facts are that in capitalism we have the conservative and the liberal; in socialism we have the modern socialist and the doctrinaire or Marxian socialist. The liberal and the modern socialist have similar structures of mind. The conservative and the doctrinaire socialist have similar structures of mind. And if we want any verification of that fact, the obvious statements made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and remarked upon by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will at least have some value in bearing me out.

It thus follows, and it can be proved by numerous examples, that the conservative turned socialist becomes a dogmatic and doctrinaire socialist, and, according to his cultural and ethical outlook, a potential communist. If I am correct, then it must be right to say that fascism is an excess in the cultural and ethical expression of capital conservatism, and evidences will doubtless considerably support me. Through all this, it will be observed, I give communism no place; I give fascism no place in the intellectual structures of our political life. They represent excesses in the moral and ethical development of the conservative, just as unbridled freedom and licence, or, under other conditions, bureaucracy, might represent excesses in the moral and ethical field of liberalism. It matters not whether it be a big stick of wood or a big rod of steel, fascism or communism, it means excess and is to be condemned and despised as such.

Now always, the dogmatic doctrinaire Marxist is a pro-communist; and here lies the grave danger developing out of the separation of the elements in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. Marx wrote the Communist Manifesto in German for the Germans in January, 1848, and Frederick Engels, who to my mind was very often his evil genius, made the following observations in January, 1888, in his introduction to Samuel Moore's translation of the German Communist Manifesto published by Charles H. Kerr and Company, of Chicago. With reference to the time when this was written, Engels says:

> Whatever portion of the working class had become convinced of the insufficiency of mere political revolutions, and had proclaimed the necessity of a total social change, that portion, then, called itself Communist. It was a crude, rough-hewn, purely instinctive sort of Communism; still, it touched the cardinal point and was powerful enough amongst the working class to produce the Utopian Communism, in France, of Cabet, and in Germany, of Weitling. Thus, Socialism was, in 1847, a middle-class movement, Communism a working class movement. Socialism was, on the continent at least, "respectable"; Communism was the very opposite. And as our notion, from the very beginning, was that "the emancipation of the working class must be the act of the working class itself," there could be no doubt as to which of the two names we must take. Moreover, we have, ever since, been far from repudiating it.

Now let me read from the last few lines of the fourth part of the Communist Manifesto:

> In short, the Communists everywhere support every revolutionary movement against the existing social and political order of things.
> In all these movements they bring to the front, as the leading question in each, the property question, no matter what its degree of development at the time.
> Finally, they labour everywhere for the union and agreement of the democratic parties of all countries.
> The Communists disdain to conceal their views and aims. They openly declare that their ends can be attained only by the forcible overthrow of all existing social conditions. Let the ruling classes tremble at a Communistic revolution. The proletarians have nothing to lose but their chains. They have a world to win.
> Working men of all countries, unite!

With such sentiments I will have no truck, nor will I blindly attach any adherence to them. Karl Marx I admire for his most excellent analysis of capital and capitalism—the capitalist economy of his day. His analyses were excellent, but his formulae for the most part leave me entirely unimpressed. Do I then fear the communists? No, save that they destroy everything and every organization to which they attach themselves. And they have attached and are attaching themselves with great assiduity and cunning to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

Through sixteen years, from the meeting of the Third International in Moscow in 1919 until 1935, the Russian-directed communists throughout the world had attempted to foster and project internecine war in every country of the world. In June, 1935, when the International again met in Moscow at their seventh communist congress, they acknowledged having pursued the wrong tactics and declared that thenceforth they must penetrate all human, ethical, social and political organizations everywhere. And this the least observant individual is able to discover to-day. This was in June, 1935. By November, 1935, they were already able to boast of their successful general penetration of the Canadian Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, as perusal of the reports and speeches at the ninth plenum of the central committee of the communist party of Canada in November, 1935, will most abundantly demonstrate. Let me read three short extracts from this publication—and I choose three at random from probably a hundred throughout the book, which it is extremely difficult to get hold of:

We Strive to Remove All Barriers.

On all of these things we have common ground with the C.C.F. How can we win the C.C.F. for common action on all of these issues? How can we open up every possible avenue towards unity of action and remove every possible barrier that stands in the way?

We declare that in the interests of unity of action we are prepared to affiliate to the C.C.F., retaining our freedom of independent action on the basis of genuine democracy and to sincerely work with all our strength to transform the C.C.F. into the broadest united front party, embracing all the trade unions and farmers' organizations and endeavouring to come to an agreement and understanding with the mass organizations of middle class people on the basis of a united front program of action for peace, for democratic rights and to ease the economic position of the masses by shifting the burdens of the crisis on to the shoulders of the ruling class.

Then again on page 50 I find the following:

Cadres Decide Everything.

Let me explain what is meant by "cadres." Three, four or five communists whose loyalty is not doubted are assigned to inter-penetrate an organization. By dint of great purpose of mind, by strict attention to their duties and by working together ultimately they secure positions on committees: possibly a secretariat; possibly a chairmanship; possibly a delegateship, and so on. They wait until all the men who are toilers have gone home, then push through resolutions in their own interests. It is not long before the organization so interpenetrated is directly controlled, with a lightly gloved hand, by the communists. Those are the cadres, and this is what is said:

The organizational commission that we have set up at this plenum is taking up the problem of cadres as the central key problem confronting the party to-day. At the seventh congress of the Communist International this question was placed before all the parties as the decisive key problem. Comrade Dimitroff stated:

"The problem of what should be the correct policy with regard to cadres is the most vital one of our parties as well as the Y. C. L's—

[Mr. J. S. Taylor.]

That is the Young Communist League.

—and all other organizations of the entire labour movement."

Comrade Dimitroff pointed out six basic considerations in respect to the problem of cadres: first of all, we must know our people. Secondly we must institute a proper systematic promotion of new cadres. Thirdly, we must use all of our people to the best advantage. Fourth, we must properly distribute our cadres. Sixth, the party must care for the proper preservation and protection of its cadres.

In this connection may I state that one of the delegates to the 1936 national convention of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, coming from the Fraser valley, was an avowed communist. Again I quote from page 94, and this is the last quotation:

First of all, we want to make the Young Communist League an organization that will have in its ranks not only communists, but also young socialists and youth who are not as yet communists, even youth who may still be Christians,—

Let me emphasize those words, "even youth who may still be Christians."

—an organization which stands on a program of the defence of the economic and political needs of the young people, the cultural interests of the young people, that stands on a platform of struggle against fascism and war and for socialism, but such an organization will not necessarily take a position on soviet power. Such an organization does not fight for soviet power and the dictatorship of the proletariat. It is the task of the communists inside such an organization to convince and educate the young people inside the organization to agree to accept such a position.

I offer no comment, but I do say, after the most mature consideration, that the development of emotional adherence to new political parties and the sway of emotional political adherents by sectional dogmatism, are suicidal errors in political life. Based on this I declare the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party in Canada to be already doomed as a constitutional transitional movement to socialism. It already, too, definitely represents, in British Columbia at least, doctrinaire and dogmatic socialism of the Marx—Engels—Lenin—Stalin type. Though I greatly respect the high quality and purpose of every one of its representatives in the house, I fear they are doomed to find themselves compelled by the body of their procession to march in directions differing entirely from those indicated by the signposts of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

So it is that while still a socialist I declare that I am essentially of the liberal structure of mind, and while my election in 1935 constrains me to call myself an independent for the time being I recognize the weakness to the country and my people in the stand I am constrained to take. I definitely believe that there are many not only potential but essential socialists in the Liberal and Conservative ranks, and I believe it would be to the advantage of the country and its progress if the leaders of the old line parties would declare their readiness to embrace all proper to their particular structure of mind, no matter how their intelligence and purpose may desire constitutionally to vary the country's present economy and economic social system.

In closing, and because I still have an earnest message to deliver, I must advise the government that I intend to vote for the amendment, not essentially because of its contents but as a definite protest against the continuance of orthodoxy in the treatment of the staggering problems of the country to-day.

Mr. H. R. FLEMING (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to follow the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor) in his address in connection with the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and socialism.

In accordance with established custom and constitutional procedure the speech from the throne was presented by His Excellency the Governor General with the usual formalities that mark the opening of parliament. Its adoption was moved by the hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Francœur) and seconded by the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Warren) in addresses that did credit to the occasion and to the house. The speech reviewed, as was its purpose, the situation that confronts the people of Canada to-day, and foreshadowed the more important issues in connection with which we may expect legislative action this session. It took due cognizance of the exceptional conditions under which the people of Canada are labouring at present and of the trying times through which we are passing. It sees problems that ordinarily would be national only in scope seriously complicated by world conditions and economic uncertainty, and it is to those more pressing of our problems that it directs our best efforts at this time.

Before proceeding with what to me, as a westerner, is a matter of paramount importance, I should like to pay tribute to the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King), who represented us so ably and so creditably at the coronation ceremonies of their majesties last spring. All Canadians, regardless of party affiliations could not but feel a glow of pride in the fact that the senior member in the British Commonwealth of Nations was fortunate in having as its representative one so eminently fitted to fill such a difficult role. Tact and urbanity, the prime requisites in state functions, were not wanting in our distinguished Prime Minister on that glorious occasion. Indeed, if the comment of the British press is any criterion, the Canadian Prime Minister deported himself with that dignity and diplomacy befitting the occasion.

To those of us who have followed his public career, and are familiar with his grasp of international affairs, it was not surprising to learn that he was able to enter so understandingly into the spirit of such an occasion, and favourably to impress all those who had so much at heart the success of that important event.

Bound together as we are, not only by ties of race and blood but by ties of common interest, the problem of every section of this great dominion becomes the problem of all. All our thoughts, all our hopes, all our inspirations and all our objectives were unified in that historic document which gave us national birth three-quarters of a century ago and which, throughout the years, has held us together in good report and in evil report, and has enabled us to discharge our national responsibility in a manner which has won the respect of the civilized world and commands the admiration of friend and foe alike.

When the supreme test came in the great war, it was through that test that Canada attained her majority and rose from beneath the wand of the Statute of Westminster to a proud place among the nations of the world. No true Canadian will raise issues which would divide section against section, or do anything to dim the lustre of that proud record. On the contrary. I am sure all with listen sympathetically and understandingly to each economic group as it pleads its case before the House of Commons. No section will discriminate against another on the ground alone of geographic location. Saskatchewan will listen to the maritimes as they present their fishing problem, to Ontario and Quebec as they debate their power issues, to British Columbia in her demands for better marketing conditions, and to Manitoba and Alberta as they offer a solution to the wheat problem. But all these provinces will in turn have to listen to Saskatchewan as she pleads in this, her hour of direst need, for that consideration which is due a people who gave with a lavish hand when they had it to give, and who come now as a member of that great Canadian family for temporary assistance, until the storm shall have passed.

She comes not as a stranger in quest of charity, but as an integral part of that great Canadian family, claiming the consideration which is due her. She stands upon her unquestioned right to temporary shelter within that home which she, by her pioneering spirit, has helped to rear. Discriminated against by transportation rates and tariff walls, under various federal administrations, she did not threaten secession, nor did she openly advocate the formation of any defensive alliances. On the contrary she relied on the goodwill and understanding of those sections of the dominion which had profited by the new market she had opened up to them.

It is upon that goodwill that she relies to-day, in her appeal for a permanent solution of her drought problem. I have studied the speech from the throne which was read in this chamber by you, Mr. Speaker, and in this memorable document one finds many commendable suggestions with respect to legislation which will be brought forward by parliamentary enactment for the betterment of the Canadian people. After careful perusal of that document I find the one problem which in my opinion is most urgent is dealt with in this manner:

> The recurrence, in a more acute form, of drought conditions in certain areas of western Canada has unfortunately made it necessary to provide assistance on an unprecedented scale. The government intends to continue its activities under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Drought, Mr. Speaker, for some time has been considered a national responsibility, financially and administratively. The drought area covers many millions of acres of all types of land. About forty million acres are occupied and about twenty million acres of that are improved; that is, that land has been used for crops or pasture. About a quarter of the whole area is semi-arid. It was so described by LaVerendrye the explorer, when he crossed the plains in 1733, because it was referred to as the great treeless desert.

Thompson in his Narrative of Explorations in Western America stated:

> The great plains may be said to be barren for great spaces, even, of coarse grass. . . . Even the rivers that flow through the plains do not seem to fertilize the ground adjacent to them.

Also, Macoun, in 1879, in his autobiography states at page 184:

> There were at least 400 miles from Moose Jaw where there were no trees and scarcely a shrub. . . . In 1879 I found a parched surface, dried and withered grass. . . . In 1880 there were numbers of dried creeks on each line of travel. . . . In 1894 the country was drying up, the lakes were disappearing, and many of the settlers were leaving the land. At this time nearly all the lakes and streams on the prairie had ceased to flow. We found the country everywhere dried up and the grass crisp and brittle. . . . In all my explorations so far we found the country extremely dry.

However, the railway was built through this region and people swarmed in. The land was taken up as homesteads. It was broken up and produced wonderful wheat crops. That land would produce bountiful crops again, if only we had sufficient moisture. Mr. George Avery who won first prize in the durum wheat class at the recent International Grain Show in Chicago makes this comment in the Regina Leader-Post:

> Give us some moisture and we will have bumper crops. The people who say the west is "through" are mostly people who have not been here long. I have seen wet years and dry years; this is but one of the dry cycles. This year has been the driest I have ever seen.

I am sure all hon. members are interested in the problem and wish to help. If people are thoroughly to understand the grave and ever increasing problem confronting Canada to-day, a well marshalled campaign must be waged. The editor of the Sunday Dispatch, London, did not make a rash statement when some time ago he wrote in his paper:

> Whatever solution is attempted, the world will shortly watch one of the most romantic passages in the history of any people and see again demonstrated that refusal of British stock to be defeated by nature.

It might be worth our while carefully to examine the tragedy of the prairies, to estimate the cause of our troubles and perhaps to lay out some definite future course of action. When we ask the simple question as to what causes drought the simplest and most obvious answer is lack of rain. You may say that is elementary, but as a general answer it is perfectly correct. There is no evidence to show that the climate is changing. All meteorological records go to disprove that the west is growing drier as the years go by. Drought has been known in the west before. The claim is made that it runs in cycles, and that this is the longest cycle since Saskatchewan has been settled. The west is amazingly resilient. Its optimism is proverbial. "A good crop next year and all our troubles will be over" seems to be the thought. However it is difficult to be optimistic after seven or eight lean years, with all the accompanying reverses.

From the beginning of the development of western Canada in the early eighties the necessity and the possibility of irrigation were the subject of study. History has revealed that for centuries the prairies have been subject to recurrent periods of drought of varying intensity and duration and there is no reason to believe that in this respect history will not repeat itself in the future. Recently an expert was quoted as stating that the west will always be subject to drought periods. It would be only rational to expect that we should take advantage of our experience of the past eight years and provide for the storage of available waste water as far as it is possible by means of agricultural engineering. This must be done since "drought is going to be a permanent problem," in the judgment of a western farmer now prominently engaged in an effort to solve some of Alberta's problems.

The use of irrigation as an aid to the growth of vegetation is a very ancient art. The paintings and sculptures of ancient Egypt show that it was in use at least 4,000 years ago. There are irrigation works in southern India which were built by the Hindus and which antedate the Christian era. In many parts of the western hemisphere, notably in Peru and in the southwestern part of the United States, there are to be found the remains of ancient irrigation works which are evidently centuries older than any historical record. In some countries irrigation has arisen and disappeared with the civilization of which it formed a part. This is true of the irrigation works connected with the civilization in the western hemisphere. There are evidences of prehistoric irrigation in the Hawaiian islands.

More land was irrigated for the first time in the last half of the nineteenth century than in all preceding centuries. The increase in the world's population, the higher standards of living, the improvement in methods of transportation and the opening up of new markets are combining to bring about the reclamation of lands hitherto neglected and to increase the productiveness of lands hitherto cultivated. Irrigation is one of the most potent factors in both directions. The area irrigated along the Nile has been doubled in the last fifty years. Four million acres were irrigated from government works in British India in 1850; twenty million acres in 1900. Although irrigation in Italy dates back to the Roman empire, the area irrigated has more than doubled since 1848. The most significant extension of irrigation, however, has been in newly settled countries. In Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, irrigation in recent years has been an important factor in agricultural production. Statistics for 1930 give a total area of 19,547,544 acres under irrigation in the United States, and this has been greatly increased during the last long drought cycle. As to the beneficial effects of irrigation, the Toronto Evening Telegram had this to say editorially on April 2, 1935, with regard to Lloyd barrage:

> A country about the size of England, peopled by agriculturalists, but practically without rain, and dependent for its water supply on a single river—that is the province of Sind in India. Under British rule the primitive canals have been greatly improved and extended, and now the province has the largest irrigation system in the world, with a dam about a mile in length, pierced by sixty-six sluice gate openings, and seven great canals, every one bigger than the Suez.

In 1769 India suffered from drought. A large percentage of the population received drought relief through voluntary contributions. This condition has been removed by means of irrigation. Irrigation systems were built extending from the Himalaya mountains through northern India covering twenty-five million acres. To-day because of irrigation engineering systems in the Nile and in the Ethiopian mountains the British engineers have made Egypt the most productive agricultural country in the world. Why should such a system not be feasible in western Canada? Mr. O. R. Galbraith, secretary of the Saskatchewan-Alberta Irrigation Association says of the situation in the west:

> There is no doubt about the need for irrigation in western Canada, and there is no doubt about its feasibility. We have the Rocky mountains covering a breadth of over 200 miles in which are located thousands of lakes which drain themselves back into the Pacific ocean. No effort has ever been made to divert some of that water down over the prairies and fill the innumerable river beds and lakes now gone dry, to provide a greater head of water in the Saskatchewan rivers and by means of dams provide sources of power and irrigation projects throughout the drought stricken areas; whereas a number of such instances can be shown throughout the United States.

I am aware that this is a view which is not shared by the Saskatchewan Minister of Agriculture whose evidence before the Rowell commission in Regina on December 16 last was both interesting and illuminating. The Hon. Mr. Taggart is afraid that engineering difficulties are too great to be overcome. While I am prepared to concede that these difficulties are great, I am not willing to admit that they are insuperable. The old adage that necessity is the mother of invention is peculiarly applicable to Saskatchewan's drought problem. Assuredly the necessity is impelling enough to stimulate to action the best engineering skill the country has available. The drought situation in the dry areas of Nevada and California was a challenge that did not go unanswered. The wonderful engineering feats of to-day would in days past have been thought impossible. Will any one say that their necessity was greater than ours?

I refuse to admit defeat until the resources of our universities have been exhausted, until the whole problem has been thoroughly investigated, until every means that human genius can devise has been tried. I would respectfully suggest that a group of the best engineers on the continent be engaged to devise a scheme of irrigation that will effectively solve our drought question and that a supreme effort be made to implement their recommendations if the cost of the same be at all within the limits of our financial resources.

The very nature of wheat farming is production to the *n*th degree, it demands little and returns little to the soil. We find that after centuries these prairies are as fertile as when first formed and contain all the essentials necessary for growth—all they need is water. In this western country we have a soil that is far from being mined out; a soil that produces the finest type of wheat in the world; a country that deservedly bears the name of the bread basket of the world, a country that produces the best bread in the world; a country that year after year receives the prize for the best wheat grown in the world; a country that does not need any artificial fertilizers or the reinforcement of chemicals. All that it needs is water, and water at the proper time. Why, therefore, should we hesitate to assist nature to overcome physical obstructions? Why not irrigate?

Statistics show the remarkable effect of irrigation on wheat yield. On a section of the Canadian Pacific railway a census of the yields obtained and the water used by a group of farmers shows that the average yield of wheat was 19½ bushels per acre with an irrigation of four inches deep plus rainfall; with two four-inch irrigations, the yields were 30 to 35 bushels and with three four-inch irrigations the yields were as high as 43 bushels per acre. In this district the rainfall was 11·24 inches, of which 9·68 inches fell during the growing season.

Nature itself has created the necessity for irrigation in that portion of western Canada between the Rocky mountains in the west and the province of Ontario in the east, especially the western prairie section, where drought is more frequent than in the central and wooded areas. This region, which is characterized by scanty rainfall, is the northern terminus of a series of plateaux on the eastern side of the Rocky mountains which begins in Mexico, and includes much desert land there and in the southwestern part of the United States. It is frequently referred to as the Great Plains. That portion which is included in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan contain from 40 to 50 million acres. Though arid or semi-arid, the soil contains all the elements necessary for the production of abundant crops—all that it requires is water and water at the proper time.

After the completion of the Canadian Pacific railway in the early eighties there was an influx of settlers to the western prairies, and it was then that Canadian government officials and engineers became interested in the necessity of irrigation. In 1893 a bill was introduced in the dominion parliament dealing with irrigation. In that same year J. S. Dennis, Chief Inspector of Surveys, was commissioned to visit the United States for the purpose of studying and reporting on the irrigation laws of that country. It was upon his information that the Northwest Irrigation Act was passed by parliament on July 23, 1894. To quote from Mr. Dennis' report to the government in 1894:

> The existing climatic conditions, and the necessity for irrigation, have been frequently referred to in the reports of dominion land surveyors employed in surveying this arid region into townships and sections, but it is probably due to the lengthy reports upon this subject and to the persistent advocacy of the principle by Mr. William Pearce, Superintendent of Mines, more than to any other cause, that the public has at last recognized the necessity for irrigation and the benefits to be secured therefrom.

The quantity of water required for irrigable lands depends primarily upon such climatic influences as rainfall, temperature, sunshine and evaporation, and to a less degree upon such factors as time and quantity of application, and the character of the soil and crops.

In the great drought areas of western Canada, there is abundant opportunity for the use of every known method of irrigation that has been tried in the world.

The impounding of flood waters is especially necessary to compensate for deficient rainfall.

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company constructed the largest irrigation project in Canada, extending along its main line between Calgary and Medicine Hat. When the railway was built, it received from the dominion government, as part of the consideration, a land grant of approximately 22,000,000 acres in what now forms the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. This land was to be given in alternate sections, twenty miles on each side of the main line, and it was stipulated that the company might reject any land not well adapted to agriculture, making up the deficiency elsewhere. The company exercised its right by refusing the land between Moose Jaw and Calgary, and in the final settlement it was agreed that the company should take about 3,000,000 acres in a block between Calgary and Medicine Hat and construct an irrigation system upon it. As an indication of its value we find that some farmers who paid $15 an acre for their land have earned enough to pay for it from the sale of one crop. Some of the wheat crops average from 40 to 56 bushels per acre, and the farmers are also growing clover and alfalfa, and are raising cattle and hogs.

The Deputy Minister of the Interior in 1894 appeared very skeptical as to the feasibility of irrigation as contained in Mr. Pearce's report, and commented, "It will be a long time before settlement will reach the class of country to which Mr. Pearce's suggestions relate." However, it was not long until irrigation was a practical issue, and the next forty years saw the development of irrigation in western Canada. Sixty-three projects are shown as being in operation in 1894, ranging in area irrigated from seven to twenty-five hundred acres.

The most extensive irrigation project in Canada is the system constructed by the Canadian Pacific Railway between Calgary and Medicine Hat. Irrigation development has not been so extensive in Saskatchewan as in Alberta, largely because of the absence of an adequate or readily accessible water supply. A large number of small schemes have been constructed in the southwestern part of this province, utilizing the run-off from the Cypress hills. They are mostly individual floodwater schemes, built at low cost in connection with ranching operations. Some of these date back to 1890 and earlier, but no accurate records seem to be available.

In 1935 irrigation was begun under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. This Act was passed after we had had five years of the most unprecedented drought. The government provided funds for rehabilitation and irrigation to the extent of three-quarters of a million dollars per year. The present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), under whose department this act is being administered, has done wonders with the increased amounts at his disposal. He has given his time and energy, under adverse financial handicaps, to help in reclamation. We must take a long range view and plan for the future if we are to save the prairies for future generations.

Miss Betty Hudson, writing in the Winnipeg Free Press, states:

> Sixty million acres and the future of millions of people are at the mercy of dust, wind and drought (if we do not do something in the line of irrigation). Who will be bold enough to say that some day desert sands will not bury Regina and Medicine Hat as they have buried the cities of Asiatic and African civilization?

Under this program there is conservation of water, for both stock and irrigation purposes. Engineering and financial assistance has been given to individual farmers for building dug-outs, stock watering dams and small irrigation schemes. Under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, irrigation projects have been undertaken in Saskatchewan at Valmarie and Eastend, and scores of smaller schemes are in operation.

Of the work accomplished so far and that now under construction by the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Commission, Mr. T. C. Main, assistant chief engineer for the Canadian National Railway, has this to say:

> I have nothing but praise for what has been done, and I hope the good work will continue. My only complaint is that not enough is being done and not enough money is being made available to have any considerable effect on rehabilitation.

In his report to the Canadian National Railway, Mr. Main suggests that:

> —a board of capable technical men be appointed to investigate the whole drought problem. Such men should be free from political or other influence so that their recommendations should not be guided by political expediency. They would be an advisory body, so parliament would not be bound to carry out their recommendations; on the other hand, as their advice would be public property, it is very likely that those in control would carry out the policies recommended by these experts if such policies were favoured by the public.

Mr. R. O. Sweezey, a prominent engineer in Montreal and a man of whose resourcefulness we have much evidence, has made the suggestion that the government should undertake a huge $400,000,000 irrigation scheme. His plan is to build thousands of ditches throughout the millions of acres of the drought area. He estimates the cost of such a project to be less than two years' losses from drought conditions.

Mr. Sweezey writes:

> The drought situation in western Canada is one which can be completely and effectively cured by the artificial diversion of water through irrigation ditches, captured from the streams which now flow mostly into the Arctic regions. The project is gigantic, but simple and entirely feasible, at a cost which is probably only less than two years' losses incurred by the present drought conditions. This is a matter of engineering opinion based on facts. It is regrettable that the authorities in Ottawa, through the several departments concerned, have not yet completely compiled those facts in such a manner as to formulate definite engineering conclusions. It is also unfortunate that the technical men of the various departments have in the past exhibited only defeatist opinions, and they would seem to have been overawed by the suggestion that a giant engineering undertaking for the handling of water would overcome the then growing menace which has since developed to such an appalling condition.

Mr. Sweezey also suggests that a commission be formed, consisting of technical men and men with commercial and agricultural knowledge, and that this commission should first ascertain the truth about drought in western Canada and the feasibility of irrigation.

The question is, are we going to adopt a program of small irrigation or are we going to adopt a larger project? Whichever scheme is decided upon, money will have to be expended from the federal treasury. Would it not be much more feasible to finance some irrigation project than to spend large sums of money maintaining thousands of families on direct relief? Our universities failed us in not studying the Palliser report and the drought cycles. Our Research Council failed us in not doing work along this line. If that had been done, we would have obtained some information and we might have at least prevented a national disaster.

The Toronto Globe and Mail in an editorial comment in connection with Mr. Sweezey's huge scheme, states:

> There is no doubt about the extent of the calamity, and there can be no doubt that huge expenditures are justified if the climatic hazards of the semi-arid regions in the south, and even in the north, can be evaded by intelligent forethought. There are at stake the lives and futures of the people settled on the largest continuous tract of arable land in Canada. There is no question that much of this land which is of high fertility is destined from time to time to have all the aspects of desert country if plans are not developed for conserving for future use excess water when it is available.
> Think of the difference between $350,000,000 annual production in the prairie provinces in the drought years and a total of $1,000,000,000 in such a year as 1928. Think of what an important part in that difference a crop of 150,000,000 bushels in a bad year like 1937 makes when compared with a crop of from 400 million to 600 million bushels such as western Canada has produced in years of abundant moisture.
> There have been no irrigation projects of vast extent in the world which have not been criticized in advance and during their construction by people who say that the money is being wasted and that the results will be negligible. There is now too much history on the other side for that argument to hold. Large parts of the fertile districts of California would to-day be desert but for irrigation. Many of the huge sugar plantations of the Hawaiian Islands would be impossible without irrigation.
> Some will say that there is not enough water in the south and north Saskatchewan and other rivers to irrigate the vast extent of land involved. Assertions of that kind from non-technical sources did not deter Australia from embarking on huge projects though her rivers are fewer and the rainfall much less dependable than in western Canada.

In 1857, that great Irishman Captain Palliser, as mentioned before, was sent out by the British government and he reported that the great plains of Saskatchewan were unfavourable for agricultural development owing to the dryness and lack of moisture in the soil, but years afterwards these same plains became the most fertile and productive grain growing areas in the world. It may be that after years of deficient rainfall in the west, a change for the better may be expected, but can we leave things to chance?

Like a great many people, I was rather skeptical of the truth of statements made regarding the drought of southern Saskatchewan. and I decided to get the information first hand. So, accordingly, I travelled over eight hundred miles of the dried out area and found that conditions had not been exaggerated. I found that practically the whole area I visited was a blanket of Russian thistle of unbelievable growth and unbelievable thickness. I did not see one field that would yield more than three or four bushels to the acre excepting a few acres of oats that were irrigated at Valmarie. In the extreme south cactus plants, which frequent only the extremely dry regions, were flourishing. Soil was drifting and in some places had buried fences and blocked the road allowance.

The drought, which has been continuous for eight years, has given westerners a very pessimistic outlook and they are beginning to fear that the west will not be able to stage a real comeback. If this proves to be the case, eastern Canada will suffer a permanent loss from the result of economic disaster in the west.

The Montreal Herald on December 21 last contained an editorial, "What the West Means to the East."

> Lest we forget what western Canada means to eastern Canada, and what the harmonious union of both means to the continued existence of British North America as the home of a people free to go about their peaceful avocations with none to make them afraid, let us look at Canada as a whole for a few moments.
> First, look at it in the light of the land-hungry nations. What would Germany or Italy not give to gain possesion of the three prairie provinces of Canada. Provinces which not only constitute one of the choicest agricultural territories in the world, but are richly endowed in metals, coal and oil?
> Now let us look at the history of these provinces.
> In the first decade of this century the filling up of the west by agricultural settlement exerted a profound influence on the general development of the dominion. Vast amounts of capital were attracted to Canada for the construction of transportation and other facilities and the building up of such cities as Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon, Calgary and Edmonton.
> Where was this money spent? Largely in the east for materials—for the steel and rolling stock for the railways, for agricultural implements for the new farms, home furnishings and clothing.

This activity laid the foundation for an era of factory building that contributed greatly to the growth of population and prosperity in the eastern provinces.

What built the Angus shops in the east end of Montreal and contributed much to the activity of the Point St. Charles shops in the west end?

The trade of the western provinces.

What built up the grain ports of Fort William and Port Arthur, and made Montreal one of the world's greatest seaports?

The grain trade of the western provinces.

What for years has been the biggest single factor in our export trade?

The western wheat crop.

What has given the greatest amount of employment to men engaged in the inland and ocean shipping and railways centering upon Montreal?

The western wheat crop.

What single product has brought more ready cash than anything else into this country to be spent on the products of industrial Quebec and Ontario?

The grain crops of the western provinces.

Italy would love to include the western provinces in the Roman empire. Germany would revel in their possessions.

And, coming nearer home, there is a general feeling in the west that the United States would be ready to assume all the obligations of the prairie provinces in return for the privilege of making them the 49th state of the Union.

Yet here in eastern Canada are some who are talking as though the western provinces were a liability instead of an asset—some who would grudge generous help to these provinces to tide them over the troubles caused by a depression that hit these provinces harder than any other part of the dominion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has already occupied forty minutes.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: Fortunately, there is still hope for the great plains of the west if engineering science is to be relied upon, and there is reason to believe that these years, so full of disappointment and misery, are passing into history, and a more cheerful story is about to unfold.

The rumblings which our demands in the west have produced in the east, the repercussions this question has already produced among men in positions of responsibility, would indicate that this matter unless faced in a spirit of goodwill and understanding might easily have serious constitutional consequences.

Saskatchewan is grateful for the assistance which has been given her by sympathizers from one end of the dominion to the other. Too much cannot be said for the kindness and the generosity of the various welfare organizations that sent clothing and food in such quantities to the people of the stricken areas. The work of the government in the matter of relief has been splendid and Saskatchewan has no complaint to offer in that respect.

Her fear, however, is that her sister provinces and the people of the country as a whole are not sufficiently impressed with the necessity for a permanent solution of her drought problem. It is the conviction of the people of Saskatchewan that this is a national issue and one which should be faced and permanently disposed of.

The whole issue, as hon. members can see, is fraught with danger to the integrity of the nation and with peril to her economic future. Magnificent in the days of her prosperity, she is not cast down in the days of her adversity. The potentialities which were hers when she entered confederation over thirty years ago are hers to-day.

The spirit in which she was conceived is the spirit which has kept her unerringly on her course ever since.

Solve the problem permanently; reclaim her drought areas through a comprehensive program of irrigation, and Saskatchewan will return to the economic fold, in a manner that will restore the confidence she inspired, and once again we shall be able to say:

> These are the gardens of the desert, these the unshorn fields, boundless and beautiful, for which the speech of England has no name, —the prairies.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, February 4, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 15, to incorporate Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company.—Mr. Damude.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

AMENDMENTS AS TO DEFINITION, BANKRUPTCY PROCEEDINGS, REHEARING, ETC.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 16, to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I desire to advise the hon. member and the house generally that the government intends to introduce a measure having as its object the amendment of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. As I indicated to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) on the second day of the session, the matter is under consideration. Although I do not know what is contained in the bill for which first reading is asked by the hon. member for Weyburn, I am quite sure it cannot embrace all that the government has in mind. I would therefore request that he, in company with other members with intentions similar to his own, should consider allowing the bill to stand, pending the introduction of a government measure which must be preceded by a money resolution. The hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) and some others have suggested the introduction of similar bills. However, the hon. member for Weyburn will have to decide what he wishes to do.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I wonder if it would make any difference to the minister if the bill were introduced and permitted to stand. It could be dropped in the event of the government bringing down legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DRILLING OF UNIFORMED CLASSES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question directed to me yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) I desire to make a statement.

Section 99 of the criminal code empowers the governor in council to prohibit drilling, military exercises and training without lawful authority, and makes it a criminal offence. Such a proclamation was issued on September 21, 1917, and has never been repealed. Section 99, therefore, is in force in all parts of Canada at the present time. By virtue of the proclamation of 1917, issued under the authority of the then section 98 of the criminal code, the present section 99, it is a criminal offence for any persons to carry out such military exercises, movements or evolutions without lawful authority, and if an offence is being committed it is of course the responsibility of the provincial authorities to prosecute, because the administration generally of the provisions of the criminal law rests with the provinces.

[Mr. Douglas.]

In the circumstances, however, the question of unlawful drilling and military training and exercises by political groups is one which may involve the dominion as a whole and, therefore, the dominion government will, in addition to any steps which may be taken by any provincial authority, cause an investigation to be made. If as a result of such investigation it is considered that an offence against the criminal law, as above referred to, is being committed by fascists, communists or otherwise, the government will cause the necessary proceedings to be initiated by way of having such information and complaint laid as the facts disclosed by the investigation may justify, and otherwise the government will furnish such reasonable assistance to the provincial authorities as they may require in connection with the prosecution.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, February 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. N. Francœur for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Bennett.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising to take part in this debate is merely to discuss briefly two or three matters which have been referred to in the speeches of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and other hon. members, especially those who sit in the far corner.

The first matter I should like to refer to is the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada of three bills which had been reserved by the lieutenant governor of Alberta. There was also the matter of the disallowance of three statutes which had been passed by the province of Alberta a few months before the reference was made. Apparently my right hon. friend is not very fond of references to the Supreme Court of Canada, although he indulged in that practice when he was the head of the government.

Mr. BENNETT: Very seldom.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): On a few occasions. My right hon. friend said that the referring of these matters to the Supreme Court of Canada would prove dangerous to the preservation of the powers of the central government. As his authority he quoted from a letter which Sir John A. Macdonald had written in 1889 to the then Minister of Justice, Sir John Thompson. It is true that at that time the Supreme Court Act had been passed, but it did not contain section 55 which empowers the governor general to make these references.

At the interprovincial conference of 1888 Mr. Mercier succeeded in having a resolution adopted, section 2 of which read as follows:

That it is important to the just operation of our federal system, as well that the federal parliament should not assume to exercise powers belonging exclusively to the provincial legislatures, as that a provincial legislature should not assume to exercise powers belonging exclusively to the federal parliament; that to prevent any such assumption, there should be equal facilities to the federal and provincial governments for promptly obtaining a judicial determination respecting the validity of statutes of both the federal parliament and provincial legislatures; that constitutional provision should be made for obtaining such determination before, as well as after a statute has been acted upon; and that any decision should be subject to appeal as in other cases, in order that the adjudication may be final.

The question under consideration was the settlement of the Jesuits' estates, a very important matter which had entered the political field. Sir John A. Macdonald did not view with favour the request which had been made, as was indicated in his letter to Sir John Thompson. In 1890, subsequent to the date of the letter of Sir John A. Macdonald quoted by my right hon. friend, the Hon. Edward Blake moved an amendment to the motion to go into supply, which read as follows:

To leave out all the words after "That"—and insert the following:—"it is expedient to provide means whereby, on solemn occasions touching the exercise of the power of disallowance, or of the appellate power as to educational legislation, important questions of law or fact may be referred by the executive to a high judicial tribunal for hearing and consideration, in such mode that the authorities and parties interested may be represented and that a reasoned opinion may be obtained for the information of the executive."

Mr. CAHAN: What was the date of that?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): April 29, 1890. Mr. Blake made a very learned speech in support of his amendment, from which I should like to quote a few words. I read from Hansard of 1890, page 4088, as follows:

Now, sir, in the exercise of this power of disallowance by the government, political questions will, or at any rate may, probably, always arise. Questions of policy may present themselves, that is questions of expediency, of convenience, of the public interest, of the spirit of the constitution or of the form of legislation. All these are clearly, exclusively for the executive and legislative, that is for the political departments of the government. But it is equally clear, that when in order to determine your course you must find whether a particular act is ultra or intra vires, you are discharging a legal and a judicial function. What do you do? You proceed to interpret the Constitutional Act, and to declare its meaning; you proceed to interpret the provincial act under consideration and to declare its meaning; you proceed to compare the two statutes so interpreted and declared; and you proceed, finally, to conclude whether or not the law conflicts with, or transcends the powers which are conferred upon the legislature which passed it. Nothing that can be conceived partakes more exclusively of the character of a legal and judicial operation than what I have just now described.

And then on page 4089:

My own opinion is, that whenever, in opposition to the continued view of a provincial executive and legislature it is contemplated by the dominion executive to disallow a provincial act because it is ultra vires, there ought to be a reference; and also that there ought to be a reference in certain cases where the condition of public opinion renders expedient a solution of legal problems, dissociated from those elements of passion and expediency which are, rightly or wrongly, too often attributed to the action of political bodies. And again, I for my part would recommend such a reference in all cases of educational appeal—cases which necessarily evoke the feelings to which I have alluded, and to one of which, I am frank to say, my present motion is mainly due.

He said, again:

But my proposal is by no means radical or revolutionary, compulsory or general. It is but an enabling proposition; it but empowers the executive to obtain—by a procedure replete with the essential requisites for the production of a sound opinion—the views on legal questions of legal authorities, leaving to the executive, so aided, the responsibility of final action. I have an absolute confidence that, if my proposal should be declined, the first persons to regret that decision will be hon. gentlemen opposite. My opinion is, that this is a proposal eminently helpful to the executive of the country at this time; but it is eminently helpful to them because it is eminently helpful to the good government of this country; and it is in this spirit that I move the amendment which I now submit to the judgment of the house.

Sir John A. Macdonald, then prime minister, replied, and his remarks will be found at pages 4093 and 4094. He started by saying that at first the resolution did not appeal to him, but after careful consideration and study this was the conclusion he had come to:

Whenever the question of disallowance is raised on important matters and the reasons alleged for disallowance are that the act itself was ultra vires, that is, that it was beyond the competence of the legislature which passed it, I coincide with my hon. friend in believing that the crown should have the power of submitting such a question to the courts, and give the opportunity to the authority—be it legislative or executive, which has passed the statute, to appear before such tribunals, and that all parties interested, or that the court should think were interested, should have the opportunity of being heard. Of course my hon. friend

(Mr. Blake), in his resolution, has guarded against the supposition that such a decision is binding on the executive. It is expressly stated—and that is one of the instances which shows that this resolution has been most carefully prepared—that such a decision is only for the information of the government. The executive is not relieved from any responsibility because of any answer being given by the tribunal. If the executive were to be relieved of any such responsibility, I should consider that a fatal blot in the proposition of my hon. friend. I believe in responsible government. I believe in the responsibility of the executive. But the answer of the tribunal will be simply for the information of the government. The government may dissent from that decision, and it may be their duty to do so if they differ from the conclusion to which the court has come.

There is another point in regard to which the court must be guarded in the measure which will be introduced—not this session but I hope next session—based on this resolution, and that is that the answer, whatever it may be, should be considered in the nature of a judgment so far as to allow of an appeal to the judicial committee of the privy council. With these remarks, I will only say further, that I thank the hon. gentleman for having brought this resolution before the house, as I concur with it generally, though holding the right with a free hand to frame the measure which will have to be brought down to parliament in accordance with it.

In the following year, 1891, as a result of that resolution which had been unanimously adopted by parliament, the "Act respecting the Supreme and Exchequer Courts," by section 4 of chapter 25 of the statutes of 1891 was amended by the substitution of a new section for section 37. This new section was the prototype of section 55 of the present Supreme Court Act. So, Mr. Speaker, this power of referring legal questions to the Supreme Court of Canada was placed in the act after parliament, on the resolution of Edward Blake, supported by Sir John A. Macdonald, had thought that this would be the best way to deal with such questions as the disallowance or otherwise of provincial statutes which might be considered ultra vires or to trespass on the powers of parliament. My right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) says: Yes, but this was not a statute that you referred; it was merely a useless piece of paper, an incomplete document.

Mr. BENNETT: I pointed out that there is power to do it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The Supreme Court Act was not framed for the purpose, nevertheless the section which gives the power to the governor in council, section 35, says:

> References by Governor in Council
> Important questions of law or fact touching
> (a) the interpretation of the British North America Acts, or

> (b) the constitutionality or interpretation of any dominion or provincial legislation; or
> (c) the appellate jurisdiction as to educational matters—

And so on. And then (d):

> (d) the powers of the parliament of Canada, or of the legislatures of the provinces, or of the respective governments thereof, whether or not the particular power in question has been or is proposed to be exercised.

So this provision was put in the act for the special purpose of enabling the government to do what has been done in the present instance, and I may add that it was done after the government of the province concerned had asked the governor in council to do it before reaching a conclusion in the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: But that was not so with respect to all the matters referred.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No, but it was so with regard to two of them, and at the same time the governor in council was asked to refer the third question, the power of disallowance, to the court. Certainly if the contention of the province with respect to the power of disallowance had been upheld that would have affected all the bills.

Then my right hon. friend, and I am grateful to him for the moderation with which he dealt with this question—he even approved of the course of the government with certain reservations—said that he approved the disallowance of the three statutes which had previously been disallowed; but he said, very courteously, that as far as he was concerned, while he thought we should have disallowed the act which refused access to the courts, we should, if I remember his words aright, have let the bankers fight out the other bills themselves.

Mr. MITCHELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend says, "hear, hear." Perhaps he does not know that this denial of access to the courts was contained not only in one bill but in every one of the three statutes. The statute concerning banking included a provision denying to the bankers or other interested parties the right to go to the courts to test its validity, and the other statute for licensing bank employees contained a similar provision. If that were the only cause for disallowance it would apply to the three statutes because that provision permeated the three measures which had been enacted.

But there is more than that. I am free to admit that I thought, and the officers of my department thought, that perhaps this last enactment was less objectionable than the other two, because the two statutes concerning banking were a direct and straight invasion of federal powers, coming in conflict with federal policies and federal legislation, and were therefore subject to disallowance under all the authorities if we were to follow the decisions in matters of this kind which had been reached by every minister of justice since confederation. I may add that before this power of disallowance was exercised, the premier of the province was asked whether he would agree to suspend the operation of those statutes pending a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. This he bluntly refused to do. He said that the statutes would be enforced immediately; and of course there was no other course to follow on the part of the governor in council.

But my right hon. friend says, although approving of disallowance, that it was a discrimination against Alberta because the statutes of Ontario with regard to the power contracts have not been disallowed. Since my right hon. friend, who is a great authority, has made that statement, of course all the hon. gentlemen on the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and social credit benches have had the same criticism to offer of the action of the government.

Mr. MITCHELL: He spoke first.

Mr. PELLETIER: I thought of it before he did that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): What is that?

Mr. PELLETIER: We felt that way before that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Oh, you did think of that before? I congratulate the hon. member.

An hon. MEMBER: Following the leader.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I say that there have been since confederation, prior to the consideration of this legislation which is being dealt with, one hundred provincial statutes disallowed, seventy-two between 1867 and 1900, and twenty-eight from 1900 until this present instance. Thousands of them were submitted after a petition had been presented for their disallowance, but the governor in council refused to disallow them.

Mr. BENNETT: But a number of them were amended in consequence of representations made.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And a number of them were amended after representations by the Minister of Justice to the provincial governments. I think I am free to say that, of those hundred statutes, not two are identical. There are differences in every statute. The circumstances are not always the same; the circumstances which must enter into line when the question has to be decided differ in almost every case. I think I can easily show the difference between the Ontario statutes and the statute of Alberta. In respect of the Ontario acts which were challenged, here is what I had the honour to say in my recommendation to the governor in council:

> With regard to the allegation that the said act is ultra vires the legislature of the province, the undersigned is of opinion that this allegation, if well founded, would not constitute a sufficient ground for disallowance. There are cases in the earlier years of confederation in which acts were disallowed on the ground that they were ultra vires, but the more modern view is that if the act be questionable only as to its validity—

Mark those words.

> —and not on the ground that it interferes with any dominion policy or interest, the question of its validity should be left to the determination of the courts. To disallow a provincial statute solely upon the ground that it is ultra vires would be to subject the provinces to the findings of the law officers of the crown upon the questions of law involved and deprive them of the right to have such questions judicially determined. Presumably the inclusion in the act of a provision that no action or other proceeding shall be brought against the said commission founded upon any such contract will not prevent the companies from having the validity of the act judicially determined by the courts of Ontario, because if the act is attacked upon the ground that it is ultra vires, surely none of its provisions could be pleaded as a bar to the judicial determination of such question. The undersigned is therefore clearly of opinion that the act should not be disallowed on this ground.

We took the stand there that the courts could redress the grievance, if there was one, with regard to the constitutionality or the validity of the acts. What has happened since proves that we were right in that assumption because the acts were successfully challenged before the courts as a result of a judgment rendered by the court of appeal of Ontario and appealed to the privy council. But the question has been settled since to the satisfaction of the parties, which shows that we were right in refusing to interfere in this matter. There was in this case, as is stated in another paragraph of the recommendation I submitted to the governor in council, no question of invasion of federal jurisdiction or federal policy or federal power. As I said last year, touching the question of unfairness or injustice, I share on this point the views expressed by Sir Allen Aylesworth when he was minister of justice. It is for the electors of the province to decide whether the legislation is unfair or unjust and to vote against the government that enacts such legislation.

Listen now, Mr. Speaker, to one or two of the reasons submitted in my recommendation to the governor in council with regard to the Alberta legislation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Just before the minister passes from that, am I interrupting if I ask—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am afraid my forty minutes will not be sufficient.

Mr. LAWSON: We will give you time, all the time you want.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East):

To parliament the British North America Act thus confided powers to establish and regulate the monetary system of Canada, and the powers thus assigned are exclusive and paramount and the provincial legislatures are wholly without authority to interfere with the exercise of such powers. The statutes of Alberta in question constitute an unmistakable invasion of the legislative field thus assigned to parliament. They conflict with dominion laws and virtually supplant dominion institutions designed by parliament to facilitate the trade and commerce of the whole dominion. While the undersigned is of opinion that no project or policy of a provincial legislature should be interfered with by exercise of the power of disallowance merely on the ground that measures to promote such project or policy are of doubtful constitutional validity, a distinction is to be made where the legislature deliberately attempts to interfere with the operation of dominion laws and to substitute laws and institutions of its own for those legitimately enacted and organized by parliament, and this is particularly true where the legislature has denied recourse to the courts of justice.

Yet there is some good thing in all things that are not so good. It is interesting for us to be told that we are discriminating in favour of the province of Ontario; for quite different statements have been made elsewhere.

In the course of the debate many hon. members—not my right hon. friend, because he is too great a parliamentarian to do so—have spoken in violent terms of the "Quebec padlock law" and denounced me for not having acted with regard to it. Perhaps they will be surprised to hear that, apart from the telegrams and resolutions of every description which have been sent to me, the petition, the official, the regular and only one, that has been forwarded for the disallowance of that legislation was received three or four days ago; and the question has to be considered in the time during which a decision must be reached.

Mr. BENNETT: When does the year expire?

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): At the end of March. I do not complain in that respect, because it will not affect the work I have to do. I do not think, however, that it is becoming, that it is quite proper, in regard to a matter that partakes of judicial interpretation—and the authorities have even discussed the question whether the function of the Minister of Justice in a matter of this kind is not judicial rather than legislative—that I should be abused before I have considered the matter, as I have been during the course of this debate. I do not think it is fair; I do not think it is conducive to the proper discharge of this part of the functions of government.

In this connection I have been asked to receive delegations, who wish to come and press upon me the advisability of recommending the disallowance of the legislation. Well, that is not the way in which a matter of this sort must be dealt with. I will not receive any delegation either for or against; and I may say to those who make the request that it would be very easy for those who think otherwise to fill all the halls of Ottawa, including the drill hall, with people who do not share the views of the persons who have made the request. It is not by such pressure either upon the Department of Justice or upon any other branch of the administration that a matter of this kind should be dealt with.

I wish now to deal with the question of unemployment insurance. The action of the government in this regard has been criticized both by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), and others, with respect to the preparation of an amendment to the British North America Act, with a request to the provinces to agree to such an amendment being made. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said that we should assert our power. He has said that since the imperial conference of 1936 Canada, as a nation, has attained equality in the British commonwealth, and I agree with that. But, he adds, the condition in regard to our constitution is one of inferiority. I cannot admit that this apparent inferiority is really a condition of inferiority, in view of the fact that the status of our constitution is what it is by reason of the will of the Canadian people and not because of the will of any superior authority who wishes to control and to dominate the Dominion of Canada.

When the Statute of Westminster was enacted, with the proviso that there should be nothing therein to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Act, that proviso was inserted because the Dominion of Canada wanted it and not because the imperial parliament desired to have it. I can assure my hon. friend that the imperial parliament would be most happy if we could rid them of this necessity of having perhaps to decide as between the parliament of Canada and some provinces on the question of an amendment. The provision is there because, under our constitutional arrangement, until we ask that it be abolished it must stand. My views in the matter are well known and I have not changed them in any particular. I think that Canada should have the power to amend its own constitution. We are the only British dominion that does not possess this power; indeed, we are the only country with a federal system of government that has not in some way the power to change in some details its constitutional charter. The United States, Mexico, Venezuela, Brazil, the Argentine Republic, Australia, Switzerland—all these are federal states and their respective constitutions foresee the possibility of amendment and determine the methods and conditions that shall govern the making of amendments.

Mr. CAHAN: They are usually amended by presidential decrees.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That might be a fine point for discussion, but it is not in the constitution of the United States. To my mind it is a necessity and a safeguard, and all the constitutional authors recognize and teach it.

I am aware that many Canadians seem to believe that a constitution is something sacred, something intangible, a sort of ark of the covenant which nobody should look at and still less touch without incurring the gravest penalty. With all possible respect for the sincerity of those who entertain this view I am compelled to say it is absurd. A constitutional charter, whatever it may be, even though it meets with the unanimous approval of all the citizens of a state, cannot preclude future alterations in the system which it has established. National sovereignty is unprescriptible, and a generation has no metaphysical right definitely to bind future generations and to deny to them the competence which they themselves possess. It cannot fix in advance and absolutely the fate of the political and social realities of the future. Reforms must be made difficult, but not impossible, and their achievement must be subject to modalities. procedures and delays. But when a constitutional reform is required and is desired by the great majority of the citizens of a country, I am afraid that prohibitions which may have been enacted twenty-five, fifty, sixty or even a hundred years before cannot be a permanent obstacle. They will be ignored, or people will find a way to get around them. I warn all my fellow citizens in all parts of Canada that to insist on making the constitution rigid and inflexible, and to prevent orderly change or improvement, is to run the risk of having it violated in a disorderly way when the political forces opposed to it are strong enough to do so. Doctor William Bennett Munro, a Harvard professor and originally a Canadian, said in a remarkable book on European governments that a constitution should not be either too easy or too difficult of amendment. If it is too easy it ceases to be a guarantee of order. of stability, of continuity in the public life of the nation; if it is too difficult it becomes an obstacle to progress and national advancement, and would be used as an excuse for revolutionary action.

The British North America Act is a statute of the imperial parliament. No method of changing it is provided. The result is that whenever an amendment is required there has to be another imperial statute. Then in order to have such a statute enacted is it necessary to have the consent of the provinces, all of them, or a majority of them? Is it necessary that this consent should be expressed by resolution of the legislature, by order in council, or by an expression of view by the premier of the province? My right hon. friend has discussed this side of the question; I do not know any more than he does. The present system is vague and uncertain; there is no definite method laid down of achieving what we might consider a desirable improvement. We do not know.

My right hon. friend favours a national convention to discuss this matter. The idea has some advantages, perhaps many, but there are also objections. But I agree with him, I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; I agree with all the public men who have had anything to do with the affairs of this dominion during recent years and who have contended that a change must be made; that we must find a way of ending the rigidity which prevents the Dominion of Canada from enacting legislation which we may believe to be necessary for the national progress and for the good of the whole country. How will that be done? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre appealed to me. I am willing to do anything to achieve this result. I have already expressed my views, and I have been instrumental in placing them before representatives of the various provincial governments. To reach a successful conclusion in this matter I am willing to do anything which commends itself to my judgment, and I hope that this parliament will not end before some progress is made in that direction.

But meanwhile we have this question of unemployment insurance. It is being discussed at great length in my own province at the present time, and I read in the press this morning some pretty violent words which were uttered in the legislature of Quebec yesterday in regard to the matter. May I say that unemployment insurance seems to be desired by a vast majority of the people of Canada? It has been in the platforms of all parties for many years; the provinces themselves have expressed the view that we should have unemployment insurance. In 1933 the then government of the province of Quebec appointed a commission to study social assurances, of which Professor Edouard Montpetit of the university of Montreal was president. There were representatives upon it of the various labour unions, as well as of the employers. His Excellency Bishop Georges Courchesne of Rimouski was one of the distinguished members of that commission. I have their report here. I will translate this sentence from the conclusions—

Mr. HEAPS: What is the date of the report?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): December, 1932, but it was published in 1933. It says:

> Unemployment insurance, though under the law it comes within provincial jurisdiction, and although in theory it might be applied in the sphere of provincial administration, cannot effectively be organized, for the reasons given in this memorandum, otherwise than in the national field.

The commission stated very clearly that although they favoured it they could not recommend its adoption by the provincial government because it could be effective only if made a national scheme. When my right hon. friend enacted his unemployment insurance act we who were then on the other side of the house claimed that the matter was provincial in scope, that the federal government did not possess the power to enact such legislation, and that it would be referred to the courts if a change of government took place. This we did. The Supreme Court of Canada decided by a majority of four to two that the act was invalid because it encroached upon provincial authority. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council affirmed the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. I confess that I cannot very well understand my right hon. friend when he says that the case was not argued, or that admissions were made giving up the whole thing. When the case was argued before the Supreme Court of Canada the counsel for the dominion were the present chief justice of Ontario, assisted by Mr. St. Laurent of Quebec, both past presidents of the Canadian Bar Association, as is my right hon. friend, and also by Mr. Plaxton, a very efficient and brilliant officer of the Department of Justice. Certainly the argument was made as strongly as possible and, before the decisions were given, my right hon friend himself said that he could not find fault with the counsel appointed by the dominion government.

Before the case was argued before the privy council Mr. Rowell had been appointed chief justice of Ontario, and we appointed in his place Mr. Robertson of Toronto, who, as everybody knows, is an eminent and distinguished counsel. The privy council merely supported the views of the Supreme Court of Canada. I never could understand why the privy council was so strongly attacked after that decision had been given by them, because after all they merely said the same thing that the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada had said.

Mr. BENNETT: It was for the reasons they gave.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have here the report of the privy council in which I find something rather interesting. When one listens to the violent protests made in some quarters about trespassing and encroaching upon the rights of provinces, one has a desire to know all the facts. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that when the reference was argued before the Supreme Court of Canada, Quebec was there represented in the defence of its rights, and argued that the law was ultra vires? Mr. Geoffrion represented the province of Quebec on that occasion. But when the case was argued before the privy council there had been a change of government in Quebec, and Mr. Geoffrion's mandate had been revoked. A gentleman named, I believe, Mr. Monette, was sent to represent Quebec, and apparently he had instructions to appear only in connection with the natural products marketing case. That was the only one, according to the reports, and according to the information I received from my officers, in which the province of Quebec was represented before the privy council. Do hon. members know that on the unemployment insurance case Quebec was not represented, the only provinces to have representation being Ontario and New Brunswick?

Ontario—and I am sure we will not have difficulty in securing Ontario's agreement to the amendment—was represented by Mr. Roebuck, the then Attorney General, and Mr. I. A. Humphries, K.C. Here is what Ontario said before the privy council, according to the report:

> Ontario does not take quite the same view of all the matters as the dominion takes. Ontario desires to support this act, however, because it is felt that it is in the public interest both in the provinces and in the dominion as a whole. Ontario's attitude, therefore, is that it is desirable to find means, if that is possible within the four corners of the constitution, by which the act may be supported as a matter within dominion jurisdiction. It is submitted that the legislation is within the overriding power of the opening words of section 91, and is also within the residuary power—in a sense there is a distinction between those two.

Then, the last words were:

> A subject of nation wide legislation may and does incidentally affect the provinces. The scheme of insurance being nation wide and not possible of enactment in the provinces, it is not civil rights in the province at all.
> With regard to the dominion right of taxation, it is not conceded that the dominion may tax everything everywhere and that the provinces are left solely to what is left, but no objection is taken by Ontario to this particular taxation for this particular purpose.

Mr. CAHAN: Is that a summary in the report, or a shorthand report?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): A summary in the report. The report goes on to show that the province of New Brunswick is the only one which, through its Attorney General, Mr. McNair, defended the provincial jurisdiction in the matter before the privy council. The only other province represented was Ontario, and Ontario supported the validity of the legislation. Quebec did not appear, and did not say a word.

I am at a loss to understand now the indignation of gentlemen who to-day claim that this tyrannical government at Ottawa wants to transgress upon the rights of the province of Quebec, and to trespass upon her provincial constitutional powers, when we courteously and politely ask them whether they will agree to a little amendment to give the federal parliament the right to amend the constitution for the purpose of enacting an unemployment insurance scheme. Two years ago the same gentlemen, without being asked and without being invited to give any consent or to agree to anything, were quite pleased to accept legislation enacted without their participation.

And now we are the persecutors. We are the ones who, through the constitution, are trying to inflict this persecution on the province of Quebec. Well, I am not impressed by these denunciations, I must admit, and I do not think the country or the electors in the province will be impressed by them, either.

Perhaps I should have done so at the outset, but if I am not too late I should like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address upon their splendid presentations. Both are worthy acquisitions to the house. Of course I am better acquainted with the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Francœur), who has been my life long friend, and I take this opportunity to congratulate him upon his election. He has shown all the qualities I have always known him to possess. His stand in the campaign was fearless, courageous and non-equivocal, and he received a splendid support from his electors.

I am grateful to those who urged the electors of Lotbinière to put up an opposition. I saw a very worthy article in the press to the effect that it was good for a government to have an opposition, and that the election should not be allowed to go unopposed. That statement in the press was of great service to us, and I am grateful that the electors of Lotbinière, in the province of Quebec, have had a chance to declare their stand on the questions submitted to them. It was a test, and I am pleased that our friends from the other provinces, who were a little nervous as to what Quebec thought and felt, have been reassured. They know now that the noisy expressions of some groups do not represent the sane minds in the population of that province.

The majority was large, indeed. But, so far as the issues of the campaign are concerned it is still larger than it appears, because there was no Conservative opposition. When one reads the figures as to votes he will find that the votes given to the opposition candidate, who certainly did not represent Conservative ideas or Conservative views, were given at places where Conservative voters were in the majority. That is explainable—they did not like his ideas. The platform of this gentlemen was not supported by the Conservatives of the province of Quebec any more than it was supported by the Liberals, but many Conservatives voted for him because they felt they were against the government anyway. It is for these reasons that I believe we should have in these by-elections either a straight contest or none at all, in order that Conservatives may not get into the bad habit of voting for anybody.

Mr LAWSON: Anybody other than a Liberal.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Anybody other than a Liberal, yes. The result was a good thing for democracy. We are living in difficult times; attacks are being made upon democratic institutions and parliamentary representation. Many of them are being made in my own province. Some of these people do not seem to realize that it is dangerous to attack democracy and parliamentary institutions. If they succeed in destroying the influence of parliament they do not know what the result will be. They may believe that their own system will prevail, but they are taking the chance that the system which will finally prevail will be one which they themselves abhor.

As I said in Lotbinière, those who attack democracy in this way are in fact protected by democracy. If this was a totalitarian state and they said the things which they have said and which they have printed in their newspapers, they would be immediately purged—I do not know whether that is the correct word to use.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the Hitler word.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is what he would do. But we live in a democracy and we do not treat our opponents in that way. They are quite safe to carry on their campaign—against me at all events, because I am not bothered by what they say.

Democracy has made Canada what it is to-day. It is the only possible system of government for this country. If I may be permitted to single out one country, immediately a dictator took office in Germany his first act was to do away with all the state legislatures. There was no longer a federal system, there was only one government, and that government was himself. I wonder how my fellow citizens of Quebec would like it if we had a system under which the provinces would disappear, where a nazi or totalitarian form of government in Ottawa would direct everything and everybody?

May I say another word in conclusion? Those who speak against democracy speak against parliament. They speak against the parliament of Canada. While I hate to say this myself, next week I enter my thirty-fifth year as a member of the House of Commons. During that time I have come in contact with gentlemen from every section of this country. I have met members of every trade and class, men from the prairies and the farms, men from the large cities and small towns. Many of these men have had ideas different from mine. They have had different visions, different views, different tastes, different talents, but I am proud to say that you could not find anywhere any body of men, any association or any group which surpasses the parliament of Canada for love of country and willingness to serve it at all times. We may differ in our methods, but we are all animated with the same desire to serve our fellow men.

This parliament is Canada on a reduced plane. It is the voice of Canada that is heard here. It is here that the will of the people asserts itself. Our parliamentary institution is not perfect; there is need for improvement, but to abolish it entirely would make conditions much worse. We must look towards the future, not back to the past. No matter what the agitators and theorists may say, if we overcome our present difficulties it will be because of the work of the members of this parliament. Sometimes we fight among ourselves, but out of it all comes something advantageous to the people of this country.

We do not want a dictatorship in this country. Our future can be secured only if our people are free to exercise their unfettered influence upon those who sit in places of power. It is for us to show the world that Canada is not a reactionary and degenerate democracy, but a country that is self-disciplined, free and rational and wholly prepared to face the future with full confidence and faith in its destiny.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to follow my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in detail, as I have no desire at this time to discuss the internal politics of the province of Quebec. I listened to the radio speeches of three members of the government who spoke in the campaigns in Lotbiniere and St. Henry. I was pleased, too, with the change of temper and tone of utterance of these gentlemen as compared with what I had heard some years ago when for being even slightly less zealous for Canada's defence I was assailed and driven out of public halls in the province of Quebec. There has been a great change not only in the temper but in the tone of their public utterance during recent years, and I congratulate the three members of this government, who participated in those elections, upon that change, except that I think they did in St. Henry lay special stress upon the benefit of public works—the tunnel under the canal, the fifty million dollar expenditure on the Canadian National station, and other similar matters which I thought were extreme suggestions to the electorate.

But I wish to discuss another matter, and in that I do not intend to enter upon a discussion of the personal relations or of the personal opinions of the present premier of Quebec and the Minister of Justice. Dealing with the proposed amendment to the constitution, I have no doubt—and I do not believe any member of this parliament who has studied the question has any doubt—that a joint resolution of the House of Commons and of the Senate praying His Majesty in council to present to the parliament of the United Kingdom any bill amending the British North America Act would unhesitatingly be acted upon by that parliament. That I think is perfectly clear, and I have no hesitation in saying that if such an address or petition received the approval of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada the proposed amendment would be made to the British North America Act no matter what provision of the act it attempted to modify or amend.

The parliament of the United Kingdom cannot afford to come into collision with the deliberately expressed views of the parliament of Canada, and therefore that very fact has aroused in the province of Quebec certain doubts as to whether we should proceed at this time with the special amendment to which reference is made in the speech from the throne. It is not a doubt entertained solely by the Roman Catholic and French speaking majority in the province of Quebec. It is a doubt that is entertained also by the great body of English speaking and Protestant opinion in that province; and that doubt is as to whether it is advisable at this time to create the precedent by way of amendment to the act which the government now propose. There is a conviction that if amendments are likely to be so readily granted by the parliament of the United Kingdom, some day an amendment might be proposed which would diminish or prejudicially affect the rights of the English speaking and Protestant minority in that province, or, on the other hand, prejudicially affect the rights of the Catholic and French speaking majority in the province, who represent a minority in the whole dominion.

The amendment proposed is to add as clause 2(a) to section 91 of the British North America Act the words: "Unemployment insurance." I might say by way of parenthesis that I do not see the reason for calling it clause 2(a). For all practical purposes, if the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council are to prevail you might as well strike out clause 2, dealing with the regulation of trade and commerce, and insert the proposed clause 2(a) with regard to unemployment insurance as clause 2. Our present difficulty arises by reason of the fact that in drafting the British North America Act, so important did the framers of the act, who were Canadian statesmen of that day, regard the matter of the regulation of trade and commerce, that they placed it as the second item under section 91, which reads in part:

> It is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated.

"Notwithstanding anything in this act"—that is, in section 91 or elsewhere.

> —the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated.

And one of those classes, the second one mentioned, the one which they regarded as second in importance, is "the regulation of trade and commerce." So, as clearly and concisely as it was possible for the men of that day to express their views, they expressed them to the effect that notwithstanding anything contained in this act, the absolute and exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extended to all matters coming within "the regulation of trade and commerce." I shall not emphasize it, but that clause gave a wide, a very wide, authority to the parliament of Canada; and yet the privy council, by decision after decision, has cut down and restricted that provision until to-day there is not a lawyer in this house who could tell me any particular matter coming under that head with respect to which this parliament might safely legislate. The whole purpose and intent of that clause of the act has been changed, if not obliterated.

Now with that in view I wonder whether the government have carefully considered whether the mere placing in section 91 as clause 2 (a) the words, "unemployment insurance" will give this parliament legislative jurisdiction to the extent necessary to deal with what we, in common parlance, understand to be covered by "unemployment insurance." I doubt it. I have not consulted my leader or my other colleagues with regard to it; I am simply expressing my personal opinion which has been elicited by what I have just heard from the right hon. the Minister of Justice. When this matter was before the previous government in 1935 I looked into the question as carefully as I could, and I became persuaded, and that persuasion became a conviction, that parliament could not deal as completely as was necessary with unemployment insurance unless at the same time it had legislative authority to deal with hours of employment, with minimum wages of employees, with the power to arbitrate and adjust labour disputes, which was wiped away by the Snider decision. The leader of the government will recall that the statute which was enacted and which the Snider decision nullified was one which for a period of twelve or fifteen years had been regarded as the law of Canada. Under its provisions grave labour troubles were adjusted satisfactorily and great loss was prevented not only to those employed in labour but to employers as well. There were some minor amendments to that act as time disclosed the need of amendment, but that act was essential to the well-being, not only of those employed in any province in particular but of all workmen in all the provinces.

I doubt, in view of the manner in which the privy council has interpreted from time to time section 91 of the British North America Act, whether under the words "unemployment insurance" when attached as sub-heading 2 (a) to section 91, this government and this parliament will find sufficient scope to deal with the very serious question of unemployment, in which so many thousands and even tens of thousands of the people of Canada are now intensely interested. When the previous legislation of 1935 was introduced, to my mind the most commendable feature was that by a series of proposed acts dealing with matters of employment, hours of employment, wages, and the like, parliament and the government were vested with sufficient authority to deal satisfactorily with unemployment insurance in respect of all matters coming within this class of subjects or that are correlated therewith. I should like the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to consider, in view of other decisions of the judicial committee, whether the proposed amendment is likely to prove sufficient for the purpose which he has in view in presenting it to the house.

Another consideration: "unemployment insurance" will not admit of the adjustment of all matters relating to unemployment and unemployment relief in this country. It is proposed, as I understand, to make a departure in the way of providing insurance for those who are now employed in industry or are likely to be employed in industry in the future in case that stress of prevailing commercial, industrial and financial conditions pushes them again into a labour market in which they can find no employment. But for carrying out that purpose, which undoubtedly the house regards as a commendable one, and which must be dealt with sooner or later, so that ample provision may be made for dealing with it I wonder whether this measure should necessarily be pressed at this session of parliament. It can afford no relief to any considerable number of people for several years to come. It is a new departure that must be worked out stage by stage and year after year. It will cost I do not know how many millions; I have heard that at least fifty millions of contributions by the taxpayer, the employer and the labourer will be necessary to place the measure on even a moderately satisfactory basis. I ask whether it is advisable to press that amendment now, when the government have placed in the hands of a royal commission the elicitation of the relevant evidence and the consideration of representations from various parts of this country as to what amendments to the British North America Act should be considered and placed before the government and parliament of the United Kingdom.

The suggestion that now, by a mere vote of both houses, we can carry through this amendment to the British North America Act, as we undoubtedly can, has aroused for the first time in some years a grave anxiety in the province which I represent as to the likelihood of a similar procedure being adopted in respect of an amendment or modification of rights and interests which its people hold most dear. As a matter of fact I have never accepted, in the sense in which I have heard it repeated recently, that the British North America Act was a compact or treaty between provinces. It was more than that. It was more sacred than that. It was a clear understanding, a pact, an agreement between representatives of the Roman Catholic faith and representatives of the Protestant faith, in the old provinces of Canada, that certain civil liberties should be guaranteed. It was also an understanding between a Protestant minority in the Lower Canada and a Catholic majority there, and a Protestant majority throughout all the provinces entering the union and a Catholic minority there, that certain rights and interests were to be guaranteed and made secure. And before we enter upon the consideration of any large or liberal amendments to the British North America Act we should satisfy those interested from those two points of view that these so called minority rights and interests will not be prejudicially affected except with their consent or the consent of those who represent them. Therefore I am simply suggesting, as one member of the house, sitting as I do on the opposition benches, not having discussed it with my colleagues or with my leader, that it would be wise to "make haste slowly" in regard to this particular amendment. I doubt whether the amendment proposed is sufficient. I think that other powers, or a broader definition, must be given to unemployment insurance, in order that all collateral matters may be satisfactorily dealt with.

When parliament comes to deal with the report which will be made eventually, probably at a later date in this year, by the royal commission now sitting, I think it will be necessary for parliament, if that commission does not do so, to consider fully and fairly some measure for procuring future amendments to the British North America Act at the will of the Canadian people as represented in parliament, which will prescribe a mode or method of procedure that will ensure that the rights of minorities will be respected and that any future modifications made by amendment to the constitution of this country will be made with the approval of these minorities. The anxiety that prevails, not only among Catholic people but among Protestants, not only among those of French descent who speak the French language but among those of English, Scottish and Irish descent who speak the English language, should be allayed at the very outset before any radical amendments to the British North America Act are now made.

I do not intend to enter into the discussion which was participated in by the right hon. Minister of Justice with respect to the argument of the appeals recently before the privy council. I have not seen the shorthand report; I suppose it is available in the Department of Justice, and, if it is, it might well be laid upon the table of the house—I refer to the shorthand report of the argument of counsel before that judicial committee. For many years after I became a student of these questions, some sixteen years after this confederation was founded, at my own personal expense, because of my personal interest, I obtained from London the shorthand reports in every constitutional case that was argued there. Some years ago I ceased to acquire them because those that I had in my possession I had packed away in trunks when I was leaving the home in which I formerly lived, and I do not know where they may now be found.

I will say this, however, that I have been particularly impressed by the report of the recent arguments before the judicial committee as given to me by one of the professors of Harvard who heard the argument and who is very much interested in Canadian constitutional questions. I was impressed by what he said regarding the admissions which he says he heard made by counsel for the government. I believe that that appeal went, not upon any prolonged investigation or study by the members of the judicial committee, not upon any exhaustive study of the Canadian constitution and of the statutes and documents leading up to the framing of that constitution, but almost completely upon the admissions made by counsel, to the effect that these proposed measures were admittedly an infringement of the rights of the province under heading 13 of section 92, dealing with "property and civil rights in the province." In my opinion that admission was clearly made, if these reports are correct, without any careful effort to elucidate that aspect of the question which was relevant and material to the decision of the appeal then under consideration. However, I do not know personally the gentleman who made the argument. I have heard him spoken of very highly indeed, and I do not wish to detract from his professional reputation.

But as the British North America Act may be amended, and has been amended time and again by judicial interpretation, when new clauses to sections 91 and 92 have been added, as they have been added from time to time by judicial interpretation, it is most important that counsel representing the dominion should be very reticent in making admissions of that kind, which may be accepted by the judicial committee as valid, and as relieving them of any necessity of making an independent study of the issues.

Mr. A. B. HYNDMAN (Carleton): Before continuing the debate I should like to congratulate the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) upon the title conferred upon him during the past year. Those of us who had not the privilege of attending the coronation were indeed proud, I may add, that we had a representative of Canada in the person of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). What gave us satisfaction, I believe, was not perhaps anything that he said at the coronation so much as his address at the Paris exposition, in which he said that when the mother country was in danger she could always depend upon Canada's readiness to be at her side. Those are words which I am sure every Canadian citizen was glad to hear our Prime Minister say. I believe that we as Canadians desire to impress upon the mother country that in all circumstances of strife, yes, in every difficulty, in war, she may count upon our support. I would rather have words of that kind spoken even in France, that good country, than the words we heard in the recent by-elections in the province of Quebec, where it was said on different platforms that the reason we were building up our defences in Canada, the reason we spent $35,000,000 for defensive purposes last year, was only to protect our own shores. I am confident the citizens of this country feel that we spent that money last year for the protection of the citizens of Canada, but I am confident also that if the mother country, or any part of the British Commonwealth of Nations, is ever attacked, we in Canada will be ready at all times to go to its assistance.

I should like also at this time to compliment the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. True they are new members of the house, but they are veterans in the provincial field. I am particularly interested in the hon. member who seconded the address, as he represents a neighbouring constituency to my own.

I listened to the speech from the throne as well as I could at the bar of the senate, and next day I read it through very carefully. I must confess that I was greatly disappointed in its contents. I found it a void and empty document. Therefore I was pleased to hear the comment of the Prime Minister as reported on page 52 of Hansard:

> Why should the speech from the throne state that the government contemplates taking efficient measures to improve economic conditions?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the hon. member please read the next sentence or two?

Mr. HYNDMAN: Yes, I was coming to that.

> Look at the facts and figures with regard to the present conditions in Canada in comparison with what they were when we came into office and see what they disclose. They speak more eloquently than could any words in the speech from the throne.

Is that far enough?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is enough, yes.

Mr. HYNDMAN: According to that the Prime Minister and leader of the Liberal party is putting all dependence, as far as the future of this country is concerned, upon increased trade, winning by-elections, increasing revenue and the decrease in unemployment. I think the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) pointed out very clearly in his address that as far as increase in trade is concerned it is largely dependent upon conditions in other countries, and we are in about the same position as those other countries. I recall clearly that prior to the last general election there was talk in Canada of the need for a national government. The present Prime Minister during that campaign stated on different occasions that there was no need for a national government; that all the provinces except one were Liberal, and that if we elected a Liberal government to the dominion house we would in reality have a national government and would have complete harmony between the provinces and the dominion. But in the very first session of this parliament what did we hear? We heard the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) in his address on the Bank of Canada say that it may be that the Liberal party is placing its footsteps on that trail of broken promises which leads not only through the valley of humiliation but down deep into the abysmal depths of eternal oblivion. We also heard the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) speak very strongly on the same subject. And what do we find going on this year? We have Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba not on the best of terms with the federal government. We have the premier of Ontario stating at a banquet in Toronto that he is no longer a Mackenzie King Liberal. Thank goodness Mackenzie King is not a Hepburn Liberal! And here we have the Premier of Quebec, the other major province in this dominion, stating that the Mackenzie King government, the federal government, has not the "intestinal fortitude" to settle the Canadian National Railways question. I would not call that harmony.

It is all very well to say that we have to depend upon trade; that the number of our unemployed is less—which I question very much—and that our revenues are higher and everything is fine. But I saw something in the Ottawa press last night which reminded me very much of the year 1929. On the front page of last night's Ottawa Journal in big, black headlines it said, "Leading stocks in sharp dip in New York." I also read that Mayor Lewis of this city, incidentally a very staunch Liberal, reminded his colleagues on the board of control that a fight is ahead if civic expenditures of 1938 are to be kept within the bounds of last year's budget. Those are similar to signs which appeared on the horizon in 1929. I submit that the government of the day are not taking the steps necessary to combat another depression.

We have three very important questions confronting the Canadian people at the present time. The most important is taxation. This country is weighed down with taxation.

Another question that is not being dealt with properly is unemployment, and the third, which has been discussed this afternoon, is the British North America Act. It is of those three questions that I wish to speak briefly at this time.

First, taxation. I wonder if hon. members realize the amounts of money that the taxpayers are paying to federal, provincial and municipal governments. For the information and interest of hon. members may I place on Hansard a few figures I have compiled from the Canada Year Book. I take the information given for the year 1934, a year when revenues were small, and I find that the ordinary revenue from taxation received by the provinces is as follows:

Nova Scotia	8,876,505
New Brunswick	5,535,214
Quebec	31,018,344
Ontario	61,426,934
Manitoba	13,966,921
Saskatchewan	15,585,916
Alberta	15,176,607
British Columbia	22,618,367
Total	$175,592,585

Hon. members will note the amount received by Saskatchewan, the province which has been so hard hit.

Let us now consider the taxes received by the municipalities, at the same time, bearing in mind that we are all taxpayers. The figures for the taxes received by municipalities in the different provinces are as follows:

Municipalities of—
Prince Edward Island	$ 164,158
Nova Scotia	7,108,035
New Brunswick	2,207,230
Quebec	59,729,973
Ontario	117,892,884
Manitoba	18,187,714
Saskatchewan	16,624,783
Alberta	12,218,328
British Columbia	18,002,475
Total	$252,139,580

In 1936 the dominion government received in taxes no less than $372,595,996. The total, from all sources, amounts to about $800,428,161, and when we take the population of Canada at 11,000,000 we have a tax of $73 per capita. In other words, every man, woman and child in the dominion in every year has to pay $73 for taxes.

I claim that is a burning question to-day, one which should be considered by the government. I represent the county of Carleton, a county which I believe is managing its affairs in a first class manner. It is one of the best counties in the province—yes, one of the best in the dominion. When I tell hon. members that between 1932 and the close of 1937 the county of Carleton reduced its debenture debt by close to a million dollars, I think they will conclude that that county is doing its level best to try to make ends meet, and deserves a great deal of credit.

My submission is that taxation in Canada is too high. From the time we are born until we are buried we have to pay taxes—and we have to pay them even after that. The doctor who attends when we are born must pay taxes on all his equipment. Then, we pay heavy taxation on what we eat and wear. During a lifetime our pleasures, and especially radio, which I intend to touch upon later, are taxed. When we die we pay a tax, due to the taxes imposed upon undertaking equipment. Apparently the government is not satisfied with that, because they even tax the embalming fluid with which our bodies are embalmed, in an effort, I venture to say, to continue the process of taxation even when we are in the ground. In addition to that there are succession duties.

I was pleased to hear the references made by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) and the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) to the farmers of Canada. I cannot agree with some of the statements made by the hon. member for Huron North, as they could be applied to the farmers in the eastern part of Ontario. He told us, speaking in this debate, that the average farm in western Ontario, representing an investment of $7,200, after payment of all expenses netted the farmer only $362. So far as the farmers in the county of Carleton are concerned I would say that that figure is not correct. In some respects I believe his figures are a little low. For example, he allows $6 for power and light. Possibly electric power in western Ontario is supplied at a cheaper rate than we have in this part of Ontario, but I am almost certain that that figure is a little too low Then, too, his estimate of the net profit to the farmer as being about one dollar a day is, in my opinion, too high.

I make the rather strong statement that 75 per cent of the farms in Ontario are mortgaged. I admit that at present and during the past year the farmers have been a little better off; I admit they have a little more money in their pockets, but I pity them if we have another depression, and I have even greater pity for them if we are unfortunate enough to lose any of the markets we have had in the past. I submit that there should be an investigation into the prices our farmers get for their products and the prices the consumers have to pay. This is the type of investigation carried on by the price spreads commission which, in my view, was the best commission ever appointed by any government.

I should like to give an example of what happened in this immediate locality at Christmas time. When the farmers around Ottawa tried to sell their turkeys just before Christmas all they could get from any dealer was twenty cents per pound, but immediately after Christmas the price jumped to thirty-two cents per pound. I contend that there is a sort of combine working against the farmers and also against the consumers in the city of Ottawa. Because of this combine we had to eat storage turkeys for our Christmas dinner, but immediately afterwards we were able to get fresh turkeys.

I contend that there should be an investigation into the packing industry in this country. The packers are bleeding the farmers. I agree with what the hon. member for Haldimand said the other night, that we in Ontario should have minimum prices fixed for our farm products. A minimum price is fixed for the wheat grown in the west and the same thing should be done for the products of the east. I notice the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is not in his seat, but while I am on this point I want to say I hope that during this session he will speak about something outside of wheat. For the past two years we have heard of nothing but wheat and conditions in the western provinces.

I have every sympathy with the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Incidentally, I might say I am averse to the criticism which has been made of those in charge of provincial affairs in Manitoba and Alberta. It must be remembered that I am no social crediter, but I think it must be admitted that they are attempting something. That is more than the federal government is doing at the present time. I do not want hon. members to think I believe in the policies of the social crediters, but they are at least trying to do something while we in the federal house, both Conservatives and members of the government, make no attempt to do anything.

I listened to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) the other evening when he was preaching free trade for the western province. Is that cooperation? We had discourses by the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) on keeping the provinces amalgamated in one dominion; yet we have the hon. member for Moose Jaw coming out and advocating regional free trade. That is not a very nice request for any hon. member from the western provinces to make in the house. It must be remembered that the eastern provinces are not complaining very much about the help which has been given to the west during the past five or six years.

Mr. FAIR: Where did that help come from originally?

Mr. HYNDMAN: I venture to say it came from the west. Then we heard from the hon. member for Huron North. This is another gentleman who believes in free trade. I suggest to the hon member for Moose Jaw, the hon. member for Huron North and any other free traders in the house that if they want free trade they should move an amendment to the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne.

I am a protectionist, but I want protection that is controlled. I believe in protecting our industries, but I should like to see the government have some control over industry. I have in my hand a list of retail prices of different articles. I intend to refer particularly to motor cars and farm implements. I notice the price in New York of a Chevrolet car, one of the three popular makes, is $732, while the price in Canada is $1,040. The United States price of a Ford is $749, while the Canadian price is $953. The price in New York of a Plymouth is $848, while the price here is $1,093. I maintain that if manufacturers of motor cars who have been protected for a number of years are not able to manufacture cars to sell at the same price here as they sell at in the United States, then they should close up shop.

Mr. MARTIN: Do I understand the hon. member to say that in view of this spread in prices he would close up the automobile plants at Windsor and Oshawa?

Mr. HYNDMAN: I did not say that. I say that if plants in Windsor cannot manufacture motor cars to sell for the same price as they are sold at in Detroit, then let them close up shop. Remember I am in favour of a tariff to protect the motor car manufacturers in Windsor, but I would like the government to go to these companies and say, "Unless you sell your cars for the same price as they are sold at in the United States, we are going to wipe out the duty." If that is done, then we shall get somewhere.

An hon. MEMBER: Page your leader.

Mr. MARTIN: I am happy to disagree with you.

Mr. HYNDMAN: I am not referring to my leader. That is what happened when he was in power.

Mr. MARTIN: What happened?

Mr. MUTCH: We did not get cars at the same price when my hon. friend's party was in power.

Mr. HYNDMAN: There was no increase in price.

Mr. BRADETTE: They were selling at a higher price then than they are now.

Mr. HYNDMAN: They were lower then than they are now.

Mr. BRADETTE: They were higher then than they are now.

Mr. HYNDMAN: They were lower in price then than they are now. Let me remind hon. members that when my leader was in power he raised the tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HYNDMAN: Hold on over there. He raised the tariff all right, but he told the manufacturers that if they increased their prices to the consumers, the tariff would go down again; and they did not increase their prices. When the tariff was high when my leader was in power, one could buy farm implements cheaper than one can do to-day under the so-called low tariffs. One thing I should like to see lowered to-day is the tariff on farm implements, because I think one could say about farm implements the same thing that I have just said about motor cars.

I should also like to see a cessation of the exportation of certain of our natural resources, because we all know where the products of our mines, for example, are going. That was pointed out clearly the other evening by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), and I concur in what they said about the exportation of our raw materials to be used for war munitions.

Now I wish to say a word or two on radio. This country permitted the federal government to take over radio broadcasting for certain objectives, and under certain well-understood restrictions. Those objectives were as follows: First, Canada was to be sheltered from United States propaganda and from undersirable United States programs, from the dilution of our British citizenship through the aggressive and often fascinating United States spirit. This promise has been broken completely to pieces. We still get most of our programs, at least the programs that we listen to, from the United States. So if we hoped that we were going to secure immunity from that influence, we have been tricked.

Second, our broadcasting was to move towards the British ideal as exemplified in the British Broadcasting Corporation. Has it? So far from being supported by the fees levied, it has to draw more and more of its support from United States commercial programs. The Canadian programs have not been bettered at more than a fraction of the rate at which we have increased United States programs, and the new increase in fees is accompanied by a large increase in United States programs. Apparently what our broadcasting corporation is trying to do is to get more broadcasting stations with which to broadcast United States programs. That is precisely the opposite of the objective which was presented to us to make us swallow the licence fee at all, and it really means another venture by Canada in government ownership —as if the Canadian National were not enough. Of course, we can have government regulation and censorship without government operation. To compare our licence fee with those of other countries is wholly beside the point because conditions are not at all similar in Canada and Great Britain and other European countries. Our proper comparison is with the United States. The people there pay no fees at all, and yet they get a large proportion of the most attractive programs to which we listen, as well as a number of others which we do not have. If the present policy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is continued we shall eventually get most of the United States programs with their United States ideas and booming of United States products, but we shall have to pay $2.50 a year for that while the people of the United States pay nothing. If the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation cannot do better than that it might as well fold up. If it was fewer United States programs we wanted, we are getting more; if it was less booming of United States products through United States programs, we are getting more; if our object was to cut down on this United States invasion, the new policy, with its accompanying increase in the licence fee, is bringing us still more and more of the United States influence. If it was a gradual approach to the British system that we wanted, we are moving further and further away from it. If it was the development of a self-sufficient Canadian system that we hoped for, any intelligent radio fan now knows that is impossible. Our people are too United States program conscious.

Let me just mention the usual radio program listened to in a Canadian home on a Sunday evening. I venture to say that every member of the house on a Sunday evening listens to the following programs coming over the Ottawa station, CBO. At six o'clock we tune in on Joe Penner, the United States entertainer. At seven we follow that up with Jack Benny; at seven-thirty, with Phil Baker; at eight we have the dummy, Charlie McCarthy, coming on; at nine o'clock Manhattan Merry-go-round; at nine-thirty Walter Winchell, giving the news of Hollywood, and at ten we have the Good Will hour.

Mr. HOWE: If my friend listens to CBO on Sunday evening he will not hear more than two of those programs. If he does hear all those programs, he must be doing what a great many people do, spinning his dial over the United States stations. CBO has only two of those programs.

Mr. LAWSON: Because they spin over to the United States stations we charge them more for radio licences.

Mr. BRADETTE: You charged more for sugar a few years ago.

Mr. HYNDMAN: I am giving the house the kind of programs the Canadian public are listening to.

Mr. HOWE: I just want to make clear why I interrupted. I understood my hon. friend to say that he heard these programs over CBO.

Mr. HYNDMAN: I get Jack Benny and certainly Charlie McCarthy over CBO.

Mr. HOWE: But just those two.

Mr. HYNDMAN: They are United States programs. My point is that that is the type of program we get over the air at the present time in Canada, and I feel there is no sense in being charged even two dollars for it. They say they are increasing the licence fee by fifty cents, but that does not blind me to the fact that I shall have to pay $7.50 for my radios this year because we have now to pay $2.50 for each set.

I feel that the proper thing to do, if we are going to have a broadcasting system in this country, is to wipe out the radio licence fee altogether. Surely we are taxed enough already, and surely we can hear at least something over the air without having to pay for a licence. I say, wipe out the licence fee absolutely and completely

As I mentioned earlier in my remarks, nothing is being done by this government. If we go back over their record since they came into power, about the only thing they have done is to appoint commissions. We have had commissions sitting month after month, with high-priced lawyers, the lawyer for one commission being paid $200 a day and $20 a day living expenses. We have too many commissions looking after things.

As I said before, I am in favour of the minimum wage law; I think we need such legislation in this country.

I come now to unemployment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry, but the hon. gentleman has already spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. A. A. BROWN (Hamilton East): A careful scrutiny of the speech from the throne indicates clearly that the government is perfectly satisfied with the progress that this country has made during the past two years. Further, it shows that the government has no intention of departing from the policies which it has followed during that period. In support of this stand-pat attitude, hon. members to the right point out that the external trade of Canada has increased to $1,934,000,000; that the revenues have increased to $401,000,000, the highest for any similar period in our history; that employment has increased and unemployment has decreased. I admit that in adopting this attitude the government is quite consistent. In a synopsis of the Liberal platform which was published in MacLean's magazine on September 15, 1935, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) states:

> I believe that upon the development and expansion of our domestic and foreign trade depends the only ultimate solution of the problems of unemployment, railway debt and taxation, and the establishment of a substantial measure of social reform.

Yet as we peruse the speech from the throne we find no reference to the railway problem, to the problem of taxation, or to measures of social security which the government and all hon. members have agreed to be the grave problems which are stifling our economic life. In spite of the visible evidences of prosperity —our large revenues, and our huge external trade—we have some 381,000 people and probably more out of employment, some 970,000 on relief, and during the past two months we have experienced an adverse trade balance with the United States to the extent of some millions of dollars. Yet the government indicates that it intends to extend the present treaty with that country.

During the past few weeks there was in the city of Montreal a display by the wholesalers of toys for the Christmas trade of 1938, and German and Japanese products were there in such abundance that it was practically impossible to find any Canadian or British toys.

That will give some indication of what the Christmas toy trade will be in the coming year. Is it any wonder that thousands of people employed in the diversified industries throughout this country are alarmed for their future status, when some of them are receiving a bare living wage, when men employed in seasonal industries for nine months in the year have to go in debt or on relief for the remaining three months, when men at the age of thirty-eight years are regarded as too old to obtain new employment? Is it any wonder that by every mail representations are received from employers of labour, from the manufacturing industries, the coal industry of the west and of the maritime provinces, the fruit and vegetable growers of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and British Columbia?

As many speakers in the course of this debate have said, the industries of this country must march together, must work together, and failures in one will undoubtedly affect the others. According to the bureau of statistics, for the year 1936 the wealth production of all industry in Canada is rated as follows:

Manufacturing	$1,476,000,000
Agriculture	746,968,000
Mining	376,000,000
Tourist trade	250,000,000
Forestry	214,760,000
Electric power	138,000,000
Construction	131,400,000
Customs and trade	70,000,000
Fishing	35,000,000
Trapping	9,600,000

This clearly shows that it is impossible for one industry in this country to be injured without affecting adversely the others.

In the past it has been the practice of almost every government in times of depression upon coming into power to commence spending huge sums of money on building projects in order that the circulation of this money may stimulate private industry and so eventually reach the man out of employment. In the past, as a rule, this method has been successful, but on account of unusual conditions it is not altogether effective, partly because the projects that were started were not needed and partly because the money did not go into the hands of those who really needed it and whom it was intended for. I believe that a much more efficient way of dealing with this problem of unemployment and of avoiding the difficulties inseparable from amendment of the British North America Act would be for the government to consult those employers of labour who they believe will find work for the unemployed in order to ascertain under what conditions they could and would employ more hands, and to endeavour to meet such conditions, at the same time protecting the employee in the matter of a living wage and decent working hours.

In many European countries during the great war the press was regarded as the greatest force in welding the nation together and in achieving unity of purpose. At present, in this so-called day of the radio, many of those countries that are passing through critical times have found the press the greatest force in influencing and directing the nation. If the government would give proper leadership; if it would insist upon Canadian goods being marked as "Made in Canada," goods imported from other countries having the country of origin similarly indicated; if the government would lead a nationwide advertising campaign and spend as much time in an effort to stimulate internal trade as it has done in attempting to develop external trade, I believe that great benefit would accrue to Canada, and that this would go a long way towards restoring prosperity to our people.

On motion of Mr. Brown the debate was adjourned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am informed by the whips that there is a general desire on the part of hon. members not to sit this evening. During the last few years it has become the custom not to sit on the last night of the first week. I do not think it should become a precedent altogether, but I think on this occasion it would be safe to ask for an adjournment. I move that the house do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 5.45 p.m.

Monday, February 7, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre) moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the standing committees of this house shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I gathered from what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) said the other day that he would make inquiry as to whether the Auditor General's report should not as a matter of course be referred to the committee on public accounts. This question arises out of this motion.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I have looked into the procedure of recent years and I find that in most cases since 1931 the Auditor General's report has been tabled by the Minister of Finance shortly after the opening of the session and that a subsequent motion has been made to refer the report to the appropriate committee after the setting up of the committees. I intend to make such a motion one of these days.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 17, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, February 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. N. Francœur for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Bennett.

Mr. A. A. BROWN (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, during the week-end while I was home certain merchants and manufacturers in and about the city of Hamilton called upon me, and in the course of our conversation advised me that two of the greatest factors that were contributing to the unemployment situation and to increasing unemployment to-day in that district were, first, that American goods are being dumped into our markets at much below the selling price in the United States, and, second, that a flood of Japanese goods are being sold in the departmental and retail stores of this country, to an extent which is hardly realized by the general public. The Japanese have gone into making screws, brushes, book-ends, lighters, etc., many of which articles are selling in Canada at much below the cost even of the materials that enter into them. It simply means that these industries in Japan are being subsidized by the people of Canada, and, I repeat, they are selling their goods in this country at a price below or at best equal to the cost of the materials used in producing them.

Before the house adjourned on Friday, I was saying that it seems to me that the government is too well satisfied with the present financial and social conditions in this country. To such an extent is this true that you can read the speech from the throne as often as you like, and you will find in it no indication of any measures proposed to reduce the uncontrollable expenditure, which accounts for some forty cents out of every dollar of revenue collected. No measures are being taken to wipe out the sugar tax, which the members of this government, when in opposition, opposed so strenuously, and there is no suggestion that the eight per cent sales tax is to be reduced, although it is one of the chief obstacles to carrying on business in this country. Nor is there suggested any practical scheme of cooperation with the provinces and municipalities to remove from real estate the tremendous burden of taxation from which it is suffering, and which is the great obstacle to a revival of the building industry. I think if the government would make some effort to cooperate with these other governing bodies it would do much more to help the building industry than the present financial loan arrangements for that same purpose.

Another year has passed, Mr. Speaker, and no measure has been introduced by this government to deal effectively with our railway problem, which has been increasing the national debt by many millions of dollars year after year. The railway problem, I think it is generally recognized, is one of the most important with which this country has to deal, and speaking for myself I do not think we shall have any major degree of prosperity until this problem is solved.

Perusing the speech from the throne we find that the government's idea of a substantial measure of social reform consists of a proposed amendment to the British North America Act which would enable parliament to enact forthwith a national scheme of unemployment insurance. Such a measure, Mr. Speaker, is one of the most important with which this parliament could be called upon to deal, and I fear that the government is not attaching to it the importance it deserves. It is a measure that would affect to a very great extent my constituency of Hamilton East. Hamilton is one of the largest industrial cities of this dominion. It is situated in one of the richest fruit and vegetable growing districts, the prosperity of which is dependent upon the millions of dollars paid out annually in wages by the industries in the Hamilton district. There is no part of the country more sensitive to fluctuations and variations in industry than Hamilton and the surrounding district, and uncertainty as to the attitude of this government in the matter of making tariffs and making treaties has contributed to unemployment there.

The government appears to have adopted the attitude that it took between the years 1921 and 1930, when it reduced the tariff, without any compensating benefits to the people of this country, at a time when all the other nations of the world were raising tariffs. When the members on this side of the house complained about the grave injuries that were being done to our industries by these tariff reductions, hon. gentlemen opposite pointed then, as they do to-day, to our huge external trade and to the large revenues that are being collected; they closed their eyes entirely to the fact that hundreds of thousands of Canadians were leaving Canada to look for work in the United States. Following the tariff reductions made during that period, various products that were manufactured in the many branch factories in Hamilton were no longer manufactured there but were manufactured in the main factory in the United States. But when the Conservative party came into power in 1930 and raised the tariff to ensure that our industries would be able to compete on even terms with those of foreign nations, products that had never before been manufactured in the branch factories in Hamilton were manufactured there, and with very little, if any, increase in price to the consumers.

When the Liberal party came into power again in 1935, we found history repeating itself. The government, in its quest for international trade, is making or contemplating making treaties which according to rumour it is hoped will not sacrifice our industries and will be of benefit to this country.

I do not wish the members of this house to think I believe in the tariff as a panacea for all our economic ills. Nor do I believe in high tariffs. I believe that we must trade with other nations, but I contend that a proper protective tariff in order to influence trade balances, to provide work and opportunities for both the farmer and the industrial worker, is the right tariff for a nation such as ours. It is impossible to have any measure of social or economic reform unless all parties in this house agree to the principle of a fair protective tariff.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to have to stop the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I find myself in what is no doubt a similar position to that of many other hon. members: we should have liked to see something more in the speech from the throne than there is in it, yet we are not greatly disappointed, because we did not expect it.

But there are certain things that we have a right to expect. This is the third session of parliament since this government came into office, and we have the right to expect that the government, possessing as it does the power, should give effect to some of the promises it made to the electorate before it assumed office. The government should not forget that it is here to-day because of a failure of the former government to deal effectively with the economic situation. It should also be remembered that this government came into office at a very much more favourable time than the former administration. The previous government came into office when the country was going into the deeps of the depression, a depression not peculiar to this country but common to the world at large; whereas the present government came into power when the economic situation the world over was improving. They are therefore more accountable to the people of Canada than was the former government because they have not extended that improvement to a larger section of the population. I am not taking up the cudgels on behalf of the previous administration; we criticized them as we criticize the present one, but there is that difference, and it should be remembered.

It is true that some improvement has taken place since this government came into office, but it cannot be denied that the government is not responsible for that improvement, because a similar process has been going on all over the world, and great as is the power of this government it does not extend much beyond the bounds of the dominion.

In my opinion there is a reason why more has not been done, and until that reason is recognized and considered, very little will be done. It is that, underlying the economic fluctuations of to-day not only in Canada but all over the world, there is a fundamental flaw in the economic system itself. The circumstances and conditions which built up in the past what we were pleased to call prosperity have disappeared and will not return. As I have said, the improvement of which we boast has been world-wide. The depression, of which we already see signs, will also be world-wide. And no country in the world has made less preparation to meet it than Canada has.

When the party now in power went to the people in 1935, it presented a fairly definite program, with planks dealing with various matters of concern to the people. Chief among these was unemployment, and the Liberal party promised to deal effectively with it. The improved economic conditions in the last two and a half years have of course diminished unemployment, but let us remember that in one month alone, last December, over 78,000 were added to the unemployed lists, and there is nothing in the policies of this government that could have prevented that occurrence. Similar increases, brought about by a world-wide situation, may take place in the coming months, and all the improvement, as far as employment is concerned, would be wiped away.

Then we were promised unemployment insurance. I am pleased that the government is taking steps to give effect to that pledge, but I was astonished the other day when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that the actions of the former—Conservative—government were responsible for this delay of five years. Unemployment insurance was a plank in the Liberal party's platform as far back as 1919. If that be so, and it is so, the Liberal government of to-day is responsible for a delay of fourteen years.

We were also promised the liberation of external trade. Trade of course has increased. This government said not only that it would improve conditions by enlarging trade within empire countries but that it would increase trade with all countries. The facts are otherwise. I have before me an article by Courtland Elliott in Canadian Business, the official organ of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. It is pointed out, in an analysis of Canadian trade, that our trade with the United Kingdom is, in percentages, approximately the same as it was in 1932; that is, taking the months January to October, 1932, and comparing them with the months January to October, 1937.

Mr. DUNNING: Percentages of what?

Mr. MacINNIS: The percentages of Canadian trade; that is, that part of Canada's trade done with the United Kingdom is approximately the same as it was in 1932.

Mr. EULER: Both exports and imports.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: I thought I had made that clear; I am sorry that I did not. Our total trade with the United States has increased by some nine per cent. The percentage of our total trade with empire countries, that is the British dominions, increased by a very small amount, but the percentage of our total trade with other foreign countries decreased from 22·3 per cent to 11·6 per cent. That is not extending trade on the basis on which the government promised it would be extended.

Then we were promised control of credit. I have a copy of the Liberal platform, which has a note on the back saying:

> The paragraphs above have been extracted from the official report of Mr. Mackenzie King's speech in the House of Commons, on February 27, 1933.

With regard to the control of credit the following statement is made:

> The Liberal party believes that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to the average citizen. It stands for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank . . .

And so on. In this regard there has been no change that has had any significance whatever; and for that statement I have no less an authority than the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer). Speaking at the annual meeting of the Vancouver-Burrard Liberal Association on November 4, he said, as reported in the Daily Province:

> "Government control of the Bank of Canada for the benefit of the people has been promised by the Liberal party," said Mr. McGeer, and he for one would not sit idly in his seat at Ottawa without protesting that it be put into effect.

That would seem to be conclusive evidence that this plank at least has not been carried into effect. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard is an authority on monetary reform. I know he is an authority because he has said so himself. He used to talk a good deal about it and spread enlightenment in regard to this very complex subject, but he does not do so any more.

Miss MACPHAIL: He went to England.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, he went to England and sat at a banquet at which were present the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Sir Montagu Norman, and now the hon. gentleman does not speak about money; he speaks about the scenery of British Columbia—a wonderful subject to discuss even if it has not the economic and personal interest that money has for most people.

There was also another great exponent of money in British Columbia—we have more than scenery there, let me tell you. I refer to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). I do not know whom he sat with when he went to Great Britain, but he does not speak about money now either. Possibly all that was necessary to stop him was a wink from the Minister of Finance. At any rate, nothing has been done in that connection.

Then there was the matter of the liberation of internal trade:

> The Liberal party will seek to end artificial price control and agreements in restraint of trade. Price-fixing by agreements restrict and hamper trade internally. The internal trade of our country has become honeycombed and enmeshed by secret understandings and agreements.

I believe that that is as true to-day as it was true in 1935, but nothing has been done to remedy it; and until we deal effectively with monopoly control in this country we shall not get our people out of the poverty they are in to-day.

There was also a section dealing with the reassertion of personal liberty. I had intended to make some reference to this, particularly as it concerns the so-called Quebec padlock law, but I will not do so, not because something could not be said about it, but the matter has been discussed already; and after listening to the very excellent speech of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) the other day I decided not to discuss the question. I am not satisfied with all that he said; nevertheless his speech last Friday should be of great interest to the people of Canada.

May I take this opportunity also to congratulate the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) on the attitude he took in the trouble that developed at Oshawa last year. If we had more of his point of view, more of the understanding that the Minister of Labour showed on that occasion, there would be fewer labour difficulties in Canada than there are.

I intend to support the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett); I shall vote for it, but I should be much more enthusiastic about it if it were more positive and less negative than it is. If it had stated the lines along which the Conservative party would proceed to lay the foundation of an enduring prosperity I would vote for it with far more enthusiasm than I shall when the vote is taken.

Two facts stand out in the life of Canada to-day; we have a country of great potential wealth, vast possibilities, and we have a country in which there is dire poverty. And the poverty of the masses is increasing; the poverty of the farmers, despite supposed improvement in the last few years, is increasing. We should try to find out the fundamental cause of this situation. Surely it is not because the wealth is not here or because our people are not prepared to work and produce wealth; there must be some other difficulty, some other fundamental cause that we have not discovered. There has been, of course, very little attempt to deal scientifically with the economic and social questions confronting us, and I submit they are not incapable of solution if we approach them in a scientific way. The small group to which I have the honour to belong believes that the solution lies in the methods which we have suggested in this house and elsewhere during the last few years. I shall not press that upon the house at this time, although I will call attention to some statements that have been made here during the present debate, statements to which we should give consideration and which every member of this house might very well study closely.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), speaking here a week ago, said:

> Why is it that to-day we have such enormous aggregations of capital in the banks—capital unemployed? Why is it that to-day the banks have such enormous investments in our securities? Is there lack of confidence in our ability properly to function as a producing country?

I am not going to answer the questions of the leader of the opposition, or take time to disagree with his own answer. The facts of course are as stated by him, and there must be some reason for their being so. Then the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), speaking in the same debate, and referring to the prevailing poverty of to-day, said:

> Take the Brookings Institution discoveries. It has found that in the peak of the boom in the United States the people of that country were able to buy only eighty per cent of the productive capacity of the United States.

I presume "productive capacity" as used by him meant the actual production in the United States at the time.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. DUNNING: That is not what the Brookings Institution said. "Productive capacity" were the words used by the Brookings Institution.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am interpreting that expression in the way I think it was used. If it was not used in that way, it has no sense, and I disagree with the Minister of Finance.

Mr. DUNNING: The report shows very plainly what it means.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then the hon. member for Lethbridge went on:

> Now will any member of this house, who thinks he knows, tell us why that was?

Of course my friends to the left would say that it was because we have not sufficient money. I do not agree with that. I believe that the money is here. We have abundance of money to distribute the wealth that is produced in this country, but those who need the wealth have not the money; those who have the money do not need the wealth, and consequently it piles up and we are unemployed.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacINNIS: They do not need the goods. If I misuse a word or put a word in its wrong place it is not important enough to cause all the hilarity on the other side. I was looking at the returns of the chartered banks of Canada as laid on the table by the Minister of Finance a few days ago. I find that there are 4,084,752 savings accounts in Canadian banks, totalling $1,580,000,000. But 3,770,000 odd of those accounts average only $120 each, so these people have not very much money saved up that they could spend. But I find that 536 accounts have deposits in excess of $100,000 each; in fact the average amounts to $287,500. Here is a great deal of what my friends call purchasing power that is not being used because the people who have it do not need to use it as purchasing power. This money is waiting for investment, and it is going to wait for a long time.

The Minister of Finance in his budget speech last year made the following statement:

> Profits are the mainspring of economic activity in the system under which we operate. Increasing profits are therefore the best augury for increasing employment, the best indication of the approach of the day when private industry will be able to release governmental bodies from the enormous burdens which they have had to bear in recent years.

It is quite true that in the system under which we live profits are the mainspring of economic activity. But it is not true that increasing profits are therefore the best augury for increased employment. Increasing profits are only the prelude to unemployment. Unemployment will take place whenever we have a spell of prosperity, when profits pile up. But the commodities produced cannot be consumed, not because the people do not need them but because they have nothing to exchange for them, while the people who have the means of exchange cannot use them. That is the problem that some government in Canada will have to deal with. I am not going to say at this time in what way we should deal with it, but I submit that the problem is as stated, and until we deal with it in some way, so as to distribute the wealth that we have in this country to the people who need it, we cannot and will not get over the difficulty that confronts us.

I wish now to say a word about another matter which was brought up by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor) when he spoke here on Thursday last. I would much prefer not to have to say anything on this subject, because I do not believe it is a matter in which hon. members are particularly interested. But to remain silent might be misconstrued. In beginning his remarks on the subject I have in mind the hon. member quoted from his maiden speech in this house in 1936. After finishing his quotation from Hansard he said, as reported on page 184:

Nor was he—

Referring to himself—

. . . to know that within five months of that night he would be placed on suspension by that coherent group and thrown into line for complete expulsion in February of 1937.

The coherent group referred to being the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. As the hon. member for Nanaimo considered it necessary to discuss this matter he should have told this house that before he was dropped from the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation he had been a member of a rival political party for several months. He sat in this house during the whole of last session without letting this house know where he stood. So if, as he says, honesty and consistency compel him to declare himself now, honesty and consistency should have compelled him to take that action a year ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What political party was that?

Mr. MacINNIS: I will mention it by and by. Indeed honesty should go much further. It should cause him to resign his seat and give the people who elected him on the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation program an opportunity to approve or disapprove his action. However, there was method in his silence. When he left the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation he with a few others formed a new party, the Social Constructive party. He no doubt hoped that when he came here this session he would be able to announce himself as the spearhead of a real socialist political movement in Canada. Things however do not always turn out as we wish. His party was absolutely rejected by the electorate of British Columbia, and no longer exists. He has therefore come to the profound conclusion that he is definitely of the "Liberal structure of mind", and sees no reason why the Liberal party should not open its ranks to him. I agree with him in that respect; I think he is Tory enough to find an abiding resting place in the Liberal fold. But when he says that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in British Columbia is not a coherent group, and no longer represents a truly foundational opposition to the existing so-called capitalist party, I do not agree with him, because the facts are all to the contrary. Despite the opposition of the old parties, and the party of which my hon. friend was a member, we maintained our numerical strength in the British Columbia legislature, and it is an accepted fact that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group was very coherent and the only effective opposition in the British Columbia legislature during the recent session. If the hon. member for Nanaimo does not know these facts he should read the British Columbia press, preferably with an open mind.

With much of what my hon. friend had to say regarding the communist party I agree. That party does try to get into and control other organizations, political, industrial and social. That policy, however, is not confined to this country. The way to overcome the machinations of the communist party is to oppose them, not to run away as my hon. friend did. We also know that the British Columbia section of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation dealt definitely and decisively with the communist party at its last convention in July, 1937.

Why did my hon. friend raise the communist bogey? A short excerpt from the speech which he quoted the other evening, his maiden speech of 1936, will give a clue to what he had in mind. I quote from his speech on that occasion, referring to Hansard at page 182:

But, sir, I do ask this honourable house and its members not to confuse the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group of seven with those who in present day colloquial speech are classed as communists and anarchists. To do that is all too common; but if you must do it, it will not ultimately harm us.

May I say to my hon. friend, as he said then, that if he must do it, it will not ultimately harm us. He continued:

> Nearly two thousand years ago those who followed the Master heard the term "Christian" spoken in utter opprobrium, and it did not hurt his followers. But these terms are intended by many in the house and all through the country to bring into derision the cause we uphold.

Nothing more need be said in regard to that, but my hon. friend's closing remarks when dealing with this subject the other night were truly pathetic in their transparency. He said, quoting from page 166 of Hansard:

> So it is that while still a socialist I declare that I am essentially of the liberal structure of mind, and while my election in 1935 constrains me to call myself an independent for the time being I recognize the weakness to the country and my people in the stand I am constrained to take. I definitely believe that there are many not only potential but essential socialists in the Liberal and Conservative ranks, and I believe it would be to the advantage of the country and its progress if the leaders of the old line parties would declare their readiness to embrace all proper to their particular structure of mind, no matter how their intelligence and purpose may desire constitutionally to vary the country's present economy and economic social system.

Out of this statement the following syllogism emerges:

1. "I am a socialist of the liberal structure of mind."
2. "The leaders of the old parties should embrace people of their particular structure."
3. "Therefore the leader of the Liberal party should embrace me."

As one who is truly interested in the welfare of the hon. member for Nanaimo I hope that party will not turn a deaf ear to his appeal.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to discuss a number of questions which have been raised in the course of the debate I should like to add my congratulations to those already extended by other members of the house to the mover and the seconder of the address. It was quite evident, I think, from the high quality of their speeches, that they will add considerably to the strength of the government benches, and I believe it was equally evident that both the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Francœur) and the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Warren) will bring honour and distinction to the constituencies which they represent in this parliament.

I hope my hon. friend who has just spoken will forgive me if I do not follow him in the course of his argument. I shall have occasion a little later to take issue with him in some of his conclusions.

On Monday of last week I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech delivered by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). It did seem to me at the time that this speech was a mixture of righteous indignation and unrighteous criticism. I thought then, and I still think, that some of the statements and charges made in the course of that speech went much beyond the amenities of parliamentary debate, and I feel quite sure that members of the house who have had a longer experience of parliamentary discussion than I have had would share that impression with me.

Some of the thunderbolts of my right hon. friend were directed against persons outside of this house, who are not in a position to defend themselves; some were directed against individual members of the government, including myself. In dealing with the subject matter of some of these charges, as I propose to do a little later, I should like to make it quite clear to the house at the outset that I do not do so with any desire for immunity from criticism or with any feeling that any special importance should be attached to questions of personal vindication. Criticism is a legitimate and necessary function of the opposition under our parliamentary system, and it follows as a matter of course that the leader of the opposition must have the utmost freedom in his comments on any and every aspect of government policy. Nevertheless it is equally clear, I believe, that freedom of this kind is almost certain to be abused unless it is restrained by a sense of responsibility, and I do not think it is going too far to say that in the course of his speech on Monday last my right hon. friend did exceed the limits of legitimate criticism.

Perhaps it would be idle to speculate on the motives which led him to indulge in his tirade of suspicion, rumour and denunciation, but it did occur to me at the time that he might wish to create a diversion—I think that is the military term—in order to cover his retreat from Winnipeg to Edmonton; his movement, so to speak, from the old Conservative policy of 1928 to the new Conservative policy of 1938. My right hon. friend has had some experience in changing direction suddenly, but I cannot help but believe that he would wish to execute this manoeuvre behind a smoke screen of some kind, because otherwise it might appear that he, the commander, was some distance ahead of his army, or it might even appear that he had no army at all. But all these are questions, of course, on which I cannot hope to speak with authority.

Before dealing with some of the charges made by the leader of the opposition I believe it will meet with the wishes of hon. members on both sides of this house if I review briefly the unemployment situation and the figures with respect to relief, in the light of developments which have taken place during the past year. As announced in the speech from the throne, there has been a marked increase in employment and a marked decrease in the numbers of those receiving unemployment aid. I am sure that statement in the speech from the throne was received with general satisfaction. As a matter of fact, I think it is fair to say that it is a very moderate statement of the improvement that has taken place during the past year, and particularly during the six months from April to October.

As members of the house are aware, there has been some criticism in the past owing to the lack of comparability in the figures respecting the number of those on relief. Fortunately we are now in a position where we can say that there is strict comparability, so far as comparisons of last year and the year previous are concerned. The registration conducted by the national employment commission began in September, 1936, and has continued steadily from that time forward. The figures which I propose to give to the house and which will illustrate the improvement which has taken place during the past year are figures from the registration conducted by the national employment commission.

I think it is well to explain that there is an unavoidable time lag in the publication of figures from the registration of those on relief. It will be readily understood that the figures for October cannot be sent in by the municipalities and provinces all across the dominion until after the end of the month or some time early in November. It is equally clear that these figures cannot be assembled and analyzed without some loss of time. At the same time I am pleased, however, to be able to say to the house that the delay has been decreased and we are hoping for a still further improvement as time goes on.

The usefulness of the registration has been amply revealed by our experience during the past fifteen months. For example, it enables us to measure the changing trends in the unemployment situation from month to month. It also enables us to measure seasonal variations with respect to particular sections of the dominion. This has been of considerable importance in dealing with problems of transiency of the single unemployed and also in the formulation of projects suitable to different sections of the country under the appropriation for youth training. Finally, it has been of great importance in connection with our periodic revision of grants in aid.

Apart from these advantages, which after all concern administration, I think it is fair to say that the usefulness of the registration of the unemployed on relief has become quite evident in another direction. The time was when we were confronted with these staggering figures of millions or hundreds of thousands and were left with the impression that they represented the total of those who were actually employable and unemployed in this country. I have even seen this suggestion in some newspaper editorials and I was very much surprised to note that the actual figures had not been analyzed more carefully before such a suggestion was created. However, through the registration, through bulletins issued by the national employment commission and through press releases, I believe there is now throughout the country a much more accurate appreciation of the problem of unemployment and relief.

We have been able, so to speak, to separate the total problem into its constituent elements of social and economic significance. We now make a distinction in our thinking between those who are receiving agricultural assistance and those who are receiving unemployment aid. We now make a distinction between those who are employable and those who are unemployable. We also make a distinction between those who are dependent and on relief and those who are heads of families or who are individuals capable of employment. As I have suggested, all this has given us a better appreciation of the problem itself and a clearer recognition of the definite progress that has been made, particularly during the past year, in the absorption by private industry of very large numbers of those who were employable and on relief.

I think I can best convey the improvement in the employment situation, and its reflection in the reduction of relief rolls in the industrial areas, by giving a summary of the completed figures of registration for the month of October. As I have suggested, these figures are comparable with the figures for October, 1936. The registration conducted by the national employment commission began in September of that year. I might say that the complete figures for November, 1937, and the preliminary figures for December will be available in a few days.

First of all, there is the material aid given to persons other than resident farm operators. I want to emphasize the distinction between agricultural assistance and unemployment aid because, after all, agricultural assistance is a different problem. Agricultural distress is mainly due to climatic causes and cannot be attributed in a large way to the operation of economic factors or policies. The reduction in the dominion total of recipients of unemployment aid in October, 1937, as compared with October, 1936, was 44·3 per cent. The decrease in the dominion total of partially employable persons in the same year was 23·5 per cent, and the decrease in the dominion total of unemployables was 9·4 per cent. The decrease in the grand total of non-agricultural aid recipients, including individuals and heads of families and their dependents, amounted to 36·7 per cent.

I turn next to those in receipt of agricultural aid. In the year under review the decrease in the total of farmers and their families, other than in the province of Saskatchewan, receiving aid, amounted to 71·3 per cent. This decrease is a clear reflection of the improvement in crop conditions in most of the provinces of the dominion, and it also brings home to us the serious disaster which has befallen Saskatchewan during the past year. The increase in the total of farmers and their families in Saskatchewan receiving agricultural aid was 95·3 per cent. The increase in the total for all provinces of those receiving agricultural aid was 22·4 per cent.

I come now to all classes receiving material aid, that is, those receiving unemployment aid and those receiving agricultural assistance. From October, 1936, to October, 1937, there has been a net decrease of 20·3 per cent. Perhaps I might also give a summary of the preliminary figures for November of this year as compared with November of 1936. It would seem that the figures for fully employable persons will still be about 40 per cent below those for November of the previous year. There has been an increase of about ten per cent over October, 1937, in the total number of persons receiving aid, but this change is one that we would have anticipated because of the variations in seasonal employment. There has been a decrease of 15·7 per cent, as compared with November, 1936, in the total of all classes receiving aid.

With the consent of the house and for the information of hon. members I should like to place on Hansard a number of tables which will illustrate and clarify the statements I have just made. They are as follows:

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister tell us how the term "unemployment" is defined by his department?

Mr. ROGERS: In answer to that question, which perhaps I could answer more satisfactorily when the estimates of the department are before the house, I would simply say that so far we have taken, as we have been obliged to take, the returns of the municipalities which have made these returns to us, and there has been a very wide variation in the returns of unemployables from different municipalities. Some municipalities will report the unemployables as representing five per cent of the total, and others as representing as high as twenty per cent of the total. That is the situation at the present time. I might say, however, that in our agreements with the provinces covering the remainder of the fiscal year we are trying to secure some general understanding as to a proper definition of unemployability.

I do not propose to enter more fully at this time into a survey of unemployment and relief, but I shall take a very early opportunity to place the whole situation before the house, and also to indicate the success which has attended the various policies which have been adopted by the government in dealing with the several aspects of this problem.

I turn now to some of the charges made by the right hon. leader of the opposition in the course of his speech in this debate. It did seem to me that the most flagrant of those charges was his attack on the members of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. That attack, let it be understood, was not born of impulse. It was not provoked by the cross-fire of debate. It was premeditated and deliberate.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROGERS: Quite so; and it was designed to impair the usefulness of a commission which was asked to conduct the most important investigation in this country since confederation.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not so.

Mr. ROGERS: The Chief Justice of Ontario and Mr. Dafoe are very well known in all parts of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I say directly that there was no design of that character. It was a criticism against the one type of politician that constitutes that tribunal.

Mr. ROGERS: The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has already dealt very effectively with that point in his speech in reply to my right hon. friend. I might also remind him that in Great Britain, as well as in other countries, it is not the exception but the custom for one who has been attorney general to move from that position to the position of Lord Chief Justice; and the Lord Chancellor, who sits in the Privy Council, has himself political functions to perform and is actually a member of the administration of the day. Surely it is a strange thing to suggest that the chief justice or any other member of our courts is not able to conduct his duties as a royal commissioner with complete impartiality and competence.

Mr. BENNETT: That was not the point. The point was there was no representative of other than Liberals on the commission.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Speaker, as I have just suggested, the integrity and competence of the Chief Justice of Ontario and Mr. Dafoe are recognized in all parts of this country, and I doubt very much if there are many people who will attach any very great weight to the charges brought against them by the leader of the opposition. Doctor R. A. MacKay is not so well known in all parts of this dominion, and for that reason, in my opinion, the attack upon him was even more inexcusable. Let me give to the house the words used by my right hon. friend in referring to Doctor MacKay, representative of the maritime provinces on the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. He said:

> With regard to the gentleman who represents the maritime provinces, I repeat that for bitter partisanship I have never known his equal.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROGERS: He went on:

> I say further that he published a book recently and sent the proofs of it for revision to many people throughout this dominion, and from beginning to end it was a tissue of misrepresentations and false statements that had to be corrected in order that it might have a semblance of truth attached to it.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROGERS: Might I ask my right hon. friend, is a book published when the proofs are submitted for revision, or is it published when it is printed and distributed?

Mr. BENNETT: Presumably both. As a matter of law, it is published when the proofs are sent out.

Mr. ROGERS: It is quite obvious that Doctor MacKay wished to have comments if he sent these proofs to various people, and my right hon. friend himself recognizes that Doctor MacKay was prepared to alter the text before actual publication was made.

Mr. BENNETT: The point was, there is no excuse for a man making false statements for a matter of record.

Mr. ROGERS: It is sometimes a matter of opinion whether a statement is false or not.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no question about it; it is a matter of record—printed record too.

Mr. ROGERS: As a matter of fact, shorn of some of the extravagant language of my right hon. friend, the substance of his attack on Doctor MacKay is this, that Doctor MacKay wrote a book that the right hon. gentleman did not like, and he joined a commission that the right hon. gentleman did not like. I think that may fairly be said to be the sum and substance of his indictment against Doctor MacKay, and for these offences he is branded as a bitter partisan from one end of the country to the other, in a manner which was calculated to injure him in his profession, and which might well have been actionable in slander if the words used had been used by a private citizen.

Mr. BENNETT: I made them publicly, and I am liable to action if he wants one outside of this house.

Mr. ILSLEY: You attacked him for being from Ontario, outside the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose that is libellous too, is it? I admit it may be libellous in this case.

Mr. ROGERS: I have known Doctor MacKay for ten years. He occupies the position of professor of government at Dalhousie university, of which my right hon. friend is a distinguished alumnus.

Mr. BENNETT: I am a governor as well.

Mr. ROGERS: May I remind the leader of the opposition, in that event, that to hold the chair of government in Dalhousie one is obliged to agree not to participate in any way in political affairs. Doctor MacKay has never made a political speech and has never appeared on a political platform, and yet my right hon. friend says he is a bitter partisan.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROGERS: I go further and say that Doctor MacKay enjoys the highest respect throughout university circles in this dominion. He has been active in the work of the League of Nations Society and equally active in the work of the Institute of International Relations; he was chosen by the Carnegie Foundation of the United States to conduct a very important survey of Canadian and American relations. I doubt very much if the reputation of Doctor MacKay is going to be injured seriously by what the right hon. gentleman has said, but at the same time I do feel that something in the nature of an apology or correction is required in the circumstances.

I now turn from this charge to one which concerns me personally. I refer to the charge brought against me by the leader of the opposition because of certain views I expressed on the incidence of the tariff as counsel for the government of Nova Scotia in the economic inquiry of 1934. After listening very carefully to the leader of the opposition on Monday, I concluded I had just fallen short of committing high treason for having stated in very definite terms that the protective tariff had imposed unequal burdens on the several provinces of the dominion. I had turned east against west, and west against east; I had undermined the foundations of confederation, and I was guilty of some measure of moral obliquity because I had become a member of the Liberal administration that had not abolished the tariff. Well, Mr. Speaker, if all this were true it would be a heavy load of responsibility for one person to carry, but perhaps the leader of the opposition will be surprised, and possibly he will be relieved, when I tell him that I have slept reasonably well during the past week, that I have had no overwhelming conviction of sin—

Mr. BENNETT: It took some time preparing the speech, though.

Mr. ROGERS: —and my conscience, so far as his charges are concerned, has been quite composed. The basis of these grave charges—and I call them grave even although they were nebulous—was his assumption and his assertion that I had advocated the abolition of the Canadian tariff as the remedy for the maladjustments and inequalities of the protective system in its operation in this country during the past sixty years. My answer is, and I give it in the most definite and unequivocal terms, that I did not advocate the abolition of the tariff, either in the submission made to the Nova Scotia economic commission or at any other time, and I challenge the leader of the opposition to read the brief and repeat his accusation.

Mr. BENNETT: We will do it later, and in more detail.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, my right hon. friend had the brief in his hand the other day.

Mr. BENNETT: He did.

Mr. ROGERS: And he chose simply to quote from it certain isolated extracts which seemed to fit in with what he wished to say in criticism of the government at that time. But I doubt very much if my right hon. friend has ever read the brief from beginning to end, even though he used it as the basis of this charge against me.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I have read it, but I have not read it very carefully.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROGERS: I ask my right hon. friend to read it more carefully, for I concluded as much myself. My views on the tariff can be expressed very simply. The tariff is an instrument of policy. If it is used at all other than for purposes of revenue in a federal state it should be used with due regard to its effect upon the maintenance of national unity. Where you have a situation such as exists in Australia and Canada, where secondary industries are largely concentrated in two provinces and where primary and export industries are largely concentrated in other provinces, you cannot move to extremes in tariff policy without endangering national unity and without undermining the very foundations of federal public finance. A high tariff policy will threaten national unity, and no one ought to know it better than the leader of the opposition. Similarly, whatever may have been possible sixty years ago, the abolition of tariffs at this time would disrupt confederation. In any realistic view of our present situation the course of wisdom is the course of moderation.

But while we retain a tariff system I submit that we should keep constantly in mind that there are seven provinces in this dominion whose income is supplied very largely, in some provinces almost exclusively, by primary and export industries, and we must be willing also to study the unequal incidence of the tariff and be prepared to apply such compensating adjustments as may be practicable. That is the position which I developed before the royal commission of economic enquiry in Nova Scotia. That is the position which I hold to-day. It is a position which, I believe, is entirely consistent with Liberal policy. It is a position which is entirely inconsistent with the traditional policy of the Conservative party.

In this connection let me remind the leader of the opposition that this present administration has already recognized the claims of primary and export industries in three directions. It has reduced the duties on implements of production. It has concluded a reciprocity agreement with the United States which has conferred special benefits on those provinces which have suffered most from the incidence of the protective system. And it has revised and renewed the Ottawa agreements with the same object in view, even though the negotiation of these several agreements did involve the lessening of protection of some of our secondary industries. Finally, this administration has appointed a royal commission to make a thorough inquiry into the whole structure of federal public finance. If the leader of the opposition has any doubts as to the validity of these conclusions which were presented to the Nova Scotia commission of economic inquiry, I would remind him that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, in their brief presented to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, recognized in effect that the tariff had been unequal in its incidence and suggested the wisdom of some compensating adjustments.

Mr. BENNETT: So has the Conservative party.

Mr. ROGERS: I would also remind my right hon. friend that in Australia, where as I have suggested conditions are very similar to those in Canada, there have been careful investigations into this whole matter. The leader of the opposition spoke the other day of Professor Copland, with, I thought, a measure of respect and admiration. I wonder if he is aware that Professor Copland was a member of a commission of economic inquiry which made a thorough study in 1929 of the effects of the tariff in Australia?

Mr. BENNETT: He was.

Mr. ROGERS: And is he also aware that as a result of this inquiry it was found that the tariff has pressed unequally on various sections of Australia?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. ROGERS: And that various remedies were suggested to correct the discrimination thus produced? I might very well place on Hansard at least a section of the appendix to that report, because it refers particularly to this very matter to which my right hon. friend has taken exception. These are the words used by this commission on the Australian tariff in 1929:

(1) The unequal effects between states are probably the most embarrassing consequences of the tariff, but they have their roots in the unequal effects between industries, which are natural and inevitable consequences of tariff protection. Were Australia one small, compact economic unit, in which the benefits of protection were thoroughly diffused, in which one common tax system operated, and in which development expenditure was equally shared, differences between areas would be less important. But with our diverse geographical conditions and our federal system of government this is not the case.

(2) The distribution of Australian industries has been substantially modified by the tariff. Assistance to protected industries has been provided chiefly at the expense of the export industries. We have shown that these industries are retarded and that their land values have been curtailed. The costs imposed upon them have been borne chiefly in the country districts and in the outlying states, which are more naturally adapted for the export industries.

I doubt if there is any advantage in my going further with this quotation. The leader of the opposition has promised he will read the submission, and he will find this particular extract on page 181 of the brief.

The leader of the opposition referred also in the course of his speech the other day to the celebrated debate in the United States between Webster and Hayne. Let me quote his words:

No man who is familiar with the history of the United States—

I would like the house to keep that in mind.

—can fail to remember the great struggle that took place between the states and the central power. The suggestion that the states were sovereign powers was put forward by Calhoun and Hayne. The great debate in the Senate between Webster and Hayne was to decide whether they should have a strong union or whether there should be a group of sovereign states gathered together in a loose form of government. That was the issue, but the reply of Webster in the Senate settled the matter. Hundreds of thousands of copies of his speeches were circulated in every part of the union, and the cry that had gone forward for the establishment of sovereign states ended.

Now, from beginning to end of that reference by my right hon. friend there is no suggestion that the cause of the crisis in the United States at that time was the extreme tariff which had fallen with special injury upon the southern and western states, and that what precipitated the debate between Webster and Hayne was the threat of South Carolina of nullification, the threat that it would not permit the collection of tariff duties within the state of South Carolina. That was the actual cause of that debate.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not according to Mr. Webster.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend has suggested that this crisis was solved by an eloquent appeal by Webster for national unity.

Mr. BENNETT: He said he had been preparing his speech all his life.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, there were others who were preparing more effective measures for dealing with a crisis of that kind. That crisis was not settled by the eloquence of Webster. It was settled by a message from President Jackson to the United States congress asking that duties which had risen to the level of forty-nine per cent on the average should be reduced from 1832 to 1842 to an average of twenty per cent. That was the way in which that crisis was settled. I refer to it now merely to remind my right hon. friend that this question of the tariff in its effect upon the relations of the federal system has been recognized elsewhere. And is a man to be charged with an offence against his country because he seeks to bring out light in a similar way with respect to the effect of the Canadian tariff upon federal relations in this country? I doubt whether there is any advantage in pursuing this point except to say that, as regards the main positions taken in the submission to the Nova Scotia commission, I have no desire to recall them; and I do not propose to recall them. My one regret has been, and I say this to the house quite frankly, that some of the computations made in the course of that brief, and which were placed upon Hansard by my right hon. friend the other day, have been published in some of our newspapers without some of the explanations and reservations that must always accompany such an analysis of the effects of the tariff upon various regions of the country.

Now I pass on to consider another matter of some importance to the house, one which also contains within it at least the suggestion of an accusation. In his reference to unemployment insurance the other day the leader of the opposition said:

> It is well known, of course, that the case with respect to unemployment insurance was not presented to the courts. No one knows that better than the Minister of Labour. It was not, for the simple and obvious reason that admissions, which constituted the basis of the judgment of the court, were made.

I would suggest that these words are at least capable of the construction that the Minister of Labour may have had some prior knowledge that admissions were to be made and that for this reason he might be guilty of an act of barratry against legislation in the interests of the labouring people of the country.

Mr. BENNETT: I at once assure the hon. gentleman that such was not the case. He was on demurrage at the time in London.

Mr. ROGERS: Precisely. I wished very much to have that assurance, because when my right hon. friend mentioned the other day that I had knowledge of this question I could not recall having heard any reference to the matter apart from the speech made by the leader of the opposition after the announcement was made of the decisions of the privy council last year. I have not heard the suggestion in any other quarter apart from the references made to the same subject by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) on Friday last, and I should like to deny in categorical terms that either the Minister of Labour or the government was responsible in any degree for admissions made which might lead the privy council to declare this legislation invalid.

Mr. BENNETT: I assure the hon. gentleman again, I did not make any such suggestion.

Mr. ROGERS: What I suspect did happen was this, that in the course of questioning, which often accompanies argument before the privy council, one of the counsel for the dominion was asked, for example, whether the general subject of insurance did not properly lie within property and civil rights, and no doubt he would make the admission that insurance generally would fall within that subject; but he would at once proceed to give the argument as to why it should be taken out of that subject and placed under the subjects in section 91 of the act.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the argument reported in the London Times.

Mr. ROGERS: At all events, I think this government can fairly say that with respect to this unemployment insurance measure we have proceeded with due regard for constitutional propriety; and we have wished above all else to have upon our statute books an act of unemployment insurance which would be operative and would not be subject to attacks in the courts. I wonder sometimes if my right hon. friend realizes the chaos and confusion that would have resulted had he set up an organization running into thousands of employees across the country under his act of 1935 and then have that act thrown out in the courts. It would have caused a condition of indescribable confusion, not only to those who had been employed as members of the staff of the unemployment and social insurance commission, but also to those industries throughout the country which would have been obliged in the interval to adjust much of their office procedure to the requirements of the unemployment insurance returns.

I have sometimes wondered when it was that the leader of the opposition determined in his own mind that this parliament could of itself appropriate the jurisdiction to deal with unemployment insurance. My right hon. friend spent some time in Geneva in the autumn of 1934, and I have wondered whether it was while he was there that he decided that this parliament had competence to deal with unemployment insurance; because as a matter of fact as late as November 27 of that year the then Secretary of State declared in very definite terms that the jurisdiction to deal with unemployment insurance lay properly with the provinces, and in making that statement he was merely declaring what had been generally understood as a result of the decisions in the courts over a long period of years. My right hon. friend may also recall that just prior to his sailing for Geneva in the autumn of 1934—it was at the end of August, as I recall it—he sent a letter to the provincial governments of the dominion. In that letter he recognized clearly that the exclusive jurisdiction to deal with unemployment insurance lay with the provinces, and that applied equally to other matters which he later made the subject of legislation in the session of 1935. As I have said, I do not know when the leader of the opposition changed his mind upon these matters, and it is quite evident that he does not desire to tell the house when he was converted upon this point.

Mr. BENNETT: I will tell him now.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be pleased to know.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman will read the judgments of the privy council in the aeronautics case and in the radio case in the light of the subsequent discussion he will discover there the reasons.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, the radio case and the aviation case turned upon the question whether or not our ratification of an international convention or treaty would give us jurisdiction. But does my right hon. friend suggest that his unemployment insurance act had any connection whatever with a convention or treaty?

Mr. BENNETT: It has with a convention, not with a treaty.

Mr. ROGERS: The unemployment insurance act was not based upon a convention or a treaty.

Mr. BENNETT: It was based upon the treaty of peace, in part, as the hon. member will recall—in the recital in connection with the convention that took place under it.

Mr. ROGERS: I have not the act before me.

Mr. BENNETT: You can get it.

Mr. ROGERS: The preamble, however, does not declare that the jurisdiction of the dominion parliament in this matter rests at all upon the ratification of a treaty or convention, but I am quite willing to wait until it is possible to get a copy of the text. I should like, however, to say this. We have felt, as the leader of the opposition has felt, and, I believe, as it is recognized on all sides of the house, that if we are to deal with this problem of economic insecurity, which is the great problem of our generation, we ought to have in Canada an organization and a statutory method of dealing with casual, seasonal and cyclical unemployment. It was with this in mind that the present administration, having found that the legislation of 1935 was not valid, invited the provinces to cooperate in order that an unemployment insurance measure might be introduced at the present session. It has been suggested in some quarters that in taking that action the present government has encroached on provincial autonomy. Surely that cannot be urged up to the present. Instead of appropriating jurisdiction we have asked the provinces to consent to transfer jurisdiction. We have invited them to cooperate with us in making it possible to put this legislation through. If there had been consent on the part of all provinces, as it was our earnest hope there would be, no question of invasion of provincial autonomy could possibly have been raised. As it is, some provinces have indicated that they are not as yet willing to concede that jurisdiction. But I believe it is the will of this house and of the country generally that this government should do its utmost within the bounds of constitutional propriety to proceed with this measure as soon as possible.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like finally and briefly to turn to the amendment—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exhausted his time, but it may be that the house is willing to grant some indulgence—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. ROGERS: I promise to be brief. I wish to refer to the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition in his speech on Monday last. That amendment is in the following terms:

We desire respectfully to express regret that the speech from the throne does not indicate that the government have taken or contemplate taking efficient measures to deal with unfavourable economic conditions in Canada, and that no legislative action is proposed to deal effectively with the prevailing uncertainty and insecurity resulting from the inadequate incomes of large numbers of our people.

I should like to say first that the figures I was able to quote a while ago with respect to the improvement in employment made it abundantly clear that during the past year there was in fact a remarkable improvement not merely in the number of wage earners in this country but also in the number of those who previously had been in receipt of state relief but are now happily earning incomes of their own. As a matter of fact, in the period under review some 95,000 have moved from relief rolls into employment in private industry. These men and women are earning incomes where previously they were on relief. Not only that, but if one takes the latest available figures from the bureau of statistics, as of December, giving the estimate of unemployment in Canada, and carries the statistics back to 1930, the following is shown:

Estimate of Unemployment in Canada

December—
1930	413,000
1931	543,000
1932	675,000
1933	623,000
1934	571,000
1935	546,000
1936	502,000
1937	381,000

In other words, during the past year there has been an improvement to the extent of 120,000. I should explain to the house that these figures include those who have been unemployed but not upon relief. The earlier figure I gave of 95,000 covers only those who previously had been on relief.

It might also be pertinent I think to place before the house the actual improvement in wages and earnings which has taken place during the past year. Wage rates during 1936 and 1937 have continued the recovery from the low level of 1933, so that the index number for 1937 was only 2·7 per cent lower than in 1930. It was 11 per cent lower in 1935, and in 1933 it was 15 per cent lower. The greatest recovery has been in logging and saw-milling, which had an increase of 13 per cent over 1936, making the level for 1937 nearly 24 per cent higher than in 1935 and 55 per cent higher than in 1933. In manufacturing industries the increase in 1937 was 8 per cent over 1936 and 16 per cent over 1933. The industries showing the greatest increases during the year were: automobile manufacturing, 15 per cent; cotton, 11 per cent; meat packing, 19 per cent; pulp and paper, 12 per cent; crude iron and steel, 14 per cent; metal trades, 10 per cent. Wages in the building trades, which fell 24 per cent between 1930 and 1934, have risen nearly 7 per cent but are still 18 per cent lower than in 1930. On steam railways the rates were only 4 per cent below 1930 in December, and the reductions will be fully restored by April 1 of this year. On electric street railways and in printing trades and coal mining the reductions were less but increases are gradually being made. The principal coal mines in Nova Scotia raised wages nearly ten per cent in 1937.

Moreover, earnings of employees have shown considerable increases. On the principal steam railways, for the first eleven months of 1937 the total compensation paid was $160,419,196 as compared with $152,334,902 in the same period in 1936, and $144,751,921 in 1935. This is the only industry for which earnings of employees in 1937 are available. Figures for certain manufacturing industries for 1936 have been issued. In the primary iron and steel industry the total earnings of employees in 1936 were $13,830,377 as compared with $12,279,390 in 1935 and $14,934,325 in 1930. In petroleum refining, earnings in 1936 were $7,193,148 as compared with $7,046,675 in 1935, $5,897,811 in 1932 and $8,190,130 in 1930. In the men's clothing industry earnings in 1936 were $10,255,745 as compared with $8,990,370 in 1935 and $11,542,990 in 1930.

These figures cover only a very limited part of industry throughout Canada, but they are representative and illustrate the very marked improvement in wages and earnings which has taken place during the past year.

In the light of the improvement which has taken place since the present government came into office, the expanding trade, the expanding income, the expanding employment, the expanding revenues, and the declining deficits, it does seem to me that there is every reason why this house should give its confidence to this administration, even as that confidence has been given in abundant measure by the people of this country.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to deal with the remarks made by the various speakers, unless time permits me to refer to some of the last remarks made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), who has just sat down, particularly his remarks in regard to unemployment insurance.

I want to deal first with the second sentence in paragraph 4 of the speech from the throne, which reads:

Trade with other countries has materially expanded.

With every hon. member of the house I rejoice when the trade of Canada expands, particularly if it expands along sound economic lines. Experienced business men, however, in trying to obtain more customers for that which they produce, are very careful not to alienate the loyalty of dependable customers of long standing. I claim that is exactly what this government has done, in one particular in any event, and I have time only to deal with that one particular. I refer to the anthracite coal trade. The government are so infatuated with such expressions as "expanding trade" and "trade expansion" that in my judgment they have made a very grievous error in their handling of the Welsh anthracite coal trade which may mean the loss of considerable trade to Canada in the form of produce shipped in return to Wales and, in a smaller degree, to Scotland, where we also obtain anthracite coal.

It was an incident that occurred last June in Wales, where I had gone to make my own survey of the ramifications of the anthracite coal trade, that made me determine to refer to the matter in the house on the very first available occasion. I had been asked to address a meeting of coal producers, following a dinner, in the Metropole hotel at Swansea. Just before I rose to speak a porter came into the room and handed a clipping, which I hold in my hand, to the chairman of the meeting, who afterwards handed it to me. I may say that it was on June 7 that I was at Swansea, and this clipping is dated Ottawa, May 29, containing a quotation from the Montreal Standard of that date:

Almost a whole year in advance of the next federal budget, the advance guard of the coal lobby has taken up its position on parliament hill, determined that it will succeed before another session is past in its objective of having the existing duties abolished against American anthracite and bituminous coals.

Further the quotation states:

Ontario is credited with being the chief sufferer under the existing tariffs, with Quebec bearing the balance of the burden.

The newspaper clipping does not reveal the names of any of the lobbyists, but I am satisfied that there would be none from either Nova Scotia or Alberta. I cannot speak for Quebec, but so far as Ontario is concerned I believe I can say that the people of this province are willing, and indeed glad, to give a preference to Nova Scotia bituminous coal, wherever it can be used, as against foreign bituminous coal. Likewise I believe they are glad to give a preference to Alberta coal, wherever it can be used, and to Welsh and Scotch anthracite in the importations we have to make.

Ten or fifteen years ago Canada regularly imported approximately five million tons of anthracite coal per year, all of it from the United States. Then, I claim through the good judgment of members of the house, irrespective of party, legislation or regulations, were initiated to encourage bringing Nova Scotia bituminous coal to Ontario and Quebec, as well as Alberta coal to Saskatchewan, Manitoba and northwestern Ontario. As a result our importations of anthracite coal were reduced from five million tons to three and a half million tons, at which point they seem to be fairly well established.

When the government of the present right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) came into power, he implemented his promise to the electorate to increase intra-empire trade, in large degree in connection with the importation of Welsh anthracite, and in substantial degree in connection with the importation of Scotch anthracite. In fact he carried out that promise in many ways, but time will permit me to deal only with this one. Let us see what the situation was as far as the importation of anthracite was concerned when the right hon. gentleman formed his government. In 1929, the last full year during which the previous government of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was in power, Canada imported 3,173,043 tons of American anthracite coal and 729,458 tons of Welsh anthracite coal. There was no Scotch anthracite imported that year. In 1934, the last full year of the government of the right hon. gentleman, thanks to his policy of increasing trade between the different parts of the empire, the situation had changed. Just here may I say that I know of no trade that is carried on with greater benefit to both the exporter and the importer than the importation of Welsh and Scotch anthracite coal in exchange for Canadian farm produce. In the last full year of the former Conservative government, 1934, importations of United States anthracite coal fell to 1,804,127 tons, while importations of Welsh anthracite increased to 1,334,517 tons. We brought in also 309,000 tons of Scotch coal, making a total importation of United Kingdom anthracite amounting to 1,643,517 tons, or not much less than the amount we imported from the United States.

What has happened to this fine trade, as a result of the "expanding trade" policy of the present government, without regard to whether or not tried and true customers are alienated? Last year, 1937, Canada imported from the United States 1,888,860 tons of anthracite, while our total importation of Scotch and Welsh coal was reduced to 1,123,841 tons. At the same time we imported 264,048 tons from Germany, 146,648 tons from Russia, 19,000 tons from Indo-China and 20,000 tons from Belgium. In other words our total importation of foreign anthracite last year was 2,338,000 tons, while our total importation of United Kingdom coal fell to 1,123,841 tons.

An examination of these figures surely will reveal why there is a marked and rising resentment in Wales to-day in regard to Canada's anthracite coal policy. If that resentment continues I feel certain that it will be reflected in a greatly reduced number of return cargoes of Canadian farm products. For the life of me I cannot see what the government expects to gain by reducing our importations of anthracite coal from the United Kingdom by 500,000 tons and then going all over the face of the earth, to countries to which we cannot possibly ship our farm produce, in order to bring in 500,000 tons of coal to make up the difference. Personally I would much rather deal with tried and true customers like Wales and Scotland in an exchange of this kind, which is beneficial to all concerned, than go all over the face of the earth in an attempt to expand our trade, in any event in connection with this particular commodity.

A few moments ago I said that last June I made a rather extended survey of the situation in Wales. I went through the mining areas and visited many of the mines. I imagine that every one in Canada has been touched by the newspaper reports which have appeared from time to time describing the distress in the Welsh coal mining areas as a result of the reduction in exportations of coal. In my judgment it is small business on the part of this government to inflict further distress upon Wales through a reduction in the importations of coal from Wales as well as from Scotland. When visiting the different coal mining towns I saw a number of bills similar to the one I hold in my hand. These were pasted up in the different stores from which the miners purchased their supplies, but I am afraid that they will be taken down before very long. I might say that Canada's purchases of Welsh coal gave employment to 7,000 miners, and her purchases of Scotch coal gave employment to as many as 2,000 miners. These bills, which were printed both in English and in Welsh were very illuminating.

Mr. DUNNING: Read the one printed in Welsh.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish I could. I brought along one printed in English for fear there would not be any one in the house who could read Welsh.

This poster, issued by Messrs. T. T. Pascoe, Ltd., Coal Exporters, Swansea, reads, when translated:

Other bills referred to other Canadian products. I think that is a mighty fine spirit for them to display towards Canada produce and I should like to see the government reverse its present policy.

Mr. DUNNING: They still appreciate it.

Mr. MacNICOL: The government should see that more Welsh and Scotch coal is purchased in order that more Canadian products may be purchased in those countries. When at Swansea I saw a large ship unloading a full cargo of Canadian wheat and piled up on the docks were large supplies of Canadian cheese and canned goods of one kind or another. I also inspected the method of loading coal on ships for Canada. Over there they view this matter with very grave concern. I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) and other members of the government who have anything to do with the exporting of Canadian products to the United Kingdom have read reports similar to these that I hold in my hand. I should like to read a few in order to direct the attention of the government to whither they are going. The first one appeared in the Toronto Globe of September 22, 1936, in the form of an editorial, and reads:

The South Wales Miners' Federation adopted a resolution to call upon the board of trade to protest the action of the Canadian government. According to the Welsh miners, Canada's pact with Russia "must result in further loss of trade to South Wales, where there is so much depression already, and must gravely affect the livelihood of some hundreds of workmen employed in the Welsh coal fields."

The next one is a Canadian Press dispatch from London, England, dated September 30, and reads:

A deputation from the South Wales Coal-owners' Association conferred to-day with Captain H. Crookshank, parliamentary secretary to the mines department, on the subject of the lifting of the Canadian government's ban on imports of Russian anthracite.

The next one is from the old Mail and Empire, dated October 2, 1936, and reads:

The Russian anthracite is produced under conditions which are uneconomic and inconsistent with the pledges given at the Ottawa imperial conference of 1932. Canada's concession of a strictly preferred market to British anthracite formed one of the basic terms of the Anglo-Canadian treaty then agreed upon. It therefore looks as if Ottawa will be guilty of bad faith if it ratifies Mr. Euler's action in Moscow. Such bad faith might have the effect of lessening the preferred place which Canada now enjoys for its products in the markets of the United Kingdom, which are the greatest food importing markets in the world.

The next one is dated Fort Erie, October 7, 1937. This refers to a shipment of Russian anthracite to Fort Erie, and reads:

The consignment will be shipped from the sea of Azov, the Black sea and the Mediterranean sea to Montreal, and by barges to Fort Erie. A second shipment for use in industrial furnaces in this area was contemplated.

The next is dated London, November 16, 1937, and reads:

A suggestion Great Britain was losing the Canadian coal market to Russia and other countries was voiced in the House of Commons to-day.

These things are disquieting to the Scotch and Welsh buyers of Canadian products, and I find that there is a depressed feeling in the situation as far as coal exporters are concerned. Before leaving for the old country I went to see some of the coal importers in Toronto from whom I buy Nova Scotia and Welsh coal. They told me that the price of Welsh coal was perhaps a little high in Canada because of the breakage or "degradation" in shipping. They referred to the breakage-saving equipment used by German shippers. In order to make a thorough investigation of this matter I visited Rotterdam and Antwerp, the ports from which German coal is shipped. I also inspected the docks at Swansea. I got many good photographs of the equipment used in loading German coal. I was told that the ministry of industries in Germany, to which I shall refer a little later on, subsidizes the exportation of German products. I do not know whether the German government have paid any part of the cost of the equipment at Rotterdam or Antwerp, but I would not be surprised to learn that they had. I understand a large sum of money was voted last year for the encouragement of exports.

At Antwerp and Rotterdam there are four lines of railroad tracks on the docks parallel to the ships. This means that at least four different kinds of coal can be loaded into a ship at the same time. The latest type of crane is used with which to take the coal from the cars and place it in the hold of the ship. The net result is that the breakage or "degradation" is quite small. At Swansea the cars come singly to the ship and at right angles. The car is lifted on an elevator and tilted over and sometimes the coal is dropped twenty, forty or sixty feet into the hold of the ship. At other times it is dropped on an escalator. The equipment at Swansea is not equal to what they have at Antwerp and Rotterdam.

I submit that this government should initiate a national or an empire coal policy and take some steps to try to improve the method of shipping Welsh coal. This might be done, first, through approaching the British government; second, through approaching the railroads; third, through approaching the producers and, fourth, the shippers. In this way the "degradation" or breakage of Welsh coal in shipment might be reduced, with a corresponding decrease in the Canadian price of the coal.

Mr. EULER: Does my hon. friend seriously suggest that it is the duty of the Canadian government to improve the facilities for loading coal in the old country, rather than have the British government itself attend to that?

Mr. MacNICOL: I said very plainly that in my judgment it might be good business on the part of this government to approach the British government with a view to doing just that.

Mr. EULER: Most absurd.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is not absurd. We are doing many things in connection with the export of wheat and other products that you might equally well call absurd. Is it absurd to try to increase trade between Canada and Wales? I do not believe it is. I believe in developing empire trade by bringing into this country Welsh anthracite coal and exporting in return our farm products. That is good trade. In any event this government could do a lot to reduce the breakage between Montreal and Toronto.

Mr. EULER: That is a different story.

Mr. MacNICOL: The British government might welcome this government approaching them on the subject. I have talked about it and I always met a very receptive ear wherever I mentioned it in government circles overseas, none of them saying it was absurd. This government certainly can do this, and it would not be absurd; they could take steps to increase the importation of Welsh and Scotch anthracite coal into Canada, and also to increase the importation into Ontario of Nova Scotia and Alberta coal, as part of a national trade policy. Such a policy would result in providing much more employment in Canada than you will get by trying to expand trade along the lines this government has been taking, of cutting off our importations of Welsh and Scotch coal and importing it from all over the face of the earth from countries from which we get practically no return.

I want now to speak briefly on a subject on which I have spoken before in the house, namely, the necessity, in my judgment, for a ministry of industry in the federal government. I should like to see created a department whose main business it is to propagate, that is, encourage industry in this country. Twenty-three other nations have a ministry of industry, and from a survey I have made of their achievements I am convinced they have done very fine work. In some countries the department stands alone, while in others it is associated with the department of commerce; in others with the department of agriculture, and in others again with the department of labour. If the ministry of industry in this country were a ministry of industry and agriculture, it might be a success under the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who is capable and able, if he could only bring himself to realize that the interests of industry, labour and agriculture are identical so far as the benefit to the country is concerned, and that industry and agriculture are equally important. But the present Minister of Agriculture, speaking in the house as Minister of Agriculture, last session is reported to have said, at page 1636 of Hansard:

> I am one of those who believe that if we want to sell our wheat in the old country market, we should be prepared to bring back to this country the shirts we wear when we are producing that wheat and the boots we wear when we grow that wheat.

But it would be a "wow" if a day or two afterwards, as minister of industry, he rose and said this:

> I am one of those who believe that if we want to sell our agricultural implements in the Argentine, we should be prepared to bring back to this country wheat to make the bread we eat when we are producing those implements and the beef we eat when we make those implements.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That would not be right.

Mr. MacNICOL: Quite so. I quite believe that if the minister were minister of industry as well as Minister of Agriculture he would not make either statement, because he would realize you cannot destroy industry without destroying agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: I would rather agree with your other argument that we take Welsh coal.

Mr. MacNICOL: The department would be a "wow" under a minister who would make both those statements. But I do not believe the present minister would; I give him credit for that.

Pursuing my inquiries into this subject of a ministry of industry I went to Berlin, Germany, and discussed the matter with their Department of Industry and inquired just how they proceeded in developing the marvellous production returns in industry in that country. They gave me the objectives of their department. I quite realize, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot go into this subject in detail now, but I shall do so later, if an opportunity presents itself. I was struck with this thing about the Department of Industry in Germany, that it confines itself primarily to creating employment in industry. They said that their business was: (1) to induce the setting up of new industries; (2) modernize old industries; (3) develop and manufacture low grade and high grade economic resources to render Germany independent of foreign supplies so far as possible; (4) maintain a strong middle class with numerous small and independent undertakings, including shopkeepers and craftsmen; (5) to subsidize exports. As I said a moment ago, they had subsidized, as far as I could hear, the exportation of coal. In any event the department last year spent 200,000,000 reichsmark, in subsidizing the exportation of their products. Then (6) the objective of their ministry is to develop the greatest possible home market; and lastly (7) to supervise the cost of production. That is something I feel this country ought to do. Perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) will tell me we have not any authority to supervise the cost of production. Perhaps we have not, but in my humble judgment the time has come for the government to take an interest in the cost of production in this country so that we shall be able not only to assure a fair price to consumers but to encourage a greater exportation of our manufactures.

If I might digress for a moment, I was impressed with the figures I got in Germany of the production of wheat. The figures were a revelation to me because I had never gone into the question of wheat extensively and I was amazed to learn the quantity of wheat they produced in a small country of 208,000 square miles. I shall give the house comparative figures of production and acreage for Canada and Germany for three years, 1936, 1932, 1913:

Canada
1936		1932		1913
Acreage	Quarters of 480 lbs.	Acreage	Quarters of 480 lbs.	Acreage	Quarters of 480 lbs.
25,290,000	28,650,000	27,180,000	55,380,000	11,010,000	28,950,000
Germany
Acreage	Quarters of 480 lbs.	Acreage	Quarters of 480 lbs.	Acreage	Quarters of 480 lbs.
5,150,000	21,230,000	5,630,000	23,000,000	4,860,000	21,390,000

I might add that the figures for oats, barley and rye show just as prolific a production.

Then I proceeded to Ireland to inquire into their Ministry of Industry. We all realize that the Irish Free State has few natural resources, that the country is small and their resources are limited. They have also had unpleasant trouble with Great Britain over trade, which has resulted in a reduction of their exports. In spite of that, their Ministry of Industry has, in my judgment, done remarkable work. I looked into it very, very carefully, and while I have not time now to go into the many ramifications of their work, I shall just say that what they have done in propagating industry might well be emulated in any country. I do not know what minister in the Canadian government has to do particularly with propagating industry.

Mr. DUNNING: Propagating it?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, encouraging the development of industries.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think we have any minister who propagates industry exactly.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, encourage it, then. They call it propagating it over there, but perhaps they are not familiar with English. What they told me was that they are determined to propagate industry by encouraging the opening of factories to manufacture new lines of goods, and Ireland has done very well at that. As a matter of fact, though a small country, its manufactured productions have increased from $275,000,000 in 1931 to over $400,000,000 in 1937, and I say that is not so bad in these times and under the circumstances in which they have to operate.

Of course Great Britain surpasses any other country in the increase of manufacturing. I suppose the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) did as I did and visited many of the new industrial areas—at Wembley, at Wimbledon, at Slough—where there are five hundred new factories—at Port Talbot, at Manchester, and elsewhere. I was amazed at what they are doing. It is not much to be wondered at that they are reducing unemployment in the old land, for they are firmly convinced that the way to do it is to give men jobs in factories, turning wheels and manufacturing material, and they have done that to a tremendous extent. I talked to several heads of great firms employing as many as thirty to fifty thousand men. I read in the press that the government was trying to persuade manufacturers not to build too close to London, but rather to go away from the metropolis as far as they reasonably could. I talked to some of these men who told me they were going to build new branches, and suggested that they might consider establishing them in Canada. I am not sure what the government would need to do to permit a branch manufacturing in Canada to ship into the United Kingdom as though the branch itself were in that country, but I have no doubt the difficulty could be overcome. There is a growing feeling in England to-day that the time has come when many of their plants, certainly those which are in any wise associated with provision for defence and the safety of the realm, be moved up country or over here to Canada. We are no farther away from London to-day than Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds and Sheffield were a hundred years ago. I may be exaggerating. I see the Minister of Finance smiling.

Mr. DUNNING: Not as much as usual.

Mr. MacNICOL: Many points in Canada are comparatively close to the old country; and inasmuch as over there they are giving serious consideration to moving their plants as far away as possible from industrial England, perhaps the time is coming when they might transfer them to Canada, which is closest of all the empire countries to Great Britain. The minister in charge of industry might be considered foolish if he tried to do anything along that line, but the project is worthy of consideration.

I visited one great steel plant which interested me very much. I will close with a reference to it because it brings me to unemployment insurance, which has been mentioned by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). The plant had three branches, in which there are said to be some thirty-six thousand men employed. They have not had a strike in thirty-six years. I talked to some of the workmen, and was pleased beyond measure to learn how kindly they talked about the plant in which they were working. I went to the management and discussed with them the basis of their relations with their men which had given such splendid results that they had not had a strike in thirty-six years. One of the main officials said to me, "You go into the plant this afternoon and ask the man who you think is the most unlikely to give you an intelligent answer, the question: What is the price of steel to-day?" That afternoon I did so. There were four men in front of a Bessemer furnace, and I asked No. 4, "What is the price of steel to-day?" I do not remember just what he said, so I shall quote an arbitrary figure: Such as "Sax pound saxteen shulling and fourpence." It was amazing to me that he knew the price of steel; probably he gave it correctly. The gentleman who was conducting me through the plant said, "That gives you the answer to why we have not had any strikes in this plant." Many years ago they established a basic rate of £X per ton as the selling price of steel. The price at that time may have been higher or lower than that selling price. They then entered into an agreement with their men which seemed to me like something which came down from heaven. I do not know whether it is applicable to Canada, but it was in my judgment a wonderful agreement and has had wonderful results. That agreement was that every time the price of steel plate advanced two and a half shillings beyond £X per ton the wages of the workers immediately advanced automatically, and were reflected in the next pay envelope, one and a quarter per cent. As there have been many advances during the last year, perhaps as a result of rearmament—I am not going into that—the workers are highly paid. On the other hand, if the price of steel goes down two and a half shillings per ton wages recede automatically one and a quarter per cent; and as the selling price of a commodity that is already made does not recede with the same rapidity as is sometimes supposed, wages do not fall as quickly as they advance.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a base below which the wage must not fall.

Mr. MacNICOL: Exactly. That base is set at £X per ton. Below that wages cannot fall irrespective of the price of steel on the market.

Then, of course, British industrial workers enjoy those two wonderful boons, national health insurance and national unemployment insurance. I agree with the minister that every member of the house without exception is in sympathy with the proposal to enact an unemployment insurance law. The question is how it may be framed so that it shall promptly give results. We know what was done in the United States. I made a trip to Washington to study what they are doing down there. They enacted an unemployment insurance act under the federal unit. By a judgment of the United States Supreme Court it was ruled that unemployment insurance was purely a matter for the states to control. The United States government, under the present president who perhaps has more powers than former presidents had, enacted an unemployment insurance law, but of course could not put it into operation. The statute provided that they should have the right to collect, from every employer of labour in the country who had eight or more employees on his payroll, three per cent of the wage schedules. Then they say to the state, "If you will enact an unemployment insurance measure in conformity with the one adopted by this government we will return to you the three per cent we have collected in your state," and to any state that refuses to enact such an unemployment insurance law they say, "We will use that three per cent we have collected in your state for unemployment relief within the state." Whether that can be done in Canada I do not know; but I am convinced that the sooner governments in Canada enact social legislation along some line with respect to national health and unemployment insurance the better it will be for the workers and industry within the country and the less trouble we shall have in the way of strikes.

Mr. CHARLES PARENT (Quebec West and South) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish needlessly to delay the vote on the address by a long speech, but I do not think it would be imposing on the kindness of the house to offer one or two observations, first, on the subject of civil liberty in Quebec, and next, on the advisability of beautifying Quebec city and preserving its historic character by extending the authority of the national battlefields commission over certain federal properties. Before broaching these subjects, however, may I tender my most sincere congratulations to the honourable members who proposed and seconded the motion. This oratorical classic always bears a stamp of its own. Whether it is to seek relaxation from patronage troubles, I cannot say, but it is undeniable that practically all members of the house follow attentively when these speeches are delivered. In addition, the galleries are filled with members of the fair sex, belonging to fashionable Canadian society for whom the social events of the Capital have much interest at this season. The task of the mover and seconder of the address is therefore a heavy one, Mr. Speaker, and the entire house rejoices at the success obtained.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened to some honourable members who have upbraided the government because, in the speech from the throne, no reference was made to the civil rights of our people. I may point out to the house that nowhere in the world do civilized people enjoy more freedom and tolerance than they do in the province of Quebec. In Quebec city, where I live, there are several thousand English-speaking protestants. We are all living in perfect harmony. Moreover, we see, within a distance of a few hundred feet, the catholic and the protestant cathedrals, and every Sunday we witness the edifying spectacle of catholic French-Canadians and protestant English speaking people wending their way together towards their respective place of worship, mutually respectful of their religious belief, with never a clash or a display of unfriendliness. We speak of them as they speak of us, with the utmost regard. We respect their pastors, just as they respect our priests.

Since the days of Jogues, Brébeuf and Lallemand, three centuries of history have recorded the devotion, the sacrifices and the wonderful deeds accomplished in our country in the name of Faith. That constitutes the very basis of our existence. No wonder that those who preach among us the non-existence of God should be branded as barbarians.

I take this opportunity to bring to the attention of the government the great national eucharistic congress which will take place in Quebec next summer. I do hope the government will vote an appropriation towards the expenses of the congress and that a federal delegate will attend it.

In order to make my speech shorter, Mr. Speaker, I shall take up at once my second point, which is the advisability of providing for the improvement of the city of Quebec and for the preservation of its historic character, by extending to certain federal property the powers of the national battlefields commission. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, not only is Quebec the oldest city in America, but it is also a city of priceless historical treasures. Thanks to the good breeding of its inhabitants, to its narrow streets, to its beautiful climate, to its monuments and its historic associations, Quebec is an interesting place whose quaintness attracts nearly a million tourists every year. It is also the summer residence of His Excellency the Governor General, and for that reason I believe the dominion government should take an especial interest in the improvement of the city. From the rock of Quebec, from that spot which is called Dufferin Terrace, tourists may admire one of the world's most beautiful panoramas. On either shore of the St. Lawrence are to be seen pretty villages whose white cottages stand out against the green mountains, while directly ahead is the island of Orleans which, rising amid the platinum billows of the great river, appears like a gigantic emerald. Mr. Speaker, every time you come to Quebec, I am sure you like to gaze, from that spot, upon some of the most beautiful parishes in your constituency. Perhaps it has occurred to you, as it has to me, that such a wonderful terrace might well be extended toward the west, as far as the National Battlefields park. Besides affording employment, this would provide the most picturesque site in the world.

In 1908, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, realizing the special and national character of Quebec city, appointed the National Battlefields Commission. The purpose of the act whereby that commission was created was to preserve the great battlefields which witnessed the epic struggle between Wolfe and Montcalm, and to restore, in so far as possible, their original features.

In 1911, the dominion government and the transcontinental railway commission acquired several properties and rights of way along the river; to-day these properties and rights of way are quite useless, owing to a change in the location of that railway.

Would it not be advisable, Mr. Speaker, to have these sites under the authority of the battlefields commission or even to have them transferred to it? Would it not be well to extend the commission's jurisdiction so as to include the Quebec walls which are being reconstructed, and, in keeping with our present needs, to lay out public walks as well as to rebuild the old gates which, for the sake of progress, have been destroyed?

In 1928, the dominion government voted an amount of $750,000 to be spread over a period of ten years, and the last payment is due this year. I hope that Laurier's plan may be followed up for many more years and that further appropriations may be voted for the improvement and conservation of that historic site in the oldest city of America. May I express the wish that the extension of the terrace, the general improvement of the city of Quebec and the preservation of its historic sites will have the support of those who, up to this day, have shown their judgment.

Mr. Speaker, I am confident that, with the strong support of my colleagues from Quebec city, the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power), my humble suggestion will be welcome. It is not only in the interest of Quebec city that I am making it, but also in the interest of the many visitors who come there from across the line. These visitors from abroad are very much impressed when they see Quebec for the first time, for it recalls many memories of the last three centuries, and it has been said of Quebec, that each stone reminds you of the past.

Mr. Speaker, it may be suggested that I make an appeal in behalf of my city and my constituency. In reply, I could quote these words of a writer: "One is always entitled to speak of his town when he loves it to the very depths of his heart."

Since I have yet a few minutes to spare, may I be allowed to draw the attention of the government to the fact that those conditions ought to be improved because Quebec is the oldest city in America and our modern needs were not contemplated in the original plans. Quebec city, owing to its narrow streets and its lack of opportunity for future development, is in a peculiar position regarding the assistance to be given by the dominion government under the housing act. Particularly in my own constituency, where there are many workingmen, several requests did not get from the commission the consideration which they deserved. I hope that the government will see its way clear to have the act amended in order to help the workingman, for, up to now, it has benefited in our part of the country only those who could have built their homes without such assistance. I understand that this legislation is calculated to help those who have not had a very easy life, namely the labourers, our workingmen, who, through their savings, are anxious to provide for a living in their old days. I hope that a representative of the government, after examining the conditions such as they obtain in Quebec, will see fit to put aside a certain tract of land to allow the government to assist in the building of homes where the workingmen, along with those that are in better circumstances, may secure a comfortable life for their children.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, allow me to congratulate the hon. members who moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne and especially the hon. gentleman who spoke in French.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to parade my few poor words of French in this chamber; I wish merely to express in that way something of the appreciation which I feel for the assistance and cooperation I have had in this house and in my political experience from those people who speak French as their native tongue.

(Text) Before entering upon the subject matter of my remarks I desire to extend in my own language congratulations to the mover and seconder upon their speeches, and to the electors of their constituencies congratulations upon the election of these hon. gentlemen. Their oratory is stilled for the time being, but there remains to us the consideration of the program of the government as set forth in the speech from the throne. For myself, sir, I approach this session in a state of mind which I think might be illustrated by a quotation from T. B. Macaulay. Some hon. members will remember that in his essay on John Dryden, Macaulay wrote:

> His imagination resembled the wings of an ostrich. It enabled him to run, though not to soar.

Sir, the government which it is my privilege to support is in motion; it may be said in many respects to have accelerated its pace to a run but I doubt if it can be said to soar. The return to power of the Liberal party in 1935 was a mandate to give Canada a Liberal government. That was the promise implied in the platform of that party, and that promise was greater and of more importance, to my mind, than the promises of all the leaders of the various parties who met us with opposition at that time. It is not for me to say that the government has failed to give leadership along the Liberal way. We have not failed to make progress, but I think it is my prerogative as a member of the party and a supporter of the government to say to my colleagues in the party at this, the first opportunity I have had in this session, that neither I nor my constituents —many of them, at least—feel that so far we have any great reason to feel smug about the rate of our progress.

We do not differ from other groups in the house with respect to our desire to serve Canada. We do differ as to how that service may be efficiently carried out; or do we? Sometimes one is reminded of the expression, "By their fruits ye shall know them." The most damning indictment of the Liberal party is and perhaps always will be that we Liberals are of the same political stripe as our Conservative opponents. Unfortunately, in my opinion during the past three years we have given a measure of hope and courage to our traducers. We hear from our Cooperative Commonwealth Federation friends not only "Hear, hear" but "We told you so." Out on the prairies the pool official says "Me, too," and from the shadow of the Rockies, almost out of the ether itself, we hear a voice crying, "Behold, the lion and the lamb lie down together." Nobody is fooled, unless we fool ourselves. Sometimes I think we do, we who put through the scandalous furniture tariff changes in the dying moments of the last session; we who in 1930 looked upon the Ottawa agreements with scorn, ostracized the parents and then in 1937 adopted the baby; we who permit the gasoline trust to mulct every user of gasoline on every gallon he uses; we who permit automobile manufacturers to take advantage of all the engineering developments charged against the American consuming public on their cars and then charge that again here in Canada and, finally, we who permit a Tory tariff board to give advice to our government. That in an individual would be something bordering on treason, and in a political party it is at least foolish.

If that were the whole story there would be much to be desired, but I rejoice that in this ledger there is much to counterbalance and offset it. I do not feel called upon at the moment to deal with the other side; I do not think there is any necessity to stress the achievements of the administration. At the beginning of a session I think perhaps it is a good thing for us to think more particularly about the things that have not been done.

It is perhaps unthinkable, Mr. Speaker, to many minds steeped in the political game, that one should speak out so frankly in this house, but I make no apology for having thought it wise to point out that there is an urge in my mind, as I know there is an urge in the minds of my constituents, to say to the government, "Faster, faster." I have a loyalty to the government of the day; that loyalty I give freely, but I also have a loyalty to the hopes and ambitions of the people who are the supporters of this government. I believe in the destiny of Canada; I believe that destiny can be best achieved in the Liberal way, but I want to see it come as quickly as possible along that way.

It is trite to say that these are critical times. It is stressing the obvious to say that the nations are failing to face up to the problems of the day. At this time it is perhaps sufficient to dwell for a little while on the problems peculiarly our own. Perhaps it is a good idea to ask ourselves: What are these great Canadian problems? I suggest, sir, that the first among them is the preservation of Canada herself as a united nation. We in Canada in past years have been much exercised about our national status, our place within the empire. Sometimes I think we have forgotten, too often and for too long a time, to assure ourselves of our own unity. I say quite frankly that if confederation was not an established fact, to-day in Canada it would be impossible. But, sir, seventy years have passed since confederation became an accomplished fact in this country. That union or confederation has been sanctified, if you like, by the blood of thousands of men who died for Canada; not for Quebec or Manitoba or the maritime provinces or British Columbia but for Canada, and the union which has stood the stresses and strains of those seventy years must not be permitted to break down under any circumstances.

First of all, we, as members of the House of Commons, are to love and serve Canada, we must know our country. Sometimes when I have come to the city of Ottawa, after I have been here a little while I have felt as I sometimes feel in a little valley high up in the western mountains. After I have been there a while I have an almost overwhelming desire to climb—and I do not like to climb—to look over the top and see what is going on just beyond that rim which seems so near. Perhaps that feeling of repression in the mountains is the result of having been born on the prairies, but as I come to this parliament hill I sometimes think we are in something of a valley, and we do not see over the edge quite far enough or quite often enough. Perhaps if one did not say the things that come to mind in the first few days of the session, under the influence of that isolation one might refrain altogether from saying them. At any rate if in times past I have been unduly critical of the travelling expenses of any ministers of past governments, I feel like taking it all back and suggesting to those who form the government now, and those yet to come, that they should travel more.

The sectionalism that is so rife—and it is rife—in my opinion is largely the result of ignorance. Ignorance is a greater menace than selfishness, because selfishness is the result of a lack of understanding of our own best interests. Second, there must be leadership, and in Canada we look to this house for that leadership. A member of this house who puts constituency considerations before national considerations should to my mind retire to the county council, where his talents will find their proper scope. A member of this house who allows the real or fancied needs of his province to dominate his national sentiments should seek a field of endeavour where his bias would be less harmful and more appreciated. At this point I should like to say even more emphatically that the member of any provincial legislature who uses his power in an attempt to enhance his own prestige at the expense of national unity is no patriot, be he malicious, or ignorant, or vain, or all three.

Party government is no bar to national unity. On the contrary it is perhaps its strongest binding tie. This can be true only so long as party lines divide this country horizontally. Vertical lines of division are lines of sectionalism and of selfishness and that way lies disaster. He is no patriot who pits east against west, the centre against the far-flung frontiers. That way lies chaos, dissension and defeat.

If Canadian politicians had spent one-tenth of the time and effort in educating the various parts of Canada as to their dependence upon each other that they have spent in provoking sectional antagonisms for selfish political ends, I venture to say that this great Canadian problem would hardly be a problem to-day. But we ask ourselves, "Is it a paramount question?" When we admit that it is, then we ask ourselves, "Why?" It is a problem because it affects the rights and privileges, the opportunities and rewards of every citizen. It is a problem because the very physical structure of the nation is threatened. It is a political question, an economic question and a social question. It touches every side of life of every citizen.

We come then to this question: Having recognized that there is a problem and having admitted that this house is the logical place where it should be dealt with, we then ask, "What are we to do?" I venture to say that no one can answer that question; there is no all-embracing answer. Most of us have come to realize that when we meet a man who knows all the answers, we have met a fool or a fanatic. We must then begin by laying down such fundamental principles as will guide us in arriving at a judgment on the various methods we shall explore. We must first realize the implications of national unity and we must then desire to achieve it. Then with knowledge and desire behind us, we must examine every question of national policy in the light of that knowledge and desire. I do not hesitate to say quite frankly that in my opinion policies in Canada have always been influenced more by constituencies than by principles. Perhaps this can be more readily illustrated by a study of Canadian tariff history than in any other way.

I have said that Canadian tariff policy has been influenced more by constituencies than by principles. I propose to show that the practice is accepted without comment by the very persons who suffer most from tariff instability. I quote from Canadian Business of December, 1937, which, speaking in advance of this session, says:

> It looks also as if the prairie tariff talkers will get a hearing on textiles, furniture and automobiles.

No suggestion that the government might be considering the needs and wants of the Canadian consuming public if, as the article suggests, it is planning a step along the Liberal way. "Oh, no," says Canadian Business, "if it comes it will be a sop thrown to the prairie tariff talkers, those strange western representatives of the poor rural rustics who believe that the duty of governments is to legislate for the people and who, incredibly enough, say so in public." This is another quotation from the same publication:

> It is unlikely the apple preference of $1.50 per barrel will be disturbed for it is a life and death proposition for the Annapolis valley and even a reduction in it would probably compel the Minister of National Revenue, Hon. J. L. Ilsley, to find a new political address.

Hon. members will notice that the story stresses, not the principle of tariff adjustment, not the economic situation in the Annapolis valley, but—the climax for Canadian Business—the possible reelection of the minister. I cannot fail to take issue with Canadian Business on this point. Without exonerating this or any other Canadian government from political consideration when tariffs are tinkered with, I feel sure that the hon. minister in question would throw away his seat, and mine too, rather than abandon his convictions.

Finally, there is another feature of the importance of national unity which should never escape the notice of the house. All of us are constantly made aware of our duties as citizens and we should give some thought to our rights. We share a common heritage and we owe a common duty, not only to the state but to each other and to ourselves. As Canadians we have decided that certain standards and services shall be maintained. By no stretch of the imagination can we justify discrimination as between Canadians in the enjoyment of these standards and services. The origin of these services is not local, their importance is not local and the advantages accruing are not local—they are national. By every test and upon every consideration, the responsibility is upon this house. If we meet it, we shall go a long way toward the goal of an harmoniously united Canada.

At this point I cannot do less than express my satisfaction that the speech from the throne foreshadows one step in the right direction, that of unemployment insurance. Here too I might pay my tribute to the government of the day for the appointment of the royal commission. In my opinion and in the opinion of the majority of my constituents, this commission has undertaken an herculean task. I believe that the government has selected men who are equal to that task.

There is another great problem which touches on the happiness and well-being of our people. This is a twin problem, the problem of housing and the problem of slum clearance. As I have said, this is a national problem and out of it spring many of the social problems which we have to face. Although not mentioned in the speech from the throne, I trust it has not been forgotten. Of this I shall have more to say at another time.

Second only to the problem of setting our national state in order is the problem of determining what our position is to be with relation to the other nations of the world, and what steps we shall take to maintain that position. These are troublesome times in the world at large. I submit it is not too much to say that the conscience of man has been dulled. There has been a futile scurrying from one untenable position to another in connection with international affairs. This so-called diplomacy of another generation has been perpetuated in this newer age. We are stumbling along the old paths, unwilling but surely. For all of this, this government is hardly to blame. Our opportunity for world leadership is limited both geographically and numerically. We are too far from the seat of discord and too weak to be a threat to those who transgress human rights. Yet I could wish that we in Canada stood more foursquare to our problems. To my mind, we have done something, but not enough.

The challenge to leadership was never more clear, more decisive or more urgent. Beginning with the deliberations at Versailles and continuing until to-day the outmoded statesmen of the world have floundered. They have played safe when audacity would have won the day. They have feared when courage might have swept the field. They have compromised when there was nothing to gain. The criticism which I make of the governments of the world, including our own, is that none of them really faces up to the fact of a changed world. None seems to realize that despite the alarms of war this is the hour to strike for peace.

Peace is or ought to be the greatest achievement of mankind. Its importance transcends the importance of liberty, prosperity and power. Without peace these are nothing. We have heard that there can be no peace without honour. Perhaps we ought to reverse those words and say that there can be no honour without peace. Without peace honour is hollow and meaningless. We have been contemptuous of those who cry for peace at any price, failing to realize that without peace price has no substance.

The tragedy of humanity is that we learn so slowly. Our elders, usually dominant in the affairs of the world, proceed with the caution that comes with experience and disappointment. In a fast changing world they miss all too often the tempo of the hour. Someone has said that to achieve greatly, one must dare greatly. The world has failed in that; we have kept our feet on the beaten paths which for centuries have led again and again to failure and despair. We need to explore the by-paths; we need to pioneer new trails.

We in Canada are a young nation and we ought to be vigorous, imaginative and courageous. We ought to face the world with something of the attitude of Pitt. You will remember, sir, that the great Walpole had chided Pitt for his youth and rashness. We ought as a nation to ponder on Pitt's reply. He said, "The atrocious crime of being a young man, which the hon. gentleman has with such spirit and decency charged upon me, I shall neither attempt to palliate nor deny; but content myself with wishing that I may be one of those whose follies may cease with their youth, and not of that number who are ignorant in spite of experience."

Asquith's policy of "wait and see" produced the crisis that made Lloyd George the man of the hour. But, sir, the old policy of muddling through is out of step with the times. Events move too quickly in this day and generation. Neither the Canadian people nor the Canadian government can afford to merit the description of those in Dante's hell, "The wretched souls of those who lived without or praise or blame."

We have had some inkling of public reaction to those who dare to be definite even when they dare to be wrong. The public of Canada is tolerant of the mistakes of those who would come to grips with our problems.

We in this house are, I believe, capable of expressing the mind of our people, and I hope that from this session of parliament there may go out a reasoned, imaginative, courageous expression of opinion on foreign relationships which will be a guide to our government, an answer to the question, "How long halt ye between two opinions?" and an inspiration to the world. But, sir, the great tragedy of the ages is that by the time young men are convinced they cannot right the wrongs of the world by their own wisdom, they have become so old that they regard it as hopeless. I wonder if any man who has not, face pressed to earth, felt his insides turn to water as the bombs came whistling down, is competent to evaluate the claims of humanity as against vested interests in the game of war.

It will be asked, What could, what can Canada do in the world scheme of things? Something she can do. Here in this new world she can, if she be willing to pay the price, raise the standard of national morality, and say with Luther, "Here I stand; God helping me, I can do no other."

The United States is half right, and therefore wholly a failure in international affairs. Right when she sees that leadership toward peace cannot be looked for from Europe; a failure because, so far, she has failed to rise to repeated opportunities of leadership. Like the Pharisee she has gathered her cloak about her and passed by on the other side. Our guilt is only less because our opportunities, and therefore our responsibilities, are less.

What can Canada do? If we cannot give leadership to the world we can at least set an example, and who knows but what that example might be strong enough to divert the rolling river of doom that threatens to engulf the world.

I have no language to express my scorn for the hypocrisy of those who are unwilling to fight for peace. I think of those thousands, yes millions, who did not scorn to die for peace. I think again of the poet's words, "We have kept the faith." We said, "We shall go down with unreluctant tread, rose crowned into the darkness." Is that real to you? I saw it! I stood by while an endless procession passed me one by one, outward borne. What did they die for? They were not professional soldiers doing a job. They had no dream of conquest, nothing to gain, everything to lose; no hatred for their foes, no traditional national enemies held in contempt from childhood; no dream of empire; no old scores to settle, and yet horribly, damnably, they died to a man, doing a job they hated, to free the world from this monster for all time. They died for an ideal, the ideal that may deliver this world for all time from the monster which even then was devouring them. They fought for peace, they paid for peace, and counted death nothing if the end was peace.

Well, they fought their fight, and for a little while we hoped and planned and, more briefly still, we believed. Gradually we began to realize that the fight for peace had not been won. There was wavering in the ranks. The world statesmen began to count the cost of peace, and the price was too high. National pride became an obsession, at the expense of national honour, national decency. Avarice outweighs principle; madmen speak and millions tremble in fear. It is not a pretty picture; it is not a hopeful prospect, but, sir, it is not yet hopeless. Perhaps it is now the eleventh hour; but there is, one ventures to think, even yet, one hour for repentance. It is not too late to say that, come weal or woe to our physical being, we have counted the cost and we will pay the price of peace, and I venture to say that the price of peace will be no dearer than the price of folly.

In this dark hour how shall we, being both British and Canadian, answer the challenge, "Stands England—stands Canada—where she did?" We know the bitter answer. Let us in all humility start afresh to be once more a nation, new, vigorous, neither ignorant of our destiny nor unwilling to pay the price of its realization. Let us brush aside the cold, dead hand of the past that reaches forth again to lead us by the old pathways to the ever-yawning abyss. Let us be definite, clear-cut and courageous, wrong sometimes, if that is the price we must pay for forthrightness, but moving forward always, building on our errors to be more often right. Above all, let us rise above the ultimate in hypocrisy—agreement in principle and denial in practice.

This brings me to the question of how we are to maintain our national integrity. Sir, it seems to me—and I have said so before in the house—that ten millions of people cannot long hope to hold half a continent in an overcrowded world. It is our good fortune that Canada abounds with those things which the world wants and must, in many instances, have. It is a noble heritage but it involves a great responsibility.

We must examine three possibilities. First, we may simply drift until, as the inevitable result of such a policy, we are invaded and overrun. We may then find our destiny among our conquerors.

Or we may proceed with vigour and intelligence to populate our country and develop it and, by trade, supply our world neighbours with their needs, at the same time enriching our own lives. Having brought in and assimilated another ten or twenty millions of people we may then have some assurance that we can indeed protect our shores, our homes, our heritage.

We must, then, it would seem, either populate our country or fight for it, or give it to someone else strong enough to fight our battles, as the price of our defence.

There is a third alternative to drift or immigration. That, sir, is the policy we are following to-day. Perhaps it would be more accurate to say that the policy of to-day is partly drift and partly the third policy, which I shall call the policy of limited "preparedness." We have progressed to a point where we admit that since we have doors, we might as well have locks; since we have guns, we might as well have ammunition; since we have both, we might as well train a few men to use them. And, of course, since we have so many generals we have to have some soldiers to keep the generals out of politics or other mischief.

We are united on this, that we will defend ourselves, if need be; but we are quite far from a unanimous realization that the need may come. We are reasonably united in opposition to wars of aggression, but far from united on the question of where our defensive frontier lies. We consent to a limited permanent force for defensive purposes but are quite unwilling, so far, to make the conditions of service such that they will attract to the service men who would by their enthusiasm and ability give us more of military efficiency and of protection for the taxpayer's dollar than we have been getting. I mean to cast no slur upon those who serve us now. Their character, and in most cases their ability, do them credit. Many of the conditions under which they serve do us no credit. We have not received the most or the best for our money. On this point it is noteworthy that in England a similar situation has been recognized and is being remedied. On that subject, when the estimates come up I may have something further to say.

Fnally I turn to the question which is in many ways the most serious and certainly the most pressing problem of them all in that part of the country from which I come. Nobody could be more gratified than I am with the statement of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) this afternoon. And yet, after over seven years, seven long lean years, we are still trying to delude ourselves into believing that unemployment is municipal and provincial, whereas since 1930 it has been definitely a national problem—national in the most real sense of the word. The unemployed who walk the streets of Winnipeg and Edmonton are just as much the problem of Hamilton and Moncton as they are of Winnipeg and Edmonton. But we have failed to realize this or to act on the realization.

The policy laid down in 1930 to 1935, and followed since 1935 by this government, has been wrong in principle and disastrous in its effect. Municipal and provincial governments have been beggared and bankrupted to no avail. What have we done? First of all we have bankrupted both municipalities and provinces in at least four of the nine provinces and impaired the credit of the others. We have forced on to the relief rolls not only the unemployed but all of the unemployable who at the beginning of this time might have been reasonably considered a charge upon the municipal and provincial governments. Then we have loaned the money, in many instances all of it, to maintain this monstrous burden. Recently this government has realized the unwisdom of confusing unemployed and unemployable. Alas, the realization comes too late. We now propose to shift to the local authorities a responsibility which was, perhaps, always rightly theirs but which they escaped in the general confusion of unemployed and unemployable. The catch is that we are too late. The policies followed thus far have already beggared and bankrupted the lesser governmental bodies; they cannot carry any more.

There is the situation as far as that part of the country from which I come is concerned. We need not lay the problem at the door of the Minister of Labour or any other member of the government. We have been reminding them in the morning and in the evening and at the rising and the setting of the sun, for some time. There is a place, and this is the place, where I have the opportunity to say this, and I say it. I believe it, and I shall continue to urge it until some one else replaces me or something is done about it. I am persuaded that the long range policies of this government are sound, that they present the only workable solution of the main problem of employment. I do think that they proceed with hesitating steps in the carrying out of some of these policies, chiefly in the lowering of living costs and increasing of trade by lowering the vicious tariff rates still in effect.

So, sir, I must say with regret that when we come to the short range policies for the immediate relief of a problem which is human and national rather than economic, I feel we have not lived up to the measure of our opportunity. At the same time, loyal to this mistaken concept of local responsibility, we have in reality loaned and lost money which, used otherwise, might have saved those local governments from their present plight.

If I have spoken frankly, that is my nature. If I have offended any, this is my defence—I find it in Pope's Essay on Criticism:

> Fear not the anger of the wise to raise,
> Those best can bear reproof who merit praise.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Having read very carefully the speech from the throne, foreshadowing, as it is supposed to do, the government's legislative program for the coming year, I feel in duty bound to the people who sent me here to vote for the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I am therefore supporting and speaking to the amendment, which reads as follows:

> We desire respectfully to express regret that the speech from the throne does not indicate that the government has taken or contemplates taking efficient measures to deal with unfavourable economic conditions in Canada, and that no legislative action is proposed to deal effectively with the prevailing uncertainty and insecurity resulting from the inadequate incomes of large numbers of our people.

Every hon. member will naturally think in terms of the people he represents; and I am supporting this amendment because I can find nothing in the speech from the throne to indicate that the government is taking, or contemplates taking, any constructive measures to ameliorate the sufferings of the people whom I represent. Nor am I thinking only of my constituents, because the problems that are confronting them are also confronted by nearly a million people living in the drought area and, in more or less degree, all the people living on the prairie. From time to time hon. members in this corner of the house have endeavoured to depict the conditions of the people on the prairie. We have been told by hon. gentlemen opposite that we were cranks, that we were gloom-spreaders. At one time we were told that we did no service to western Canada by painting so black a picture. But I submit that we have been vindicated during the past few months, for the western provinces have submitted through their respective governments to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations briefs which have painted pictures equally black or more so than any for which we in this corner of the house have been responsible.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) outlined the Manitoba situation very well the other day, and I have no doubt hon. members from Alberta will do the same for their province. It is therefore my intention to summarize very briefly the material contained in the report which was made by the Saskatchewan government to the royal commission. May I remind the house that what I am quoting from is not the ravings of some dyspeptic pessimist but a report made by a Liberal government which until a very short time ago was led by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Whether, due to his absence, they have become more intelligent or more progressive I know not. But they have made a report. While I do not agree in all its details with that report, I do think it is very commendable and gives a fairly accurate picture of conditions as they are in Saskatchewan.

It deals first of all with the question of debt. The latest figures, given by the government of Saskatchewan on January 28, show that the provincial debt is just a few dollars short of $192,000,000, with a contingent liability of over $32,000,000, making in all a debt of over $220,000,000 to be borne by a population of about 900,000. The seriousness of this can be realized when we remember, as the Saskatchewan government pointed out to the commission, that fifty-two per cent of their ordinary revenues were devoted at that date to the payment of interest charges; in other words, that fifty-two cents out of every dollar they collected went to pay interest and forty-eight cents out of every dollar went to pay for education, government administration, relief and other social services. They pointed out that the municipal debt was: For rural municipalities, $61,000,000; for villages, $2,000,000; for towns, $7,000,000; for cities, $57,000,000, or a total of $127,000,000, to be paid by municipal bodies whose incomes are steadily diminishing, while their responsibilities are yearly increasing. They pointed out further that the total farm debt for Saskatchewan, including first mortgages, hypothecs and agreements of sale make a grand total of $525,000,000. This does not include second mortgages and debts owing to doctors, storekeepers and so on, nor has any estimate been made of the amount of money owing in the form of mortgages and agreements of sale registered against homes and businesses in towns, villages and cities.

An analysis of figures collected under the administration of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in Saskatchewan shows that the farm debt of Saskatchewan is 120 per cent of the total property assets of these farmers and 140 per cent of their total assets, property and personal. If these debts were owed only in the province it would mean that payment of them would be a matter of exchange within the province.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. gentleman has made an important statement and I should like to have his authority for it. He mentioned the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am referring to figures that have been collected from time to time under the act.

Mr. DUNNING: Does any officer under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act or the board of review take responsibility for the figures the hon. gentleman has given?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The figures were given from time to time in reply to questions asked last year.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no official statement in connection with it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): These are figures that were given in answer to questions put on the order paper last year.

Mr. GARDINER: Only with respect to those who came before officials.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Exactly. The government of Saskatchewan showed that of the farm debt of the province 83·5 per cent is outside the province and only 16·5 per cent is owing inside. I submit that a condition like this permits of only one conclusion, that is that a great area of the dominion is insolvent, the income of the people being less than their expenditure; 52 per cent of their income goes to pay interest, and their liabilities far exceed their assets.

The effect of this on the population of Saskatchewan has been pointed out in this brief. They point out first of all the effect on the people who are on relief. The total number of people receiving government aid in some form or another is nearly 500,000, more than half the total population. No picture that we have ever painted of the conditions under which these people live is nearly so black as that painted in this brief in quotations taken from articles written by Mr. D. B. MacRae, editor of the Regina Leader Post and Mr. R. M. Scott. I shall read one or two quotations from pages 291 and 292:

> There is virtually nothing in the rolling hills and valleys at Buffalo Gap and Big Beaver, which are near the U.S. border due south of Bengough. Gardens were a failure. Potatoes will have to be brought in. . . . One man told of children whom he knew who had not tasted any other vegetables than potatoes for over two years. Meat, bread and potatoes form the diet of the majority it was stated, but this year it is feared that the meat will often be lacking and the potatoes as well. Such is the progressive effect of six years of drought. . . .
> This means that replacement of things in the home has been at a low point, or practically not at all. This is the most aggravating feature of the drought. One farmer described the situation as "patching up old clothes with clothes already patched, only to find that the garment had given way somewhere else." Examples are everywhere but repetition of them would not ease the circumstances. Clothing and bed clothes are badly needed. . . .
>
> Clothing has been reduced to a minimum and bed clothes are reported as a great necessity, being but a remnant of what they once were and worn thin with age. Bare necessities have been the rule during the past few years. Farm homes such as these have never been run on a lavish scale. The people live simply and modestly, so reduction from their scale of living means more to the farmer and his wife and family than would at first appear. . . .
> In some farm houses near the United States border . . . information was given of cases where one girl wore "the dress" to school one day while the sister stayed at home. Next day they alternated, one staying at home and one going to school. Even the tea kettle is worn out and has been replaced by a lard pail. Broken panes of glass have been replaced by cardboard.

That is not the statement of someone trying to overdraw the picture; it comes from the editor of the Regina Leader Post, a supporter of the Liberal party. The housing conditions of these people are such that one could not take time to describe them, but I will give a quotation from a report of the bureau of statistics:

> The large six room dwelling is predominant in the maritimes and Ontario where there is least evidence of crowding and conversely on the prairies where four room dwellings predominate, there is definite evidence of inadequate living space, particularly in rural areas. . . . Over 60 per cent of prairie rural homes contain four rooms or less, while the number of such homes in Ontario is less than 23 per cent. In Alberta and Saskatchewan there are more rural households occupying two rooms than in any other room group.

The Saskatchewan government submitted figures to show that in regard to household comforts in rural homes Saskatchewan ranks among the lowest in the matter of farm conveniences and has the unenviable distinction of having fewer homes with sanitary conveniences and running water than any other province in the dominion. The effect, as the result of these long years of unvaried diet and living on starches, has been to reduce the powers of resistance of great masses of these people. When we realize that the maximum relief for a family of five is $20.20 per month, with 15 per cent deduction if they have meat, 10 per cent deduction if they have dairy products, 10 per cent deduction if they have vegetables, we can readily understand that the problem of health, the problem resulting from undernourishment and malnutrition is a very grave one indeed.

This brief points out that not only have the people on relief been affected, but the rest of the people have had their incomes seriously curtailed. Storekeepers, doctors, workers in towns and villages, ministers of the gospel—all these people are still endeavouring to carry on the services of the community, in many cases with resources exhausted, and they can carry on only under great privation and hardship. And no group have suffered more than the school-teachers, particularly the rural teachers. The brief points out that in 1936 the total salaries paid the school-teachers of Saskatchewan amounted to about half what was paid in 1926, and the total of salaries owing to the teachers was about $1,000,000. It proceeds to set out some of the causes, three main causes being mentioned. I cannot deal with them extensively, but it is interesting to note that drought is not given as one of the main causes.

[Mr. Douglas.]

I have listened to hon. gentlemen opposite telling us from time to time that one good rain or one or two good crops would put Saskatchewan and the prairies back on their feet. That was not the opinion of those who presented this brief. They recognized that drought is a factor which has aggravated the situation, but the causes lie deep down in our economic and social system. On page 1 they say:

> It will be most unfortunate for Canada as a whole if fundamental weaknesses in the economy of the western provinces, and in particular of Saskatchewan, are ignored in the belief that prosperity will be assured with a return of normal crop conditions.

And the same view is stated on pages 18 and 46. They cite three main causes; the first is the uneven burden of the protective tariff, and as usual they quote the figures compiled by the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) before he became a member of the government. I am not going into that except to say that the government of Saskatchewan pointed out to the Rowell commission that those figures show—and they must have agreed with them—that the benefit Saskatchewan derived from the tariff was $3,000,000 a year, the amount it cost Saskatchewan was $29,000,000 a year, and therefore the loss to the people of Saskatchewan was $26,000,000 a year. Therefore on a per capita basis each man, woman or child gained in benefit $3.55 and paid out $31.71, in other words, the tariff cost each man, woman or child in Saskatchewan $28.16 in terms of too high prices that they paid for the goods they bought, over what they would have paid had they been buying in the markets of the world. They pointed out that western Canada was discriminated against, that they received in benefit only $30,000,000 and that it cost them $86,000,000, being a net loss of $56,000,000 per year to the three prairie provinces. Now I am not going to say whether or not those figures are correct, I shall leave their defence to the Minister of Labour, who is an authority on gathering statistics. But I ask, Why should a Liberal government in western Canada present these facts to the Rowell commission? If there were a Tory government in Ottawa I could well understand them talking about the unequal burden of the tariff, but we have a government here which has for its slogan "Wider and freer markets," a government which has in its ranks the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman), whose syndicated articles on freer trade are blazoned from one end of Canada to the other. I listened with interest to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) saying that the farmers give every fifth hog, every fifth head of cattle, every fifth bushel of wheat to protection. But why tell us that? All he has to do to have this situation rectified is to convert hon. gentlemen beside him. They have the power; theirs must be the responsibility if there is an unequal tariff burden.

The same thing is true in regard to the second cause they gave. They say that the monetary policy of the government was such that it had worked a hardship on western Canada. I refer the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) particularly to pages 233 and 237. I shall read only one quotation:

> While western members in the house continued to urge a change of monetary viewpoint in order to ease the burden of western agriculture, the government of the day never wavered in its allegiance to the doctrine of "sound money."

Has the doctrine of sound money been changed? In what way? Why tell the Rowell commission about it? This government has been in office two and a half years; its leader was going to "issue currency and credit in terms of public need." It has among its supporters and champions the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), and the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). I remember with what eloquence these gentlemen entered the house to do battle against the money power.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member may ask all the questions he likes when I have finished.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is it the present government that is meant by "the government of the day"?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member may make his speech when I have finished.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. member has reached the stage where he will not answer questions.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): These gentlemen remind me of Tennyson's well known lines:

> But oh for the touch of a vanished hand,
> And the sound of a voice that is still.

Their voices have become very still.

Mr. FINN: Yours has not.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I hope it never will as long as the government opposite is in power.

Mr. MacNICOL: That will be not more than two and a half years.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The third reason given was the railway problem and unfair freight rates. I shall take no time to say anything about that, except that the same remark applies; the government in power could have rectified these inequalities, and theirs is the responsibility for not doing so.

But I want to mention some of the causes not mentioned in the brief, that have aggravated the situation. The first I come to is the administration of relief, particularly in the drought area and in the province of Saskatchewan. The first thing wrong has been lack of direct responsibility. A man applies for relief, his application goes to the secretary of the municipal council. The council consider it, they may pass it, reject it or cut it down. Then the relief officer comes around. There is one relief officer for every two or three municipalities. He has power to veto any relief order the municipal council may pass. Furthermore he has power to pass one even if the municipal council may have rejected the application, and to pass that relief order on to the provincial government. In other words, the responsibility does not lie with the municipalities, as has been so often alleged. No wonder the rural municipalities of Saskatchewan in their brief to the Rowell commission said this rather sad thing:

> We at times feel that we are a rather important unit of our government system, and at other times that we are simply in existence for the purpose of performing tasks and assuming responsibilities that no self-respecting unit of government would undertake.

And that is true.

Mr. DUNNING: No, that is not true.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If the minister will let me finish my argument I will show it is true.

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister knows I cannot go on for an hour and twenty minutes as he did. I have only forty minutes, unless the house will extend my time, in which case I will answer all the questions the minister likes to ask.

This is what happens when a man finds his relief order has been cut down; he goes to the secretary of the municipality, who tells him; You have to see the relief officer. The relief officer tells him; I am governed by the regulations of the provincial government. He goes to the province and is told: That is under the dominion government. He addresses himself to the federal minister and is told: We provide the money but we do not administer it, and they send him back to the province, which refers him back to the relief officer. So, like the music, he "goes round and round" and never gets anywhere.

In giving the relief officer a power which is practically dictatorial you give him power to discriminate against individuals. The other evening the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) put this question to us in this corner:

> I am certain that my friends of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, some of whom come from Saskatchewan, or of the Social Credit group, two of whom come from that province, will not admit that the councils in the municipalities which they represent are composed of men who are cogs in any political machine.

Mr. Speaker, I have covered eighteen thousand miles this summer by car, going into every corner of the drought area. I have handled hundreds of relief cases. After seeing this thing I say first that the municipal councils are not in the political machines, but that the relief inspectors are, and that there is being built up to-day in the drought area, on the misery of our people, a political machine that would make Tammany Hall look like a Sunday school.

Mr. MacNICOL: They will receive what Tammany Hall did.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Why? Simply because these relief inspectors are politically appointed. They have the power; if they like a man's political flavour his relief application goes through without difficulty. If they do not like his political flavour they can give him a great deal of trouble. I am not saying that happens in every case; I have met scores of these men and taken up individual cases with them, and when apparent discrimination has been drawn to their attention it has been rectified. But I will say to the government, and particularly to the Minister of Agriculture, that there is room in this set-up for discrimination and that there has been discrimination again and again.

Mr. GARDINER: That is not the set-up. The hon. member has not described the set-up.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I think I have described the set-up very well.

The second effect of our relief system, Mr. Speaker, of course has been to penalize initiative. There is a deduction, for instance, if a man raises a few pigs or milks some cows. If he gets a little work and earns some money, that is deducted from his relief. Even last summer if men went out in the boiling sun and put up stacks of Russian thistle, in many cases they had it deducted later on from their feed and fodder quota. In other words we have worked out a relief system which says: The more you do, the less you get; the less you do the more you get. I can remember that during the campaign of 1935 some hon. gentlemen opposite said to the electors, "If you have a Cooperative Commonwealth Federation government, everybody will be looked after, but what will you do with the lazy fellow?" I want to ask what you are doing with the lazy fellows under this relief system. Of course some of them have been made government inspectors, but what about the others? This is what they have done with the lazy fellows. They have said to them, "You stay out on the prairie and squat and do nothing, and you will get more relief than the man who is trying to do a little to help himself."

Mr. DONNELLY: Is that what you told them at home?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have said here what I told them at home. I can tell the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly that I always tell the people here what I tell the people at home. That is not true of some hon. members.

The second thing that has aggravated the situation has been the distribution of feed and fodder. May I review, just briefly, what happened. First of all, in the early summer the Saskatchewan wheat pool, recognizing as everyone did that we were going to be short of feed and fodder, made an offer. They were willing to use their facilities to collect feed and fodder, bring it into the province, do the interim financing, bale and load it for seventy-five cents a ton and take a large share of this work off the hands of the government. Why this offer was never accepted no one has been able to explain.

Mr. GARDINER: It has all been explained on the floor of the legislature in Saskatchewan.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I hope it will be.

Mr. GARDINER: It has been.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I would not consider that an explanation; I would consider that an evasion. This is what happened. It was apparent last year in the middle of July that we were not going to have enough feed. Some of us, along with farmers' organizations and representatives of the municipalities, approached government officials. We said, "You are not going to have enough feed, and nobody can expect you to feed all the cattle in Saskatchewan. We ask you to take the scrubs to the canning factories, but the foundation stock must be taken care of, either by shipping it out, by organizing bands of farmers to go out and secure feed or by shipping feed in." Nothing was done. Weeks went by. In the middle of August I journeyed all the way to the town of Carlyle to hear the Minister of Agriculture speak to his own constituents. It was the only way I could possibly find out what the government was going to do.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member must have hidden in the back corner; I did not see him.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Like the Minister of Agriculture I am not very conspicuous when I am on my feet. I hope you are taking note of these interruptions, Mr. Speaker, because I should like to finish this speech.

At that meeting the minister gave an outline something similar to that which he gave here as to the program his government was going to follow, with regard to the shipping of cattle, the selling process and so on. Then he made another statement, and if I do not quote him accurately he will correct me. He said they were not going to cut people down to a schedule; they were going to feed the stock up to a schedule, and if a man was able to feed more than the schedule, that was his good luck. On the other hand, if a man kept more than his schedule and could not feed them, they would die. I have personal knowledge that many of those farmers did not have enough feed to see them through that week, and the minister assured them that feed would be brought in.

I must say that most of the people who heard him were very well satisfied, but the feed did not come in. The situation became so acute that one of the best supporters of the minister in that constituency called a meeting in the same town four weeks later to make a violent protest about the lack of decisive action on the part of the minister. We could not understand what was happening, but the minister cleared that up the other night as reported at page 159 of Hansard, when he said:

> Instructions went out from my office, knowing western Canada as I do know it, that no hay was to be delivered until it was absolutely necessary to have it there. I was much more concerned about having hay there in the middle of February than I was in having hay there last October.

But I should like to tell the minister that in the middle of February some of the cattle were not alive to eat that hay; many of those cattle died before the feed ever got there. But what followed? This is the most iniquitous part of the whole thing. The minister said no compulsory measures would be taken to cut people down to a schedule, yet I know that farmers who went out and bought feed and brought it in and kept stock on their own feed were refused direct relief unless they cut down their cattle to the quota. In the southern part of my constituency, where they are not grain farmers but live stock men, they shipped herds of cattle numbering sixty and eighty head to Manitoba, under the government scheme. Then they came back and applied for direct relief, but they were told they could not get it because they had cattle in Manitoba. They went back and sold their cattle in Manitoba, then returned and applied for relief, only to be told that they could not get it because they had money obtained from selling those cattle.

Mr. GARDINER: Why should a man with sixty head of cattle obtain relief?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That represents his capital equipment. You would not ask a grain farmer to sell his equipment. The result was that thousands of farmers were faced with the choice of either liquidating their herds or seeing their wives and children starve. What has been the result? There has been a depletion of live stock. The other evening, as reported at page 158 of Hansard, the minister said:

> In other words, we still have 252,000 head more than we had in 1931, so if that number of cattle are still in Saskatchewan no one can say that the country has been depleted of cattle.

Do you see the catch in it, Mr. Speaker? These figures represent statistics as of June 1. The cattle were shipped out in September, October and November, to say nothing of the cattle that died in the meantime.

Mr. GARDINER: Read the rest of the speech and you will find that I covered that point.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister did not cover that. He went on to talk about the cattle shipped out, but he has no statistics at all with regard to the cattle that died. Any person who says there has been no depletion in Saskatchewan has only to go along the railway lines of that province to see what are the facts. In 1931 the farmers were shipping out butter and butter fat; to-day they are shipping it in. What has been the result? Simply this, that the live stock industry in southern Saskatchewan at least has been liquidated. That means hundreds of farmers are unable to supply their own tables. For many of them it means no cream cheques. In the town in which I live it means $1,500 a week less in cream cheques coming in, a total of $75,000 a year less purchasing power. But it means more than that. If we have a crop next year, as we hope we shall, these farmers are going to want to build up their herds again. How are they going to do it? I saw cattle being sold for $12 and $15 a head. Can anybody imagine buying milch cows for anything like that amount next summer? No; the farmers will be asked to pay anywhere from $60 to $100, which they simply cannot pay. This will mean that they will have to breed up their herds, and in the end it will mean that the live stock industry has been ruined for at least ten or twelve years. That is one principal reason for the great dissatisfaction which exists there.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with one other matter, but I am afraid my time is not going to permit me to do so. Since the Minister of Labour is in his seat I should like to have dealt especially with the farm placement scheme.

At this time I should like to pay a tribute to the youth training program put on by the Minister of Labour. A very fine work has been done. I visited a number of these schools and I found they were excellently handled. I only hope that the appropriation will be increased next year and this work continued. While I am paying compliments, perhaps I should mention the Minister of Agriculture. I consider the distribution of fish, cheese and beans under Doctor Stapleford to have been the most efficient and equitable I have ever seen. I think the minister is to be commended for this work.

While the minister's department may be a "wow" at gathering statistics, there has been either a great deal of incompetency or sheer stupidity in the administration of the farm bonus plan. I think other hon. members will agree with me when I say that I have had more letters of complaint about this single thing than about anything else. There are two main difficulties in connection with this matter. The first is the definition of "homeless." A young man or young woman may have been working for a farmer for one, two or three months and then be informed by Mr. Molloy, who is administering this work and doing it very well under the handicap under which he is working, that his or her application has been rejected because it has been found that he or she has a home. The fact that a man has a home somewhere ought not to bar him from taking a job.

I know of many cases where the head of the home is unable to support a young man or woman. It may be that a home is presided over by a widow; that other children are doing all the work necessary on the farm, and that an older brother or sister coming home would simply mean an additional burden. I have before me a number of letters that I would gladly pass over to the minister. In addition to being thrown out of employment, these young people have been unable to collect anything for the two or three months they have worked.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not think that is the case at all. I am quite sure my hon. friend is misinformed.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I can show the minister letters from his own branch.

Mr. ROGERS: I would be very glad to receive them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I will pass over to the minister letters which were received from Mr. Molloy in which he states that that is why these people have been refused employment. I have written to Mr. Molloy and that is the kind of answer I have received.

Mr. ROGERS: Everyone will be paid for the time he has worked on a farm.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have one letter in which Mr. Molloy offered to pay relief to a farmer for the time a man worked, but he would not pay anything else.

Then there is the question of relationship. Applications have been refused because the applicant was a relative. This rule is being applied stringently, even in cases where the relationship is very remote. For instance, take the case of a widow with a small family running a farm. She needs someone to help her and there may be a brother who is homeless and destitute. He has to work somewhere and he would be better working for his sister than somewhere else. But his application is rejected. Mr. Molloy is quite clear about this.

Mr. ROGERS: Will my hon. friend say how many have been placed in Saskatchewan?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am talking about those who have not been placed.

Mr. ROGERS: About 25,000 have been placed.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If the Minister of Labour met a man who was out of work he would say to him, "Cheer up, my friend, there are a lot of people who are working." That is no consolation for a man who is not working. Then the minister might tell him that he has been registered and therefore he should feel better. I am sure it is not the slightest consolation to the unemployed of this country to know that they have been registered.

Mr. DUNNING: Twenty-five thousand have been placed in Saskatchewan.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If the Minister of Finance will let me go on, I should like to quote from this letter from Mr. Molloy. He says:

> Your opinion that it is much more suitable and proper that a widow endeavouring to maintain herself on a farm should be allowed to have her brother, rather than a stranger, reside in the home and assist in the farm work, is concurred in by my minister, the Honourable Mr. Parker. As evidence of this, I would mention that Mr. Parker made quite a strong appeal to the Minister of Labour at Ottawa to permit the placement of relatives with women who are endeavouring to carry on farming operations in the province. However, this appeal was rejected by the federal authorities.

I submit that in the definition of "homeless" and of "relatives" there ought to be some leeway by those responsible for administration in the respective provinces in order that situations like this may be adjusted. In this particular case the man was allowed to work for his sister for two years under the farm bonus plan. Then in the third year it was suddenly found that as he was a relative he could work no longer. I think serious consideration should be given to this problem. I suggest that the difficulties facing the people in the drought area are due not only to the drought but to certain fundamental economic conditions that have not been rectified. Their difficulties are due above all to the aggravating policies that have been formulated by this government and to a lack of constructive measures to meet the situation that confronts these people.

Mr. J. A. MARSH (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in this august chamber for the first time I do so with memories of him in whose place I now stand. I refer to the late Herbert Earl Wilton. Mr. Wilton was a man whom we in the city of Hamilton had grown to love and respect as a capable and efficient public servant. For several years he served in our city as an alderman, then later as mayor, and he finished his term of public life as the member for Hamilton West in this House of Commons. We knew him not only as a public servant, but as a man whom we had grown to respect and love. His integrity, his love of truth, his exceeding kindliness and his good humour made him beloved by all with whom he came in contact.

I am happy to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne. As a new member perhaps I can appreciate their feelings and emotions more thoroughly as they stood up to speak than other hon. members, who in their wisdom and experience, have sat in this chamber for many years. I am sorry I was not in the chamber when the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) told the house he was just completing thirty-five years as a member of parliament.

Mr. Speaker, I view with regret the content, or shall I say the lack of content, in the speech from the throne. I am moved to say that I regard it as a sad document to be put forth by a government whose Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), whose ministers and many of whose members have so recently participated in that joyous event, the coronation, and later in the imperial conference of the countries of the empire. What a wonderful clearing house that must have been for ideas and what a diversification of problems to be solved! All of this should have been productive of much. But this government has returned for the third session of this parliament and I submit that the speech from the throne leaves much to be desired.

Canada is faced with a number of problems, at least two of which threaten the very lifeblood of our country. The first to which I shall refer is that of poverty in a land of plenty. The second problem is the apparent desire on the part of some provinces to legislate for themselves and to set up nine separate bodies instead of continuing as the great Dominion of Canada which was handed down to us by the fathers of confederation.

I read from the speech from the throne:

> It is gratifying to note that, during the past year, there has been a further substantial advance in Canada's economic recovery. Revenues have reached new levels. Trade with other countries has materially expanded.

I submit that the recovery referred to is much more imaginary than real, and that, if divorced from its dependence upon our participation in the armaments program in which the world is engaged at the present time, there is little net economic advance. I thoroughly concur with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) when he said, on Wednesday last, that increased revenue was obtained last year largely through the exploitation of Canada's mines for war purposes and that we were avidly selling to both aggressor and defending nations.

During the last few years I have spoken with people who are thinking people, and if I can believe what I hear and what I read, it is the opinion of a great many Canadians that our nation is one of the most materialistic in the world. I am forced to agree that that is so. We pride ourselves on our standard of living; but I am convinced that Canada is now putting far too much emphasis on the dollar and not enough emphasis on the man. Our national life is full of evidences of this. I am sorry to say that our churches are not free from it, though I hesitate to criticize them. Our values are all wrong. Does it not seem to be the veriest hypocrisy that we, living in a country where we have virtually control of nickel and to a large extent control of copper, should sell them to belligerent nations for the purposes of destroying life, while at the same time we hear from the radio, the newspaper and the pulpit appeals by the Red Cross—and God bless the Red Cross—that we send sums of money to one million Chinese boys and girls and old men and women to nurse back to health broken bodies, the starved wastage of war? Does it not seem the veriest hypocrisy that shells and other armaments made of Canadian nickel and copper and sold by Canadian industries to belligerent nations should later necessitate philanthropic giving, to nurse, with Canadian surgery and the use of Canadian adhesive tape, perhaps, the products of our own destruction? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is poor economy and worse Christianity. It is entirely unworthy of the traditions of the Canadian people.

I make these observations after serious thought. When the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was speaking on Monday last, he pointed out very clearly the importance of Canadians not taking sides, that Canada must observe her neutrality, that public servants must be guarded in their expressions of opinion as to any belligerent. Also I am mindful that the Prime Minister, in reply, concurred in this thought, and I was much impressed by his earnestness when he said:

> I do hope that in the course of political discussions in this house during the present session, hon. members will think twice with regard to whatever they may have to say on foreign affairs, and ask themselves whether, in view of the attitude which great nations such as England, France and the United States have thought it wisest to adopt, we ourselves should seek to outrun them and attempt some of the things that go much farther than they are prepared to go.

Despite this injunction I am moved to say that the present exploitation of Canada's mines in favour of belligerent nations, of aggressive people at war, is Canada's responsibility. I deplore that I must say it is Canada's guilt.

Also am I mindful of the efforts put forth by British statesmen in the last few years to preserve the peace of Europe. Cannot this government, moved by the high principles of right, justice and peace, do something to eliminate or at least to curtail the exploitation of our mines in order that shells may be sold to belligerent nations? It should never be hinted or even thought of Canada that she sacrificed her national honour for financial gain.

Neither, Mr. Speaker, am I impressed by the increase of revenue which was spoken of in the speech from the throne, when I realize that the taxes paid by the Canadian people last year were greater than in any previous year in our history. You have heard this before, Mr. Speaker, during the discussion, and you will hear it again, because of necessity it must be spoken. Are we to congratulate the government because they have proved themselves to be the greatest tax collectors in the history of federal governments in Canada? I think not. In view of the increase in economic recovery as spoken of in the speech from the throne, why does the sales tax—that much discussed burden which unfortunately falls so largely on the commodities that the man making fifteen or eighteen dollars a week has to buy—remain at eight per cent? Why the tax on sugar? You have heard this before, but in view of the economic recovery, why is that tax still one cent a pound? In view of the surplus in the department of the Postmaster General I wonder why postage is still three cents? The leader of the opposition put the matter in its right category when with ridicule he said, "Behold the surplus!" If recent government action gives any indication of what is going to happen in the next few months it would appear that taxes are increasing rather than decreasing. Otherwise why the increase in the radio licence from two dollars to two dollars and a half? I am not going to belabour the point now; I wish to speak of it a little later.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is unbecoming in a young man, especially a new member, to be intolerant. As we approach years of maturity we should find in ourselves a readiness to stand in the other man's shoes, to look at mutual problems through the other man's glasses, and I hope that as long as I am on the opposition benches I shall not be found continually condemning the government. I am not made that way. Consequently perhaps I may remark that when hon. members who now sit to the right of the Speaker move over, as they will do in a little while, to the left of the Speaker, they will conduct themselves accordingly.

Therefore, realizing that this young country of ours—and how prone we are to boast about its trees, its streams and its lakes, its rivers that generate power, the nickel and copper we take from the bowels of the earth, the apples which compare favourably with the best in the world—with all its present wealth and its potentialities, is faced with a menace, an enemy which is stalking through the length and breadth of the land, cannot this parliament unite to banish that monster from among us? His name is poverty.

I come, Mr. Speaker, from the industrial city of Hamilton. Hamilton is the Pittsburgh of Canada, and the finest city in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARSH: I hear some assent and some dissent from a few members, perhaps from Toronto. Perhaps I may be permitted to say to them that civilization has always moved from the east to the west, and there may come a time when "the desert will blossom like the rose" and Hamilton will extend its boundaries north, south, east and west, but mostly to the east, and when that time comes, the city of "Toronto the good" will perhaps find itself rejoicing in the bosom of a greater and better Hamilton.

We pride ourselves in Hamilton upon possessing a university, and we have a school system that we think is second to none. We have other cultural advantages, but Hamilton is still a city of dinner pails and time-clocks and pay envelopes. Because of our natural geographical location, and because of the fact that we have a fine harbour and good railroad service, as good as the present setup can give us, industry knocks at our door, and we joyfully admit industry. Yet, Mr. Speaker, I am distressed to see the men and women who haunt our streets day by day looking for the job they cannot find. I am distressed also by the great percentage of men and women in the city of Hamilton who are working in our industries, giving an honest day's work and receiving in return a pay envelope that is inadequate even for the bare necessities of life. I am further distressed by the number we have on relief. Our relief system is, we think, one of the most economically operated in Canada, and we are proud of it. But relief is a poor substitute for a job, and it is a terrible impost on the taxpayer who is trying to help out his less fortunate fellow-citizens.

We listened the other day with a good deal of interest to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) as he told us what the government had done and tried to do in the west. We were gratified to hear that the government had done so much, but we have also heard from western members who have told us of the spectre of poverty that is marching throughout the west, leaving in its wake destitution, bundles of bones—horses or cattle—wandering on the prairies, little children clothed in burlap, receiving a steady diet of potatoes, and perhaps not that. I would like to say to the members from the west that those of us in the east pay our tribute to you of the west. You have been brave; you have fought manfully. Perish the thought that the east should ever forget the west, or the west ever forget the east! Perish the thought that one province should ever war with another! Perish the thought that this Dominion of Canada should ever disintegrate because of selfishness! But I would like to point out that the government now in power appealed to the electorate in 1935, and said: If you put us into office, you will have the federal government and all the provincial governments of this country of the same political persuasion, and we shall have a cohesion and a unity which will enable us to solve many of the problems that are now distressing this country. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that this government stands condemned until that is a realization, and not just a fond hope—and that time is not yet.

To the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) I would suggest that we cannot brag about our trade and commerce so long as we have 960,000 people on relief in a country of 11,000,000, almost one in eleven of our total population. We cannot brag about our resources or our world trade so long as we have a great mass of people in our cities and in the country living in the shadow of insecurity, and of fear of what to-morrow may bring.

May I say a word about the tendency on the part of this government to reduce tariffs in industries which depend upon protection for their very existence, the payrolls of which are even now inadequate to afford a decent living to their workmen. I refer to the reductions that have been made in certain tariffs during 1936 and 1937. I am an advocate of a reasonable tariff for an industry that needs protection. I am an advocate of foreign trade. I believe in exchanging our surplus products, if they can be exchanged with a country whose business cycle is not a feast-and-famine cycle, whose market is more or less stable, whose trade shows some degree of consistency, and therefore I am alarmed at the reference made in the speech from the throne to the proposed trade treaty between Canada and the United States. To what extent will it affect the present British Empire trade agreements, so skilfully and carefully prepared by the late government under its right hon. leader (Mr. Bennett), and implemented by the present government somewhat. There is great apprehension on the part of manufacturers as to what the future holds for them. How can they plan with tariffs that jump around? While the speech from the throne does not indicate the specific classes of goods that may be affected, nevertheless I should like to quote what the leader of the opposition said in his speech on Monday last:

> There is nothing more we can give the United States except specific reductions of tariff items, but we are told that what we are to do is to sell our British preference for these benefits. That is the story. Without going into it in detail, the sole, simple question is: What price? And what price means what concessions we are prepared to make from the British preference in order that we may get something for which we have given already everything we have to give on our own account, so that we have nothing more to offer except reductions in specific items. . . . We are not prepared to take quotas when we have given 125,000,000 people everything.

I am rather taken by the undeniable fact—and it applies in this instance—of how history has a habit of repeating itself. Why are Liberal governments against, and why have Liberal governments through all the years been against industry? Senator Beaubien, on April 1, 1936, reviewing the success or failure of reasonable tariff protection of our industries, instanced the year 1930, and said:

> So our tariff wall was being demolished brick by brick, and a flood of merchandise from all over the world was pouring into Canadian markets with the result that manufacturers who had been in business in this country for years and gave employment to large numbers of our citizens were unable to withstand the competition.
> What was the position in 1930? The manufacturers of the United States, enjoying higher protection and greater sales volume than do our manufacturers, flooded our market with $900,000,000 worth of goods, $600,000,000 worth of which competed directly with our own manufactured products.
> I do not say this disparagingly, but it has always struck me as being very strange that, traditionally, the Liberal party has in a sense always been opposed to our manufacturers. My hon. friends opposite know this to be a fact. Why is this?

We are still asking that question in the year of Our Lord, 1938.

> The situation was bad enough in 1930. What is it like now? I dare say that there is no other country in the world which provides such dangerous competition for our industries as does the United States. We could perhaps meet the competition of glassware and boots manufactured in Czechoslovakia, for that country is a great distance from our market, and, so far as its boots are concerned, our people will not wear them. But every hon. member having the slightest experience of business knows that the manufacturers of the United States are competitors against whom it is virtually impossible for us to compete. This was evidenced in 1930.

I shall not read further, but I would point out that since this statement was made, tariffs have again been lowered, and now we have a proposed trade agreement with a country of 125,000,000 people who have protected themselves with a 60 per cent tariff, while our own country, with 11,000,000 people, has an average tariff of approximately 14 per cent. We have an adverse balance of trade with them at the present time; what have we to gain?

May I say a word or two to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) with regard to certain branches of the textile industry. I have learned to respect the Minister of Finance; I admire his brain and his tongue, and most of all I like his very cordial manner in the House of Commons. But I cannot understand the way his brain works when it comes to the protection of our industries. I am aware that there are certain branches of the textile trade which came in for condemnation because they have not played the game in the past, but there are other branches which need protection. Surely the minister does not need to be reminded that $25,000,000 is paid by this industry directly to men and women who work with their hands; nor does he need to be reminded that there are eighty-two municipalities in Ontario, thirty-nine in Quebec, eighteen in the maritime provinces and seven in the west which are dependent upon this pay-roll and benefit by it. I would ask him to compare the duty into Canada with the duty into ten of the principal cotton-manufacturing countries.

I quote from an authority which I regard as responsible and I give as a basis five Lancashire gray cloths. Taking cloth No. 1, the rates are:

	Per cent
United States	22·3
Japan	21·0
United Kingdom	23·0
India	23·0
China	35·5
France	33·6
Brazil (minimum duty)	197·4
Czechoslovakia	22·3
Belgium	25·0
Canada	15·0

Mr. DUNNING: Is that gray cloth?

Mr. MARSH: That is gray cloth. The percentages for cloth No. 2 are:

	Per cent
United States	19·5
Japan	18·8
United Kingdom	23·0
India	23·0
China	35·5
France	24·2
Brazil (minimum duty)	215·9
Czechoslovakia	25·1

I shall not weary the house by giving the figures for cloths Nos. 3, 4 and 5; they all find Canada at the bottom of the heap with 15 per cent. I have not said anything about five countries which might be spoken of as textile manufacturing countries—Germany, Russia, Italy, Spain and Poland—all of which might be claimed to have special considerations governing the extent of their tariffs; but I have quoted ten of the fifteen important textile manufacturing countries. It is evident that the Canadian duty on cotton textiles is the lowest of any textile manufacturing country in the world and that our standard of living, thank heaven, is higher than it is in China. I submit therefore that the tariff should not be further lowered, but should be raised.

It has been said of this government that it is a safe government. I wonder what we mean by "safe." We cast our minds back a few hundred years to the middle ages and read of monks going into monasteries in order to be safe. They shut themselves off from the iniquities of the world, from sin, and hardship and warfare in order that they might be safe. We who are in positions of leadership in Canada's parliament are very much at grips with life, and we cannot be inactive; we must wage war on this thing we call poverty. I am mindful that during the recent depression the then government, now sitting in opposition, was blamed for the greatest slump in the history of modern times. The present leader of the opposition, then Prime Minister, came in for a great deal of criticism and blame, but his shoulders were broad. He was blamed for the collapse of the whole world, at any rate for the depression, so far as Canada was concerned. I shall not reciprocate in kind and blame the present Prime Minister and his government for the fact that the sun did not shine at the right time in Saskatchewan; that the rain did not fall; that the wheat did not grow; that men who sowed did not reap. But I do submit, in the light of evidence that we have heard on the floor of the house, that the government did not act soon enough. It did not go into the situation thoroughly enough, and the west suffered mightily because of the want of aggressiveness and because of the passivity on the part of this government. The government did not act with the dispatch which the pressure of the moment demanded.

And now, I shall voice the protest of hundreds of thousands of Canadians against the present radio situation. First of all, I refer to the increase in licence fee from $2 to $2.50, and in the second place to the impost of $2.50 for each additional radio in the home and for radios in motor cars. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), speaking the other day, hit the nail on the head when he said that it was a nuisance tax and that the people regarded it as such. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was looked upon with a good deal of kindness for a while when it was dependent upon the good will of the people, but it is losing that good will quickly. But there is another question: Why should the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, protected by government licence and supported by the people's funds, go into the radio business on a commercial basis and compete with privately owned radio stations who did the pioneering? Years ago when the radio was a new thing men had faith in it, to the extent of being willing to dig down into their pockets and establish a radio industry. Through the years the going was hard and they were in the red, but now that it appears that world trade is coming back and they have a chance to make money the government goes into the business. What would happen if the government went into the steel business and started to buy and sell steel? You know what would happen, Mr. Speaker, and so do I. This idea, of the government using radio as a commercial means of putting out of business established industry, is wrong.

Might I review briefly why the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was set up? It was established with the intention of providing competition for foreign broadcasts. It was argued that a broadcasting organization supported by the Canadian government, financed by revenues from listeners, and with its credit standing guaranteed by the government, could develop programs which would compare favourably with and therefore could compete with United States broadcasts. These programs were to be made available to Canadian radio stations. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was given wide powers, including power to refuse to any Canadian radio station the right to import any foreign program. I remember well two years ago that a great motor car company which has one of the finest broadcasts on the air desired to send that broadcast over Canadian airways. A Canadian radio station had the business initiative, the facilities and salesmanship to go out and sell that company. Then arrangements were made to broadcast the program over Canadian stations, all this to be subject to the approval of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. They applied to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and permission was refused. Months later I understand that another motor car manufacturer in the United States, which has a Canadian factory and employs Canadian workmen, wanted to broadcast a radio program in Canada. A Canadian station applied to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the right to use that program, and was refused.

Now what has happened? The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in its search for further revenue is now doing exactly what it formerly would not permit the private station to do for the same purpose. Further, the corporation I understand is offering United States agencies special concessions in the form of corporation networks at a combined cost far below the normal time charges of these stations, also line facilities at less than normal cost. These concessions are being made to attract foreign broadcasts to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation stations, and, mark you, the deficit is being paid from my $2.50 and the $2.50 of the poor fellow making $18 a week, who has just as much right to radio as anyone, if our standard of living is to be kept up. Why the right about face?

Now my time is almost up; so let me briefly summarize what I have said about the present radio set-up in Canada. First, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation imports foreign broadcasts for its own network, which privilege has long been denied the private stations. Second, the corporation establishes powerful broadcasting stations but will not permit the private station to increase its power; therefore it cannot compete. Third, the corporation offers sponsors the facilities of these stations, its networks and line facilities, at less than normal cost. Fourth, the non-Canadian activities of this corporation are made possible and the payment of the deficit incurred by a licence fee of $2.50 for each individual radio, which is an imposition and a nuisance tax that should be withdrawn altogether.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I have the friendliest feelings for the people of the United States of America—part of my family live there, although they are Canadian born—and I think it is very fine that we can have the friendliest of intercourse with that great English-speaking country. But, sir, I deplore the fact that a responsible Canadian journal, the Financial Post, can truthfully say, in black headlines, a thing we cannot deny—"United States speaks—Canada listens!"

Mr. F. D. MacKENZIE (Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, first I offer my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Then, sir, I wish to speak briefly on one or two subjects that have been discussed during this last week. First, I should like to make some observations on unemployment and relief, chiefly as relating to the province of Manitoba and more particularly the constituency I have the honour to represent.

Manitoba is still an agricultural province, and as such there will always be a seasonal fluctuation in employment. Under normal conditions there is always a part of the year when employment is active, that is during seeding and still more during harvesting and threshing; also there is a period when employment on the farm is slack. That will always be the case unless there is some change in the set-up, as would now appear to be working itself out, for due to the more extensive mechanization of farming the labour requirements even during the busy season are much less than they were in the past. In spite of that, if it had not been for the help of men from Saskatchewan, Manitoba would have been short of labour during the last harvest season. Farmers from the drought area of Saskatchewan poured into Manitoba last year, and the stream even trickled through to Ontario, as I found in more than one part of this province last autumn. But the fact remains that while in the city of Winnipeg many men were unemployed and on relief the country was short-handed and would have suffered had it not been for the drought in Saskatchewan which allowed the farmers from that province and their sons to come to the assistance of Manitoba farmers.

If we leave out of the picture the drought area in Saskatchewan and Alberta, has there ever been more employment in Canada at this season of the year than there is this year? That does not mean that I am satisfied with the situation; I just put the question. I repeat what I said at the outset, that Manitoba being largely a farming province will continue to have these seasonal fluctuations. Normally more men are required in the summer than in the winter. This has always been the case and will continue to be so under the set-up we have now. What is to be done about the matter? Is the cure to be found in establishing more secondary industries in the west? I do not think so, because men employed in factories would not be available on the farms unless the factories worked only in the winter, which of course is not feasible. The cure is to be found in something which will put the farmers in such a financial position that they will be able to hire men for longer periods, that is, to hire permanent help.

In the old days, before the advent of direct relief on the present scale, men went out from the towns and cities to work on the land during the summer months. Then in many cases they went back to the cities, doing little or no work all winter. Some would go to the woods for the winter, but there never has been in Canada sufficient lumbering and allied work to take up the slack of winter unemployment, especially on the prairies. I remember that in Ontario, when I was a boy here, many of the young men in our community would follow the work of sailing on the great lakes. As a rule they did not work in the winter; in the great majority of cases they would lay up. I suppose the nearest we have come to taking up this winter slack in employment in Canada has been during the several railroad building periods of the past.

The point I wish to stress is that before the present period of depression and large scale direct relief, men never thought of going on relief even though conditions in regard to employment were no better than, or not as good as, they have been during the present winter. As hon. members know, people have gone to the cities and gone on relief, and they will not go on the land during the busy season. They prefer to remain on relief throughout the year. In that connection I want to say that the relief rates are so high in the cities that farmers cannot afford to pay men enough to compete with existing rates of relief. That is the case as between Winnipeg and rural Manitoba. I know a great number of cases in my own constituency, where men have come out from Winnipeg for harvest work, good farm labourers, men who should be living in the country instead of the city, because they know farm work better than city work, and who have gone back to the city because they could draw more in relief than they could make by working in the country. They have made that statement quite openly. A farmer cannot pay wages high enough to compete with the relief rates in the cities at the present time.

That is one side of the situation. There is another side to look at. During the last few years in the west the farmer has taken such a beating year after year that he has no reserve left. In a great many cases he may be actually gravely in debt. Much of his machinery is in bad repair; much of it is out of date, long past the time for replacement. Buildings are in need of paint and repairs, but the farmers are not in a position to hire men for the better part of the year. They have been hiring men only when they could not possibly get along without help, particularly for harvesting and threshing. Many have done without help altogether. Now that times are a little better for the man on the land, he may put some of his surplus into the new machine he needs so much. Then he may put a little into much needed repairs to his buildings. After that, if his taxes are paid, he can begin to think of hiring help for longer periods of time. Many of the farmers in our constituency would hire men if they were sure they would be able to pay them after harvesting their crops. That is what they have told me. That is why in Manitoba, and especially in our part of the country where a fair crop was harvested last year, some farmers did not hire help except for harvesting and threshing. Last summer they found it difficult to get men in the busy season, having waited too long. This was where the Saskatchewan men who came into the province at that time saved the situation.

It does create a problem when the farmers do not hire men right through the season but take them on for only short periods. First, it makes it difficult for the farmer himself to have any choice in his labour supply, for when he does need a man the supply is limited. In the second place it is very difficult for the labourer to carry on until he is again needed on the farm, and if he finds another job in the meantime he cannot be expected to throw it up in order to work for a few weeks on the farm.

The solution for this phase of the problem will be found only when the farmer himself is assured of a living wage, an income suited to his requirements. When you assure the farmer a fair return for his work you will automatically solve a great many of the other problems that are worrying us to-day. The hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) is right; put the primary producer on his feet and you will cure most of our economic ills.

To sum up that part of my argument, if Manitoba is to remain a farming province the position of the farmer must be improved, because labour cannot be employed unless the farmer can afford to hire labour continuously. So the farmer must be helped to attain a position where he can hire labour steadily.

Before leaving this point may I say in passing that there are a great many other families who, like the farmers, have fallen behind during the years of depression, and who will find it difficult to exist until they can again find steady employment at reasonably good wages. Many have used up what reserves they had, and at last have had to go on relief. Many, I know, have gone on fighting and have kept off relief. Many of those people deserve a better fate than a continuance of that grim struggle, and I think the government should do more rather than less in providing work for those who have kept off relief in spite of everything.

I should like to offer a suggestion to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) which will help in Manitoba. It is that public works coming under the dominion-provincial agreement, such as road work, should get under way earlier in the season and not late in July or August, as has been the case in the past. I know it is not the fault of the minister; but if that could be done, once seeding is finished men could go to work on the road projects. Then, these being completed, the harvest would come along and the farmers would be able to get men, while the men would continue to get jobs. This would do away with the conflict as between the farmer and the contractor for men for short periods in the summer and the resulting periods when neither the farmer nor the contractor is busy.

There has been an improvement in the Manitoba farm situation, but there is much leeway to make up. Several years like 1937 would do a great deal to put the country on its feet, provided other things were taken care of by the government. This brings me to another matter which has been discussed in the course of this debate and which I hope to have an opportunity of dealing with at greater length later in the session. It follows naturally and logically.

The speech from the throne mentioned the pending trade treaty between the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada. If I may judge from a survey of Canadian newspapers, there is little opposition to the treaty and much support. The treaties already consummated by this government and the moderate reductions that have been made in the tariff have been generally conceded to have assisted in building up our external trade to the point where we are in fourth position in the world in export trade. That that improved trade has had a beneficial effect on our whole national position is borne out in many ways and is so stated by many who are not avowed free traders. Mr. Wilson, President of the Royal Bank of Canada, had the following to say in his annual statement:

> Where the recent prosperity in the United States has been dependent mainly upon large-scale government deficits, the Canadian recovery took its origin from foreign trade. There was no single remedy to bring about improvement.

He mentions a number of possible remedies and then goes on:

> But these should be combined with exceptional efforts on the part of the government to open the doors to foreign markets.

And again:

> I view with satisfaction the present tendency among democratic countries to break down barriers impeding the natural flow of business.

He says a lot more which I shall skip. I should like to quote a report in the Ottawa Journal of January 28 of a speech by Mr. McLeod, President of the Bank of Nova Scotia, as follows:

> During 1937 there was a modest reduction in the barriers to international trade. Some countries, of which Canada was one, made significant if moderate decreases in their tariffs. New trade agreements were negotiated, of which that between Great Britain and Canada was among the more important. Some exchange controls were relaxed and according to League of Nations authorities the actual administration of such controls and clearing agreements was in many countries made less rigid.
> Now that the recovery in trade appears for the moment to have been interrupted, it is more important than ever that further steps should be taken to lower barriers which still obstruct the flow of goods from one country to another.
> The recent opening of trade negotiations between Great Britain and the United States is of the greatest significance. A treaty between these two countries would tend to reduce the barriers to trade over a very large part of the world. A truly successful agreement would hold vast promise for the further revival of trade and thus for the continuance of world recovery.

Mr. Speaker, it all seems very reasonable and very logical. Moderate tariff reductions by Canada would be followed by increased trade which would be followed by improved conditions of employment. All this would be to the general benefit of Canada. Does this not suggest that the reasonable and logical course to pursue is the further lowering of tariffs which would be followed by a further improvement in employment and in Canada's economic position? Mr. McLeod goes on to say:

> The price of success is a willingness to make concessions in the spirit of give and take, not only by the two parties directly involved but also by Canada and the other British dominions.

These two men cannot be accused of being free traders and yet they ask us to press on to lower tariffs in order to promote the common good of all. We can do this by trade agreements and we can do it in the ordinary way.

We look forward to the agreement mentioned in the speech from the throne with hopeful anticipation. We look forward to further reductions in our tariff structure so that improvement may continue until national prosperity is assured.

As I said before, a few more years like Manitoba had in 1937 would help to put the country on its feet. Two sections of my constituency were completely hailed out and of course the people suffered as a consequence, but the rest of the country enjoyed a comparatively good year. My constituency embraces one of the finest farming districts in the west, in fact anywhere in Canada, sloping as it does to the south and east from the Riding Mountain plateau. Each year of the three I have been a member of this house I have listened to eulogies on the county of Peel, a fine county which I know personally, but if the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) would come west and visit with me for several days I could show him a constituency the equal of his own in many ways, and the superior in others.

I could show him the district which produces the cream and butter which has for years led the province of Manitoba to the grand championship of Canada at all the large fairs. Manitoba has led all Canada since 1924 in the production of quality butter, and for the last several years the creameries of my constituency have led Manitoba to victory. Not only has the Gladstone creamery won the grand championship at the Canadian National Exhibition, but at the last three successive Royals it has captured supreme honours. It has taken those honours right from the front door of the county of Peel.

We also produce live stock which has competed with success at the larger fairs. What is more, our men and boys know their live stock. Of the Manitoba boys' and girls' clubs team at the Royal last year, the four boys in live stock judging were from my constituency. Our honey is of a much better quality than one can find here in Ontario, so much so that I bring my own supply with me each session.

But we have more than fine grain, live stock, butter and honey; we have admittedly some of the finest scenery in the country. I would like to take hon. members to the Riding mountain national park, down the east slope of the mountain. As the road winds slowly downward through the poplar, spruce and birch, now on the edge of a precipitous cliff, now overlooking a deep ravine, we would see far below mile after mile of cultivated farm lands and away on to where the far horizon blends into lake Manitoba's waters. Some of those glorious vistas are comparable in kind and beauty, but more expansive, with some we have known in Italy. There are many other scenes which might well make one, on viewing them, imagine himself in bonnie Scotland.

But my time is going and I should like to touch on just one more of the subjects mentioned in the speech from the throne. It gave me pleasure to note that there was to be an expansion in the program of youth training. That is as it should be. The work last year was to some extent in the nature of an experiment, but it proved so successful in our province that its extension is amply justified. I do not know just how much the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) will expand or extend his program, but he can be assured of my complete support even to the limit of the greatest burst of generosity by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). I do not intend to say more on this now, but I hope to join in the discussion when it comes again before the house.

I cannot, Mr. Speaker, support the amendment.

Mr. F. C. BETTS (London): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my own words of congratulation to those we have heard already to the mover (Mr. Francœur) and the seconder (Mr. Warren) of the motion now being debated. With most of what they said I am in active disagreement, but nevertheless I should like to felicitate them on the graceful manner in which they performed their duties.

At the outset of my remarks, which will be very brief, I too should like to register, as a representative of a riding in which a great many people are engaged in the manufacture and distribution of radios, a strong protest against the increase in the radio licence fee. This added tax, to my way of thinking, is objectionable for a number of reasons. In the first place, it will retard the sale of sets, particularly what are described as secondary sets, that is the small sets, such as are used on the mantel, and in a motor car. In the second place, it is going to place on the Canadian radio audience a burden which is entirely disproportionate to the benefits, if any, that we derive from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Finally, it is a tax which invites evasion and dishonesty, in that the honest taxpayer will declare his extra sets and pay the very considerably increased tax on each one, while the dishonest taxpayer will conceal his extra sets and evade the tax. Last, and most important of all is the consideration that by this additional impost the government is seriously obstructing an inexpensive source of amusement, relaxation and education which in the past has been available to hundreds of thousands of people in this country who because of their limited means would otherwise enjoy the minimum of these blessings. For these reasons I feel the government might as well cancel the increase at once.

I should like to read the paragraph in the speech from the throne which states:

> The strains and stresses, which economic and social developments since confederation have placed upon Canada's governmental structure, have disclosed the necessity for adjustments which will enable it the more effectively to serve provincial and national needs, and to promote and preserve Canadian unity.

With that statement, Mr. Speaker, no one can be in disagreement, and I would venture to suggest to the government of the day a few methods by which the strains and stresses under which we are suffering may be, in part at least, lessened, by which the national need can be better served, and by which Canadian unity may be promoted and preserved.

There is one means which would go a long way towards these very desirable ends, and that is based upon the fact, which we all admit, that to-day we live in an age when propaganda is more powerful and more prevalent than ever before in the world's history. The spoken word and the written word have more power to-day than they have had at any time in the past. That being the case, any measure which will tend to facilitate the means whereby our national hopes, our national problems, our national aspirations, are disseminated will be a measure tending to preserve and promote Canadian unity, and any measure which makes against the establishment of a Canadian literature will be very much opposed to these objects.

I should like to point out that when the former government was in office there was, until 1935, a tax on magazines entering this country from the United States. That tax was removed when the present government assumed office, and the result of its removal has been a tremendous influx of publications, periodicals and magazines, in which the Canadian viewpoint finds no place whatever. Many of them contain a great deal of active pro-American and anti-Canadian propaganda. Most of them are, to use a colloquialism, tripe, devoted in the main to cheap sensationalism and pallid pornography. Many of them are decidedly harmful and objectionable, taking into consideration the fact that many of these publications inevitably fall into the hands of our young people. To show the rate of increase of this undesirable type of literature, in 1935 when the duty was on, we imported United States magazines to a value of $2,625,000. The tax was removed, and next year the total value jumped to $4,037,000; last year it was up to $5,900,000. I made some inquiries recently, Mr. Speaker, of a very large and very reputable concern, whose business is the distribution of magazines and publications, and I find that they listed and carried in their stock what they described as 1,000 "titles"; that is to say, 1,000 separate magazines and periodicals. Of these only 2½ per cent were Canadian; some 35 to 40 per cent originated in the British Isles, and the balance, or roughly 60 per cent, were of United States origin. That is a situation which the government could very readily and simply correct, and I would urge the government in the interests of Canadian unity, with the idea of encouraging our people to do more Canadian reading and more Canadian thinking, to reimpose that salutary tax which existed in 1935.

Another effective manner of promoting Canadian unity is to foster and protect to an adequate extent our Canadian industries. I am not one who is opposed in any sense of the word to foreign trade, nor are such views held by the party of which I have the honour to be a member. But I do appreciate the immense importance to this country of our domestic and imperial markets. Coming from a riding which, as I have said, is industrial, I have seen for myself the benefits which industrial workers there and in every part of the dominion have derived from the empire trade agreements of 1932. Those agreements are just as good as they ever were, and I submit to the government with all the emphasis at my command that in the revision of the Canada-United States treaty which is now being considered they must do nothing to weaken the empire trade agreements. I urge the government not to give away any of our empire preferences. If they follow my suggestions in this connection they will do much to promote and preserve Canadian unity; they will serve the national need, and they will relieve our body politic of some of the strains and stresses from which we are suffering.

Turning to another paragraph of the speech, I note the mention, and a very proper one, of the coronation ceremonies. That event has been described as one of special significance, and we are all in entire agreement with that expression. On that occasion our young king and his young queen assumed staggering responsibilities, of which they have since discharged themselves royally and magnificently. On that occasion all parts of the empire were represented. It was the greatest festival of empire the world has ever seen. It was an opportunity for every part of the empire to advertise itself before a great cloud of witnesses. I call to mind the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), with which I am in full agreement, as to the desirability of this dominion advertising its products in London to the very best possible advantage. The coronation ceremonies afforded Canada, along with the other dominions, a golden opportunity of advertising its greatest national product, its manhood. We were honoured along with the other parts of the empire by an invitation to send a delegation to represent Canada.

Let us see how the government availed itself of that opportunity and how they proceeded in their selection of Canada's contingent. In the first place, they made a ruling that representatives should attend the ceremony from our naval, militia and air services and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—an eminently proper ruling. A delegation was built up totalling three hundred and fifty-one. It was composed of thirty from the naval services, two hundred and fifty-six from the militia services, thirty from the air services, and thirty-five from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Let me say before I go any further, in order that no misunderstandings may arise, that the representatives of the mounted police, I am told by every one who was at the ceremony, were a credit to their corps, to their commissioner, and to their country. I have heard them described time after time as the smartest uniformed men in the coronation procession.

I propose to deal with the representatives of the militia service—a subject in which I have a particular interest, having served for some time in the Canadian militia. Let us examine that militia contingent of two hundred and fifty-six with the idea of seeing how it was made up as to ranks. It is a question, no doubt, that must have given the government some thought. I shall not weary you, Mr. Speaker, by detailing all the various ranks; I shall simply say that in that contingent there were thirty-two gunners, privates and bandsmen, and the balance of the contingent, two hundred and twenty-four, consisted of officers and non-commissioned officers. I do not know what precedent the government followed in arriving at that quota.

I think it is of interest to see how some of our military formations are made up as far as the matter of rank is concerned, and I would place on the record a few figures as to the constitution of an infantry battalion on a peace-time basis. I take an infantry rifle battalion as being typical. The total of all ranks of such a unit is four hundred and seventy, and of these there are two hundred and thirty-four private soldiers. In other words, as near as a toucher, there is one private soldier for each other soldier of higher rank. I would draw to your attention, sir, that in the coronation detachment, for every private soldier—and I speak still of the militia detachment—there were seven soldiers of higher rank to every private. As a result of that somewhat top-heavy constitution of the militia detachment, some strange things followed. I should like to read an article from The Legionary of July, 1937, entitled "Tickled Tommies":

> Canadians could be very proud of the military bearing of the dominion's contingent, declared Colonel J. E. L. Streight, M.C., M.P., commandant of the Canadian coronation contingent, on his return from England last month. The Canadian guard at Buckingham palace was mounted with only one day's notice in advance, and it was conceded that the Canadians turned out as smart a guard as the British regulars, Colonel Streight said.
> There were one or two amusing incidents in connection with the Buckingham palace guard duty.
> "Before we mounted guard, sentry duty there had never been done by warrant officers, and a special order had to be issued by the War Office to permit Canadian N.C.O's to perform the duty of a private soldier. It was necessary because of all our contingent of 359 there were only five privates. British Tommies were tickled to see regimental sergeant-majors and other high-ranking warrant officers doing sentry duty like private soldiers," Colonel Streight related.

I can only say that British Tommies and others may have been tickled to see an entire reversal of what is usual in important military duties, especially when these duties were being carried out at the king's front door. But if I may speak for many people who were anxious to see the best possible, the most military and the smartest detachment representing Canada on that important occasion, these people—many hundreds of thousands of them—were not and are not tickled by that extraordinary situation. Dealing still with the claim made by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Streight), who commanded the Canadian contingent on the occasion in question, that the Canadian guards were as smart as the British regulars, I would refer hon. members to the coronation number of the Illustrated London News of May 22, 1937. It is in the parliamentary reading room and they can get it there. There is probably no publication that has a wider circulation in every part of the British Empire than the Illustrated London News, and at page 955 hon. members will find a picture with the following letterpress beneath it:

The first dominion troops to guard the royal palaces: Canadians relieving the Welsh guards. On May 9, for the first time in history, dominion troops mounted guard at British royal palaces. Precedence was accorded to the Canadian coronation contingent as representing the oldest dominion. They took over from the Welsh guards at fourteen posts (seven at Buckingham palace and seven at St. James's palace) for six hours.

If hon. members will examine the picture they will see that it shows a sentry being posted for guard duty, and being instructed in his duty; and standing beside him is the sentry whom he is about to relieve. The sentry who is being posted and instructed is a Canadian sergeant-major, who, as hon. members know, is a very high-ranking non-commissioned officer. He is being instructed in his duties by a Canadian corporal, an extremely junior non-commissioned officer. That, I submit, is making a farce of what should be a solemn occasion, and there was no necessity for it except for the fact that the government chose to leave all privates at home except thirty-two. I make these remarks not with any pleasure whatever, but simply because I regard it as a duty that should be performed. Nor do I know who the sergeant-major is. He may have a fine military record, or a fine political record; I do not know anything about that. But he is not a smart and soldierly figure. His greatcoat is pulled all awry; he stands a foot shorter than the imperial soldier whom he is relieving; and he has a bulge in front, which, to put it mildly, suggests that for a soldier doing sentry duty outside his majesty's palace he is in a very interesting condition.

In all seriousness, I am going to submit to the government that to choose a contingent, in which private soldiers were represented, on the scale of one to seven, is the antithesis of democracy, and the quintessence of fascism. I say further that the adoption of any system whereby the plums go to the high-ranking men, "and to blazes with the men in the ranks," will do more than anything else, not to promote and preserve national unity, but to prevent and to destroy it. It will do more towards that end than anything I can imagine. I would say, furthermore, that it should have been obvious to the meanest intellect; it should have been obvious to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), that the private soldier, the man in the low-paid ranks, was least able to pay his way to this great festival of empire, while the high-ranking officers were best able to go at their own expense.

I remember that in the course of the last election campaign there was a grandiose and grandiloquent book displayed on the newsstands, selling for $1 or more. It was called The Liberal Way, and I am told on very good authority by my publisher friends that it can now be picked up in any departmental store for fourteen cents. I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, if the manner in which Canada's coronation contingent was selected was the Liberal way, the book is grossly overpriced at fourteen cents. I would not give the Prime Minister's favourite price of five cents for it; in fact, I would not take it as a gift.

On motion of Mr. Turgeon the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 8, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

PROPOSED APPLICATION OF CROWSNEST PASS RATES ON GRAIN WESTWARD AS WELL AS EASTWARD

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 18, to amend the Railway Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. REID: Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to amend the Railway Act so as to give to the people of British Columbia equal treatment with respect to rates on grain and grain products to that enjoyed by the people of Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes. It is the same bill that I have introduced into this house in each of the past four years.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE NEW TESTAMENT

REPORTED REFUSAL TO PERMIT DISTRIBUTION IN QUEBEC CITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). Has the government any statement to make regarding the refusal of the authorities to permit officials of the Baptist church to distribute copies of the New Testament in the city of Quebec, and particularly with reference to the statement by Superintendent H. R. Gagnon, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who is reported as having said, "The general practice is to withhold permission."

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should merely say that the government has no statement to make with regard to the matter, but obviously my hon. friend is actuated in directing his question to me because the name of Superintendent Gagnon, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, is mentioned. Superintendent Gagnon is now Chief of Police of the city of Quebec. Under an arrangement between the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the city of Quebec, he has been lent for a certain time for the purpose of reorganizing the municipal police force. He is paid by the city of Quebec; he is a servant of the city, and does not take any direction from the head of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police so long as he is acting in his present position. The matter to which my hon. friend has referred is obviously one of municipal regulations, and Superintendent Gagnon has acted, no doubt, under instructions from the city.

PARLIAMENT HILL

QUESTION WITH RESPECT TO ICY CONDITION OF GROUNDS AND SIDEWALKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask the government a question in reference to the dangerous condition of the sidewalks and roads, and of the rink, in front of Parliament hill. Members have some privileges, and the men and women who use this building should be afforded some protection. We are not all good skaters, like those on the front benches opposite. We have a fifteen million dollar building, and there seems to be only a few dollars to spend on sand. I would ask what action will be taken by the government to remedy the present dangerous conditions. Anybody who gets injured will have no action for damages sustained on crown property. It is disgraceful.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have no information to give to my hon. friend at the moment, but I shall look into the matter and give a reply to-morrow.

Mr. CHURCH: Why not distribute some skates and skis and toboggans?

Mr. RINFRET: I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, with your permission, that if the hon. gentleman would give notice of his questions in advance, he would stand a better chance of getting an immediate reply.

Mr. CHURCH: Everybody is not a Canadian hockey player.

VALIDITY OF DOMINION ACTS

REQUEST FOR SHORTHAND REPORT OF ARGUMENTS BEFORE PRIVY COUNCIL RESPECTING 1935 STATUTES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) if there is available in his department a shorthand report of the arguments before the privy council on the hearings of the several statutes passed in 1935, and if so, would it be convenient for him to lay that report on the table of the house? If that is not deemed expedient, perhaps he would make the report available to me and other members who care to read it.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Yes, I believe we have in the department a shorthand report of the argument on all those cases. I shall be pleased to arrange for my hon friend to see it.

VALIDITY OF QUEBEC STATUTE

QUESTION OF DISALLOWANCE OF "ACT RESPECTING COMMUNISTIC PROPAGANDA"

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I desire to correct a statement which I made in the course of my remarks on Friday. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) asked me when would the year expire for possible action by the governor in council on a certain Quebec statute, and I said, "at the end of March." I had in mind that the statute was assented to at the end of March; but under the British North America Act the delay starts only from the reception by the secretary of state of an authentic copy of the provincial statute, and that was received on July 8.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps the minister will permit me to ask him a question arising out of that. I think he will find that it is a year from the date of the reception of the statute by the governor general, the words "governor general" being substituted for the king and a secretary of state. But the question I desire to ask is this. Would the minister or the government be prepared to hear representations, either to the cabinet as a whole or to a committee of the cabinet, by way of argument as to why the legislation should be disallowed?—and the government at Quebec could probably be afforded an opportunity to present any arguments it might desire to make contrary to that contention. That has been done frequently with cases that were of great importance and highly controversial; the government usually has set up a committee presided over by the Minister of Justice, with the legal members of the cabinet, to hear argument for or against the disallowance of the legislation in question. I just ask the minister if he sees any reason why that should not be done in this case, but perhaps it is not fair to expect him to answer at the moment; he might desire to look into the precedents.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: He may treat this as notice for that purpose. I had intended speaking to him about it, but I heard that he was going to make a statement, so I did not do so.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): As far as my own experience is concerned we have always declined to receive delegations.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, not delegations.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): These matters have been dealt with on written brief and representations sent to the Department of Justice. However, I shall be pleased to look into the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: As to the remark of the right hon. gentleman with respect to a delegation, that was not at all what I had in mind; it was a question of receiving arguments from counsel for or against disallowance, based upon the question of legality on the one hand and policy on the other. That was done to my knowledge in one case with which I am familiar, and, I think, in another as well, the committee which heard it being, if my memory serves me, the lawyers of the cabinet, presided over by the Minister of Justice.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, February 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. N. Francœur for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Bennett.

[Mr. Bennett].

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): I rise to take part in this debate for the purpose of correcting various misstatements that have been made by a few hon. members in discussing radio broadcasting, and to answer unfounded statements that are being currently circulated inside and outside this house.

All hon. gentlemen are well aware that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is an autonomous body created by act of parliament. The corporation has full authority to plan and carry out policies within the scope of its act and within the funds which by the act are placed at its disposal. The Minister of Transport is designated by the act as the means of communication from the corporation to the government and to parliament. I think it is unfortunate in many ways that a member of the board of governors of the corporation cannot himself be the spokesman in parliament, but as this is impracticable, I assume it to be my duty to correct misstatements as they occur in this house.

It is a happy reflection on parliament that the subject of radio broadcasting has never been used for purposes of party advantage. There have been three committees of parliament on this subject, and the findings of all three were unanimous. Two bills affecting radio broadcasting have passed the house, in both cases unanimously. In the debate which instituted broadcasting as a public service, hon. members in all parts of the house took part, and all favoured the bill.

Perhaps I can summarize the purposes which promoted the founding of public control of broadcasting by reading short extracts from two or three of the speeches made on that occasion. The first is from the speech of the then prime minister, which summarized admirably the reasons why legislation for public ownership was adopted:

> No other scheme than that of public ownership can ensure to the people of this country, without regard to class or place, equal enjoyment of the benefits and pleasures of radio broadcasting. Private ownership must necessarily discriminate between densely and sparsely populated areas. This is not a correctable fault in private ownership; it is an inescapable and inherent demerit of that system. It does not seem right that in Canada the towns should be preferred to the countryside or prosperous communities to those less fortunate. In fact if no other course were possible, it might be fair to suggest that it should be the other way about. Happily, however, under this system, there is no need for discrimination; all may be served alike. Equality of service is assured by the plan which calls for a chain of high power stations throughout Canada.

The opposition spokesman was the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who said:

I just wish to endorse the views expressed by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, to say that I am in full accord with the principle embodied in this bill. I have been supporting this principle from the first, more particularly after the work of the Aird commission, but I knew the difficulties in the way and the strength of the propaganda carried on to prevent the work of that commission from having the results which we have witnessed to-day.

I am pleased with the work which was done by the committee which has been studying this question, and I congratulate the members of that committee on the excellent work which they did. I congratulate the house upon having this bill introduced at the present session, and I congratulate the people of Canada on the principle which is represented in the bill.

The third party was spoken for by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who said:

I should just like to associate myself with the last speaker (Mr. Lapointe) in congratulating the Prime Minister on his promptness in bringing down this bill to implement the report which has been unanimously adopted.

Perhaps I may take two or three moments to give a brief outline of the development of public broadcasting in Canada. At the time the Aird commission was appointed to study the matter, about fifty per cent of the broadcasting strength of Canada was represented by four privately owned stations, two in Toronto and two in Montreal. Each of these stations was attached to a United States broadcasting chain, and the programs broadcast over them were almost entirely of United States origin. Apart from these cities very few communities were served by radio. The Aird commission, composed of Sir John Aird as chairman, and Mr. Augustin Frigon and Mr. C. A. Bowman, made a thorough investigation of the whole situation. The commission took evidence in Canada and in the United States and travelled in Europe, and after much study brought down a comprehensive report. The recommendations of the commission were, briefly, that the control and operation of radio broadcasting in Canada be made a public utility, and that the government should establish its own high power broadcasting stations so that complete coverage of Canada would be obtained by this means.

The report was brought in too late for the then government to implement it, and it was not until 1932 that a parliamentary committee was set up to review the subject again. That parliamentary committee brought down a report which was the basis of the broadcasting act of 1932. In 1934 a second parliamentary committee studied the question and again brought in a report, suggesting revisions of the commission plan of management and a return to the basis recommended in the Aird report. However, no change was made at that time. In 1936 a third parliamentary committee studied the subject and brought in a unanimous report which was made the basis of the present broadcasting act. The act now in force was studied by that committee and recommended by it to this house after it had unanimously approved the draft bill.

The revenues of the corporation were provided, at first, by a licence fee of one dollar, which was in force for the period prior to the establishment of public broadcasting, and the proceeds of which were used for a very important service that is apt to be forgotten now—the elimination of interference with broadcasting. A considerable expenditure, some $300,000 I believe, is made each year on this service, and I can tell the house that without the abolition of interference with broadcasting there would be very little reception in any part of Canada to-day, even in the large cities. It is a most important work, and if the service were relaxed for two or three years broadcasting would rapidly become impossible.

The Aird report recommended that revenue to carry out the public ownership program should be provided, first from a licence fee of $3 per radio set, second, from advertising revenue to the amount of $700,000, together with a grant from the dominion government of $1,000,000 per annum. It was estimated, I believe, that the funds from these three sources would amount to about $3,500,000 per annum. As I stated, a radio fee of one dollar was put into effect in the initial period. When broadcasting was set up as a public service the fee was raised to two dollars and at that figure it has remained.

During the current fiscal year about 1,150,000 persons will pay licences of two dollars, and the sum realized, less the cost of collecting these licences, that will accrue to the broadcasting corporation from this source, will approximate closely $2,000,000. The corporation will earn this year about $350,000 from all commercial sources, and that is the highest level of commercial revenue that the corporation has received to date. It is not the desire or intention of the corporation at any time to obtain a revenue of over $500,000 from commercial sources for reasons that are obvious.

The mandate given to the broadcasting corporation set up by the last broadcasting act was detailed in the report of the committee on radio for 1936. It recommended (a) "that a public corporation, modelled more closely on the lines of a private corporation, but with adequate powers to control, for purposes of coordination, all broadcasting, both public and private, be set up to replace the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission;" (b) "that this corporation be known as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, to be managed by a general manager as chief executive, and an assistant general manager, and directed as to policy by a non-partisan board of nine directors or governors, chosen in order to give representation to all parts of Canada;" and (c) "that the corporation immediately consider ways and means of extending national coverage."

It is that last mandate to which I wish to call attention. One of the first acts of the newly constituted broadcasting corporation was to make a coverage survey of Canada. That coverage survey disclosed that less than fifty per cent of the population of Canada had adequate coverage from existing sources. The corporation had certain funds at its disposal under the broadcasting act; it had also the privilege of borrowing from the dominion government the sum of $500,000 as a repayable loan. With that amount and with some $200,000 saved from current revenues, the corporation set about carrying out its mandate to establish high-power broadcasting stations. Two of these stations have been built, each of 50 kilowatt capacity, one near Montreal and one near Toronto. These stations were undertaken first because, through them, efficient coverage could be provided for a maximum number of listeners.

The corporation wishes to continue to carry out its mandate and establish adequate coverage by building two more stations and improving certain other properties where equipment is obsolete. With that in mind its governors have recommended to the government that the radio fee be now increased from $2 to $2.50, and that fees be collected for each radio set rather than from each owner of one or more radio sets. The main purpose, as I say, is to provide revenue sufficient to justify the expense of establishing two high-powered stations in sparsely settled areas of this dominion. In addition to the fifty cent increase in licence fee, another repayable loan of $500,000 will be required. In reviewing the work of the corporation and the results accomplished to date it seems to me that the request of the corporation is a reasonable one.

Also let me say that there is an urgency for the completion of coverage which it is well to draw to the attention of the house. In 1932 the distribution of wave lengths between the countries of North America was considered by an international conference. A division was made by which Canada received the use of six exclusive wave lengths; the United States received certain others, as did also other countries. In addition to these exclusive wave lengths Canada secured the partial use of other wave lengths, suitable for low-powered stations. Within a year or two broadcasters desiring to establish high-powered stations and not able to obtain wave lengths in the United States discovered that Mexico was not a party to this international agreement, and that the Canadian channels were not being used by high-powered stations, so these men simply moved over to Mexico and established high-power stations there using exclusive Canadian channels. The result has been that not one of the six channels allotted to us is free from interference from Mexican sources. The interference from Mexican sources conflicts seriously with the coverage of the Canadian stations using those channels.

As a result of this interference Canada has protested vigorously to the other countries which are parties to the convention. Preliminary conversations were held with our near neighbours at a conference at Havana some months ago, and about six or seven weeks ago a full conference of all American countries was held at Havana. At that time a new allocation of wave lengths was made. Instead of six clear channels Canada secured seven, and also secured a more favourable distribution of partly used channels. But this stipulation was made, and I think for a good reason, that unless Canada would proceed to establish on each of these exclusive wave lengths a radio station of at least 50,000 watts power the other countries would not guarantee that that wave length would remain exclusive to Canada. It was pointed out to our delegates at that conference that Canada was at fault if its exclusive wave lengths had been interfered with, because Canada had not made anything like adequate use of them. Therefore the matter is urgent because the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is under compulsion to complete the establishment of its high-powered stations on the newly acquired wave lengths. The corporation has laid down the policy that if funds can be made available the high-powered stations necessary for complete coverage will be built within the next year. It has shown to me conclusively that the funds from the sources I have mentioned will be adequate to complete the work, and no one can see any reason to anticipate that funds from any source other than those mentioned will at any time be required to enable the corporation to carry out its functions in the years to come.

I wish at this time to discuss a matter which has been the subject of much misrepresentation both in the house and outside, the use of American programs. I shall tell you how the ninety-eight hours of operation per week of the network are divided. Let me say that a sustaining program means a program devoid of advertising—having no advertising of any kind, direct or indirect; a commercial program means a program which contains advertising in varying amounts. Of the ninety-eight hours broadcasting on the network, fifty-seven and one quarter hours are given up to Canadian programs free from advertising, three and one-quarter hours are occupied by commercial programs originating in Canada, and seventeen and one-half hours are devoted to American programs free from advertising. Programs originating in the British Isles, and free from advertising, account for twelve hours, a German program occupies half an hour, and advertising programs originating in the United States occupy eight and three-quarter hours. The total percentage occupied by non-advertising programs is 87·8. The present American commercial programs have for some years been distributed in Montreal, Toronto and Windsor.

Mr. LAWSON: Would the minister be good enough to identify the week of which he is giving an analysis?

Mr. HOWE: It is any week within the last five. I am speaking now of the chain.

There has been a good deal of misrepresentation about the distribution over station CBL, so perhaps I might give the distribution there. CBL is an individual station operated by the corporation, forming part of the chain of the corporation, but of course it operates for longer hours than the chain. The network operates twelve hours a day, and this station I suppose is on the air some eighteen or twenty hours a day, therefore it has more advertising programs than the chain. However, the total commercials on CBL (Toronto) represent thirty-five per cent of the total time of that station. American commercials represent eighteen per cent of the time, and Canadian commercials seventeen per cent.

In one of our great financial journals there was published a chart showing the American programs, and at the bottom of this chart there appeared the words "The flood of American advertising coming into Canada." It stated that forty-three per cent of the programs on CBL are American advertising programs.

Mr. DUNNING: Where is station CBL situated?

Mr. HOWE: At Toronto. The fact is that American commercial programs make up eighteen per cent of the time and American sustaining programs twenty-five per cent of the time of that station.

Now let me say something about these American programs. As you know, a sustaining program is one put on purely for entertainment purposes. It carries no advertising and mentions no sponsor, but is simply put on for the benefit of the listeners; and, as I say, some fifty-seven per cent of the programs over the Canadian chain are of this type, made in Canada. But may I say that each of the three commercial chains in the United States produce sustaining programs for their listeners. For example the National Broadcasting Company pays the Metropolitan Opera Company a very substantial sum for the privilege of broadcasting the Saturday afternoon performances of that company. The Columbia Broadcasting System pays the New York Philharmonic orchestra a very substantial sum in order to broadcast the performance of that orchestra for two hours on Sunday afternoons. Similarly the Mutual chain supplies certain sustaining programs to please its listeners.

The competition for quality in these sustaining programs is strenuous. A recent development has been that the National Broadcasting Company has retained the services of the great conductor Arturo Toscanini to form an orchestra of his own, to be composed of the best musicians obtainable in New York and that vicinity, to broadcast a series of ten concerts exclusively for the radio. I was told by the president of the National Broadcasting Company that his company is paying Toscanini and his artists $450,000 for organizing this orchestra and presenting these ten programs exclusively for radio broadcasting.

This type of programs makes up the seventeen hours of sustaining programs that we obtain from the United States. The Metropolitan Opera broadcast takes about three hours a week. The broadcast of the New York Philharmonic on Sunday afternoon takes about two hours. The Toscanini program on Saturday evening takes about one and one-half hours, and any musician will tell you that in the matter of perfection of technique the Toscanini program is the finest musical feature that can be heard anywhere on this continent and perhaps anywhere in the world.

These American sustaining programs are for the most part musical programs. Since when was music anything but international? When we listen to the Metropolitan Opera what artists do we hear? Are they American? Yes, a few of them are, but we hear also Italian, German, French and perhaps Brazilian artists as well; we hear artists from every corner of the world. Is the music they play American music? No, it is probably German, Italian, French or Spanish music, with an occasional American composition. So I ask if bringing in the music of the Metropolitan Opera can be called flooding Canada with American propaganda. What nonsense!

We listen to the music of the New York Philharmonic. Who is the conductor of that orchestra? The regular conductor is John Barbirolli, who came to America from Leeds, England. Only a few Mondays ago as guest conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony I heard our own Sir Ernest MacMillan, and at other times we hear distinguished guest conductors from every part of the world. I ask if there is anything offensive to Canadian listeners in accepting that kind of program from the United States? I could go on and give other examples, but I do not think I need labour the point. However, I do say that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation makes no apologies to the Canadian people for bringing them these seventeen hours of American sustaining programs.

One other point I think should be cleared up now. I noticed a question on the order paper asking how much Canada pays the United States for the programs brought into this country. That question of course will be answered in the usual way, but I can say now that Canada pays nothing at all in dollars and cents. No single dollar of ours goes to pay for a program brought in from the United States. But we are not accepting favours from the United States in taking those programs. We have an exchange arrangement with each of the great national chains, which they are just as glad to make as we are, under which those United States chains take our sustaining programs in exchange for their own. I checked up the hours of Canadian programs taken by the great United States chains, and I find they just about equal the hours we take from them. Last night we heard a peroration which concluded with the statement, "the United States speaks; Canada listens." That is true of certain hours. Of certain other hours it is equally true that Canada speaks and the United States listens. I am sorry that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Marsh) spoiled a very fine maiden speech by ending with such a phony peroration.

Now I come to the commercial programs. As I say, we take eight and three-quarter hours of commercial programs from the United States over our national chain, broadcasting from coast to coast. For broadcasting these programs we receive a gross payment of about $200,000, of which we pay about $80,000 to the stations that make up our chain as payment for the time used, and we net about $120,000 to the broadcasting corporation. The programs we take are chosen for their entertainment value, and I may add that we have been offered and have refused additional commercial programs for chain broadcasting which would have netted our corporation an additional amount of over $250,000. We refused them for the reason that they did not have the class of material that we cared to carry on our Canadian network.

The programs we do broadcast are the most popular programs broadcast in the United States as commercial features. The Charlie McCarthy program, to which reference has been made in this house, is considered the number one program over any American chain. Checks are made of the listeners to individual programs, and it has been shown that the average audience listening to that program whenever it is broadcast exceeds 33,000,000 persons. The cost of building that program, which lasts for one hour each week, is more than the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation can spend on its fifty-seven hours of sustaining programs. In other words more money is spent in building up that one program than we can spend in building up fifty-seven hours of broadcasting. It has been suggested in the house that we should build up a program to put on as a sustaining feature at the time the Charlie McCarthy program goes on. Who would listen to it? We have been doing that for years. The listeners insist on Charlie McCarthy, as has been demonstrated by the listener check-ups that have been made. The material used in the Charlie McCarthy program is, I think, to most people, exceedingly amusing, and therefore we carry that feature on the chain. By doing so we save the cost of building a program which otherwise would have to be provided for that hour.

It has been said that in connection with the cost of carrying programs we are discriminating in favour of United States advertisers. That is absolutely untrue. Rates for chain broadcasting are on the card and apply to any Canadian advertiser who wishes to obtain chain broadcasting privileges, just as they apply to United States sponsors. The rates for chain broadcasting are slightly lower than those applying to the individual stations. However that is only the wholesale rate as against the retail rate. May I say that from the point of view of financial returns we prefer the chain broadcast to the broadcast from an individual station, because the chain broadcast relieves us of the cost of building a sustaining program for the same period. The rates charged at each station are based on the coverage of that station, and rates in Canada generally, on the basis of coverage, are somewhat higher than those charged by stations in the United States.

For a moment let us look at the broadcasting situation from a common sense point of view. Anyone who has a family knows that, where radio is concerned, there is a wide variation in tastes. One man's radio meat is definitely another man's radio poison. For my own experience I draw on my own family. Occasionally all of us listen to the radio. I like almost any kind of music, provided it is played softly so as not to interrupt whatever else I may be doing. My wife prefers the operatic and symphonic concerts. My two boys, aged fifteen and twelve, go for the sports broadcasts; I refer to the broadcasts of hockey and football games and boxing matches. Those are the sports in which they take part and in listening to the play by play or blow by blow descriptions of the contests they get the same thrill as though they were participating. My two younger girls like the vaudeville. They would have been shocked had they heard the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Hyndman) refer to Bill Penner; they would have corrected him instantly, and he would have been told that it was Joe Penner. My older girl of fourteen years has graduated from the class which like vaudeville. She has moved in with her mother, and likes the better class of musical programs. For that I believe I owe a debt to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which makes it possible for us to have the variety of cultural and first class musical programs which come in over Canadian broadcasting stations.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): It will cost you $2.50, though, for each different taste.

Mr. HOWE: To work out our family situation I may say that it is necessary to have three radios in our house; otherwise there would be a conflict of interest. However, I will pay those three licence fees cheerfully, and I feel anyone else who wishes to avoid conflict at home might do likewise. I have always regarded the system which charged a two-dollar licence fee on a cheap crystal set, parts for which can be bought for fifty cents, and charged a similar fee for a householder owning four radio sets in his house, and one in his car, as one which discriminated in favour of people of ample means as against those of only limited means. I believe hon. members will agree with me that there would be greater justice in taxing the sets, rather than the houses in which the sets are contained.

The present attacks on the principle of public ownership are being made not because the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is a failure but because it is a success. The listening audience in Canada are turning their dials to programs of the corporation. I believe the reason is apparent, and can be readily demonstrated by any hon. member who wishes to try the experiment. If one were to leave his dial turned to a corporation station for the full twelve hour period of broadcast he would find a better average program than he would find if he turned on any other station for a similar continuous period. On that corporation station one finds the programs of ever increasing excellence built in Canada by the corporation. One finds, too, the best programs of the British Broadcasting Corporation, which, broadcast in the evening in England, are received here in the afternoon. We find the best of American sustaining programs, built in the United States, and such few United States commercial programs as have the highest entertainment value.

Naturally when the listening public turns to the publicly owned stations, the privately owned stations fight back. That is what is happening to-day. The fact that the chains are carrying a few of the outstanding advertising programs has caused certain newspapers and periodicals to fear the loss of national advertising revenue. Some of those papers are voicing severe criticism on their editorial pages. It is striking, however, to find that even where severe criticism of the policy is written on the editorial page, the radio page, either full or half size, carries a description of radio programs, and almost invariably those descriptions feature United States commercial broadcasts. So much for consistency in our press.

However, radio in Canada will not be judged by speeches made in parliament, nor will it be judged by the editorials written in our newspapers. It will be judged by the programs that come daily into our homes from the publicly owned stations. Of the verdict, I think, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation need have no fear. In advocating the carrying out of the recommendations of that corporation in the direction of the additional revenues they require to complete the plan of nationalization of radio started in 1928, I have every confidence the people of Canada will approve the recommendations I am making to the government of which I have the honour to be a member.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very attentively to the speech just delivered by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe), and in my opinion it was timely and effective. The most amazing thing to me in the whole controversy with respect to the fifty cent increase in radio licences is the fact that when the public are receiving something in return for a fee, and they are asked to pay an increase of twenty-five per cent, there is a great howl from certain quarters, but when, on the other hand, the government levies an indirect tax which takes many dollars each year from the pockets of individuals, we never hear a murmur. This shows the difference in effect between direct and indirect taxation.

I wonder whether those who to-day are criticizing the activities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are entirely disinterested in their criticism. I had no intention of speaking on this question, but I do appreciate the great improvement that has taken place in the programs and service which have been given to the Canadian public since the present corporation took over the management of our radio broadcasting. A few weeks ago I had the opportunity of hearing, over the service provided by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the inaugural speech, known as the message on the state of the nation, delivered by President Roosevelt at the opening of congress. I listened to it most attentively, and had the service not been provided by the corporation I might have missed that splendid opportunity. As I listened to the President of the United States speak to congress on the state of the nation, just prior to the opening of our parliament here, I wondered whether our own government or our own Prime Minister would deliver as definite or as conclusive a speech on the occasion of the opening of our parliament.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that if I do not refer at greater length to the remarks of the minister (Mr. Howe) he will forgive me, because I did not know that I was to follow him in this debate.

When I read the speech from the throne, which was delivered in the other chamber, the thing that struck me most was its barrenness, its nebulous character, its lack of definiteness as to what was in the mind of the government regarding what they were going to do for the people of this dominion.

In the main, Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne contains references to commissions that have been appointed by the government, to the trade agreements which the government have in contemplation, and to the expansion of our foreign trade. In fact our government takes the stand that in the conclusion of trade treaties and the expansion of our trade with foreign nations lies the solution of our problems. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot agree. Members who have been in the house as long as I have will know that at all times I have supported any government that has reduced the tariff. I have always supported the Liberal party in its reduction of tariffs just as I have always opposed the Conservative party in its tariff increases, but I have always taken the stand that moving the tariff up a little or down a little will not provide a solution for our national problems. To-day the bankers of the world are shouting from the roof-tops that the trade of the world should be liberated, that tariffs should be reduced, and I have been wondering since when have the bankers of the world or of this nation become the champions of the ordinary farmer and working man. We should indeed be in strange company if we were found in the ranks of the bankers agreeing with them that a policy of lower tariffs would solve our economic problems. If I thought that that was the solution, Mr. Speaker, I would hold up both my hands immediately for such a reduction and so end all our troubles; but even in low tariff countries to-day, just as in high tariff countries, they have exactly the same problems to face as those by which we are confronted in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but he is repeating what many on the other side have already said, and which is not correct. He is saying that the government takes the position that by furthering international trade it is doing the only thing that it considers necessary to solve existing problems. The speech from the throne is quite specific as to the government's view on international trade. It states that:

> The government is convinced that, in seeking to cooperate with the United Kingdom and other countries in efforts to promote international trade, it is pursuing one of the most effective means of ensuring economic security and progress in Canada, and the betterment of conditions in other parts of the world.

One of the most effective means—that is the position of the government. It is not that the government holds that international trade is the solution of all ills, but that it is one of the most effective means of ensuring security and prosperity.

Mr. HEAPS: I am very glad to have that statement from the Prime Minister, but I have spoken for only two or three minutes, and probably if I had gone on a little longer I should have dealt with some of the other statements made in the speech from the throne, as I intend doing before my time expires. I am glad the Prime Minister takes the position that in international trade is not to be found a complete solution of our national problems. We must bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that every nation to-day is anxious to find export markets. In that we are not alone. In fact, since production became simplified and the nations learned to produce with an ease that we did not know fifty or a hundred years ago, practically all nations have had exportable surpluses, and it is because of these exportable surpluses that competition among the nations for foreign markets is becoming keener and keener, while at the same time there is a lessened demand from the nations of the world for the importation of commodities as compared with the demand that existed twenty-five or fifty or seventy-five years ago.

I maintain that it is not necessary for us to look first of all to foreign markets. The first thing for any government to do is to satisfy the home demand. Can anyone give me a logical reason why we in Canada cannot consume the goods we produce here in such abundance, or why we must not consume them until Japan, China, Germany, Italy and other countries have first been supplied from our production? The people who have first claim on the productive capacity of the dominion are the Canadian people themselves. When we find ourselves with a surplus of commodities, then let us by all means find export markets to take our surplus. But no government has ever yet attempted adequately or even reasonably to satisfy the demands of the Canadian people. Have the demands of the Canadian people been legitimately met? Certainly not. In this country hundreds of thousands of people, some of them out of work, some of them working part time or full time, are living on the borderline of poverty, and until we have satisfied their legitimate demands their needs should receive first consideration, and foreign countries second. I remember in my school days reading in a history of India the story of the people of India famishing while India was exporting her wheat. We here are doing very much the same thing; we are exporting so-called surplus commodities while hundreds of thousands of Canadian people are in dire want.

The government might claim that as a result of the trade agreements they have made with the nations of the world our trade has increased, but I will not subscribe to that assumption because in all parts of the world trade has increased, and although the tariffs of this country have decreased by only a comparatively small amount during the past two or three years, our imports have jumped up. If tariffs are a hindrance to international trade I would like to ask this question of economists, who may be able to answer it in a simple way: Why is it that in spite of high tariffs, quotas and other trade restrictions in all parts of the world, there has been this great jump in international trade in the past two or three years? It is quite obvious that this has happened not because of important tariff reductions, but because there has been an effective demand in certain countries for a certain class of commodities, and the nations of the world have been trying to satisfy that demand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There would have been a bigger jump had it not been for these restrictions.

Mr. HEAPS: That is merely an assumption. We can take one view or the other; we cannot be sure. If we were, of course we could deal with this question in a more definite way than we are doing. All I say is that in spite of high tariffs the world over, there has been a considerable increase in international trade during the past three or four years. From the standpoint indicated by the interruption of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), if an economist to-day attempts to deal with the cycles of trade during the past few years, say from 1929 to 1938, how will he chart them? He will begin the cycle in 1929, when we had the peak of trade, and continue down to 1932, and then he will take the upward period from 1932 to 1937. So far as Canada is concerned we find that those years cut right across the political complexions of the governments in office during that time, indicating quite obviously, I think, to almost everyone that the tariff structure of the country had very little significance with respect to the flow of trade so far as Canada is concerned. Our curve upwards commenced in 1932 and continued until the end of 1937; that is, the upward trend prevailed in 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936 and 1937. During that period we were under a Conservative government about the same length of time as we were under a Liberal government. Consequently I say that our tariff structure is not the fundamental factor in trade that we thought it was many years before.

It seems to me that there are features of our trade relations which are akin to the situation of the two families who used to take in each other's washing in order to try to keep themselves busy. If we thought a little less of trade treaties, many of which are entirely ineffective, and attempted to create a higher standard of living based upon the production of which we are capable in this dominion, our energies would be turned to much better advantage than they have been in the past. Although I favour treaties and would be glad to support those which have for their purpose the lowering of tariffs, I will not regard them as a panacea for the ills and ailments of the present time.

When my right hon. friend opposite and other Liberals tell me that they are the party that is in favour of freer trade, of unrestrained trade, I am afraid I cannot accept that statement as entirely in accordance with the facts. For the last two years or so that they have been in office our tariff structure has been changed very little from what it was prior to that time. The Prime Minister, when he was sitting here as leader of the opposition at the time the empire trade agreements of 1932 were under discussion, stated that when his party came into power one of the things he would do would be to cut these tariffs in half. I think my memory is correct on that point. Well, at the rate we have been going these past two years I wonder how old the Prime Minister will be before the tariffs are cut to half what they were when the agreement was adopted in 1932. We have practically as many restrictions now as we had five years ago. The tariff has been reduced very little. We still have—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend a moment? He quoted me as saying that I would cut the tariffs in half.

Mr. BENNETT: No, a fifty per cent cut in the British preference.

Mr. BRADETTE: He said "in half."

Mr. HEAPS: I said, the tariffs as enumerated in the empire agreements of 1932.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The expression my hon. friend used was that I said that I would cut the tariffs in half.

Mr. BRADETTE: That is what he said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not my way of speaking.

Mr. BENNETT: Not the general tariff.

Mr. HEAPS: I am speaking specifically of the empire trade agreements of 1932. If I am wrong I will certainly withdraw the statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure that never in my life have I used in tariff matters the expression of cutting anything in half.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the Prime Minister say that he promised to reduce the tariff by fifty per cent?

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I do not believe I said that. But if my hon. friend can show me my statement, from an authoritative source—

Mr. HEAPS: I have not the statement before me, but in view of the interruption of the Prime Minister I will say this, that I still have to learn what is the difference between fifty per cent and cutting in half.

Miss MACPHAIL: The "half" is easier to remember.

Mr. HEAPS: To show that the Liberal party are not as earnest in their desire to reduce the protection that we have at the present time I will read a little circular that was brought to my attention. It deals with the textile industry. It was sent out by the Department of National Revenue, dated "Ottawa, 3rd December, 1937," and is numbered "Miscellaneous No. 14." It is as follows:

> Upon checking the values of some recent importations of cotton yarns and cotton fabrics from the United States, it has been ascertained that the home market selling prices are less than the actual cost of production plus a reasonable advance for selling cost and profit, and it is therefore clear that in such cases the provisions of section 36 of the Customs Act have not been observed.
> You are therefore instructed to accept entries of such goods imported from the United States at invoice values, only with an undertaking in writing from the importer or his agent to amend the entry if called on to do so should this be found warranted upon examination of the documents here in the department.

Many manufacturers engaged in our secondary industries have complained bitterly to me about the action of the Department of National Revenue in preventing them from purchasing textile goods in the United States at the same prices as those at which United States manufacturers can purchase them. Indeed it seems to me that there are some officials of the department who sit up nights trying to find ways and means of giving protection to the textile industries of this country. But what I want to point out is that these dumping duties, which were inveighed against by my hon. friends of the Liberal party, are being enforced by the Department of National Revenue just as vigorously to-day as ever they were in the past.

As I have heard some hon. member speak in different parts of the chamber I have wondered what the policy of the Liberal party is. Yesterday I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch). He was anxious that the government should do something; he felt very much disappointed because the government had not taken some definite line of action regarding the problems which confront us. Also I heard the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) urge the government to be true to the ideals of its past, or to the ideals of Liberalism. You have on the one hand a man who is an absolute free trader. You have other Liberal members from the west who also are anxious that the government do something towards reducing tariffs—a policy in which the farmers place so much faith. The fact is that if one looks carefully at the very large following of the Liberal party in this house one must be driven to the conclusion that there is in that party, as indeed there is in other parties in the house, no true alignment of political thought or expression.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a little bit of that among yourselves.

Mr. HEAPS: I am free to admit that; I said other parties as well. There is no true alignment of political thought in the country.

An hon. MEMBER: Why should there be?

Mr. HEAPS: Well, I was always under the impression that the only thing that should hold a party together was a common allegiance to a common purpose, in following an ideal; and where there is no such allegiance and no common purpose a group or party cannot be held together. So far the Liberal party has held together pretty well; I am free to admit that in the by-elections the people in certain parts of Canada have given them a majority of their votes. But a majority of votes in the country or a majority of members in this house means nothing in itself. The question is, for what purpose is the majority being used? For what purpose is the majority of the Liberal party in this house being used at the present time? In my humble opinion, the party cannot have a purpose, and cannot give permanent expression to an opinion, because there are too many opinions in the party. On the one hand we find some members declaring themselves in favour of retaining the padlock law in the province of Quebec, and on the other hand there are those who are opposed to this.

An hon. MEMBER: That is why it is a Liberal party.

Mr. HEAPS: If that is Liberalism, then I say it is absolutely bankrupt.

Mr. MacNICOL: And has been bankrupt for a long time.

Mr. HEAPS: If it is Liberalism to be in favour of having the police and other officials going into the homes of men and women and confiscating literature that can be found in any library in the country, police breaking into homes and threatening people with arrest, then I say that that is a strange sort of Liberalism. Is this Liberalism in 1938? Is this what the Liberal party is doing?

Mr. DUNNING: No Liberal government is doing any such thing.

Mr. HEAPS: We have a Liberal government that could have disallowed that legislation if it had wanted to; a Liberal government has allowed it to remain on the statute books of the country.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not on the statute books of this country.

Mr. HEAPS: It is on the statute books of the province of Quebec, and I have an idea that the province of Quebec is still a part of the dominion.

Mr. DUNNING: Only a part.

Mr. HEAPS: It is just as much a part of the dominion as Alberta is, no more and no less; and if the power of disallowance can be exercised in one part of the country it can be exercised in another to safeguard the liberties of the people. But it is because there exist these contradictions within the ranks of the Liberal party that there is no definite policy on their part. I suggest that one of the main functions of a party in power is to hold its members together, to prevent the party from falling to pieces. But if the Liberal party took a definite stand on the tariff, for instance, what would happen? You would find those in favour of a low tariff fighting those who want a high tariff; you would find those who are in favour of the Quebec padlock law in conflict with those who are opposed to it. There are these teeming contradictions within the ranks of the party, and it takes an extremely careful and clever leader to hold all these divergent elements together.

Miss MACPHAIL: He is so busy doing that, he cannot do anything else.

Mr. DUNNING: What do you do with the fellows that disagree in your party?

Mr. HEAPS: We have differences in our party, but those who have differences have the good sense to get up and say so. In the ranks of the Liberal party, however, there is always something dangling in front of members to keep them in the fold. Sometimes it is a judgeship, sometimes a senatorship, or sometimes perhaps a secretaryship such as was foreshadowed in the speech from the throne a few years ago—something not yet carried out. I presume that at the time there were so many applications for these secretaryships that the government adopted the usual Liberal policy of doing nothing about it.

An hon. member has just pointed out to me a passage in Hansard of October 17, 1932, in connection with the Ottawa conference. At page 264 the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made this statement:

> May I go a step further and say in connection with that, so that there can be no mistake as to where we stand in the matter of British trade, and the British preference, that we would undertake to give to the trade of the United Kingdom, where goods are imported through Canadian ports, a British preference averaging fifty per cent of our general tariff. If there is anything in this particular agreement that is comparable to that of advantage to ourselves and to British peoples in trade, I hope we will find it out before this discussion is over.

What is mentioned here is a British preference averaging fifty per cent of our general tariff. Is that not one-half of the general tariff? The Prime Minister did not recollect having made that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That statement is all right.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to know what difference there is between a fifty per cent reduction and cutting something in half.

Mr. DUNNING: As a matter of fact that promise has been pretty well carried out.

Mr. HEAPS: Here we are in the third session of this parliament and the people are still looking to the government to do something definite to ensure security, and freedom from the feeling of uncertainty that is to be found in practically all parts of Canada. It is true that in certain industries there is much greater production than a few years ago; we are free to admit that. But can anyone in this house tell us how much of that increased productivity is due to war preparations that are taking place in practically all parts of the world? We have never yet been told that. All we have been told is that there is an increase in production and in employment. Certain steel mills in this country are producing steel rails to send to South Africa. Why is it possible that we in Canada can produce steel rails and send them there in competition with Great Britain, Germany, Belgium and other countries which for many years have specialized in that class of material? The answer is obvious; those countries to-day are so busy in the production of munitions of war that they have not time or facilities available to execute orders for South Africa, with the result that the orders are coming to this country and providing work here. But who knows how long this state of things is going to last?

In the speech from the throne we are told that—

> The government is convinced that in seeking to cooperate with the United Kingdom and other countries in efforts to promote international trade it is pursuing one of the most effective means of ensuring economic security and progress in Canada, and the betterment of conditions in other parts of the world.

Are we really doing what this sentence states? I doubt it. Does anyone here mean to say that we are promoting more friendly relations with the people of China when we send to Japan munitions with which to slaughter the Chinese people? Is that something of which we can be proud? We have heard in times past about our neutrality in respect to Spain, but when it comes to Japan and China we are free to break that neutrality and with materials that we produce here help to slaughter innocent women and children in China. Is that promoting better international relations? Are we promoting better international relations when indirectly the rebel forces in Spain can procure through intermediate sources munitions of war partly made in this country? Do hon. members think that the government of Spain will have a kindlier and more friendly feeling towards us on that account?

Mr. BRADETTE: What about the intervention of the Russian government?

Mr. HEAPS: My hon. friend who is interrupting can make his own speech.

When we are told that by sending goods abroad we are promoting goodwill between the different peoples of the world, I question whether that is an accepted fact. Once having taken a neutral position in regard to the Spanish situation I would think it preferable that we take exactly the same position in regard to the Sino-Japanese situation. It is just as logical in the one case as the other. There is nothing to be said in defence of our action except that those who produce munitions of war will profit by the action of this government in allowing munitions to be shipped from Canada to Japan. And when attention is invited to the condition of so-called prosperity I am inclined to look more closely to find out what it really means. It is true that there are more men at work at the present time, thanks to the preparations for war going on in various parts of the world. But suppose before very long the nations which are preparing for war catch up in the armament race, what is going to happen to the tens of thousands of workers in this country who to-day are working on preparations for war? In a year or so from now Great Britain will perhaps have caught up in the armament race; the money she is spending in Great Britain and which indirectly finds its way to this country will cease to flow here, and we shall be faced with a slump probably as great as if not greater than that which we experienced in 1929-30.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It is not always safe to prophesy.

Mr. HEAPS: There was a time when my hon. friends opposite were not so anxious to interrupt what I had to say, when I would get more applause from them than I am receiving to-day. But I can tell them that I am just as honest in my convictions to-day as I was twelve years ago.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear. That is better.

Mr. HEAPS: This parliament has a grave responsibility. It can sit idly by and, Micawber-like, hope for something to turn up. But I claim it must deal definitely and effectively with the problems that confront us. We must realize the changed world and changed conditions in which we live. Recent years have completely revolutionized the social and economic structure. We cannot deal with present day problems on the basis of ideas that may have served in the nineteenth century. There is no stronger aid to fascism and all that it stands for than to create the impression that parliament is either unable or unwilling to deal effectively with present day economic conditions. I know the great and powerful forces of an economic nature that often stand between a government and needed reforms, but if parliament is all-powerful, as it should be and could be, then such forces as stand in the way of needed economic changes must be swept aside, and the will of parliament and the people must prevail.

In my opinion the masses of this country, in spite of the results of by-elections, still feel that the government of the day is not coming to grips with the real problems that confront us, the paramount one of course being that of economic security. The search for mythical markets abroad may sound alluring to some, but that is not an effective means of remedying conditions at home. There is no reason why in order to distribute amongst our own people the goods produced in Canada we should depend on foreign countries. Must we tell our people that before we can consume the goods that we produce here we must first find export markets? I think we all realize that our distributive system is out of harmony with the times in which we live. It is not a case of tariff adjustment one way or the other, it is a definite clear case of giving to the Canadian people the fruits of their own enterprise and energy so that they may enjoy the products of their labours.

The time has arrived when hon. members must shed their party labels and think more of their constituents than of the party whips. I can think of no time when the responsibilities of members of parliament were greater than they are to-day. Throughout the world far-reaching changes are taking place. In all parts we see social and economic upheavals; even in Canada we cannot escape their effects. Under these circumstances it is the bounden duty of parliament so to shape the destiny of this dominion that our people will have grounds for hope that parliament is earnestly dealing with the pressing problems of the day. I am afraid that there is no such impression at present. We are not dealing effectively with the problems of poverty or insecurity. If to-day I ask the house to give some real lead in regard to these social problems it is only something that I have been doing for the past twelve years.

So little encouragement, I regret to say, is afforded in the speech from the throne, that I cannot vote in favour of the address. But it is my earnest hope that the government will yet give the nation a lead, that instead of continuing to be one of the backward nations of the empire in matters of social progress we shall take our rightful place at the head of those countries which are leading the way towards a more just and better social era.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Speaker, this would seem to be an appropriate occasion for me to give expression to a few thoughts I have held for some time, and in doing so I want to follow the good example of toleration and moderation that has characterized this debate thus far. It has been quite a contrast with the debate following the election of 1925, much, I think, to the credit of the present debate. It also has been worthy of note how much of our time during this debate has been spent in discussing fiscal matters, which naturally would be expected to follow the budget. Experience has proved, however, that if you want any changes of a major nature made in the budget you must have them made in advance of the budget speech, because seldom are any but minor changes made after the budget is brought down. Another reason, perhaps, why we have taken so much time in discussing fiscal matters is that we are all concerned with home budgets; hence we are talking about them here in a national way.

The thoughts I have had in mind are expressed to some extent in a statement that has been prepared by the appropriate department showing the fluctuations in our tariffs during the past sixty years. Do not take alarm; I am not going to dwell on each of the sixty years, but I would like to point out the little progress we have made in either direction, up or down—and especially down—during those years. I am going to mention a number of elections which were fought primarily on tariff matters, and when we consider these figures, which I obtained from an accurate source, those of us who believe in low tariffs must ask ourselves if we have been taking the best possible way to get the greatest results.

In the year of confederation the general tariff on major commodities in which farmers are interested was 15 per cent, and a large number of items are given in the statement I have before me. That situation continued until 1878, when Alexander Mackenzie's administration went out of office. Then and there followed the first battle of tariffs of which I am aware, between the government of Alexander Mackenzie and the party under the leadership of Sir John Macdonald. The former, heading a low tariff party, was defeated; the latter came into power with a high tariff policy which was brought into force in 1879, when tariffs were shot up pretty generally, almost as they were in 1930.

Later on, in 1891, the Liberals went to the country on a tariff policy of unrestricted reciprocity. Sir John A. Macdonald was still in the saddle. The Liberal policy practically meant a reversion to the old conditions of reciprocity which obtained between 1854 and 1866, but, as might have been expected, our opponents took advantage of the opportunity to alarm the people as to what unrestricted reciprocity would mean, although it had been in force for twelve years. They raised the cry of annexation. So thoroughly was that campaign carried on that I almost voted Tory myself, because I did not at all like the idea of annexation, and if unrestricted reciprocity meant that, then I did not want any of it. We are not so scared by these cries now as we were in those days, although the fact that Edward Blake resigned the leadership of the Liberal party at that time because he thought unrestricted reciprocity would lead in that direction, gave some colour to the cry raised by our opponents. Seeing that they are so prolific in the production of cries of that nature I am not so much surprised that they took advantage of that opportunity, and, as already stated, almost converted your humble servant to their way of thinking.

That was in 1891, and that was a terrific battle of tariffs. Then in 1894, when Sir George Foster was Minister of Finance, a considerable reduction was made. You will remember that period, I think; he was going to lop off, and did lop off, the mouldering branches of protection. Consequently there was a considerable reduction in that year, especially on farm implements. That did not save the government of that day from defeat. I have found that death-bed repentances on the part of governments, in connection with tariffs or anything else, do not amount to very much. They are not very effective. By the time that active repentance comes along the mind of the people is pretty well made up and you might as well save your last moment repentance, because you are going to get it in the neck anyway.

Following the election of 1896 there was a considerable reduction of tariffs, though the reductions were not so great as they would have been if Sir George Foster had not anticipated it and reduced tariffs himself, although without any beneficial results to his party. In 1897 again there were considerable reductions, though not nearly what we had hoped for. Anyway, we kept on living in hope, until finally in 1911 the great proposal for freer trade with the American republic was brought down in the form of what is known as the reciprocity agreement.

On that occasion again our friends of the Conservative party excelled themselves in propaganda as to the horrors that this would lead to, in the matter of annexation. I do not want to picture this too vividly; that seems to be their major cry in any campaign and especially with respect to tariffs and treating our neighbours more generously. The election of 1911 resulted in the defeat of the Liberal party. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that inasmuch as the Liberal party, with Sir Wilfrid Laurier at its head, sacrificed its political life on behalf of Canadian, and particularly western, agriculture, it always seemed to me most ungrateful that a third party should spring up at a later date, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was still available for endorsation. Let me repeat that. The Liberal party went out of power in 1911 fighting on behalf of Canadian agriculture, particularly in the west.

Then in 1917 there was another general election. The less we say about that election the better. It was not on tariffs; it was on a lot of other things, the War-time Elections Act and such like. Then in the latter part of 1921 the first King administration came into power, and our policy was to reduce tariffs by "easy stages" of about two and a half per cent at a time. I think it was my hon. friend the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) who coined that phrase when he wanted to allay the fears of the protectionists, when he was at the head of the Progressive party. I am afraid my own leader adopted it later on. Those easy stages, I think, are sound economically, but they are absolutely no good politically. You nip off a little bit here, a little bit there and a little bit somewhere else, but the aggregate is not nearly so apparent as when you take it and cut it in two. So I would in a friendly way warn the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) not to be too easy in his stages of tariff reductions. However in 1930, when the Dunning budget was brought down, in justice to my own party and my own leader I was proud—and am still proud—to say that we had the lowest tariff since confederation on implements of production. But the issues of high or low tariff do not seem to figure very much in a campaign in which the tide is either for or against you. For instance, the low tariff province of Saskatchewan split nearly even in 1930. Only eleven Liberals were elected out of twenty-one and the rest were either Conservatives or members of some other adverse group.

Then, in September of the same year, after the Liberals had been condemned for low tariffs by a province which should have known better, the people voted for a party which shot up the tariff, not by easy stages, but like a sky-rocket. All that happened despite the fact that tariff was not the predominant issue of the election of 1930. We will remember that butter figured far more conspicuously than the tariff did. Nevertheless the right hon. the leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Bennett) on that occasion lived up to his promises and, in a twinkling, gave us higher tariffs throughout Canada. I do not know whether that was the right way to do it, but it did not work out very well for his party.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): It worked well for the country.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The people soon changed their minds. Hard times steadily grew harder, and by 1935 we did not hear any more talk about high tariffs; the leader of the Conservative party then wanted reciprocity with the United States. That was a remarkable conversion, in some respects almost greater than that of St. Paul. I do not think there was ever a more zealous campaign against any issue than that which was lodged by the present leader of the opposition throughout Canada against reciprocity in 1911. But, presto chango, we find him going down to Washington to try to consummate a treaty, with the words "no truck or trade with the Yankees" still echoing throughout the country.

That brings us up to the 1935 election. I think I shall have to confess that I was just as rabid in my determination to get lower tariffs for the west as were my opponents to get higher tariffs. Looking backward I do not think we went about it in the right way at all. How can we expect a minority in the west to overcome, overpower and overdominate the great industrial majority in the east? It is not democratic. At all events, it is not representative government and in my estimation it is not the right way to go about it. In the last sixty years, as the result of these periodical battles we entered into with such ardour, what have we got but a lot of turmoil and a lot of good time spent—worse than wasted—and a great deal of ill feeling engendered between the east and the west? In the end we got very little, anyway, that remained permanent.

I believe the Minister of Finance should face the fact that there are many items which still bear duties from twenty-five per cent to forty-five per cent, and in making up his budget I would ask him to give particular attention to them. No matter how much we in the west or others in low tariff provinces have the tariff reduced, it will still be higher than we want. In other words, no common tariff has yet been devised to suit all parts of Canada, and particularly to suit the western provinces. What are we going to do or say about it?

I wish to thank the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) for using the words "compensatory adjustment" in his excellent address of yesterday. I believe they are better than the word "compensation," which I had intended to use, but they mean the same thing. We have been barking up the wrong tree in our proper efforts to get lower tariffs. Even if we get it right or nearly right, as we did in May, 1930, in the Dunning budget, the electors may take a notion that they want it up again. That is futile. I have too few years longer to live to spend them in that kind of everchanging thing. I want to try the principle of compensatory adjustment as suggested by the Minister of Labour.

Well, what does compensatory adjustment mean? Let us first consider my own word, compensation. When confederation was established the maritime provinces were a little leary about coming into it. They thought they were so small territorially and so small numerically, although giants in other respects, that their weight would not properly be felt in the parliament of Canada. For that, they were given a compensatory adjustment by way of larger representation in the senate. Because of the grievances they had advanced, I think there was some ground for that action. But what I want to bring out is this, that whether the principle was right or wrong, it was endorsed and applied.

Then later, when the new prairie provinces came into existence, inasmuch as we had no debt—that would be a fine thing to be able to say to-day—a special grant was given to us in lieu of debt, to put us on a basis of equality with the other provinces. As may be recalled, the original four provinces absorbed the provincial debts of those respective provinces. The western provinces coming in, and having no debt, were, as already indicated, given grants in lieu of debt. There is the principle of compensation, and it has been recognized ever since.

Later on the Conservative party of 1931, which I thought was at that time doing everything in the worst way possible, adopted the policy of compensation through the five cent bonus on wheat. I believe, at least, that the idea was that of compensation. By that compensatory provision they gave about $12,000,000 in bonuses to farmers who needed it least; I never knew how they compensated the poor fellows who had no crops. Those moneys were paid entirely on a bushelage rather than an acreage basis.

I believe however that I am wandering away from my point. It is that the principle of compensation has been recognized by all parties since confederation. It must be recognized in our homes and our respective occupations. Not a day passes but what some kind of compromise or compensation is made everywhere, from the state right down to the honest peasant in his home. There would be no such thing as living peaceably together unless there was a great measure of compromise and compensation.

I do not need to elaborate upon the soundness of the principle. One must wonder, however, how it will work out. As the Minister of Labour pointed out in his memorandum, what are we going to get in lieu of the high tariffs? Certain injustices are bound to arise in a high tariff policy imposed upon rural Canada. Do we wish to keep the provinces suffering in perpetuity those injustices in that condition, or are we going to respond to the disciplining effect of the times in which we are living, when the international situation seems bent on self-destruction, and when the whole world may be thrown into the vortex of war in the twinkling of an eye.

The dogs of war may be unleashed at a moment's notice. I do not wish to anticipate it, but we must remember that we ought to be in the best possible shape to meet the worst which may develop. We ought not to be caught unprepared. The way to be prepared is to look after our own home affairs; we ought to have them working as harmoniously as possible, and not go into war in the midst of national turmoil at home, as we did the last time in 1914. It is bad enough to go into it, and in all conscience I hope we may never have to, but let us anticipate possibilities. I am not making these statements because I happen to belong to the party in power; as a matter of fact, sometimes I would like to be in the opposition for just a few minutes. I am not pleading for conciliation or toleration because I fear that somebody will attack the government; not at all; but it is better for the state and for everybody that we should live as harmoniously as possible during these perilous times. This method of lowering and raising tariffs is sometimes called scientific, but it is nothing of the kind. It is based largely on the exigencies of the occasion. I say that we should not waste our energies in the manner I have described. What kind of compensation do I refer to? What are we to get in lieu of this high tariff that has been imposed on us during all these years? Before entering on that, may I condense into a few short sentences what I have tried to say in a somewhat rambling manner?

Every legitimate and reasonable effort should be made to reduce the customs tariff, particularly on the implements of production, consistent with revenue requirements. So long as the middle west's interests continue to be largely agricultural and its representation in parliament so relatively small, and the central east so largely industrial and its representation in parliament so relatively large, no common tariff can be devised that will satisfy both, if we are to preserve the principle of majority rule and representative government. On the other hand, neither should the majority impose upon the minority in Canada a high protective tariff that has been so burdensome to agriculture, particularly in the prairie west, as to cause constantly growing feelings of resentment against such transparent injustice. While our customs tariffs have varied in height from time to time, depending upon which party was in power, no tariff has yet been devised that has proven satisfactory to the middle prairie west, nor is it likely to be in the immediate future unless some method of compensation for losses sustained by such minority already alluded to be adopted and put into equitable operation.

Now I will give the house what I have in mind, and I am giving only my own thoughts; I do not represent anybody except my constituents, and I am not sure that I represent them all the time, because when I talk about compensation, their idea may be to keep on fighting wildcats all the time. At my years I am just a little bit out of that class; but I intend to persevere, first, in getting the tariff down as low as possible by every reasonable and honourable means, and then let us make up for the deficiency by some form of compensation. I have two suggestions in that regard. First, we want, not a wheat board, but a grain board. We want one that is self-sustaining and non-hibernating, if you can guess what kind that is, and the implications involved. I use that word so that a lot of people will have to look up their dictionary. I repeat that the grain board should be self-sustaining and non-hibernating. This is not the appropriate time, I realize, to go into the grain marketing problem, because we have a competent and capable commission studying that question and the country is now anxiously awaiting its report. Pending its arrival I shall have to pass on, somewhat regretfully, to the other compensation that I have in mind.

Shortly after the west began to be settled in the early days—that is, exclusive of the old Selkirk settlement and the settlement around Portage la Prairie—the Hudson Bay railway became a live issue. Cruel people say that it always was used as an election football. Well, maybe it was. Those forty miles of rails that ran north of Winnipeg never got us anywhere, except that they were to somebody's advantage—I do not know whose. But it was a live issue all through the years since 1880. We were just like other countries similarly situated. There is a feeling in the breast of every nation that makes them seek the shortest route to the sea. That was the case long years ago, long before Solomon, whether it was by caravans over the desert or by the seven seas. There has always been that inherent instinct in the human breast to reach the seaboard by the shortest and safest possible route. That is what we were desirous of in the west, but it took us a long while to attain it, until at last Sir Wilfrid Laurier, coming back from a trip in the west, was again prepared to make the sacrifice largely for the west, because naturally there was not much love for it displayed in the east.

In the city of Hamilton in 1908 Sir Wilfrid Laurier pledged his party to the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. Then the matter hung fire for a while, but not long afterwards the bridge over The Pas was under construction when a change of government took place. Contracts were let to a point called Split Lake for the construction of the road, and then again we had a change of government at a critical time. But the new government carried on the construction of the road, and headed it for Port Nelson. I am not going to enter into the old story of how the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), then Minister of Railways, in a most expeditious way, as soon as he got the report of Sir Frederick Palmer, changed the terminus from Port Nelson to Fort Churchill. There you have a real port. I do not know for sure who it was that had blundered in choosing Port Nelson, but I know that the whole undertaking was pretty nearly ruined and would have been ruined if the road had run into Port Nelson. Well, we now have this port at Fort Churchill, and it is not doing very much. How could you expect it to do much at the beginning, when the insurance rate on the Hudson Bay route was eight times as much as on the St. Lawrence route? You could not expect traffic to seek the Hudson Bay outlet with such an enormous handicap in the matter of marine insurance.

And there was always something happening to injure the route. We know the story of the Bright Fan and its drunken shipmaster. That was all brought out in evidence. I do not know whether he ever got a certificate again for running a boat across the Atlantic, but he never should have received a certificate in the first place to shipmaster a boat through the, to him, strange waters of Hudson strait, where people's lives and property, and the reputation of the route were at stake.

But now we have the Hudson Bay railway; we have a good roadbed; we have a good port, and we have a good elevator. Of course, with our restricted crops, the traffic must be meagre for some time, but I was wondering if we could not get some kind of move on in anticipation of better crops. One of the difficulties with the Hudson Bay route, we are told, is the short open season, and that is one of the difficulties; but so far as good water is concerned and so far as safety is concerned, many shipmasters who have taken cargoes of wheat out of Fort Churchill declare that it is just as safe a route as any other in Canada with seasonal ports. I am not a nautical authority at all, and I do not pretend to be ; but I know that good water, lots of depth and width, is absolutely necessary to successful navigation, and I know that Captain Bernier gave evidence before the grain commission in 1925 in the province of Quebec with respect to his experience on this route. I have not a copy of his evidence with me, but if anybody wants further information on the matter, any member of that grain commission, and particularly the chairman thereof, will be able to confirm everything I say regarding Captain Bernier's evidence.

He was master, or second master, of a ship when he was only seventeen years of age, and he traversed those northern waters almost continuously in the employ of the government until he was seventy-five years old. I had the privilege of meeting him here in the Chateau Laurier about four or five years ago, when we went all over this evidence that he gave, and he reported that he was more than ever firmly convinced that what I am going to mention would be the proper course to pursue. The present period is too short for the route to be open to provide it with a sufficient volume of business, and without volume hardly any business can be profitable. You cannot grow one acre or even twenty acres of wheat and equip yourself with machinery and make the operation pay. So it is with this new outlet; we must get the volume in order to do a reasonable proportion of the business which will be available when our crops come back, as they will do sooner or later.

Captain Bernier testified before the grain commission in 1925 in the province of Quebec, and took the ground that not only was this a possible route, a workable route, but that it had a great future, and that the proper port was Churchill. Not only that, but he observed that the greatest handicap would be the shortness of the season, and he advocated that the government provide the necessary boat equipment, strengthen and reinforce it, to take care of new ice conditions in those northern waters. As hon. members know, when the ice is forming in the fall of the year, Fort Churchill can be kept open two weeks later by the use of a boat that would not be called an ice-breaker but could open up the way during at least the formation of ice in the early fall and at the same time could be used for transporting grain. I am not an authority; I am quoting Captain Bernier, who said that a number of suitable reinforced boats which would stand considerable pressure of ice could be used for transporting wheat and at the same time for keeping that route open two weeks earlier in the spring and two weeks later in the fall. That makes a month and would give us a maximum period of four months' safe transportation over that route to the world's markets. This evidence was taken a long while ago—thirteen years—and I have scarcely heard of it since. I do not wish to magnify anything I have done, but I think I did contribute a little towards getting that route built to the right port.

Mr. DUNNING: Very much.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Alone I certainly could not have done it. I do not know whether my good friend and old colleague wishes me to extol him for the masterly part he played in a crisis, but I can assure him the people of the west give him full credit for it. One way to compensate us would be to see whether somehow or another that period of safe navigation could be lengthened. As far as I know there has been no attempt to do this. We have suitable direction-finding stations established, and if these shores were lighted and appropriately equipped as those of the St. Lawrence, this would add considerably to the safety of the route. I admit freely that considerable progress has been made in the above direction, but now is the time to consider whether that route is built for ornamental purposes or for practical use. I think decidedly it could be made fit for practical use. I do not like to suggest any expenditures at this time, but the subject should be carefully studied. Look up and study Captain Bernier's report. If you cannot get it, consult the chairman of the commission before whom his evidence was taken. Possibly the report is in the archives of the university of Saskatchewan. Governments cannot keep all these volumes of evidence indefinitely, but we will try to find it.

I hope that our eastern friends, who naturally are interested in eastern ports, will consider the question we have been discussing. A member of the government has suggested that we have "compensating adjustments." Will hon. members adjust their views regarding this matter and permit us to have the natural, inherent instincts of the human breast gratified by reaching tidewater with our exports as quickly and as safely as possible. That is one of the long heart's desires of the west. Alberta is not much interested, if at all. British Columbia had not always the Panama canal; it had not always the Crowsnest pass rates extended to the Pacific. I think fellow Canadians from other parts of Canada can join with us and be tolerant of our little ambitions and nostrums—if you like to call them that. The Hudson Bay railway is a reality. We have now to see whether we can make some practical use of it, and this is the way I respectfully suggest that it should be gone about.

I believe I have covered what I wanted to say at present; in any case my forty minutes are almost up. There are a number of other problems I should like to speak about, but they will be more properly said later in the session, after the various reports have been tabled.

Hon. J. EARL LAWSON (York South) It is not my purpose this afternoon to discuss fiscal policy, so I shall not attempt to follow the remarks of the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) but rather devote my attention to those of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe).

When the Minister of Transport started his address this afternoon I came to the conclusion, after his first few sentences, that he was performing the painful duty of answering for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in the House of Commons; but before he finished he left no doubt in my mind that he as a responsible minister of the government was approving their actions and approving their recommendations that the licence fee should be increased from $2 to $2.50 per annum, and that each individual radio should be licensed. The minister pointed out that the two bills previously passed in the house in connection with radio broadcasting were passed by a unanimous vote. Lest the impression should have been left that those of us who did not vote against the measure therefore spontaneously approved it, I should point out that we who did not agree in all its details with that measure merely followed the unanimous recommendation of a committee of the house, which recommendation, for reasons that I shall state in a moment and that were then presented to the house, we did not see fit to oppose.

The minister said this afternoon that he was willing to pay for three radio licences at the increased rate. Possibly he and I can well afford to do so, but that does not lend any weight to the argument on this question. The vast majority of radios in this country are owned by people whose incomes are so meagre that it is a burden to pay $2, much less $2.50 for a radio licence.

I want to make it clear at the outset that the present Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is not the tribunal which was set up by the original radio act passed by the former government in 1932. That was all scrapped with the advent of the Liberal party in 1936.

An hon. MEMBER: In 1935.

Mr. LAWSON: The legislation was introduced in 1936. The advent of the Liberal party was in 1935, but so far as this house was concerned the government introduced its legislation in the session of 1936, and the present act is their responsibility. The present Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was set up by this government.

No law is any better than its administration, and where the administration of a law does not work for the benefit of the people of Canada, then, under our democratic system, the responsibility devolves upon the government of bringing in a measure to change that law. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), who spoke this afternoon, expressed a view that, coming from him, was rather a surprise to me, to the effect that he had a suspicion that those who opposed the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and its activities had some interest or ulterior motive. Let me say to him that I have no financial interest of any kind in any radio station, in any magazine, in any newspaper, in any interest that conflicts with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, nor in my professional practice have I any client who has such an interest.

The minister spoke of the committees which heard evidence on radio broadcasting prior to 1932. How well I remember the one that was not a parliamentary committee. Prior to 1932 a committee was set up, and represented upon it were the business element, the church element, the labour element, charitable and philanthropic societies, every phase of Canadian activity. That committee made a recommendation in favour of the nationalization of the radio. But why? With the object primarily of promoting Canadian unity. We in this house were told that the Americanization of this dominion by United States programs was the dominant factor behind the decision of the committee and of the parliament of that day to bring in a broadcasting act, and that another primary purpose was to develop in Canada all the varied resources of radio entertainment, in other words, that we might develop Canadian talent. We were to provide work for Canadian musicians, Canadian playwrights, Canadian actors, Canadian singers and Canadian technicians. Any members who were in the house at the time will remember that we were to limit advertising. We were told that it was this advertising which was so reprehensible to Canadian listeners, and all this boon we were to receive for the small sum of $1 per licence.

The radio commission was established in 1932 and struggled during its existence to improve Canadian programs, and I am not going to suggest that that commission or the one which is now in existence has not made some improvement in Canadian programs. I remember that one of the early acts of the old radio commission was to limit advertising on the air to the maximum of five minutes to the hour. Well, we had the advent of this new Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in 1936. We were told that in accomplishing our purpose it was going to be far superior to the old commission. It was to have a board of governors, upon which there were to be astute business men, and it was to be representative of all phases of Canadian activity. A new era was to dawn. After two years it has dawned, and it has dawned with a huge increase in United States advertising.

I have spoken of the representations made in this parliament as to the Americanization of Canada through the penetration of United States advertising. The minister in his speech to-day repeated the figures given by the chairman of the broadcasting corporation when he delivered an address a while ago in which he told us about the number of hours—eight and three-quarters out of ninety-eight—that were given up to United States advertising. He said:

> Advertising programs originating in the United States occupied eight and three-quarter hours of the ninety-eight hours broadcast weekly over the CBC network.

I do not know whether that gentleman, and the minister this afternoon, intended to create the impression, by that statement which has gone abroad, that eight and three-quarter hours constituted the only United States programs we were receiving, because what he meant and what the minister meant was that out of ninety-eight hours the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation were being paid for only eight and three-quarter hours of United States programs. If you take the very schedule produced by the chairman you will find that the total United States programs, in whatever week he took, amounted to twenty-six and one-quarter hours out of ninety-eight hours of broadcasting. Bear in mind that I am speaking now of the penetration of Canada, of the Americanization of Canada by United States programs. I quite agree with the minister that music is international, and unfortunately, not being on the investigating committee, I have no means of access to the records of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I have some familiarity only with the station in the neighbourhood from which I come. But hon. members will notice that when I asked the minister this afternoon as to the number of hours of United States broadcasting we have from CBL, the new 50,000 watt station near Toronto, which gives broadcasting coverage for the whole province of Ontario, I found that there was thirty-five per cent of commercial broadcasting, eighteen per cent of which is commercial United States broadcasting, which the minister explained meant paid advertising. I could not do anything with the figures he mentioned, because I do not know the week to which they relate.

The radio corporation sends out a bulletin issued in advance showing its programs for each week, and I took the trouble to have made, from the bulletin they turned out for this week, commencing with February 6, a chart which I now show to the members of the house. Every space marked in red on the chart is broadcasting in Canada by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of a program originating in the United States. What proportion of them is paid advertising I have no means of ascertaining without having access to the records of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

The minister says that the total radio broadcasting by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is ninety-eight hours. That again may apply to chain broadcasting. I am referring to CBL. But bear in mind that when I refer to CBL I am dealing with one-third of the population of Canada—I shall prove that before I finish. According to the bulletin turned out by the broadcasting corporation, from which that chart is computed, of 112½ broadcasting hours during this very week, 48 hours are occupied by United States programs. Again I cannot say what proportion is United States paid advertising. Now percentages sometimes are deceptive. When the minister tells us that eighteen per cent of the time of CBL is taken up with United States advertising programs that does not give a correct picture, because we must bear in mind that the most advantageous hours of broadcasting are recognized to be from eight a.m. to eleven a.m. and six p.m. to eleven p.m., with the exception of Saturday night. Let me turn back to that same chart, so that the house may have a picture of the position from eight a.m. to eleven a.m. every day of this week, everything shown in red being United States programs. The result is that on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, you have one hour of Canadian programs between eight a.m. and eleven a.m., and on Saturday only half an hour.

Mr. HOWE: May I ask a question?

Mr. LAWSON: Yes.

Mr HOWE: Are the hours between eight a.m. and eleven a.m. the advantageous hours spoken of?

Mr. LAWSON: So I am told by broadcasters.

Mr. HOWE: That is very interesting.

Mr. LAWSON: The largest audience is reached between eight a.m. and eleven a.m. except the audience reached between six p.m. and eleven p.m.

Mr. HOWE: I wish you were our salesman to sell that time.

Mr. LAWSON: Apparently the corporation is not having any difficulty in selling it, in view of the cut rates. I shall come to that before I finish. Now, referring to the hours between six p.m. and eleven p.m., the choicest hours of all with the exception of Saturday night, by observing that chart one will see that there are more United States programs than Canadian programs during those hours. With what result? With this result, that as the greatest number of listeners are reached between the hours I mentioned, the Canadian-sponsored broadcasts can be had only at the off hours, and the consequence of that is that the entertainers engaged for Canadian-sponsored programs receive small pay. In fact the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation pays singers and entertainers for broadcast programs $5, $7.50 and $10 per performance. Is that the encouragement we were told was to be given to Canadian talent in this country? The minister mentioned Sir Ernest MacMillan. Sir Ernest MacMillan heads one of the finest musical organizations in the country, the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, an orchestra which is maintained in large measure by public subscription, and which, in order to exist, has employed some of the finest musicians in this country at salaries so meagre that hon. members would find them incredible. Sir Ernest MacMillan was considered such a great Canadian musician and composer that he was knighted by His Majesty the King. May I ask why we have never had the Toronto Symphony Orchestra broadcast by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as a sustaining program? If Canadians are anxious to listen to Sir Ernest MacMillan leading the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, how much better it would be if Americans were listening to Sir Ernest MacMillan leading his own symphony orchestra in Canada. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) spoke of the joy he had in hearing the opening of the United States congress. I sincerely hope he was able to hear it through to the end, because I was listening to a broadcast of His Excellency the Governor General of Canada addressing the Scottish curlers when they were here, and it was cut off in the middle in order to bring on the Packard Motor Car program from the United States.

Mr. HOWE: May I ask the hon. member to what station he was listening?

Mr. LAWSON: I am sorry I cannot tell.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member was listening to a private station, for that could never happen on a Canadian Broadcasting Corporation station.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was listening in and I heard every word of the governor general's speech from beginning to end.

Some hon. MEMBERS: So did I.

Mr. LAWSON: In that event the Prime Minister must have been listening to a different station.

Mr. HOWE: On a CBC station.

Mr. LAWSON: May I say to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) that I understood the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation not only operates stations but controls all stations in Canada.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member is entirely wrong.

Mr. LAWSON: Pardon me, I am entirely right, and I shall read the statute if I have time left before I sit down.

Mr. HOWE: Read it now.

Mr. LAWSON: I am not going to read it now because I have much more important things to say than reading a statute at this moment. This is the development of Canadian talent and Canadian ideals which we are getting from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; this is the policy for which we are asked to pay increased licence fees. To those who may be labouring under the belief that programs now being heard are of an essentially educational and inspirational nature, designed to create and inspire a clearer concept of Canadian ideals, one has but to listen to the programs broadcast from time to time. It may be that there are those who like blackface comedians and Charlie McCarthy and the Stroud twins; I listen to it myself. Like the Minister of Transport and the Board of Governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, those who wish can now get a twenty-inch high cardboard facsimile of the dummy Charlie McCarthy by buying four pounds of dated coffee and sending in the coupons.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Made in Canada.

Mr. LAWSON: No, no coffee is made in Canada; it comes from Brazil. What happens is that Chase & Sanborn ship the beans in here and grind and package them in Montreal for Canadian consumption.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Have you any objection?

Mr. LAWSON: I think we may well ask in all seriousness what educational programs, what rich incidents of Canadian historical drama, what cultural aspects of Canadian life, what encouragement to Canadian practitioners of the arts have found a place in the program planning of the great Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? Make no mistake, I am not objecting to the broadcasting as sustaining programs of Charlie McCarthy or United States programs of any kind. But I am objecting to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation prostituting the purposes for which it was created by statute and charging the Canadian listeners increased licence fees for doing it, while our United States cousins can listen to it all and pay not a cent for it. That is the thing to which I am objecting.

Now I said I would come back to advertising. I said that formerly the Canadian radio commission placed a maximum limit on advertising of five minutes to the hour. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation when it came into power immediately doubled the maximum, making it ten minutes to the hour. Then recently they brought in a new policy, which is to solicit and sell to United States advertisers broadcasting time over our air channels in competition with the private stations which I again say the corporation has power to control.

Now let me come back to the chart for a moment. I stated that I had no means of knowing what percentage of the total of the United States programs was paid advertising. I have to accept the statement made by the chairman of the broadcasting corporation in this speech, in which he tells us that the revenue of the corporation from this source for this fiscal year will be about $400,000, and they want to reach a total of $500,000. If they are to obtain $500,000 net, Mr. Speaker, by the time they pay commissions to advertising solicitors and the different commissions paid to the stations they will have to raise at least $750,000 gross. While I am talking about paying I should like to know who paid the broadcasting corporation for this national broadcast by the chairman of that corporation? If it was paid for with the money of the people, by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, I want to know if anyone who is opposed to the policy of that corporation, as now accepted by the minister, is going to be given an opportunity of presenting the other side of the case. If not I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we will set up in this country a bureaucracy which ultimately will destroy this parliament if we put into the hands of any small group of men the power to broadcast their views with the cost paid by the people, raised in taxes, while they charge me $3,000 an hour for a coast to coast broadcast in order to give some picture of the other side of the question.

We are told by Mr. Brockington that he only wants advertising revenue up to $500,000 from this new scheme of selling advertising to the United States, and he says he only wants that until we are self-supporting from other sources. What are the other sources? The moment he ceases to take that advertising the only other source is the poor Canadian taxpayer who is going to have his radio licence fee increased not by fifty cents but by five dollars in order to raise the money required. Mr. Brockington says he only wants to sell this advertising until such time as he attains that happy position. That tempts me to repeat some comment I read in some paper, that it was exactly similar to a bank robber saying, "I only want two more hold-ups and then I will reform. I will have enough then with which to retire and live pleasantly for the rest of my days."

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, by the solicitation of United States advertising, is causing a serious loss to many industries in this country. There is only a fixed appropriation for advertising in Canada. That appropriation must be divided between national magazines, local magazines, weekly press, daily press, signboards and the radio. To the extent that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation participates in that advertising appropriation some other medium must lose. I believe private enterprise is willing to accept competition on an equal basis, but I say the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is using the money of the people as a subsidy to enable it to undersell private enterprise.

Let me show why I say that. In order to broadcast you have to lease wire lines. A private station leasing wire lines has to anticipate the total number of hours it is going to broadcast in any one day. Obviously it cannot get sponsored programs for the whole of the day. Therefore it has to pay wire charges for hours from which it gets no revenue. Consequently in fixing its prices for time on the air it has to take into account the hours during which it is using sustaining programs. The broadcasting corporation also has to lease wires for the number of hours it is going to use them during the day. But when it comes to fixing the price which it is going to charge the advertiser on a sponsored program for any hour, it does not have to make the rate as high as the private station, because the corporation says: Oh, the advertiser is paying the rate for that hour, and the money we raise from the people of Canada by taxation is paying for the other hours.

To-day the minister said there was a standard rate and that anybody could buy time on the air at that rate. I challenge that statement. I have in my hand a comparative schedule published by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the costs of each station, beside which I have the standard rate which I am asked to pay if I go to a private station. Again I will take the station I know best. CBL in Toronto. The published rate of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for one-half hour over CBL is $180. The standard rate—

Mr. HOWE: Is the hon. gentleman reading the rate for CBL as part of the chain or individually?

Mr. LAWSON: I am reading it as part of the chain.

Mr. HOWE: Then may I point out that the hon. gentleman is comparing two things which cannot be compared. If he will read the tariff for station CBL as a single station he will have something comparable with a private station.

Mr. LAWSON: All right; I am only talking about the private station as a private station. I have no chain figures available. The rate for CBL, as published by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, for one-half hour is $180. The standard rate, based upon a private station cost plus five per cent, is $165. As I stand in the house at the moment making this speech there sits in the Chateau Laurier a man with a contract in his pocket for a half-hour over that station at $120 less ten per cent, less fifteen per cent. That is why I challenge the statement made by the minister this afternoon.

Mr. HOWE: May I ask if that last price was for a chain broadcast or an individual broadcast?

Mr. LAWSON: An individual broadcast.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is very careless with his figures here. I hope he can substantiate them.

Mr. LAWSON: I seldom use figures I cannot substantiate. Give me a committee and the opportunity to substantiate them and I shall do so.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend asks for it I shall give it to him now.

Mr. LAWSON: In connection with this sale of United States advertising the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has established an attractive range of discounts, which pyramid as more stations are used, in order to attract that United States advertising. The Canadian stations cannot even arrange a chain of stations among themselves without going to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for approval. I am told that within the last few weeks a dozen contracts have been signed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for choice hours, such as I outlined to-day, and the Canadian advertiser has to take what is left.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me demonstrate to the house what our United States cousins think of their new privileges over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation chain. I am sure the initials N.B.C., meaning the National Broadcasting Company, are familiar to every member of the house, since that is one of the greatest corporations in the United States. They have produced an attractive advertisement, of which I hold a photostatic copy in my hand, designed to get business from United States advertisers over Canadian stations. On the front in large white letters on a black strip we find the letters NBC. Then, opposite the letter "N" we find the letters "ow," opposite "B" we find "etter" and opposite "C" we find "overage," the whole reading "NBC, Now Better Coverage in Montreal and Toronto." Turning to the inside page we find across the top "New NBC Canadian supplementary facilities in Montreal" and "in Toronto."

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): CBC?

Mr. LAWSON: No, this is NBC. Then they go on in these words:

Two major Canadian radio stations, CBM and CBF, in Montreal, joined NBC networks on November 14, 1937.

Then further down:

CBF: French-language station, full time, 50,000 watts, clear channel, 910 kilocycles, owned by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, is available (alone, or in combination with CBM or CFCF) to advertisers using either the basic blue or the basic red network.

Then, the next paragraph refers to Ontario:

NBC service in Ontario has just taken a big step forward. Station CRCT, NBC affiliate in Toronto, has increased its power—

And so on. Then they go on to say:

This is a clear-channel, full-time station operating on a frequency of 840 kilocycles. It is owned by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Then, on both sides I find notices as to the market, and it is stated that by using the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's station in Toronto one may reach the province of Ontario, with thirty-three per cent of the population of Canada, and that by using the station in Montreal one reaches twenty-seven per cent of the population. In other words, by using these two supplementaries to the national broadcasting chain the broadcaster reaches sixty per cent of the population of Canada—and the people of Canada have just paid, out of their licence fees to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, for completing these two new 50,000 watt stations.

What is the result of all this? The result is unemployment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAWSON: Yes, more unemployment to Canadian singers, Canadian musicians and Canadian technicians. Every time we take business from magazines and newspapers, by broadcasting United States advertising, we are putting printers, typesetters and other workers out of jobs. May I say to the hon. gentlemen who just said "Oh, oh," that that was not my expression. I am simply repeating a resolution passed in Toronto by the Trades and Labour Council. That resolution was passed within the last week, and published in the newspapers.

For the privilege of maintaining the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, created by this Liberal government, and maintaining the policies I have outlined, several branches of Canadian industry must be taxed to subsidize unfair competition with themselves; Canadian radio owners are being compelled to pay increased licence fees. I protest. On behalf of those associated with me in the Conservative ranks in the House of Commons, who have not yet had an opportunity to speak for themselves, I protest. On behalf of the people I represent in this chamber, I protest.

I promised the hon. member I would read the statute. If you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, I should like to be given an opportunity to lay my hand on the section stating that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has control over private stations. I am sorry that in the short time at my disposal I cannot put my hand upon it, but if hon. members interested—

Mr. HOWE: Because it is not there.

Mr. LAWSON: —will read chapter 24 of the statutes for 1936 they will find set out the power and control held by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation over private stations. If I might cite one instance of control, may I ask who it was that imposed the censorship about which I complained last year? Was it a private station or was it the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? If they cannot control what was broadcast over a private station, how do they censor the programs which go upon the air?

Mr. HOWE: Because the act gives them that privilege, but it does not give them the privilege to say how private stations shall run their programs.

Mr. LAWSON: I did not suggest that.

Mr. HOWE: What the hon. member stated is not the fact; why not say so?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, as I sat in the house when it opened at eight o'clock I was of opinion for a little while, when I saw so few members present, that my remarks this evening might take the form of a rather intimate conversation between yourself and myself, but I am happy to note now that the house is not quite so sparse as I thought for a moment it was going to be.

I regret that the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) is not in his seat at present because, with most of the other members of the house, I listened before the dinner recess with a great deal of interest to what he had to say. I felt that whatever his case was with respect to radio he was certainly presenting it very well, perhaps making the best of a bad case, but at all events presenting his ideas with some force. That aspect of radio criticism which has to do with, shall I say, the permeation of Canada with American ideas is one which interests me particularly, and I recall that the hon. member for York South did not seem to fear nearly so greatly the permeation of Canada with American ideas when he was the sponsor, if I remember correctly, of the "Mr. Sage" campaign which was carried on in 1935. Apparently in 1935 the belief must have existed, as I have said once before in the house, that the Canadian people were hardy enough to stand any such onslaught on their national thought and life; but apparently the situation is a little bit different now. At that time I remember we were a little afraid that the Conservative party had gone Yankee, but I was glad to note from the way the hon. member spoke this afternoon that if he ever had any such intentions he has recanted, retraced his steps, and is now facing in the other direction.

I also regret the absence from the house at the moment of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) because, in common with most hon. members, I listened the other day with considerable interest to his offering, if we might call it that, in this debate. During the recess we have all had an opportunity of noting in the various journals of the country that, what they were pleased to call the political truce existing between the leader of the opposition and the government, was going to come to an end, and we have all been on the qui vive to observe what would be the form of behaviour of the leader of the opposition in signalizing the end of that truce. It may have been observed that these journals to which I have referred made no mention, in speaking of the truce, and the ending of the truce, of the right hon. gentleman's party. Rather it was always said that the truce which "the leader of the opposition" had permitted to continue would come to an end. All these journals realized, in their references to the great Conservative party, that He was It, and It was He; that all the members of that party were comprehended in the term, "the leader of the party"—all except its organizer, who, it seems, will not go to work until the party gets a new leader.

We have now had an opportunity of observing the manner in which the truce came to an end. We have heard the theme song, one might say, of the right hon. leader of the opposition in the new play that he proposes to enact in Canada. I read over his speech very carefully, and I think most people will agree that, aside from captious criticism, from what in the language of the street we call just mud-slinging, there was very little in the speech at all. The theme song of 1930 was "Promises" and the play was entitled, "A pledge for every Parish." That yields place now to this new opera.

Very soon after commencing and being rude to a new member of the house, after first misrepresenting what that hon. member had said, we found the leader of the opposition going on to discuss the actions of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as though the Prime Minister had been a Roosevelt agent, or at any rate he allowed that inference to be drawn.

Then we had this great hint of corruption. That is the second offering we have for 1938—the hint of corruption—but so far the fear of making direct charges has restrained him.

There was also an attempt to make capital out of imaginary grievances supposed to exist somewhere in the cabinet, when such difficulties do not apparently exist at all.

Next we had an attack made upon men who are earnestly engaged in an important task throughout Canada, the important task of trying to lay the groundwork for greater unity and a greater degree of harmony in this country, something we all have known for a long time was necessary if this dominion was to endure. It would seem almost as if the leader of the opposition was afraid something was going to be accomplished. It would seem as if he wanted to render nugatory the work that any person else might attempt. The work of that royal commission was misrepresented. Surely it was a misrepresentation to suggest that its business was to amend the constitution of Canada. That was his suggestion. Indeed the words he used very clearly stated that the commission was engaged in amending the constitution, when as a matter of fact there is in the terms of reference to that commission no foundation whatever for any such suggestion. But it would seem that to state the case thus would engender fear in the country. It would seem as though, adopting the words of the speech from the throne—"the strains and stresses" of confederation—he had taken for his motto: If there are not enough strains and stresses in this confederation now, I will put in a few more.

Then there was his attempt to turn the east against the west, and city against city, saying that certain things had been promised in the St. Henry by-election, and that if Montreal can get such and such a promise why cannot Calgary get it, why cannot Vancouver get it, why not Edmonton, why not Winnipeg? But when you come to look at that a little more carefully, you will find that they can get that promise, that they have had that promise. It has been implicit all along in all relief arrangements, that what was indicated in the St. Henry by-election had been the order of the day in all these other places. As the right hon. gentleman puts it himself, it was said: "If local government fails, the central government will not fail". That, Mr. Speaker, has always been understood, and there has never been any difficulty about it. The only difficulty there has been was whether or not the local governments would get to the point of admitting complete failure.

The real difficulty about relief is not that. The difficulty we have here in the matter of sharing relief costs is, in my opinion, that the central government has never taken its full share, the share it should have taken, of this relief expense. But at that, the present handling of the relief problem is immeasurably superior to what it was over the five long years between 1930 and 1935. We have here, however, an attempt to set one section of the country against another by suggesting that one section can get what another section cannot. That, decidedly, is not the case, but it apparently suits the right hon. gentleman's convenience to speak that way. I would not say that he is malevolent, that he definitely wishes ill but his approach to this particular problem could hardly be different if he were malevolent. He would create two stresses where there was only one before, and two strains where there had been only one.

I wish also to put on record again, what most likely all have noticed, his misrepresentation of the position of Canada in the money market. It was said that the position of Canada was inferior to that of Australia, and facts were given to bear out this conclusion. A comparison of an Australian loan with a Canadian loan was made. Of course we know that what was stated was not true. Next day the inaccuracy of these remarks was exposed. Then, if nothing else had occurred, it would be our business to consider whether the right hon. gentleman knew of the untruth at the time he stated it. He tells us, however, that he had in mind a former loan of Australia, that he got the facts respecting it and then compared that former loan with one of the Dominion of Canada which was a current loan, and, thus endeavouring to compare things which were not comparable, he concluded that Canada's position in the money market was inferior to that of Australia. Since he asks us to believe that is what he did, of course there is not any question about its being believed. But if a little more care had been taken, the critique in his main speech would not have gone out to the country in the way it did; and when you publish a statement throughout the country, any amount of explanation afterwards will never quite overtake the misrepresentation originally made.

I remember a story about a clergyman who, being slandered, went to the woman who had slandered him, and explained the situation to her. She promptly accepted the explanation and made an apology. But he conducted her to a high place and gave her a cushion or a pillow or a bag of feathers and asked her to scatter the contents about. This she did, and he then said to her, "Now just put them back in the bag." Of course she could not do it. The clergyman realized that no further explanation was needed to demonstrate to her the impossibility of catching up with a false statement when it had once been made. In this particular case we have, either a deliberate attempt—and that must be ruled out—to misrepresent the position of Canada, or negligence in the discovery and presentation of facts; consequently there is a misrepresentation of Canada's position, and so the situation is just as bad as if it had been deliberate.

In going over the speech of the leader of this once great party I find in it only one concrete statement of political philosophy, and that, it would seem, is just a little bit more absurd than any other declaration he has ever made. That was the declaration that free trade makes for war. I do not propose at the moment to pursue the general idea of tariff making and the philosophy underlying tariffs, because I believe there will be plenty of opportunity at a later time. But I wish to remark at this time that this question of high tariff and low tariff should not be regarded as an east versus west proposition. It seems to me that the concept which better pictures this problem is that of primary producers paying by way of taxes and higher prices for processes; it is the concept of the primary producer versus the processor. Perhaps, in view of the fact that the proportion of primary producers in western Canada is larger some people there get into the habit of looking upon this particular controversy as one of west versus east. But I think we should not allow ourselves to fall into that error, because decidedly it is not the true nature of the issue.

But revert for a moment to the "Free Trade Brings War" doctrine. Here you have it that Peel and Canning caused the Crimean war when they reduced duties on a large number of articles, and particularly when, after Canning's death, Peel became in favour of the repeal of the Corn Laws and brought about almost complete free trade. As a matter of fact the right hon. gentleman, I believe, particularly mentioned the Crimean war and related it to these particular acts of these English statesmen. So all British wars thereafter up to the time of the great war appear to have been caused, on this theory, by the free trade policy of Great Britain. And further, in view of the fact that no nation in the world except Great Britain practised free trade before the great war, the responsibility for that war must also rest almost entirely upon the shoulders of Great Britain. That is the doctrine of the right hon. gentleman. It is a proposition so absurd that one wonders how his mouth could have framed the words.

A few years ago, when he went to England and endeavoured to persuade them to adopt a protective policy his speeches were denominated by a member of the British cabinet, and have been known from that time until now, as the "Humbug" speeches. Apparently, although Jimmie Thomas called his talk "Humbug," what the right hon. gentleman was really doing, was persuading the people of Great Britain to become peaceful and to adopt protection, for to adopt protection would be the same thing as to turn their faces in the direction of peace. Also, since the world war, when economic nationalism seems to have run riot, the fact that every nation in the world has gone in for protection to a greater or less degree is apparently the reason why the world has been so peaceful. After the nations adopted the policies of the leader of the once great Conservative party peace descended upon the world, not exactly like a dove but more like a flock of bats. I do not suppose the world has ever had a worse time from the standpoint of peace and war than in the years since the treaty of Versailles.

There is the only concrete proposition that has been laid before the house by the leader of the opposition in his lengthy speech. We have some criticism; we have harmful criticism; we have stress creating criticism; we have strain creating criticism; and conjoined with these we have the one proposition that if you do not go in for more and more protection you are likely to be drawn into war. There we have his whole contribution, and I wish to make record of it in the house at this time in order that there may be no mistake about it.

As for myself, I wish to introduce one or two declarations I have to make with reference to the speech from the throne by asserting again, as I have often asserted before, that I do not belong to any party of a fascist or communistic nature and that I do not rest under any iron heel of discipline. Nor, since we are talking about political parties, do I answer to the crack of any party whip; in fact, I have never heard of any whip to the crack of which anyone else had to answer. I work and do my thinking in the genial warmth of the Liberal party, in which there is freedom of expression, freedom of expression as in Tennyson's England, where a man might speak the thing he would.

I realize that I am often impatient, but I believe that in the long run greater advancement will be made by working from within the party where one can find kindred spirits, than by any other means. Greater progress has been made in that way in the past, and that will hold true in the future. Of my friends who are called left-wingers, I often think that if one-tenth of the energy they devote to the organization of more extreme party forms were spent in working with, shall I say, the more impatient ones within the Liberal party, ten times more progress could be made than by the method they are pursuing. However, I have no wish to push my own ideas down anyone else's throat; everyone has his own way of working.

I propose, as my conscience from time to time directs me, to express any thoughts that occur to me, whether they are completely in consonance with the ideas of my party, or to express views not yet having gained status by an ex cathedra utterance. I feel that in doing so I would not be in any way like the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Hyndman) who, a few days ago, when he expressed willingness to see factories in Windsor and Oshawa closed, butted his revered and honoured leader in the stomach—metaphorically speaking, of course. The right hon. gentleman must have been astounded by that blow.

It is sometimes said that the government does not move fast enough, and we have before us at the present time an amendment to that effect. As I have already indicated, I have a fellow feeling with healthy impatience; but there are two points to be noted in that connection, and they stand out in bold relief. In the first place, you cannot very well say about the government that it is not doing this and that; that it is not advancing this and that measure, and every other proposal put up to it, and at the same time accuse it of being a mere vote-catching administration. You cannot have it both ways. The second point that stands out is this. When you bear in mind the tremendous increase in the mortgage debt of Canada which was incurred in the last five years before this government took hold, an increase approaching a thousand millions of dollars, you are bound to realize that, with the extra burden thus imposed, many plans which one would desire to attempt—costly plans—cannot be immediately proceeded with. And I say that, in spite of the fact that I myself am impatient. I think, however, that when people are impatient they should try to cool themselves so as to be just.

Personally I regret the absence from the speech from the throne of any specific reference to the question of aid to low cost housing plans. I realize that this may not mean its exclusion, and no doubt a further opportunity will be afforded to deal with the matter. I should like to observe, however, that assistance to the construction industry, which seems to be about the most depressed of all, would break the back of unemployment, and I hope to see something of that sort introduced into the house.

I welcome the references which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has made to the padlock law of Quebec. I must say candidly that if statutes are to be disallowed, I believe that statute should be disallowed. I apologize for not having said so last year; I should have made that statement then. I feel very strongly about this matter. I believe that if any statute should be disallowed, that one should be; it should not be allowed to stand. The reason I did not express this opinion last year was that I thought the law would be a dead letter. I was wrong, and I now endeavour to make amends for my failure on that occasion. Mind you, I am in favour of all necessary safeguards against subversive action, but they must be safeguards and they must be necessary.

Turning for a moment from that subject, may I say how welcome to me is the reference in the speech from the throne to unemployment insurance. I am not one of those who expect too much from any statute of that sort. I believe it is probably only one of the steps that will have to be taken in an endeavour to end this scourge of unemployment. No laws that we can enact could be perfect, and I should expect that any law would have to be amended almost as soon as it became operative. I certainly commend the wisdom of seeking to obtain provincial approval of any such amendment, but I hope that lack of complete provincial approval will not hold up the address of this parliament to the British parliament asking for the amendment of the British North America Act, because it would seem to me that we must get the law operating soon, in order that we may acquire the experience necessary for further advance in an endeavour to wipe out what seems so far at any rate to be an inherent defect in the system under which we live.

I am glad to see this unemployment insurance proposal for another reason, namely that it marks the adoption of the principle of greater responsibility of the central government in respect to unemployment. I should have been glad if that principle had been adopted a little more definitely with reference to the relief difficulties that we have had in Canada for the last several years. Last year I had an opportunity of saying to the house something about the plight of the cities and the heavy load they are made to carry. I feel that the division of the cost of unemployment relief which results in putting more than one-third upon communities which can obtain money only by direct taxation, and that upon a very narrow base, mainly real estate, is not fair. I am not saying for a moment that I believe the central government should carry the whole burden, but I say that when a division is made which results in a city such as that from which I come being forced at certain times to carry well up to fifty per cent of the total load, that division is not fair. At the present time my city is being forced to find somewhere in the neighbourhood of $1,500,000 for this year, with all avenues of taxation already exhausted—a well nigh impossible task. I suppose there will be not more than 30,000 people upon whom the necessary levy can be made in order to obtain that large sum of money. The situation in Regina, Vancouver, Edmonton, Saskatoon and most other cities is substantially the same, according to the information which they severally have given to me.

Touching further upon this unemployment problem it seems to me that the two most important aspects of it, if you can single two out from many, are those of the soldier veteran and the youth of the country. As to the former I understand a special opportunity will arise later when we come to consider a report; therefore I need say nothing about it at the present time. But, sir, it is impossible to overstate the importance of youth training and youth reclamation work. If the government of the day had done nothing else, its advance upon this problem during the recess would be sufficient to entitle it to the continued confidence of the people. What has been done is not so much in itself as an earnest of what is to be. Now, according to the speech from the throne the work is to be continued and the plan enlarged.

I have kept in very close touch with youth, both employed and unemployed, and I believe there is no sadder sight, and one could not have a sadder experience, than to find young men and young women hopeless because jobless. We seem always to be in danger of falling into the needless use of superlatives in discussing problems of this sort; yet even at that risk I say that I do not believe any country has any other assets quite equal in value to its youth. Continuing the thought of the youth of our country being wealth, I think I am justified in saying that youth is the greatest jewel of the country. And to permit idleness among youth, to such an extent at any rate as to sap their morale or begin to render them incapable of seizing opportunities when they arise, is comparable with throwing your jewels into the sea. No price is too great to pay to prevent this from happening, and no price that can be paid hereafter will restore our loss if we permit it to happen.

Now, as I have already indicated, there is much that I should like to see done. I have expressed dissatisfaction with some things; I have failed to express the satisfaction that I feel with many other things, but time does not permit. While I have various aspirations and aims and ideals I would sacrifice them all and accept anything if I knew that the young people of the country were being saved for the country; that they were going to get their chance. As far as I am concerned everything else may go by the board if youth gets its chance. And observing what has been done and realizing that more is now to be done in the way of training and reclamation of youth, I feel that in this respect at any rate I should be content. There is more hope in that one section of the speech from the throne than in any other part of it.

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal): There is no doubt in my mind that the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne have been amply congratulated by hon. members of the house. I would not wish to make the expression commonplace by repeating it; nevertheless my feelings are just as sincere towards those two gentlemen as the feelings of those who have already expressed them in more graceful language. I know that the task committed to the charge of those two newly elected members was a delicate one, and involved a rather heavy responsibility. The government could have made their task more pleasant, more enjoyable and more satisfactory if they had brought before the house something of a more commendable nature by way of an address. Very unfortunately the newly elected members had rather a bare bone on which to chew. It was unfortunate for them that they had to make their initial speeches under such circumstances; nevertheless even under those circumstances they acquitted themselves well, and I add my congratulations to those already extended.

I should like also to pay my tribute, humble but sincere, to the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) on an honour that has come to him in recent months. It is an honour well deserved, and I am sure that there is not a member of the house, on either side, who is not sincere in expressing his congratulations to the right hon. gentleman. I hope he has a long life still ahead of him in which he may enjoy the full vigour of health, so that in due course we on this side will have the privilege of addressing him, sitting to the left of the Speaker, as the right hon. former Minister of Justice.

May I express the hope that the mover of the address has left behind him a certain atmosphere which must have accumulated during his long term of service in the legislature of Quebec, and particularly during the last few years of that service, when he had the misfortune to be a member of the now famous Taschereau regime. I am hoping that in the pleasant surroundings of this house, with the congenial companionship that he will find here on both sides, he will soon learn that he has migrated to a vastly different atmosphere, and that anything he has said or done in the past will be completely forgotten. I followed the campaign in Lotbiniere with some degree of interest, for it has been my privilege to know the newly elected member for that constituency for a number of years. I remember him in Quebec in 1917, during rather troublesome times, rather hectic days in that province, when the lives of certain politicians of a certain faith were not worth a great deal. I remember him, as a member of the legislative assembly, rising in his seat and moving a resolution which I desire to read. I am sure hon. members will appreciate this reference, which will enable them better to understand the antecedents from which the hon. member has graduated. At that time the hon. gentleman was a member of the Quebec legislature for the constituency of Lotbiniere, the same constituency which he now represents in this house. This is the resolution he moved:

> This house is of opinion that the province of Quebec will be disposed to accept rupture of the federal pact of 1867 if in the opinion of the other provinces it is believed that the said province is an obstacle to the union, to the progress and the development of Canada.

Unfortunately they do not keep a record of the proceedings in that legislature such as we have here. Otherwise I should have had an opportunity of reading some of the choice phrases then used by the hon. gentleman in support of this resolution. That, however, indicates the atmosphere which the hon. gentleman has left, and I wish him well in the atmosphere he is now enjoying.

I should like also to direct the attention of the house to the misuse of the result of that by-election in Lotbiniere. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) characterized it, in his usual manner, as another evidence that the people of this country were well satisfied with the policies of the present government. You will excuse me, Mr. Speaker, for using the word "policies"; I use it because the Prime Minister also used it. For my part I fail to see any policy that the present government has, but those were the terms the Prime Minister saw fit to use. I want to point out that the policies of the present government were not discussed during the by-election in Lotbiniere. I should like to quote a statement by the present member for Lotbiniere, who was the candidate representing the Liberal party in that by-election. This statement appeared in L'Action Catholique, which is published in the city of Quebec, and which certainly is not a Conservative paper:

> The victorious candidate expressed himself as "flatly opposed to our spending one single dollar, one single cent, to equip and send one sole soldier to a war foreign to Canada."

I compared that with the statement made in Paris by the Prime Minister, and I could not understand how the right hon. gentleman could suggest that the success of his candidate in Lotbiniere indicated the goodwill of the people towards the policies of the present government. This is the statement made by the Prime Minister, and I contrast it with the statement made from a public platform by the present member for Lotbiniere:

> Some people have been implying since the imperial conference that Canada wished to withdraw more from the affairs of the commonwealth of British nations. This is entirely untrue. We like to manage our own affairs, but any threat to England would immediately bring Canada to her side.

That is a quotation from the London Times. It is, I should say, rather opposed to the statement by the hon. member for Lotbiniere.

I should like to emphasize the point I am making, namely that the election of the hon. member for Lotbiniere was no vindication of the policy of the present government, by quoting again from L'Action Catholique:

> It appears that in certain circles the great victory of the Hon. J. N. Francœur in Lotbinière is interpreted as an approbation of a policy of armament.
>
> There should not be a mistaken idea on this point. Inasmuch as the electorate of Lotbinière endorsed the present armament policy it was with the condition that these armaments serve exclusively for the defence of Canada. To pretend that Lotbinière expressed its willingness to give a blank cheque for armaments would be going pretty far.
> If Mr. Francœur and Mr. Lapointe had showed themselves less hostile to participation in imperialistic wars, the result would have been quite different, even in a county that is Liberal by tradition. . . . The vote in Lotbinière is a frankly anti-imperialist vote.

I want the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) to note that statement, because he was given to making certain misstatements in the by-election in Victoria which would lead the people in that section of the country to believe that the present government was very much pro-imperialistic.

While we are on the subject of by-elections may I for a moment digress to speak about the by-election in Victoria. I feel that the manner in which that by-election was conducted, from the Liberal side, was a disgrace to the public life of Canada. I consider that if there is any justification for the formation of fascist and communist organizations in Canada, they will find a certain justification in the statements made from public platforms by men who are presumed to be enjoying public confidence and to hold responsible positions. The people are losing confidence in those men in high office. They are losing confidence because of the rash, ridiculous statements these people make to win by-elections.

May I draw to the attention of the house a statement made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) in support of the expenditure of certain moneys at the Pacific coast for armament and defence I quote from the Victoria Daily Times of November 19, a paper which is probably more pro-Liberal than any other paper in Canada:

> The minister referred to the appropriation for this purpose, for British Columbia increased from the 1935-36 total of the Bennett regime of $1,916,000 to $5,817,000 with an additional $2,346,000 for air equipment. This was a program for the Pacific coast from Prince Rupert to Esquimalt, including points at Vancouver and Vancouver Island which could not be completed until 1940.
> "If I am here," said the minister, "not as a Liberal or as a politician but as Minister of National Defence, who has had some difficulty in this program to ask you to indicate to the government do you approve of these policies of security for the Pacific coast, or do you not?"
> Mr. Mackenzie mentioned he had had some difficulty in securing these estimates and urged Victoria electors to give their endorsement by sending to Ottawa a man who could assist him.
> Mr. Mackenzie pointed out the naval magazine in Esquimalt had been condemned as far back as 1905 but nothing had been done about it until the Liberal government did it, and told how Canada's forces had been starved to deterioration during the depression.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and members of the house, this question: Does any man with a high sense of public responsibility feel that under the circumstances those statements by the Minister of National Defence were justified? I ask hon. members to consider those statements carefully. We voted to his department the sum of $35,000,000 to be used for purposes of national defence. That was to be administered as a sacred trust fund by the Minister of National Defence, through the department over which he has control. But instead of administering it as a sacred trust he saw fit to bring it on to the political platform, to parade it before the electorate of Victoria and to state to them, "In view of the fact that through my department I have spent $5,000,000 or $6,000,000, therefore you should support the Liberal candidate." Appeals of that nature are most degrading, and are not in any way uplifting in the minds of our people. Sooner or later such appeals are going to undermine the democratic principles we enjoy. I make that statement without animosity, feeling that I am speaking in the public interest. I say it because I feel that every man and woman in Canada with any understanding of the responsibility of that minister feels that he no longer is justified in holding his present position and in asking for a further appropriation of about $30,000,000 to be spent in a similar manner during the coming year.

I would develop the point at greater length, but I notice the time is slipping by. I had intended, however, to refer to the statements made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, when in the course of the by-election he took advantage of a last minute broadcast, so that no reply could be given. In that broadcast he made statements which were justified neither by fact nor even by possibility of fact. In putting before the public certain information which he must have known would not bear close scrutiny, and which he knew would not receive close scrutiny, on account of the fact the contest was almost at an end, I believe he transgressed even the ordinary rules of debate. In one part of his observations he said this:

> The real issue in Victoria's by-election that has been made by Mr. Bennett is: "Are you in Victoria going to support the government of Canada going along with Great Britain and other nations of the empire in working out a world trade policy, suitable to the needs of 1937, or are you going to stay with Mr. Bennett on his 'Canada First' program of 1930," said Mr. McGeer. "Are you going to vote for the empire and empire unity, or are you going to vote for Mr. Bennett's condemnation of the empire policy developed at the imperial conference in 1937."

I have not seen tabled in the house any report of an imperial trade agreement or an imperial policy embodying a trade agreement, as a result of the imperial conference of 1937, and neither has the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. The policy he was enunciating there is a direct development of that policy enunciated in 1930 by the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), and the direct result of the empire trade agreements reached in this building in 1932. Yet in a last minute broadcast the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard would wish the people of Victoria to understand that those trade agreements were the result of the imperial conference of 1937, and that the present government should take credit for development along those lines.

The hon. member went even farther, and made a comparison of figures. Of course he was most happy in his choice of figures. It was his desire to suggest that the trade agreement with the United States had shown a very favourable trade balance in favour of Canada. In giving the figures he stopped where it was convenient for him to stop, namely, at the end of August. He failed to go on to give the figures for September, October and November. If I may be permitted to do so I shall now set them out. For September, October and November of 1936 we had a favourable Canadian balance of $25,366,000. That is the figure arrived at after comparing the imports of Canada from the United States with the exports of Canada to the United States. For the same three months of 1937, however, we find a favourable United States trade balance of $19,597,000. Hon. members will recall that when we were discussing the agreement the leader of the opposition and his colleagues suggested that the market in the United States was a most uncertain one, and that we in Canada should be dependent upon the more certain market offered in Great Britain. This is proven by the figures. The trade balance is now against us and in favour of the United States and is likely to continue so.

Just one more reference to the Victoria by-election. The premier of British Columbia gave vigorous support to the Liberal candidate, and assured his audiences during the campaign that they need fear no contamination from a Liberal candidate being elected for Victoria. He expressed the feeling that the government would see that the beneficial results of the British Empire agreements were consolidated and retained so far as Canada was concerned. On more than one occasion he assured his audiences that such would be the case. After assuring them during the course of the by-election that that would be the case, why did he do a loop-the-loop act in the provincial legislature in order to bolster up his own position in the province? After assuring audiences in Victoria that they had nothing to fear from the present government so far as empire trade agreements were concerned, listen to this motion which was moved early in December by the premier of British Columbia himself and forwarded to the government at Ottawa:

> This house favours the principle of empire preferences and urges upon the dominion government the great importance to British Columbia of the maintenance of existing markets in Great Britain and other parts of the empire.

After deceiving the people of Victoria, telling them they had nothing to fear, he brings forward this resolution in the legislature at Victoria requesting the present government at Ottawa to safeguard what the previous Conservative government had won in 1932.

I was going to refer to the St. Henry by-election, but that has already been referred to. Lavish promises were made in that campaign by ministers who are at present members of this house. I want to read a statement made by the member-elect, now the member for St. Henry (Mr. Bonnier) shortly after his election. It shows a very high standard of public idealism. The member-elect was interviewed, and this is the substance of the interview. He was asked if he was going to retain a double mandate, namely, the honour of being alderman for St. Paul ward in the city of Montreal as well as being member of parliament for St. Henry, and he assured them that such was his intention:

> "Why not," answered the councilman for St. Paul ward. "The people in my district have given me their confidence. I am ready to fulfil a double mandate and remain on Parliament Hill as well as at the city hall—"

I want the house to notice what follows:

> "—to get public works which had been promised for my division."

What high idealism! He comes here to help solve our national problems, and here we have his reason for being in this house supporting the present government—to get public works for his division. What public works? The interview continues:

> First, a tunnel under the Lachine canal. Then the abolition of railway tracks and level crossings in St. Henry. This would come with the construction of the Canadian National Railway station at the site of the big hole on Dorchester street. I also figure on getting a bridge to link the down-under division with the Notre Dame de Grace area. After his federal division gets these, he'll say good-bye to Ottawa. Concordia is enough for him.

We welcome, Mr. Speaker, to this house the hon. member for St. Henry, who will be of considerable assistance to both sides in bringing to bear important opinion upon our great national questions. Does the house realize that what has been promised in St. Henry involves the expenditure at the very least of $50,000,000? Is one by-election in St. Henry worth the price of $50,000,000? And, remember, the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) said that this would be done before the next election. It is not worth it, and it lowers the standard by which public life is viewed by the public of Canada when we have statements of that kind from our public men, seeking to come here to help solve our great national problems.

I was going on to relate other incidents, but I shall close that part of my remarks. I was going to refer to the Taschereau government in Quebec that is now out of office. Many of the supporters of that government are now supporting this government. I assume they are glad to get away from the kind of atmosphere which prevailed down there. They have a better atmosphere in that province now. The only comparison I was able to find in Canadian history with the Taschereau government, defeated in the province of Quebec in 1936, was the famous "Hug-the-machine" Liberal government in the province of Ontario. Every time I look at Canadian history from the point of view of standards of public life it seems that it is generally, if not always, a Liberal government which is involved in conditions of the kind to which I have made passing reference.

An hon. MEMBER: How about the Roblin government?

Mr. WALSH: For every Conservative government that can be named, I can name two or three Liberal governments that fell, and fell far more badly, from grace than any Conservative government ever knew how to fall. That brings to my mind a conversation which took place on the train between Montreal and Ottawa. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) will remember a very pleasant trip we had in the fall. I was talking to a gentleman on the train coming here to do business, or at least he thought he was going to do business, with the Department of National Defence, and he wanted to know where the department was. "Do you know," he said, "what I am going up for? For thirteen years my firm has had regular business from the department, and now I have not heard from them for over a year." I said, "There must be some mistake. You will find them pretty nice fellows over there." I came back on the train with him and asked him how he had got along. "Not so good," he said. "What happened?" I asked. He told me he had asked them why he had not received any inquiries or any orders, and he said they told him, "Well, you do not manufacture your goods in Canada." "Oh, yes," he said, "we do. We have a big plant in Montreal, and all our material, containers and everything else, is made in Montreal." Well, that did not go over so good. They said to him. "Your name is not on the list." "What list?" he asked. They said, "The patronage list." "Oh," he said, "I did not know there was any such list." "Oh, yes, there is," they told him. "Then by what means do I get my name on that list?" he asked. "I am afraid you will have to see the patronage committee in Montreal," they said.

Now that is a fact, Mr. Speaker, and that is what I understand is regularly taking place in a great many departments of the government at Ottawa. There, at any rate, is one illustration that I know is an absolute fact.

I was going to speak of the attitude of the present government towards provincial legislation. I was going to ask why they had not done something about the Ontario legislation and the so-called padlock legislation referring to communists in the province of Quebec, but I see my time will not permit. In passing let me say that I do not agree with the padlock law. I agree with the object which the premier of Quebec has in view, but I do not agree with the method he is pursuing by putting that statute on the books. I want to say in justification of the premier of that province that he is no separatist. He is not trying to bring about disunion in Canada. Listen to these words of Premier Duplessis, spoken at Longueuil on January 15:

> No separatist spirit can prevail in the province of Quebec, for the province intends to remain an integral part of the dominion.

That is his attitude, and that attitude he will maintain. Although we find him opposed to changes in the British North America Act, there are good and sufficient reasons, for he belongs, so far as the dominion is concerned, to a minority race. In that province I myself belong to a minority race, and I am in agreement with him and with my friend the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) that there should be no changes in the British North America Act but that we should endeavour to meet conditions as they arise by some other method than that proposed by the present government.

I was also going to refer, if time would allow, to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, but that matter has already been amply covered. I only wish to say that I am in entire disagreement with the policy which is being pursued by this government. Naturally I disagree with the increase in the licence fee from two dollars to two and a half dollars, but that is of minor importance. I disagree with the principle of their policy. You cannot have growing up in this country a publicly owned institution along with a privately owned institution of the same nature. Either you have to adopt the British broadcasting system or the system in the United States. The institution should be either publicly owned or privately owned. It cannot be jockeyed midway between the two. It is not fair to the privately owned stations or to the ratepayers of this country to put the corporation in competition with regular business. As hon. members know, one of the principles of government is that the government should not engage in business but should strive to regulate business. I believe the radio is of national and international importance, and for that reason it should be put on the same basis as the post office, on the same basis as the telegraph and telephone systems of Great Britain, and made a public utility supported by the government for the convenience of the people living within the dominion.

I also intended to refer to the Americanization of our purchasers in this country, but that has already been satisfactorily covered.

As regards the railway situation, I can refer to it because in the speech from the throne it is covered by a negligible quantity of words, in fact no words at all. There is no reference to what the government proposes to do to solve this great problem. It is on our hands. It is not of Conservative creation. I do not intend to review the history of this problem; it is sufficient to say that it is of such magnitude as to require immediate attention. Liberal members when they were sitting on this side of the house urged the then Conservative government to deal courageously with this matter. Have the Liberals dealt courageously with it? What have they done since coming into office towards solving the railway problem? They have done two things. First, against the express recommendation of the Duff commission they did away with the trustee system and established a board of directors. Second, they introduced last year Bill No. 12, to create a new financial set-up for the new Canadian National Railways, thereby taking away from the railway's statement that which meant anything to the citizens of Canada, in that it showed them exactly what that system meant financially to this country. I have in my hand a resolution which was passed by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, at Vancouver, requesting the government to take "resolute and constructive action to solve the railway problem." I have another resolution from the Federation des Chambres de Commerce de la province de Quebec. After reciting their reasons for making the resolution for presentation to the government, it continues:

Be it resolved, that representations be made to the government of Canada urging the pressing necessity of adopting effective measures to secure the most economical operation of Canada's railway systems, in order not only to eliminate the deficits of the Canadian National railways, thereby reducing the drain on the federal treasury, but also to improve the financial position of the privately-owned railway whose good credit means so much to Canada as a whole.

These organizations represent a large body of public opinion. Yet the present government are giving no lead in the direction of a possible solution of this gigantic problem. I trust that during the course of this session we on this side of the house will be given ample opportunity to discuss the possibilities of a solution. Mr. C. H. Carlisle, president of the Dominion Bank, says that the country's great railway problem would be the more speedily and efficiently settled were it free from party politics. I quite agree. I suggest that it can be settled by the present parliament. In this house are hon. members who are conversant with that problem, public spirited citizens representing all parties, and if a special committee of the house were appointed and the government bound themselves to accept a unanimous report from that committee, I believe that in sitting around a table and forgetting our politics we would soon reach an agreement and a settlement that would be advantageous alike to Canada, to the Canadian National Railways, and to the privately owned corporation, the Canadian Pacific railway. I am not advocating unification, but I do believe it is the only solution so far presented which merits some consideration. I am prepared to receive other suggestions and give them equal consideration, but I honestly believe that a select committee of the house could settle this problem during the course of the present session and relieve Canada of the financial milestone which hangs around her neck. Do hon. members realize that, of the total debt of the dominion, namely $4,750,000,000, over fifty per cent is directly chargeable to the Canadian National Railways and to our venture into public ownership? When hon. members are confronted with facts of that nature they will readily understand why I feel, as others do, that it is urgent that the present government and the present parliament should tackle the problem involved in our railways in the courageous manner suggested by an hon. member, a Liberal member, when he was sitting on this side of the house.

One last word. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has placed before parliament the main estimates for the coming year. They amount to $418,968,899, and compare with estimates last year of $410,465,397, representing an increase of $8,503,502. The supplementary estimates are still to come. Is it not unfortunate that, knowing that the people of Canada are overburdened with taxation, the present government cannot see its way clear to reduce rather than to increase expenditure? To that total of $8,503,000 I want to add this figure: During the year there was saved by the present government through a policy of conversion the sum of $6,000,000. That has also been spent, so that the total increase this year over the same estimates of last year is $14,503,502, a tremendous increase, a stupendous amount of money for the parliament of Canada to be spending on a population of eleven million. I leave it to hon. members to figure out the per capita of that expenditure; I leave it to them to say whether such an increase is at all justifiable; I leave it to them to say whether they are playing fair with the people of Canada in increasing rather than reducing government expenditure.

The present government came into office on promises to reduce expenditures, to reduce taxation. Have we seen any material evidence of action in that direction? The first step this government took was to increase the revenue by increasing the sales tax from six to eight per cent Their next step now is to add a further burden of fifty cents a set on radios and to extend the fee to all sets which anyone may have within the precincts of his home. What other steps are going to be taken by the government to increase taxation still further it is hard to say, and probably only one with a vivid imagination can guess what expenditures will be required by them before they leave office.

Is there anything of political significance in the increase in the amount of money required by the present government as shown by the estimates? Do they contemplate an election? Do they contemplate fulfilling some of the rash promises they made in Victoria, St. Henry, and other parts of the country? I would ask the hon member for St. Henry to go through the estimates carefully. If he does so he will not find in them any reference to a tunnel under the Lachine canal; he will not find any reference to the removal of railway tracks from his division of St. Henry;

he will not find any reference to an appropriation to be used to fill the hole on Dorchester street; nor will he find anything that will lead him to believe that the present government is going to build a bridge from the lower St. Henry division to the section of Notre Dame de Grace.

I leave these thoughts with hon. members and with the government, and ask them to look at the facts from a non-partisan point of view, so far as expenditures, radio and railways are concerned, and to give the public for once in their lives a really square deal.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): My first words in this third session of the present parliament will be those of congratulation to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on the way he represented our country at the coronation of the king and queen last summer. I am sure the whole of Canada was delighted with our representation at that time. My next words will be those of congratulation to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) on the honour conferred upon him in being made a member of the British privy council. Regardless of race or creed, Canadians of all classes from one end of the country to the other, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, regard the right hon. the Minister of Justice as a great Canadian. My next words will be those of congratulation to the mover (Mr. Francoeur) and the seconder (Mr. Warren) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It would be presumptuous on my part to emphasize that because they are both older parliamentarians than myself. I can only express the hope that they will both be long spared to serve the country in this house.

I do not intend to follow the last speaker (Mr. Walsh), but there are one or two remarks which I think I should make in reference to his speech. He suggests that in some way Liberals are inclined to be more corrupt than Conservatives; in fact, he seems to think the Conservatives are so virtuous that they can afford to point the finger at us. I suggest to the hon. gentleman that the people of Canada are tired of mud-slinging between parties; what they want to know is what we are going to do to solve some of their problems. Furthermore, we do not need any lessons in virtue or political honesty from the Tory party.

May I express the appreciation of the people of Saskatchewan of the aid given them in the greatest calamity that has ever befallen any province in the history of Canada. First of all, we appreciate the voluntary aid so generously extended by all parts of the country, especially by the farming population, many of whom were not in any too good shape themselves. We realize that now more than ever, since hearing the speech of the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman). In order to help us, many of these people filled cars with the produce of their own labour, which produce they could ill afford to give away. It showed a magnificent spirit of Canadian fellowship. Let me also, on behalf of Saskatchewan, express appreciation of the generous aid given by the government of Canada. It was no more generous than the situation demanded; nevertheless we were glad to know that in our troubles the rest of Canada had no objection to the government coming to our aid. I wish to say how much western Canada appreciates also the energy of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who went there and covered the ground by automobile, making a thorough study of the situation. I believe, as most of the people of Saskatchewan believe, that on the whole he dealt effectively and satisfactorily with the greatest problem which any minister of the crown will probably have to face during the time this government may be in office. The task needs only to be seen to be appreciated. It is the greatest problem that has ever faced any government in connection with drought in our history.

Let me now pass on to some remarks that have been made arising out of that help, which we think had a great deal to do with demonstrating the essential unity of confederation, and the fact that we are consciously a nation. Incidentally, before I forget, there is one thing more I would say to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He seemed to suggest that the people of Quebec, the people of Lotbiniere, were unique in being inveterately opposed to purely imperialistic wars. My father was born in Ontario of British stock; I was born in Manitoba, and I do not think anyone in Quebec is more opposed to imperialistic wars than I and those like me of British stock, the young people of Canada, from one end of the country to the other. Does the hon. gentleman suggest that he is favourable to war as a part of imperialism? If he does, he should belong to another age. Wars of imperialistic conquest in democratic countries should be a thing of the past, especially since we have seen something of the horrors, the miseries, the frustrations and the unutterable unhappiness caused by war—and I have seen a little of it all myself. In the face of all this, no one in this house should condemn anyone for saying that he is opposed to imperialistic wars.

Mr. WALSH: Would the hon. member permit me to say that I am in hearty agreement with what he has just said.

Mr. TUCKER: I am glad to hear it, Mr. Speaker. The verdict in Lotbiniere should not be regarded as an endorsation of imperialistic wars. I do not think anyone ever thought it could be so regarded.

The suggestion has been made by some people in the central part of Canada—I am glad to say I do not think they are in the majority; in fact I hope they are only a very small group—that the west is becoming too great a burden and that it would be a good thing for the east if they could get rid of the burden of the west. To us in the west that suggestion came as a great shock. We in western Canada have felt that we have suffered more than any other part of Canada through the tariffs and fiscal policies adopted by Canadian governments. The attitude of western Canada has been that the people of those plains were being exploited as no British people had ever been exploited before; but in spite of this, they never suggested that they wanted to break away from Canada or cease to be part of the Canadian nation. Now in the time of our need, to be told by some people in eastern Canada that they would like to secede from us, after the patience that we feel we have shown with the rest of Canada, comes to us as a great shock. In that connection I should like to read some words from the foreword written by Premier Patterson of Saskatchewan to the brief presented to the Rowell commission, which I think indicate the attitude of the people of Saskatchewan towards Canada and towards the disabilities under which we suffer. He said:

> We realize that confederation was established for the good of all Canada and that each province must be prepared to make its contribution to the common good. . . . We believe it essential that a united Canada should be maintained as a part of the British Commonwealth of Nations, and are prepared to devote every effort to that end.

That, I think, is the attitude of ninety-nine per cent of the people who inhabit western Canada. They believe in Canada as their country. But they say to their fellow Canadians from one end of Canada to the other, We expect to be treated as well as are the people in any other part of Canada. If, for example, we can show in connection with our educational system that we have not the money to bring up our young people properly and educate them as good Canadians, we expect you will do enough to enable us to maintain at least a minimum standard of Canadian citizenship; in other words, that you will not drive us down to a peasant level. That is the attitude the people of western Canada take, that all that is necessary is to lay the facts before the people of Canada, as is being done in connection with the Rowell commission, and then we have only to sit back and confidently expect that the people of Canada will do us justice. That is one of the reasons I intend to vote for the motion and against the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). This government has given western Canada a chance to lay its grievances before a tribunal which will make a finding on those grievances, and thus some hope is held out that some of the disabilities under which we have suffered for many years will receive attention and redress.

I intended to go into some figures indicating how important western Canada is to the rest of the country, but I do not think I should do that here because I am sure that everyone in Canada, from the lumbering industry on the Pacific coast to the manufacturing industries of eastern Canada, realizes that the building-up of western Canada and the production of immense wealth there made a great contribution to the upbuilding of Canada as a whole. I might give one figure. The value of grain production in the prairie provinces in the twenty-seven years from 1910 to 1936 inclusive was $10,278,465,000. That in very large measure went to increase the wealth of the central part of Canada—goodness knows we do not have it now in western Canada.

A charge often brought against the people of western Canada is that their governments have been extravagant and that is why we are in our present difficulties. In answer to that let me say that so far as Saskatchewan is concerned, in 1929 when the government led by the present Minister of Agriculture went out of office the debt in Saskatchewan was only slightly over $63,000,000. It was one of the lowest per capita debts in the whole of Canada; I think only Quebec and Prince Edward Island had a lower per capita debt at that time than Saskatchewan. Since then we have had to spend vast sums on relief, to advance moneys that the banks had to pay in respect of pool guarantees, and other things arising out of drought and low prices for our products which have increased our debt to almost $200,000,000 to-day. But I ask hon. members to remember that we provided our legislative buildings and everything we had in the way of capital equipment prior to 1929 with a debt of only $63,000,000, every cent of which was represented by actual physical assets in the way of public buildings, roads, bridges and so on. That hardly bears out the charge of extravagance. What has happened since has been no fault of ours.

Then we hear the charge that the people of the west are extravagant. Every farmer has a car! Well, some figures have been given here as to the kind of houses that most of the farming people in the west have to live in; I do not intend to deal with that. But I wish to give some figures bearing on this matter, and I hope I shall be pardoned if I take Ontario for comparison, because I do not wish to burden the house with too many figures. Comparing farmers in each case, I find that in Ontario the proportion of farmers having motor cars is 65·4 per cent. What about the extravagant farmers of Saskatchewan? Only 47·7 per cent of Saskatchewan farmers had motor cars. That was in 1931; since then of course the proportion of Saskatchewan farmers having motor cars will be very much less.

Then in regard to telephones, in Saskatchewan the proportion having telephones is 34·2 per cent, while in Ontario it is 54·1 per cent. If there is a place where telephones are needed it certainly is Saskatchewan. Just yesterday I received a letter from a doctor friend of mine in Rosthern, informing me that in a village about fourteen miles distant there was a woman very sick. Last year the municipality had a municipal doctor not very far away, but on account of their financial difficulty they could not keep him. In the middle of the night in forty below zero weather this doctor was called to attend that woman. They had trouble on the way with their snowmobile, and by the time the doctor got there the woman was dead. Such things are not uncommon occurrences in Saskatchewan where doctors live too far away to be obtained quickly. When we see our people forced through poverty to endure such things, is it any wonder that we come here and ask that you give us all the consideration you feel we deserve as Canadian citizens? Certainly we need telephones in Saskatchewan, but in 1931 only 34·2 per cent of the people had them.

Only 20·2 per cent of the farmers in Saskatchewan have radios; in Ontario the percentage is 21·5. Gas and electric light in the home—16·8 per cent in Ontario and only 2·8 per cent in Saskatchewan; piped water in the kitchen—10·4 per cent in Ontario and only 1·4 per cent in Saskatchewan. What, then, about this charge of extravagant westerners? As a matter of fact I was born and brought up in the west, and from what I know of the way our people live out there I say they live just as close to a minimum standard of living as any people in the whole of Canada.

I hope no one will object to my giving my next figures, but in doing so I have in mind some remarks made by some public men in Ontario. Take the figures in regard to the sale of liquor. In Saskatchewan in 1929, receipts from the sale of beer were $4,262,000. By 1934 they had decreased by about two-thirds, or to about $1,422,000. Receipts from the sale of hard liquor had decreased from $3,339,000 in 1929 to $840,000 in 1934. What has been the history in Ontario? In the year ended March 31, 1937, in Ontario I understand some $72,000,000 was spent on intoxicants. The gallonage of spirits increased by 71 per cent; of wine by 31 per cent and of beer by 211 per cent in a period of two years. In saying that I am not finding fault with the people of Ontario. If they want and can afford to enjoy their beer they are lucky; but I ask them, when finding fault with the extravagance of the people of western Canada, to remember that while they were drinking many times more beer than they were two years ago, our people were drinking just one-third as much.

What has brought about the position in which western Canada finds itself, if its people have worked hard and have not been extravagant either individually or in their government? Well, I wish to indicate in outline some of the reasons why we find ourselves in our present position.

In the first place we are in the centre of the continent. Practically everything we sell must be sold on the markets of the world. The price we get in those markets is brought back to us less the amount necessary to send those goods to market. Take wheat, for example. The average cost of sending wheat from Saskatchewan to the world market is about 35 cents a bushel. We get what is paid in the markets of the world, less 35 cents. On almost everything we buy we must pay the freight to bring it to us. For example, a person buying a cheap car in Ontario pays $124 less in freight on that car than we pay in Saskatchewan. In other words, we are caught in regard to freight in both shipping out and bringing things in.

If anyone is interested in this question of freight, a study of the Saskatchewan brief presented to the Rowell commission will indicate that in western Canada freight is charged on a higher basis than in eastern Canada. In other words, freight seems to be based upon what the traffic will bear. In Ontario, with water transportation competing, the railroads have had to keep freight rates down. Our only protection has been the Crowsnest pass rates and if you study rates you will find that western Canada is paying more for freight than is being paid in eastern Canada, over equal distances.

Another thing that has injured western Canada is of course the tariff policy. Something has been said about the figures given by the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) before a commission investigating the matter in Nova Scotia. There is no question, I believe, in the mind of any thinking man but that the tariff must operate against the primary producer in western Canada. The price of everything he sells is fixed in the markets of the world, where he is competing with agriculturists all over the world. I do not care how low their standard of living may be, the western Canadian farmer has to compete with them. Then he is forced to buy the things he has to purchase in one of the most expensive markets in the world. That may have been all right, Mr. Speaker, when there was a vast amount of new land available which cost the farmer very little, but the time has come when the fact must be faced that the western Canadian farmer cannot bear that burden any longer. It may be all right to say that we need this protection in order to make sure that large profits can be made in our textile industry; in order that our automobile industry may have large profits; in order that we may pay large salaries to the executives of automobile concerns, and so on. If we could afford that luxury it would not be so important, but the time has come when the house must choose between not driving the western farmer out of existence and those other things I have mentioned. It is no longer a matter of argument; the western Canadian farmer has reached a point where, if you do not give him relief by way of reduction of tariffs he cannot carry on.

That is the question which must be faced by the house. Any study of the present position of the western Canadian farmer must lead anyone to that conclusion. Consider, for example, the load of debt. We had last year $525,000,000 approximately of private debt alone in Saskatchewan. There has been a reduction of that debt. That reduction in regard to mortgages and agreements has amounted to $26,000,000; in regard to taxes, $22,000,000 and in regard to relief write-offs, $31,000,000, or a total of $79,000,000. Then there was a reduction in 1937 under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act amounting to another $3,000,000. Under private arrangement there was a reduction of about $1,000,000, and last year there were payments of taxes, debts and so on amounting to about $12,500,000. That means that we can deduct about $95,500,000 from that amount of $525,000,000. But last year we had interest on agreements for sale, mortgages and other debts amounting to at least $25,000,000; municipal tax levies totalling another $12,500,000 and relief advances of $15,000,000, bringing the debt, in spite of all that has been done by way of debt reduction, back to about $482,000,000, or $15 per acre on all the crop land. To have paid interest alone on this debt would have taken nearly two-thirds of the cash receipts from wheat available for sale in almost every year since 1930, and municipal taxes would have taken the rest.

Can anyone tell me, then, that we can carry on if we must bear one cent more of burden than we should be carrying? If we are to compete in the markets of the world our only hope is to say to the Canadian farmer, "You have a load on your back. You must compete with some of the lowest paid agricultural workers in the world, and the only way you can do so is by being enabled to buy the things you need in the very cheapest market." That is the situation, whether we like it or not, and if you do not want all the western Canadian farmers being forced to come east to try to get on relief in your cities you will deal with that problem.

As a matter of fact, what has happened in that very connection? Our natural increase, that is, the excess of births over deaths, in Saskatchewan from 1931 to 1936 was 70,000. Immigration to Saskatchewan during that period amounted to 3,500. What is the actual situation to-day? What do we find, after having had an excess of 70,000 births over deaths and 3,500 people coming into the province? There are less males in the province to-day than there were in 1931. We find that the actual increase, including males and females, was only 9,108. In other words, we find that largely of her native born sons and daughters Saskatchewan lost over 64,000. I ask people from the maritimes, Ontario or Quebec if it is a proper condition when we find that 64,000 of our best young citizens are driven out to seek their living elsewhere. That is what is happening in Saskatchewan.

Let us now consider the value of farm property. In 1921 the value of the average farm, with equipment, was $13,814, while in 1936 that value had shrunk to $7,185. The number of farms owned by those farming them provides an interesting comparison. In 1911, 91 per cent of the farms in Saskatchewan were owned by those farming them; in 1921 the percentage had dropped to 80·5 per cent; in 1931, to 70·5 per cent, and in 1936, to 65·2 per cent,—and so it goes on. How long are we going to sit idly by and permit that condition to prevail?

Before leaving the question of debt reduction may I say that the present board of review operating in Saskatchewan has brought a measure of relief very much appreciated and very necessary to the people of our province. But it cannot keep up with the work coming in. I suggest that in order that it may perform that work at least one more board of review should be set up to deal with the accumulation of cases, and that it should act under the direction of the present chairman of the board. I know that people in other parts of Canada have found fault with the act. I would suggest that if people in Ontario or Quebec find the act is not working out satisfactorily in those provinces an amendment might be made whereby any province might exempt itself from its operation. Provision might be made in an amendment to the act whereby any provincial legislature might pass a resolution to the effect that that province need not remain under the act, and that thereafter it stand repealed in that particular province. I have no doubt as to the constitutionality of such a move, because in connection with the criminal code we find that different parts apply differently in different sections of the dominion. So long as we have jurisdiction to deal with the matter I submit there could be no doubt that we could make it apply in one province, and not in another

Mr. BENNETT: It came into force by proclamation in every province.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes, it came into force by proclamation in every province. As a matter of fact I believe there is provision in the act whereby, unless she desires, the act shall not apply to British Columbia.

Mr. BENNETT: And all the provinces are in the same position.

Mr. TUCKER: May I place before hon. members the history of interest in Saskatchewan. In that province we had mortgages bearing as high as ten per cent interest. Although it is provided in the Bank Act that banks shall not charge more than seven per cent we had banks closing their eyes to that provision and charging as high as nine per cent. I believe I noticed in the headlines of the papers as I was entering the building to-night that the banks have this year made half a million dollars in increased profits. I suggest that it be ascertained how much the banks have taken in interest from the people in western Canada, over and above the amount of seven per cent to which they were entitled, and that that amount be set aside to provide university scholarships for the children of the people they have overcharged.

We find that this year, the fiscal year 1937, the interest on the governmental debt of Saskatchewan will be $7,039,000, constituting the largest single item in the whole of the expenditures of that province. What can they spend on education? They can spend $2,876,000 —and yet they must spend $7,039,000 for interest. They can spend $5,169,000 on public welfare, but they must spend $7,039,000 for interest. To-day debt charges amount to 49 per cent of ordinary expenditures and 52 per cent of ordinary revenue. It is the considered opinion of the provincial government that they cannot service that debt, unless they get further help from the dominion.

I suggest that in view of the great increase in private, municipal, provincial and dominion debts, when suggestions are made for some improvements or some change in public financing they should be given consideration, and should not be dismissed as though the last word had been spoken in regard to carrying on matters of public finance. It may be that the last word has not yet been said on the subject. It may be that it is possible to improve on our present system. In the past we have had cases where people, in their day and age, took the attitude, "We are the people, and wisdom will die with us." They took the stand that there could be no improvement in what they had conceived, or what had been conceived prior to their day and age. I submit that in connection with this question, likewise it is possible to have improvement in our way of handling public finance. I suggest that if failure to solve the question of public finance is weighing the people down so that they cannot attend to education, so that they cannot attend to public welfare, then it is high time that we looked into the matter very seriously.

What is the situation with regard to education? Let us consider for example, the university of Saskatchewan. I have been told by more than one professor of that university that he has received offers to go elsewhere, on much better pay, but that he hated to leave Saskatchewan in her hour of need. If there is one thing more than another that we need in Saskatchewan, it is the best scientists Canada can produce to study the means to cope with drought, grasshoppers, smut, and all other pests and drawbacks the western farmer has to meet. The best scientists should be in the university of Saskatchewan, but we have not the money to pay them and keep them. Their salaries have been continually reduced, and we are asking them to work for mere pittances.

What is the position with regard to children who wish to have secondary education? The government in the province has done the best it can. It has used the radio; it has set up correspondence courses and has tried to cope with the situation. The fact remains however, that most of the children in the province would like to have secondary education, but have not the money to spend in boarding in town or to pay the cost of reaching town.

Coming to the public schools we find that while in 1931 public school teachers received in salaries $6,695,000, in 1936 they received only $3,973,000. Those of us who live in Saskatchewan know of teacher after teacher who is working for no more than $300 a year. We know lots of them, young girls and young men, the finest Canadians one could find anywhere, who are teaching for less than enough to pay for board and lodgings and buy clothes for themselves, let alone books or magazines which would permit them to keep abreast of developments in education in other parts of the world. That is the way we are treating those people who are in charge of training the youth in Saskatchewan.

I suggest that it is highly dangerous to tell those teachers that all we can pay them for looking after our young people in Saskatchewan is sometimes as low as $300 a year. They hear, for example, that the dominion collects over $100,000,000 in income tax on a rate which is not high. They know, therefore, that there must be people in Canada who are receiving large sums of money from industry. They have heard about the textile inquiry; that five people each put $200,000 into a project and that those people got their money back, and in addition that during the thirty-one years that the project has been in existence they have each received an average annual income therefrom of over $97,000. They have been drawing that money right along, because they invested in a highly protected industry which used its tariff protection to overcharge the people. Some of them were prominent bankers. Perhaps they loaned credit to one another and invested no money of their own. The fact remains that they got their money back in about four years, and they have been drawing that average annual income ever since.

[Mr. Tucker.]

Put yourself, Mr. Speaker, in the place of a young woman out west whose duty it is to teach the children that this system of ours is fair and just; that the democratic system is better perhaps than the system they have in Russia or Germany; that it is fair; that it is the system the children should uphold and admire—a teacher who has an abiding conviction of the injustice and unfairness of the present system which practically condemns her to work for nothing, while other people, as she knows, on account of special privileges such as tariff policies are drawing money they have not earned in thousands and thousands of dollars. I ask, how can you expect her to have an influence favourable to our system on the children in her charge? When you mistreat in that way people who are in charge of the youth of the country, you can well expect that the young generation, when they grow to adulthood, will not have an abiding conviction in the fairness of democracy, and things may happen that we would shudder to see if we could only see them from this distance. The sooner we deal with that important problem the better for democracy in Canada. There is $900,000 in arrears of salary owing to these teachers, poorly paid as they are. Why? Because we have not the means of paying them. The government of Saskatchewan have struggled with that problem and the whole problem of carrying on our government under present conditions like veritable heroes as no one from another part of the dominion can ever appreciate, but they have not the financial means of dealing with it, and we in this house should take that into account.

I should like to deal shortly with the question of unemployment. There are many other things I should like to deal with, but I do not want to presume too long on the time of the house. In the information service for November, 1937, that was sent out by the national employment commission—this has been sent out, I suppose, to everybody, and so I am not guilty of any breach of confidence in reading it—I was surprised to find this statement:

> In dealing with the problem of unemployment certain preliminary but essential steps have been taken.

Preliminary steps!

> Relief has been "unscrambled" and clarified. Registration is revealing accurately the extent and nature of the problem.

This was in November, 1937. It goes on:

> The migrancy problem has been analysed and remedies suggested.
> Thus the way has been cleared for an attack on unemployment itself. The real problem of obtaining jobs for the employable unemployed, of which those on aid numbered 143,745, according to August registration returns, emerges. How is it to be met?

Now how is it to be met? Two years after our party finds itself in office, after declaring that unemployment is Canada's greatest national problem, we are apparently still asking ourselves, how is that problem to be met? This is what I suggest, and I make the suggestion not with any desire to criticize the government but simply to help as a member of the Canadian House of Commons. The policy of the government with regard to trade is gradually solving the problem of unemployment; but if after two years in office we find that there are 143,000 employables still out of work and on aid, then I suggest that we should do something, while long range policies are absorbing them into industry, to look after these young fellows, to give them a chance to make a contribution to our national development in the meantime.

I was amazed, "floored," as a colleague of mine said, in the words of Mr. Micawber, when the last speaker was making some remark, when I read in the interim report of the national employment commission, at page 14, these words:

> With the rapid improvement taking place in employment conditions in private industry, the commission decided to recommend that, at this stage of the recovery, not only should there be no expansion in public works programs, but that there should be a very substantial contraction in the total governmental expenditures for public works projects.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exhausted his right to speak.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Let him finish.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. TUCKER: I shall take just a few minutes, Mr. Speaker. It may be that recovery has proceeded so far in other parts of Canada that they need nothing in the way of public works to look after their unemployed; but, after all, we should take account of conditions in different parts of the country. I do not think anyone would suggest for a single moment that recovery in Saskatchewan has proceeded to such a stage that we do not need any help. What is the use of saying that recovery has gone so far that we need not do anything in the way of public works, when in Saskatchewan, for example, according to the figures given by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) yesterday, the total number of people on relief in Saskatchewan is 44·5 per cent of the total population of the province. We may perhaps expect that before this winter is over almost half of Saskatchewan will be on relief.

Take bank debits, which indicate the situation more or less. In the rest of the country I notice that bank debits have actually increased, but in Saskatchewan they have decreased to the point where they lowered the debits for the whole dominion below those of last year. I shall give the figures. Bank debits for the whole dominion were down last year $763,000,000 from 1936. There was a drop in bank debits in the prairie provinces last year of 25 per cent from the previous year. The reduction in bank debits for the whole prairie provinces last year, as compared with the previous year, was $1,678,000,000. Bank debits show the amount of money passing from the accounts in the banks. At a time of the worst drought in the history of Saskatchewan, with bank debits down in the prairie provinces over one and a half billion dollars, we are told by the national employment commission that recovery has gone so far that we should not have a public works program including Saskatchewan! I say that we have looked down our noses at, for example, Germany. We have praised democracy, and dispraised the system they have in Germany. Something I said in a speech before has been taken as an endorsation by me of Germany's militaristic policy, such was far from my thoughts. When I refer to Germany's method of dealing with unemployment I am not thinking at all about what she is doing in regard to militarism.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is a part of it.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes, it is a part of it, but to-day not only is Germany rearming on a scale unprecedented in the history of any European nation but she is embarking at the same time on a program of building roads and public buildings, and land reclamation, for farming purposes, on a scale that Germany has never seen before. If Germany, hemmed in by the problems which face her, and rearming on a scale the like of which probably no European nation formerly ever saw, can find the means for a really comprehensive building program, can construct buildings which will stand as monuments for all time to the Hitler regime, can proceed with a vast program of public roads, can carry on important land reclamation schemes—if she can do these things after going through a tremendous war and all that it entailed, why is it that we in the Dominion of Canada cannot handle our small unemployment problem? Why is it that we are content to tell these young people, year after year, "We are registering you, and our long range policies will ultimately take care of you?" We believe they will; I believe they will; but I say in the meantime, supposing it requires another two or three years to develop those policies, should we not give them a chance to do something for the development of their country in the meantime?

Goodness knows there is enough to be done. For example, take roads. In Saskatchewan we have a little over 2,500 miles of gravelled roads. Saskatchewan had less expended by motorists under tourist permits last year than any other province of the dominion—a little under a million dollars worth while Ontario had expenditures by motorists under tourist permits of over $101,000,000. It is the considered opinion of the Saskatchewan government that if we do not get help to build a hard surface road from the United States-Canadian boundary to our national park we shall not be able to do it ourselves for from fifteen to twenty years and thereby will not get a fair share of tourist business for that time. If we have an economy that is so ill-balanced, so dependent upon the wheat crops, should not this government do all it can to give us a better-balanced economy? Put through the trans-Canada highway as a hard surfaced road. Build a hard surfaced road from the United States-Canadian boundary to every single national park in Canada including ours. With 130,000,000 people to the south, and proper roads to travel over, those highways will probably pay for themselves in ten years. There is something at which to put our young people to work.

I am asked, how should we get the money? Thanking you, Mr. Speaker, for the indulgence you have extended in letting me go a few minutes beyond my time, I want to suggest a way to obtain the money to put these young people to work on national development programs. We have to-day in the Bank of Canada, according to the report of January 19, 1938, notes in circulation of $157,987,610. We have gold in the Bank of Canada of the value of $179,000,000. In other words, we have over a dollar's worth of gold for every single note that we have issued. It is regarded as sound financial practice to have a gold coverage of twenty-five per cent; that is so regarded, I believe, even by the Bank of England. But it is not good enough for some really sound money people in Canada; we must apparently have dollar for dollar of gold coverage. I suggest that with that amount of gold we have the right to issue on a sound money basis $718,000,000 worth of currency fully secured on a twenty-five per cent basis. We have $157,000,000 worth issued, which would leave $560,000,000 that we could issue to put our young people to work, to put the power of the nation behind the development of the nation, behind the youth of the nation. Does anybody suggest that that would not be sufficient to put them all to work? Does anybody suggest that it would not make a real contribution to the future of this country?

Take irrigation as an example. One of the reasons these irrigation schemes are turned down is that they are not economically feasible; the land will not be worth what you have spent on getting it developed. My answer is that irrigation should be looked upon as a matter of national development. We do not require that the harbours shall pay interest on the money we spend upon them. We do not ask that dredging works shall return the cost they involve. Why should we begrudge three or four hundred million dollars to open up a million acres of land whereon thousands of Canadians could make their homes in the future? By populating the country we reduce the danger of attack from outside by those who may say, "You are not making use of your resources; you have not the right to keep them." Would not the lessening of that danger alone help to make it really worth while?

It may be suggested that this would mean inflation. My answer is that if there is any danger of inflation as a result of issuing what is required of that money you can take power to increase the reserves required to be kept by banks in the Bank of Canada. By law they are required to keep only five per cent. The central reserve system of the United States requires banks to keep with the central reserve a reserve of twenty per cent. If the United States, with its vast wealth, has realized the need of doing something like this to prevent inflation when it increases its currency issue, Canada can do the same.

We cannot afford to take the attitude that we will not promote public works and take care of our unemployed, but will rely on long range policies and wait for time to work these things out. We should not debar these young people from making a contribution in the next two or three years to the future of Canada. In this way this government should consider putting to use the gold that is lying idle in the Bank of Canada. Put it to work to put our youth to work. What right has anybody to say that we should compel our fellow men to stagnate on relief because we will not move one iota, one jot from present financial policies? I submit that the time has come for action; that we should no longer consent to have these good Canadians remain out of work, deprived of the chance of making a contribution to the well-being of Canada, while in other nations the young people are being utilized, put to national development work and encouraged to feel that they are making a real contribution to their own country. Canada still takes the attitude, in spite of all her vast resources: We cannot do it; we will wait for our long range policies to work out, and in the meantime these young people also have to wait, and wait, and wait.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is one of our vital problems. This, and the solution of western Canadian problems, the lowering of the tariff so that we do not drive these people from the land—these are the questions which face this parliament in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and thirty-eight.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): The mover and seconder of the address acquitted themselves, I think, very well upon their first attempt in this honourable chamber. Of course they endeavoured to give credit to the government for any improvement in Canada and particularly for any increases in trade. Supporters of the government are prone to do this kind of thing, and in doing so, to make comparisons between the years 1935 and 1937. In my opinion any credit for increases in trade and improvement in our general condition is due to the former government, and particularly to the United Kingdom agreement which was passed under that government, and if hon. members would go back and examine what happened in 1933-34 and 1934-35 they would find that a normal increase started at that time and that what we have had in the last year or so is only what might have been expected. I believe, however, that if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) would compare, as regards our trade with the United States, what happened in November, 1936, with what occurred in November, 1937, he would find something to give him cause for a little alarm.

We have listened during the last few days, and particularly to-day and yesterday, to some very interesting speeches. With reference to the speeches made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross), the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) and the one to which we have just listened by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), as well as the references that have been made to the brief presented by the province of Saskatchewan to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, I do not believe that any greater evidence could be produced than is to be found in these speeches, of the failure of the Liberal party, both in the dominion and in Saskatchewan, since 1921.

I say that for this reason. From 1921 to 1930 the Liberals were in power in the federal arena, and since Saskatchewan entered confederation as a province the Liberals have been in control there except from 1929 to 1934, the most critical period in that province. In the federal field the Conservative party was in power from 1930 to 1935, another very critical period so far as the dominion is concerned. Apart from these two periods the Liberal party has been in control. Why then has it not done the things which these gentlemen tell us should have been done? They had an opportunity to do them. The hon. member for Moose Jaw, in particular, if he is so widely at variance with his party, might have moved an amendment or perhaps might have formed a new western party to bring about the results he would like to see attained. But he admitted that he had not accomplished very much here.

There are two or three paragraphs in the speech from the throne to which I should like to refer. The first is with reference to the proposed amendment of the constitution to provide for unemployment insurance. Had the government been as anxious, when they were in opposition, to see an unemployment insurance measure enacted and put upon the statute books as apparently they are to-day, when they would like to see all parties in the house in support of such a measure, we would have had an unemployment insurance scheme in operation to-day.

The next point to which I would refer is the reorganization of the Department of Agriculture. As we all know, agriculture is our most important industry. Production, processing and grading, and the marketing of our primary products—these are the all important things. The Department of Agriculture needed reorganization, and to prove that, I could go back to 1930 and quote the words of the then Minister of Agriculture, the hon. member for Melville. At that time he said that a new foundation would have to be laid for agriculture if we were to save the towns and villages of the west. I believe that some progress was made, certainly in the way of improving some of our products—cattle, bacon and certain other products that I could enumerate. Obstacles were removed and there was vast improvement during the period from 1930 to 1935. I am in accord with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in his efforts to reorganize the department in order to advertise our products and put them on the markets of the world in better condition. I am all for that.

Speaking on Thursday last, I believe, the Minister of Agriculture made one or two statements that were rather uncalled for and I am going to take a moment or two to correct a misunderstanding that was created. As reported at page 150 of Hansard, he said:

I had occasion to call attention to the fact that on every one of three occasions on which the former federal government came into Saskatchewan to deal with labour questions the result was that certain persons were taken to the graveyard, others to the hospital and still others to gaol.

In that statement he tries to place the responsibility for what happened with respect to certain riots which took place in Regina, and that responsibility he lays at the door of the federal government of that day. That is a wrong impression, for if any government is to be charged with that responsibility it is the government which was in power in Saskatchewan at that time—and the present Minister of Agriculture happened to be the head of that government as premier. His government at that time encouraged the rioters, the trekkers, to proceed to Ottawa, and when the order was issued prohibiting them from going further he took strong exception to it. In proof of that I would refer to the report of the commission that was set up to investigate the Regina riots. The report was released on June 16, 1936, by the Hon. Mr. Estey, acting for the attorney general. The finding of the royal commission is given, and the personnel of the commission is set out. I need not go over that. The commission's finding was to this effect. They declared the leadership of the trek to be definitely communistic. The commissioners found that the federal government was quite justified in halting the march at Regina, because it would have menaced the peace, order and good government of every town or city in which they stopped. The number of trekkers increased as they moved eastward, and had they reached Ottawa unopposed, "their number would probably have increased to at least 5,000," the report states. It goes on to say:

On arriving at Ottawa, unless their demands had been fully met, one can readily surmise the danger involved. It probably would have been necessary to call out the militia.

I submit, therefore, that the finding of the commission, appointed by the province of Saskatchewan itself to investigate the matter, establishes the fact that no responsibility can be laid at the door of the federal government of that time.

[Mr. Perley.]

Another paragraph of the report states:

In reference to disputes between the Saskatchewan and dominion governments over the right of the dominion to halt the trekkers in Saskatchewan and to assume full authority to instruct the police, it is not for us to pass judgment upon the validity of the protests made by the provincial government in either of the matters complained of.

The fact is that the provincial government appointed the commission, and the commission's report exonerated the federal government.

Mr. GARDINER: What did they say about stopping them before they reached Regina?

Mr. PERLEY: I have not the full report before me, but the report is very short. There was some discussion at the time.

Mr. GARDINER: They should have been stopped at Vancouver.

Mr. PERLEY: It was impossible to get a sufficient number of mounted police at that point to stop them and it was decided that they should be stopped at Regina. What about the cost? It cost Saskatchewan $30,000 odd to discover that the responsibility was not the federal government's. I have under my hand the journals of the provincial house for the session of 1937 and at page 206 I find set out the cost of the commission. These are the figures:

The Hon. Mr. Justice Brown, honoraria, $4,000.
The Hon. Mr. Justice Martin, honoraria, $3,000.
His Honour Judge Doak, $3,000.
His Honour Judge Doak, subsistence and travelling expenses, $1,617.
G. H. Yule, K.C., counsel to commission, $3,000.
L. Tourigny, counsel to commission, $3,500.
F. J. G. Cunningham, defence counsel, $4,500.
G. H. Yule, K.C., subsistence and travelling expenses, $1,100.
L. Tourigny, subsistence and travelling expenses, $1,326.

That is a total of $30,000 odd, and I might say that B. D. Hogarth, who put in an account for some $100 a day which I believe was disputed—there is no record of it here—is the gentleman before whom most people in Saskatchewan if they want a job with either the federal or provincial government have to run the gauntlet and get his o.k.

Now there has been some discussion concerning the functions of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Agriculture. I am not going to take time to deal with that to-night; we may have opportunity to say something about it later. However, if Dean Shaw's report has done nothing more than bring a statement from the government as to the functions of these departments it will have served a useful purpose, for I think that should be set out and overlapping done away with.

Now I want to come to the conditions that prevail in Saskatchewan. The minister described the conditions there and I do not think he painted too dark a picture, because they are the worst we have ever had in that province. It is, I admit, a difficult situation to handle. There are practically 400,000 people on relief. Here again I want to join with other hon. members in expressing the appreciation of the people of Saskatchewan who are in that dire distress, of the splendid gifts of vegetables and fruit and goods sent from the east and the west. No language can express adequately our appreciation. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) mentioned the fact that many farmers from Saskatchewan had migrated to Ontario. Many of those men and women are sons and daughters of the pioneer stock that settled in Saskatchewan; they are a fine type of agricultural people, and our loss of them will be Ontario's gain; I wish them all success. There is no doubt in my mind—and other hon. members have expressed themselves to the same effect—that Saskatchewan will come back.

The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) referred to-night to the wealth that has been produced in that province since 1920. That province has produced in the past and will in future produce more new wealth in one year than any other province in the dominion. I am not fearful of its future. In taking care of the situation that exists out there I will grant that the Minister of Agriculture—for it seems to be more or less his responsibility as far as this government is concerned—has a difficult task. He referred to the old relief commission system and the system in vogue to-day. I might explain for the benefit of hon. members who may not be familiar with it that from 1930 to 1934 the federal government approved the provincial government setting up a relief commission. The personnel of that commission I think was given here the other night, four business men and a woman representing the farm women of Saskatchewan, who by the way gave their services without pay other than living expenses, as the woman in particular had to come to Regina to live. They appointed as manager Mr. Daniels, and he set up a staff which was housed on the second floor of the Regina Trading Company building. I believe he did a good job. There has been very little criticism of it. He did it at a minimum cost to the government, and no farmer was asked to reduce his herd. The federal government had an auditor on the job who approved the accounts as they were passed by the provincial treasurer.

But in 1934 we had a change of government in Saskatchewan, and as the minister stated the other night, the new government dismissed the commission and since then relief has been administered through a department of the provincial government and the municipalities. I may say that in the last two years there has been nothing but criticism of that system, criticism with respect to political patronage, loss to the government and lack of fodder, particularly this year. If we compare the criticism of the commission managed by Mr. Daniels in the four years in which he was in charge I am sure there was not as much criticism in those four years as there has been in the last two months, December and January. The public press is a pretty good criterion, and a search of the press will prove this statement. The present government set up this new system. The Minister of Agriculture in his speech the other day, whether he intended it or not, gave an impression which is not correct. He said that the relief commission had employed 839 people, while they are now doing similar work with a staff of 45. I quote what he said as reported at page 155 of Hansard.

> I do think, with the system we have now under which this government is paying, when we are at the peak of our movement, forty-five men, our administration, in matters of cost at least, compares very favourably with the eight hundred and thirty-nine that the leader of the opposition had through the province in charge of relief at the time he was in office.

That statement leaves the impression that forty-five men are now doing the work that was done by 839. I made some inquiry as to the number employed under the former commission and I have a statement before me. The relief commission in 1930 to 1934 had at the peak about four hundred employees. Latterly the number was reduced to one hundred. It is estimated by those who are well informed as to handling of relief in Saskatchewan that the inefficiency of the present system and the lack of control are costing that province somewhere about $2,000,000 annually more than the cost under the other system. The public accounts of the province for 1936-37 show that the administration cost $450,000 for that year, and on top of that they were paying the salaries of over two hundred municipal clerks.

What have we to-day? We have in the Regina Trading Company a staff set up by a branch of the Department of Agriculture; they are in the same building and on the same floor, the second floor, and there are just as many people pounding typewriters and clerks checking applications as there were under the relief commission managed by Mr. Daniels, besides which they are paying some two hundred municipal clerks about $100 a month, as I am told by one clerk who is drawing this salary, and he said it is common. But the minister would lead us to believe that forty-five men are doing this work. Forty-five men could not check the applications alone, and thirty men were not able to cut the cheese fast enough to get it distributed in order that there would be no demurrage to pay on the cars which were being unloaded.

I want briefly to compare the efficiency of the two systems. I do not care to dwell too long on this matter, but the minister made it an issue the other night. Under the management of Mr. Daniels in the previous three years, according to the public accounts there was a profit of $50,000. That is not a statement of my own; it is in the public accounts of the province of Saskatchewan. Then the system changed and the provincial government took over, under the direction of the Minister of Agriculture here to a certain extent, because this government was paying the bill. In the first four months, when they employed Mr. Gordon Brown to secure the seed and feed oats for them, they lost $300,000, and Mr. Brown received $4,500 for his services. It was admitted by this government last year, and it is admitted by the provincial government, that there was a loss of at least $165,000, and that loss was made the subject of a reference to the Turgeon grain inquiry.

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask the hon. gentleman if it is not a fact that the figure of $300,000 was only a paper loss at that time, and that $165,000 was the final loss?

Mr. PERLEY: The final loss is not yet known; the evidence given before the Turgeon commission in Winnipeg has not settled what the loss really was, and certainly it has not been settled as to what government is responsible. Mr. Gordon Brown is endeavouring to place the responsibility with the government or with Mr. McIvor or Mr. McFarland; it does not matter who, as long as Mr. Brown is not made the goat. The provincial government is endeavouring to make Mr. Gordon Brown responsible, and he does not propose to accept that responsibility.

Mr. GARDINER: The loss is $165,000.

[Mr. Perley.]

Mr. PERLEY: I said there was a loss of $300,000, of which $165,000 is admitted. This has been made an order of reference to the Turgeon commission. The balance was hidden, as the hon. gentleman has just stated, and covered up by profits made in some other way.

Mr. GARDINER: If I might be permitted to say so, there was no loss established at any time. The loss was calculated from time to time on the basis of the price of oats from day to day, and the final loss was $165,000.

Mr. PERLEY: Then there is a final loss admitted of $165,000, and I think if a proper search were made of the records and accounts it would be found that there was a further loss of $140,000 which has been covered up, and which could be uncovered if a proper opportunity were given.

However, Mr. Speaker, I was referring to the efficiency of the two systems. I have before me the journals of the provincial legislature of 1937. Take the matter of oats, and I am now referring to page 164 of the journals. Car number 242617 was shipped to Buffalo Gap. The cost of that car is given as $1,186.43, and the loss amounted to $693, or more than fifty per cent. There are several cars mentioned in connection with which I might give the particulars. Another one is car number 407470, shipped to Rouleau. This car was purchased from the Federal Grain Company and cost $864.32. On that car there was a loss of $361. Another car, number 196050, was purchased from the Searle Grain Company. That car cost $863 and there was a loss of $342. There are several such cars, showing losses in the neighbourhood of fifty per cent. That is how many of these losses were made, and I leave it to the house to decide which was the most efficient system. I think if the farmers were asked which was the most satisfactory there would be no question as to what they would say.

The minister made reference to the cheese, fish, beans, fruit and vegetables distributed in the west this fall. I think it was a splendid gesture on the part of the government to send those things to the people in the west from the people in Canada, and I have only two criticisms to offer. The first is that there was mismanagement in regard to shipping in the cars. They arrived in such numbers that the freight sheds of the railway companies could not handle and unload them. In the city of Regina, for instance, only one cartage company was used, the Regina Cartage Company, and by December 1 the demurrage on these cars amounted to $3,700. What the demurrage amounted to in all we may be able to find out some time later on.

I should like to make a reference to the distribution of the vegetables and fruit sent to the west. I have before me a letter from the clerk of two municipalities, a man who is well known to the Minister of Agriculture. I do not care to mention his name, since the letter is more or less confidential; but under date of November 6 this is what he says:

To date, two cars of apples, one car of carrots, one car of cabbage and one car of turnips have been shipped to Davidson for the two municipalities. Davidson is on the line between R.M. 252 and 253 and both offices are in Davidson.

Before the cars reached us, we were advised from Dr. Stapleford's office of the population of the two municipalities and also of the urban centres within these two municipalities. The letter also stated that, "The Minister of Agriculture, Hon. J. G. Gardiner, under whose department this is being operated, is anxious that practically one hundred per cent of the rural dwellers participate, those on relief, as well as those not on relief, and that residents of towns and villages should be covered where a real need exists."

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask what the hon. gentleman is reading from?

Mr. PERLEY: From a letter I received from the secretary treasurer of two municipalities. I do not care to have this man's name go on Hansard, but I shall be very pleased to hand the letter to the minister as soon as I have finished with it and he can read it for himself.

Mr. GARDINER: I think I saw all the circulars that went out, and I do not remember seeing any circular containing any statement such as that.

Mr. PERLEY: This is a letter from the secretary treasurer of two municipalities.

Mr. GARDINER: Telling you what he thought about the matter?

Mr. PERLEY: Telling me that he received a letter from Doctor Stapleford to the effect that the minister, under whose department this was being operated, was anxious that practically one hundred per cent of the rural dwellers should participate, those on relief as well as those not on relief, and residents of towns and villages as well. Then he goes on to tell how these goods were distributed on a population basis, three-fifths of a box of apples to each person; fifteen pounds of carrots, fourteen pounds of cabbage, fifteen pounds of turnips, and so on. Then in the last paragraph he says:

The idea of a general distribution to everyone makes a joke out of relief, as so many are taking it, not because of necessity, but because it is offered to them; and many who are in need of relief are not getting sufficient in the way of clothing and other necessities.

That is the criticism I have to offer. The amount given those who did not need it lessened the quantity that was given those who were in need and, as this gentleman says in his letter, quite a number of people refused to accept these articles for that reason.

The question of feed and fodder is one that I know has given the department a great deal of trouble. I am ready to grant that it has been a difficult situation, and the minister and his government have had difficulties in dealing with that situation. They have approved a policy of reducing live stock to a minimum. That policy was outlined by the minister the other night and I am not going to take time now to go over it again. I will say, however, that the live stock and dairy industry of that province has been struck a blow from which it will not recover for ten or fifteen years. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) covered that matter very well the other night, and he did not set out the situation any too strongly, because it is very serious. Last fall we experienced a fire sale of cattle; the year before we experienced a fire sale of wheat. I may say that the injury, in particular, is to the small dairyman and cream shipper, not to the large dairyman. I was talking with a merchant in a small town who said he had received and cashed cream cheques amounting to about $200 or $300 per week. Those cheques were small, ranging from $1.50 to $7 or $8. Hon. members will see what it would mean to that district when the number of cattle is reduced to not more than four each person.

I have in mind one man to whom I have talked—I know him well—who in the last five years had built up a herd of seventeen cattle and was milking six or eight cows. He told me that his cows brought in revenue sufficient to cover his grocery and gasoline accounts. Another returned soldier told me that he had received enough to pay his grocery and gasoline accounts and his taxes from a small herd of twenty-nine cattle. All these men were forced to reduce the number to four.

It is not a question as to whether the feed was available. If action had been taken at the proper time, feed was certainly available. When I saw in the press the policy that was to be adopted I immediately got in touch by letter with the Minister of Agriculture, and with the provincial minister. I set out what I thought should be done, and suggested finally, that some system should be brought about, through organization in the municipality, whereby cattle would be shipped to the feeding ground in Manitoba. The municipalities could organize, and two or three hundred cows could have been shipped from each one. I know that feed was available. Two of my tenants shipped stock there; one shipped six hundred sheep, and the other shipped all his stock, including horses and cattle. All are wintering there. Another man I know well shipped one hundred head to Gladstone, Manitoba, where they are being wintered. This man is well known to the Minister of Agriculture because he was a contractor who, from the government which held office prior to 1929, had received many contracts. He built bridges north of Wolseley across the Qu'Appelle river, and built an overhead bridge at Roche Percée. He went out to British Columbia this year, in company with his two sons and a nephew, and made money. One son told me that his father had drawn $12 a day all summer and that the boys had drawn $7. That man had one hundred and ninety head of cattle, and did not sacrifice one of them. They shipped three carloads, with free freight, to Gladstone, Manitoba, and are wintering at that point.

Mr. GARDINER: We paid the freight?

Mr. PERLEY: Yes, you paid the freight; I am glad the minister mentioned that. That man was no more entitled to free freight than the man in the moon. He had been a contractor all his years; he had built the bridge at Roche Percée. He had one hundred and ninety head of cattle, three cars of which he had shipped to market, and certainly was not entitled to free freight on the others.

One point I wish to make is that there has been discrimination. He was refused assistance from the municipality—

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. PERLEY: He was refused by the local inspector, but he went to Regina and got it.

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask a question?

Mr. PERLEY: My time is limited. The hon. member who spoke ahead of me had an hour, or more, and I have only a moment or two to finish what I have to say. I thought that inasmuch as the minister got a knock-out or so last night, he would probably be quiet when other hon. members from western Canada were speaking.

Mr. GARDINER: We will have another knock-out later.

Mr. PERLEY: If fifty thousand cows could have been saved to the dairy industry, and particularly the smaller dairymen, what would this have meant next spring when they were shipped back? Those cows would produce calves, and in addition produce valuable milk and cream next summer.

The minister made the statement that he would rather have feed there in March than in November or December or February. I can tell him that the fact that the feed is not there in these other months will render it unnecessary to have it in March. I have before me a number of newspaper clippings, but I regret that I have not time to read them.

Mr. GARDINER: Read them.

Mr. PERLEY: I should like to; I wish I had the time.

Mr. GARDINER: Read the last one.

Mr. PERLEY: The reeve of the municipality of Indian Head, for instance, states that the mortality there of horses will be 30 per cent. The mortality of stock in the southern part of the province—

Mr. GARDINER: It has not been five per cent to date.

Mr. PERLEY: The farmers of Grenfell, through the Grenfell board of trade, according to one newspaper heading, ask consideration for the dairy cattle in their district. Another heading states that there is a fodder and feed shortage in the province. Another states, "Horses dying in Kronau district."

I have dozens of these newspaper articles, but at the moment I have not time to read them. Certainly they supply proof that there is a shortage of feed for horses and cattle, and that stock is dying of—

Mr. GARDINER: I must ask the hon. member to read one of them, because I do not think the proof is there.

Mr. PERLEY: If you will allow me to adjourn the debate and give me the time which was taken by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) but which was promised to me, as indicated in a note from your chief whip, I shall be pleased to read these articles to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: Go ahead.

Mr. PERLEY: I will move the adjournment of the debate, Mr. Speaker.

On motion of Mr. Perley the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 9, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice—for the Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house will unite with them in the formation of a joint committee of both houses on the subject of the printing of parliament, and that the members of the standing committee on printing, viz., Messieurs Barry, Bertrand (Laurier), Casselman, Chevrier, Damude, Davidson, Denis, Douglas, Dussault, Elliott (Kindersley), Esling, Evans, Ferron, Fleming, Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemount), Gauthier, Green, Hansell, Hurtubise, Hushion, Jean, Kirk, Lapointe (Matapedia-Matane), Leduc, Lennard, Little, MacInnis, MacKinnon (Edmonton West), MacLean (Prince), McGregor, McIntosh, McKenzie (Lambton-Kent), McNevin (Victoria, Ont.), Marsh, Marshall, Mills, Moore, Mullins, Mulock, Mutch, Pinard, Purdy, Reid, Ross (St. Paul's), Ross (Middlesex East), Rutherford, St-Père, Taylor (Nanaimo), Thompson, Tucker, Tustin, Veniot, Weir, and Winkler, will act as members on the part of this house on the said joint committee on the printing of parliament.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice—for the Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house has appointed the Hon. the Speaker and Messieurs Ahearn, Blackmore, Blair, Blanchette, Bonnier, Bothwell, Bouchard, Bradette, Brasset, Cameron (Hastings South), Casselman, Clark (York-Sunbury), Duffus, Emmerson, Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemount), Grant, Green, Hamilton, Hyndman, Johnston (Lake Centre), Kuhl, Lennard, MacInnis, MacKinnon (Edmonton West), MacLean (Cape Breton North-Victoria), MacLennan, MacNeil, Macphail (Miss), McCallum, Mallette, Martin, Moore, Mutch, Parent (Quebec West and South), Raymond, Reid, Rennie, Ross (St. Paul's), St-Père, Spence, Walsh, Winkler and Young a committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the library of parliament, so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of a joint committee of both houses on the library.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice—for the Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house has appointed the Honourable the Speaker and Messieurs Barber, Bertrand (Prescott), Fafard, Fraser, Gray, Hill, Landeryou, MacInnis, MacMillan, Macphail (Miss), Moore, O'Neill, Pinard, Purdy, Rhéaume, Roberge, Sinclair, Spence, Taylor (Norfolk) and Tustin, a committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the restaurant, so far as the interests of the Commons are concerned, and to act as members of a joint committee of both houses on the restaurant.

Motion agreed to.

DIVERSION OF WATER

EFFECT OF BOUNDARY WATERS TREATY WITH UNITED STATES RESPECTING DIVERSION FROM LAKE MICHIGAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): May I ask the government a question based upon a brief dispatch that appears in to-day's Toronto Globe and Mail, dated Washington, February 8:

Claims Canada Waived Water

Cleveland A. Newton, general counsel for Mississippi Valley Association, emphasizing navigation and sanitation reasons for diverting 5,000 cubic feet of water a second from Lake Michigan through the lakes to the gulf waterway, urged approval of the Parsons bill.

He dismissed the international question with the contention Canada conceded in a 1910 treaty the United States right to divert Lake Michigan water.

The question is: Is there an international treaty of 1910 between Canada and the United States in which Canada waives any rights pertaining to lake Michigan water?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend is an older man than I am and he ought therefore to know the terms of the treaty to which he refers better than I do. I cannot tell him offhand if there is in the treaty any provision capable of the interpretation he speaks of. I should be surprised to learn that there is.

PARLIAMENT HILL

QUESTION WITH RESPECT TO ICY CONDITION OF GROUNDS AND SIDEWALKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): With reference to the observations made yesterday by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) with respect to the icy condition of the grounds and sidewalks on parliament hill, I may say that in 1934, by order in council P.C. 865 of May 21, the care of the grounds, driveways and walks around parliament hill was transferred to the federal district commission and the attention of the commission has been called to the hon. member's remarks. I may add that one must make allowance for the exceptional weather conditions which have prevailed during the last few days.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. N. Francœur for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Bennett.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): When the house adjourned yesterday evening I was about to quote from press reports from Saskatchewan with respect to stock mortality. I was invited to read some of the reports and I shall now take a moment or two to review some of them. I have before me an extract from The Indian Head News of December as follows:

Stock Mortality Matter of Alarm in Municipality

Actual Facts Show that Hundreds of Horses Succumb

Deaths among farm horses of this municipality run into the hundreds, due to lack of feed, . . . The situation is acknowledged as extremely acute by the R. M. council, . . .

Reeve S. W. Nichols, in touch with the actual situation, informs The News that the rural council is doing all it can to cope with the problem. The mortality rate is very high among the district's horse population, with some farmers losing over fifty per cent. One farmer, he told The News, had lost four out of seven of his horses.

Another one from the Regina Star of December 1 reads:

Horses Dying in South for Lack of Feed

Snow and Steady Diet of Russian Thistle Proves Fatal to Animals

Notices in post offices and other public buildings stress the necessity of disposing of stock owing to the acute shortage of feed. Farmers are being requested to budget their feed quota and dispose of the surplus animals lest the retention of live stock result in heavy losses this winter.

Lack of feed has already brought reports of horses dying in the south country.

Among the cases cited is that of Elmer Mithog of Verwood district, 70 miles south of Moose Jaw, who has lost eight horses . . .

Last night I referred to a resolution passed by the Grenfell board of trade and I wish to quote more extensively from it now:

And whereas the dairy farmers themselves, as well as the businessmen, of the town of Glenfell view with alarm the apparent necessity of cutting down the size of their herds fully realizing as they do that many of them will be forced upon public relief while at the same time their herds will have been cut to such an extent that in many cases it will be impossible to rebuild them again during the farmer's lifetime:

Now therefore be it resolved that the government of the province of Saskatchewan, in view of the alleged supply of feed within reasonable transportation distances of the province, should forthwith take such steps as are necessary to insure the dairy farmers of sufficient feed for their herds for the winter of 1937-38.

After this resolution was passed, a letter from the Broadview board of trade was read asking for support along those lines.

Another dispatch by the Canadian Press reads:

Thirty Per cent of Horses in Southeast Dead or Dying

Saskatoon, January 8.—Thirty per cent of the horses in the Macoun, Midale, Halbrite and Goodwater districts in southeastern Saskatchewan are either sick, dying or dead of starvation.

Another dispatch states:

Horses Dying in Kronau District.

Mr. DONNELLY: Who is responsible for the report from Midale?

Mr. PERLEY: That is a report in the press, issued by the United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the date?

Mr. PERLEY: The dispatch is dated January 8. I have another one which is a little different, and it may explain why feed was not secured earlier:

Farmer Charges Deliberate Delay in Hay Payments

Charges that the Saskatchewan administration was deliberately holding up payment for hay sold for relief purposes to that government by Manitoba farmers, was made to the Free Press Friday by F. G. Louth, a farmer of the Roseisle and Stephenfield districts, who, at present, has a government hay deal on his hands.

In a letter to the Minister of Agriculture of Saskatchewan, dated December 23, Mr. Louth warned that, unless some action was taken for payment of hay delivered from the Stephenfield district to the drouth area about two months ago, following inspection by Saskatchewan agricultural representatives, the matter would be taken up with Premier King and the federal Department of Agriculture.

Investigation by Mr. Louth, he says, reveals that many other farmers are in the same position, and he openly charges that the Saskatchewan government is "stalling" in order to save interest on funds.

Despite the fact that his cars of hay were inspected by a government official, and the bills of lading forwarded with the cars to the various points in the dried-out areas, continued requests have been made for further bills of lading, and these were forwarded. Then, the "stall" continued, according to Mr. Louth, when the government officials demanded originals, which had already been sent with the cars. . . .

Later, a request for weights was made, which had gone forward with the cars.

The weights had already been supplied.

Dealing with a government, I figured I was dealing with a body I could count on. . . . Consequently I paid out $140 for baling and loading. Exactly what the trouble is I do not know. . . .

Mr. GARDINER: Will my hon. friend give the date?

Mr. PERLEY: It is the Winnipeg Free Press of December 27. One cause of the difficulties the government had is the fact that a lot of the hay secured for the winter of 1936-37 was not paid for until late this fall. As late as December last farmers and municipalities in Manitoba were complaining that the hay they had supplied had not been paid for, and they refused to ship more hay until the government had paid for that previously supplied. That is no doubt one of the difficulties. I know the reeve of one municipality who went to Manitoba and was told by the reeve of a municipality in that province that several thousand dollars were owing to the municipality for hay shipped during the previous year. The whole matter should have been handled by an independent relief commission. If that method was not followed the government should have considered accepting the offer they received from the pool, of which mention has, I think, already been made. I have before me a statement of the president of the Saskatchewan pool, citing what they offered to do. The pool offered its facilities to the provincial government, and in cooperation with the pools in the provinces east and west to secure supplies and distribute them, and practically all the government would have had to do would be to set the price. The pool offered their facilities at a minimum fee of seventy-five cents a ton plus 3 per cent interest on cash outlay. I know what the answer of the minister to that will be, because the president of the pool sets out in this statement that he replied that there was nothing to prevent the pool from going into the fodder business if they so desired. But that was not the question. Under the present system we have the inspectors to whom the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) referred the other night; I think the forty-five he mentioned were inspectors. If the farmers there were asked what they think of these inspectors the report would be a very interesting one.

If my time were not so short I should like to have referred to the Turgeon commission. However the report of that commission will be presented in due time and I shall have something to say then with respect to the evidence taken, particularly that of Mr. Murray, and some of his actions. I agree with the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) in what he said yesterday, that the great majority of farmers are demanding that the Canadian Wheat Board Act be put into operation, with representation of the farmers on an advisory committee. No matter what the report is I think that will be demanded. Last year I referred to certain losses that had taken place. I now have reason to believe that the figure I gave was well within the mark and that I should have stated a larger figure. If in the report on the final disposal of the wheat taken over from the McFarland board or the Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited a profit is shown, the Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited should be reimbursed to some extent for the services they rendered during three or four years.

After listening to speeches of some hon. members opposite in the last few days I am confirmed in my view that the Liberals have failed and have betrayed the people of Canada. We need reforms. Why are we to-day considering the amendment of the constitution? Because we are now in the year 1938 and the problems confronting the Canadian people to-day are not those that confronted them fifty years ago. To-day we are concerned about such matters as debt, public and private, interest, taxes, freight rates, production and marketing. What we need is dominion control of the grading and marketing of Canada's primary products in order to control the price in the domestic market. Agriculture is our greatest industry; then why not have boards to control it? We have a board controlling the railways, a board of directors controlling the central bank, power boards and the radio corporation, on which some discussion has already taken place in the house.

With respect to the latter corporation I have received protests from people in my constituency and other parts of Saskatchewan against the increase in the licence fee. There are hundreds, yes, thousands of farmers in Saskatchewan who have no other enjoyment these long winter evenings than listening to the radio broadcasts, music, hockey, sports, and getting the world's news daily. These men cannot even pay for a weekly paper, let alone a daily, so it is a great convenience for them to get the news of the world by radio, and I think their protest against the increase is valid. I for one would be in favour of abolishing the licence fee altogether for a time at least. We have these various boards; why not have a board to control wheat and other primary products? Later on this session we shall have opportunity to discuss these questions in detail when they come before us in the form of resolutions or bills, and I shall have some questions to ask.

Briefly, in conclusion I say that the government have failed in many respects to meet the demands of the Canadian people, and to relieve the people of the burdens under which they labour at the present time. I propose to vote for the amendment.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Before the hon. member finishes might I ask him what he means by the proposed charge of seventy-five cents a ton by the Canadian wheat pool on feed? Do I understand that he means that they offered to bale and deliver feed for that price?

Mr. PERLEY: I thought I made it plain enough; the offer was that they would place their facilities at the disposal of the government and use them for the purpose of purchasing feed, arranging for the baling, shipping and distribution to the farmers in the dried out area at the rate of seventy-five cents a ton. As the question has been raised I would say further that we would like to know the commission that was paid to some individuals in Regina for their services in going to Minnesota and gathering up this feed, rather than having it handled through the pool on the offer they made. They offered to do this for seventy-five cents a ton.

Mr. GARDINER: Anyone would do it for fifty cents.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may I join with those who have preceded me in this debate in complimenting the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne for the able manner in which they discharged the duty which was committed to them.

It is not my purpose to discuss in detail the matters mentioned in the speech from the throne. As I propose to confine my remarks chiefly to matters concerning the Department of Trade and Commerce referred to in the debate, I am sure the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) will not take it amiss if I do not follow him in the matters which he discussed just now. He did raise some points in the latter part of his address which might call for some comment, but perhaps it would be better to leave that to a more convenient occasion.

In the speech of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) reference was made to the functions or respective jurisdictions of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce. He expressed concern that there was perhaps some overlapping or possibly even differences of opinion with regard to the matter. Then at the last, in a somewhat jocular vein, he added that my colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was in possession of some sort of magic wand with which he might wave some of us, and perhaps particularly the Minister of Trade and Commerce, into nonentities. That, I think, is the word he used.

Mr. BENNETT: Not "nonentity", I think.

Mr. EULER: That is the word that was used, but I am quite willing to use some other suitable word. Perhaps "oblivion" would be better.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps coming events cast their shadow before.

Mr. EULER: In reply to that, and in exactly the same spirit as that of the right hon. gentleman at the moment, and perhaps also at that time, I would merely say that the practice which existed under the former regime of one minister interfering in the department of another, or perhaps I should say one prime minister interfering in all the departments, was discontinued shortly after the election of 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: I can afford to let that go without an observation.

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend has quite correctly said that the functions of the Department of Agriculture and of the Department of Trade and Commerce are controlled by the statutes under which those departments operate. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his speech on the address described pretty accurately the line of demarcation which separates the functions of the two departments when he said that the Department of Agriculture concerns itself with the production, grading and preparation generally of agricultural products for the markets of the world, seeing to it that those products reach those markets in the proper condition; but that after those products reach the overseas market the work of promoting their sale, as well as the sale of other products, falls strictly within the domain of the Department of Trade and Commerce. That, sir, has always been the case, and I can assure my right hon. friend and those other members opposite who expressed some concern with respect to the matter that this situation will continue. Not only that, Mr. Speaker; perhaps in contrast to the condition of affairs prior to the coming into office of the present government, it is the intention of the two departments to cooperate in every way to promote the interests of the producers of agricultural commodities.

Mr. BENNETT: The Shaw report looks like that.

Mr. EULER: I propose to-day to deal particularly with the various phases of the export trade of this country, more especially with regard to the value of that trade, which seems to be questioned by certain members of the house, including my friend the right hon. leader of the opposition, especially when he said—I am sure to the amazement of this house—that freer trade was apt to predispose nations to war. That is a doctrine that so far as I know has never been enunciated by anyone else.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend has not read Mr. Keynes, then.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps not, but I am using my common sense in these matters, and I am very sure that hon. gentlemen opposite, as well as the supporters of the government on this side of the house, believe in their hearts that the more business we can do with our neighbours in a mutually advantageous way, the better it is for the peace of the world. I need only draw to the attention of the house one very outstanding example which disproves this new theory, which by the way has obtained the support of a new ally in the person of the leader of the social credit group, that freer trade fosters war. For the last two years we have had a reciprocal trade agreement with the United States, and I will leave it to the people of this country to say whether in the whole history of this continent the relations between the two countries were ever any more cordial than they are at this moment. It is fair to say also that a great deal of credit attaches to the efforts made by the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States in this direction.

My right hon. friend, as I said before, seemed to question, very much to my surprise, the advantages of export trade.

Mr. BENNETT: Pardon me, Mr. Speaker; he did not question the value of export trade at any time. What he did say, and he repeats it, was that it is not a cure for the conditions that exist in this country.

Mr. EULER: I am very sure that that statement came from my hon. friends in the far corner and not from my right hon. friend, but I quite agree with it. This government, or the supporters of this government, never advanced the thought that by the extension of export trade, by trading more with the countries of the world, we would find a panacea for all our ills, social or otherwise. I do not believe that. I do believe, however, that the promotion of export trade is a mighty factor in bringing prosperity to Canada or any other country.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend is now consistent with what he said in the city of Montreal, I think in the year 1933, when he was given a banquet by the board of trade of that city upon his return from Great Britain. He said then, and I shall not give the full quotation because I do not desire to embarrass him—

Mr. BENNETT: Go on; do not stop on that account.

Mr. EULER: He said then that export trade was vital to the prosperity of Canada—and now I will add the other—and that he did not believe this country could afford to experiment with shorter hours of labour and higher rates of pay.

In connection with his fear that export trade would promote war, the right hon. gentleman mentioned cut-throat competition, presumably suggesting that this competition would lead to ill-feeling and thoughts of war. This government does not believe in promoting cut-throat competition. It proceeds entirely on the theory that when it makes a trade agreement with another country it is not following the principle of trying to get the better of those with whom it is dealing but rather that it should make an agreement that will be mutually satisfactory. That is the only kind of agreement that can possibly be of lasting value.

We have heard the argument—I think it comes from our friends to the right, and some newspapers have been advancing it—that the only export business in which we should engage is that by which we export those things of which we have a natural surplus and import those things which we do not produce ourselves, or do not produce to advantage. I have no particular fault to find with that argument. I think that is exactly the line upon which we are proceeding to-day. With our great natural resources, Canada must be a trading nation. With our resources of the farm, the forest, the mine and the fisheries we produce a great deal more than we can possibly consume at home. What would happen to our population if the men now engaged in farming, the thousands of men engaged in our mines, those employed in cutting timber in our forests and sawing it into lumber in our mills, our fishermen in Nova Scotia and British Columbia, found that because we could not sell our goods they were out of employment? So I say that in a country such as this, where we have great natural products, upon which are founded other industries as well, it becomes an absolute necessity that we find markets in other countries, because of our surplus products.

The complement of that, of course, is that if we expect to sell these goods in other countries we must also expect to buy, and we do buy. We do not produce cotton, rubber, tea, coffee, spices, or even sufficient iron or petroleum, among many other things, and of necessity we are obliged to import these into Canada. But as a general thing I think it is true that Canada is producing, and not importing to any great extent, the things it is best equipped to produce. She exports the surplus, and imports the things I have mentioned.

In developing export trade, this government, as did the previous government, has had to contend with a great many obstacles. Unfortunately, soon after the war, and perhaps more particularly in the last seven or eight years, certain countries, especially European countries, in order to prepare themselves and to make themselves self-sufficient in the event of another war, have tried to produce some of the goods which we sold them formerly. To a very great extent our wheat market in continental Europe has gone by the board, and we have been reduced to the necessity of selling our wheat largely in Great Britain. So, in order to bring about what might be described as an equilibrium of trade, whereby we can sell our goods to other countries and in turn receive commodities from those countries, we have found it necessary to try to arrange trade agreements.

What do we find to-day? Not only are there high tariffs against us but, what is perhaps even worse so far as obstructions to trade are concerned, we have exchange control by which a citizen, we will say of Germany, might desire to buy a Canadian commodity, but cannot do so because he is not permitted to send money out of the country.

Then, we have to meet the system of quotas, as it is found in Switzerland and some other countries, which brings about an absolute limitation upon the quantity of goods which may be imported into that country. We meet also government monopolies, which operate in the same way. Thus, if we desire to establish markets in these other countries, and not be at a disadvantage with our competitors, it has been necessary for us to arrange trade agreements.

I believe we have been fairly successful in this endeavour. Perhaps some credit belongs to the previous administration because of some of the trade agreements they made. I do say however that we have been successful in promoting a very heavy export trade. As hon. members are no doubt aware, Canada now holds fourth place among the countries of the world in the value of her export trade. Our foreign trade, both buying and selling, is over two billions of dollars, and we had a trade balance—perhaps this is more interesting to the right hon. the leader of the opposition than it is to me—of some $315,000,000 in the past year.

Although I have not the exact number, nearly thirty such agreements have been consummated. We hope to make additions to that number. There has been difficulty in getting into the markets of some of the smaller countries in eastern Europe, and at the present time negotiations are proceeding with respect to them.

I should like to discuss for a few moments a question which has been raised by certain hon. members, namely that of the value of the policy of freer trade. The statement has been made, and perhaps more particularly by our friends to the right, that the recovery Canada is experiencing is not attributable to government policy, but is merely something which is occurring in all other countries. Their suggestion is that all other countries are recovering, and that Canada is sharing in this general advance. I am afraid that suggestion does not hold good when it is submitted to the test of fact. For the information of hon. members in the corner of the house may I place upon Hansard a few figures. In 1935 the increase in world exports was only 2·2 per cent, while the increase in Canada's exports was 7·1 per cent. In 1936 world export trade increased 8½ per cent, while Canada's export trade increased 23 per cent.

Again let us consider our agreement with the United States. Our exports in 1937, over those of 1935—I am taking the period in which the agreement operated—increased 28·2 per cent. I would ask hon. members to consider a further point of first-class importance in judging whether or not the trade agreement had anything to do with the increase in our exports. The increase in exports of products to the United States, on which the tariff was reduced as against Canadian goods, was in those two years 80·8 per cent. On those items which were already free, and which were bound so that the United States could not increase the tariff, the increase was 46 per cent. Those facts become really significant when I say that the increase with respect to items not covered by our trade agreement with the United States was only 7·1 per cent. If that is not an absolute proof that we profited, so far as exports were concerned, by our agreement with the United States, I know of no better method.

Mr. BENNETT: May I ask a question, without disconcerting the minister?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister must realize, I think, that the items which were not affected by the agreement at all, namely, those which were free and on which there is no change in the tariff, are responsible for the greatest part of the whole increase. All you have to do is to count them, as I did the other day.

Mr. EULER: I will not make that concession.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, all you have to do is to count them.

Mr. EULER: As a matter of fact, in those two years our exports to the United States increased from $359,000,000 to the huge total of $470,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Correct.

Mr. EULER: Then, we received another advantage, through our trade agreement with the United States. Of late that country has also established the practice of entering into trade agreements with other nations. In our present trade agreement with the United States there is a clause giving to Canada what is known as most favoured nation treatment. I need not explain the meaning of that term more than to say that the practical result is that if the United States makes a trade agreement in which she gives concessions to other countries, Canada automatically receives the same concessions. Of course, that is reciprocal and applies also in the event of our giving most favoured nation treatment to other countries.

I might give another example to show where trade agreements have been beneficial. Something over a year ago we made a trade agreement with Germany. Through that agreement our trade with Germany has increased almost one hundred per cent during the year in which it has been in operation, namely from $6,759,820 to $11,771,565.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister would tell us what the exports were; that would be very interesting.

Mr. EULER: Yes, I think I can give my right hon. friend the list, although I have not the complete list in front of me. I was going to come to that later; I will deal with it in a moment or two. I thought I might be interrupted with a statement that the exports to Germany consisted of metals and raw material, and other articles to be used in the preparation of war munitions. It is true that when the agreement was made the German representatives did wish to import into their country more of the raw material, including metals and some others, which they did not produce. But we did not agree to make that kind of arrangement. We insisted, and succeeded in having Germany agree to our stipulation, that 63 per cent of the credits which she will allot for the purchase of Canadian goods must be in the form of other goods, such as wheat, and, to a great extent, other agricultural products.

Perhaps I should give my hon. friends opposite some credit for the arrangements which were entered into with Australia and New Zealand. Our agreement with Australia has been renewed and slightly modified and during the last year our exports to that country increased to something more than $30,000,000.

I should like to deal for a few moments with another criticism to which I have just made casual reference, to the effect that the increase in our export business is due largely to the export of commodities which go into the manufacture of munitions. That is not the case. It would be idle for me to deny that with the speeding up of rearming in Great Britain and other countries there has been some effect upon the exports to those countries, but the exports for munition manufacturing purposes are not by any means the chief factor in the increase of our total exports.

Let me try to give some proof of that statement. Our agricultural exports did drop last year, due almost entirely to the fact that we had a drought in western Canada and made only a small exportation of wheat. Our exports of animal products increased from $97,000,000 in 1935 to $144,000,000 in 1937. It can hardly be said that that increase was due to demands for munitions purposes. The exports of wood and paper products increased from $176,000,000 to $263,000,000. There again it can be said that the increase was not due to munitions needs. It might be said ordinarily that iron and steel products would be used for this purpose, but as a matter of fact our exports of iron and steel products consisted largely of farm implements, machinery and automobiles.

As I mentioned a moment ago, in this two-year period our exports to the United States increased from $359,000,000 to $470,000,000. The United States were not concerned to any great extent in the making of munitions in those two years so that one can hardly attribute this increase to munitions manufacturing. Perhaps at this point I could give my right hon. friend the list of commodities which we export to Germany that he asked me for. The sixty-three per cent of the exchange which is allotted by the German government for the purchase of Canadian goods must be in wheat, asbestos, apples, seeds, lumber, fish meal, salmon, wood pulp and a number of other minor articles. I submit that none of those articles can be said to be used in the making of munitions.

I should like to say a few words with regard to nickel, perhaps a dangerous subject. It seems to be the general impression that our exports of nickel are used entirely for the building of war vessels and making of munitions generally. That is not the case. Some hon. members of this house, certain newspapers and organizations and many citizens of Canada have advocated that Canada should prohibit entirely the export of nickel, especially to those countries which are at war at the present time. I will not yield to anyone in or out of this house in my abhorrence of the outrages that are taking place in countries which I need not name. If, by the total prohibition of the export of nickel and some other commodities, it would be possible to stop the wars in which certain countries are engaged, I would be entirely in favour of such prohibition. That may be a compliment to the hearts of the Canadian people, but I question if upon further consideration it would be considered as a compliment to sound reasoning.

[Mr. Euler.]

I desire not to be misunderstood on this point. I would not advocate for one moment that because we can make money out of the export of nickel we ought to be willing to export something which might cause the shedding of blood of innocent people with all the horrors attending modern warfare. Let us examine the matter for a moment. In 1910 the total world production of nickel was 25,000 tons. In 1916 and 1918, the war years, this production had risen to 52,000 tons. In 1921, the war being over, it had dropped to 9,100 tons. Then in the succeeding eight years up to 1929, when there were no wars and no great preparation for war, it rose to 62,000 tons, greater than it had been even during the war years.

The fact is that the companies in this country which produce nickel finding that that there was no longer a war demand for their product began extensive scientific researches, the result of which was that this metal was adopted for a great many uses other than for war purposes. Canada produces about ninety per cent of the world's nickel, the other ten per cent being produced largely in New Caledonia, one of the colonies of France on the other side of the world. I have it on very good authority that of the total production of nickel, only ten per cent, or perhaps a little more at the present time with all the war preparations, is used for munitions purposes. Therefore even though we discontinued entirely the sale of nickel there would still be sufficient produced in other parts of the world to supply war needs.

What would immediately follow would be a greater development of fields which are now not profitable to work in competition with the cheaper production in Canada. Substitutes would be discovered immediately, as was the case in Germany during the war. Perhaps I should not say this, but I may as well be frank. Should this country prohibit the export of nickel to Japan, unless the same prohibition were applied to exports to the United States, to Sweden and to other countries, there would be no doubt that nickel would reach Japan just as though it had been exported direct from this country. Perhaps I might offer this final observation. Those of us who have seen the stupendous and humiliating failure of the League of Nations in applying sanctions in the case of the Italo-Ethiopian war perhaps would hesitate before committing Canada to experimenting with sanctions on her sole account.

With the facts I have given to the house I think it may fairly be claimed by the government that at least some of the expansion in our export trade is attributable to the trade policies followed by this government.

I should like to make reference to certain statements made on Monday by my very good friend, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). He told the house that last summer he visited the Welsh coal fields and found that whereas in the previous year Canada had taken from Great Britain something like 1,640,000 tons of anthracite, these importations had decreased by about half a million tons. That is the fact. But my good friend goes on to make this remarkable statement, and it is for this reason alone that I refer to the matter. He says, on page 212 of Hansard:

> For the life of me I cannot see what the government expects to gain by reducing our importations of anthracite coal from the United Kingdom by 500,000 tons and then going all over the face of the earth, to countries to which we cannot possibly ship our farm produce, in order to bring in 500,000 tons of coal to make up the difference.

The only inference that can be drawn from that statement—in fact the hon. member makes the direct charge—is that we are travelling all over the world in order, as he says, to induce other countries to send us their anthracite coal and displace coal from Great Britain. I have a high regard for the hon. member for Davenport; usually he is very moderate in his statements and shows good common sense in what he says, but I cannot, to use his own words, "for the the life of me" understand how, with the knowledge which he must have, he could make a charge such as that. We have made no agreement with any other country to bring in anthracite coal. As a matter of fact the policy of this government so far as anthracite coal is concerned is exactly the same as it was under the government which he supported. In 1932, when the Ottawa trade agreements were made, my right hon. friend who now leads the opposition put a duty of fifty cents a ton on hard coal from all countries other than Great Britain, from which country coal imports to Canada remained free. That is the position to-day. We have made no change in that respect in our agreements with these other countries. From Germany, from the United States, hard anthracite coal still pays a duty of fifty cents a ton.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. EULER: Yes, certainly.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are the conditions prevailing to-day with regard to the importation of Russian coal into Canada the same as they were under the previous administration?

Mr. EULER: I will deal with that immediately. When the previous administration went out of office there still remained an embargo against practically all Russian products. This government felt that it was not right or wise that we alone of all important countries should refuse to do business with Russia. For that reason we removed the embargo against Russian goods, thus placing ourselves in exactly the same position as Great Britain, the United States and most other countries. We made no trade agreement with Russia; there is none to this day. Not only that; whereas some feared that there would be heavy importations of anthracite coal into this country, the Russians voluntarily consented to limit their exports to Canada to 250,000 tons annually. As a matter of fact they have never taken advantage of that provision, and all they have exported to this country is something like 150,000 tons. Imports of Welsh coal have sunk by half a million tons, but let me tell the hon. member this with regard to the various countries which were exporting anthracite coal to Canada: shipments to the extent of 141,000 tons which formerly came from Indo-China, the Netherlands and Belgium have practically ceased. In a former year we received from Indo-China 88,000 tons. That has been reduced to nothing in the last year.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister means, by " a former year," 1936?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Under the present government?

Mr. EULER: Exactly.

Mr. MacNICOL: But not under the Bennett government.

Mr. EULER: Yes, but we made no new arrangement with these countries. Let my hon. friend observe this too, that if it came in under the present government in 1936 it also went out under the present government in 1937. From the Netherlands we had purchased 16,000 tons, but it paid the fifty cents a ton duty the same as Indo-China did. Now there are no imports whatever from the Netherlands. Imports from Belgium of 44,000 tons, upon which fifty cents per ton duty was paid, have now sunk to slightly over 8,000 tons.

As I said, we took from Russia 154,000 tons, but exports from Great Britain of Welsh coal dropped, as my hon. friend said, by something like half a million tons. Why? The explanation is very simple. It is not because this government went out and induced nations in all parts of the world to send us anthracite coal. One reason is that, as many hon. members know, ocean freight rates have risen tremendously. The other and perhaps the better reason is that there has been an enormously increased demand from the continent for Welsh coal. For some reason or other the British coal operator produces anthracite coal in large sizes, or rather he leaves it in large sizes, and he can sell that coal at good prices in the European market. The Canadian consumer of coal likes the small sizes; and Germany, which has increased her exports of coal to this country, although not nearly enough to make up the amount which has been dropped by the Welsh exporters, supplies us with the small sizes of coal. I know it to be the fact that there was always considerable trouble in connection with importations of Welsh coal because they were sending in the larger sizes, and I believe it to be a fact that in Montreal the importers of Welsh coal were obliged to erect breakers to reduce it to the dimensions which Canadian consumers would accept. That is the position with regard to Welsh anthracite. This government has not altered its policy one iota with regard to the importation of Welsh coal. Welsh coal has the same advantage on the Canadian market that it had when the former government was in office.

I regret that I have held the house at such great length. It was not my intention to do so. But I wished to make reference to some of the statements that have been made throughout the country, and more particularly by the leader of the opposition, with regard to the negotiations now proceeding with the United States for a new trade agreement. I regret that, more particularly in the Victoria by-election, the leader of the opposition inoculated, if I may use the word, the people of this country with a fear that in these negotiations the interests of Canadian producers would be sacrificed. I do not know where he obtained his information. If I had the full facts with regard to the negotiations I would not be permitted, of course, to give them to the house.

Mr. WALSH: Does the minister realize that the premier of British Columbia was also "inoculated," and that he inoculated the members of the legislature of that province?

Mr. EULER: Well, I should think that that was the direct result of the speeches made by the right hon. gentleman.

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no; he commenced them before I went there.

An hon. MEMBER: You must have telegraphed.

Mr. EULER: This fear of the consequences of the negotiations is not a new thing. To my mind it is very regrettable, whether it was the premier of British Columbia or the former prime minister of the Dominion of Canada, if either of these gentlemen by speeches or addresses, without any real basis or cause, increases and accentuates that fear of the future which already is in the minds of many people. In my opinion one of the chief reasons we have had recession in this country is that very fear and lack of confidence on the part of our people. We heard the same expressions of alarm when we proposed to make the first trade agreement with the United States, but the result has shown that there was no cause for them and that the consequences have been mutually satisfactory.

Mr. BENNETT: You did not make it. It was all done when you came into office.

Mr. DUNNING: Why did you vote against it, then?

Mr. BENNETT: Why? For that reason—because you gave more than we would.

Mr. EULER: When I made that statement I was not particularly attributing anything to the leader of the opposition. There was, however, a fear throughout Canada that the industries of the country would be sacrificed. Well, that did not happen, because the agreement was mutually satisfactory and advantageous. There was the same fear when we proposed to make a new agreement with the United Kingdom, but that agreement seems to be working satisfactorily. In a minor way we had the same fear when we made the agreement with Germany, and there has not been one word of complaint with respect to it. Again we have the fear on the part of our industrialists and agriculturists as well—and it is fostered by my hon. friends opposite—that we are going to sacrifice the interests of Canadian producers in our negotiations with the United States.

Let me say this in conclusion. I say it in all sincerity and as emphatically as I can, and I believe that in this I shall have the support of the Prime Minister and all my colleagues. This government is not so inept, so unwise or so unpatriotic as to sacrifice the interests of the producers of Canada, whether they be agricultural or industrial, for any reason whatsoever.

Mr. A. H. MITCHELL (Medicine Hat): I have listened with interest to many of the speeches that have been made during this debate, but it was the address on Friday last of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that inspired me to take part. I should like to say to the Minister of Justice through you, Mr. Speaker, that one remark which he made struck me very forcibly, and that was when he told the house that he was concluding his thirty-fourth year of continuous service to the Dominion of Canada. At the time the right hon. gentleman first took his seat in this house I was not very many months old, and so, in my mind, his name is linked with the traditions of Canada as one of Canada's elder statesmen. I wish to congratulate him upon his long service and to wish him thirty-five years more of similar service to the country.

During these thirty-five years, however, tremendous things have been happening in the world and the tempo of living has speeded up considerably, especially during the later years since the great war. Whereas it used to be very true to say that life on this planet depended upon three essential elements, air, water and food, that now has changed with our industrialized and very highly developed civilization, so that the truth is now that the three elements required to sustain life and to enable one to enjoy all its privileges on this earth and in this civilization are, air, water and money. Without money it is not possible in this complex civilization to obtain even food. I wonder how many of us would have our dinners to-night if we did not have the wherewithal to pay for them. And if that is true, and in all common sense it is true, then surely somewhere in this problem of money lies the key to the answer that we look for to solve the problems which we are trying to solve with trade and commissions and one thing and another.

Any man's property and civil rights, his ability to live and to enjoy living in the world, are closely linked up with his ability to pay for what he needs, and to pay with money, because to-day men do not tender bags of wheat and fleeces of wool in payment for what they consume; in this country they tender dollars. The grim spectre of want disappears just as soon as money is available, and it so happens that it is of enormous importance not only in a nation's life but in the life of the individual—no less in my life than in the life of Canada. It is because of the need for money in order to have the right to live that men steal, lie, cheat, fight, murder, and die. They do all these things for money because of what money gives them. It is fair to say that if you are looking for the devil incarnate, the father of lies, you will find him somewhere around money. And so the remarks of my right hon. friend on Friday last made me feel like saying in this house that what is being done in Alberta is being done for the first time in history, and that is that a government elected democratically has undertaken to challenge the authority of those who control the supply of money—not lumber and wheat and coal and all these things, but money, which is necessary for the exchange of them. It has never been done before, but the challenge has not yet been sustained. It has been made, however, and this is something of the procedure that was followed.

Rightly or wrongly it is a fact that the government of Alberta ultimately went to that system in which all money originates, the banking system, and said to them: Here is a problem. Here is a naturally productive and wealthy area, extremely productive, which is not overly populated, and the people are not able to consume to the limit of their appetite all the things they are able to produce. In effect the Alberta government said to the banks: If all that the people of Alberta are able to produce were in one end of the province, and the people with appetites to consume were in the other end, and the problem was then a transportation problem, we would not approach you, the bankers, at all; we would approach a transportation company and ask it to perform the function for which it exists in the state. But of course it is not a transportation problem. The problem is that while the people are able to produce they are not able to consume, not for lack of appetite but for lack of money, which you and you alone now control. So the Alberta government said to the banks: Will you admit your responsibility in this connection and set about righting this difficulty as quickly as possible? That was the purpose of the letter sent by Hon. Solon E. Low to the branch banks in Alberta. Or failing that, will you admit, if that is the case, that you do not know how to solve this problem of money? Will you admit, for instance, that there has been built up a Frankenstein which has got out of hand, if that is what you think? If you admit that you do not know how to solve this problem, there are men who say they do know how; so employ them, bring them in with you and attempt to solve the problem together. If they fail fire them and get others, until the solution is found. The banks replied that they were willing to co-operate within the bounds of this act and that and so on, which was all very fine. A questionnaire was sent out as a feeler to find out how much cooperation could be expected. It asked for the names of certain people. No replies were forthcoming, which showed the amount of cooperation that was available.

Then a third course became necessary, if the source of money would not admit its responsibility and set about correcting the evil, or in the alternative admit that it did not know how and acquire assistance in effecting a remedy. In that case it becomes necessary for the Alberta government within its own limits to pass such legislation as will demonstrate that the institution which now has the monopoly of banking does not intend that the problem should be solved, nor will it relinquish that monopoly. That is the meaning of the legislation which was passed by the Alberta government. Personally I think mistakes have been made; any government, being human, makes mistakes. But I agree with what was said by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Hyndman) a day or two ago, that in Alberta they are at least attempting to do what needs to be done and therefore are to be admired.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit me to ask what names were wanted from the banks?

Mr. MITCHELL: Merely a list of employees, a very simple matter. I wonder why it is so difficult for people to recognize that there is an acute problem in connection with money. Perhaps an illustration such as this may be helpful. As a farmer I am able to produce certain goods. When I sell them for money I take that money just as much for granted as I do the goods. A government—this or any other—is not able to acquire money in any other way than by taxation or by borrowing. Those are the only two ways, according to the statutes now in effect. For that reason the policy of any government must of necessity be satisfactory to those who provide the means of payment.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Does the hon. member refer to Canadian national money or to Canadian government money or to bank money or to any money, money as such?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not follow the the question, but I think perhaps my meaning will appear as I proceed.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What type of money does the hon. member refer to?

Mr. MITCHELL: Anything that pays for goods and services is money.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): At any rate?

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. This government has given the banking system—the Bank of Canada now—the right to decide on the amount of money that shall be in circulation. Any time that the Bank of Canada sees fit to increase the amount of money in circulation it may do so, and any time it sees fit to decrease the amount it can do so. That includes both paper money and credit money, money of all kinds. Now there are only two ways of doing that. Suppose money has to be issued or the amount in circulation increased, the only way a bank can put out money is to spend it or to lend it. It does not matter who creates it, it can only get out by being spent or lent. The great flow of money from the banking system into public circulation is in the form of principal lent cooperatively to borrowers, and the demand back is in the form of principal plus interest. In any year if the interest on loans made is greater than the amount that the banks themselves spend on services, it is physically impossible to meet the interest, and debt naturally and normally must pile up. Of course over the long period of years that Canada has been in existence it has been necessary many times for the dominion to borrow money, because the tax income was not sufficient to meet the expenditures. So bonds were floated at different times. Those bonds are not repayable in lumber or wheat or coal or any of the commodities that we the people of Canada produce; they are repayable only in dollars, and dollars are produced only by the banking system. That being the case, whatever government is in power, it has to meet its obligations with a medium which is supplied by only one institution. So, until a third way of getting money into circulation is found, until this is done by means of a money technique which comprehends existing facts, and puts into circulation sufficient money to reflect accurately physical truths as they exist, our accounting system certainly needs enlarging.

Because control can be exercised by those who provide the means of payment; because this government must necessarily borrow in order to meet its obligations, and because in order to borrow it must be not necessarily friendly with the banks but at least in a relationship satisfactory to the banking system; I am sure its policy must be agreeable to the banking system. This will be true until such time as the government—that is to say, the people—recognize the subtlety of the control over their very right to live, as exercised through money, and demand that the government of the day remove that anomaly and that monopoly from existence. Then, and not until then, will it be possible for the people of any society, in Canada or in Alberta, to produce and consume to the limit of their appetite and exchange the surplus after they have satisfied themselves. Then trade will really enter into the picture; but until we do that, trade alone, or any of these other palliatives that we are attempting, will not and cannot possibly solve the problems of unemployment and poverty. Until such time as this complex system that is ours, which requires men to depend upon money as much as they depend upon air and water, which has had that control of money handed over by the people, through their successive governments, to a private monopoly, has been altered, certainly we cannot expect that any of these problems of unemployment, poverty, debt and want will be solved. We may tinker with them, but if the system does not collapse under the weight of its own debt then we shall have found a way of preventing it from doing so by devising another method of bringing money into circulation to enlarge the methods we now employ.

So, Mr. Speaker, I did not wish to make any attack on the government, nor did I wish to defend everything that has been done by the Alberta Social Credit government. I simply wanted to point out to all earnest members present that Alberta is not playing a game. We are not playing a political game. Premier Aberhart and his ministers are genuinely and actually tackling a problem which, if civilization is to survive, must be solved; that is, the problem of making what is already physically true—that is, plenty—become financially true so that the plenty can be consumed by the people.

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in the debate on the address it is customary, desirable and practical for members to present such matters as are of immediate importance to their constituents, with the thought and hope that the government will deal with them, either by legislation or by regulation as the matters suggest.

Conditions to-day present a tragedy for youth. Thousands of boys approaching manhood graduate from high schools each year, and each year thousands are added to those unemployed. In the speech from the throne the announcement is made that the government proposes to extend the scheme for the training of unemployed youth, and certainly it will be interesting to us to learn just what that scheme may be.

In my opinion there is nothing that can contribute as much towards the relief of the existing situation, so far as our young men are concerned, as the apprenticeship system. I believe that if the government would endeavour to cooperate with industry in order to bring about the taking on of apprentices, a very great deal of good would result. Thousands of young men would gladly take advantage of an opportunity, for example, to become apprentices in airplane construction, in piloting airplanes, and in the work of engineers, mechanics, groundmen or any other line of aviation. There is no doubt in the world that the government could contribute to that end. Why not persuade Trans-Canada Air Lines to take on so many apprentices? Why not endeavour to persuade other industries to do their share towards helping young men to fit themselves for work?

I suppose, Mr. Speaker, hon. members will think I too often bring up conditions in Trail, but there we have the plant of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, and it would be a good thing if the heads of other industries would follow the example that has been set by Doctor S. G. Blaylock in connection with apprentices. Doctor Blaylock is the man who put soul into industry, and that is what industry needs to-day more than anything else. There the sons of employees are given an opportunity to enter various departments of the plant, and to-day seventy apprentices are receiving instruction in twelve different trades. To further that instruction the best available instructors have been secured to drill and coach the boys in matters relating to their trade, taking them beyond the high school standards in mathematics and science, so that in the end they will be not only journeymen of their crafts but also efficient employees.

There is one more situation with which I think the government could deal in order to aid in the relief of unemployed young men. I refer to a class of young men who are handicapped, who have not even the opportunity to obtain relief through pick and shovel jobs. I have in mind particularly young men who are handicapped by lack of sight. The Canadian National Institute for the Blind is appealing to this government, to the various provincial governments and to the owners of large office buildings, for permission to install in various buildings concession stands to be operated by blind young men. These concession stands would not in any way mar the appearance of the building. They would be constructed along plans to be approved by the chief architect of the dominion. The woodwork and the tile work would be fitting to the surrounding conditions in the building. First of all, these stands are supplied with newspapers, periodicals, tobacco and like merchandise at the expense of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. A blind attendant would be in charge. That attendant, an unemployed young man, is given all the profits resulting from the sale of the merchandise, with the exception of only three per cent, which is deducted from net profits for purposes of depreciation and to keep the stand in proper condition.

Throughout Canada to-day there are two hundred such concessions, and that simply means that two hundred young men have employment which perhaps otherwise they would not have. The Canadian National Institute for the Blind cooperates with the American Foundation for the Blind. The latter organization has been so much impressed with the progress made in this direction that it, too, has taken the matter in hand, and has presented it to congress. Congress has approved of the installation of concession stands in federal public buildings. Not only has it given its approval but it has generously contributed sums of money for the initiation of that program. Furthermore, as a compliment to the Dominion of Canada it has taken from the Canadian National Institute for the Blind a blind placement officer who will have general supervision of the installation of these stands throughout the United States.

May I be permitted to offer a suggestion to the Minister of Finance, namely that he endeavour to persuade the various service clubs to take up the matter of taxation, in an endeavour to make the people of Canada tax conscious? If the minister does not do this work, then he should see that others do it. While some people are tax conscious, certainly others are not. The man on the street has no conception whatsoever of what he pays by way of taxation. He says, "What difference does it make to me if the government borrows a few more million, or a billion?" Until he does realize that it makes a difference to him, we cannot hope for a continuation of responsible government, because the man on the street pays the taxes. He must pay, the same as anybody else, although he may be absolutely unconscious of it.

The great ambition of the young man is to have a motor car. Assume he purchases a car in the average price class; without knowledge on his part and long before the provincial government gets a crack at him, the federal government takes $65 or $70 by way of sales and excise taxes. If he chooses a more expensive car, costing wholesale about $1,000, he pays on sales and excise taxes in the neighbourhood of $125. And so it goes on, all down the line. If a person takes a trip on the train he pays a ten per cent tax on his chair or his berth. If he sends a telegram he pays a five cent tax. If he sends a long distance message by telephone he pays from one cent to 25 cents. If he happens to have savings on which there are dividends he will find that there is a tax deduction from the dividend, and particularly on one which he happens to send outside the country.

[Mr. Esling.]

Turning to another line of recreation, let us suppose that he wants to light his pipe. If he chooses to smoke he must pay twenty-five cents per pound on his tobacco, and if his choice is cigarettes he pays from four cents to eleven cents per package. If he rolls his own he must pay two cents per package on the cigarette papers. If he chooses a ten cent cigar he is taxed one and a half cents. When he finds it necessary to light his cigar, or whatever he may be smoking, he must pay two and a half cents on a box of 300 matches. If he wishes to economize, and buys a twenty-five cent lighter, he must pay a five cent tax. He must pay from $1.50 to $2 on the bottles of spirits he may choose to buy. Then, if he builds a house valued at $3,000, absolutely without his knowledge about $120 is given to the federal government by way of sales tax on everything he uses. He pays on everything he wears and on everything he consumes.

The sooner the public generally can be made tax conscious the sooner the minister and the government will be relieved of constant appeals for appropriations.

May I say a few words about the housing act? That act has not been a success in British Columbia, through no fault of the government. The difficulty is that one cannot get an insurance company, a finance company, a trust company or any other financial organization to lend them money. They will not go to the expense of supervision. Up to date I believe there have been 320 loans in British Columbia, since the initiation of the act at the end of 1935. Last year, without the assistance of the housing act, there were eighty-five houses built in Trail. I have endeavoured to persuade municipalities to take upon themselves the responsibilities of lending authorities, but I receive word from a municipal counsel that under the Municipal Act of British Columbia there is not sufficient scope to permit municipalities to borrow for that purpose.

In this connection I suggest that industry should do something. No matter what is done, we look to the federal government, and I think it is time industry did its share. Let me impress this upon the minister: At Trail $2,750,000 has been lent employees for the building of homes, and not a cent has been lost. The money was lent at five per cent interest. This year it is the intention to go farther, and by the end of the year the amount will have reached $3,000,000. A program is now under way for the construction of one hundred homes of various types of architecture, at moderate prices so as to permit the wage earner to secure a home. The average value of the homes will be about $2,200. Each home will contain two bedrooms, a living room, a kitchen and a bath, and the upstairs is arranged so that the purchaser may finish it at his convenience.

These homes are made available to employees. The person going into a home is permitted to rent it for the first year, and if at the end of that time he wishes to purchase, the rent he has paid in the first year is applied as the initial payment on the principal sum.

May I now approach another subject which has been discussed at length in the debate, namely that of radio. I propose however to approach the subject not from the angle of the fifty cent increase but from that of manufacture and sale. I should like to refer to the Patent Act. Everyone realizes that the genius of anyone who perfects something should be rewarded through the sale of that article. Generally he sells it to a manufacturer who makes an arrangement for the payment of royalties. That is perfectly all right, but it is an entirely different thing when those who make a business of acquiring patents have a virtual monopoly over the sale of certain articles. When they put the screws on the public and make them pay what they please, it is high time the government interfered. These monopolies and supermonopolies contribute more to dissension, to disturbance and to biased public opinion which undermines security than any other single thing.

I am going to say a few words about the Canadian Radio Patents Limited. This company controls seventy-one patents, and they take advantage of their control in every way. Last year a resident of my district went across the line and brought home a seven tube radio for which he had paid $32.50. He brought that in under the $100 customs exemption, declaring it at the border and securing his clearance. No sooner had he installed it in his home than he was served with a notice by the Canadian Radio Patents Limited that he was infringing upon Canadian patent rights and would have to pay damages. He hesitated to comply and was then served with an undertaking which he refused to sign. I wish I were able to read this to the house, but I shall ask permission to have it placed on Hansard:

This undertaking requires the importer not to import, not to make, not to use or not to sell any radio coming within the scope of the patents set out thereon. This corporation holds the patents on seventy-one radio parts, and there are not very many more parts in a radio. This gentleman refused to sign this undertaking, but after some correspondence he was advised that perhaps the easiest way out would be to pay the royalty. He did so—paid the royalty, or the damages as they term

it. He then received a letter, which I ask permission to place upon Hansard, as follows:

McCrossan, Campbell & Meredith,
Barristers & Solicitors.

Hull Building,
Vancouver, B.C.,
April 10, 1937.

Mr. D. St. Denis,
Nelson Civic Commission,
Nelson, B.C.

Dear Sir:—

Re Canadian Radio Patents, Ltd.

Further to our letter to you of the 24th ultimo we beg to advise that we have now been instructed by our clients that in view of the fact that the receiving set which you purchased was for personal use only and apparently done in ignorance of our clients' rights we are prepared to waive our demands that you execute a formal undertaking.

We have, however, been instructed to point out that payment made by you was merely in the nature of nominal damages and that in the circumstances of the case our clients have endeavoured to be lenient with you. We have been instructed also to advise that any repetition of your infringement will necessarily be followed by appropriate action to protect our clients' property rights. We might say that our clients have the right to require surrender of infringing sets for destruction. It will, therefore, be obvious to you that our clients have acted in a most lenient manner.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) McCrossan Campbell & Meredith,

Per K.M.B.

This letter informed the importer that the holding company had been very lenient. In view of the fact that the radio was to be used for his own personal use, they stated they would refrain from further action. They told this gentleman that had they chosen to do so they could have demanded the radio from him and destroyed it.

This is a serious condition to have existing in this country. The twelve manufacturers of radios in Canada have turned over the patents which they own to a holding company, which in turn issues licences to manufacture radios. The owners of the patents are really leasing the patents to themselves through the holding company. What is the result? The result is that the manufacturers combined can charge what they want to charge for radios. They can reduce the output of certain lines or increase the price on others. But the public has to pay for all this.

I induced a radio builder to give me certain particulars of the cost of radios. This man is not an amateur, he builds perhaps larger radio sets than anyone else in Canada for commercial purposes. He is thoroughly familiar with the industry and knows the cost of the different parts which go into a set. He told me that a six-tube radio which costs $99.50 in Canada was being sold at a price sixty-seven per cent higher than in the United States. A 15-tube radio which was selling in Canada for $310 was selling just thirty-four per cent higher than it was in the United States. A 16-tube radio which was made by the largest company in Canada and which sells for $339 was selling only nineteen per cent higher than in the United States. The assumption was that modesty prevented them from tacking on the duty and the ten per cent royalty, or damages, as they call it.

Apart from all this the fact remains that this corporation has a strangle-hold on the people of Canada. Things have reached a stage where a Canadian citizen cannot bring a radio into the country, cannot have one in his possession or cannot use one without the permission of this corporation. When such a situation exists I submit it is pretty fair evidence that we are being absolutely dominated and controlled by a syndicate to an extent far beyond the conception of the general public.

I should like to cite one case in British Columbia. A dealer brought in thirty radios which were particularly adapted to the needs of his district. After he had sold these he was pounced upon by the Canadian Radio Patents Limited for damages to the extent of $2,500. This man had paid the duty on the radios and the natural supposition was that he was justified in selling them, since the federal government had accepted the duty. To cite another case, a well known firm in Winnipeg brought in a shipment of radios upon which they paid the duty. They were also pounced upon by this Canadian Radio Patents Limited and compelled to sign an undertaking similar to the one I have placed on Hansard. They were compelled to pay ten per cent damages, or royalty, plus legal fees, and they undertook not to bring in any more radios.

It is quite right to encourage Canadian industry, but it is not right to be dominated by a super-monopoly of this kind. It is not necessary for the government to take such a matter as this to the courts. Under the Patent Act, whenever the minister has an intimation that the production of anything is being restricted because of a patent or because the price is unreasonable, he can cancel such patent immediately if it has been in operation three years. The ordinary patent is valid for seventeen years, but what happens? It is well known in connection with these radio patents that the moment one of them expires it is again registered, but with another and more intricate description, so that it passes for a new patent. The government is not responsible for this condition, but it enables those who are inclined to monopolize and to get all the money they can to take advantage of an opportunity afforded them by the Patent Act. It is the business of the government to stop it; for the bill is being paid by all the people of Canada. The sales production alone for the last twelve months of radios in Canada, without counting retailers' profits, was $23,000,000. It has been reliably estimated that the retail sales price will increase that amount to $38,000,000. To the cost of these radios they have added the duty and other things, including no doubt the ten per cent, and these charges are coming out of the pockets of the wage earner and everybody else in Canada who purchases a radio.

Another super-monopoly to which I want to call attention is under the Copyright Act. I commend the government for having appointed the appeal board, which has done pretty fair work; it would be willing, I am sure, to go further if it could. Remember that the government is interested in this business, for the reason that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation pays to the Performing Right Society $32,000 this year for the privilege of putting music on the air. To show that this super-monopoly is not so conscientious about its charges, that at least they are very elastic, I may mention that its charges to the broadcasting stations of Canada for 1938 were $145,000, but the appeal board reduced the amount to $83,000, so it is evident that the board must have been satisfied that the Performing Right Society was not too particular about what it charged.

However, the point I wish to make is that the broadcasting stations pay for this music, and that the $83,000 which they will pay this year covers only radios for domestic service, radio sets in homes; it does not cover radios in hotels, in restaurants, in skating rinks, in stores, in cabarets or even in boarding houses. They all have to pay a minimum of five dollars, and they are required to make periodical reports, upon which increased charges are based. I am sure that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) will be pestered with protests against the increased charge of fifty cents, but apart from that, let me ask what use is a radio if these small users cannot get the music without paying an additional fee to the Performing Right Society. They have purchased their radios; they have paid to the dominion government the fee of two dollars or two and a half dollars, as the case may be, for the coming year; and then this Performing Right Society pounces upon them for an additional amount. I ask in all fairness every hon. member who has in his constituency—and they all have—a band, an orchestra, an hotel, a boarding house, or any kind of institution or public place in which music is performed, to give consideration to the unfairness of this levy of tribute by this additional super-monopoly.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government will give some consideration to what I have suggested for the benefit of the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. ELIE O. BERTRAND (Prescott) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I add my own congratulations to those that have already been tendered to the hon. members who proposed and seconded the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne. We are most happy to welcome in our midst the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Francœur) and the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Warren). The experience these two members have acquired as representatives of constituencies in their respective legislatures and their knowledge of their province will be a great help to us in the consideration of the matters of national interest which come before us.

This being the first session of this house since the coronation of our new sovereigns, I wish to assure Their Gracious Majesties King George the Sixth and Queen Elizabeth of the loyalty of the French-Canadian minority of the province of Ontario. We trust that their reign will be a long one and that it will be a reign of justice and peace for every one of the citizens of the empire.

May I also pay a passing tribute to the fellow-members who have died since last session. Three of them belonged to the Liberal party, two to the Conservative party and one to the Social Credit group. To the bereaved families I offer my sincere sympathies. I should like to make special mention of Sir George Perley. Although situated in the province of Quebec, his constituency was separated from mine only by the Ottawa river. The late member for Argenteuil gave twenty-five years of unselfish service not only to his constituency but to the whole country. He enjoyed an enviable reputation in this house and in the whole empire. His constituents, whom he served for so long a period, held him in high regard and were deeply affected by his death. May I offer my sympathies to Lady Perley and to the people of Argenteuil county.

I do not intend to take up all the points raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling), but I should like to refer to that part of his speech where he states that the taxpayer does not realize how much he is paying until he becomes overburdened with taxes. I am greatly surprised to hear such a statement made by the hon. member for Kootenay West, for was it not the administration which he supported from 1930 to 1935 that added during that short period nearly one billion dollars to the national debt? I say that the taxpayers are now conscious of the enormous sums taken from them in federal taxation. Indeed, one reason why the Liberal party obtains such easy victories at every by-election is that to-day the people realize that the Conservative administration of 1930 to 1935 was a nefarious administration. They are therefore glad to return to the policy of the Liberal party which better understands the needs of the taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, I read with great pride in the speech from the throne of something which we have noticed ourselves in the past two years or more: the business improvement and the return of this country to prosperity. Any one of us can see in his own neighbourhood that business is better, that the people are recovering from the distressful state they have been in for some years past. Prices of farm products have increased; our trade expansion has assuredly stimulated lines of activity; the farmer's position is certainly better than it was a few years ago, although he is still confronted with an extraordinarily difficult problem to which I shall refer presently. In spite of the return to prosperity, I must say that the problems of the farmer and the workman are still most serious. I listened with pleasure to the plea made a few days ago by the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Deachman) on behalf of the farmers. The hon. member described the economic situation of the farmers of his district. I had intended to speak at length on that subject, but after what he and other speakers said about it during this debate, I shall only say that, according to the census of 1931, the average Ontario farmer owns a farm of about 120 acres worth about $7,000. This average farm yielded in 1930 products valued at $1,585 gross, that is without deducting operating and living expenses. This represents the value of farm products available for the markets or for the farmer's own consumption. In 1932, that production value had fallen to $964, which means a decrease of $621 in two years.

In 1936, when took place the return to prosperity to which I referred a moment ago, the value of our agricultural production stood at $1,335, which was still a decrease from 1930, but a substantial increase of $370 as compared with the low level of 1932. Even with that increase the farmer remains in the red and the problem still calls for our serious consideration.

If we take the costs of farm production and submit them to the same analysis as that of farm income, we find that operating expenses, including interest on mortgages or on capital investment, amount to $973 a year. A survey of the 1931 census figures, as revised up to 1936, shows that the Ontario farmer is earning less than a dollar a day, both for himself and his family, and that his working hours are exceedingly long. His working hours are not controlled by any provincial or federal regulation. He must toil from sunrise to dusk, and in many cases, has to go on working late in the evening until forced to quit by darkness.

If we concede that agriculture is our chief industry, we must also admit that the farmer's services are the most underpaid. Such conditions exist throughout the country. Agriculture is therefore in a most deplorable state, as I have just shown and as statistics prove beyond possibility of contradiction. I should certainly not attempt to hold the government responsible for it. The present government has already done a great deal towards bettering agricultural conditions, but in order to have a united Canada, equal treatment must be dealt to every class of the population, and all should be afforded the opportunity of obtaining an adequate reward for their work and efforts so that they may secure a more or less equal share of the benefits accruing from our national wealth.

I could not stress the point any better than the hon. member for Huron North did, last Tuesday, and I would like to join him, as well as other hon. members of this house and the members of the provincial legislatures, in their endeavours to get that agricultural problem solved by the government, so that our farmers may have a larger share of the prosperity which now obtains in Canada.

Now just a brief reference to the unemployment problem. The commission appointed by the government, the so-called Purvis commission, certainly achieved an excellent task in gathering important statistics throughout the country to show the scope of the problem, to what extent each class of unemployed is being affected at the present time, and the obstacles, heretofore unknown, that we shall have to face in dealing with that problem. Nevertheless, as it is stated in the speech from the throne, there are many of our people still unemployed, and that will have to be considered by the government for some time to come.

With regard to the constituency that I have the honour to represent and more particularly the city of Hawkesbury where 50 per cent of the people are affected by unemployment—people who would be glad to work and to support their families—I would ask that they be afforded some relief by way of employment, so that instead of depending on public support they may earn their own and their family's living, and be once more in a position to live through their labour rather than be on relief.

I was interested in reading the following paragraph in the speech from the throne:

> In view of the success which has attended efforts to assist in the training of unemployed young people, it is proposed to extend the scheme during the coming year.

What has been done for the training of our young unemployed by way of vocational courses and technical schools with a view to fitting them for the future, ought to be appreciated by all our people. We are certainly happy to hear that the government will continue to assist, again this year, in the training of our unemployed young people. Whatever we may do for our youth will be that much that we shall leave them. It is absolutely necessary further to assist these training schools and prepare our young people for future years. Of course that will cost some money, and I hope that during this session means will be taken to ensure the continuance of this technical training by voting the necessary appropriations for the expansion of such useful work. Then we shall be able to place them in their proper sphere where they will be in a position to provide for their future and assist in the development of this country.

It is not a question of dealing with the immediate unemployment problem, but with the problems of the future generation who, before long, may enjoy the benefits of such training, for they will have the means to cope with their own requirements and take care of those who wish to establish a home.

You may have read also with some uneasiness the following words in the speech from the throne:

> The international situation generally continues to give much ground for anxiety. My ministers have endeavoured, as opportunity has afforded, to promote international understanding and good-will. They have sought to join the efforts of Canada to those of other countries which are seeking by cooperation and conciliation to effect a settlement of questions and issues which concern the world's peace.

I am certainly happy to say that the Canadian people have some reason to be less anxious. The message of peace brought last summer by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and by the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to the empire and to the countries of Europe certainly honoured us and evidenced the interest taken by Canada in the question of world peace. We are grateful to them, and the whole population of Canada agrees with them that peace must prevail as far as this country is concerned, even should other parts of the empire at any time become entangled in European or world wars.

May I state, as it has already been mentioned by several hon. members who preceded me in this debate, that one way to remain on friendly terms with other nations of the world is to try and extend our trade relations with them. That is not the only way, but it is one which will benefit our population.

The hon. Minister of Commerce (Mr. Euler) and the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) have already submitted statistics; however, I should like to submit more figures in order to establish a comparison between our imports and exports for the twelve months ended November 30, 1935, and the twelve months ended November 30, 1937. Those figures show that our trade with the United Kingdom has increased by 33 per cent; with Australia, by 45 per cent; with South Africa, by 42 per cent; with New Zealand, by 121 per cent; and with the British West Indies, by 83 per cent.

Let us now consider the expansion of Canadian trade for the same periods with the other countries of the world. Trade increases were as follows: United States, 64 per cent; Japan, 70 per cent; Belgium, 98 per cent; Germany, 89 per cent; France, 8 per cent; Argentine, 104 per cent; Netherlands, 33 per cent; China, 16 per cent; Italy, 20 per cent; Brazil, 25 per cent; Norway, 31 per cent; Cuba, 60 per cent; Dutch Indies, 43 per cent; Poland, 93 per cent. I could go on indefinitely giving similar figures for many other countries.

An outstanding fact is that in its policy of trade expansion the government fostered particularly the development of our primary industries rather than that of our secondary industries. As a result, we find that for the twelve months ending with August, 1937, our grain exports increased by 42 per cent as compared with the twelve months ending with August, 1935. Other increases in our exports for the same period were as follows:

cattle, 105 per cent; cheese, 111 per cent; fish products, I am sorry to say, the increase was only 16 per cent; cured meats, 71 per cent. Our lumber and paper exports increased by 71 per cent and 43 per cent respectively. The export figures for nearly all products of our primary industries show somewhat similar increases.

These increased exports have certainly contributed to the development of our primary industries, which are entitled to our greatest consideration because they give employment to the largest number of people. They are the foundation of our prosperity and will continue to contribute in the greatest measure to the expansion of our trade.

In developing our trade, not only are we fostering more friendly relations with foreign countries, but we are also providing employment for Canadian workingmen, and helping in the solution of the unemployment problem and in the rehabilitation of the farming community. While there is absolutely no question about that, it is nevertheless true that the problems I have already referred to are still before us, owing to the conditions which confront the farmers and the workers in several parts of our country.

We have no Canadian merchant marine for carrying our goods; consequently, in order to ship them to foreign countries we must use the merchant ships of Great Britain or of those other countries which are willing to trade with us. A thorough analysis of the figures I have quoted will show that, with the exception of the United States of America, the increase in our trade has been largely with overseas countries, or with countries quite remote from Canada. Consequently, we must necessarily ship those goods from our harbours to the farthest corners of the world. Many of those countries have not the same mentality as we have; each one of them is keeping close watch on the others with a view to its own protection. Such countries have raised walls for the defence of their territory, their people and their trade, and to ensure such protection these walls are watched by soldiers equipped with guns and other weapons. When such countries are making agreements for the purpose of increasing their trade with us, their viewpoint is not the same as ours. We are living near the United States, quite a peaceful country which is not trying to extend its territory, and which has no reason to fear our enmity. When those countries wish to trade with us, they are also desirous of being afforded, in our harbours, such protection as may enable them to enter them safely. That is why I say that we need a national defence not only to protect our people, to preserve order, peace and good government in our country, but also to protect our trade. If a certain sum is to be appropriated for the improvement of our national defence, it will be used, among other things, for motorizing our transportation facilities so that they may be available in all parts of the country. If we spent money last year and if we spend some more this year on our coast defences, it is not because we expect the attacks of any enemy, not because we fear to become involved in war, but in order to show to the whole world that we are in earnest, that we are willing to trade with all nations, and are ready to give them the assurance that our harbours will be protected, that their ships may safely enter them and unload their goods in exchange for ours. It is not a national defence in terms of military operations, but a defence for the purpose of enabling us to increase our trade; it is not a defence for purposes of war and conquest but solely to protect our people and secure our own prosperity in this Canada of ours.

I should now like to say just a few words about our constitution. In the speech from the throne there is one paragraph which reads as follows:

> The cooperation of the provinces has been sought with a view to an amendment of the British North America Act, which would empower the parliament of Canada to enact forthwith a national scheme of unemployment insurance. My ministers hope the proposal may meet with early approval, in order that unemployment insurance legislation may be enacted during the present session of parliament.

The speech from the throne, as every one may ascertain, clearly states that the government has endeavoured to secure the cooperation of the provinces with a view to amending the British North America Act so as to empower parliament to enact forthwith a national scheme of unemployment insurance. That necessarily means that if the British North America Act is to be amended, the amendments must be concurred in by the interested parties. At the present time, we notice in the press of our country comments of a most diversified character. In a certain part of the country, comments just as varied are made about what could be done in the way of an amendment to our country's constitution. Such amendment gives rise to comments that are quite conflicting. Unemployment insurance is a problem which deserves the attention of the government, and the latter should consider not only present but also future needs. In order to afford Canada the best possible protection against unemployment, there is nothing better than unemployment insurance, just as life insurance affords protection for the dependents of policyholders, and just as fire insurance protects against fire losses. That is an important problem which claims the attention of the government.

The cost of unemployment relief is now borne by the municipalities, the provinces and the federal government. Should the latter accept the unemployment problem as its own, I think that no province would refuse to leave it entirely in its hands or to admit that it should be the object of federal legislation. Provided the federal government takes over the entire unemployment problem, I submit that there would be no objection to a national unemployment insurance scheme—but that would be an essential consideration. Otherwise, the constitution of our country must not be amended without the consent of all the contracting parties, and without the proposed amendments being approved by all of them.

The present government, under the direction of the right honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King, has certainly not shown any dictatorial attitude in the past; they have always been willing, under all circumstances, to give due consideration to local and national problems, and I say frankly that in the present instance also we have no fear. We know that every one of the problems of the day will be considered and solved by this parliament with proper regard to all classes of citizens.

For all those reasons I intend to vote against the amendment of the leader of the opposition and to support the present government so that it may continue to solve the problems of our country and to give the people the administration they want in this period of difficulties.

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Wood Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I associate myself with others who have preceded me in this debate in congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. These gentlemen have performed their allotted task with credit to themselves and their constituencies, and they should be a valuable addition to the debating ability of this house.

One of the first paragraphs that attracts my attention in the speech from the throne is that which refers to the recovery which has taken place in the Dominion of Canada. It reads as follows:

> It is gratifying to note that, during the past year, there has been a further substantial advance in Canada's economic recovery. Revenues have reached new levels. Trade with other countries has materially expanded. There has been a general increase in employment and a marked decrease in the numbers receiving unemployment aid.

I have verified this statement not only by looking over statistics but from my experience since coming east. I have talked to members from different parts of the dominion, and each has told me that conditions in his district are better than they had been for many years. Conditions are and have been improving, practically speaking, all over the dominion, with the exception of the district which I have had the honour to represent during the last few years. For nine years in that district I have referred in this house from time to time to the condition that has prevailed—we have been suffering from a terrible drought, which last year reduced crop prospects to nothing at all. I contend, as other members from that district contend, that nothing whatever is wrong with the district from which I come except that we need rain; we lack the moisture necessary to produce a crop.

Some time ago, looking over the Regina Leader, I noticed an article written by Grant Dexter from the Leader-Post London bureau. In that article Mr. Dexter refers to a man named A. G. Street, who has been giving lectures and speaking over the radio in England. I should like to read one paragraph from the article written by Mr. Dexter:

> Street, in his articles and over the radio, painted conditions on the prairie in sombre colours. He mentioned the lack of rainfall but attributed prevailing conditions chiefly to selfish, short sighted husbandry. He indicated that the west's troubles were largely of its own making. Prairie farmers were condemned because it was suggested that they have mined the land, taking the good from the soil and putting nothing back into it.

No article could be more misleading. The farmers in western Canada are as good as the farmers in any other part of the world. In western Canada we have farmers just as industrious, just as hard working and just as intelligent as the farmers in the east, in any other part of the British Empire or in the United States. For a man to sit in his office in England and write a speech such as that, without ever seeing the conditions or knowing anything about them, is misleading and most unfair.

Mr. McINTOSH: He ought to be chloroformed.

Mr. DONNELLY: He is absolutely wrong in making such statements. There is nothing wrong with farming conditions; there is nothing wrong with our prairies or with the people on the prairies. All we need is rain. No government can give us that, and we realize it. It is not the government's fault, but rather an act of Providence. Nothing can help us until Providence smiles upon us again and gives us rain. We believe that time will come.

The farmers in my district have been trying to grow wheat, but they have not had enough rain to grow it. When there is not enough moisture to grow wheat you cannot grow any other kind of grain, because it takes less rain to grow wheat than to grow any other crop. Therefore when we cannot produce a wheat crop we cannot produce any crop.

Let me point out that the drought area is not confined to Canada. It is roughly oval in shape, comprising about eight states and portions of nine other states of the American union. The southern part of the oval reaches Mexico, and the northern part of it extends into western Canada, taking in a large portion of Saskatchewan and parts of Manitoba and Alberta.

In the past year the drought area has been somewhat reduced. There has been some restriction along the edges, and the result is that in the past year we found practically no drought in Manitoba. But the central part of the drought area, found in Saskatchewan, is more affected than it has ever been. Conditions have been so extreme that there have been no crops at all. In other years there had been a little crop, here and there, but in the past season there was practically no crop in Saskatchewan.

Then, there has been a restriction in the affected areas in the United States. There has been some change along the edges and we believe the drought area is being brought back to a state of cultivation. The moisture which has fallen during the past winter and autumn leads us to believe that during the coming year there will be a still greater reduction in the area, and that eventually we will reach a condition where we will have rains and crops.

The area from which I come was opened up in 1908 and 1909. Ninety per cent of the settlers in the district came in without any worldly goods. They farmed there from those years until about 1929, and during that twenty-year period they had pretty fair crops. In 1929, fifty per cent of those people had assets valued all the way from $10,000 up to as high as $100,000 and $150,000. The men who homesteaded in those early days have now reached ages of forty-five, fifty-five or sixty-five years. It is quite impossible to expect them to leave the good homes they have built, to leave the outbuildings on their properties or to leave the land, which lacks nothing but moisture. We must not expect them to go out into the bush to carve out new homes for themselves. They simply cannot be persuaded to go. And in view of the good crops they had during a twenty year period, they cannot believe that Providence will not smile upon them again. They still have faith in the country, and so have I.

I believe we will have crops in there again. But in all fairness, I must say to the government, that while I believe it is justified in helping the old settlers to remain on their land, it is not justified in helping young men to settle there. They must differentiate between the young men who want to start farming in the district and the old settlers who have been in there for some years. Young men should be discouraged from settling in that area, and should be encouraged to begin farming in other districts where conditions and prospects are better.

I should like at this point to refer to what has been done for the people in that section of the country, but as the time before adjournment is getting short I should appreciate it if you would permit me, Mr. Speaker, to adjourn the debate.

On motion of Mr. Donnelly the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 5.46 p.m.

[Mr. Donnelly.]

Thursday, February 10, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. LAWSON

POWERS OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION RESPECTING OPERATION AND CONTROL OF STATIONS

Hon. J. E. LAWSON (York South): I rise to a question of privilege. Speaking in the house on Tuesday on the amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, with regard to the powers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, I made a statement which, in an interruption by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe), was alleged to be erroneous; and subsequently, at the end of my speech, the minister said that my statement was wrong and that I should admit it.

I claim the privilege of quoting to the house the authority upon which I base my statement; that authority is the Canadian Broadcasting Act. If you will refer to page 263 of Hansard, Mr. Speaker, you will find that I used these words:

May I say to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) that I understood the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation not only operates stations but controls all stations in Canada.

The minister said:

The hon. member is entirely wrong.

I tried in a hurry to locate the provisions in the act but was unable to do so, and the Minister of Transport, immediately upon the conclusion of my address, as shown at page 266, said:

What the hon. member stated is not the fact; why not say so?

I quote from the Canadian Broadcasting Act, being chapter 24 of the statutes of Canada for the year 1936, section 22:

The corporation may make regulations:
(b) to prescribe the periods to be reserved periodically by any private station for the broadcasting of programs of the corporation.

This was a program of the corporation that was in question.

(c) to control the character of any and all programs broadcast by corporation or private stations.

I say, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that my statement was correct. It was correct also on a further ground; the broadcast in question was a chain broadcast. A private station cannot obtain wires for the conduct of a chain broadcast without application to the commission under section 22, subsection 1(a), and therefore the commission has control of the private stations.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT, TOGETHER WITH PUBLIC ACCOUNTS, TO PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the Auditor General's report for the year ended March 31, 1937, and the public accounts for the year ended March 31, 1937, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVY COUNCIL APPEALS

PROPOSED ABOLITION OF APPEALS TO HIS MAJESTY IN COUNCIL

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 19, respecting appeals to the judicial committee of the privy council.

He said: In moving for leave to introduce this bill, which is entitled An Act Respecting Appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, I would ask the privilege of making a few explanatory remarks, not by way of argument but for the purpose of enabling lay members of the house to appreciate more clearly the development of the constitutional law with respect to prerogative appeals to his majesty in council and with respect to the appeal under the statutory provision of a later act to the judicial committee of the privy council.

A statute of the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, which was enacted in 1833 and is best known by its short title, The Judicial Committee Act, 1833, recites the fact that "from the decisions of various courts of judicature in the East Indies and in the plantations, colonies and other dominions of his majesty abroad, an appeal lies to his majesty in council," and proceeds by its provisions to regulate the proceedings in such an appeal. But under the Judicial Committee Act, 1833, it was never claimed that as a matter of royal prerogative the king and his privy council had jurisdiction to review the judgments of a colonial court, other than from the final appellate court in the colony, which, in the British American provinces, was the governor and his executive council.

The first royal commission appointing a governor of a province in that part of British North America now known as the Dominion of Canada was the commission issued in 1749 to Edward Cornwallis as governor of the newly-created province of Nova Scotia. Upon his arrival at Halifax Cornwallis appointed his council and established three courts for the province; a court of general sessions, similar to courts of sessions in England, a county court of five justices of the peace having jurisdiction over the entire province, and a general court consisting of the governor and members of his council, having a supreme appellate jurisdiction in the province. This supreme court of the governor in council exercised both political and judicial functions. The right of appeal to the governor in council was omitted from the royal instructions to the governors of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island in 1861.

In 1754 Jonathan Belcher was appointed chief justice of the province of Nova Scotia, and chief justice of the supreme court of judicature, which was then constituted. This court thereafter exercised the appellate jurisdiction that formerly appertained to the governor in council.

The royal proclamation of October 7, 1763, established a judicial system in Quebec, consisting of civil and criminal courts, with a right of appeal in civil cases to the king in council. The Quebec Act, 1774, repealed all existing ordinances relating to the administration of justice, but the instructions to Governor Carleton in 1775 authorized the constitution of criminal and civil courts, with an appeal in civil matters to the governor in council in certain cases.

The Constitutional Act of 1791 provided for the division of the old province of Quebec into two new provinces to be called Upper and Lower Canada, and provided that all existing laws, statutes and ordinances should remain in force until altered by the legislatures of the new provinces. The respective legislatures of the two new provinces each enacted statutes making provision for appeals to the governor in council, with a further provision for appeals to the king in council. Lower Canada legislated by 34 George III, chapter 6, section 23. Upper Canada legislated by 34 George III, chapter 2, section 33, which reads as follows:

> And be it enacted that the governor, lieutenant governor, or person administering the government of this province, or the chief justice of the province, together with any two or more members of the executive council of the province, shall compose a court of appeal for hearing and determining all appeals from such judgments or sentences as may lawfully be brought before them.

One of the grievances most bitterly complained of in the province of Lower Canada was this constitution of the governor in council as a court of error and appeal, inasmuch as the governor in council exercised, in practice, political rather than judicial functions.

In 1841 the appeal In re Samuel Cambridge from Prince Edward Island was heard before the privy council. By the royal instructions to the governor of that island, then in force, he was directed to allow appeals to himself in council where the value appealed from amounted to £300 sterling and to the king in council where the value appealed from amounted to £500. Cambridge, to avoid a multiplicity of suits against himself, petitioned her majesty in council for leave to appeal from a judgment of the supreme court of the island to the amount of £135 which under the instructions to the governor was not appealable either to the governor in council or to her majesty in council. The judicial committee, Lord Brougham, a former lord chancellor, presiding, held that there being an intermediate court of appeal in the island, namely the governor in council, no appeal could be received by the privy council directly from the supreme court of the island. Appeals from the supreme court of the island under the instructions should be made to the governor in council of the island. The reference is Moore's Privy Council Cases, volume III, page 175. This case was decided in 1841, and thereafter Lord Brougham introduced to parliament the bill which was enacted as the Judicial Committee Act, 1844, to overcome the difficulty which had arisen, by allowing in future appeals to the privy council from other courts in the colonies although they were not courts of error or courts of appeal.

When this statute was enacted in 1844 the royal instructions to every British governor, without exception, constituted him and his executive council a court of appeal exercising judicial functions as a court of error and appeal, and made further provision for an appeal from the governor in council to the king in his privy council. The Judicial Committee Act of 1844 recites that:

> —the judicial committee, acting under the authority of the said acts—

The act of 1833 and an amending act.

> —hath been found to answer well the purposes for which it was so established by parliament, but it is found necessary to improve its proceedings in some respects for the better despatch of business and expedient also to extend its jurisdiction and powers.

The first section of the act of 1844 enacts that it shall be competent to her majesty by general or special order in council to—> —provide for the admission of any appeal or appeals to Her Majesty in council from any judgments, sentences, decrees or orders of any court of justice within any British colony or possession abroad.

The jurisdiction of the king in council to review judgments of colonial courts, other than the final court of appeal where such court existed in the colonies, was never claimed as a matter of royal prerogative prior to the enactment of The Judicial Committee Act, 1844, which converted the pre-existing prerogative right into a statutory right.

The conditions which Lord Brougham desired and intended to remove are shown by the preamble to The Judicial Committee Act, 1844 which recites:

> Whereas by the laws now in force in certain of Her Majesty's colonies and possessions abroad no appeals can be brought to Her Majesty in council for the reversal of the judgments, sentences, decrees and orders of any courts of justice within such colonies save only of the courts of error or courts of appeal within the same, and it is expedient that Her Majesty in council should be authorized to provide for the admission of appeals from other courts of justice within such colonies or possessions—

Then it proceeds with the enactment of section 1:

> 1. It shall be competent to her majesty, by any order or orders to be from time to time for that purpose made with the advice of her privy council, to provide for the admission of any appeal or appeals to her majesty in council from the judgments, sentences, decrees or orders of any court of justice within any British colony or possession abroad, although such court shall not be a court of error or a court of appeal within such colony or possession; and it shall also be competent to her majesty, by any such order or orders as aforesaid to make all such provisions as to her majesty in council shall seem meet for the instituting and prosecuting of any such appeals, and for carrying into effect any such decisions or sentences as her majesty in council shall pronounce thereon.

This statute of 1844, says the late Mr. E. R. Cameron in his valued work on The Canadian Constitution, never contemplated interfering with the power to regulate appeals from the courts of appeal in the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, given them by the Constitutional Act of 1791. This undoubtedly was the view of the imperial authorities in passing the earlier orders in council which provided for the institution and prosecution of appeals in the Canadian provinces which had no courts of error and appeal other than the governor in council, and which orders are clearly supplementary to the provisions of The Judicial Committee Act, 1844.

The preamble to the orders in council, providing for appeals from New Brunswick in 1852 and Nova Scotia in 1863, recites the language of The Judicial Committee Act, 1844, and proceeds:

And whereas it is expedient that provision should be made in pursuance of the said cited enactments to enable parties to appeal in civil causes from the decision of the supreme court of the province to His Majesty in council, the same not being a court of error and appeal.

When these orders in council of 1852 and 1863 were passed by his majesty in council, each of the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia was "a British colony or possession" within the meaning and intent of The Judicial Committee Act, 1844; but it may be doubted, I think, whether a province of the Dominion of Canada may now be properly so described. It is clear that in respect of any future enactment of the parliament of the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland it may not be so described, because section 11 of the Statute of Westminster, 1931, provides:

Notwithstanding anything in The Interpretation Act, 1889, the expression "colony" shall not, in any act of the parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the commencement of this act, include a dominion or any province or state forming part of a dominion.

In 1849, by 12 Victoria, chapter 37, in Lower Canada, and by 12 Victoria, chapter 63, in Upper Canada, the governor in council as a court of error and appeal was abolished, but provision was made for appeals to the king in his privy council. Subsequently the thirty-fourth resolution adopted at the Quebec conference in October, 1864, provided that the general parliament should have power to make laws for—

The establishment of a general court of appeal for the federated provinces.

Section 101 of The British North America Act, 1867, subsequently enacted:

101. The parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this act, from time to time provide for the constitution, maintenance and organization of a general court of appeal for Canada, and for the establishment of any additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada.

During the parliamentary session of 1875, which was during the period when this country was administered by the government of Mr. Mackenzie, a bill was introduced by Mr. Fournier, then minister of justice in the Liberal administration of that day, to establish the Supreme Court of Canada. The political records of that time disclose that Edward Blake had a large part in drafting the bill, and that the bill, as originally drawn, contained a clause providing that judgments of the supreme court should be final, thus precluding appeals to the privy council, but that the government of the United Kingdom then intimated to the government of Canada that the proposed act would not receive the assent of the crown unless that section of the bill was amended so as to preserve the prerogative right of appeal. Professor Kennedy, of the university of Toronto, in his work, The Constitution of Canada, at page 341, relates:

When the parliament of Canada in 1875 proceeded to constitute a supreme court for Canada, the bill, as introduced, provided for the cessation of all appeals to the privy council, but the colonial office at London notified the Liberal government of that day that unless this provision was eliminated the whole bill would be disallowed by the government at Westminster.

In May's Constitutional History (1912), volume III, he says that when in 1875 the Liberal government of Canada proposed to abolish appeals to the privy council, the judicial committee prepared a memorandum in which they said:

To abolish this controlling power and abandon each colony and dependency to a separate court of appeal of its own would obviously be to destroy one of the most important ties connecting all parts of the empire in common obedience to the courts of law, and to renounce the last and most essential mode of exercising the authority of the crown over its possessions abroad.

It is to be noted that Canada was then regarded as a colony, dependency or possession of the crown, over which the government of the United Kingdom should not renounce the last and most essential mode of exercising authority in the name of and as advisers of his majesty.

The forty-seventh section of the Supreme Court Act of 1875 as then enacted, reads as follows:

> 47. The judgment of the supreme court shall in all cases be final and conclusive, and no appeal shall be brought from any judgment or order of the supreme court to any court of appeal established by the parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, by which appeals or petitions to her majesty in council may be ordered to be heard; saving any right which her majesty may be graciously pleased to exercise by virtue of her royal prerogative.

That section now appears as section 54 of the Supreme Court Act, chapter 35 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927.

The parliament of Canada in 1888, by chapter 43 of the statutes of 1888, subsequently enacted amendments to the criminal code, which provided that in criminal cases the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada should in all cases be final and conclusive, and that no appeal shall be brought in any criminal case to his majesty in council. That remained the law in Canada for thirty-eight years, until, in 1926, in the Nadan case, the privy council held that this enactment of the parliament of Canada was inconsistent with the provisions of the Judicial Committee Acts, 1833 and 1844, and therefore invalid under section 2 of the Colonial Laws Validity Act of 1865, which enacts that:

> Any colonial law which is or shall be in any way repugnant to any provisions of any act of parliament extending to the colony to which such law may relate . . . shall to the extent of such repugnancy, but not otherwise, be and remain absolutely void and inoperative.

In the Nadan case it was declared that that enactment in the criminal law of Canada, which presumably had been in force for some thirty-eight years, was invalid and void, by reason of repugnancy to the Colonial Laws Validity Act.

Section 2 of the Statute of Westminster, 1931, has more recently declared that:

> The Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, shall not apply to any law made after the commencement of this act by the parliament of a dominion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but on the introduction of bills statements should be made succinctly and briefly.

Mr. CAHAN: I have only one more citation to make, and I shall have finished. I had no intention of being argumentative, but having these notations in my notebook I thought that by placing them on Hansard I might save hon. members some time.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think so, too.

Mr. CAHAN: I thought that if they had the exact references it might be helpful.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think the observations of the hon. member will be very useful to hon. members who would like to speak on the second reading.

Mr. CAHAN: In 1931, in chapter 28, section 15, the parliament of Canada reenacted the same section of the criminal code abolishing appeals to the privy council in criminal cases; and the privy council in 1935, in the British Coal Corporation case, held that the enactment is now valid.

Nevertheless The Judicial Committee Acts of 1833 and 1844 still apply to appeals to his majesty in council in civil cases; and the purpose of this bill is to repeal the said acts and all orders, rules and regulations made thereunder in so far as they are a part of the law of the Dominion of Canada.

Before second reading of the bill, which will not take place for several days, hon. members will have ample opportunity to study its terms and consider their effect. At that time I shall endeavour to present such arguments as I may in favour of the enactment of the bill.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I am pleased to hear the hon. member say that he does not propose to move second reading before several days have passed. I would ask him, if possible, to give us some private notice of his intentions to move second reading.

Mr. CAHAN: I shall be very glad to consult with the Minister of Justice and to arrange for such day as may be convenient to him.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Thank you.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS—PUBLICATION OF NAMES OF OWNERS, STOCKHOLDERS, ETC.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 20, to amend the Post Office Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. MacNICOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I rise to a question of privilege—I suppose I can call it that. In reply to a question I asked yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said: "My hon. friend is an older man than I am" and, I have the recollection that he said "has been longer in this house than I have been." I am happy to say that I am several years younger than the Prime Minister is, but I am very sorry to say that I have drawn twelve or thirteen fewer sessional indemnities than he has.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I must congratulate my hon. friend; I am only sorry he does not look younger.

Mr. MacNICOL: I might say, Mr. Speaker, that I don't dye my hair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I haven't enough hair to dye.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. GARDINER

FREIGHT ASSISTANCE ON LIVE STOCK SHIPPED TO FEEDING GROUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I wish to call the attention of the house, on a question of privilege, to a reference made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) to the Saskatchewan government. The reference is to be found at page 290 of Hansard.

I wired the provincial Minister of Agriculture, the Hon. J. G. Taggart, quoting the reference to freight paid on live stock from the town of Wolseley to the province of Manitoba. In reply I received the following wire this morning:

Hon. J. G. Gardiner,
Ottawa, Ontario.

In September we provided freight assistance on two cars sheep and one car cattle for Albert Schuster, Wolseley to Kemnay and in October one car horses and two cars cattle for David Laidlaw, and in November one mixed car containing horses and cattle for Wilfred Laidlaw, Wolseley to Gladstone. Understand Laidlaws have Perley property under lease, but do not know financial standing or recent earnings or cash revenue.

I wired Mr. Taggart this morning as follows:

Hon. J. G. Taggart,
Minister of Agriculture,
Regina, Saskatchewan.

In referring to Laidlaw Perley states, "he was refused assistance from the municipality. He was refused by the local inspector but he went to Regina and got it." My understanding is no one can get assistance of any kind without being passed by the municipality. Where there is doubt if your inspector cannot convince municipal representatives the man is refused assistance. Kindly wire me additional information at once if possible.

James G. Gardiner.

I received this wire from Mr. Taggart:

Hon. J. G. Gardiner,
Minister of Agriculture,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Both Laidlaw applications investigated and recommended by municipal secretary and our district representative. Schuster came to Regina to complete freight arrangements after his application had been approved by municipality. Laidlaw until recently tenant of Perley but declines to continue. Municipality advanced seed and supplies to value of four hundred eighty-two dollars fifty-four cents in 1937, being about half amount desired by tenant and landlord. Termination of tenancy by Laidlaw may partly explain criticism. Understand tenancy has been unprofitable throughout to Laidlaw which reduced him to circumstances necessitating aid in shipment of live stock out.

J. G. Taggart.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, it must be apparent to your honour that the observations which have just been made are wholly out of order, and directly contrary to the rules of this house. We are having introduced into a debate a statement made by one not a member of this house and reflecting upon a member of this house, a statement which has been met with cheers from hon. members opposite but which the rules say must not be made. I did not interrupt the minister before because I desired that he should conclude what he had to say. But I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), as the custodian of the proceedings of this house, should make it clear that this procedure is not only contrary to parliamentary practice but is a direct violation of the rules themselves.

Mr. GARDINER: I would direct the attention of the house to the fact that I did not make any statement at all.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point exactly.

Mr. GARDINER: I merely quoted the Minister of Agriculture of the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the very point.

Mr. GARDINER: I quoted a statement which he made with regard to an accusation against himself, made in this house. Since he is administering the expenditure of considerable money provided as a result of a vote of this house, I think it perfectly proper that the statement should be made here.

Mr. BENNETT: The rule is just the contrary to what has been stated by the minister. The minister has said that he made no statement, but by reading a telegram he is attempting to have someone who is not a member of the house make a statement in this house. The rules are very clear upon that point. The idea of the Minister of Agriculture of Saskatchewan speaking in this house through another mouthpiece is contrary to the rules of any deliberative assembly. No one can do that.

Mr. GARDINER: In reply to the right hon. gentleman I would like to point out that just about a year ago he did exactly the same thing. He read to this house a wire which he had received from Mr. John I. McFarland, giving information which he said was—

Mr. BENNETT: That is not an accurate statement, as one would expect. The wire which I read at that time was a distinct denial by Mr. McFarland of a statement which had been attributed to him and which subsequent events proved had not been made by him. That is not what is being done here. The minister has said that he has no statement to make, but that Mr. Taggart is making a statement in this house. That is an entirely different thing. The rules are very clear that one must not use his position in parliament for the purpose of enabling someone not a member of parliament to make a statement in this house. That would seem to be reasonably clear about a controversial matter and a statement to the effect that a certain man was a tenant of a member of this house and that that tenancy brought about his ruin. That is the sense of the statement and it should be stricken from the record.

Mr. GARDINER: In order to put it in order, I shall read the statement made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) which was quoted to Mr. Taggart. The telegram to Mr. Taggart of February 9 reads:

> Following statement made in house by Perley of Wolseley "two of my tenants shipped stock to feeding grounds in Manitoba, one shipped 600 sheep and the other shipped all his stock including horses and cattle. All are wintering there. Another man I know well shipped 100 head to Gladstone, Manitoba, where they are being wintered. This man is well known to the Minister of Agriculture because he was a contractor who from the government which held office prior to 1929 had received many contracts."

That is a direct reference to myself as Minister of Agriculture. He put this all on Hansard for the definite purpose that it might be used later in the province of Saskatchewan. I am within the rules in reading the telegrams as a complete answer to the statement which was made.

Mr. BENNETT: That is out of order.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, one man shipped from southern Saskatchewan long before I ever had anything to do with him or knew anything about him. As far as Laidlaw is concerned, the cancellation of his lease was sent to him by registered mail last July or August and he was no longer a lessee of mine when he moved out. As to Laidlaw's association with me causing his ruin, I may say that right from the very start this association has been most unsatisfactory to me. The result was the lease was cancelled and he was not a tenant of mine when he moved out.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

STATEMENT OF FORMER SECRETARY OF STATE AS TO JURISDICTION IN MATTERS OF SOCIAL REFORM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to explain a reference made on Monday to a speech delivered by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), in November, 1934. As reported in Hansard I stated that the then secretary of state declared in very definite terms that the jurisdiction to deal with unemployment insurance lay properly with the provinces. The speech of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of November 27, contains the following relevant quotations:

> It has been clearly decided that many matters now being discussed in the press and elsewhere relating to hours of labour, wages, price spreads, costs and profits, are exclusively within the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): This is entirely out of order. We may as well conduct the business of the house with regard to the rules. What right has the Minister of Labour to refer to something said by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George as quoted in the Montreal Gazette? This matter might have been a part of his original speech, but it cannot by any possibility be brought up now as a matter of privilege.

Mr. ROGERS: If the leader of the opposition does not wish me to proceed, I am quite content. As a matter of fact, what I was about to say was in correction of a statement which I had made on a previous occasion. I thought this correction should be made in fairness to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. BENNETT: If it is a correction, it is quite within the rules, but the minister did not say it was a correction.

Mr. ROGERS: The second relevant quotation was:

> It is a proper matter for intelligent discussion as to whether the exclusive power of the provinces in matters of social reform should be considerably curtailed and the powers of the dominion correspondingly extended. Meanwhile until the British North America Act is amended by constitutional methods no good purpose can be served by either the dominion parliament or the provincial legislatures attempting illegally to exercise powers now fully vested in the other or others of them.

My hon. friend did not refer specifically to unemployment insurance and he has informed me that he did not have unemployment insurance in mind when he referred to matters of social reform as being within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. I felt that I should make this statement in fairness to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, although he had not asked me to do so.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): The minister could have made his correction very simply by stating that through a lapse of memory he had stated in the house that I had discussed unemployment insurance in Montreal, when, as a matter of fact, so far as I am aware, I have never discussed this matter in any address which I have made outside of this house up to the present time.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. N. Francœur for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Bennett.

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Wood Mountain): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last night I was dealing with conditions in the drought area in western Canada, and I had referred to a series of radio addresses and articles in English newspapers by a Mr. A. G. Street with regard to conditions in western Canada. In these articles and addresses Mr. Street lays the blame for conditions in western Canada upon the methods of our farmers there. He says that we were mining the land, taking everything out and putting nothing back, and that that was the cause of our present conditions. I omitted to say last night, as I intended to say and wish to say now, that if his argument is sound that our conditions are due to our methods of farming, then the older sections of Canada would have no crop and the newer sections would be having crops, because it would be the older sections that would be mined and would run out first. But the very opposite is true. In the older sections of the country, in Manitoba, for example, they are having good crops this year, while in the newer sections, in the southern part of Saskatchewan where I come from, they had no crop. So that our conditions cannot be due to our methods of farming.

I want to deal now with what is being done for the people in the dried-out area, but before entering upon what this government has done, I wish to express my thanks and the thanks of the people of western Canada to all the people in the other sections of this country who, not only last fall but for the past seven or eight years, have been giving to us freely and cheerfully of their vegetables and their fruits and products of different kinds in order to help carry our people over the period of depression and crop failures. Our people in western Canada deeply appreciate the generosity of the rest of the people of Canada. We are thankful to them, and we hope the time will soon come when it will not be necessary for us to receive relief from other parts of the country.

I wish also while on this matter to express to this government, and especially to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the thanks of the people in that district for the carloads of vegetables, fruit, fish, cheese, and beans that were sent out there. It was well received and well distributed—and there was no politics in it, either.

Now I turn to what this government is doing for the people in that area in Saskatchewan. Let me say at the start that for purposes of relief the province of Saskatchewan is divided into two areas. There is, first of all, what we call the one hundred per cent area, consisting of 170 municipalities and several local improvement districts. In that area the federal government pays one hundred per cent of the cost of all the relief. Outside of that area there is a large section of the country on behalf of which this government gives to the province of Saskatchewan, first of all, a grant of one million dollars, to pay for feed and fodder for the people in that district; and they allow the province of Saskatchewan to borrow another million dollars for the same purpose. This government also gives to Saskatchewan a grant of something like $230,000 a month for taking care of relief in other parts of the province.

I wish to deal particularly with the people in the one hundred per cent area, because that is the district we are concerned with, and it is the district the federal government is specially looking after.

The people in that district are better fed, better clothed and better looked after this year than ever before. I have talked, not to one or two or three but to many men in that district, and invariably they have said to me, one after another, "Doctor, I have more fruit, more vegetables, and more food in my celler with which to feed my family now than I had in the good years in Saskatchewan. What I say about myself is true of ninety per cent of the people in this district, but they do not want to admit it." Of course there are people who go round finding fault. There are always some people who can never get enough relief. There are also people who go round and carry on an agitation among the people inducing them to complain. Some of these agitators are irresponsible people, but I also know responsible men, men holding public office, men who should not do things of this kind, who have gone throughout the country, stood on public platforms and told the people in that district to sign anything and do anything to get more relief, urging people to be dishonest in order to get relief, and then more and more relief. How can we wonder, then, that there are people who are dissatisfied and who complain that they are not receiving enough relief?

With regard to this relief problem generally, perhaps I had better first outline the methods by which it is administered. The dominion government pays one hundred per cent of the relief in the area I have described, and the administration of that relief is entirely in the hands of the provincial government. The provincial government appoints relief inspectors, one for about every five municipalities. The application forms for relief are sent from Regina to the different municipalities, and the municipalities have the relief applicants come into whatever office they designate and make out their applications for relief. These applications, when filled out, are put to one side for the inspection of a committee. A committee is set up, consisting of a relief officer and at least two councillors. In many cases the whole council is on the relief committee. Every one of these relief applications is gone over by this committee. No applicant for relief can get his relief order increased or decreased or changed in any way except with the consent of this whole committee. Any changes that are made are made by the committee, so if any man's relief order is cut down or increased it is the fault of the committee and of the council, because the council comprises the majority on that committee.

When I hear that there are politics in it, when we are told that people have their relief orders changed because of politics, it is a complete mystery to me how that can happen, and I defy any man in this house or out of it to tell me of one individual in western Canada who has had his relief order changed on account of his political affiliations. No man is asked what his politics are when he applies for relief. There are some C.C.F.-ers and Conservatives in that area, and naturally some of them will slip in on the municipal councils in western Canada, but of course the majority of the people there are Liberals and the majority of our councils are Liberals. These committees are not political machines by any means, and these men are not swayed by politics in the administration of relief. There is no federal politics in it, there is no provincial politics in it. There may be a little municipal politics; sometimes a councillor favours one of his neighbours because he thinks he will vote for him at the next municipal election, or something of that kind. It is said that these relief officers are going around the country building up a great Liberal machine. So far as that is concerned, I have only this to say. I know only one or two relief officers in my constituency, but if I were selecting men to build up a Liberal machine I would choose a far different type of men from these officers; I would look for men who were more effective along the political line and not men who were so favourable to some of my opponents.

Let me now deal for a moment with feed and fodder. Early last summer we realized that there would be a shortage of feed and fodder for stock in the west. The government in its wisdom decided to pay the freight in order to allow the people to ship the cattle out to pasturage. I do not believe that very much of this was done in my section of the country. We have been doing this for the last four or five years and we have not found it very profitable. Invariably when we have shipped horses or cattle they have come back in the spring poorer than when they went out; a great number of them have died, a great many have never come back. Horses and cattle shipped from that short grass country that I come from, when they go into the north or into Manitoba do not do so well; it takes them a long time to become acclimatized and they do not thrive on the feed they get there. Some of our people last fall shipped cattle into Manitoba. They weighed them before they left and after six weeks the cattle weighed less than they did when they were shipped from Saskatchewan and they had good pasturage. We did not find that practice a good thing. It may be better in other sections of the country, but we did not find it so.

The government, however, put into effect a program whereby they bought cattle and shipped them out of the country, and this is one of the best things it has done for the cattle raisers of the west. I have not heard one complaint with regard to the buying of cattle. There was an independent commission buying cattle, and shipping points were established throughout the province. The cattle raisers were notified when shipments were going to take place and were asked to bring in their stock. Again, some of our agitators went about the country and said to the farmers, "Don't bring in your cattle and offer them to the government; you will have to give them for practically nothing." The result was that some people did not bring in any cattle, and when the shipping day came these people came to town to see what was going on. When they found that the buyers were paying the prices that were actually being paid some of them rushed home and tried to get their cattle into the market. The next week some of them drove across the country, twenty-five, thirty and forty miles, herds of cattle which they sought to market at other shipping points.

Let me give an example of what I know with regard to the price of cattle at that time. One man had a herd for which he said he was willing to take $350. About two weeks after the government initiated this program I saw this man and he told me that he was going to hold his cattle and sell them to the government. I told him I thought he was well advised. About a week before the shipping day a buyer came around and this man took him to his farm. The buyer asked him how much he wanted for his cattle, and the farmer said he would take $550. The buyer laughed at him, but, pointing to a particular animal, he said he would give $40 for it. The man said he would not take $40 for it. He said, "I will let the hair go with the hide to the government." The government officials came the week after and bought that stock, and that farmer got, not $350, not $550, but $640 for the lot; and the animal for which he was offered $40 he sold for $62.

I do not know of any man in the whole of my constituency, or anybody in any other part of the province, who was not satisfied with the price received for stock sold to the government buying agency. My hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) referred to a price of $12, $13 or $14 for a milch cow. It must have been many years ago that that was a milch cow; it was one of those canners and cutters. I doubt whether the hon. gentleman would know the difference between a canner and cutter and a milch cow.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I know a Liberal.

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes, but you don't know the difference between a C.C.F.-er and a Social Crediter. You would not tell the people which you were before the last election.

The only complaint I have to make with regard to the cattle buying program was that they did not buy enough; I should like to see them buy more. After it was discovered that such good prices were being paid, sixty or seventy different shipping points wrote to the government and asked them to have another shipping day.

Mr. GARDINER: Ninety-two of them.

Mr. DONNELLY: Ninety-two of them asked for another shipping day so that more stock could be disposed of. We should like to see the government do this every year. The cattle held by the ordinary farmers in the west—not the ranchers—were more or less nondescript. There were some Holsteins mixed with beef cattle and coarse breeds of one kind or another, so that there was nothing but a mixture, and the best thing to do with these cattle was to get rid of them, so as to make way for a better class of stock next year. That will be better for the cattle raisers and the farmers themselves. I would urge the Minister of Agriculture to see next spring that steps are taken to help these people to establish better herds than they have had in the past, and for this very reason I think it would be wise to ship more. The idea of putting from $25 to $35 worth of feed into an animal worth only from $20 to $25 is foolish.

The next problem was to look after the stock that was left and to make provision for their fodder. In this connection, some people are of the opinion that nothing has been done. For shipment into the province of Saskatchewan there have already been purchased 6,500,000 bushels of feed oats; 2,000,000 bushels of barley; 1,250,000 bushels of wheat, and corn and mill feed. All this is ready for shipment. Then we have the coarse feeds. Some people here talk about shipping crews into Manitoba to cut feed. We tried that for a couple of years and found that it was an expensive business. Not only that, but some of our people last fall went from our own municipalities in western Canada to bale hay and feed, but the weather was so wet that they could not make it pay and they came back, not having baled very much. We did find that on account of wet and bad weather in Manitoba and Alberta many farmers there would not leave the cutting of their crops to cut feed, and I do not blame them much. But when I came here and said to hon. members from different parts of Manitoba, "There was lots of feed not cut in your section of the country, lots of hay?" invariably they told me the same thing, that there was no hay worth anything not cut in their districts. They said that any hay that remained uncut they would not haul five miles from the slough to feed any kind of stock. Most of the hay in Manitoba was cut. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) spoke of seeing burning stacks of straw. Well, Manitoba had quite a lot of straw last year, but much of it was rusted, and a lot was filled with sow thistle. Rusted wheat straw and sow thistle are not very good feed for stock. It was burnt because it was of no value whatever.

Then we had another hon. member speaking about the commission for which the pool offered to look after feed. He mentioned 75 cents; I understood it was 50 cents. That commission was to be paid to the pool on top of the price. The price for No. 1 hay was $8.50 and they wanted 50 cents in addition to that. But in fact there was no commission paid to anyone. No commission has been or is being paid to anybody anywhere to buy hay for western Canada. Three councillors came to me last fall; they wanted to go to Manitoba and bale hay. They wanted to get a baler, and we tried to get one for them. While we were trying, one of them said: "You know, I can get lots of hay in Manitoba, anyway. I have had offers; I have letters here." I asked him what they wanted. He said, "They want $5 to $7.50 a ton." "Have you got the letters?" "Yes." "Well, then, here is fifty cents; send a night letter and order 100 carloads of hay right away." Another man sitting there also said, "Here is fifty cents; send to that other fellow and order 100 carloads right away from him and ask him when he can deliver it and at what price." We got a wire back next morning saying they did not know when they could deliver, and the price would be $9.50. These were just commission merchants trying to make a little money buying and selling feed. All the feed available in Manitoba and in Alberta has been bought, and we believe that our stock will be well looked after and is being well looked after at the present time.

Now, as to this question of how much stock a man is allowed to keep: the government said, "Tell the people and tell them plainly that this is an emergency measure, that it is only for people who are in need, for people on relief. The government will help a man to keep two or three or four head of stock, or even five, depending upon the size of his family. But if he is able to feed five or six head of stock himself we are not going to give him any feed at all." Some farmers of course said, "I can feed ten or fifteen head of stock, and the government is going to feed five more; so I will keep fifteen or twenty," and they were surprised when the government said, "No, we are not going to give you any feed." Feed was short; why should the government feed stock which a man was able to keep himself? If he was able to keep five or ten or twenty head of stock, he could buy his own feed. It was this misunderstanding that brought about a lot of difficulty.

We have heard a dire tale about animals dying around the country. Well, stock has died in western Canada ever since I have been there, and will continue to die. I investigated a lot of these tales myself. Invariably when I went to the man and asked how old the animal was, he would reply, "Well, eighteen or twenty years." It should have been shot two or three years ago. That is what I found. Some of our United Farmers of Canada lodges, Saskatchewan section, kept writing to the president complaining that unless something was done the stock was all going to die. I want hon. members to notice that; it was "They will die," not "They have died." They were prophets, prophesying what was going to happen. Mr. Bickerton, the president, became alarmed and sent a circular letter to the different United Farmers of Canada lodges. Let me read a section of it:

> Prior to sending the telegram to Mr. Gardiner—

That was a telegram stating that he had received all these letters predicting that so much stock was going to die.

> —we had received numerous letters from lodges stating that horses were dying or being shot because of lack of feed, fodder and shelter . . .
> We trust that you will realize our position in this matter. We have taken a strong stand.

The governments differ with us. Now we want you to either back us up to the limit or tell us that the information we have already received is wrong and the government is right. If we are right wire Hon. Mr. Gardiner at Ottawa, Mr J. Taggart at Regina and the Regina Leader Post, the Regina Star and the Western Producers something to the effect that "the telegram to Mr. Gardiner from the U.F.C. officials is a true statement of conditions." If telegrams are too expensive write to these various parties and papers, but above all write to us by return of mail and tell us the truth about conditions in your district now.

It was due to this letter being sent out that these articles which were read by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) were published. Notice what he said about them. One of them is from the town of Indian Head, one from Broadview, another from Grenfell. I drove over that district myself from Indian Head north—I have a farm north of there—and I saw more feed in a five mile drive out of Indian Head than there is in the whole of my constituency; if animals are dying there it is because the people are too lazy to feed them. But that district the hon. member referred to is not in the one hundred per cent area at all.

Mr. PERLEY: Some is in the one hundred per cent area.

Mr. DONNELLY: Those three places are outside the one hundred per cent area. I shall deal with the others.

Then next the hon. member said something about the towns of Halbrite, Midale and Macoun. That is down in the south country, a long way off, pretty safe to talk about. This man he mentions wrote an article to the newspaper from down there, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle said. But here is a letter from another man in the same district in reply to that; this is what he says:

> No truth exists in the statement of the United Farmers of Canada that thirty per cent of horses in the Macoun, Midale and Halbrite districts are sick, dying or dead from starvation.

In a letter to the Regina Leader-Post, Mr. P. B. Peterson, of Midale, said:

> In November and the first part of December hay was rather scarce in this municipality, although we had a good supply of straw. But at present most farmers at least have a fair supply of hay and straw.
>
> During the good years, when feed and fodder was plentiful, there was always a certain number of old horses that died.
> I think the government has done wonderfully well in supplying us with the feed and fodder they have up to the present time.

So that settles the Midale and Halbrite complaints of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle.

Mr. GARDINER: No more letters came in?

Mr. DONNELLY: No more from that man; he never wrote back about it again. Then there was an indefinite place down in the southern part of the province.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to tell the hon. member that he has exhausted his time.

Mr. DONNELLY: I will finish in five or ten minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DONNELLY: Perhaps less than that. I only want to say that the other complaints were very indefinite. They are the sort of thing I have investigated personally. There was one man down at Verwood who said he had some horses die. I was in that district, which happens to be in my own constituency. There were horses that died there, but there have been horses die all over the country ever since that has been a country. The death rate among horses, cattle or stock of any kind is about five per cent every year.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. member has the consent of the house to complete his remarks?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. DONNELLY: I just want to say that the province of Saskatchewan made an investigation in a number of municipalities scattered throughout the province, in order to get what they considered to be a fair sample of conditions. They found that the death rate this year was going to be practically the same as always; about five per cent, no more and no less. It may be possible that we will have a little higher rate this year. Many of our young horses have been shipped out of the country; we have nothing left but old horses, and naturally more of them may be expected to die, but the death rate this year presumably will be about the same as it has been in the past, about five per cent.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Would the hon. member mind saying what municipalities were included in that investigation, just for the information of the house?

Mr. DONNELLY: I could not say. My instructions are that Mr. Taggart picked out representative municipalities throughout the province and had a survey made, and it was found that the death rate would be about the same as it had been in the past.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I share the views expressed by my colleagues in this group as to the inadequacy of the legislative program outlined by the government. At this time I do not intend to state my personal views in regard to the policies under debate; I desire to direct the attention of the house to certain conclusions reached by representative and non-partisan bodies across Canada as to the necessity for definite action by this parliament to deal with the need for low cost and low rental houses.

I believe there is general disappointment that in the speech from the throne there has been no reference to this important subject. Statements previously made by members of the government had given rise to the hope that during the present session some advance might be made to relieve the acute housing shortage and thereby lend impetus to economic recovery. I believe members of all parties would welcome such an advance, and, I am sure, hope that the plans of the government hinted at elsewhere may mature at a very early date. There is an amazing unanimity of opinion everywhere that additional measures can and should be undertaken now by the government to meet this pressing problem. Definite action in this direction would be less costly than further delay. In any event many members must feel, as I feel, that in this house we should lend support to the splendid service rendered by public spirited citizens in many groups across Canada in reference to this problem. I refer particularly to those associated with the National Planning and Housing Association. Their approach to the question has been based wholly on considerations of public welfare. They have brought out the undeniable fact that proper housing is as much a matter of public interest and public welfare as the maintenance of a pure water supply. They have shown that the conditions of a complex industrial society make it impossible for governments to avoid assuming increasing responsibilities to assure to every individual a decent minimum of shelter.

The omission of any reference to this subject in the speech from the throne is all the more significant because of the recommendation contained in the interim report of the National Housing Commission, which report was placed in the hands of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) in July of 1937. The recommendation in connection with housing construction reads in part as follows:

> The commission recognized the desirability of a rounding out of governmental housing policy, particularly as regards accommodation for those unable themselves to afford an economic rent—often associated with slum clearance. Action in this field was considered necessary both from the viewpoint of eliminating a social sore all too prevalent, especially in the larger cities, and because of its effect in stimulating employment in the construction field. This employment stimulus the commission considered would be felt directly, and also indirectly through the impetus that would be given to the Home Improvement Plan and to the Dominion Housing Act.

Again, in another section of the report, the commission states:

> In making this recommendation the commission was influenced by the fact that Canadian governmental bodies had expended some $14,000,000 in 1936 to rent accommodation for relief recipients, and that in many instances such accommodation was unsanitary and unsuitable in the extreme. The commission feels that such a situation should not be allowed to continue, in that it breeds conditions tending to increase unemployment by decreasing the employability of numbers of workers, thus making it harder for them to secure employment.
> The plan recommended by the commission was put before the minister some time after the opening of the parliamentary session of 1937, and it is understood action thereon has been held over. As the government stated on September 10, 1936, that it accepted certain general principles laid down by the commission to govern its intended attack on this important branch of the housing problem, it is hoped that action may shortly prove possible.

In view of the circumstances related in this report it is not unreasonable to expect that the government should take appropriate action this session to implement the recommendations of the commission. It would also seem most unwise to disregard the recommendation on this score of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities. This federation represents the local government of more than five millions of the population of the dominion. In the submission of this body to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations it is recommended:

> That the federal government enact a national low rent housing act.

This recommendation was based on the following considerations:

> (a) It has been demonstrated that a substantial proportion of the urban population lives in sub-standard houses and in neighbourhoods that are injurious to health and morals, conducive to delinquency and destructive of family life.
>
> (b) It is also true that private enterprise and local authorities have found no way thus far to provide decent housing for those with low incomes. Competent spokesmen for private enterprise admit that the provision of housing for this social group is beyond their ability. Local authorities are unable to function without financial and other help from the senior governments.
> (c) The provisions of the Dominion Housing Act (1935) are unsuited and inadequate to facilitate a housing program for the low-wage income group.

(d) Therefore, in order that a large proportion of our urban families should not continue to live in unfit dwellings, and to supply the urgent need for housing facilities, conforming to an acceptable minimum standard for the low income groups and thus to attack the serious problems of health, welfare and order, which are directly related to inadequate housing, the municipalities of Canada recommend that:

(1) A national policy should be adopted for rehousing the low income groups at acceptable minimum standards, as a cooperative undertaking by federal, provincial and local governments, and private enterprise. This policy should be designed to stimulate local initiative, recognize local circumstances, and vest the control, save in exceptional cases, in the local authorities.

(2) The federal and provincial governments should extend, in accordance with local needs, financial assistance conditioned on the existence of a comprehensive city plan and a housing program meeting satisfactory standards.

(3) Financial aid should be either in the form of capital grants, long term, low interest loans, or annual rent subsidies.

Here you have the recommendations of practical men who are close to the problem and who have had every opportunity to measure it and to gauge its difficulties.

I submit it is becoming more and more apparent that existing provisions of the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, do not adequately meet the situation. The reasons are obvious.

Here I would say that a good deal of praise is merited by the officials in charge of the administration of the act. They have done much to increase the scope of its usefulness. I do not wish to minimize the value of the pioneering work done, or the importance of plans now under consideration. I believe the information made available with respect to operations under the act indicate definite limitations which exclude the possibility of relieving the housing shortage, or of providing houses for those who need them most.

I wish briefly to touch upon the latest statistics available with regard to operations under the present housing program. The total loans as of December 31, 1937, amounted to 2,150. The total number of family units provided for, by such loans, stood at 3,018, while the total value of loans was $13,034,858.

These statistics should be considered in conjunction with the reports of the construction industry. In 1934 there were 10,135 residential contracts in the dominion, having a total valuation of $30,588,100. In 1936 the number of residential contracts increased to 13,606, with a total valuation of $42,857,900. In 1937 the 18,284 residential contracts had a valuation of $56,207,000. It is true that these statistics indicate an important gain, but when we compare these figures with the estimated shortage of housing they at once appear pitifully inadequate. It becomes painfully clear that operations under the act do not even touch the fringe of the shortage, and that more extensive measures are sorely needed.

In this connection again we must note the serious backlog in the construction industry. Going back to 1929 we find the total value of construction work stood at $576,651,800. Then, in 1933, at the low point of construction in Canada, the valuation was $97,289,800. In 1936 an increase is indicated to $162,588,000. According to the latest records construction contracts in 1937 were valued at $224,000,000. It may be unwise to attempt to express this backlog in terms of dollars and cents, but there is sufficient to show that it is serious, and that the construction industry is lagging behind all other major national industries in Canada.

In 1931, according to census statistics, there were 2,252,729 households in Canada. In 1937 the number was estimated at 2,350,000. The estimated increase in population since 1931 has been at the rate of 130,000 per year, or 30,000 families per year. It will be seen at once that we are building only about one-third the number of houses required to keep pace with the growth in population and we are making no adequate provision for the necessary replacements. It has been reliably estimated that the total shortage of houses in Canada exceeds 300,000. When we consider operations under the act we find that up to December, 1937, the number of loans in British Columbia stood at 253. Vancouver city alone reports a housing shortage of over 12,000. Loans in the province of Quebec totalled 992, while in the city of Montreal 40,000 houses are required to make up the shortage, and that figure does not include the requirements of necessary slum clearance.

Then, there is another phase of the problem with respect to operations under the Dominion Housing Act. The average loan per family unit for the entire period ended December 31, 1937, under the Dominion Housing Act has been $4,319. The lowest average loan for any three-month period during 1937 is shown to be $3,806. Only 756 family units were financed by loans under $3,000. When we face realities with regard to the distribution of income in Canada we realize why the present housing program cannot be expected to serve the needs of those who are now without proper housing facilities. Detailed studies of this phase of the problem have been prepared and published by Mr. H. L. Seymour, planning and housing consultant of this city.

It is estimated that in 1935 there was a total income of $3,750,000,000 earned in Canada by 3,800,000 persons receiving wages and salaries, or their equivalent. It is shown that of the gainfully employed:

Only 10 per cent received an income of $1,700 or over.
20 per cent received an income of $1,120 or over.
30 per cent received an income of $ 980 or over.
40 per cent received an income of $ 900 or over.
50 per cent received an income of $ 800 or over.
60 per cent received an income of $ 700 or over.
70 per cent received an income of $ 560 or over.
80 per cent received an income of $ 400 or over.
90 per cent received an income of $ 230 or over.

This shows that more than half the wage earners in Canada received less than $850 per annum. It can be shown that if under the housing act we allow 25 per cent of income for amortization and taxes, which is a reasonable percentage, it would require an income of $1,700 per annum to provide a payment of $35 per month towards the purchase of a $5,000 home. On the average, only those having this income, or more, could save the 20 per cent down payment necessary under the housing act. Certainly we can hardly expect more than ten per cent of the new homes to be built under the present plan.

It is believed, however, that a program could be launched to enable payment for a $3,000 home over a twenty-five year period on the basis of monthly payments of $14, representing approximately 20 per cent of an income of $850. Less than this income, as I have stated, is received by half the wage earners in Canada.

While giving consideration to the question of income in connection with the problem I am compelled to refer to the plight of the unemployed on relief who are herded together under housing conditions which are a disgrace to our communities. I must remind the house again that federal, provincial and municipal authorities during one year subsidized these housing conditions to an amount of $14,000,000, by way of shelter allowances. Certainly it would be better and more constructive to subsidize better housing conditions. While there were approximately 1,000,000 persons on relief, about $135,000,000 was paid out in that year for relief allowances by federal, provincial and municipal authorities. That amounts to about $135 per person, or $620 per family. One will readily see that there were few families on relief which could pay more than $8 or $12 per month for shelter, and consequently many of these people have been living in dilapidated houses unfit for human habitation. At the same time statistics show that there were 1,750,000 persons in about 385,000 families which had an estimated family income of $620 or less, and an average income of well under $400. A number equal to or greater than the number actually in receipt of relief were receiving incomes as low as or lower than relief standards.

The lesson from this experience is plain. Private enterprise seeking profitable investment at prevailing returns cannot provide decent shelter for the low-wage income group. Professor Urwick of the university of Toronto aptly describes the situation when he states that the economics of the problem are "ridiculously simple." He says further:

> The poor have not got decent homes because they cannot pay for them; no one attempts to build better homes for them for exactly the same reason. There is no money in low-cost housing; it is doubtful whether it can ever be low-cost enough. For the present, private enterprise does not come into the picture at all, no sane individual or company would touch the business. So the case for state aid does not need to be proven, it is patent on the surface.

Someone said recently that our society is divided into two classes, those who have more dinners than appetites and those who have more appetites than dinners. The same may be said of the disparities apparent in the housing accommodation of the Canadian people. Some dwell on the sunny side of the fence while the many dwell in the shadows. That which lurks in the shadows threatens the well being of the whole community. I consider that this house has definite responsibilities in this matter which can no longer be evaded.

It is not to our credit that Canada is far behind many other countries in carrying out a housing program. I might refer especially to Sweden, Holland, Belgium and Great Britain. In England and Wales 3,300,000 household units have been constructed from the war up to March, 1937. In proportion to population that is over four times what we have accomplished in Canada. We can learn about housing from Great Britain. We can learn that any stimulus to the building industry is passed on to other industries and has startling and cumulative results. Mr. Herbert N. Casson, writing in Maclean's magazine, has the following observations to make of the results.

> British bricklayers are overwhelmed with orders. They have not been able to produce enough. Almost every day, ships come to Britain loaded with brick from Belgium.

Many timber merchants have had to double their staffs. Practically every furniture factory is working overtime. Decorators and paperhangers have never in their lives been as busy as they are to-day. Britain is building houses.

And again:

By 1931, a building boom had begun. More than 130,000 houses were built in that year by private builders. Since then the boom has continued. At present it has reached its highest point and is confidently expected to go higher. To any tourist, the most striking feature in Great Britain is the vast number of new houses, and houses in course of construction, most of them on the outskirts of the towns and cities. At last, in spite of a bad start, Britain has succeeded in solving her housing problem.

I think it is agreed by all that any stimulus to the building industry has an immediate effect upon other industries. I submit that the findings of the public bodies to which I have referred, and the various reports which have been published, make it abundantly clear that the situation in Canada with regard to housing is grave. The Montreal Metropolitan commission undertook a survey which was carried out in a very painstaking manner, and I think the report they made is more than fair. They do not attempt to exaggerate the situation in any way. A total of 4,216 houses were inspected and the following conclusions reached:

According to the Central Housing Committee, Washington, D.C., in a recently published glossary of housing terms, a slum is defined as "an area in which dwellings predominate that because of either dilapidation, obsolescence, overcrowding, arrangement or design, lack of ventilation, light or sanitary facilities, or a combination of these factors are detrimental to the safety, health, morals, comfort and welfare of the inhabitants thereof."

If we accept the above definition, we are bound to affirm that there are districts in Montreal which can aptly be described as "slum areas."

They probably do not dramatically reflect each and every one of the characteristics mentioned in the foregoing definition. Overcrowding is not in wide evidence. Sanitary facilities are, on the whole, passable. But these districts do embrace predominantly old housing. Much of it is obsolescent, a considerable portion of it is dilapidated. The arrangement or design of the dwellings, either in their structural defects or the manner in which they are crowded on the land, along with "a combination of other factors are detrimental to the safety, health, morals, comfort and welfare of the inhabitants thereof."

In this sense Montreal has a slum problem.

The report continues:

As such, they represent an economic liability, the social costs of which are too expensive a luxury for us to indefinitely continue to tolerate.

Passing across the country, we find the following statement made by Dr. T. A. Lomer of Ottawa:

The scarcity of reasonably low rental houses is so great that the health department has not been able to take action to abate overcrowding except in the most extreme cases.

The chief inspector of the health department at Winnipeg has this to say:

From time to time this department has drawn attention to the increasing congestion by the conversion of one-family dwellings into tenements or multiple dwellings; housing from two to ten families. Nothing was being done to such houses to make them fit for multiple occupation, except that in order to attract tenants, gas stoves were installed in the various rooms. Pages have been written about the undesirable conditions thus being created; the lack of adequate plumbing, want of ventilation, occupation of cellars and attics, danger from fire, danger from communicable disease propagation, increased expense to the city for hospitalization, the moral effects of such conditions, etc.

And again:

—during the past five years, only one house or suite has been provided for every ten marriages.

An authority in Saskatchewan has this to say:

Saskatchewan has the doubtful honour of being the most overcrowded province, from the point of view of housing, in the entire dominion.

The report of a special committee appointed by the city council of Vancouver to investigate housing conditions contains the following paragraph:

Apart from overcrowding, a very unfortunate condition is being perpetuated in connection with dilapidated, and in some cases, condemned dwellings. Under ordinary circumstances, these buildings would stand vacant, or be demolished, but the great lack of suitable accommodation has forced people to occupy these premises to the detriment of their health and well being. The rentals obtained are small and, therefore, the landlords will carry out no repairs, nor make any improvements; thus, damp and cold add their toll to the misery of the occupants.

This report is signed by Helena R. Gutteridge, chairman of the building, civic planning and parks committee. The Vancouver branch of the National Planning and Housing Association has this to say:

There is at present an acute shortage of housing accommodation in Vancouver. Apartment house surveys reveal that less than one per cent of the suites are vacant, and the position with regard to the cheapest types of accommodation is worse still. It is practically impossible to find a vacant house in the poorer districts.

The housing shortage not only results in overcrowding; it also prevents the effective enforcement of the sanitary and zoning by-laws, since it becomes impossible to remove tenants from insanitary dwellings. The reports of the medical health officer indicate that there are many buildings occupied as dwellings which would not ordinarily pass for that purpose.

A recent civic housing survey revealed serious overcrowding and slum conditions in many rooming houses. It also disclosed that over 600 persons (including children) are living in shacks or houseboats on the waterfront, all without sewage facilities and mostly without a direct water supply. Unless active measures of prevention are immediately undertaken, these conditions will continue to spread and multiply.

The population of Vancouver has increased by over 12,000 during the last two years. New houses built during this period provided accommodation for less than half this increase in population, and were mainly of a type far beyond the means of the lower paid sections of the community. Marriages deferred from the depression, the "unscrambling" of families, and the steady decline in the size of the family unit, has still further aggravated the situation.

They give the number of houses and apartments which have been built in Vancouver during the last six years. The report continues:

It is estimated that an annual output of at least 2,000 houses a year for the next six years is required to make good the existing shortage.

At the date of the 1931 census, nearly 40 per cent of the families renting houses in Vancouver were paying under $25 a month in rent, and their average income was approximately $70 per month. Allowing one-fifth of income for rent, the average rent which this group can afford to pay is under $15 a month. About half of the population own (or have an equity in) their own homes. The other half, and probably a good proportion of those who have attempted to buy their homes, have, for the most part, neither the capital nor the stability of income to justify house purchase.

Unassisted private enterprise cannot build satisfactory houses to rent at under $30 per month.

The 1935 Housing Act does not touch the problem of the lower paid worker, since the average cost of the 154 houses (including land) so far built in British Columbia under the act, is over $4,400. Direct governmental assistance for low cost housing is therefore essential.

8. The key to the situation is cheap finance, since financing charges usually represent well over half the net rent. The dominion is alone in a position to provide this financial assistance, and without it the municipalities are powerless to act.

He goes on to point out:

Public responsibility for housing conditions has been accepted in Europe for many years.

I think it has been made abundantly clear that the situation is grave and demands action by this parliament, and I urge that such action be taken soon. When we review housing conditions across Canada, I think we will agree with the statement made by Professor Percy E. Nobbs, in a report of a recent survey of the situation in Montreal in conjunction with the junior board of trade:

Private enterprise has never been able to cope with the problem of providing decent accommodation at these rentals for low-wage families. Large-scale operations and corporate management combined with a measure of social service are the only solution . . . Bad housing is often profitable to the landlords, but never to the community; for it carries with it vast economic burdens, many of which are calculable to a fraction of a cent—hospitalization, juvenile delinquency, etc. It is on purely economic grounds that I urge rehabilitation loans to retard the growth of slums, and large scale housing operations, as a prelude to slum clearance later on. The alternative is to see society destroyed by the mounting burdens due to bad environment.

I submit that in view of these conditions so well described, it would be not only sound economy but wise statesmanship to introduce without delay a measure to extend the housing program to provide low rental and low cost houses.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, some of the measures to be submitted to parliament during this session deserve the very serious attention of the legislator. Trade agreements, constitutional amendments, unemployment insurance, assistance to agriculture, the economic situation of the country, constitutionality of legislation, repression of agitators, and all that is required for the sound administration of the state. As to trade agreements, not only do they contribute largely to Canada's economic recovery, but they help to establish peaceful relations between nations. Were those their only advantages they would deserve the most careful attention of the people's representatives and our whole-hearted support in so far as they tend to benefit our people.

In this troubled world the efforts of our rulers should tend solely towards peace, the creator of initiative, of work and of happiness, but nothing is more difficult to-day than to unite the best elements of the country for the attainment of that ideal. The endeavours of statesmen to give to the country the best possible administration are constantly beset by the most serious obstacles. However, in spite of adverse winds, the ship is making for the port where prosperity so long in sight, awaits its arrival.

Let us not forget, sir, that it is by farming that we have lived as a colony and that we shall survive as a nation. That is true not only of Quebec but of all the provinces of Canada. To the great agricultural industry I am resolved to bring, as in the past, all my help and the experience I have acquired in this chamber. As to the matter of unemployment insurance, it should in my humble opinion be approached with the greatest care and considered only to the extent that it will put an end to the depressing and disastrous method of direct relief. I go further: better have no unemployment insurance than allow provincial prerogatives to suffer.

During the past week there has been the question of submitting certain provincial laws to the consideration of the supreme court. One of these laws is known as the "Padlock Act" passed by the Quebec Legislature. At all events, should the highest court of the country hold this law unconstitutional, it would be the federal government's own duty to take immediate measures to curb agitators, by whatever name they call themselves. All revolutionary movements and organizations should be promptly, firmly, energetically and effectively suppressed by the government. For do they not constitute an attack upon established authority? Do they not provoke deep reactions among the masses, thus preparing the decline of the authority of the state and the constitution of the country?

Nobody will deny that for some time there has been a marked improvement in more than one sphere. The number of relief recipients was reduced. Better prices prevailed for certain kinds of farm products. However there is still room for improvement from a social and economic viewpoint. Small wage earners and farmers wrere the most severely affected by the economic unrest which prevailed during these last few years. Our young people were in great distress. The governments made commendable efforts to remedy these deplorable conditions. However, we need something besides theories, speeches, and lectures, in order to reestablish the condition of all classes in our community. From the people we require initiative and enterprise; from the governments, efficiency in their administration, and a clear vision of present requirements. Thus, the present government, who enjoy the confidence of the people, may carry on their work or reconstruction, in the interest of the country and its ratepayers.

Since the speech from the throne allows the members to make all the suggestions which they consider as being in the public interest, I shall draw the attention of the government to the small salaries which are being paid to our rural carriers for the carrying of his majesty's mail, in certain parts of the country. Some may contend that these carriers have freely agreed to the salary they are getting. It is true that contracts are let out only after a call for tenders. It is also true that, except for some serious reasons, the contract is awarded to the lowest bidder. Is that a good reason to deprive these carriers of the reward of their labour? I know some pitiful cases where carriers have been operating at a loss for two years.

Mr. Speaker, on all sides you hear of nothing but social justice, minimum wages, and fair remuneration of labour. Still, rural carriers, who shoulder great responsibilities, are most unfairly treated, when you consider the expenses they incur to carry out their work for his majesty. I regret very much to be precluded by the rules of this house from introducing a bill in order to grant these rural mail carriers a reasonable salary and a fair remuneration. In fact, only a minister of the crown may introduce such a bill. That is why, for the sake of fairness, and justice, I would ask the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) to submit to parliament the necessary measure, since I have not the right to do so myself. Otherwise, the government will give the people the edifying spectacle of men being exploited while carrying his majesty's mail. I shall probably be told in reply to my request that the Post Office Department and the carriers are already bound by a contract. An empty excuse! When any legislation in force constitutes a denial of justice toward the people of a country, the first duty of the government is to amend it or to substitute another therefor. Besides, it would be easy, in the notice calling for tenders, to fix a minimum annual rate of, say, $35 per mile provided of course, the government were satisfied that the tender system was the best one. Moreover, in the notice and request for tenders it should be clearly and definitely stated that any tender involving a rate of compensation lower, for example, than the annual rate of $35 per mile, shall be deemed null and void.

Mr. Speaker, I should have liked to discuss other problems of national importance, such as the defence estimates. But "all in good time," as the saying goes. Therefore, when the National Defence department's estimates are brought up in the house I shall, as I have done before, consider and discuss them in such a manner and spirit as appear to me in the best interests of Canada. When that troublesome question comes up, I shall be governed by no other consideration than the love of my country and its welfare and progress.

In concluding, I wish to tell the house that I shall, again this year, insist upon the application of a seasonal tariff for the benefit of truck gardeners in my constituency and in the whole country. When, at the very first session of this parliament, the government gave favourable consideration to my resolution requesting a seasonal tariff for fruit and vegetable producers, an immediate improvement was noticed in the selling price of these nationally important products. Truck gardening holds a prominent place in the economic life of Canada. Therefore, not only should the government help that industry to preserve its present standing, but it should also promote its development in the best interests of the Canadian people.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, a member sitting in this corner and being from Alberta can hardly rise in this house to-day without adverting to the now famous Powell and Unwin case recently concluded. The press has had a good deal to say during past months concerning this matter, and in yesterday's newspapers we read of the telegram that had been sent the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) from the Attorney General of Alberta requesting the full remission of these sentences. To-day's press carries the news that the Minister of Justice has not seen his way clear to granting the request. The charge against these gentlemen would appear to be, and is generally accepted to be, actuated by political motivation. This being the case, one might be excused for having entertained the hope that the Minister of Justice would see his way clear to grant the dignified request of His Majesty's Attorney General for the Province of Alberta, especially when it is borne in mind that Alberta's attorney general, being on the ground and therefore intimately familiar with all aspects of the situation involved, is singularly qualified to make recommendations as to the disposition of the sentences. The Minister of Justice having made his decision, I feel impelled to ask that he sympathetically consider the possibility of granting at a very early date a parole for these persecuted gentlemen, who are after all the servants of the people of Alberta.

I had not intended to speak to the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne, but after listening to several remarks that have been made in debate thus far I am compelled to say a few words on some matters. I wish to refer particularly to certain remarks made by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) wherein he endeavours to justify the argument against the present policy of subventions on coal. The hon. gentleman made considerable reference to this matter during the last session, and I think that he should be better informed. It is generally argued by those living at the head of the lakes that subventions on coal destroy to a very large extent the shipping industry at the head of the great lakes. It is argued by some that millions of dollars have been invested in elevators, coal docks and harbour improvements on the assumption that the natural advantage of the harbours at Fort William and Port Arthur as shipping centres assures their future growth and improvement. But those who so argue overlook the fact that millions of dollars have been invested in the coal industry of Alberta upon the assumption that the people of Canada need coal and should naturally buy home products.

In an editorial that appeared in the Daily Times-Journal of Fort William about a year ago the statement was made that the destruction of the coal trade at the head of the lakes was the result of deliberate action on the part of the government in response to agitation for subventions on the part of western coal operators. It is stated that because of the subvention policy the amount of coal handled at the head of the lakes dropped about one and a quarter million tons. In reply let me say that the policy of subventions for coal was instituted by a Liberal government, first in Nova Scotia and later in the west. The fact that subventions were granted to Nova Scotia gave the coal mining industry in the west a natural right to expect that the same thing would be done for it. The statement that this coal subvention policy reduced the coal trade at the head of the lakes one and a quarter million tons is entirely incorrect. The movement of Alberta and British Columbia coal under the subvention has never exceeded 340,000 tons, and part of this goes to points in eastern Ontario which were never served from Fort William. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) seems very much concerned about the employment of 100 to 150 men in his constituency. The movement of 340,000 tons of coal from the west gives employment to something like 400 miners and partial employment to some 2,250 trainmen, in addition to other railroad employees who otherwise would be put on short time or thrown entirely on relief. In addition there are farmers in western Canada who are able to make ends meet by selling mine props made from timber cut from their small forests. The editorial referred to would lead the public to believe that Alberta coal is of inferior quality to imported coals. The very opposite is the fact. That is proved by actual tests.

We have coals in Alberta and in Nova Scotia that compare most favourably with any imported coal.

It is also suggested that by doing away with coal subventions and importing additional coal from the United States the amount of the subvention would be saved and the revenue increased by the duty collected. Such an argument is untenable, for if it were carried to its logical conclusion we would be, in effect, saying: Destroy all Canadian industry and reap the revenue collected in duty on imports. But money spent on our own coal production at least stays in the country, and that part paid to employees and railway men, as well as any small dividends or profits to the operators, also remains in Canada, except perhaps a small amount. Most important of all is that if the comparatively small amount now being spent for western subventions, about $300,000, were discontinued and such coal displaced by United States coal, the result would be more unemployment, more relief costs, and money going abroad, thus reducing the purchasing power of the Canadian people and placing upon them a greater burden of taxation.

The hon. member said, as reported on page 104 of Hansard:

> I do not like to see western coal coming down to within a few miles of Fort William to the detriment of our workers.

Surely my hon. friend does not mean that he desires the destruction of an entire coal mining industry with its thousands of employees in order to employ 100 to 150 men in his constituency. He must remember that to interfere with subventions in western Canada would mean that there would have to be the same interference with subventions for Nova Scotia coal, thus destroying the entire coal mining industry of Canada. I believe the coal mining industry of Canada is a matter of national importance, and we are dealing with national policies. What should be done to save the coal mining industry of this country, under the present system at least, is to increase the subvention.

The hon. member said also that he viewed with alarm any action taken by any province to curtail the freedom of the press. I have discussed this matter with some of my colleagues. I know it is contrary to parliamentary procedure to discuss a matter which is before the courts, but I find nothing in the rules to prevent me from simply reading the act which was passed by the Alberta legislature. I would like to have your ruling on this Mr. Speaker...

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead and read it.

Mr. HANSELL: I shall read it without any comment whatsoever. It is Bill No. 9, entitled, "An Act to Ensure the Publication of Accurate News and Information," and it reads:

Whereas it is expedient and in the public interest that the newspapers published in the province should furnish to the people of the province statements made by the authority of the government of the province as to the true and exact objects of the policy of the government and as to the hindrances to or difficulties in achieving such objects, to the end that the people may be informed with respect thereto.

Now therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the legislative assembly of the province of Alberta enacts as follows:

1. This act may be cited as "The Accurate News and Information Act."

2. In this act, unless the context otherwise requires—

(a) "Chairman" means the chairman of the board constituted by section 3 of the Alberta Social Credit Act;

(b) "Newspaper" means a paper containing public news, intelligence or occurrences or remarks or observations thereon, printed for sale and published periodically in parts or numbers at regular intervals not exceeding thirty-one days between the publication of any two of such papers, parts or numbers, and includes a paper printed in order to be made public weekly or oftener, or at intervals not exceeding thirty-one days containing only or principally advertisements, and a paper containing accounts of events occurring within thirty-one days before the date of publication.

3. (1) Subject to the other provisions of this section, every person who is the proprietor, editor, publisher or manager of any newspaper published in the province, shall when required so to do by the chairman, publish in that newspaper any statement furnished by the chairman which has for its object the correction or amplification of any statement relating to any policy or activity of the government of the province published by that newspaper within the next preceding thirty-one days.

(2) Every such statement shall have written upon it a certificate in the following words: "The foregoing statement is published by the direction of the chairman of the social credit board," which certificate shall be printed at the foot of the statement to which it relates.

(3) Every such statement shall be printed with the type ordinarily used in the printing of the newspaper.

(4) The length of any statement required to be published shall not exceed the length of the statement corrected thereby and such statement shall be given the same prominence as to position, type and space as the statement corrected thereby.

(5) Every requirement by the chairman for the publication of any statement shall be in writing signed by the chairman, and shall be deemed to have been duly made upon the receipt of the requirement together with the statements referred to therein at the office or usual place of business of any of the following persons, namely, the proprietor, editor, publisher or manager of the newspaper.

(6) Every statement so required to be published in a newspaper shall be submitted in the language used in the publication of such newspaper and shall be published in the next regular issue thereof after the day upon which the requirement for the publication thereof referred to in subsection (5) is received at the office or usual place of business of any of the following persons, namely, the proprietor, editor, publisher or manager of the newspaper.

(7) No statement required to be published pursuant to this act shall contain any notice or other matter the publication of which is required to be made pursuant to any other statute or which is ordinarily published as advertising.

4. Every person who is the proprietor, editor, publisher or manager of any newspaper, shall upon being required so to do by the chairman in writing, within twenty-four hours after the delivery of such requirement at the office or usual place of business of any of the following persons, namely, the proprietor, editor, publisher or manager of the newspaper, make a return in writing setting out every source from which any information emanated, as to any statement contained in any issue of the newspaper published within sixty days of the making of the requirement and the names, addresses and occupations of all persons by whom such information was furnished to the newspaper, and the name and address of the writer of any editorial, article or news item contained in any such issue of the newspaper as aforesaid.

5. No action for libel shall be maintainable on account of the publication of any statement pursuant to this act against any person who is the proprietor, editor, publisher, manager or printer of the newspaper publishing the same or against any employee of any such person or against any person on account of any subsequent publication of any such statement.

6. In case the proprietor, editor, publisher or manager of any newspaper has been guilty of any contravention of any of the provisions of this act the lieutenant governor in council, upon the recommendation of the chairman, may by order prohibit,—

(a) the publication of such newspaper either for a definite time or until further order;

(b) the publication in any newspaper of anything written by any person specified in the order;

(c) the publication of any information emanating from any person or source specified in the order.

7. (1) Every person who contravenes any of the provisions of this act or who makes any default in complying with any requirement made in pursuance of this act shall be liable to a penalty not to exceed five hundred dollars.

(2) Every person who contravenes any of the provisions of any order in council made pursuant to section 6 of this act shall in respect of every such contravention be liable to a penalty not to exceed one thousand dollars.

(3) Any penalty which any person is liable to pay pursuant to any provision of this act shall be recoverable either by suit brought by the chairman in any court of competent civil jurisdiction, or upon summary conviction upon the information or complaint of the chairman or of some person authorized in writing by the chairman to lay such information.

8. This act shall come into force on the day upon which it is assented to.

Now my hon. friend can read the act for his own information. I am not going to make any comment on it whatever, but I wish to deal with one phase of thought that is prevalent in the minds of many people. relative to what is meant by the freedom of the press. It seems to me the freedom of the press means that it is free to print the truth. Let us make no mistake about that; it is free to print the truth. The hon. member for Fort William, who made this reference, is a clergyman. Perhaps it is only fitting that one clergyman should reply to another.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Is the hon. member a clergyman?

Mr. HANSELL: He is; he may not look like it, but he is.

Mr. LAWSON: As a clergyman, apart from the Bible can the hon. gentleman say what is the truth?

Mr. HANSELL: It is not a matter of a definition of truth; it is a matter of a statement of fact. I do not want to become involved in a discussion of what the act itself purported to do; I am avoiding that, but I should know what is the truth about myself and the Alberta government should know what is the truth about itself. That is the question which is involved.

Now let me ask my hon. friend the clergyman, sincerely and without malice or satire: In the ethics of his religion could he say that people or institutions should be free to say and publish that which is false? Let me ask him further: Would he deem it a thing objectionable to demand a true statement of the facts in answer to a falsity which has been spoken or published?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer to some remarks that were made by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman), who commenced his speech, appearing at page 79 of Hansard, by making reference to the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), who is the leader of this group. I would not regard this reference as particularly important were it not for the fact that in connection with it the hon. gentleman also referred to the government of Alberta. The hon. gentleman started off by saying that a year ago last summer—and I am surprised that as a parliamentarian he would build up an argument on such a flimsy foundation—he read something somewhere. He does not say when he read it, but he builds up a fantastic argument because he heard or read something somewhere at some indefinite time, before the last session of the house, in some morning newspaper which he does not name, in which appeared some report from some small town in Alberta, which he also does not name. On that basis he builds up an argument with which he attempts to ridicule not only the hon. member for Lethbridge but the government of Alberta. I submit that the Canadian public will do well to judge the strength of the argument of my hon. friend by the meagreness of his reference. The hon. gentleman went on to say that no government had been a more complete failure than the government of Alberta in carrying out its promises.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSELL: In response to the "hear, hear" I am going to say that no government has succeeded as the government of Alberta has in carrying out its promises.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend should be better informed. Perhaps in making a statement of that kind he was depending upon information which appeared in some little newspaper in some one-horse town, away back in Timbuctoo, in the remote ages of the past. Does he not know that under the present administration in Alberta surveys have been made in the interests of the oil industry in such a way as to induce a great amount of capital to come into Alberta from the Dominion of Canada, from the United States and from across the water? In the last little while we have heard a great deal about capital going out of Alberta, but millions of dollars have come into that province because hard-headed business men in the oil industry have had confidence in the Alberta government. In 1935, before the present government took office in Alberta, 60,000 feet were drilled in the Turner valley oil fields. For the first nine months of 1937 nearly four times that number of feet were drilled. Under the policy of the Alberta government that province is producing about 7,000,000 barrels of oil every year. For the information of the hon. member, Canada takes third place in the British Empire as an oil producer and, may I add, largely through the social credit policies of the Alberta government.

I could say something about the lumbering industry. I could make some observations about tar sands, the production of salt, and other matters, but time will not permit me to go into details. I suppose the hon. member has reference to the fact that social credit policies had promised much in terms of monetary reform. Let me say that the hon. member should sweep his own doorstep first. If any charge can be made that a government has not kept its promises with respect to monetary reform, then certainly that charge can be laid at the foot of the present Liberal government at Ottawa.

What did we read as to what the Liberal government was going to do? All hon. members must be familiar with the famous speech made by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) at Saskatoon on September 21, 1935, when he is reported to have said:

> Canada is faced with a great battle between the money power and the people, a battle which will be waged in the new parliament. I plead for a sweeping Liberal victory to carry out my policies of public control of currency and credit. Until the control of currency and credit is restored to the government, all talk of sovereignty of parliament and democracy is idle and futile.

We find that the right hon. gentleman says that Canada is faced with a great battle between the money powers and the people, and that that battle will be waged in parliament. Well, when was the battle waged? Some of us have been sitting in the house for a couple of sessions and we are now asking ourselves when the battle was waged.

Mr. MARTIN: Would the hon. member permit me to ask a question?

Mr. HANSELL: Yes.

Mr. MARTIN: When may the people of Alberta expect the $25 a month by way of dividend?

Mr. HANSELL: I would be very glad to answer my hon. friend's question.

Mr. LANDERYOU: As soon as the Liberals keep out of our hair.

Mr. MARTIN: Answer the question, please.

Mr. HANSELL: When the social credit forces of Alberta began to explain the philosophies of social credit, it was brought to the attention of the people in that province that there was a shortage of purchasing power.

Mr. SLAGHT: Why not answer the question?

Mr. HANSELL: I am answering the question. There was a shortage of purchasing power between production and consumption which must be made up in some way or another. That shortage could be made up by the issuance of what Major Douglas terms a national dividend. That $25 a month represents a dividend, and it was promised that such a dividend was possible under a social credit scheme. My hon. friend now asks me when the Alberta government is going to issue that dividend. When we have a social credit system operating, that will be possible. It is our firm conviction that the Liberal forces in Alberta are blocking the institution of social credit in that province. That is my answer to the hon. member's question.

Mr. MARTIN: What about the eighteen-month period? It has expired.

Mr. HANSELL: I have only ten minutes in which to finish my observations, and I should like to spend the time in answering the hon. member for North Huron. He has been viewing the Alberta situation from a distance. May I now bring information from Alberta showing what some Liberals in that province think of the battle which was supposed to be fought in this house against the money powers. Before proceeding to the reference, may I ask when the battle was fought. If it has been fought, when was it finished? If it is finished, who won the victory? If it is finished, was the victory won by parliament or by the money powers? If it is not finished, why was money reform absent from the speech from the throne?

I have said that I would let the hon. member view the matter from the standpoint of people who are a little nearer the situation. All hon. members have received a letter from the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba. That assembly is substantially Liberal, and yet we find that it does not recognize that a battle has been fought or won. This is the resolution moved and carried by the legislature of Manitoba:

Whereas the standard of living in Canada can only be raised by increased production and consumption of goods and services,

Whereas such increased production and consumption can only be accomplished effectively by national control of currency and credit issued in terms of public need,

Whereas the government of Canada, by recent legislation, now control fifty-one per cent of the shares of the Bank of Canada,

Now, therefore, be it resolved that in the opinion of this legislature that the government of Canada proceed forthwith to implement its election pledges and issue through the Bank of Canada currency and credit, considered in terms of public need, the amount of which to be determined in relation to the domestic and industrial requirements of the Canadian people.

Be it further resolved that a copy of this resolution be sent to the premier of Canada, every member of his cabinet, and all members of the House of Commons.

That, Mr. Speaker, comes from the legislature of Manitoba.

[Mr. Hansell.]

In the five minutes left at my disposal may I deal with what some people from Alberta who are interested in Liberal policies have to say. In that connection I shall read a letter from a gentleman who during the last election campaign was an organizer for the Liberal forces in Alberta. This letter was written to the Prime Minister and, so far as I can learn, has not yet been acknowledged. In sending a copy of the letter to the Edmonton Bulletin the gentleman in question wrote:

Editor
Bulletin.

On August 10th the writer sent the enclosed letter to Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, Premier of Canada.

Having supported his government in the 1935 election in reliance upon his election pledges, the courtesy of an acknowledgment was deemed reasonable whether the explanation was satisfactory or not.

The people should know how those of us who worked and voted for his election, now feel about the present situation.

This is the letter:

Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. King:

Edmonton's recent unique legislative activities must have shocked Ottawa nearly as much as Ottawa's continued inactivity on the same question has disappointed and disheartened the west.

Alberta's misguided and desperate attempts to secure for her citizens as a life-sustaining necessity, an increase in her people's purchasing power in view of Ottawa's failure therein, has resulted in the present legislation.

The writer opposed the social credit idea of monthly "dividends" not because relief from the present situation was not required, but because that group was proposing to grant purchasing power in a way that seemed beyond the province's constitutional powers to accomplish, whereas you, on behalf of the Liberal party of Canada, to which I belong because I believe in a minimum of tariff barriers to trade, and which I helped as local organizer at election time, had given a definite pledge on behalf of the Liberals of Canada, to remedy the long standing financial and economic injustice to the Canadian people due to the shackles imposed upon commercial and economic progress by the Bank Act which farms out the national credit to private interests for their profit rather than for the nation's welfare.

Your pledge, given in parliament in 1934 and which formed the chief plank in the Liberal platform when they were returned to power under your leadership is widely known and well remembered. It is as follows:

"Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to the government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile. . . . To regain for the nation what has thus been lost will continue to be the first objective of Liberal effort."

That pledge is incorporated in the speech from the throne reported on page 17 of the 1936 Hansard, after your government took office, in the following words:

"The control of credit, and the issue of currency, being public matters of direct concern to every citizen, it is intended, at the present session, to ask parliament to make such changes in the ownership and control of the Bank of Canada, as may be necessary to give to the government a predominant interest in the ownership as well as effective control of the bank."

In the 1936 session of parliament you mentioned for example the development of the tourist trade as a proper and desirable activity of the National Employment Commission. Mr. Bennett agreed, and there was general parliamentary and other agreement on the subject.

That meant highway construction—of necessity involved the spending of money.

What has happened in that regard?

Alberta has the finest scenery in the world but it can't be observed because of bad roads.

In this connection it will be noted that the changes you requested in the set-up of the Bank of Canada were made which enabled your government to control the country's credit and to issue the necessary currency to accomplish on a wide front the building and improving of national highways.

Why did you want the government to have power of control over credit and the issue of currency if that power was not going to be exercised for the people's benefit?

The 1936 session of parliament produced a number of earnest voices insistent that such power be restored to the government and used.

What happened to those voices?

Why were Tucker, and McGeer, and Stitt, and others who last year were insistent upon the people's rights being exercised, silent in the 1937 session? What assurance did you give that induced them to remain silent in the face of an ever growing necessity for action?

The people are asking this and they insist on knowing.

As you are recognized personally as an outstanding authority on economics, your election pledge had more weight than that of a person not so equipped. As you had an unimpeachable private record your word was accepted.

The only suggested explanation of your inertia since then, in the face of a condition of increasing need, would appear to be lack of courage.

Is that the trouble? Or do you now doubt your estimate of existing conditions, and the correctness of your remedy? Or, again, is it your purpose to make the Bank of Canada a useful adjunct to the chartered banking system (to repeat the words of the general manager of the Royal Bank of Canada in his address to the bank shareholders at their annual meeting in January, 1934)?

If you were correct, as we still confidently believe, when are you going to do something about it? You can't wait forever, because people's lives and their living—their hopes for the future are at stake. Old people, too old to get work if it could be had, and too young to get the meagre old age pension—are sick with defeat. Middle aged people, if employed, find their tenure of employment less and less secure, and their remuneration diminishing while living costs rise. If they are unemployed, their spirits are utterly broken by the sense of helplessness and, worse still, of uselessness which grips them. Young people cannot make plans for their life work or for marriage or homes or families of their own, and the spark of ambition is quenched.

Desperate people are apt to take desperate measures and go to any extreme to maintain their God given right to live. And where only the outworn, criminally conceived system, which your government has both the power and a specific mandate from the people to replace, stands in the way of this right, how can they be prevented or blamed for doing so, if you continue to refuse to act?

The time for effective, constructive, intelligent action is overdue.

What are you going to do about it?

The hopes and the prayers of a stricken people are yours as you let your conscience direct your intelligence to effective action in this crisis.

Awaiting your explanation and reply, I am, sir, on behalf of myself and all western Canadians.

Yours sincerely,

A. L. Marks.

Mr. Marks is a well known lawyer and a respected citizen of Edmonton. I hope the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Deachman) and the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) will take notice of these things. To repeat what the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Mitchell) said yesterday, Alberta is not playing a game; she is tackling a problem which the Prime Minister of this country promised the country he himself would tackle. With these remarks I ask the house to take notice that we in this corner are insisting upon a solution of the problem which confronts Canada.

Mr. J. J. DUFFUS (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I did not desire to interrupt the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) while he was speaking, but I think it may be fairly said that had the Hon. Mr. Howson, leader of the Liberal party, promised the people of Alberta $50 a month in the last Alberta election he would have carried the election.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. P. J. ROWE (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, I represent a riding, that of Athabaska, which is in the area known as the park land section of Alberta. Into that area during the last five or six years have come farmers from the dust bowl of the west, men who have been defeated in their efforts to make a living there, and are now pioneering in Alberta under conditions very closely approximating those which our ancestors had to face in Ontario a hundred years ago. They have come into that area without their implements, or with just the remnants of them, and such stock, as they were able to save from the wreck. This summer, when I was there, I found them heroically facing conditions which, had I the time to tell hon. members here about, I am sure would deepen their feelings of sympathy and respect for the courage and fortitude of these people who, having seen the things they gave their lives to, broken, are stooping to build them up again with worn-out tools.

One question which the people on the farms are asking—and it is a question that I have always asked myself, born and reared as I was on a farm in Ontario—is, Why are the farmers unable to have the same incomes as the people in the cities? It seems a self-evident truth that the farmers, who are literally feeding and clothing the world, should be entitled, from the standpoint of the social value of the services they render, to remuneration comparable with that received by those who manufacture wool and hides into clothing and shoes, or lumber into chairs and furniture, or those who render services to society professionally. That is a question to which I hope we can begin to find an answer before parliament prorogues.

During the last two weeks members of the house from different parts of Canada have told us about conditions in their various ridings, and I was particularly interested in the speeches made by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Hyndman). I want to congratulate the hon. member for Huron North on the effectual analysis of operating costs which he presented to the house showing the income and expenditures of the farmers of Ontario, analyzing their investments and showing their net income, from which the startling fact emerged that the farmers of Ontario are receiving less remuneration than the wages of a junior office boy, less than one dollar a day, he said. The hon. member for Carleton said that seventy-five per cent of the farms in Ontario were mortgaged. Well, Mr. Speaker, I can say that in the new sections of Athabaska, in the park areas where settlement is taking place under pioneering conditions, the farmers have neither investments nor electric lights. The hon. member for Huron North spoke about the cost of electricity to the farmer, and I just want to say that the farmers in my district have neither electricity nor investments.

The reason I refer to the addresses made by these two gentlemen is that they are members of parties which have alternated in power, administering the affairs of this country for the last seventy years since confederation, and looking at the situation from the standpoint from which any institution or policy or system must be judged, by the fruits it produces, the net results are those pathetic and heart-breaking conditions which have been described by these two hon. members.

I do not know whether other hon. members have noticed it or not, but since coming to Ottawa this session I have been impressed by the fact that among members of all parties—and I have had the pleasure and privilege of talking with members of all parties in the house—I have found a serious undertone, a grave, earnest desire to make a contribution to the solution of the perplexing problems that confront us. As I met these men and talked in a heart to heart fashion with them, my feeling of comradeship and respect has been deepened. It is true they are here to represent different political and economic philosophies; but it seems to me that there is a growing tendency towards the recognition of the fact that we have all failed, and that our common task is to find a way to lay the foundations of a plan that will endure. Indeed, that kindliness and magnanimity, and the evident desire to be friendly, is a characteristic of all the people that I meet, when I meet them man to man.

During the last twenty-five years of my life I have lived and rubbed shoulders in western Canada with people from every land beneath the sun. I have in my riding representatives of most of the races that have come from the older parts of the world, and I find in them the same kindliness. I venture to say that no one of these peoples desires to injure his fellow man in other countries. It makes me think of the words of the great French philosopher, Rousseau, who said, about two hundred years ago, "Men are naturally good. It is by their institutions alone that they become corrupt." If men are naturally good and have a desire to cooperate with each other, surely we can recognize the equal worth of all peoples and races, the common blood and common destiny of mankind, and try in our policies to remember that the world is interdependent culturally, economically, and spiritually, if you will; that we are just beginning to get acquainted; and that we should not do or say anything, or institute any policy which would injure or invade the rights of people in other countries.

I can never forgive Herbert Spencer for having written that manifesto, on which I believe the constitution of Japan was founded, in which he said that society flourishes by the antagonism of its atoms. I believe on the contrary that the obvious golden truth is that constructive cooperation and not destructive combativeness is the rule by which we must be guided, because the former is the first principle of life upon which the universe is founded, the principle of self-preservation by which we seek to avoid friction. That is true of every atom in life and of every individual in society. We must seek the minimum of frustration and the avoidance of friction.

Just the other day there came to my desk a cartoon called Two Mules, a fable for the Nations. In the first cartoon two mules are pictured tied together with a rope. There are two stacks of hay, one on each side of the mules which are tethered in such a way that by going together they can reach either stack. They are looking at the hay in pleasurable anticipation. In the second picture each is straining to reach the stack nearest him and pulling against the other. In the third picture they are kicking, each refusing to go with the other. All they lack is understanding; they do not know how to cooperate. In the fourth picture they have decided to sit down and talk it over, and there is a large interrogation mark between them. The hay is still there. In the fifth picture they decide to cooperate constructively and they are consuming the hay. They are both standing by one of the stacks. In the last picture they are eating the other stack.

I am not going to suggest that we should have horse sense; perhaps that is too much to expect of the human family; but I do suggest that we have at least mule sense.

Five hundred years ago the Indians ruled this country and the standard of living they enjoyed was measured by their collective capacity to produce wealth. The very young children and the very old men and women lived off the surplus that could be produced by those who caught fish in the lakes and rivers and game in the forest. The one yardstick by which the Indians measured their standard of living was their collective capacity to produce wealth. If there was a bad year, then, of course, they were short; perhaps there was famine; but in a good year everybody was happy.

I want to draw a little picture of what would have happened among the Indians had their wise counsellors and leaders, their medicine men, if you like, informed them that a policy of "scarcity" had been decided upon and that a certain percentage of the strong young men should go back into the stockade, sit down and twiddle their thumbs, notwithstanding the fact that the rivers and lakes were teeming with fish and the woods were filled with game. Another percentage of young men, let us say, were asked to go into the northern part of the country and dig a curious yellow metal out of the ground, transport it laboriously to the mouth of the Hudson river and bury it in another hole in the ground. Because that metal could not be eaten, because it could not be worn or burned to warm them in their wigwams, the labour that these men performed in the production and transport of gold was all wasted. It was not wealth at all, and those who toiled in the forest and on the rivers and lakes to produce game and fish had to support these men who had dug up this gold. Then it was decided that a certain percentage should engage in the production of goods for shipment abroad; there was to be foreign trade. So that notwithstanding the fact that these goods were needed at home these men had to go to work and produce a certain quantity of goods to be shipped out of the country. Then, because it was necessary for some of the men to leave the country sometimes to fight for the right to continue sending abroad goods that were needed at home, a certain percentage of braves had to undergo training in order to engage in death duels with members of other tribes. And they, too, had to be fed and clothed.

I wonder how long it would have taken those young braves to discover that their witch-doctors and medicine-men were nothing but imbeciles to be locked up or put out of the way as painlessly as possible. Yet that is an accurate picture of what is going on in Canada to-day. Last year the nations of the world produced and distributed, by borrowing, fifteen billions worth of armaments and munitions. Every dollar of that was wasted; every dollar of it came out of useful labour. If the people in other countries bought from us metals which were used in the manufacture of war materials their governments had to tax them to pay for these commodities, and therefore their standard of living was reduced exactly by the cost of these implements of war. I do not think there can be any answer to that.

I have observed a few things which I wish to call to the attention of hon. members with respect to foreign affairs and our foreign policy. In the first place I wish to commend warmly the action of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in going to Berlin last year. I covet for Canada leadership in the direction of instituting measures which will reduce the cause of the friction, fear, animosity and antagonism which exist between ourselves and that great nation, a nation that has established itself as one of the foremost among the peoples of the world in science and art and culture. Anything that can be done to break down prejudices, to assure these people that we do not desire their harm, is all to the good. But I wonder whether the Prime Minister did not make a slip in Paris, because there seems to be a conflict between his views and those of the hon. member (Mr. Francœur) who moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne. He said that we do not intend to engage in foreign wars; that we do not intend anything but defence. Yet the Prime Minister said that if Britain finds herself in trouble she will find Canada at her side. There seems to be a contradiction there. I call attention to the fact that those interests which we might be called upon to defend in some foreign country were the result of a defect in the present economic system in its development one hundred years ago. The workers who produced that wealth were not paid enough to enable them to buy back the goods, and therefore there came about the rise of capital investments by Great Britain in other countries. These capital investments have proved a boomerang, because when they were used to develop industries abroad Britain found herself in competition with other countries as a result of the export of her surplus. I want it clearly understood as far as I am concerned that if patriotism means the art of inducing someone who has no interests at home to defend someone else's interests abroad, then we had better revise our idea of patriotism. I suggest further that it takes neither moral nor physical courage to arrange wars for other people to fight. Most hon. members are beyond the age to be conscripted, but I suggest that we should be very careful about the policies we institute, policies of foreign trade which give rise to conflict resulting in war. It is very easy to launch such policies, but it would be a different thing if we were made to go out and fight for policies that we initiated.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his broadcast on September 19, said:

> Canada is anxious and prepared to do whatever lies within her power to promote the widest measure of international cooperation.

I read in the Canadian Press dispatch from New York of February 4:

> Canada prepares for her display at New York fair.
> Plans for Canadian participation in the New York World's Fair next year moved ahead to-day as fair officials announced the dominion had contracted for 40,000 square feet of space and would send destroyers and airplanes as a ceremonial gesture.

That is a peculiar kind of "ceremonial gesture".

Then there is the question of our policy of defence. The statement of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), in initiating what he calls an "adequate policy" of defence, that it is necessary to keep down subversive elements from within, has been repeated many times in the house. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) said repeatedly last year and again this year that the way to control subversive elements is to remove the cause. That is a sound principle. I mention that to show members of the government that there appears to be something there which requires explanation. I believe that most if not all of the so-called moral diseases of mankind are due to the abnormal conditions under which people have been compelled to live. If that is true, obviously the cure consists in nothing less than removing the cause. And the cause is to be found in the conflict arising out of competition, competition that is unnecessary. We have to ask ourselves whether if we were to utilize the productive capacity of our machinery in the factories and the farms of this country with a view to producing goods and services to be consumed by our people, it is possible to produce enough for all. I think it is. Therefore I suggest that a system based upon competition has now become outworn and is an anachronism. It is necessary now to undertake some mental readjustment to keep pace with the changing needs of society. I would also call attention to the rather optimistic suggestion in the speech from the throne to the effect that conditions in Canada are fairly good, and suggest that it is a mistake to measure them by comparison with what has happened in the past or what is happening in other countries. The only accurate measure of value when we are evaluating the soundness of our policies is, what is it possible to do with the machinery we have?

I should like to congratulate the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) on the broadcasts which he has made throughout Canada about our natural resources. Of course it is commonly understood that education is vested in the provinces; but this form of education is in my opinion invaluable, in creating an informed, enlightened, intelligent public opinion by disseminating factual and scientific information about Canada and what we possess. But I should like to suggest that our great mineral wealth is badly needed to provide the comforts of life for our own people. I should like to see our mineral wealth diverted from channels of destruction into channels of construction. I should like to think that our wealth is to be used to minister to the needs of our people rather than to assist ourselves and others in preparations for mutual extermination.

This is not the time to go in any great detail into the many defects and abuses which we are here to remedy, but may I suggest that there are one or two things we should bear in mind. In my own experience in the commercial life of this country for about twenty-five years I have observed some glaring defects. While we all recognize the complexity of our problems and that one nation alone cannot solve the world's problems, yet there are measures that can be taken here in Canada as a first step towards the removal of these abuses.

I am familiar with the affairs of a town in western Canada which in 1912 to 1915 borrowed $80,000 on long term debentures. Those debentures were issued at a discount; from the proceeds of the sale the people received $71,000. Prior to 1937 they have paid back $95,000 and still owe $150,000. That is not an isolated case, Mr. Speaker; that illustrates the effect of one of the greatest drains upon our purchasing power in Canada. I could apply the same principle to the Canadian National Railways. The interest on the stocks and bonds of that company, if it averaged five per cent and were paid regularly for twenty years, would be equal to the entire capital invested in that company, and still we would have to pay it over and over and over again, every generation. That is one of the problems to which I think we should give careful consideration at this session, and I have no doubt that opportunities will arise to permit that to be done.

Another abuse is gambling in futures on the grain exchange. I have before me a short article taken from Common Sense for January, 1938, in which the writer, Mr. Ernest Macdougall, points out:

> The futures market is a parasitical overgrowth on the body of the commodity market. The annual business of the grain futures gambling market runs to four billion dollars, and the commissions of grain futures brokers amount to one hundred million dollars a year. Divided among five hundred futures brokers, that is a prize worth fighting for! And this has nothing to do with the commissions paid on the actual sale and delivery of actual commodities.

I hope to have something more to say on that question a little later on in the session. Broadly speaking, I think the answer to our problem is increased production. I have under my hand a short article from another issue of Common Sense, that of November, 1937, by Congressman Allen of Pennsylvania. I should like to put on Hansard his conclusions with regard to the situation across the line, because it closely approximates our own. He says:

> In spite of the earnest attempts of the Roosevelt administration the share of the workers in the national income produced was less in 1936 than in 1929. The owners of our industrial machinery, however, pocketed $4,573,000,000 in dividends in 1936 or an increase of 50 per cent over 1935. During the same time the total income of the workers was held down to an increase of only 14 per cent. Commodities are manufactured to be sold. They cannot be sold so long as people do not have sufficient income to buy them. In this machine age mass consumption is a prime requisite. Under the conditions described above we have stifled our own customers. They are helpless. At the same time huge profits have been directed into the pockets of a small number of our people whose consuming power is limited and whose surplus wealth is invested, if at all, in new mechanical equipment designed to produce a constantly increased amount of goods which our people cannot consume. The abuse of technological improvements is constantly threatening to make the machine a curse instead of a blessing to labour. It has brought unemployment and poverty when it could bring security and abundance. Much of our liberal legislation, intended to eliminate unemployment, raise wages and increase production, has been thwarted. We have in many respects actually played into the hands of those whose privileges we sought to curb. Instead of halting them we have set in motion the very forces that nearly ruined us in 1929.
> Scarcity and contraction are impossible in this machine age. No longer can we "plough under" our labour force, and mechanical equipment. We must expand our output and then make that output available to those who need it. The creation of more wealth alone can solve the economic problem of the underprivileged without inflicting hardships on other classes of our people.

I think we have some food for serious thought there.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before sitting down I should like to suggest that there are steps we can take in Canada. We can plan for the utilization of our resources to a far greater extent than we are doing. I have before me a copy of Wonders of World Engineering, for August, 1937, published in London, England. At page 730 I read:

> The hydrogen gas is made from coke in a special plant and the total raw coal consumption at Billingham for the 100,000 tons of petrol made directly from coal each year is 500,000 tons.

That shows that with our great coal resources in Alberta, in addition to the raw oil in the Turner valley and the oil contained in the Athabaska tar sands we have great quantities of oil in our coal, and that oil already is being commercially extracted.

The other day I read in the Regina Star of January 22 a proposal for the irrigation of the western prairies. The writer, Mr. Cleugh, suggested that by piping streams such as the Bow river and the Saskatchewan river high enough upstream, we could run the water by gravity over the prairies and turn them into a garden. I suggest that we should divert some of the $50,000,000 a day used by the world last year in the construction of armaments with which to destroy the people of the world into a constructive channel such as that, in order to feed the world. If the world spent fifteen billion dollars last year on armaments, this means that $50,000,000 was spent every day for 300 days, taking out two weeks for holidays and every Sunday, when we knocked off to pray for peace. We might divert that money and that labour into a constructive channel and show the people of the world that we are ready to cooperate in feeding them and supplying their wants rather than in preparing to destroy them.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wonder what we are going to say to the young people and the unemployed in this country. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said the other day, I feel that we should stay here until, working together, we have formulated a plan that will be the beginning of the solution of the problems which confront us. So far as I am concerned I do not think parliament should prorogue until some plan of that kind has been found.

I am confronted now with the question of how I shall vote on this motion and the amendment thereto. I have been forced to indulge in some destructive criticism; but I am sure members of the government appreciate the fact that these defects and abuses exist, and no doubt they are as anxious as I am to solve them.

The question in regard to the amendment is this: Is it a sound principle to suggest that free trade could ever conceivably cause friction among the nations of the world? My idea of trade is that we should export only that surplus required to bring in those goods which we cannot produce advantageously within Canada. To make effective our domestic market; to rearrange and bring up the wages of farmers and workers in the country so as to absorb more of the domestic market, and to undertake to remove from our trade arrangements with other nations retaliatory and discriminatory tariffs which hamper and thwart other nations from developing their own economy, must, in my view, be the ideal and ultimate goal of world trade.

I cannot conceive of free trade being the cause of war. I will grant hon. members this, that under our present competitive price and profit system difficulties do exist; but I have been a student of international affairs for some time, and I am most anxious to do everything possible to alleviate and disarm the fears of people in other countries. Therefore, on that one point alone, I have decided to vote with the government.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, on this occasion I wish to confine my remarks to a paragraph from the speech from the throne, the implications of which I consider fundamental to successful democratic government in Canada. I refer to the paragraph concerning contemplated amendments to the British North America Act. What I have to say on this important subject I shall say not from a partisan point of view or even as the representative, particularly, of the electors in my constituency. Rather I shall speak as a Canadian representing the Canadian people.

Since elected to this house I have been deeply interested in the constitutional position obtaining in Canada. I am sorry to be compelled to relate that my investigations into the subject have sadly disillusioned me on many matters. I hope it will not be considered presumptuous for a back-bencher, without law school diplomas, to express opinions on a subject as intricate as constitutional law. I approach the question more from the point of view of the average citizen who wishes to know the why and wherefore of all he sees and hears.

Speaking on this question the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) referred to the methods employed by other British dominions, notably Australia and South Africa, in amending their constitutions. After reading the constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia, and the method by which the people of Australia amend it, I wondered, since the enactment of the Statute of Westminster of 1931 which made Canadian citizens politically independent of the imperial parliament, why we have not the same privilege with respect to a constitution.

I am pleased to note that the speech from the throne mentions the Statute of Westminster, and indicates that it is being recognized as an effective measure.

In considering the present constitutional position in Canada I find myself faced with the situation referred to by Professor Keith in his book, The Sovereignty of the British Dominions. At page 201 he says:

> Those who claim autonomy for Canada naturally cannot acquiesce in a position under which the supremacy of the imperial parliament is insistent and undeniable. A sovereign state whose constitution can only be altered by another power is a contradiction in adjecto.

The more one studies these matters, the more contradictions he finds. In order to have an intelligent understanding of our constitutional status I have spent considerable time in making a study of the history surrounding the passing of the British North America Act. All the evidence I have been able to gather compels me to entertain grave doubts as to whether or not any individual member of this assembly has authority, or whether as a group we have authority to legislate as a parliament. I have discovered what in my opinion are discrepancies both in the British North America Act and in the historical record. I trust I am doing an acceptable service in bringing some of these matters to the attention of the house, the legal authorities in which may be able to provide me with the necessary enlightenment.

In Hansard of April 1, 1936, the leader of the opposition is quoted as saying that the preamble is an important part of a bill. I wish to discuss the preamble to the British North America Act, as we find it in the printed copies. In order to indicate the importance of a preamble I shall quote the observations of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) in the debate which took place on the wheat bill. I quote from Hansard of April 1, 1936.

> Mr. Bennett: Parliament for the first time within my knowledge . . . is asked to pass a preamble . . . that is not supported by documents attached as schedules to the bill. A preamble is rather an important part of a bill. . . . A preamble is useful when you are endeavouring to interpret the legislation in respect to it. . . . In private bills it is essential to establish by competent testimony every fact inserted in the preamble. . . .
> Mr. Mackenzie King: My right hon. friend will, I think, agree that there is no better authority on legislative methods and forms than Sir Courtenay Ilbert, Parliamentary Council to the Treasury. At page 269 of his treatise "Legislative Methods and Forms," I find the following with respect to preambles: "As a rule a preamble is unnecessary in a public bill. Where the object is merely to describe briefly the reason for and the intended effect of the proposed legislation, the object can often be better obtained by prefixing a short explanatory memorandum to the bill. Such a memorandum should state concisely the existing law, the reasons for amendment and the effect of the proposed amendments. A local bill must always have a preamble, the recital in which must be proved."
>
> Mr. Cahan: And they must be proved.
>
> Mr. Mackenzie King: My hon. friend says they must be proved. That is correct. . . . Then the only remaining point at issue is whether or not the preamble contains an exact recital of facts.
>
> Mr. Bennett: And whether it has been proven . . .

I would direct the attention of hon. members to a particular statement of the leader of the opposition as reported at page 1695, where he states:

> In every case unless the preamble is proven before the committee, the bill fails.

The gist of the argument would seem to be, then, that the language in the preamble must be consistent; the recital of the words must be in accordance with the facts, and unless the preamble can be proven the bill fails. Let us in the light of these facts examine the preamble to the British North America Act. Let us ask of the preamble these questions: Is the language in the preamble consistent? Is the recital of the words in the preamble in accordance with facts? Can the preamble be proven? Was the preamble proven?

In order to make sure that we are not starting out on a false premise I wish to submit a few historical facts which will substantiate that the British North America Act is a private act, or a public act resembling a private act. As the British North America Act did not affect the entire empire, but was restricted to the three colonies enumerated, and further restricted in its scope to north America, it was a private bill in its relation to the parliament by which it was enacted. Sir John A. Macdonald, in his letter of July 18, 1889, to Lord Knutsford, said this:

> The union was treated by them much as if the British North America Act were a private bill uniting two or three English parishes.

Let us now turn to the first question on the preamble: Is the language in the preamble consistent? Before proceeding with that question I should like to read the preamble to the British North America Act. I hold in my hand a photostatic copy of the preamble to that act, which reads as follows:

An act for the union of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and the government thereof, and for purposes connected therewith.

Whereas the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one dominion under the crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom;

Before we can determine whether or not the language in the preamble is consistent, there are two terms in the preamble which, I think, we must define. Those are "federally united" and "one dominion." Are these terms synonymous, or are they the antithesis of each other? Bouvier, in his law dictionary, says of the words "federal government" that it consists of "a union or confederation of sovereign states, created either by treaty, or by the mutual adoption of a federal constitution."

Doctor Ollivier, law clerk of the House of Commons, at page 85 of the evidence of the special committee on the British North America Act in 1935, says this:

A confederation is a union of independent and sovereign states bound together by a pact or a treaty for the observance of certain conditions dependent upon the unanimous consent of the contracting parties, who are free to withdraw from the union.

It is quite apparent, Mr. Speaker, from these definitions that the status of sovereignty must precede confederation and that a federal union can be consummated only by the mutual consent of contracting states, adopting a constitution.

Now as to the term "dominion." What is a dominion? Is a dominion the same as a federal union? Before the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus the term dominion was used to denote a state or country that was dominated by the imperial parliament. Wales is called a "dominion" in the Acts of Henry VIII as in article 25 of the Treaty of Union, 1707. The Isle of Man was also known as a dominion. Newfoundland, the first colony of England in America, was a dominion founded by Sir Humphrey Gilbert in 1583. Virginia, founded by Sir Walter Raleigh, was a dominion, and is known to-day by the name of "The Old Dominion" in the United States of America.

[Mr. Kuhl.]

Section 18, paragraph 3, of the Interpretation Act of 1889 says this:

The expression "colony" shall mean any of Her Majesty's dominions. . . .

We see, then, that a dominion was nothing more than a colony. Do these definitions not indicate that a federal union and a dominion are opposed in nature; that one is the antithesis of the other? How then could the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick be federally united into one dominion? Is this not a positive contradiction? Furthermore, how could a colony have a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom?

The next question we were to consider was, Is the recital of the words in the preamble in accordance with facts? Did the provinces express the desire to be federally united into one dominion? Before discussing the desire of the provinces I believe it would be well to indicate the constitutional status of the provinces before the British North America Act was passed. As all hon. members know, the province of Canada governed herself for more than twenty-five years prior to the passing of the British North America Act, by the Act of Union of 1840. I wish to quote a few sections from the Act of Union to indicate the nature of the government at that time.

3. Her Majesty shall have power by and with the advice and consent of said legislative council and assembly to provide for the peace, order and good government of the province of Canada . . . and that such laws being passed by the said legislative council and assembly and assented to by Her Majesty or assented in Her Majesty's name by the governor general of the province of Canada shall be valid and tending to all intents and purposes within the province of Canada.

44. Taxes shall be levied by Her Majesty in such manner only as shall be directed by any law or laws which may be made by Her Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the legislative council and assembly of such province.

61. In this act, unless otherwise expressed therein the words "acts of the legislature of the province of Canada" are to be understood to mean an act of Her Majesty, heirs or successors, enacted by Her Majesty with the advice and consent of the legislative council and assembly of the province of Canada and the words "governor of the province of Canada" are to be understood as comprehending the governor or person authorized to execute the office of governor of the said province.

In 1854 the imperial parliament passed, in response to an address of the legislative assembly, an act to empower the legislature to alter the constitution of the legislative council. imperial act 17-18 Victoria, chapter 118. The first election of councillors took place in the summer of 1856. Twelve members were elected to the legislative council every two years to hold office for eight years and could be reelected. In 1862 the speaker of the legislative council was elected by the members, Sir Allan MacNab being chosen speaker. In the twenty-seven years between 1840 and 1867, during which time Canada enjoyed responsible government, no act of the province was disallowed. Mr. Gladstone in the British Hansard of March 28, 1867, at page 754, states:

> We have for a full quarter of a century acknowledged absolutely the right of self-government in the colonies.

The words "federally united" in the preamble are equivalent to the recognition and acceptance by the imperial parliament of the status of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, that they were free and competent to sign a compact to which they, without coercion, would mutually agree. Now, what was the desire expressed by the provinces? The preamble to the Quebec resolutions states:

> The best interests and present and future prosperity of British North America will be promoted by a federal union under the crown.

Section 70 of these resolutions states:

> The sanction of the imperial and local parliaments shall be sought for the union of the provinces on the principles adopted by the conference.

The bill drafted in London by the delegates from the provinces, and presented by the Hon. John A. Macdonald to Lord Carnarvon, Secretary of State for the Colonies, contains a reiteration of this desire in the following words:

> Whereas the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, have expressed their desire to form a federal union under the crown—

In order further to determine the desire expressed by the provinces, let us examine the manner in which the bill was drafted and presented. The act was drafted by the law officers of the crown attached to the colonial office. Lord Carnarvon was chairman. I quote Sir Frederick Rogers, Under Secretary for the Colonies:

> They held many meetings at which I was always present. Lord Carnarvon was in the chair, and I was rather disappointed in his power of presidency.

That is taken from Lord Blachford's letters, page 301.

The law officers of the crown drafted the bill to guide the delegates, the title and preamble of which read respectively:

> The union of the British North American colonies, and for the government of the united colony.

And the preamble:

> Whereas the union of the British North American colonies for purposes of government and legislation would be attended with great benefits to the colonies and be conducive to the interests of the United Kingdom.

This was the desire of the colonial office, and it appears that it prevailed over the desire of the provinces, which read:

> Whereas the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to form a federal union under the British crown for the purpose of government and legislation, based upon the principles of the British constitution—

Why was Lord Carnarvon chairman of the delegates from Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick? Is this not a violation of natural law?

Consider this: If the British North America Act contained in some measure the desire expressed by the provinces, would it not have been simply a matter of common courtesy on the part of the noble lord who was chairman of the delegates from Canada, and who introduced the bill in the House of Lords, to have at least returned a copy of the act for the consideration and consent of the local legislatures?

Let us now consider how the act was presented. In presenting the bill to the House of Lords, Lord Carnarvon, Secretary of State for the Colonies, and chairman when the bill was being drafted, asserts that:

> The bill opens by reciting the desire of the several provinces to be federally united.

That will be found in the British Hansard of February 19, 1867, page 559. When presented, the Quebec resolutions were attached to the bill as an enunciation of the motives prompting or impelling the colonial office to present the measure, for on the second reading, on February 26, Lord Campbell says:

> The bill is founded, I believe, on what is termed the Quebec scheme of 1864 . . . . Our lights indeed may be imperfect upon this part of the subject, and I will not dwell upon it. But one thing is clear: The preamble of the resolution comes before us in full and perfect authenticity.

That will be found in the British Hansard of February 26, 1867, page 1012.

The present preamble as printed was not debated.

The act was not yet printed, as is evidenced by the excerpts from the speeches in the House of Commons. I should like now to quote Mr. Hadfield, as reported at page 1090 of the British Hansard of February 27, 1867:

> Mr. Hadfield said he rose to ask of the government why it was the second reading of this bill had been fixed for to-morrow. It was one which affected 4,000,000 of people and upon which great doubts and differences of opinion were entertained. It was not yet printed and was of so important a character that he thought some little time ought to elapse after it was in the hands of the members before it was introduced, in order that some little consultation should take place upon it. He was not at all sure that he should be opposed to it but he certainly required more time to consider it.

On the following day, February 28, at page 1195 of the British Hansard, Mr. Hadfield is reported as follows:

He (Mr. Hadfield) thought that a bill of such great importance ought not to be passed through parliament with such haste. It was read a third time in the House of Lords, only on Tuesday night, and two days after they were called to give it a second reading in that house (Commons). That was a bad precedent to establish and might produce ill effect at another time. If the bill had been delayed only for a few weeks, the people of Nova Scotia would have been able to express an opinion upon it. He had not had time to consider either the bill itself or the papers on the subject which had been put into his hands.

I have another quotation which casts light on the manner in which the matter was presented. It will be found in the British Hansard of February 28, 1867, at page 1179. Mr. Bright said:

I have heard there is at present in London a petition complaining of the hasty proceedings of parliament and asking for delay, signed by 31,000 adult males of the province of Nova Scotia, and that petition is in reality signed by at least half of all the male inhabitants of that province. So far as I know, the petition does not protest absolutely against union but against the manner in which it is being carried out by this scheme and bill and by the hasty measures of the colonial office. . . . Nobody pretends that the people of Canada prefer a nominated council to an elective council . . . to put seventy men in that council for life inserts into the whole scheme the germ of a malady which will spread and which before long will require an alteration of this act, and of the constitution of this new confederation. . . . I am satisfied . . . that we run a great danger of making this act work ill from almost the beginning. . . . There is no part of the world in my opinion which runs less risk of aggression than Canada. . . . No political party in America ever dreamed for a moment of aggression upon Canada or of annexing Canada by force. And therefore every farthing you spend upon fortresses . . . is money squandered. through an hallucination we ought to get rid of. . . . For my share I want the population of these provinces to do that which they believe the best for their own interest—remain with this country if they like, in the most friendly manner, or become independent states if they like.

Is it not quite apparent from this evidence, Mr. Speaker, that the desire expressed by the provinces was for a federal union and for nothing but that?

I have searched many records and nowhere have I been able to find that the provinces expressed the desire to be federally united into one dominion. I ask hon. members, Can the preamble to the British North America Act, in the light of this evidence, be said to be an exact recital of facts?

Before answering the last two questions regarding the preamble which I asked in the early part of my address, there is one other question which may very well be answered first: Did the British North America Act do for the provinces what they desired it to do? Or, putting it in other words; Did the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick become a confederation or a federal union through the British North America Act? In reply to that question could we not very well ask: Had the provinces federated, would not an agreement or a pact have had to be signed? Had an agreement been signed, would we not have a record of it? Would we not at least have had a certified copy of the act?

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that notwithstanding that the imperial parliament recognized Canada as being responsible since 1840, Canada was reduced to the position of a colony by the British North America Act. Canada did not become a federal union or a confederation but was demoted to the status of a colony under the name of "dominion." An important piece of evidence on this point is, I believe, a statement by Sir John Bourinot in Canada under British Rule, chapter 8, page 215, in which he says:

It is interesting to know that in the original draft of the bill the united provinces were called the Kingdom of Canada, but when it came eventually before parliament, they were designated as "the dominion of Canada," and the writer had it from Sir John A. Macdonald himself that this amendment did not emanate from the colonial delegates, but from the imperial ministry.

In order that we might know definitely the constitutional status Canada attained through the British North America Act, the imperial parliament defined the term "dominion" in section 18, paragraph 3 of The Interpretations Act of 1889, which reads:

The expression "colony" shall mean any of Her Majesty's dominions exclusive of the British islands and of British India; and where parts of such dominions are under both a central legislature and local legislatures, all parts under the central legislature shall, for the purpose of this definition, be deemed to be one colony.

Excepting Canada, no country in the empire had a central legislature and local legislatures; therefore, twenty-two years after the enactment of the British North America Act, Canada is deemed to be one colony. Prior to 1867 her majesty could act only by and with the advice and consent of the legislative council and assembly of the province of Canada. Members of both the legislative assembly and the legislative council were elected by the people. The members of the legislative council elected their speaker. According to the provisions of the British North America Act, the members of the legislative council are appointed by the governor general. The Speaker is appointed and can be removed at his discretion. Members of the privy council are appointed to aid and advise him and can be removed at his discretion. Canada lost all power of self-government through the British North America Act.

Sir John A. Macdonald protested against the British North America Act while it was being drafted as well as later. If hon. members will take the trouble to refer to Pope's Confederation Documents they will find a written protest of Sir John A. Macdonald's against the British North America Act. In the forepart of the book we find a copy of the draft of the bill, the title of which reads:

Draft of a bill for the union of the British North American colonies, and for the government of the united colony.

Judging from the way in which the page is disfigured, Sir John A. Macdonald was not agreeable to this. Alongside it we find in his own handwriting what he desired, and it reads:

Whereas the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to form a federal union for the purposes of government and legislation, based on the principles of the British constitution. . . .

And in a letter to Lord Knutsford, dated July 18, 1889, Sir John said:

Had a different course been pursued—for instance, had united Canada been declared to be an auxiliary kingdom, as it was in the Canadian draft of the bill, I feel sure (almost) that the Australian colonies would ere this, have been applying to be placed in the same rank as the kingdom of Canada.

Now, as to the last two questions: Can the preamble be proven? Was the preamble proven? The evidence which I have submitted proves conclusively, I believe, that a dominion and a colony were identical; that to be federally united an agreement must be signed; that no compact or agreement was signed; that to be federally united into one dominion was an impossibility; that the provinces did not express their desire to be federally united into one dominion. I ask, therefore: How can the preamble be proven? Furthermore, if the preamble cannot be proven to-day, how could it have been proven in 1867? My opinion, therefore, based upon the evidence which I have submitted, is similar to that expressed by the leader of the opposition on the wheat bill of 1936. Speaking to the preamble the leader of the opposition said, as reported at page 1694 of Hansard of 1936:

I do not think the Prime Minister would desire that the house should give its support to a preamble which is not in accordance with the facts. I point out that the language which is employed in this preamble is not even consistent, and is not in accordance with the facts.

That is exactly my opinion with regard to the preamble to the British North America Act. I wish to repeat the statement of the leader of the opposition as reported on page 1695:

. . . in every case, unless the preamble is proven before the committee, the bill fails.

The preamble to the British North America Act was not proven and could not be proven, as it is incapable of proof. Therefore the bill fails. If the foregoing be true, then I submit that the British North America Act is null and void.

To suggest that we refer this evidence to the courts would be in my opinion another way of sidestepping our responsibility in the matter. As it is impossible to submit all the evidence in this debate, I suggest that the house should consider the question in committee of the whole. In order to suggest what must be done under the circumstances to rectify the present situation I wish to quote some evidence given by eminent Canadian constitutional authorities to the special committee on the British North America Act in 1935. Hon. members would do well to take heed of the evidence given by eminent constitutional authorities in Canada. The logical question, after one peruses the evidence, which I have submitted is: Where do we go from here? I believe the answer was very well suggested in the evidence that was given to the committee. Professor Norman McLeod Rogers, now Minister of Labour, was giving evidence at this particular time. As reported at page 116 of the evidence Mr. Cowan asked this question:

You get back to this: your start is another interprovincial conference?

The answer was:

I am afraid it is. I see no feasible alternative.

Hon. Mr. Lapointe: There is no doubt about it.

I wish now to quote Doctor W. P. M. Kennedy, professor of Law of the university of Toronto. At page 69 he is reported as follows:

I think we have got to get away from the idea that the British North America Act is a "contract" or "treaty." I do not want to go into that, but it is true neither in history nor in law. The British North America Act is a statute, and has always been interpreted as a statute. Suppose now we assume that it is necessary to have constituent powers in Canada, powers to change the constitution. (sic) I approach that problem from two angles. First of all I want to break the British North America Act up. We have got to ask ourselves, Is the dead hand of the past to be constantly laid with numbing effect on the body politic? That is really what it amounts to . . . If we in Canada are not capable of interpreting our own constitution we should not have a legislature at all.

I quote now Doctor Skelton, Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, at page 27:

Now it might be said, Why not trust to growth of convention or custom altogether for the necessary changes in our constitution? The obvious answer, I think, is that the process is too slow, and is applicable only in cases where unanimity has been reached.

And at page 42:

No other country in the world looks to the parliament of another country for the shaping of its constitution. This solution would only be supported if we believe that Canadians are the only people so incompetent that they cannot work out a solution of their constitutional problem, and so biased that they alone among the peoples of the world cannot be trusted to deal fairly with the various domestic interests concerned. . . .

It is not safe to leave the question open and ambiguous indefinitely; for at any time a dispute on a concrete issue may arise.

. . . To retain permanently the intervention of the parliament of the United Kingdom is either superfluous or dangerous.

Doctor Maurice Ollivier says, at page 55:

Furthermore our constitution is a law adopted by the British parliament exercising its incontestable right of sovereignty towards its colonies. . . . This explains the fact that the British North America Act is not a reproduction of the Quebec resolutions.

I should like now to quote Doctor Beauchesne, the worthy clerk of this house. I believe Doctor Beauchesne should be highly commended for the very progressive suggestions he made to this committee. They are found at page 125, as follows:

It is quite true that if we apply to the British North America Act the principles followed in the interpretation of statutes it is not a compact between provinces; it is an act of parliament which does not even embody all the resolutions passed in Canada and in London prior to its passage in the British parliament where certain clauses that had not been recommended by the Canadian provinces were added. . . .

The Statute of Westminster has altered our status. . . . What we want is a new constitution.

The new constitution must leave nobody with a grievance.

[Mr. Kuhl.]

A spirit of conciliation should predominate. For these reasons, the task must be entrusted to an independent body in which all the elements of the country will be represented.

I want the assembly to sit in a city in the west. It would not be necessary for a delegate to be a member of parliament or of a provincial legislature.

I would suggest that the assembly do not sit in Ottawa, in order that it may not have the appearance of being dominated, or even influenced by the dominion power; and, as the western provinces are of such paramount importance in the country, I suggest the best city for the representatives to gather in would be Winnipeg.

Whether our country should be changed from a dominion to a kingdom is also a subject which might be discussed. I would suggest that the country could be called "The Federated States of Canada."

There have been many disputes about provincial rights since 1867 and it seems certain that when a new constitution is drawn up the distribution of federal and provincial powers will have to be modified.

At page 131:

I submit that appeals to the privy council should be dealt with by our constitution. This method would preserve the principle of taking our cases to the highest tribunal without going out of our own country.

At page 132:

If you will allow me, Mr. Chairman, I will just make another suggestion; if we have a constituent assembly and if we discuss the making of a new constitution, I think it is an anomaly that dominion affairs should, to a certain extent, be subject to provincial authority. I would suggest that we have a federal district, taking in about twenty-five square miles on each side of the Ottawa river.

And at page 134:

I would not have any minority rights discussed. There is nothing more dangerous in Canada than a discussion of minority rights. A discussion of them would wreck the whole constituent assembly.

I think the time is ripe for a change in the constitution. I do not think you would need much publicity in order to draw to the attention of the people of this country that the British North America Act is inadequate.

In prefacing my remarks I stated that I was speaking not from a partisan point of view or as representing particularly my constituency in Alberta, but as a Canadian representing the people of Canada. I appeal particularly to hon. members from Ontario and Quebec. From Ontario came William Lyon Mackenzie; from Quebec, Papineau, who were exiled from Canada for their patriotism, and whose followers were imprisoned and hanged. But by their efforts from 1835 to 1837, Ontario and Quebec achieved the right to govern themselves, by the Act of Union of 1840. The right of self-government was taken from Canadians by the British North America Act. No longer do we elect our upper house, or the Speaker of that house, and to-day under this act our enactments are subject to the power of disallowance. The prima facie evidence which I have presented to the house to-day stands upon the record until it is refuted. How, may I ask, is the government to proceed to amend an act the preamble of which cannot be proven? This is manifestly impossible.

I take pleasure, therefore, in placing myself on record in favour of the amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, so far at least as any reference in the speech from the throne concerns an amendment to the British North America Act. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will agree with me when I suggest an interprovincial conference, as they suggested in 1935. That there was no confederation is attested by Doctor Ollivier, Doctor Kennedy, Doctor Skelton and Doctor Beauchesne, also by the incontestable fact that there was no certified copy of the act in Canada, showing that the provinces of Canada were not consulted. In closing, I desire to record my approval of the suggestion made by Doctor Beauchesne, that the provinces choose members for an assembly to construct a constitution, and that the country could be called "The Federated States of Canada."

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, not being a constitutional lawyer or even a member of the legal profession I shall not undertake to deal with the last speaker's observations. I shall leave that to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who some day may reply.

This debate is a free-for-all, the first of the session. I think from the beginning until to-night it has been a real free-for-all. I am going to use this opportunity, not to dwell very long on the speech from the throne but to bring to the attention of the government some matters which in the interest of Canada, I believe, should be dealt with at this session. I think it is generally understood that the speech of his excellency presented at the opening of the session is a means taken by the government to place before parliament the program of legislation which it is intended to deal with during the session. In the first session following the election there was perhaps some excuse for not bringing in a very heavy program to carry out the pledges of the Liberal party during the 1935 election. Then the second session was very brief in order that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) might be able to represent Canada at the coronation and at the imperial conference. But, let me tell the government that the people of Canada expect some action during the present session. Almost three years have passed and nothing has been done to remedy conditions in this country.

Now let us look at this program of legislation and see if there is anything to relieve the serious economic condition that exists among the great masses of our people. It is true that we are to consider the amendment of the British North America Act, if the cooperation of the provinces is forthcoming. We are to deal with the elections and franchise acts. The government proposes to do something about the export of power. The authority of the board of railway commissioners is to be extended. It is hoped that negotiations may so progress as to render it possible to submit to parliament a new trade agreement with the United States.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the program, and I am afraid the Canadian people can take very little comfort from it. I believe they will be very much disappointed when they learn through the press that in the third session of this parliament this is the program brought before parliament by this government to deal with our problems. But we are told in this same speech, "Oh, everything is lovely. Canada has once more returned to prosperity. Look at our export trade." How many times we have heard that during this debate. The other night the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) told us that we are now in fourth place among the exporting nations. "Look at our revenues; they have reached a new high level. As a result more money has poured into the treasury than in any year in the history of this country."

Yes, not only has our export trade increased during the last twelve months, but there has been a steady increase in our export trade ever since the low dip of the depression in 1933. It is true that there was a change of government during that time, but it is some comfort to a few of us on this side of the house to know that the policy of the previous administration has been very closely adhered to. The Ottawa agreements, negotiated by a Conservative government and so vigorously opposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, are mainly responsible for the progress Canada has made in selling her products abroad. Through those agreements the greatest market in the world was opened to Canadian producers. The opening of other channels of trade was bound to follow and added to that increase.

Yes, our statistics show that exports from Canada have increased to a considerable extent during the last twelve months. Natural products and raw materials have been mainly responsible for that increase, raw materials to be consumed by the warring nations and the other great nations in their armament programs. I wonder what would happen to this great export trade of which we boast if this year the nations of the world should cease war and agree to disarm. What would we have in this country? We would present a very fine example of a nation that could not live by export trade alone. Let me put another question: How can this country ever expect to put its great army of unemployed to work if we continue to export our raw materials and buy back manufactured products, giving employment to people of other countries and denying employment to our own people?

Yes, our revenues have reached a new level. As has been pointed out in the debate, these revenues are raised entirely by taxation, so in other words the people of Canada have this year contributed more money in the way of taxes than in any other year in the history of Canada. The Prime Minister tells us this indicates that the country is prosperous; that the $401,000,000 of revenue derived by taxation this year supplies the answer to the amendment which has been moved by my right hon. leader (Mr. Bennett). The Prime Minister also said that these increased revenues indicate the degree of relative prosperity in Canada compared with what it has been in the past. Prosperity! Has prosperity reached our people when at the present time about one-eleventh of our total population is on relief and the average income of the great mass of our people is not sufficient to maintain a decent standard of living? What about the farmers of our country? Are they prosperous? What about the labourers? Are they enjoying prosperity? What about the small business men who have been the backbone of many communities throughout this country? They have been forced on the streets in these last few years by combines and corporations. Is it any wonder that we have a demand from a large section of our people for a change in our system? Is it any wonder that some are looking to social credit and others to socialism as advocated by my friends to my left, or that some are even grasping communism and fascism as a way out? We talk about fighting these isms. Well, I would like to say to the government that the way to fight these isms that we dread so much to-day is not by padlock laws, militia or police forces or amendments to the criminal code. The way to fight these things is to remove the evils of our present system; then these isms will disappear.

[Mr. Barber.]

The people of this country took the Prime Minister at his word during the election campaign. He said that unemployment was a national responsibility; that he would wage a great battle against the moneyed powers. Almost three years have passed. This government has not assumed responsibility for unemployment, and the battle against the moneyed powers has not commenced; not a single gun has been fired. I urge upon the Prime Minister, who has had long experience in public life, who possesses outstanding ability and who is surrounded by able advisers, to direct his efforts towards measures to be brought in during the present session for the purpose of correcting the evils of our economic system.

Dealing with taxation, Mr. Speaker, I want to give one example of how these taxes are applied and how unfair they are in many instances. In the constituency which I have the honour to represent we have several large industries, among them what we call the small fruit industry. Strawberries and raspberries are grown in large quantities and shipped both in the fresh state and in what is called the processed form. In some years we may have extra large crops or weather conditions may be such that we cannot ship in the fresh state. Those berries must be taken care of, and the result has been the erection of jam factories, expensive buildings equipped with expensive machinery. They produce a very fine product, the pure berry and the pure sugar, but lo and behold, that agricultural industry is taxed thirty-one per cent by the federal government, including the sugar taxes and the eight per cent sales tax! I am sorry the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is not in his seat, because I wanted to bring this matter particularly to his attention. I believe there is no other manufactured or semi-manufactured commodity that pays such an exorbitant tax. The question is: Why should the berry industry be singled out from all other agricultural industries to carry this heavy and unjust burden? Why does not the sales tax apply on honey, maple sugar, maple syrup, cheese, butter, canned milk and similar agricultural products? Why does the total taxation on an imported product which is competitive with the jam—I refer to peanut butter—amount to only sixteen per cent, while the jam bears a tax of thirty-one per cent?

When these people sell fresh berries or berries processed in what is known as sulphur dioxide solution they do not pay any of these taxes. When a merchant or a wholesaler sells sugar in any quantity he does not pay a sales tax. But just as soon as a man goes to work and erects an expensive building, equips it with expensive machinery and employs hundreds of people—yes, thousands are employed throughout Canada in the industry—to combine fresh berries with sugar to make jam, he is compelled to pay eight per cent sales tax. I shall leave the matter there, trusting that the Minister of Finance will correct this when it comes to his attention in preparing his budget.

A great deal has been said about the increased radio licence fee. I shall not spend much time upon it, simply to say, on behalf of radio owners and dealers in my constituency I protest against the increased licence fee. If we have an increase to $2.50 this year, we may expect that the corporation will make an effort to increase it to $4 or $5 next year. I believe the matter should be investigated and given a little more consideration, and the business of the corporation should be looked into before permission is given to increase the fee.

One further point I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. A number of producers in British Columbia have been a great deal concerned over reports which have reached them to the effect that the preferences they now enjoy under the Ottawa agreements may be disturbed, and that in the negotiation of the Anglo-American trade arrangements Canada might agree to an extension to United States producers of the preference on such commodities as apples, lumber and fish. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has charged that the leader of the opposition has been responsible for the fear created. I do not think it is necessary to quote the minister's speech in that regard.

Mr. EULER: He said he had helped.

Mr. BARBER: Let me tell the minister that long before the statement was made by my leader the United States press carried a statement to the effect that under their trade arrangement with the United Kingdom their producers would receive preferences similar to those given Canada on lumber, fish and apples. Those reports originated in Washington. According to the press of the United Kingdom it will be necessary to make some changes in the Ottawa agreements, but Canada and other countries will be consulted before those changes are made.

Let me refer to a statement of the minister when, in concluding his observations he said, as reported at page 300 of Hansard:

> This government is not so inept, so unwise or so unpatriotic as to sacrifice the interests of the producers of Canada, whether they be agricultural or industrial, for any reason whatsoever.

Does that statement stand good with respect to concessions from Canada under the Anglo-American trade agreement? I wonder if the minister would make a statement on that point, or was he referring only to a trade agreement between Canada and the United States?

Mr. EULER: Does the hon. member wish me to answer?

Mr. BARBER: Yes.

Mr. EULER: When I spoke yesterday I said that even if I had information or details with regard to negotiations between Canada and the United States, I could not give them. The same must hold true with regard to any possible negotiations going on in which Great Britain may be concerned. But I shall have to leave with my hon. friend my last statement, and that applies all around.

Mr. BARBER: I fear there is little comfort to be taken from that statement. There is another matter to which I should like to draw the attention of the government. I believe the matter I have in mind, namely soldier settlement, comes under the Department of Mines and Resources. I notice on the order paper a resolution urging that the amendment which has been in force for the last two years be renewed for another period. I should not think it necessary to have a resolution on the order paper to urge upon the government the necessity of the amendment. As hon. members know, that amendment refers to the dollar-for-dollar bonus. May I say to the minister that that is the soldier's only hope of reducing his indebtedness. Eighty-three per cent have taken advantage of it. I should hope to see on the order paper one of these days an amendment continuing the provision for another two years.

Sometimes I think our greatest handicap in British Columbia is distance; we are far away from the centre of Canada, far removed from the seat of government. That great distance creates several problems, one of which the farmers in British Columbia have been trying for some time to get the government to solve. I refer to the cost of transporting grain and grain products from the prairie provinces to British Columbia. This problem is not new to the House of Commons, because to my knowledge we have had it before us for the last ten or twelve years. In connection with the cost of transporting grain a charge of discrimination arises. At this time I shall not go into details in the comparison of rates, because those rates have been placed on Hansard in previous sessions by members from British Columbia, irrespective of party.

Evidence has been submitted to show that not only are the consumers in British Columbia called upon to pay a rate higher than that on similar mileage from prairie points to the east, but also more than double the rate applying to grain shipped from prairie points to Vancouver for export. For the information of new members may I be permitted to give an illustration of how this works out. Let us take, as an example, a train of sixty cars of grain moving from Edmonton to Vancouver. We shall suppose that fifty of those cars are for export and ten for domestic use. On the fifty cars the rate is twenty cents per hundred pounds but on the ten cars, drawn on the same train, the people of British Columbia are penalized to the extent of forty-one cents per hundred pounds. In other words, the freight charge is $4 per ton on the fifty cars for export and $8.30 per ton on similar grain to be used by the farmers in British Columbia.

My reason for bringing the matter to the attention of the government is this: The Liberal party is pledged to remove this differential. Between 1930 and 1935, when this matter was brought before parliament by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), he received the solid support of the Liberal party, then occupying the seats to your left, Mr. Speaker. During the election of 1935 the hon. member, quite in good faith, told the electors that if they would elect him and if the Liberal party were returned to power the reduction would take place. Well, the hon. member was elected; the Liberal party was returned with the largest majority ever given to a party in this country; this is the third session, and the differential still remains.

Mr. REID: We shall need the hon. member's vote this year.

Mr. BARBER: As the Liberal party is pledged to this reduction I wish to make a suggestion to the minister, because I know he does not favour the method by which the hon. member for New Westminster is undertaking to secure the removal of this differential. In 1933, when this matter was urged upon the government of the day, the minister's predecessor, the Hon. Dr. Manion, took action. He called in the heads of the two railways and asked them to have their officers sit in with representatives of the four western provinces and try to work out some reduction on feed grain for domestic use in British Columbia. This was done, and a rate of thirty cents per hundred pounds on certain grades of wheat, oats and barley went into effect on March 10, 1933. That rate is still in effect. Unfortunately mill feeds were not included. Who was to blame I do not know. The matter was decided at the conference. This reduction means $2.30 per ton to the farmers and poultrymen of our province, and they have received the full benefit of it. According to a statement I received from the railway companies, at the end of 1935 it meant savings to the farmers amounting to $121,209. Two years have passed since then; I have not the figures up to date; but I think it is safe to say that it has meant a saving to the farmers of three hundred to three hundred and fifty thousand dollars during that time. If the concession had included mill feeds, of which we use a great deal more than we use of these feed grains, the saving would have been just that much more. Today, when dairy products are very low in price, people in the lower mainland of British Columbia are paying $1.75 for a hundred pound sack of bran and $2.60 a sack for oil cake. I mention oil cake because, if we could get a reduction on oil cake we could displace that soya bean meal which is being sold there.

Let me tell the minister that dealers in the lower mainland of British Columbia are buying American wheat, No. 2, a better grade of wheat than they are getting in the feed grains from the prairies, and are selling it to poultrymen and farmers in the Fraser valley at fifty cents per ton less than the price of the Canadian product. My suggestion to the minister is that he follow the same course, talk it over with the heads of the two railways, and see if it would not be possible to have another conference, consisting of representatives of the two railroads and of the four western provinces, to ascertain whether something could not be done further to reduce this differential and to include mill feeds and oil cake in that list.

Mr. HOWE: I suggest to my hon. friend that, as both parties have agreed on the present scale of rates, it is a little difficult to have a new conference and ask for lower rates.

Mr. BARBER: This thirty cent rate was for only one year. It has been renewed from year to year.

Mr. HOWE: But, as I understand, both parties agreed to it.

Mr. BARBER: They agreed, but they could have another meeting and change it. I do not see any reason why they could not meet again. The rate was not to be a permanent thing. I think it would be perfectly in order to review this, particularly now that United States grain is coming in and being sold in that part of the country.

Mr. HOWE: The railways might not think it worth while to make another agreement if the last one they made is not to be permanent.

Mr. BARBER: The consumers would think it worth while. It would certainly make a great difference to the dairymen and farmers of our district. Why should we continue to be discriminated against in the difference between twenty and forty-one cents a hundred on the same grain hauled by train to Vancouver? I think the railways should give us a cut on it, at any rate down to twenty-five cents.

In the matter of railway rates distance is certainly a handicap. This brings to mind another matter which I wish to bring up for the information of the house. I do not suppose the minister can do anything with this. But prior to the end of last October motor cars were shipped into our province at the flat rate of $120 a car, which we thought and I think hon. members generally would consider, a fairly high rate. Later on, behold like a shot out of the blue, on November 1 new rates went into effect—a rate of $4.87 per hundred pounds! That means that on the lighter type of car weighing 2,900 pounds the rate is increased from $120 to $141.23; on a car that weighs about 3,300 pounds the former charge of $120 has been increased to $160.71; on a car running about 3,500 pounds, a beautiful car which we should all like to own, the rate, which was $120, is now $170.45. On trucks the flat rate was the same, namely $120. A new rate of $4.12 per hundred pounds has been put into effect. Thus, a truck weighing 4,400 pounds, which was shipped into our province from the east for $120, now pays $181.28, or a 50 per cent increase in freight rates. The charge on a truck weighing 3,700 pounds is increased from $120 to $152.44. These amounts do not include decking and loading charges, which are extra. The result is that a large number of people are coming east, buying or taking delivery of their cars here and driving them back, and some firms are negotiating to have their cars brought through the Panama canal to Vancouver.

In this, I hope not too lengthy a part I have taken in this debate, I have tried to bring some matters to the attention of the government. The Minister of Finance was out of the chamber when I referred to the tax, but I know he will look it up in Hansard and will give it serious consideration.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. J. A. GLEN (Marquette): I understand that I am the last speaker before the vote is to be taken. I do not intend, therefore, to exceed my time. I shall be as brief as I possibly can.

The speech from the throne provides, of course, an opportunity for the discussion of many items. I do not propose to deal in detail with any number of them, but I might remark at this point that I do not recall any similar debate wherein so many ministers spoke so early in the session in defence of the functions of their departments, and I must say that, listening to those speeches, I have enjoyed and have been gratified at the high level which they have attained. I believe their speeches influenced the quality of the contributions by other hon. members, in that they also attained a very high level. This debate will compare worthily with any previous debates of this kind and is in accordance with the best traditions of the house. I know that most of the ministers who took part in this debate were drawn into it by the highly provocative speech made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). He gave some very hard knocks, and I think he also received some. But he seems to thrive upon them.

It is inevitable that in this house constituted as it is, with representatives from all over the dominion, representing differing and conflicting views, there must of necessity be some differences of opinion. But when the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) the other day referred in gleeful tones to the many protesting speeches that were made on this side of the house and also from some on the other side immediately to your left, Mr. Speaker, in what we affectionately and euphoniously call "the rump," I think he overlooked the fact that there is no Liberal party worthy of the name but must have in its ranks members, be the number large or small as it may happen, who appear to be somewhat rebellious and impenitent speakers. It would not be a Liberal party if there were not differences and distinctions of opinion. The life and health of any Liberal party depend upon helpful criticism to build up and construct Liberal policies. I have endeavoured many a time to convert my hon. friend from Winnipeg North, for he is one of my particular friends, but in a conflict between a Jew and a Scot I do not know who is likely to win. I am hoping that some day I may be able to give him knowledge of this fact, that the Liberal party does not prohibit free thought or free speech, nor yet does it eject by executive decree any of the rebellious and impenitent members of the party.

I am going to deal first with one or two matters that are more local than general, so far as the Dominion of Canada is concerned. Last summer my constituency of Marquette, along with parts of Dauphin and Brandon, suffered from the drought, not perhaps to the same extent as Saskatchewan, but still considerably so, and these territories in Manitoba affected by the drought were all west of the Assiniboine river and extending up to the Saskatchewan boundary, and continuing for miles along that boundary. I would not have referred to it had it not been for the fact that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) explained in his speech the other day why no federal assistance was given to these municipalities in Manitoba.

I took the position that we were suffering from the drought and that federal assistance should be given. I had had surveys made of these municipalities and of the conditions prevailing, and they were just as bad as conditions in many of the municipalities adjacent to the one hundred per cent drought area in Saskatchewan. I had officers of the minister's own department come into my constituency, and with them we travelled through it to see the conditions and discuss what the remedy should be. Unfortunately for me my summer was wasted because I was not able to convince the Minister of Agriculture that he should give assistance to my constituency.

The position taken by the federal government was that Manitoba had had the best crop in several years, and in consequence they thought that province was in a position to take care of its own relief. I cannot agree with that. In the adjoining municipalities in Saskatchewan, which are not one whit worse off in the way of crops than my constituency, I find that the farmers there are receiving from the federal government assistance in the way of feed and fodder, and they must in the future be also supplied with seed. They are in no worse condition than their more unfortunate neighbours on the Manitoba side of the boundary, and I think assistance should equally be given to Manitoba, particularly because, as I shall point out a little later, Manitoba is in no position to give the relief I have requested.

The reeve of one of these municipalities wrote telling me of conditions in his municipality, and of how they were able to look across the line and see the adjoining municipalities in Saskatchewan given free feed and fodder, and ultimately they will receive seed as well. He says that he does not begrudge these farmers that assistance and relief, and I agree wholly in what he says; they need that relief. But I must say that they are a good deal more fortunate than their unfortunate brothers on the Manitoba side, who are receiving no assistance from this government. I felt it was my duty to bring these facts before the house—they have all been submitted already to the department—and if any of the facts I have given are not correct I am anxious that there should be an inspection of the territory, which I am sure will reveal conditions to be more grievous than I have described them in my statement here to-night.

Now I wish to deal with the other question, the inability of Manitoba to finance its own relief, and in that connection I propose to deal with the status of that province within confederation with respect to tariffs.

We had a visit of the Rowell commission in Winnipeg, and let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I deeply deplore the strictures that were passed by the leader of the opposition on the personnel of that commission. I think the right hon. gentleman did a disservice to Canada in making those strictures. I am quite sure that none of the members of that commission accepted their onerous and responsible positions except from the very highest patriotic motives. I could not understand any man being willing to assume an obligation so onerous and responsible as these gentlemen have done without being actuated wholly by a desire to help Canada and to conduct their investigation entirely devoid of any spirit of partisanship. I do not know any of the members of that commission personally except Doctor Dafoe, and for those who do not know him I am bound to say this, that not only is he the most distinguished journalist in Canada to-day, but his contributions to Canadian policy at home and abroad have been so outstanding, and his individuality and capacity for independent thinking so striking throughout his long life, that I believe no man in Canada is more preeminent than he to assume that obligation, which I am perfectly satisfied he assumed with great reluctance.

The leader of the opposition in his speech deplored the disunity in Canada at the present time. I am bound to say that in my opinion he has contributed to that disunity, for he has raised in the minds of people questions with regard to, I shall not say the integrity, because that is perhaps not the correct word, but at all events the usefulness of the commission which has been appointed. Statements have been made which it might have been better if they had never been made. We are now familiar in Canadian life with that sinister word "axis." We have forces being joined to-day in some parts for the purpose of combating other parts of the country. The leader of the opposition is not wholly devoid of blame in the strictures he has made against that commission, who have a real job on their hands, and who, if they apply that partisan spirit of which they are accused, will jeopardize the long and distinguished record which each of these men has attained in the course of a long life in Canada.

Before the Rowell commission in Winnipeg the province of Manitoba submitted its case—a very remarkable one—and it has been attacked surreptitiously, subterraneously, if you will, for having set up the west as against the east. As a representative from Manitoba I say that there was no intention on the part of the province to raise issues as between different sections of the dominion. They were concerned only with the presentation of the case as Manitoba saw it, and perhaps I might use the words of Lincoln, the hundred and twenty-ninth anniversary of whose birth takes place on Saturday—"with malice towards none, with charity to all." That language, I believe, can well be applied to the case submitted by Manitoba. I should like to read from part VII, page 69, of Manitoba's case to show that the province is in no position to finance its own relief, and to justify the request I have made of the government that relief be given to my constituency. At page 69 the following statement is made in paragraph 8 of the summary:

That, other things being as they have been, if Manitoba had so financed its own share of unemployment relief, and those portions of the municipalities' shares which it has had to lend to municipalities, its accumulated deficit in current account for this item alone in the period from April 30, 1930 to April 30, 1937, would be $23,945,637.25. This total is made up, $23,736,570.51 due to the dominion and the public, plus moneys advanced to municipalities out of provincial trust funds to the amount of $209,066.74.

(9) That Manitoba has, in effect, funded this deficit on current account and has been forced to borrow almost the whole of this from the dominion government because it could not borrow in the money markets.

(10) That if the dominion government, during this interval, had not continued to lend to Manitoba, the province would have been unable to meet its liabilities.

And at page 71, paragraph 20:

That short of the dominion's taking over the whole administration and financing of unemployment relief, the only practical solution of the problem of financing relief is for the dominion government to distribute amongst the provinces upon a per capita basis of relief population, subject to such reasonable restrictions as to administration as the dominion may impose, the entire cost of unemployment relief, either as a grant, or as the proceeds of a special federal tax upon the whole nation earmarked for relief purposes.

21. That the financing of relief is quite beyond:

(a) The present revenue producing capacity of Manitoba.

(b) The revenue producing capacity which it is possible or desirable for every province in Canada to acquire under a change in the Canadian constitution.

22. That the present system of financing relief:

(a) Will cause the inevitable bankruptcy of many of the provinces and municipalities of Canada.

Then at page 72, paragraph 24:

That the administration and financing of relief by the dominion is the wisest solution to the relief problem because:

(a) It would do away with all of the inequitable and subversive effects of the present system of relief administration;

(b) It would provide a uniform national minimum standard of relief without casting an unfair and unsupportable burden upon any municipality, province or economic area.

In part VIII, page 13, the province makes this statement:

In the Manitoba budget this item appeared only very occasionally and in small amounts prior to the year 1930. From that year up to April 30, 1937, the total cost of relief and relief works in Manitoba was $53,278,775.98. The total cost was divided as follows:

The cost to the dominion $19,602,697.64
The cost to the province.. .. .. 18,550,572.12
The cost to the municipalities.. .. 15,125,506.22

It has already been shown elsewhere that by far the greater part of these expenditures has been met by borrowing. The result is, at April 30, 1937, that the province owed on its relief debt $23,736,570.51, covering both its own costs and moneys borrowed for reloaning to municipalities; the municipalities owe considerable sums to other creditors on their relief debts and, at April 30, 1937, they owed to the provincial government on their account the sum of $4,608,255.74, practically all of which was borrowed by the province from the dominion.

In the light of these figures I do not think anyone can successfully contend that Manitoba is in a position to finance its own relief and, therefore, any demand which is made of the federal government should take into account that the 1937 crop in our province, grateful as we are for it, only begins to touch the volume of debt that has accrued in the province and there will have to be a continuation of these crops before Manitoba can be in a position to finance its own relief.

There were some other points brought out in the case submitted to the royal commission. I should like to read one or two statements made by the provincial government with regard to tariffs. At page 18 of part VIII of the submission there appear these words:

At confederation the provinces gave up their jurisdiction over tariff matters to the dominion government. Since that time the tariff policies of the dominion, presumed to be in the interests of the nation as a whole, have worked out to the very great disadvantage of certain provinces.

We have presented to the commission evidence of the burden of this dominion policy on the people of this section of the dominion. The result of our investigation, stated in what we believe to be minimum figures, shows that the burden the dominion tariff places upon the three prairie provinces comes to the staggering total of 58 million dollars per year. This figure is twice as much as the total of all the annual taxes imposed by all three prairie governments combined. It is a heavy price to pay for the privilege of being in confederation.

In the case of Manitoba the tariff policy, as now in effect in Canada, has been found to impose a burden of 15 million dollars per year upon our people. This is an indirect tax of almost unbearable weight. It is seventy-five per cent more than the total of all our provincial taxes which are themselves too heavy. It is almost as much as the total taxes collected by all our municipalities combined. It has for many years imposed a burden exceeding $100 annually on the average farmer in Manitoba. While the tax in itself is burdensome it has the fundamental weakness that the greater part of it is not credited to the dominion government revenues. . . .

It goes on to say that the tariff has thus constituted a heavy load on the primary industries of our province and those of other western provinces.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have shown the burden which is imposed upon the western provinces as far as tariffs are concerned. It is a gloomy picture so far as I have described it. But I was delighted the other day when I heard the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler). I can recall many times when hon. gentlemen opposite called him a protectionist and when the leader of the opposition used to take delight in using that term in order to embarrass him. I think after the minister's speech the other day even the leader of the opposition will have come to the conclusion that that epithet as applied to the minister is entirely a misnomer. In fact, if I were to use any word to describe him I would say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce might be called a realist. He has gone abroad in the world and has seen the effect of trade treaties, and being a realist, he recognizes that after all some of those over here who are called free traders have not been so much out of line. It was also a real delight to find the minister not only grasping with both hands all the treaties which other countries were willing to conclude with Canada, but indicating that he is still pursuing, and more eagerly than ever, other treaties, because he knows the beneficial effect of them. The increasing revenues of Canada during the past two years, about which so much was said by the last speaker, have demonstrated the value of these treaties. Could anything demonstrate better to the people of Canada that reciprocal trade treaties can have only beneficial results to the countries concerned? The minister indicated in no uncertain terms that even where trade agreements did not include certain items trade in them was also increasing and this country was getting the benefit. I say in the words of an Irishman. More power to the elbow of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

A parallel picture was given by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) in his speech the other day. He told the story of employment conditions in Canada. It will seem most extraordinary to the mind of the protectionist, but, to the mind of a free trader, a natural consequence, that unemployment has decreased during those two years while foreign trade has been bounding upwards. Both results are linked together. I think the Minister of Labour said that in 1937 as compared with 1936 there was a reduction of 120,000 in the number of unemployed. If that is not an argument in favour of freedom of trade and the removal of restrictions and barriers to trade which some on this side have been advocating for years, then I do not know what an argument is.

I recall that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), either after or during the election campaign, asked the people of this country, whither are we going. Well, I know where we are going if we continue to pursue the path that has been blazed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the benefits of which are being shown by the Minister of Labour. The government has blazed a trail which will convince the people of Canada that freedom from trade restrictions is bound to result in increasing prosperity. They have blazed the trail; all I want the government to do now is to make it a broad highway between us and every country in the world that is willing to trade with us, and I am satisfied that the Liberal party will demonstrate that only by freedom of trade and removal of trade barriers can Canada become one of the most prosperous countries in the world.

Had it not been for the disastrous drought in Saskatchewan; had Saskatchewan been in the position, say of Manitoba, or had she produced even half of what she produced in past years, does the country realize that every province would to-day be prosperous, able to balance its budget, and the dominion as a whole would be among the most prosperous countries on the face of the earth? That is what the position would have been but for the drought in Saskatchewan, which caused these ills that we have to remove. Nothing I could say is more pregnant with meaning than the facts submitted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Labour. While it may be that some of us are more impatient than others, yet we all realize that in the Liberal party lies the only hope for the solution of these problems and the cure of these ills.

I am hoping fervently that the opportunity which is now knocking at the door of the Liberal party will be fully taken advantage of in the legislation to be brought down this session. The results of the government's policy as shown in ever increasing trade are such that the country will be satisfied with having returned in 1935 a government opposed to high protection, of which policy the people of Canada had had bitter experience. I am satisfied that the experience of the two years yet to come before an election will demonstrate to this dominion that through the removal of trade barriers and the promotion of freer trade by the methods adopted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Canada will become what she should be, the brightest jewel in the British crown.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with a great many previous speakers who have lauded the speech from the throne so highly. Personally I cannot see in that speech a great deal to be proud of. One thing is certain. As has been stated before in this chamber, one of the greatest problems confronting us is the economic condition of our country, and we are sent here for the purpose of endeavouring to the best of our ability to correct the chaotic conditions under which we live. That is my purpose in speaking to-night. It should be the endeavour of every hon. member not to let time become a factor in closing off any address that might be made in the house when a question so important as the livelihood and very existence of our citizens is under consideration.

We have heard a great deal of praise from the opposite side of the house on the wonderful benefits of the trade agreements. It is all very well for a supporter of the government to quote statistics to prove that conditions are improving, but one only has to look about to find with greater surety that conditions are no better than they were a year ago. One thing that makes me wonder is this: In 1935 the party now sitting on the opposite side of this chamber said they were going to remedy these conditions. It has been within their power to do so; they have had the largest majority ever given any party in the house, but I say in all sincerity that so far they have not done anything to any material extent to alleviate those conditions which now exist.

Hon. members speak of foreign trade as being a cure-all for the economic conditions with which we are faced. Well, I am not of that opinion. I agree with some other hon. members, that blasting our way into the markets of the world will never solve our problems. It is not a cure-all, by any manner of means. One of the most important factors we should consider in that connection is the trade within our own boundaries. I have said before in the house, and I have no hesitation in saying it again, that I am not concerned with the tariff. We have only to consider the evidence which has been brought forward in connection with farm machinery to see that the lower the tariff has gone the higher has been the cost of machinery. The tariff in itself is not a factor. I have no objection to the tariff being lowered if that will help in any way. Certainly I have no objection to the tariff being raised in order to protect the industries within the confines of this country. But be assured that I do not favour the protection of the profits of the industries of this dominion.

If we were as concerned with the welfare of our people as I believe we should be, we in Alberta would not be faced with the situation that we find to-day in our oil industry. We have one of the greatest potential oil fields in the British Empire, something that should be of great concern to this dominion because of the fact that at present we face one of the most critical times in the history of the empire. We have often thought that we could not be thrown into another world war; yet we are facing that very possibility to-day. In Alberta we have an oil field which would be of inestimable value to the British Empire if such a tragedy happened; yet what are we doing to assist that great industry? We in Alberta are endeavouring to place that product on the market in eastern Canada. The east has bled the west for many a year, to the extent of millions of dollars. The west has fed the east, but now when we ask for reciprocation in that regard what do we get? We are not given the slightest bit of consideration. Take the large combines, such as the railways, if you like. When we ask for a reduction in rates they do not even know the cost of transporting a hundred pounds of crude oil for a distance of a hundred miles. When a large concern, such as Imperial Oil, asks them to lower the rate on crude oil to Regina, they do not know how much they can lower the rate without losing money. But when they are faced with the possibility of the construction of a pipe line from the Alberta field to Regina they say to Imperial Oil, "What do you estimate it will cost you to transport that oil?" It was estimated that the cost would be fourteen cents. Then the railways said, "Well, we will charge you nineteen cents. How is that?" They came down just enough to enable them to meet that probable competition. That is not cooperation. We must have something more constructive. If we are endeavouring to find markets for our produce, surely a different attitude might be taken.

Just on this question of trade as a cure-all for the economic ills of the dominion I should like to remind the house that one of the great factors in the improvement, if there has been any improvement, has been the war preparations that have been carried on, as other hon. gentlemen have mentioned already in this debate. I am reminded of a speech that was made here in 1935 by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), as reprinted in Action for January, 1938. This is what the right hon. gentleman said:

> I think this country ought to declare that any nation which could be shown to have threatened the peace of the world by violating a pact of collective security should be denied any assistance in the shape of men or munitions, should be denied any assistance in the nature of food, should be denied any assistance through credit. Our country, small as it is, might well lay down a definite policy in that regard as expressing Canada's attitude toward any country which, upon the facts being disclosed, was found to be guilty of attempting to destroy what otherwise might be collective security. If that example were followed by other parts of the British Empire, as I believe it would be, it would soon be followed by other parts of the world.

I want to repeat these words:

> Our country, small as it is, might well lay down a definite policy—

That is my contention, Mr. Speaker, that this parliament should lay down a definite policy in regard to the very matters dealt with by the leader of the government as recently as April 1, 1935. That was a declared policy. So far we have seen nothing done to implement it. I well remember that last year, in reference to this question, the right hon. gentleman informed me that an investigation would be launched in this country to find out the exact amount of profiteering, if there were any, going on in connection with arms and munitions manufactured in Canada. So far I have heard nothing as to the results of that investigation, if indeed it was carried out. That should be one of the very first steps we should take, and I think, as the right hon. gentleman mentioned in the quotation I gave a moment ago, this country could well take the lead in laying down the policy that we would not supply other countries with nickel or other material that might be used in the manufacture of arms and munitions.

Those are matters of vital importance to us. Day after day I receive resolutions. Not later than to-day I received a telegram advocating the abolition of trade with Japan. That is all well and good; I am not against a policy of barring trade, in connection with either imports from or exports to Japan, if that would be a cure-all. I well remember that at Christmas time in the store windows in western Canada we saw large placards bearing the words, "Boycott Japanese oranges." That would not stop the war. Our refusal to buy Japanese oranges in western Canada would not make any difference. If we refused to trade in commodities not essential to war it would make no difference at all. What we should concern ourselves with is the very thing we are neglecting, namely the making of armaments and munitions in Canada. Yet, of those commodities we export to the extent of about $1,000,000 a week, $52,000,000 a year, to Japan, and no step is taken to curtail that trade.

It is essential that one of the first steps to be taken this session—we should not wait until the next one—is to see that the export of arms and munitions from Canada is stopped. We are sending armaments to Japan and, although we hope not, we are almost certain that within a short time we are going to be sending our young men over there to be killed with the very ammunition we supply. Could there be anything more barbaric than that? Why do we not do something about it? We do nothing because capitalism steps in. Huge profits are made from the manufacture and sale of armaments and munitions. We permit this condition to exist, and we do not see fit to challenge it.

May I read an extract from the Canadian Unionist of December 17, dealing with profits and patriotism:

> How the profit motive, the mainspring of capitalist enterprise, mocks patriotism is indicated by an article in Labour, official organ of the British Trades Union Congress. British armament firms are allowed to sell their productions to any and every customer—except Spain for the time being. They may sell to potential enemies. "Why should British firms arm our enemies?" the writer in Labour asks. He points out that there are not only obvious humanitarian and patriotic objections. The indiscriminate selling of arms leads to rivalry in armaments, thus tending to make wars more and more destructive. If a British firm supplies a submarine to a foreign government, another government will want destroyers to offset the menace of the submarine. So it goes; the more armaments supplied the greater the demand.

But capitalists want profits, and workers need jobs, and the inhuman, unpatriotic potentialities of the armament industry are a minor consideration. Governments permit the sale of arms to possible enemies because they say it helps to develop the country's armament industry, and the bigger that industry is the better a country is prepared for war.

In a sane society, with production for use, instead of profit, the capital and labour now applied to the production of means of destruction would be utilized to supply better homes, better education, and better quality goods and services of all sorts.

That is the point. We talk about patriotism. If another war were declared we would preach patriotism to our young men. We would say, "Go out and fight for your homeland." Yes, we would tell them that; but we would not tell them at the same time that we have supplied the arms and ammunition to the enemy country; no, we would omit that. Our churches will broadcast patriotism throughout the country, but they, too, will omit that. When capitalism comes into contact with patriotism, capitalism wins every time.

I was deeply interested a few days ago in the observations made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) with respect to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I do not criticize in every respect the actions of the corporation, because I believe in some respects they are commendable. I must say, too, that the type of program carried by the corporation is of a higher standard than those broadcast a while back. But while there are commendable features, there are features which should be criticized, and I can think of no better opportunity than the present to make the observations I have in mind.

Since announcing a fifty cent increase in the licence fees we have heard a great deal of criticism throughout Canada. True, there may be some wealthy men, like the Minister of Transport, who can afford three radios in their homes, or a radio for each member of their families. I wish them nothing but the best of success, and I trust they will be highly delighted with the entertainment they get. But unfortunately there are many people in this country who cannot afford three radios in their homes. It is exceedingly difficult for people on relief or those about to be on relief to find that extra fifty cents. Not only is it an extra fifty cents in licence fee, but these people have to pay added costs in the form of maintenance charges and radio batteries. Those are charges which people in Ottawa do not have to bear, because the situation in eastern Canada is to some extent different from that in the west so far as electrical energy is concerned. In eastern Canada electricity costs about one and a half cents per kilowatt, whereas in the west it costs anywhere from eight cents to ten cents, with an extra meter charge of anywhere from ninety cents to a dollar and a half per month. Those are matters which have to be considered. The average set owner in the west cannot afford to have the extra burden placed upon him, and I think it is unfair to increase the fee at this time. I would have no objection to placing an extra fifty cent charge on a man who has a radio in his car. Further, I could see no objection to charging a man who has three radios in his house a fee for each set. That would be all right, because if a man can afford three radios he should be able to buy three licences for them.

On the other hand, to increase the fee on one set is entirely different. I find that the fifty cent increase per radio licence would bring in a total of about $750,000. In view of the fact that not so long ago the broadcasting corporation advertised that they would have a surplus this year I would judge that with the increased revenue the total amount received would be about $2,780,000. I may be wrong in my figures, but I give them subject to correction. In view of the fact that they had a surplus last year and will have another $2,000,000 to spend this year, in the event of their doing as well in the coming year as they did in the last there would be no cause for complaint. But why is it necessary to raise the fee? That is something which has yet to be explained.

What was the reason for the increase? Was it pressure from somewhere? Probably the Department of Finance spoke again; probably an increased fee was demanded. Possibly political pressure was brought to bear, due to the loss of a few votes. However, that should not be a main consideration. May I point out that there is an interesting background to the announcement, one which was not revealed by the press. The announcement of the change was made following a closed meeting of newspaper and magazine publishers with Mr. Gladstone Murray, General Manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The meeting, convened in Toronto, was organized shortly after the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation had imported a number of outstanding radio programs originating in the United States. Or, to make the matter clearer, let me put it in this way: The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation imports some United States programs; the newspaper and magazine publishers call a meeting which is attended by Mr. Gladstone Murray and then the licence fees are boosted.

The trade magazine, Broadcasting, in its edition of January 15, reports—and this report did not appear in the press—that both the magazine and newspaper publishers wanted to know how far the importation of United States programs was going to go. They claimed they were losing big advertising appropriations thereby. "Broadcasting" says it is understood that one publisher suggested that parliament be asked to grant the Canadian Broadcasting Commission a subsidy over a period of years so that commercial programs would not have to be broadcast by the Canadian Broadcasting Commission. In other words, the newspaper and magazine publishers want the government to bear the cost of broadcasting so that they will be able to get the money of the advertiser which now goes to pay for broadcasting. They want the cost of broadcasting to come out of the pockets of the people of Canada rather than out of the pockets of advertisers. Now, this is a significant paragraph, which appears in the January 15th edition of the weekly magazine Marketing, published in Toronto. Says the paragraph, referring to the Toronto meeting:

> A constructive suggestion was made that if the Canadian Broadcasting Commission would seek to secure its needed additional revenue by increasing the licence fee on radio sets, the press would stand back of it and help the public realize that such increase was just and necessary; otherwise the press would have to consider the advisability of revealing what the Canadian Broadcasting Commission is doing in flooding Canada with United States programs.

Now, there you have not only a suggestion from the publishers to the Canadian Broadcasting Commission but a direct threat. The Canadian Broadcasting Commission must either boost radio licence fees or undergo a bombardment of newspaper criticism from coast to coast. But let the Canadian Broadcasting Commission boost the fee, and the press would use propaganda from coast to coast to prove to the people that the increase was necessary.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

Well what happened? On January 19 an editorial on the subject appeared, for instance, in the Calgary Herald, and one paragraph read as follows:

> The Herald is of the opinion that the radio corporation is on untenable ground in seeking to justify the importation of foreign advertising programs solely on the need of additional revenue. There is another obvious channel open to them which would not invite logical criticism now so freely voiced.

I pause to remark that we heard little criticism and much praise for the corporation when it imported the programs. However, to continue with the Herald's editorial:

> The other obvious channel from which the corporation may obtain revenue is—by way of increasing the cost of each radio licence from $2 to $3. . . . By raising the fee one dollar, the net revenue on last year's basis would be increased to $2,780,000, a sum which should make the corporation independent of revenue from foreign advertising concerns.

That is the end of the quotation. It points to the attitude of the press—soak the people so that they, the publishers, can get their hands on the money of the advertisers.

The press, by its direct threat of criticism, placed the corporation in a most embarrassing position. By demanding that radio licence fees be increased, the publishers placed the corporation in the line of fire for criticism from every radio owner in Canada—the very people whom the corporation is called upon to serve; the people whose protests would do more than anything else to destroy the corporation. The publishers demanded an increase of $1. The corporation compromised and increased the licence fee by fifty cents.

There was a great deal of concern by the papers throughout Canada about the tremendous amount of United States broadcasting, but when one considers that only eight and a half hours, out of, I believe, ninety-eight hours, was thus being used, their protests are not impressive. Certainly there was not much complaint when it was first introduced; on the other hand everything in the line of praise was given to it; and when the corporation have selected, as I have said, some of the best types of United States programs, it seems curious that the press should take such great objection to this increased revenue. No, what they want is the money which was derived from that source. Here you have an example of the "freedom of the press" which was mentioned a moment ago. Who is controlling the country? The press. The only freedom they should have is the right to print the truth; that is as far as their freedom should go.

One other matter with regard to radio I do not think I can properly omit. In the west we have a different situation, perhaps, from what prevails in the east, although the difference is not great. We are now asked to pay a fifty cent increase in the fee; but there is many a time out west, as well as in this city, when you turn on your radio and because of local interference you cannot hear anything. In fact the situation became so bad that a petition was sent to me from my constituency protesting against the interference, but no consideration is given as regards an adjustment of the fee. I had occasion to visit Calgary, where I was received very courteously by an official of the radio branch there—I believe it was Mr. Ainslie—with regard to this interference in radio. A trouble man was sent out to investigate the matter. He came out within a week after I visited the office, and made a thorough investigation of every radio concern in that town. He found that a great many machines were running without condensers, without means of eliminating this interference. He went around to each one of the firms, pointed out that this condition should be corrected, and told them how to do this. He then came around to my house and said he would return in one week. He did so, but things were just as bad. He made another round of the town and advised them again.

The point is this, that we are now paying fifty cents more for a licence; yet there is no regulation by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or by this government which gives these trouble men authority to say to owners of machines which are interfering with reception, "You must change that or you will get into trouble", or "we will prosecute you." There is no regulation which directly covers this matter. These trouble men are much concerned about it, and I think properly so, and I should like to see the Minister of Transport provide by regulation that when they go to all the trouble and expense involved in checking up on interference they should be granted some authority whereby they can compel owners of machines which cause electrical interference to clear it up.

There is another question that I must mention. It has been referred to before, but it is of too great importance to be permitted to slip by as idly as has happened so far. I refer to the charges of political graft that were made not long ago in the house.

At 11.02 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, February 11, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BENNETT

QUESTION OF RULES ARISING OUT OF DISCUSSION OF FREIGHT ASSISTANCE ON LIVE STOCK

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): On a question of privilege affecting the rights of members of this house I desire, Mr. Speaker, to direct your attention to the telegram that was placed on Hansard yesterday purporting to be sent by the minister of agriculture of the province of Saskatchewan.

In so far as the telegram deals with a contradiction of statements made in this house I do not propose to raise any question at the moment except to say that it may be questioned. On that phase of it which reflects upon one of the members of this house and casts aspersions upon his conduct and his bona fides, I desire to raise a question which I shall not discuss at this time in view of public business, but I ask you, sir, to deal with the matter, and I direct the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the language of the closing part of the telegram. I think the minister himself will agree that it is not a document that should be placed upon the record; for no one outside of this house has a right, without contravening the privileges of a member of this house, to cast aspersions and reflections upon his honesty or his conduct. However much a man not a member of this house may desire that a misstatement be corrected, the moment he engages in argument in the message he transmits through a member of this house he contravenes the rules of parliament and one of the privileges of this house and of every member of it.

I shall discuss the matter at a more convenient time, but I desire to direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, and the attention of the Prime Minister, to the matter, which is one of very serious moment as far as the privileges of the members of this house are concerned.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I should like to point out through you, Mr. Speaker, that in his speech the other night the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), called attention to the fact that a certain man who was known to myself as a minister in this government had been given some special consideration by the government of the province of Saskatchewan. For that reason I think I was justified in calling attention on the floor of this house to the representations made, and to have those representations put in a clear light before this house. That is all the telegram does which was read to the house yesterday.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what it does.

Mr. GARDINER: In order to confirm what I have just stated I would say that if my right hon. friend will look at page 290 of Hansard and read the reference which was made to Mr. Laidlaw he will find that the hon. member declared that Mr. Laidlaw on account of his financial position was not entitled to any consideration at that time. In reply to that statement the telegram merely says that the hon. member himself together with Mr. Laidlaw made application to the government for consideration in relation to seed in the spring of last year. I think that is an answer in full to the suggestion that this gentleman was not entitled to consideration after he had lost another crop. The facts are very clear, as outlined both in the remarks of the hon. member and in the telegrams replying to those remarks.

As to whether it is within the rules of the house to have the reply placed upon Hansard in the manner in which it was done yesterday, that is another matter upon which you, Mr. Speaker, will rule. So far as the facts are concerned, nothing has been produced to indicate that they are other than as I have stated them to the house at this time.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I did not read the telegram, but it was the latter part of it with which I was dealing, not with any question as between the minister and any member of this house or any person outside of this house. I was dealing solely with the privileges of this house and of every member of this parliament. I did not read the telegram because I did not wish to take the time at that moment, but I shall have to do so now:

. . . Laidlaw until recently tenant of Perley but declines to continue. Municipality advanced seed and supplies to value of four hundred eighty-two dollars fifty-four cents in 1937, being about half amount desired by tenant and landlord. Termination of tenancy by Laidlaw may partly explain criticism. Understand tenancy has been unprofitable throughout to Laidlaw which reduced him to circumstances necessitating aid in shipment of live stock out.

That is the part to which objection is taken and which I think should be dealt with by you, Mr. Speaker, for the future guidance of this house.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, Mr. Speaker, the section to which I referred a moment ago, which was not read but which is answered by the part of the telegram now referred to, is as follows:

Another man I know well shipped 100 head to Gladstone, Manitoba, where they are being wintered. This man is well known to the Minister of Agriculture because he was a contractor who from the government which held office prior to 1929—

That is the government of which I then was the head.

—had received many contracts. He built bridges north of Wolseley across the Qu'Appelle river, and built an overhead bridge at Roche Percée.

That, by the way, happens to be in the constituency I now represent in this house.

He went out to British Columbia this year, in company with his two sons and a nephew, and made money. One son told me that his father had drawn $12 a day all summer and that the boys had drawn $7. That man had one hundred and ninety head of cattle, and did not sacrifice any of them. They shipped three carloads, with free freight, to Gladstone, Manitoba, and are wintering at that point.

Then I put in a remark which was intended to be in the form of a question. It is not so reported, and I would suggest that it might be put in that form.

Mr. Gardiner: We paid the freight?

Mr. Perley: Yes, you paid the freight; I am glad the minister mentioned that. That man was no more entitled to free freight than the man in the moon. He had been a contractor all his years; he had built the bridge at Roche Percée.

Again referring to my own seat.

He had one hundred and ninety head of cattle, three cars of which he had shipped to market, and certainly was not entitled to free freight on the others.

I wish to point out that the facts are these: This man does not now and to my knowledge never did live within the one hundred per cent drought area. He lived outside the one hundred per cent drought area but within the area from which cattle are shipped free of freight for anyone who wants to ship cattle out and bring them back again to their present location next spring. The references to myself, and to a section of my constituency that has no relation to the matter under discussion, apparently are made with certain intentions, and I think I am within my rights in this house in drawing the attention of the house to the fact and to indicate that they do not apply to the discussion in any way whatever. I would suggest that the latter part of the telegram in question is a complete reply, in that it indicates that the gentleman who is being discussed, although known to myself, previous to July last was a tenant on lands owned by the hon. member who was discussing this matter in the house.

Mr. BENNETT: He so stated in his speech.

Mr. GARDINER: No, the speech does not state that clearly.

Mr. BENNETT: It makes it clear to me.

Mr. GARDINER: This is what the speech states:

> Two of my tenants shipped stock there; one shipped six hundred sheep and the other shipped all his stock, including horses and cattle. All are wintering there.

Then notice this:

> Another man I know—

And it is the other man he knows who is the gentleman named Laidlaw who, previous to July, was a tenant on these lands and who asked for and received seed grain under the government guarantees last spring. The argument of the Minister of Agriculture of Saskatchewan is that if he was a person entitled to receive seed and other supplies one spring, having lost another crop surely he was still entitled to receive consideration from the government of the province of Saskatchewan. That is all that the telegrams indicate.

Mr. BENNETT: That does not deal with the question at issue, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member wish to speak to the matter?

ELECTRIC POWER

TRANSFER TO PARLIAMENT OF CONTROL OF EXPORT EXCEPT IN INTERNATIONAL EMERGENCY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 21, to amend the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act.

He said: While this bill in form constitutes a general amendment and recasting of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act which has not heretofore been amended since it was passed in 1907, in substance its object is to transfer to parliament itself the power at present legally vested in the governor in council to control the export of electrical power from this country.

The bill does not affect the licences to export power which have already been granted, nor does it take from the governor in council the right to renew or cancel the existing licences. It does provide that no further exports of power may be made unless they are specifically authorized by a private act of parliament.

An exception to this rule is made only in the event of a temporary international emergency and only for the duration of such an emergency.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the first reading of the bill.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): This is not a debatable motion, but the right hon. gentleman used the words "private bill." I should hardly think it could be designated a private bill. It would be a public bill of a private nature, but in any event it would be a public bill that granted the right to export electricity from this country, I should think.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The point raised is a matter of terminology.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DIVERSION OF WATER

EFFECT OF BOUNDARY WATERS TREATY WITH UNITED STATES RESPECTING DIVERSION FROM LAKE MICHIGAN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have a further reply to make to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol); not with respect to the question of privilege he raised yesterday but with respect to the question he raised the day before on the orders of the day, concerning the diversion of water from lake Michigan.

The treaty to which the question refers is doubtless the one commonly known as the Boundary Waters Treaty signed in 1909. It was ratified in 1910, but the customary practice is to describe a treaty by reference to the date of signature.

I do not think it is advisable to enter upon a detailed explanation of the government's position upon a legal or international question merely because of some controversial statement. The Canadian position has been indicated in a number of official publications containing correspondence and other material, such as sessional papers numbers 101 c-d-e-f-g, 157, 180, session of 1924, "Papers relating to the St. Lawrence waterway project and the Chicago drainage canal"; "Correspondence relating to diversion of the waters of the great lakes by the Sanitary District of Chicago, from March 27, 1912, to October 17, 1927"; No. 227-1928, "The Senate of Canada—Proceedings of the special committee appointed to inquire into the development and improvement of the St. Lawrence river," 1928. Beyond saying that no Canadian government has ever accepted the interpretation to which the hon. member's question refers, I do not think I need do more than direct his attention to those publications.

As is well known, the diversion in question has occupied the attention of Canadian and United States governments for many years. There have been various stages in the negotiations and the effort has been to work out practical solutions which might afford reasonable safeguards to the various interests concerned. The immediate subject of the question of the hon. member for Davenport has come to the attention of the departments concerned, and the house may be assured that such matters are taken into account and carefully considered.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, February 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. N. Francœur for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Bennett.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, before the house adjourned last night I had not completed my observations, and I should like to speak first with respect to a matter which has been referred to on one or two occasions, namely that having to do with elections, and levies made from certain contractors.

It may be said that I am following the pattern or the insinuations left by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), but notwithstanding that I must refer to the observations of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) as they are reported at page 156 of Hansard. He said:

To the hon. member for Peace River—

Referring to Mr. Pelletier—

—I would say that when he has been longer in the house, or it may be in some other house, he will realize that when a man across the floor throws out vague insinuations in his remarks he is not making a charge.

It may be true that some of the younger members of the house cannot clearly distinguish between insinuations and charges, but notwithstanding that, I think it would be well to recall to the house the exact words of the right hon. the leader of the opposition.

A contribution is one thing, but a levy of a certain per cent is another. The time has come when this must stop because the contractors themselves are complaining.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

That part may be the insinuation. However, I shall read further:

Mr. Howe: As one who places a great many contracts for this government I ask the right hon. gentleman to give me a specific instance of a levy.

Mr. Bennett: I can give the minister as many as he wants, but I am not going to do it here and now.

And this is the point I wish to emphasize:

What is more, I know of levies being made in connection with Canadian National Railways contracts.

Mr. Bradette: That was under Mr. Manion.

Mr. Bennett: No; it was not; it was in the last few months. Let us have no misunderstanding about that.

Mr. Howe: The right hon. gentleman has said either too much or too little. This matter must be threshed out.

Mr. Bennett: It can be threshed out any time you want any committee of this house that you desire to appoint to go into the matter.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the reference here made by the leader of the opposition in connection with levies is no vague insinuation, in my interpretation of the word. I believe it is the charge of a man who apparently knows of such illegal practices in connection with these contracts. I say this house should know whether such things are being done. It is not a question of trying to avoid the issue; rather we must come out clearly and show, not only to the public but to hon. members, whether such a charge is true or false.

I think any hon. member would be only too willing to have a committee set up, as I understand it may be, and to have the matter investigated. I know from actual experience in the west that the money being sent in there is not received by contributions from the people. This brings up a serious question, of which I think hon. members must take serious notice. There is a condition arising in the west caused either directly or indirectly by this very thing. Last year when speaking to the house I said that unless something was done in the next session at Ottawa there would be serious consequences, and that a serious situation would arise for which the government would be directly responsible. I wish once more to draw the attention of the house to that very fact.

There is a condition arising between the west and the east which is of great importance, and it is imperative that the house take these matters into consideration. The feeling in the west is becoming greatly intensified by such conditions as I have just pointed out, in connection with elections, and they are wondering where the money comes from for election propaganda. We know that thousands of dollars are being spread out through the west for propaganda purposes. The question every honest citizen is asking is this: Where is that money coming from? How can we expect the people of Canada to express a conscientious and sincere vote, when money is being taken presumably from the east and sent out to the west to be devoted to all sorts of propaganda? That is not the way to induce good citizenship.

In the west we have conditions which are not found here in the east. In Alberta there was an election in which the majority was the greatest of that found in any province, and it was not done by graft on the part of political parties or by contributions from organizations. It was done by nickels and dimes given by those poor people out there who realize that something must be done.

Mr. McPHEE: What about the promise of $25 per month?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If the leader of this Liberal government had kept his promise they would have got their $25 a month. Do hon. members know that the leader of this government said, "I wish with all my heart that social credit may succeed"? His policy was "hands off Alberta". Any hon. member knows that Alberta has had every obstacle put in its way, and chiefly right from the Liberal party in this house.

Mr. REID: The hon. member knows that is false.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It will be something more serious, and will not be laughed off so easily. It would do hon. members of the Liberal party good to go through the western provinces and see some of the conditions out there. If they did they would realize that the people of the west are sincere in their desire to rid themselves of the condition in which they find themselves.

Hon. members ask about what the Social Credit government has done with respect to its promises. I say that Alberta has been discriminated against on every hand. To-day Manitoba is bringing down legislation which will increase bank taxation to the extent of about $50,000. I venture to say that the Manitoba bill will not be disallowed. They are increasing the corporation tax to the extent of $350,000, but that bill will not be disallowed. The province of Ontario is increasing taxation in connection with banks, but that bill will not be disallowed. Why not? Why are these bills not disallowed? The padlock law of Quebec was not disallowed. Why not? The answer is only too obvious.

As was pointed out by the right hon. the leader of the opposition, the banks should stand on their own feet. That is all we ask out there. One of the members of the Liberal party—I believe it was the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) is reported to have said that banking institutions were the biggest swindle in the Dominion of Canada, or anywhere in the world. Why not let the banks stand on their own feet? If that were done we would soon find that Alberta would take care of itself, and that no favours would be asked from eastern Canada.

I do not think it is in the interests of Canada that there should be set up differences between the people in the west and those in the east. It is my belief that we should make every endeavour to bring these two parts of the dominion together. We must make an effort to save the Dominion of Canada. The actions of the present government have done more to disrupt our confederation than anything that has been done in the past, or is likely to be done in the future.

I should like to refer briefly to the statement of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) with reference to certain laws in Quebec. He is reported on page 182 of Hansard as follows:

> I wonder how my fellow citizens of Quebec would like it if we had a system under which the provinces would disappear, where a nazi or totalitarian form of government in Ottawa would direct everything and everybody?

Thank goodness the people of Quebec have some intelligence and are able to see in which direction things are going. Why do they oppose this amendment to the British North America Act? Because they see that the purpose of the government is to form a centralized government and take all power from the provinces. The provinces will not be legislators in any sense of the word, they will be mere administrators. How can the government expect the provinces to agree to a bill the terms of which they do not even know? This reminds me of the loan council which it was proposed Alberta should join. Alberta did not know what it was all about and refused to join. Then Saskatchewan and British Columbia came and asked for a loan and got it without being asked to agree to the loan council. No wonder the provinces are trying to save their autonomy. The purpose of this government is not to have a united Canada, but a united dominion government. The provincial governments will become mere administrators. I think the province of Quebec should be congratulated upon seeing that far ahead.

Some reference has been made to the proposed amendment to the British North America Act. I do not intend to speak on this matter at any length as I think it has been covered quite ably by my colleague, the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl). The point is that the provinces are being asked to agree to an amendment about which they know nothing, and about which they have no way of knowing unless this government gives them the desired information. Anyone can see that the purpose of the government is to centralize power, to take all power away from the provinces, and, as I have said, leave them as mere administrators.

Why is it necessary to have so much governmental expense? There is no question that we are over-governed. I agree with the hon. member for Jasper-Edson when he says that what we need is not an amended constitution but a new constitution under which no province will be left with a grievance. I believe that we could do away entirely with our present form of dominion government. I suggest that there should be fifteen members in each of the provincial legislatures to look after provincial affairs. Then the premiers of all the provinces could meet for six or eight weeks, or perhaps three months in every year, as a dominion government. In that way more work would be done and there would be more unity in the dominion. The different premiers would know more about the problems which face the provinces than we do as members of this House of Commons. A great deal of trouble between the provinces, would be avoided, and the tendency would be to hold them more closely together. We would then have a properly constituted confederation.

Mention was made the other day of the distribution of relief in the west, and I want to take this opportunity to thank the government for what has been done. This work was carried out in a most admirable way, although there were some abuses about which the government may not have information. It is a wonderful thing that the people of eastern Canada saw fit to come to the assistance of the people in the west. However, in some instances, perhaps through laxity of administration, abuses did occur and advantage was taken of this distribution of food.

When carloads of apples, cheese and beans arrived at places in my constituency and outside of it, every solitary person in the particular town got some relief. An hon. member of the government, from what constituency I have forgotten at the moment, referred the other day to the fact that everyone was more than satisfied. I know of cases where everybody in a town, including the doctor, lawyer and storekeeper, got boxes of apples and other foodstuffs. The food was never sent out west with that intention, and I am sure those who sent it would not be at all pleased if they knew that some of it had been distributed to people who had an over-abundance. In conclusion, I express the hope that the government will check up on this matter more closely and see that these things are not distributed in that way.

I intend to support the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the people of my constituency and the province of Alberta I should like to join with the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) in thanking the people of the other provinces of Canada for the help extended in our recent need. The supplies sent in were very much needed by the people and they certainly were appreciated. We are hoping that conditions in Alberta and throughout Canada will improve to such an extent that everyone will be able to stand on his own feet and provide himself with a livelihood without applying for help from other parts of the dominion.

The speech from the throne referred to the fact that there has been a further substantial advance in Canada's economic recovery. I am sure we are all glad to hear it, but I am sorry to say that some of us have not been able to share in that prosperity. We find evidence of a large increase in the output of our mining industry, but we also find a considerable decrease in our agricultural production. Wheat production has been one of the mainstays of the dominion in years gone by. In 1937 the production amounted to approximately 182,000,000 bushels. At one time we figured on an average production of around sixteen bushels per acre, but the average production last year in my district amounted to only eight bushels per acre, and this year it is down to between three and four bushels. The farming communities of Alberta have not felt the benefits of improved economic conditions in Canada.

The mining industry is gaining ground quite steadily, but, if I may use the phrase, this gain has been abused to some extent. Several million dollars' worth of war materials have been exported, and it is possible that in the near future these materials may be used to kill our young men who may be called to defend the country. A short time ago I was reading a book entitled Merchants of Death, and I read the following at page 254:

In England the Imperial Chemical Industries (I.C.I.) monopolizes the chemical industry.

It, too, owes its real importance to German patents which it secured after the war. It is very closely tied to the government and frankly acknowledges its readiness for war. It was this company in which Sir John Simon held 1,512 shares which he sold during the far eastern disturbances. Sir Austen Chamberlain was at the same time shown in possession of 666 shares, and Neville Chamberlain the holder of 11,747 shares. In order to guarantee its national character, it is provided that non-Britons may never hold more than twenty-five per cent of the total shares.

I have often wondered whether war can be prevented by governments or whether it is encouraged by governments. I find from that same book that the press has been used to a very great extent for the promotion of war and, at the same time, the sale of large quantities of armaments. If we are selling war materials for the purpose of maintaining wars or making large profits out of the manufacture of armaments, I should like to see our economic recovery retarded a little by withholding the sale of these materials for war purposes.

In the speech from the throne no reference is made to reductions in taxation. Two years ago we were asked to increase the sales tax from six to eight per cent, and we find now that boasts are being made of the large amount of revenue that is being collected. I should very much like to see that sales tax reduced, if not removed entirely, so that people who are in the bread line or on the border line between the bread line and something just a little better may have an opportunity to get the necessaries of life without having to pay a tax of eight per cent.

It is also proposed to increase our radio licence fee by fifty cents. Personally I do not kick about an increase of fifty cents, which means only one cent a week; but the house must remember that there are in this country many people who have not money enough to buy necessary food and clothing, and to whom this increase of fifty cents will mean quite a little.

The youth training movement is something which I believe everyone is glad to see advanced. Personally I should like to see a little more money spent for this purpose. For the last eight or nine years at least we all know that thousands of young men and women who have left school, and some of them universities, have been unable to find work when they got out and have been having a hard time of it. Many of them have hopped on freight trains, if they could dodge the police, and set out to look for work wherever they could find it. As a result of these conditions crime has been on the increase, and it is not the fault of these young people, because they have to eat, and being refused help, they have to do something for themselves.

I think changes should be made in the regulations governing the youth training movement so as to permit young men from the farms to take up other lines of work. At present a young man who has his home on the farm, no matter how poor that home is, cannot go into one of these training schools unless he is able to pay for his own board and lodging. I do not think that is fair. It excludes many young men on our farms who are not satisfied with farm life, and who would be only too glad to learn some trade which they could be taught under the youth training scheme.

There are quite a number of royal commissions at work throughout the country at the present time, and we hope to have some of their reports for study in the near future. The national employment commission is, I believe, about wound up, and it finished its labours without making a complete registration of the unemployed and those on relief. For instance, you could pick out family after family in western Canada, and in eastern Canada as well, where there are young men and women unemployed, but because they have a home they do not register as unemployed.

We are expecting very soon a report from the royal commission that is inquiring into the textile industry; also a report from the veterans' assistance commission. A number of us are hoping that something radical will be done for the veterans this session. It is now nearly twenty years since they came back to Canada. Before leaving for the front they were told that Canada would take care of them when they returned, but up to the present this has not been done to the extent we desire.

The wheat commission is also sitting; and then there is the Rowell commission, as to which all the provinces do not agree. We have also on the table before us the report of the committee that inquired into prices of agricultural machinery. The report was tabled last session, and I understand still lies on the table. I hope drastic action will be taken to reduce prices when that report is finally adopted by the house. In 1935 the tariff on farm machinery amounted to 25 per cent. At that time an 8-foot International McCormick-Deering binder, delivered at my nearest station, cost $272.50 cash. In the 1936 session legislation was passed reducing the tariff from 25 to 7½ per cent on agricultural implements, but still anybody who wanted to buy a binder to cut his 1936 crop had to pay $290, or an additional $17.50 even after the tariff had been cut by 17½ per cent. We have gone to school, some of us perhaps longer than others, but by no system of mathematics can we figure out just how the price could increase that much with a reduction in the tariff of 17½ per cent.

The profits of the International Harvester Company amounted in 1935 to $19,618,000, and in 1936, apparently taking advantage of the tariff reduction and an increase in their prices, their profits were $29,760,000. An investigation at that time showed that the company had also a secret fund of $40,000,000, which had not been disclosed up to that time. In view of this and other information brought out, we are hoping that the government will carry out at least one of its promises and do something in connection with farm machinery prices.

Turning now to prices of motor cars, you have your automobile factories in Ontario, and your car prices are not very much affected by freight rates. Just the same, car prices here, as all hon. members know, are far higher than they should be, much higher than they are in the United States; but on account of the subsidies given to manufacturers, those prices are allowed to continue. Those of us who live in the west have to pay heavy freight charges on the ordinary light car. Take for instance the Chevrolet; it costs us for freight $135 in addition to the price paid in Ontario, so that residents in the east are a little better off in this respect than we are. Considering the price we have to pay for our cars, and the tariff protection provided for car manufacturers in Canada, I was interested to read the following in the Edmonton Journal of January 10, 1938:

> Washington, Jan. 10. A congressional committee, giving the public a peek into the 1936 pay envelopes of the United States' highest paid industrialists, movie stars and financiers, disclosed Sunday Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., of General Motors, tops the list with $561,311. Thirteen men received in excess of $300,000 each for the year, the report showed, and nine of them were officials of the General Motors Corporation. William S. Knudsen, its vice-president, ranked second to Sloan, with $459,878. . . . The report showed that 336 General Motors Corporation officials received $15,000 or more and 56 of them got at least $50,000.

In view of the conditions existing in Canada to-day, of the millions of dollars which have been handed out in relief or are to be paid at some future day, and of the salaries which I have read to the house, is this not another place where the government might consider tariff reductions and give the people another break? Most of us are pretty well broke at the present time; give them the other kind of break for a change.

It costs quite a lot for the gasoline required in the operation of an automobile. In this connection I was interested to find the following report of what took place the other day before the tariff board. I quote from the Ottawa Journal of February 5, 1938:

> Widespread cheating of Montreal motorists as they buy gasoline was alleged before the tariff board Friday by Charles E. Austin, representing the Joy Oil Company, operating in Toronto and Montreal.
> Austin said his company had sent a test car to seventy-five Montreal stations. The car was operated on a special gasoline tank. Purchased gasoline went into another tank. At 68 of the 75 stations short measure was received, in many cases the shortages ranging from one to three gallons on five-gallon purchases.
>
> He charged the alleged evil became apparent when the major oil companies abandoned direct operations of their retail stations and leased them to individuals.
> "It is what I would expect in the long run and over the whole picture unless the number of stations is greatly reduced," said Chairman George Sedgewick. "If the load is put on the boys running the stations, then the loss is there. Somebody's got to pay for the fool distribution system and if the companies won't then the lessees of the stations must."

Here, again, is an abuse which I believe can be remedied if the proper action is taken. We have laws on our statute books regulating weights and measures, and such a glaring case as this, where in sixty-eight of seventy-five stations short measure is received, sometimes ranging from one to three gallons on a five-gallon purchase, looks like rampant short measure operations. Or, to go a little further away, if the government intend to do anything about this I suggest that they check up on barrel measures being supplied in different parts of Canada. In the past I have bought quite a lot of gasoline in barrels, and it is nothing new to find that the gas comes only within six or sometimes eight inches of the top, when in order to get full measure it should be close to the top of the barrel.

I understand that the elections and franchise acts are to come up at this session for amendment. Here, also, something radical should be done. In view of information which has been received during the past two weeks and commented upon on both sides of the house, it seems to me that drastic amendments should be brought in, and if we are not able to rectify the wrongs by amendments to these acts we should proceed to amend whatever are the appropriate statutes. I do not think there is any doubt that wrongs exist, and the common people again must pay the shot. If our people were treated with the justice to which they are entitled, probably relief could be cut to a considerable extent.

Another matter in which I am very much interested is the wheat board. At the last session a number of protests were forwarded to Ottawa. To those protests the government has turned a deaf ear. One hon. member of this house, speaking before the royal commission, is reported to have said that "the government have sterilized the Wheat Board Act." That is about what it amounts to. It seems strange that they should have done so. We know that many farmers, particularly in the west, were depending upon that board to obtain for them a square deal. We know that very little reason is apparent at times for the price of grain on the exchange going up or down. Here is an instance of a prediction which looked very foolish but nevertheless had the desired effect and, I assume, enabled certain people to make large profits. I read from a market letter sent out by the Searle Grain Company, February 3, 1938:

A few days ago the world wheat advisory committee issued a formal statement to the effect that if the present world wheat acreage is maintained, and if average yields should occur, and if the demand for wheat does not increase, then a disastrous glut of wheat would appear by August 1st, 1940. The committee estimated that on that date the world wheat carryover, or surplus, would be not less than 1,370 million bushels.

The immediate effect of this news was to unsettle wheat markets. Price dropped two cents at Chicago, with corresponding drops on other markets. World wheat buyers and millers could not be expected to be over-anxious about stocking up their bins when the London wheat committee suggested there will probably be a disastrous glut of wheat in the near future.

That is all supposition. I read three "ifs" there and on the strength of those ifs, which we know might be shattered by several different circumstances, the price of wheat dropped two cents a bushel.

We find also that as soon as the farmer starts to haul his wheat the price goes down and stays down during the time he is delivering his grain. Commencing August 1, 1936, and continuing until December 12 of that year—the period that most of the wheat is delivered by the farmers—the low at Fort William for the period was 96⅝ cents and the high $1.14¾. Commencing again with the week ending December 19 we find that the low from that period until the end of the 1936-37 crop year was $1.20⅝ and the high $1.50⅞. The purpose of the wheat board is to level up the average selling price and give those who are compelled to sell immediately after threshing just as good a price as is received by the man who is able to hold until a later day. It is also meant to take some of the speculation out of wheat, but perhaps that would make the farmers too prosperous, so we are denied the right to use that board unless the price of wheat gets below the cost of production.

Last season we had the very strange condition of both price and grade of wheat dropping. I know one man who at the end of August, started to haul less than 2,000 bushels of wheat; when he started it was grade No. 1 but by the time he had finished it had dropped to grade No. 3. That is a serious matter and one that should be taken care of by this government. We find also that the difference in price and grades ran as high as at least 29½ cents that I know of between No. 1 and No. 3, and as high as 20 cents between No. 2 and No. 3. For quite a number of years we were accustomed to the spread between No. 1 and No. 3 running around 8 cents. In the past elevator companies by keeping their elevators nearly full were able to make quite substantial earnings on the storage of grain. But this year, because the grain was not there, apparently some other way had to be found, and I suggest that this spread in price is to help pay the overhead of the elevators. It seems very strange that at the beginning of the season the grade of practically all kinds of grain, whether old or new, dropped down to No. 3. I know one small town from which eight cars of No. 1 were shipped last season; samples were taken of that grain and sent in and came back in some cases No. 2 and in some cases No. 3. So it looks as though the graders this year do not know their business or else those last year did not know it. Again, after most of the grain had left the farmer's hands we find the grading has eased up to a very considerable extent. For some weeks before I left to come to Ottawa some farmers were getting No. 2 again, although that was impossible at one time when the grain was going in from the farm.

Now I should like to read part of a speech delivered here by the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) on March 30 last, reported at page 2294 of Hansard. Replying to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) the Minister of Justice said:

With regard to disallowance, I am surprised that the hon. member should suggest the disallowance of provincial legislation.

Mr. Woodsworth: I did not suggest it.

Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East): Ordinarily the hon. member is very much opposed to arbitrary measures.

Mr. Woodsworth: May I say I did not suggest it. I said there was a power of disallowance, but I made another suggestion.

Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East): For many years the power of disallowance has not been resorted to by the government of Canada. The same power of disallowance existed in connection with federal legislation in the hands of His Majesty the King, represented of course by the Imperial government. That power has not been exercised for many years. In fact, at the imperial conference of 1926, and later in 1930, it was formally declared that this power no longer constitutionally exists, and that the imperial parliament has no constitutional right to disallow laws of the parliament of a dominion.

I would not say the same condition would apply to provincial legislation, but it has often been stated by the courts that within the sphere of their own jurisdiction the provincial legislatures are sovereign. I do not think that in a federation such as this the power of disallowance could easily be exercised by the central government. I believe the provincial legislatures feel that they are still supreme and sovereign within the sphere of their jurisdiction.

I understand the act has been assented to by the lieutenant governor. If, as the hon. member suggests, it is ultra vires, then the courts will so rule. The courts will declare that it is ultra vires, and it is better that the courts so declare than that the Minister of Justice do so, because there would be no appeal from disallowance by the minister. On the other hand there would be appeal from a court decision, and there would be a final judgment as to whether or not it is within the powers of a province to legislate in the matter.

A little further on he says:

The hon. member spoke of communism and the way to fight it. He asked what our stand against communism would be. I am pleased that the debate gives me an opportunity to express my views as to the doctrine of revolutionary communism. I have never concealed my views on the subject. I am opposed to everything that they teach and preach. I am against their doctrine on moral, religious and sociological grounds. With the exception of a few individuals, I think our whole population is opposed to the spreading of this doctrine. I believe the best way to fight communism is to eliminate the causes of discontent which exist among many classes of our population. We should try to give justice to everyone, to the poor, the same as to the rich, to the humble the same as to the powerful. We should endeavour to eliminate the grievances and abuses which now exist in our system. But while that system may need reforming, we still want to keep it.

I believe that is a good idea. I was very glad to hear the minister say that, and something more a little later in that same speech, but I am sorry that since that time he has turned in the other direction. We find that other powers are crushing Canada to-day, and that the minister, as well as the government, has seen fit to adopt those oppressors. Speaking the other day the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Mallette) said, as reported at page 114 of Hansard:

The question of repealing the padlock law should be left to the people of Quebec; this government should not exercise its power of disallowance. If a demand comes from a strong section of the people of Quebec then the matter might be considered. However, one of these days the people of Quebec will have an opportunity to say at the polls whether or not they are satisfied with the government that passed that law, and it will be time enough to deal with the matter then.

I find in talking with a number of hon. members that the same thoughts are expressed by them. I wonder whether these members will tell their leader so, tell him that the will of the people in any province should be supreme. If a law exists for the oppression of the people, that law should stand back and the will of the people take the place of the law.

I believe with several other hon. members that conditions in Canada have got to be changed, conditions all over the world have got to be changed, and if we do not do it peacefully they will have to be changed otherwise. A little over two years ago the people of Alberta decided that a change was necessary and elected a government to make that change, and I believe the change is pretty well in line with the proposals made by the Prime Minister, speaking particularly at Saskatoon on September 21, 1935, when he asked for a sweeping Liberal victory so that they could fight the battle in the new parliament against the money powers. The government of Alberta began and is still continuing that fight against the money power, but we find that this government, under the leadership of the present Prime Minister, has become part of our opposition. While things are not travelling very quickly, there is a fight ahead. The people have been oppressed in the past; they are not going to sit down and take that forever. When people are allowed to starve while there is plenty to eat, plenty to wear and plenty of material with which to build better houses, I think this government should make a start, together with the government of Alberta, and do something to help those who are faced with such serious difficulties.

I have a little verse which I am going to commend to the consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite:

It's All Up To You

You are the ones who have to decide Whether you'll do it—or lay it aside.
You are the ones to make up your minds
Whether you'll lead or will linger behind,
Whether you'll try for the goal that's afar,
Or be contented to stay as you are.
Take it or leave it, there's something to do
Just think it over, it's all up to YOU!

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER

AMENDMENT OF STANDING ORDER 56 TO PROVIDE FOR APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That standing order 56 be amended by adding the following as section (5):

(5) At the commencement of every session, or from time to time as necessity may arise, the house may appoint a deputy chairman of committees who shall, whenever the chairman of committees is absent, be entitled to exercise all the powers vested in the chairman of committees including his powers as deputy speaker during Mr. Speaker's unavoidable absence.

He said: Mr. Speaker, standing order No. 56 has to do with the office and duties of the Deputy Speaker. The Speaker of the House of Commons Act provides that at the beginning of each parliament the house shall appoint, first, a speaker, and then a chairman of committees. The act also contains provision for the appointment of a deputy chairman of committees, but that right has not thus far been availed of, and there is at present no rule of the house relating to a deputy chairman of committees.

The circumstance which has brought the matter to the attention of the government at this time is that the Deputy Speaker and chairman of committees, Mr. Sanderson, is likely to be absent from the house until towards the end of March, he having been chosen by the Empire Parliamentary Association as one of the delegates to represent Canada at the 150th anniversary of the founding of Australia. It has been pointed out that if it should so happen that His Honour the Speaker were absent at the same time as the Deputy Speaker, the house might, pending some action formally agreed upon, find it impossible to meet until we succeeded in having either His Honour the Speaker or the Deputy Speaker return to his place.

To avoid a possibility of that kind, and in conformance with the practice followed at Westminster, I have introduced the resolution now before the house. If it is adopted it will make possible the appointment of a deputy to the chairman of committees, and I shall then suggest, for this position an hon. member whose name will, I believe, appeal to all hon. members.

I may say that this resolution does not contemplate the appointment of a deputy chairman for the entire term of parliament, but simply for the session and from time to time as occasion may arise. There are similar orders, not at Westminster only but in the parliaments of the other self-governing dominions.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that only one question arises in this matter: is it competent under the statute as it now stands to confer the powers of the Speaker upon a deputy chairman of committees? I am bound to say that I find it difficult to give an affirmative answer to that question. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has pointed out that the Speaker of the House of Commons Act provides for the election of a speaker and that under our standing rule we have a chairman of committees who has exercised the powers of the Speaker when the Speaker has been absent; but I have some doubt that we can name a deputy of the chairman of committees and confer upon him the powers of the Speaker.

I assume the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has given this matter his consideration and has arrived at a satisfactory conclusion, otherwise the resolution would not have been introduced. It seems to me the safe course to pursue would be to have the chairman of committees, when parliament meets, tender his resignation for the session, and then elect a chairman of committees. That would obviate any possible difficulty that might arise with respect to conferring the powers of the Speaker upon a deputy chairman of committees. This is the only observation I have to make, and I shall be glad to hear whether the Minister of Justice has satisfied himself on this point.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I may say to my right hon. friend that I really believe this is a regular method of procedure during the absence of the Deputy Speaker. The question has been considered by the department and we could find no other way of dealing with it.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, with your consent I shall put again to the Minister of Justice the method which I conceive to be the safe way of dealing with this. I do not believe he got my observation, because he was reading the statute at the time.

I say we should ask the chairman of committees to resign his office for the session, or declare the office vacant by reason of his absence; then by motion of this house we could elect one of our members as chairman of committees. It will be remembered that we had the same difficulty in connection with the oaths act and that we had to go to the imperial parliament for the necessary legislation. Our constitutional statute certainly does not provide for the appointment of a deputy chairman of committees and his being clothed with the powers of the Speaker. With respect to committees, it is a simple matter; with respect to the Chair, it is difficult and complicated. I mention this only because I am unable to find any constitutional authority to deal with it. I think the safe course would be as I have indicated. It is certainly not contemplated that the chairman of committees shall be absent; it is contemplated that he will be here, and when he is within the country I personally would think that the effect of this would be to vacate the office for the session.

I thank the Minister of Justice for his courtesy in permitting me to make this statement after he had made his.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The suggestion of my right hon. friend would meet the case except that it would mean the reappointment of the Deputy Speaker when he returns home.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I can only repeat that this matter has been considered by the Clerk of the House and the law officers of the department and the decision was that this would provide a satisfactory manner of dealing with it.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. J. FREDERICK JOHNSTON AS DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That Mr. J. Frederick Johnston, the member for the electoral district of Lake Centre, be appointed deputy chairman of committees of the whole house.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT, 1934

SICK MARINERS AND MARINE HOSPITALS—LEVY, COLLECTION AND REMISSION OF SHIP DUES

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Canada Shipping Act, 1934 (part V, sick mariners and marine hospitals), in respect to the levy and collection, and in certain cases the remission, of ship dues.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

AUTHORITY FOR EXTENSION BEYOND THE CONFINES OF CANADA

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937, to empower the governor in council to authorize the minister to enter into a contract for the extension of the Trans-Canada Lines of aircraft beyond the confines of Canada.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT COMMISSION

AUTHORITY TO CONTROL TRANSPORT OF PASSENGERS AND GOODS BY RAILWAYS, SHIPS AND AIRCRAFT

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure conferring authority upon a transport commission (the board of railway commissioners to be known as such) to license, regulate and control the transport of passengers and goods by railways, ships and aircraft, and to fix licence fees and transportation tolls and charges and regulate and control other matters incidental thereto.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

INSPECTION AND SALE

PROPOSED REGULATIONS RESPECTING BINDER TWINE, SALT AND OTHER COMMODITIES

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to regulate the inspection and sale of binder twine and salt, to establish weight of bushel for certain commodities commonly sold by the bushel and to authorize the appointment of inspectors and analysts.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT, 1934

CONTROL OF SHIPMENT OF MUNITIONS BY SHIPS REGISTERED IN CANADA

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 9, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, 1934.

He said: This bill was prepared for last session, but as that session was shortened on account of the coronation and the imperial conference proceedings it became impracticable to introduce it then.

It will be recalled that during last session parliament amended section 290 of the Customs Act in order, among other things, to modernize and make more effective the long standing power to control the export from Canada of arms and munitions of war, including articles capable of being converted thereinto or made useful in the production thereof. That amendment was the result of careful inquiries conducted by the government into the proceedings of the committee of the Geneva disarmament conference which had studied the international traffic in arms and munitions. The actual practice of other countries in the same field was also considered. Last year's legislation, so far as the control of exports is concerned, placed Canada in line with many other countries throughout the world, including Great Britain and the United States and western European countries.

In pursuance of that legislation the government, also in line with the practice of the countries mentioned, has established a licensing system covering a specified list of arms, ammunition and implements of war. This list is in general conformity with a list which was compiled by the committee of the disarmament conference and with similar lists adopted by other countries. The result is that none of the arms or other articles specified in the list can be exported from Canada without a licence issued by the Department of National Revenue. The applicant for such a licence is required to give full information regarding the proposed export, and upon his furnishing this information the licence is issued, except in cases where a duly authorized restriction has been placed upon exports to the proposed destination. The result of such licensing systems established by various countries is that information becomes readily available as to the extent and character of the trade in arms.

In further pursuance of last year's amendment of the Customs Act, an order in council was passed at the end of July, 1937, specifically prohibiting the export to Spain of this list of arms, munitions and implements of war; so that no licences can be granted for such exports to Spanish territory. As is well known, twenty-seven European countries were engaged in an effort to carry out a non-intervention agreement respecting the Spanish conflict. This agreement, whatever may be said as to evasions of it, contemplated that the countries concerned should refrain from supplying arms and implements of war to either side of that conflict. It is understood that the broad aim of the agreement is to prevent other countries from becoming embroiled and thus to prevent the conflict from spreading, while it was also hoped to shorten the conflict. Canada is not a party to the non-intervention agreement; but it is no part of Canadian policy to intervene in the Spanish conflict, and it was undersirable to leave Canada in a position of seeming to sanction activities which might to some extent defeat or run counter to the purposes of the agreement and to the general policy of neutrality. Accordingly, the above mentioned order in council of July last was passed. It will be recalled that earlier in the year the United States government had also prohibited the export of a similar list of arms and implements of war to Spain or Spanish territory. The United States also is not a party to the non-intervention agreement.

The expediency of the present bill also arises from the general situation as explained above. More immediately its preparation was suggested by various incidents affecting shipping which have occurred from time to time since the beginning of the Spanish conflict.

When the bill is carefully examined, however, in relation to our existing legislation and to the actual state of Canadian shipping, it will be found that its practical effect has only a narrow scope. The bill gives power to exercise a certain control over the activities of Canadian ships—that is to say, ships on Canadian registry—which might become involved in some incident of an international conflict. In this connection two situations have to be considered. The first is where a ship carries arms or munitions of war shipped from a Canadian port and destined for countries or regions which are in a state of war or conflict. Practically speaking, that situation can already be completely controlled under section 290 of the Customs Act as amended last session; because, whenever a proper case arises, shipments of such goods from Canadian ports, whether by ships on Canadian registry or on any other registry, can be prevented under the power to prohibit exports from Canada. The second situation is where a Canadian ship trading abroad might, at some foreign port, accept for carriage a cargo of such warlike articles for carriage to some foreign country or region other than those engaged in war or conflict. That is a situation which it is possible for Canada to control, since Canada possesses jurisdiction over the activities of her own merchant ships wherever they may be. It is that situation which the bill, therefore, is primarily intended to cover, although incidentally, to be consistent, it includes a like power over Canadian ships trading from Canadian ports. It may further be noted that in actual fact Canada has no great merchant marine engaged in trade between foreign ports and other foreign ports.

But while, as noted, the bill may have a narrow practical effect, it is considered useful to have this precautionary power on the statute books in case necessity arises and in order to be able, if desirable, to ensure that Canada may not run counter to some international policy adopted by other countries with which Canada may agree.

The broad object might be regarded as twofold: To be able in appropriate cases to avoid what might be taken as a Canadian public policy of intervention in some conflict, and to be able to prevent Canadian registered ships, for their own sake, from getting into difficult situations.

It may be noted that this proposal is in line with measures taken by other countries. In December, 1936, the United Kingdom parliament adopted similar legislation known as the Merchant Shipping (Carriage of munitions to Spain) Act, 1936. The scheme of the present bill gives a general power of control in such situations rather than a power confined to one particular situation. Under the United States neutrality legislation a similar kind of control over United States shipping is provided.

The bill provides for a new section—No. 703A—to be inserted in our basic shipping legislation, that is, the Canada Shipping Act, 1934. Under subsections 1, 2 and 3 the governor in council may by regulation designate the territory in a state of war or armed conflict to which the section is to apply, and the arms, ammunition or other materials which are to be affected, and thereupon it will be unlawful for a Canadian ship to carry such articles from a foreign port, or from a Canadian port either to the area of conflict. Subsections 4, 5, 6 and 7, together with other penalty sections of the basic Canada Shipping Act, provide for such matters as the definition of the indictable offence, the jurisdiction of the exchequer court and certain other courts, the powers of certain officers, and generally speaking the means for enforcing the purposes of the proposed new section.

The newspapers have perhaps given some erroneous impressions as to the scope and purpose of the bill. Some reports seem to give the impression that the bill means that the government intend to embark upon some new policy in connection with the international situation. As noted above, however, the bill was prepared last session and did not get introduced for lack of time. It is, in a sense, supplementary to the purpose of the amendment to section 290 of the Customs Act passed last session, and its preparation was suggested by certain shipping incidents arising from the Spanish conflict. As also noted above, the practical effect and scope of the bill are probably very narrow but it nevertheless seems a useful precaution, and it puts Canada in line with other countries.

One report indicated that, in defining the articles to be affected, the bill considerably extended the definition of such articles which was included in the amendment to section 290 of the Customs Act last year. This is not so, as can easily be seen by comparing subsection 3 of section 1 of the present bill with paragraph (b) of section 290 of the Customs Act as amended. The definitions are the same. Section 290 of the Customs Act provides that the governor in council may—

(b) prohibit, restrict or control the exportation, generally or to any destination, directly or indirectly, or the carrying coastwise or by inland navigation, of arms, military, naval or air stores, or any articles deemed capable of being converted thereinto or made useful in the production thereof, or provisions or any sort of victual which may be used as food by man or beast.

Thus it will be seen that the definition of the articles affected by the present bill is precisely the same as the definition employed last year in amending section 290 of the Customs Act to describe the articles whose export from Canada might be controlled.

It has to be borne in mind always that the present bill is only a measure to provide powers. The bill itself prevents nothing. Like section 290 of the Customs Act it simply provides a precautionary power to take certain action in the future if the interests of Canada should appear to warrant such action. The insertion of the words in question cannot be taken to mean that the government have in mind any situation which would warrant making use of them in present circumstances.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Inasmuch as our rules provide that on the second reading of a bill the principle of it only shall be discussed, and the details contained in the sections should not be considered, I content myself with saying that the principle is the control, so far as our jurisdiction may enable us to exercise it, of the shipment of munitions of war in Canadian vessels. That is as far as it goes, and I am afraid that a great many words are used in the section to accomplish very little. As the minister himself knows, whatever benefits may accrue lie within a very narrow base. There are some details of the measure which require amplification and explanation, but everyone is agreed, I believe, that we should have the power, and that will expedite the passage of the bill through this chamber, because no one will deny that parliament should authorize somebody to have the necessary control of a matter of this kind. If the Customs Act as amended last year is not broad enough to deal with it, we should of course proceed with this amendment of the shipping act; but I question very seriously, for reasons that are obvious, the extent to which the powers can be exercised.

[Mr. Howe.]

The real crux of the matter lies in the fact that a single section might have covered all that is contemplated, because the governor in council is the motive power behind any action that may be taken. Within its jurisdiction and within the rules and regulations and orders in council passed by it must be found any value or benefit that may attach to this measure. The explanations in the subsections are only an amplification of the power that is to be exercised after the governor in council has made such provisions for the operation of the act as are regarded by the government of the day as being necessary.

I have some questions to ask the minister in respect to the question involved. He indicated a moment ago that there had been no matters arising in this country with respect to the Spanish conflict. I think he will find on investigation that from Paris were sent cables, to which a negative answer was given by the government here, as to the shipment of certain articles of trade and commerce from Canada to Spain. My memory does not serve me at the moment as to which one of the belligerents they would go to, but certainly a negative answer was given as to permission for the handling of certain traffic which was offered, involving some millions of dollars, and the commodities in question were not shipped from this country. I recall that vigorous complaints were made, that this should have been prevented. Perhaps some details will be given when the matter is in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 1—Prohibition of shipment of articles of war to countries in a state of war.

Mr. BENNETT: Can it be said that that is quite what this section says? The ship now is out of Canada and out of Canadian waters; she is in the Mediterranean; how can we reach that ship there and in what manner would we enforce our fiat with respect to the matter, assuming that the governor in council has declared that some section or area in the Mediterranean is an area to which the act applies?

Mr. HOWE: A Canadian ship is always under the jurisdiction of the laws of Canada. If a ship breaks the law by carrying war materials from a Mediterranean port to a country at war it will be subject to the penalties provided by the act.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has not followed me. The ship is laden with munitions in France and sails for the Mediterranean; she arrives in the Mediterranean and begins to discharge her cargo of munitions. She may never come back to a Canadian port.

Mr. HOWE: Well, our officers are Canadian seamen. We could at least penalize the officers. That is, we could strike them off the register. Some time or another a Canadian ship surely must come back to Canadian shores.

Mr. BENNETT: She need not.

Mr. HOWE: But in any case the seamen are subject to the law. It is the same, I suppose, as with any criminal; he may evade the policing authority; he may never be called to answer for his crimes. So it would be in the case of a Canadian ship that never comes back to Canada. Nevertheless I believe her officers and crew would find it necessary at some time to make use of their Canadian articles.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister has admitted that from a practical standpoint the scope of this bill is not very great. Could the minister give us some information as to what ships of Canadian registry are now engaged in the transatlantic or transpacific trade?

Mr. HOWE: We have two ships on the west coast from Vancouver to the Philippines and China and Japan, and we have a fleet between Canada and the West Indies on the east coast. That is all that occurs to me at the moment.

Mr. BENNETT: Are they on Canadian registry?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, the two Canadian Pacific ships are. The two running to Australia are on Australian registry.

Mr. BENNETT: And those on the Atlantic are on British registry?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Could the minister tell us how this could be used in respect to the fighting in China? For instance, could the Empress boats out of Vancouver be prevented from carrying munitions from the Philippines to Hongkong?

Mr. HOWE: The two ships registered in Canada could be prevented from carrying munitions or supplies, anything that the governor in council designated as prohibited material.

Mr. GREEN: Could they also be prevented from carrying from, say Manila to Hongkong?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, that is really the purpose of the bill. There are other ways of preventing those ships from carrying munitions from Canada to China; they could be prevented under the Customs Act. But this amendment would give us power to prohibit those ships from carrying from Manila to China.

Mr. GREEN: So that when this amendment goes through the government will have power to prevent shipment of munitions from Vancouver to China?

Mr. HOWE: Exactly. We have that power now.

Mr. BENNETT: Not under this section but under the Customs Act.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, under the Customs Act.

Mr. COLDWELL: Do I understand that the two ships referred to on the Pacific are the Canadian Pacific Empress boats?

Mr. HOWE: They are the Empress of Russia and the Empress of Asia.

Mr. HEAPS: Have we the power to prohibit the shipment of arms from Canadian ports to any country that we wish?

Mr. HOWE: Any country where a conflict is taking place and which the governor in council may designate as a prohibited area.

Mr. GREEN: Then there is no question that under the present act it would be possible for the government to prevent shipment of arms and munitions to China?

Mr. HOWE: From Canada?

Mr. GREEN: Yes, or prevent them from being picked up at Manila and taken on to Hongkong?

Mr. HOWE: Under this bill we can prevent them from being picked up at Manila and taken on, yes. Under the Customs Act we can prevent them from being shipped from Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: On any ships?

Mr. HOWE: On any ships, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister is in error in saying that we can prevent them from being shipped on a ship at Manila. Our arm does not extend to the Philippine port of Manila. Obviously if they were laden on the ship by workmen at Manila we could not stop them. We would have to name that as a prohibited territory to begin with and then we could not touch the loading; we could touch only the ship after she got into our jurisdiction. The law of the community or port would govern with respect to any proceedings taken against the ship. If the ship were libelled there she would have to be libelled in accordance with the law of that community; she could not be libelled under the Canadian law. Our arm does not extend to touch anything in that port once she is in the port or within the three mile limit. What we could do is punish someone, because the ship is of Canadian register, but we cannot interfere with the loading or unloading in that port, that not being a port in which a conflict is being waged.

Mr. SLAGHT: Surely that is as far as we can go.

Mr. HOWE: We are doing what we can, what is within our powers.

Mr. COLDWELL: This bill is of limited scope. It is in a sense discriminatory against just two ships on the Pacific, for example. Does the government contemplate using the Customs Act to cover other ships not registered in Canada and place them on the same footing in regard to the export of munitions?

Mr. HOWE: We are doing that almost every day. The section passed last year is being applied to Spain at the present time.

Mr. HEAPS: Do I understand from what the minister has just said that quite a large number of shipments have been prevented from leaving this country under the provisions of the act of last year?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps more indirectly than directly. The fact that the power is there probably stopped a good many shipments.

Mr. HEAPS: I understood the minister to say that shipments had been stopped almost every day under the Customs Act.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think what the minister said is that the provisions of the Customs Act are being applied. Naturally, when shipments to Spain are prohibited under order in council, persons in this country do not try to make such shipments.

Mr. HEAPS: Well, have many shipments been prevented from going to Spain as a result of the legislation passed a year ago?

Mr. ILSLEY: That comes within the jurisdiction of the Department of National Revenue. I cannot answer the question definitely, but I am under the impression that no one has tried to make such shipments. Efforts to ship to Spain have been insignificant or non-existent.

Mr. MARTIN: Would the point raised by the leader of the opposition be met if in 703A (1), instead of the phrase "transshipped on the high seas," a more general or comprehensive phrase were used such as "transshipped anywhere"?

Mr. HOWE: I think the point there is that to be under our control it must be on the high seas. As the leader of the opposition said, if it is in a foreign port it is under the control of the government of the country in which the port is situated.

Mr. MARTIN: Then we get into an argument. The phrase "territorial waters" does not mean the same for all countries. In some instances it is three miles; in others, twelve miles. Moreover, for some countries, the phrases "territorial waters" and marginal seas are not identical.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, I think, covered by the words "territorial waters." The section contemplates three things. One of them I find difficult to follow. First, the article shall not be discharged at any port or place in any territory designated by the governor in council for the purposes of this section. The second is, "or within the territorial waters." The third is, "on the high seas." They are all covered. But what I find it difficult to understand is this: We say that no such article consigned to or destined to any such port shall be taken on board or carried in any such ship. I would think that the language used should have been that so far as the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction it shall be so, as is frequently done. It looks strange for us to say that no one in one of these foreign ports can load goods into or discharge goods from a ship to which our arm cannot reach, except as the people or the ship may come back within this jurisdiction. If I may say so without being offensive, it really is meaningless as it reads, because no purpose can be served by enacting a prohibition against something being done in Manila, for instance, when Manila is within the legislative jurisdiction of another country and we cannot exercise any power with respect to that ship in that port. The fact that she is registered in Canada does not give us jurisdiction over the ship tied up at the dock in a foreign port. She has become subject to the local or domestic law of the port.

The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) sitting beside the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) knows of a case that engaged the attention of eminent judges for a long time concerning the jurisdiction of the local authorities and the British authorities, the ship being registered in England, in connection with a particular crime. In this case we certainly cannot prohibit the loading of anything on that ship in a foreign port. We can say that if a ship under Canadian registry does something, we may punish the owner; and the crew itself is subject to certain international obligations—I did not want to get into that phase of the matter—provided for by the convention which we signed some years ago, which was approved by this house. The sailor on that ship who is a Canadian has, by convention between all the maritime countries, of which we are one, an international status when he goes into a foreign port. That was dealt with in the last parliament.

My difficulty is that this does not mean anything. It is a prohibition in terms, in words, incapable of being made effective by any action of ours. I was suggesting that foreign people might think we were endeavouring to exercise too wide a jurisdiction, and it might be desirable to add such words as "as far as the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction." Then we would not give offence to foreign countries, nor could it be successfully contended that we had endeavoured to exercise a jurisdiction which we did not possess, that is, a jurisdiction over the ship tied up to a dock in a foreign port.

Mr. SLAGHT: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there is in connection with our legislation a presumption which goes to remove the fears the right hon. gentleman has expressed, that the section as drawn has a distinct meaning, in that we can enforce it as against British subjects, or Canadian subjects at all events, and that we do not purport to exercise jurisdiction which we do not possess over anyone in a foreign port. We merely prohibit the doing of certain things. If our Canadian citizens infringe upon our laws, then, as the section now stands, when they return I would think they can be punished.

Mr. BENNETT: Since the Statute of Westminster we have a wider power, and that presumption no longer obtains.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is another point. I am somewhat at a loss to know why we should be asked to pass this bill. As I understood the Minister of Transport, we have no boats plying between here and Spain, and the Minister of National Revenue says he cannot recall any instance in which advantage was taken of the amendment to the Customs Act. I cannot then see any necessity, as far as Spain is concerned, of putting this supplementary legislation on the statute books. The Minister of Transport seemed to me to convey the impression that this empowering legislation was sought merely because of the situation in Spain. If we are to contemplate this being used on the Pacific, then it seems to me we should have some sort of statement from the government as to the reason for this legislation. The governor in council has been given authority under the Customs Act to prohibit anything being shipped to Spain.

Mr. ILSLEY: To any country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; Spain has been designated.

Mr. ILSLEY: By order in council.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is what I thought I said.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not by the legislation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; by order in council Spain has been designated. Why should we not have China or Japan designated as another country?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a matter of policy.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so; but I think at this stage, when we are asked to give supplementary powers, we should know what is the policy of the government with respect to this matter. Apparently it is only the ships on the Pacific that will be affected by this legislation; two Canadian Pacific ships are the only ships that will be affected.

Mr. ILSLEY: At the moment, but this may last a long time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I know it is general legislation which empowers the governor in council to take action, but we should not be asked to load the statute books with useless legislation. Does the government propose to designate Japan as one of the countries to which arms may not be sent? I think we should know that. Only if the government propose to do that has this legislation any value at this time.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask a question? Does the hon. gentleman advocate the naming of both Japan and China as countries to which exportations should be prohibited?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know that there is any particular reason why I should be called upon to declare what government policy should be.

Mr. ILSLEY: I thought the hon. member would not answer that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister thought I would not answer that? I will answer it. The minister does not answer. I thought the minister would not answer; and the government does not appear to be answering. As far as I am concerned Japan is an aggressor nation, and I think morally we are bound to refuse to ship materials of war to an aggressor nation. China is in an altogether different position. Apparently the minister and the government do not want to answer that question. I do not think we should be called upon to put this legislation on the statute books unless we know whether it is going to be used.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that, as he is aware, as far as the conflict in Spain is concerned several nations have been represented on a non-intervention committee which has been endeavouring to prevent a spread of the conflict in that country. They have all agreed upon non-intervention as far as Spain is concerned. While not represented on the committee of non-intervention Canada has deemed it desirable to ally herself with these other countries in the general attitude which has been taken towards the conflict in Spain. There is not thus far among the nations a similar non-intervention policy with regard to the Sino-Japanese conflict. There has not even been a declaration of a state of war. Other nations have not joined together in any declaration of concerted non-intervention in that field. When other nations have united on a policy of non-intervention, that, it would seem, would be the time for this country to consider whether or not it should adopt a similar policy.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the Prime Minister if we have not signed solemn treaties under which we obligate ourselves to go to the help of a country that is being attacked? And may I ask a second question: Must Canada always wait until other nations take action, especially when Canadian affairs are concerned?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think we need to wait, but I think we are wise to take cognizance of our obligations in the light of the world situation as it is to-day.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then the obligations do not mean much, do they?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Does my hon. friend advocate Canada taking part in that war?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not advocate that. I advocated refusing to give assistance to an aggressor nation that is mercilessly attacking another nation.

Mr. COLDWELL: If my recollection serves me right—I have not the documents before me—I think on October 5 or 6 last the League of Nations, of which we are a member, called upon its constituent members to give moral support to China in its struggle, and more recently we have had another pronouncement of the same kind. Again, speaking from memory, I believe at the Brussels conference Canada was pointed out as the nation which was supplying a large percentage of the raw material for Japan.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

If we are a signatory of the League of Nations and we have moral obligations, it seems to me—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where does the hon. member get the information he has just given, with respect to Canada supplying Japan? I believe he mentioned the Brussels conference.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe the statement was made by the Chinese delegate to the nine-power conference held at Brussels about six or seven weeks ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to see the statement before attempting to answer it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should be glad to look it up, and send it to the Prime Minister.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the Prime Minister also be prepared to tell us what happened at Brussels?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Not during the debate on this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has the report of the Brussels conference which was laid on the table of the house. That report contains the information given to the world as to what happened there. I shall be glad to answer any questions I am in a position to answer with respect to the conference, but I cannot tell the hon. member about everything that happened there.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was referring to the attitude taken by Canada at that conference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At the proper time I shall answer any questions as to Canada's attitude. I doubt if this is the appropriate time.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I follow up what I was saying by asking the minister if this legislation, which applies to only one set of circumstances, and is discriminatory against Canadian shipping, ought not to be paralleled by a declaration of the kind proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, so that the provision could be applied equally to all shipping engaged in the transportation of goods which may be used for war purposes.

Mr. HOWE: This is complementary legislation. As I said in my speech on second reading, Great Britain has legislation, in exactly similar terms, applying to the Spanish conflict. The United States has a measure exactly the same as this, in general terms. While the present measure applies to only a very few ships at this time, it would at least have the effect of preventing ships from being placed under Canadian register to engage in the type of trade we are trying to prevent.

Mr. GREEN: Is the power under the section wide enough to prevent a shipment of munitions to Japan? I notice that subsection 2 (a) reads:

(a) Designate any territory or territories in which there is a state of war or armed conflict—

And so on. That would not apply to shipments to Japan, because there is not a state of war in that country.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But there is armed conflict.

Mr. GREEN: The belief of the government is that this section is wide enough to enable them to prevent shipments to Japan, under present circumstances?

Mr. HOWE: I can say generally, that if the government passes an order in council stating that there is armed conflict in a certain area, this measure would apply immediately.

Mr. GREEN: And the minister would consider that there is sufficient power under the section to permit designating Japan as a territory to which shipments should not be made?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, undoubtedly.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the word "munitions" include machinery for the manufacture of munitions?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. Subsection 3 contains these words:

. . . or any articles deemed capable of being converted thereinto or made useful in the production thereof—

This undoubtedly covers machinery.

Mr. MacNICOL: Prohibition of the shipment of munitions would also mean prohibition of the shipment of lathes for the manufacture of shells, equipment for weighing powder and equipment for placing the powder in cartridges?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, I would say so, under the words I have quoted. If the government decided that any article was being used in the production of munitions of war, shipments could be prohibited.

Mr. HEAPS: It seems to me that this measure is more or less a gesture on the part of the government to show what it may do under given circumstances. No doubt it vests in the government great responsibilities. If it so wished the government could, perhaps without the consent of parliament, say that a certain area is in a state of armed conflict and, if it wished, could go to the support of one side and refuse to go to the support of the other. For instance, if the government desired, with respect to the present Sino-Japanese conflict it could either adopt a state of complete neutrality or support one side or the other.

As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the government has given no inkling or indication to the committee as to its stand on that very important question. In Canada to-day there is an overwhelming sentiment against the action of Japan in China. I believe if the government, under the power granted by the present measure, would declare that Japan is an aggressor nation, and take the bold step of refusing to supply her with the necessaries of war—always assuming that, as has been said, large quantities are being sent to that country—I believe a great body of public opinion would support the government's action. I know it must face difficulties presented by those people who are engaged in a profitable trade between Canada and Japan. I believe, however, that sentiment in Canada is so overwhelmingly against the attitude of Japan as an aggressor nation, and against the tactics that country has employed against a peaceful people, that the government would do well to take the bold step of prohibiting shipments of goods from Canada to Japan.

Mr. FINN: Would the minister give the name of the ships running to the West Indies? I believe he mentioned two ships in the West Indies trade, and two on the Pacific coast.

Mr. HOWE: I believe the hon. member must have misunderstood me. There are about ten running to the West Indies, including the Canadian National fleet of Canadian register.

Mr. STIRLING: Under subsection 2 (a) would it be possible to designate Portugal as a territory in which there is a state of war or armed conflict, civil or otherwise?

Mr. HOWE: Does the hon. member ask if we could now designate Portugal in that manner?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: Is there a state of armed conflict in Portugal?

Mr. STIRLING: No, but it is a territory adjacent to one in which there is armed conflict and from which, for all I know, it might be possible to pass munitions on to either of the parties which are fighting.

Mr. HOWE: I believe if it could be established that a regular route was being made across Portugal, and that munitions carried in Canadian ships were transshipped through Portugal to Spain, there would be reason to forbid the use of those territorial waters.

Mr. MacINNIS: There is not a state of armed conflict in Italy to-day, but it has been proved and is a well known fact that with the consent of the Italian government Italian armed forces are taking part in the struggle in Spain.

Mr. MARTIN: The same is true of Russia.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not concerned with that at the present time; but if the hon. member wishes to raise the point he may do so, and it can be settled later. Could this legislation or the legislation passed during last session be applied to Italy?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not the amendment made during the last session before me, and before making an answer I should like to have it. Looking at the legislation now in hand I should think that if there is not a state of armed conflict or war existing in Italy the present measure would not apply.

Mr. STIRLING: Then, what about Portugal?

Mr. MacINNIS: And there is no state of armed conflict in Japan. Under those circumstances it could not apply to Japan.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not think that that would be the case. Japan is sending armed troops into another country and I would think that this legislation would properly apply to her.

Mr. MacINNIS: Italy is doing the same thing.

Mr. ILSLEY: If Italy is doing the same thing, that would be a question of fact to be determined. The hon. member for Yale made reference to Portugal. Reference has been made to the Customs Act. If the Department of National Revenue in the administration of that act has any reason to believe that there is an indirect routing of goods to Spain through Portugal, there are ample powers in the act to refuse a permit for the shipment of such goods.

Mr. BENNETT: That would be under the Customs Act, not this act.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not because Portugal is at war, but because Spain is at war and a shipment to Portugal might be considered as in effect a shipment to Spain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I realize that during a discussion on a bill of this kind is not the proper time to press the government for a declaration of foreign policy. At the same time I feel it is not proper to place legislation of this kind upon the statute books without the fullest discussion. Undoubtedly the government ought, in an emergency, to have the power of effectively controlling the actions of its nationals in shipping goods whether under the Customs Act or under the proposed legislation. But at the present time, there is no emergency although of course there might be in the indefinite future. Perhaps we ought to give emergency powers of this kind looking to some indefinite future; but consider the existing situation. A war has been going on in China for some months; we are met here at the beginning of the session and apparently the government is not proposing to do anything with regard to that particular situation. I take it that that was the meaning of the declaration by the Prime Minister.

In spite of that, the government is now asking us to give it powers which will enable it, by order in council, in effect to determine the foreign policy of Canada. I do not think that is democratic. I have no objection to this legislation in itself, as it may be used in an emergency, but I say that when an international situation exists such as does exist to-day the government ought not first to refuse to give any information as to its foreign policy and then in this indirect manner ask parliament for powers which would permit it to commit the country in a roundabout way to a line of action which might involve war.

I am not accusing the government of wanting to go to war; I am accusing them of failing to live up to the solemn obligations which Canada has made; I am accusing them of taking to themselves by means of legislation of this kind the power to control our foreign policy without consulting parliament. This is not just the occasion when I would have chosen to bring this matter before parliament, but I feel that the government should take us a little more into their confidence and explain just what their policy is likely to be under the provisions of this legislation.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): What are the solemn obligations to which my hon. friend refers?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Kellogg pact and our membership in the League of Nations, both very solemn obligations.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Will my hon. friend name one nation in the world that is applying sanctions at this time? Does he suggest that Canada alone should apply sanctions, even though it might lead to war?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: An hon. member beside me suggests that according to the newspapers New Zealand, quite a small nation, has taken this action on her own.

I suggest that Canada has a big responsibility in this regard, as much of the war material which is being shipped to Japan comes from Canada. I do not think I can accept a code of morals that affirms that we shall not do anything until somebody else does it. I submit that we are guilty—I use the word advisedly—of assisting an aggressor nation to kill men, women and children in China. I do not see how Canada can escape the moral responsibility for that kind of thing.

The Department of National Defence is presenting estimates with which to build fortifications on the Pacific coast.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And the hon. member is opposed to that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not discussing that question just at the moment. What are these fortifications to be placed there for? In order to defend us from possible attack by Japan. If airplanes or warships come to the coast of British Columbia and attack this country with bombs and shells we know that those bombs and shells will have been made from materials supplied by this country. I urge that that is a crazy situation. Even though we have no sense of responsibility for the women and children of China, for our own sakes we should prevent one more ounce of war material going to Japan—and this whether or not any other nation takes similar action. I think I have the right to urge that the government give us some assurance that such action will be taken. The government should not refuse to take any action and then at the beginning of the session ask us to pass a bill, in itself good enough, which gives them power to deal with important questions of foreign policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, may I say to my hon. friend that the government is just as concerned as he is about the well-being and welfare of the women and children in the orient, in Spain or in any other part of the world. But what this government is particularly concerned about is the well-being and welfare of the Canadian people. If my hon. friend wishes to know in a word what the policy of this country is with respect to matters affecting war, let me tell him that it is to seek in every possible way to avoid taking any step which may be responsible for this country either directly or indirectly being drawn into war or bringing itself or other countries into a world conflict. What it does or refrains from doing to-day with respect to world affairs is with a view to discharging its obligations in the light of the existing world situation and in the light of what other nations are doing or refraining from doing. To the best of its judgment the government is following a course which will serve to keep Canada strictly neutral and enable her, when opportunity presents itself, to co-operate with other nations in helping to bring to a conclusion, more speedily than might otherwise be possible, any existing international conflict.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Even if the Prime Minister takes the view that we should exercise no discrimination; that we should regard China and Japan as being on an equality, will he tell me why the government should not take the same action in the case of the Sino-Japanese affair as they took in the case of Spain?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can answer my hon. friend by saying that much the same reasons that have actuated the United States, that have actuated Great Britain, that have actuated France and that have actuated other countries of the world in their attitude to the Sino-Japanese conflict have actuated Canada in its attitude. We are aware of the tremendous possibilities of danger involved in taking certain courses of action, and we are taking every possible care to avoid them.

Mr. FINN: The hon. leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation party spoke of ships, but there are ships other than those owned by the Canadian government going to the West Indies. There belong to the Canadian Pacific Railway two ships of Canadian registry and under private ownership. I well remember my hon. friend stating in the house that he saw no sound reason why Japanese, Chinese and Canadians should not go to school together and get married, or why they should not be allowed to grow up together in this country. I ask him now, if his policy had been carried out, what would be the influence of the Japanese upon a Canadian girl who married a Japanese living on the Pacific coast?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know what that has to do with the matter. I have never advocated mixed marriages.

Mr. FINN: The hon. member's statement can be found in Hansard, that he saw no sound reason why Japanese, Chinese and Canadians should not all go to the same schools in the province of British Columbia.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They do now.

Mr. FINN: Then I say that is absolutely the trouble. Why does not my hon. friend urge that the Japanese should be put out of the schools, just as the United States has said that Japanese fishing boats travelling along the Pacific coast of the United States shall no longer be permitted to receive information and to map out the country, with the idea of using force later. To permit it would be against the finer civilization that this continent desires to have.

The right hon. leader of the opposition was on very sound ground this afternoon. Any hon. gentleman who is a member of the legal profession knows that a ship on the high seas is governed by the law of the flag she flies at her stern, and that when she gets into a foreign port she is subject to the statutory laws of that country and can be held and sold, and may never return to the country from which she came.

I am sure there is no one in the house more desirous of protecting the finer humanity, not only of Canada but of the civilized world, than the Prime Minister of Canada to-day, and I believe also the right hon. leader of the opposition; but I would point out, and in no critical spirit, that this amendment to the shipping act passed in 1934 deals only with war materials transshipped on the high seas, and if we want to do a real job we should provide that war materials shall not leave any of our ports. Then they could not arrive at any foreign destination, or be used to kill people, nor could they be transshipped on the high seas. The amendment which it is proposed to insert in the Canada Shipping Act reads:

> No article to which this section applies shall be discharged at any port or place in any territory designated by the governor in council for the purposes of this section or within the territorial waters adjacent to such territory from a ship registered in Canada, and no such article shall be transshipped on the high seas from any such ship into any vessel bound for any such port or place, and no such article consigned to or destined for any such port or place shall be taken on board or carried in any such ship.

I may be wrong, but if we are going to get to the bottom of the world situation to-day, and if Canada is to carry on peacefully as outlined by the Prime Minister a few moments ago—and I believe every hon. gentleman, with that finer sense of humanity which should be in the human heart, will support him in that—we should go to the bottom of the situation by providing a law so ironclad that it will be impossible to ship from Canada war materials, and we would not then be worried about transshipments on the high seas or the ports the vessels were going to, or whether the ship would come back to Canada to be penalized.

Mr. HOWE: I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. FINN: I desire to say to the hon. Minister of Transport that I was hardly off my feet when he made his motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: It is six o'clock.

Mr. FINN: Then I apologize most humbly to the hon. minister.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 6 p.m.

Monday, February 14, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT OF MR. SPEAKER WITH RESPECT TO READING IN DEBATE OF STATEMENTS MADE OUTSIDE OF HOUSE

Mr. SPEAKER: The right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has expressed the desire that I should state the rules of procedure on the reading in debate of written statements made outside the house. Points of order should be taken before and not after such statements are read and included in the official reports of debates. I have looked into the matter and I think it may be advisable to explain these rules.

The rules under which statements emanating outside the House of Commons may be read in debate are so restrictive that we may say the practice is not allowed. Unless a member intends to base a motion on extracts from such statements, it is irregular to read them during debate if they refer to, comment on or deny anything said by a member, (Bourinot 336); are intended to influence debate (May 316); reflect upon any vote of the house or use offensive words against either house or against any member thereof (standing order 41); contain unparliamentary expressions, as no language can be heard in quotation if it would be disorderly if spoken (Bourinot 336); allude to debates in the other house of parliament (May 316); utter treasonable or seditious words, or use the king's name irreverently (standing order 41); cast reflections upon the conduct of judges (May 295; Bourinot 358); refer to matters pending a judicial decision (May 316); reflect upon the conduct of persons in authority (May 316); make personal allusions to members (May 316); refer to other debates during the same session, or to any question not under discussion (May 317-318; Bourinot 336).

Bourinot, page 335, refers to these objections when he says a member may read extracts from documents, books, or other printed publications as part of his speech provided in so doing he does not infringe upon any point of order.

When the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) quoted letters in an argument against the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and when the minister retorted with telegrams, I did not interfere because great latitude has always been given with respect to citations in this house. We follow the same practice as in England where the house itself seems to have settled the procedure in these cases. I take it that the same rule applies to telegrams and letters as to extracts from newspapers.

The practice of reading extracts or written statements in debate to support an argument has been followed in the British house since 1840 when Speaker Peel, with the acquiescence of the house, allowed a member to proceed to read passages from a newspaper. In 1856, when a member was called to order for reading an extract from a newspaper, the Speaker stated that on former occasions when he had attempted to enforce this rule, he had been overruled by the house. A similar statement was made by the chairman in committee on the 9th March, 1857 (May 318). These are the last precedents cited in the 13th edition of May, published in 1924.

The house may be indulgent in these matters but it is a well known principle that a statement made in this house cannot be contradicted by a statement made by a person who is not a member of the house.

STANDING COMMITTEES

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS, MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Little be substituted for that of Mr. Slaght on the standing committee on privileges and elections, and that the name of Mr. Slaght be substituted for that of Mr. Little on the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Motion agreed to.

POWELL AND UNWIN CASE

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT TO DISCUSS MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house, under standing order 31, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the advisability of the Minister of Justice granting the request made of his majesty's attorney general and premier of the province of Alberta for the remission of the sentence recently placed upon Messrs. Powell and Unwin in Edmonton, who are reported to be now incarcerated for an offence alleged to have been committed in the said province, which is administered by the above premier and attorney general.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of his motion. I find that leave for introducing such a motion is covered by standing order 31, paragraph 3 of the said standing order being as follows:

(3) He—

The member—

—then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to Mr. Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order, and of urgent public importance, reads it out,—

And so on. I have read the document handed me by the hon. member, but I do not regard it as coming within the purview of this paragraph. I consider that it is not a matter of urgent public importance, and in consequence I rule that he cannot introduce the motion.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order, arising out of your ruling. May I point out that paragraph 4 states:

If less than twenty, but not less than five, members rise in their places, the question whether the member has leave to move the adjournment of the house shall be put forthwith, without debate, and determine, if necessary, by a division.

Then, I find this further statement in paragraph 3:

If objection is taken, Mr. Speaker requests those members who support the motion to rise in their places and, if more than twenty members rise accordingly, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who has asked for leave.

In other words I do not think the Speaker of the House may determine whether or not such a motion is in order. As I interpret the rule, if twenty or more members of the house are anxious that the hon. member introducing the motion be permitted to proceed with the question which has been brought to the attention of the Speaker, he can be given the right to do so.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I submit the hon. member (Mr. Heaps) is altogether wrong, The matter is entirely in the discretion of the Speaker, and the rule the hon. member has read does not at all substantiate his claim.

Paragraph 2 states that the member desiring to make such a motion rises in his place, asks leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, and states the matter. This the hon. member has done. Then, paragraph 3 states:

He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to Mr. Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order—

That is, if Mr. Speaker thinks it in order—

—and of urgent public importance—

Still referring to the Speaker—

—reads it out.

That is, if he considers it a matter of public importance, Mr. Speaker reads it out, "and asks whether the member has the leave of the house." Then the paragraph states:

If objection is taken, Mr. Speaker requests those members who support the motion to rise in their places and, if more than twenty members rise accordingly, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who has asked for leave.

That is to say, if Mr. Speaker had thought the matter was in order, or of urgent public importance, he would have read the motion to the house. Then if objection were taken, but twenty members rose in their places, the hon. member would have had authority to discuss the matter. As it is, the Speaker has declared that this is not a matter of urgent public importance. And may I add, as my own view, that not only is it not a matter of urgent public importance that it be discussed, but it is a matter of urgent public importance that it be not discussed.

SHOP CARDS REGISTRATION

PROVISION FOR REGISTRATION OF DISTINCTIVE CARDS OF LABOUR UNIONS AND PREVENTING UNAUTHORIZED USE

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 22, respecting the registration of shop cards by labour unions.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is designed to establish a system for the registration of shop cards by labour unions, and authorizes the keeping of a register of shop cards. It prescribes the conditions upon which registration may be granted, and provides that a labour union may authorize the use of any shop cards registered by it under agreements for the use of the cards. It provides machinery for the cancellation of registrations and for correction of the register.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE

CONGRATULATIONS TO RIGHT HON. MR. LAPOINTE UPON THE THIRTY-FOURTH ANNIVERSARY OF HIS ELECTION TO PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with the business of the day I should like on behalf of those with whom I am associated to convey to the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) our heartiest congratulations upon the celebration of the thirty-fourth anniversary of his election to the House of Commons.

Thirty-four years is a long time in the life of any man; looking back, it must seem to the right hon. gentleman a very long time indeed. It is a fact to be remembered by all, and especially by the younger members, that the right hon. gentleman, who came here with little knowledge of the English language, by persistence and perseverance has made himself one of the most complete masters of the English language in this chamber. This should be a source of inspiration to the younger members of the house.

During the period of thirty-four years that has elapsed since he came to this chamber the right hon. gentleman has travelled far. We have not always agreed with him, and looking back I see less reason than ever why we should have—perhaps he would be the first to admit the correctness of that statement. He has made great progress, and, under Providence, has been permitted to play a not unimportant part in the life of our country. It is well that, where possible, continuity should be perserved in the representation of constituencies. The right hon. gentleman has been able to give an example of the affection and regard in which it may be possible for a member to be held by his constituents, and the fact that he has not always represented the same constituency goes to prove the universality of the affection in which he is held in his native province.

We congratulate the right hon. gentleman because he has served with distinction his day and generation, not only his own province but the country as a whole. In the profession to which we both belong, he has added lustre and distinction to the title of "Minister of Justice." In the Canadian Bar Association, as honorary president, he has rendered valiant service to the cause for which that organization was created. We wish him many years of useful service. All of us in this chamber, whatever the motives that brought us here in the first place, have, after all, the same desire to render service to the country we love so much. Whatever may have been the political predilections of the right hon. gentleman when he entered this chamber for the first time at the age of under thirty, I feel quite sure that to him party ties have lost much of their acrimony, blended smoothly and easily as they have been into that high regard for his country which has characterized his efforts in recent years and I am sure will be apparent in the years to come. We congratulate him upon his years of service and trust that in whatever capacity it may be—whether to the right or the left of you, Mr. Speaker, is a matter wholly unimportant—he may long continue to render service to Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of hon. members on this side of the house may I express to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) our warm appreciation of his thought and courtesy in extending the congratulations he has just extended to the one who in point of years of membership and service is, at the present time, the oldest member of the Canadian House of Commons. I need not say how wholeheartedly we who sit on this side of the house endorse his remarks. It would be impossible for any of us, most of all myself, to begin to say what we owe to the exceptional abilities, wise counsel and helpful guidance of the right hon. member for Quebec East the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). He has been at my side—my deskmate in fact—during all of the years I have held the position either of leader of the government or of leader of the opposition. His presence, I need scarcely say, has made my task very much easier and my place infinitely more secure, than it otherwise could possibly have been. I am glad to have this opportunity of repeating in public and in this House of Commons, what I feel I owe to the loyalty, cooperation and constant help I have had from my right hon. friend during my entire public life.

The right hon. leader of the opposition has referred to the remarkable manner in which the right hon. member for Quebec East has mastered the English language and the example he has been to us all in that particular. There is another particular in which he has also been a great example, not only to hon. members of this house but to the citizens generally of our country. He has taught us the wisdom of moderation and of toleration in all that pertains to differences between classes, between races, between provinces and between creeds. I am sure that there is but one wish in this house and that is that the right hon. Minister of Justice may be spared for many years to come as a member of the House of Commons in order that he may continue to give in parliament his exceptional abilities and qualities to the public service of our country.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, had the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group been in his seat this afternoon I am sure he would have been only too happy to join in the compliments that have been paid this afternoon to the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). In his absence I desire on behalf of our group to concur in the sentiments expressed by the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). If there is one thing that we appreciate about the Minister of Justice, it is his courtesy to all members of the house, no matter in what part of it they may sit. In this he sets another fine example which may be added to those referred to by the previous speakers. Even though we may not agree with what he says, he says it in such a way that we cannot but enjoy listening to his remarks. I wish to associate myself most heartily with those who have expressed the desire that the right hon. gentleman may sit in this chamber for many years to come.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, since I do not belong to any group I cannot let this opportunity pass without saying that I have always felt that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has been the one member of this house who has sustained my faith in human nature. Many times during the sixteen years I have sat in this house my faith has been threatened, but the Minister of Justice has always conducted himself in such a way as to restore my faith in my fellow men and in the members of this House of Commons. I do not think it would be going too far to say to the Minister of Justice, who is to-day celebrating the thirty-fourth anniversary of his first entrance into this chamber, that he is a greatly admired and beloved member of the House of Commons.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, ever since I came into this house the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has impressed me as being a thoroughly good man. I believe he is enjoying to-day the harvest of a life well spent and I rejoice greatly with him in this day of celebration.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed pleasant for one to hear so many nice things said about him during his lifetime. I did not expect to receive this afternoon any flowers, either in the form of roses or of speech. I am deeply grateful to my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) for his kind words. He is a prince in handling these delicate matters. As he says, very often we have not been in agreement, but I hope I shall always be able to keep his warmest friendship. I thank my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the kind things he has said about me, and I thank also the other hon. members of the house who have been so kind.

It is not an unmixed blessing to be a sort of dean of the house. I am just as proud of being a member of this parliament as I was of being a member of the eighth parliament, the first session of which was in 1900. I was pleased when I was first elected a member of the House of Commons in 1904. During all my years in parliament I have made it a point to follow attentively the debates of the house. The poor English I speak to-day has been achieved by listening in the house to masters of the English language such as the leaders of the Liberal and Conservative parties. I repeat what I said the other day, that an association of thirty-four years with the members of this House of Commons has convinced me that there is no body of men more patriotic or more fully prepared to serve their country in the best way they can.

I thank my colleagues in the house for the kind words they have said of me. I hope I shall be in this house for a few more years, and I shall try to render the best service possible to my fellow citizens and do my utmost to maintain the faith of the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) in human nature.

THE PARLIAMENTARY GUIDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct an inquiry to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) or some other member of the government in regard to the distribution of the Parliamentary Guide. I noticed this morning that copies of this annual publication had been distributed among the members of the house. It was understood last year that we were to have a statement from some member of the government with respect to the free distribution of the Parliamentary Guide. Personally I have strong objection to its free distribution among members of the house, and I should like to know who it was that gave instructions this year, after what was said to the house last year, to have the Parliamentary Guide distributed free to members of the house.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend had mentioned in advance that he was bringing up this question, I would have had it looked into. Perhaps he will allow his question to stand until to-morrow when I shall endeavour to let him have a reply.

RADIO INTERFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I shold like to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) a question. I have received a number of complaints in regard to electrical interference with radio reception. Is the minister prepared to make a statement as to whether regulations will be made, or present regulations enforced, regarding the use of machinery or apparatus likely to cause interference with radio reception, as provided by section 23 of the Canadian Broadcasting Act of 1936?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of his question. The section to which he has referred gives ample power to enforce penalties for violations of the act, and the regulations under the Radiotelegraph Act set up the procedure. I think our inspectors are applying both sections wherever there seems to be occasion for doing so. I know that we are issuing orders almost every week in regard to radio interference.

CATTLE SHIPMENTS

PROVISION OF SPACE ON VESSELS FOR SHIPMENT TO ENGLAND

On the orders of the day:

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) or some other member of the government, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), if the government is taking steps to provide additional space on boats for the shipment to Great Britain of cattle that were shipped from western Canada to Ontario and are now finished and ready for the British market. There is quite a demand by Ontario farmers for cargo space to ship these finished cattle to Great Britain, and it is not available. What steps is the government taking to provide it?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If my hon. friend will allow the question to stand until to-morrow I shall seek to give an answer then.

SMALL LOANS

INDUSTRIAL LOAN AND FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East—for Mr. Vien) moved the second reading of Bill No. 7, respecting Industrial Loan and Finance Corporation.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think I might anticipate the usual discussion on this type of bill by making a short statement. I can see from smiles in certain quarters that it is expected.

It will be remembered that last session we had two private bills of the character of the one now under discussion and the one immediately following on the order paper. They came before the house last year after having been passed by the senate, and were for the purpose of amending the special acts of two small loan companies. The principal amendments last year provided for the substitution of a maximum flat monthly rate of interest and charges on loans made by these companies for separate charges for interest and expenses deducted in advance as permitted by the special acts. In one of the bills last year the maximum monthly rate provided for was two per cent, and in the other two and a quarter per cent.

The first bill was referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce. After some discussion, and after an undertaking had been given by the promoters of the second bill that the rate of interest provided for therein would be reduced to two per cent per month, that bill also was referred to the banking and commerce committee. After prolonged consideration of the bills in the committee, both were reported back to the house with a provision for a maximum rate of two per cent. The bills, however, were not further dealt with by the house.

We have now before us on the order paper private bills amending the special acts of the same two companies. These bills, so far as I can gather, differ in form and substance from those of last year, the most important change being a maximum monthly rate of two and a quarter per cent instead of two per cent as approved by the committee last year. I am unaware personally of anything which has taken place in the interval to make necessary an increase in the maximum monthly rate to be authorized for small loans.

In the banking and commerce committee, and in the house last session, I stated that it was the intention of the government at the present session to propose a special committee of the house to investigate generally the question of small loans and the maximum rates of interest and charges that should be permitted. One reason for suggesting a special committee was the difficulty experienced last year in securing a quorum of the banking and commerce committee and the frequent delays in proceedings caused thereby. The government has given further consideration to the matter, and in view of the number of special committees that are contemplated this session, and the further fact that the banking and commerce committee does not appear to have in prospect a very great volume of work, the government believes it would be better to refer this matter again to the banking and commerce committee. The number of special committees will make it rather difficult during the session for members to give adequate attention to all committees, and if it should be found from time to time that there is great difficulty in getting a quorum of the banking and commerce committee it is always within its competence to suggest to the house a reduction in its quorum. That would be a means of overcoming that difficulty. I intend to propose, therefore, on behalf of the government a motion which should come, I think, after the reference of the two bills now on the order paper. The proper course I suggest would be to refer these two bills to the committee once more, without, of course, the house endorsing them in any greater degree than it always does in referring private bills.

Mr. BENNETT: They have to have second reading first.

Mr. DUNNING: They have to have second reading first, of course, as a matter of form, and then I shall ask the house to adopt this resolution:

> That the standing committee on banking and commerce be instructed to inquire into the practices of individuals, partnerships and companies in making small loans on personal security, and to consider the maximum rate of interest and charges which should be permitted for such loans.

I believe that by referring these two bills and then adopting such a motion as I have just read, the house will set in train a thorough and complete investigation into this whole small loan business, and we shall not be crowded for time as we were last year because of the shortness of the session. I have some hope that out of the work of such a committee might come something constructive which would appeal to parliament in dealing with this vexed and very difficult question. That is the suggestion I make to the house.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think that possibly the delays in committee last year were largely due to the fact that quite a large group in that committee felt that rates of interest of two or two and a quarter per cent on these small loans were far too high, and we hoped that the government might bring down some general legislation this year dealing completely with this small loan business. If that is the idea I see no reason why the procedure suggested should not be followed, although I dislike the thought of the house accepting the principle of these two bills, because on the second reading we really adopt the principle. But if the understanding clearly is that they will be considered by the committee with a view to general recommendations looking toward general legislation, then, although I was inclined to oppose these bills to-day, I would be prepared to allow them to go to the committee and look forward to the general legislation dealing with these small loan companies.

Mr. DUNNING: If the house will permit me, I omitted to mention one matter of some importance, and that is that a resume of the proceedings of the committee last session has been printed in order that it might be available in the investigation which we hope will take place at this session. I should also say to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that the intention of the government in submitting this resolution is to have the kind of examination upon which it is hoped a general policy may be founded.

Mr. PELLETIER: Will the minister state exactly what status the bill will have when it comes through for second reading?

Mr. DUNNING: The same as any other private bill which is referred to committee. It may come back from that committee amended; it may come back without amendment, or it may not come back at all.

Motion agreed to; bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

CENTRAL FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East—for Mr. Macdonald, Brantford City) moved the second reading of Bill No. 8, respecting Central Finance Corporation and to change its name to Household Finance Corporation of Canada.

Motion agreed to; bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE QUESTION OF SMALL LOANS AND MAXIMUM INTEREST RATE AND CHARGES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Subject to the condition mentioned in the discussion of the bills just dealt with, and with the permission of the house, I now move:

That the standing committee on banking and commerce be instructed to inquire into the practices of individuals, partnerships and companies in making small loans on personal security, and to consider the maximum rate of interest and charges which should be permitted for such loans.

Mr. R. L. BAKER (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether, if it be necessary, the committee should introduce some changes in the criminal code, or is there now adequate provision in the code for purposes of enforcement?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot answer as to the criminal code. I am quite sure that if, as a result of the investigation, anything of that nature is discovered to be practicable from the standpoint of the committee it can be suggested and may be dealt with when the report of the committee comes back to the house.

Mr. BAKER: Suggested by the committee?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, undoubtedly.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): May I ask the minister, in view of the attitude taken by the committee last year in respect to the desirability of going into this whole matter, whether there is provision now for the calling of witnesses, from afar if need be, to go into the matter thoroughly, or is that a question we shall have to determine in committee when it meets?

Mr. DUNNING: The committee itself, like all standing committees, has power to summon witnesses. As Minister of Finance I have always requested chairmen of committees to report to the house what they are proposing to do along that line in order that there may be some reasonable check on the degree of expense. In the case of this committee, as I am a member I suppose I cannot complain.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE PENSIONS—FEDERAL PAYMENTS

Mr. BOULANGER:

What amounts have been paid by the federal government, since April 1, 1936, to date, to each province, in connection with old age pensions?

Mr. DUNNING:

In the period April 1, 1936, to September 30, 1937(*), payments were made as follows:

Alberta	$ 2,172,086 41
British Columbia	2,785,914 73
Manitoba	2,921,703 62
New Brunswick	1,517,442 26
Nova Scotia	2,675,053 88
Ontario	13,948,004 72
Prince Edward Island	243,824 28
Quebec	6,971,915 95
Saskatchewan	2,589,355 90

(*)Payments for the quarter ended December 31, 1937, have not been completed in the case of all provinces.

FEDERAL GRANTS TO PROVINCES

Mr. BLANCHETTE:

1. What is the total amount of federal grants to the several provinces, respectively, for the fiscal years 1935-36, and 1936-37?

2. What amounts collected by the several provinces, respectively, on federal accounts, have been paid to the credit of the Receiver General during the same fiscal years?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Should be passed as an order for return.

2. This question was asked last session and the following answer was given:

"Mr. Dunning: With reference to this question I find that a similar question was asked in the 1932 session. The then prime minister answered in a manner of which I wholly approve, and I quote his answer:

The question which the hon. gentleman asks I submit should be dropped. It is impossible to tell what sums have been derived from each province for the last five years, and by what department of the dominion government. It is possible to ascertain, as is known to every hon. member in this house, sums collected at the customs houses and income tax offices in each of the provinces. Obviously however, imports at cities like Montreal, Quebec, Saint John, Halifax, or other cities at the seaboard do not always show their destinations, and questions which have been asked in times past in this connection have not produced results. The bureau of statistics have not been able to get the information. It is not a question which the government could accurately answer, and an inaccurate answer would be worse than none at all.

For the same reasons I suggest that the question be dropped."

It is not often I agree so fully with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) as I do with respect to that answer. I think it accurate in every particular.

HAMILTON, ONT., CENTRAL POST OFFICE

Mr. LENNARD:

What revenue was derived by the government at Hamilton central post office on Christmas day, December 25, 1937?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex West): Incidental to other necessary work, employees on duty gave restricted service at the general delivery wicket between 7 a.m. and 12 noon. Fifty-five cents postage was sold during that time.

The two employees on duty were also engaged on box sortation, etc.

Complete deliveries were given in all sections of the city. Had this service not been given mails which were sorted Friday evening would have been delayed until Monday morning.

ANTICOSTI ISLAND

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What action, if any, has been taken by the government with respect to Anticosti island?

2. Can the government assure the house that Canada's sovereignty with respect to this territory and its boundary waters is not being exploited by a foreign government or by any private citizens thereof?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The government has taken cognizance of representations appearing in the press and has made such inquiries as were deemed necessary and advisable.

2. Yes.

WASHINGTON CONFERENCE, 1922, AND ANGLO-JAPANESE ALLIANCE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Who represented Canada at the Washington conference in 1922, and what other countries were represented?

2. Did Canada have representation there apart from Great Britain, and, if so, who were its delegates?

3. What stand did Canada take there, or elsewhere, as to the necessity of maintaining the Singapore base for naval security in the Pacific for Canada and the empire?

4. Did Canada at that conference support the policy of dissolving our former alliance with Japan?

5. What was decided at the said conference?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The late Sir Robert Borden.

The United States of America, Belgium, the British Empire, Australia, New Zealand, India, China, France, Italy, Japan, The Netherlands, Portugal.

2. Yes. Answered by No. 1.

3. The Washington Conference arrangements placed no limitation upon the right of the authorities responsible for the government of Singapore to fortify or maintain a naval base there. So far as the present administration are aware, the necessity of such action has been viewed as a matter to be determined by the government of the United Kingdom.

4. The treaty, commonly known as the Quadruple Pacific Treaty, between the United State of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan, for the preservation of the general peace and the maintenance of their rights in the region of the Pacific ocean, which was concluded at Washington on December 13, 1921, and which terminated and superseded the agreement between Great Britain and Japan, concluded at London on July 13, 1911, commonly known as the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, was signed and ratified on behalf of Canada.

5. See sessional paper No. 47, Session of 1922: Conference on the Limitation of Armament, held at Washington, November 12, 1921, to February 6, 1922—report of the Canadian delegate including treaties and resolutions.

MISSION OF LORD HALIFAX TO HERR HITLER

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Was His Majesty's government in Canada advised or consulted about the mission of Lord Halifax to Herr Hitler to find out what Herr Hitler wanted, and did Canada approve of the same, or was Canada asked to approve?

2. What were the results of the said visit?

3. Will any communications, if any, from the government of Great Britain, be laid on the table of the house, or have any been received?

4. Did Lord Halifax at these interviews have power to represent Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The government were informed of Lord Halifax's departure for a visit to Germany on behalf of the government of the United Kingdom and of the purpose of the visit, but were not asked to express an opinion in the matter and did not express an opinion.

2. The government are unable to add anything to the public statements made on behalf of the government of the United Kingdom following the visit.

3. Communications have been received from the government of the United Kingdom subsequent to the visit. It would not be in accord with established practice to lay them on the table.

4. No.

MARKING OF IMPORTED FRUITS AND VEGETABLES

Mr. LENNARD:

1. Are the shippers of American fruits and vegetables required to mark each package with the name of the grower?

2. If not, will the government put this regulation into effect?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. No. The country of origin is required but not the name of grower.

2. Answered by No. 1.

HAMILTON POST OFFICE—TEMPORARY EMPLOYMENT

Mr. LENNARD:

1. How many extra men were temporarily employed at the Hamilton post office during the Christmas rush of 1937?

2. How many of these men were returned men?

3. How many of the returned men employed were recommended by officers of veterans' organizations?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex West):

1. 228.

2. 93.

3. 50.

WILLOW COVE, ONT., POST OFFICE

Mr. LENNARD:

1. What was the postal revenue derived from the post office at Willow Cove, Ontario, from its inception to December 31, 1937?

2. What remuneration did the postmaster receive for the same period?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex West):

1. $334.71.

2. $229.58.

TOKYO LEGATION—THE SINO-JAPANESE CONFLICT

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Who is Canada's minister to Japan?

2. What is the cost of the Canadian legation in Japan for the last fiscal year of record?

3. Has this legation been functioning during the Sino-Japanese war, and, if so, where?

4. Who is looking after the interests of Canadian nationls, and who is protecting the interests of Canadian nationals in the Sino-Japanese war zone?

5. What is Canada's foreign policy in relation to the Sino-Japanese conflict?

6. Will any correspondence or communications with the Chinese or Japanese governments be laid on the table in reference to the said conflict or its probable settlement as it effects Canada and Canadian business in the far east?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Honourable Robert Randolph Bruce.

2. $62,253.96.

3. The Canadian legation in Japan has been functioning without interruption since its establishment in May, 1929. The address of the legation is 16 Omote-cho, 3-chome, Akasaka-ku, Tokyo.

4. The interests of Canadian nationals requiring representations to the government of Japan are in the charge of the Canadian minister at Tokyo. There is no Canadian minister in China. Inquiries concerning and assistance to Canadian nationals in Chinese territory, including the regions of the conflict, have been carried out through members of the British consular and diplomatic service and members of the Canadian government trade commissioner service stationed in China. The procedure followed in the case of the Canadian national who was killed on the SS. "President Hoover," whereby the negotiations regarding the payment of indemnity are being handled by the United States Government, is similar to that followed in the "I'm Alone" case, in which the Canadian government presented the claim in respect of a French sailor who was killed.

5. To maintain a strict neutrality and to contribute in collaboration with other Governments, as opportunity affords, to movements designed to restore peace in the orient through methods of conciliation.

6. No.

CANADA AND THE NINE POWER CONFERENCE AT BRUSSELS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Did Canada take part in the nine power conference of the Sino-Japanese war at Brussels?

2. What other countries were represented and who represented Canada?

3. What were the results of said conference?

4. Did the conference propose to stop the victorious Japanese advance? Did it propose to end the war, and, if so, how?

5. Who was responsible for the utter failure of this important conference?

6. Will a report of the conference be tabled?

7. What technique of diplomacy does Canada employ at these conferences?

8. Did Canada separately or with Great Britain ask the United States to join them in a note of protest to Japan?

9. Did the United States reply that they would act separately and not jointly?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Canada, as a participant in the Nine Power Far Eastern treaty concluded at Washington, February 6, 1922, took part in the conference convened at Brussels for the purpose of examining, in accordance with article 7 of that treaty, the situation in the Far East and study friendly methods of hastening the end of the conflict now taking place there.

2. United States of America, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, China, Denmark, France, India, Italy, Mexico, The Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, The Union of South Africa, Sweden, Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, United Kingdom.

The Hon. Raoul Dandurand, Senator, minister without portfolio.

3 and 4. The report of the Brussels conference, dated November 24th, 1937, as issued by the conference, which has been laid on the table, sets forth the proceedings.

5. Under the rules this question does not appear to be of a suitable character for disposition by question and answer.

6. Answered by nos. 3 and 4.

7. Canadian delegations at international conferences observe the methods of procedure customarily followed on such occasions.

8. No.

9. Answered by No. 8.

VISIT OF THE PRIME MINISTER TO BERLIN

*Mr. CHURCH:

1. On whose invitation did the Prime Minister visit Berlin and the German government of Herr Hitler in 1937, and on what days was the visit made?

2. What was the subject matters discussed and was the government of Great Britain advised or consulted about this visit?

3. Will a summary of the matters discussed be laid on the table of the house?

4. Was the subject of establishing a Canadian embassy to Germany under discussion?

5. Did the Prime Minister of Canada make any proposals during said discussions, and, if so, what were they?

6. Was the subject of the ceding of German colonies by Great Britain discussed?

7. Were any economic or international questions in their relation to Canada discussed, and, if so, what questions?

8. What is Canada's foreign policy with respect to Germany?

9. Is such foreign policy a Canadian policy, or is it in harmony with the foreign policy of Great Britain?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As this question refers more particularly to myself I am answering it orally.

It had been my intention to pay a visit to Germany at the conclusion of the Assembly of the League of Nations, at which I represented Canada, in the autumn of 1936. This, however, did not prove possible at that time. Following the imperial conference of 1937, I was able to carry out the deferred visit. As I have already indicated in public statements, the purpose of the visit was to obtain at first hand, as intimate a knowledge of conditions in Europe as the time at my disposal permitted. After leaving Great Britain I paid brief visits to France and Belgium, as well as to Germany. The British Government were fully aware of the intention to pay the visit to Berlin, which occurred on June 27th to 30th, inclusive. The interchange of views and information which took place was of a nature which it is not the practice to disclose.

NYON CONFERENCE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Was Canada represented at the conference at Nyon to prevent piracy in the Mediterranean?
2. If so, by whom?
3. What action was taken?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. The states represented, namely, the United Kingdom, Bulgaria, Egypt, France, Greece, Roumania, Turkey, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and Yugoslavia, concluded on September 14, 1937, an agreement for collective measures against piratical attacks in the Mediterranean by submarines, and, on September 17, 1937, a supplementary agreement for collective measures against piratical acts in the Mediterranean by surface vessels and aircraft; and by subsequent arrangement, Italy agreed to participate in these measures.

OPENING OF SINGAPORE DRY DOCK

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has Canada been yet invited by the British admiralty to the ceremonial opening of the new giant dry dock at Singapore on February 11?
2. Is the government aware that the United States, New Zealand and Australian war ships have been invited and have accepted the invitation according to dispatches from London, England?
3. Does Canada contribute anything to maintain maritime freedom in the Pacific or to the cost of this Singapore base—past or present—and what agreement was ever in existence about it, if any?
4. Who will represent Canada's navy if an invitation is extended to Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.
2. No official information; press reports have been noted.
3. Canada has made no contribution to the cost of the Singapore naval base. The government know of no agreement in this respect. The expenditures upon measures for the naval defence of Canada, as approved by parliament from time to time, are shown in the records of the house.
4. Answered by No. 1.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

CANADIAN NAVY

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What does Canada's navy consist of, and where is it now located?

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT PAYMENTS

Mr. WINKLER:

1. Are the arrears in soldiers' settlement payments relatively greater in the drought areas of the prairie provinces than elsewhere?

2. Are there any special areas in other provinces—British Columbia, Ontario, Quebec or the maritimes—where crop failures have comparably restricted the ability of the soldier settlers to meet their payments?

3. What areas in the three prairie provinces have been most seriously affected by drought in the past seven years?

4. In view of the inability through crop failures of many soldier settlers in the drought areas to avail themselves of the dollar for dollar bonus scheme, does the government propose any measures to assist settlers to overcome their burden of arrears: (a) by continuation of the bonus after March 31, 1938; (b) by other remedial legislation?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Yes.

2. No. Crop failures have occurred intermittently in scattered localities from various causes, such as hail and grasshoppers.

3. The boundaries of the drought area in Canada are approximately as follows:—

In Alberta, beginning on the International boundary at approximately range 22, west of the fourth meridian, south of Lethbridge, extending northwest to Irricana then following an irregular arc northeast to Stettler, Wainwright, and along the Battle river to the Saskatchewan boundary.

In Saskatchewan, following the Battle and North Saskatchewan rivers to township 39, range 7, west of the third meridian, approximately 40 miles northeast of Saskatoon, then south and east to the Qu'Appelle river about north of Regina, and along this river to the Manitoba boundary.

In Manitoba (with the exception of 1937), following the Qu'Appelle and Assiniboine rivers to Brandon and then southeast to the vicinity of Morden.

4. (a) Under consideration.

(b) No. The department is facilitating applications from eligible settlers under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

*GOVERNMENT ELEVATOR LEASES: IMPORTS OF CORN

Mr. MARTIN:

1. What portion of the expenditure made by the dominion government during the years 1929 to 1936 inclusive at the port of Three Rivers, Quebec, were spent in the development of the site leased to the Three Rivers Grain and Elevator Company Limited?

2. What rental does the government receive from the Three Rivers Grain and Elevator Company Limited?

3. What expenditure was made by the dominion government in developing the site at Sorel, Quebec, leased by the government to North America Elevators Limited?

4. What rental does the government receive from North American Elevators Limited for such site?

5. What quantity of Argentine corn arrived at the elevator of the Quebec Harbour Commission at Quebec city between September 25, 1936, and December 31, 1936?

6. What grain firms were the importers of such corn and at what rate or rates was storage charged and collected for the period such corn remained in store in the said elevator?

7. What has been the expenditure at the ports of Windsor, Sarnia, Goderich, Owen Sound, Collingwood, Midland, Ontario, and Three Rivers, Quebec, for the years 1922 to 1936 inclusive?

8. What are the quantities of corn imported into Canada in each of the years 1930 to 1937 inclusive for each of the following purposes: (a) starch manufacturing; (b) cereal manufacturing; (c) distilling; (d) other purposes, and what in each case was the country of origin?

9. (a) What were the quantities of Argentine corn imported into Canada between September 25, 1936, and December 31, 1936; (b) what were the quantities of corn arriving at each of the various ports in Canada where such corn was unloaded from ocean boats; (c) what was the highest, lowest, and average c.i.f. price of such corn?

Mr. HOWE: The government have no information with regard to a number of these items. I suggest that question be dropped.

Question dropped.

LANGLEY PRAIRIE, B.C., EMERGENCY LANDING FIELD

Mr. BARBER:

1. What is the acreage of the airport or emergency landing field at Langley, British Columbia?
2. How much was paid for the land?
3. What amount has been expended to date on this field?
4. What is the estimated amount required to complete the work?
5. Is this field subject to fog or flood conditions; if so, how many days did such condition or conditions prevail during the year 1937?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Ninety acres.

2. $24,411.60.

3. $48,437.24—1936-37—$23,943.10; 1937-38—$24,494.14.

4. $15,925 (Field $1,425—Lighting $14,500).

5. This district is subject to occasional flood and fog. Special drainage has been installed to prevent flooding of aerodrome. No record is available of the number of days fog prevailed.

Mr. REID:

1. Was the site for the airport or emergency landing field at Langley Prairie surveyed by officials of the dominion government before purchase of the site was made?
2. If so, when was this survey made, and in what year was a report, if any, made to the government?
3. In any report made to the government regarding the Langley Prairie airport or emergency landing field, was any reference made as to the possible flood and/or fog conditions?
4. Were any steps taken by the government to acquire the land for this site previous to the general election of 1935?
5. Who was the owner or owners of the land negotiated with in acquiring or the possibility of acquiring this emergency field?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. Following preliminary surveys along the route of the Trans-Canada Airway, a detailed survey by officers of the Department of National Defence was made between January 6th and 16th, 1935. The report of this survey is dated January 16th, 1935.

3. Yes. The report stated that on January 6th this property was the only one in the district not covered by water, and that a thorough search had established the fact it was the only suitable aerodrome in the district. Fog was known to be prevalent in the district during the winter months.

4 and 5. Options were taken on the property from the former owners, Dr. Edward H. Saunders and John W. Berry, on January 10th and 11th, 1935, respectively.

HAY EXPORTS TO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. BRUNELLE:

1. What was the quantity of hay exported to the United States in each of the years 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, and 1937?
2. What was the value of hay so exported to the United States in each of the years 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, and 1937?
3. In the province of Quebec, what is the rate per mile for the transportation of hay in carload lots to the United States?

2. How many wave-traps have been supplied to date to owners of radio receiving sets in the vicinity of said station?

3. How many licences have been issued for radio receiving sets in the county of Peel for the current fiscal year?

Mr. HOWE:

1. P.C. 691, dated April 1, 1937, authorized an expenditure of $282,123.00 for the establishment near Hornby, Ontario, of a 50 K. W. transmitter, complete with land and accessories. The total expenditure to this date is $270,012.00.

2. Five hundred.

3. 2,498.

COST TO CANADA OF UNITED STATES RADIO PROGRAMS

Mr. BENNETT:

What is the cost to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of United States radio programs presently heard over the Canadian network?

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. HOWE: The following information has been supplied by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation:

1. Nil.

DOMINION GOVERNMENT RECORDS OFFICE

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. Has the government completed a building at Ottawa for the storing of records?

2. Have the records in the Auditor General's office increased in the past thirty-five years, and, if so, to what extent?

3. Was there a clerk of records employed in the Auditor General's office in the year 1917, and, if so, what is the name of such clerk?

4. How many years of service had this clerk in the Auditor General's office before he was appointed as clerk of records?

5. Was the position of clerk of records in the Auditor General's office abolished, and, if so, why?

6. Is there a clerk of records or record clerk employed in the government service at Ottawa according to civil service classification?

7. If so, will such clerk in the Auditor General's office receive a classification from the civil service commission covering the duties of his employment?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Record storage building at central experimental farm now under construction.

2. No means of determining extent of increase.

3. H. Cottee was appointed temporarily clerk of records in 1917 under War Measures Act not Civil Service Act.

4. 19 years, as messenger.

5. On restoration to permanent staff, position was classified as senior file clerk.

6. There is no position in the civil service classification.

7. No change in classification considered necessary.

WEST TORONTO CUSTOMS PORT—APPOINTMENTS

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. Will the collector of customs for the new port of West Toronto be appointed from the civil service?

2. Will all appointments to the staff of the port of West Toronto be made from the civil service?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. The position of collector of customs and excise for the port of West Toronto will be filled by the civil service commission by promotion from within the customs excise services.

2. Appointments to the staff of West Toronto as vacancies occur will be made by the civil service commission by promotion from within the customs excise services, or if there is no one eligible for promotion, then by assignment by the civil service commission from eligible lists established by that commission.

NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT COMMISSION—RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. Did the Purvis employment commission make recommendations to the government with respect to low-cost housing?
2. If so, were these recommendations made before parliament last rose?
3. If so, why were these recommendations not tabled?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. The national employment commission made the following recommendations to the minister:

Sept. 2, 1936—For a dominion government housing policy, including a detailed home improvement plan, and basic principles to govern a low rental housing plan.

Feb. 10, 1937—For a detailed low rental housing plan.

March 25, 1937—For draft legislation to embody the low rental housing plan.

2. Yes.

3. These recommendations are embodied in the final report of the national employment commission, which will be tabled as soon as it is available for distribution.

ELIMINATION OF PATRONAGE FROM RELIEF WORK APPOINTMENTS

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. Has the government taken all steps in its power to see that patronage is eliminated from all appointments to relief works?
2. Has the government so instructed the heads of the various government employment agencies?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Agreements entered into with the provinces respecting relief projects provide inter alia that "No resident of Canada shall, with relation to his employment or eligibility for employment be discriminated against nor favoured by reason of his race, religious views or political affiliations."

2. Employment agencies and the engagement of workers and supervisory staff under agreements referred to are within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. Any complaints as to discrimination are promptly brought to the attention of the provincial government for investigation.

*RECIPROCAL TAX CONVENTION

Mr. PINARD:

1. Upon what date was the reciprocal tax convention between Canada and the United States, effective as from January 1, 1936, and passed by the parliament of Canada at its last session, ratified by the United States Senate?
2. Is the government aware that although this convention reduces the rate of deduction, at source, on all income received from the United States, by residents in Canada, from 10 per cent to 5 per cent, no refunds of the two over-deductions in 1936, so far as is known, have been made to Canadians interested?
3. Has the government knowledge of the fact that the United States government requires that Canadians claiming a refund of the two 1936 over-deductions must make application therefor to the collector of internal revenue at Baltimore, Maryland?
4. Has the government any knowledge of the number of claims so filed at Baltimore by Canadians?
5. Is the government aware that many requests have been made by Canadians to the treasury department, internal revenue service, at Baltimore, for the refund cheques, and that the invariable reply is that the claims have been forwarded to Washington for review?
6. Will the government take steps through the Canadian minister at Washington, to move the United States government to expedite the settlement of this matter by forwarding the refund cheques due on account of the 1936 over-deductions?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. August 13, 1937.
2. No.
3. Yes.
4. No.
5. No.
6. Compliance with United States regulations involves certain mechanical procedure and statements which would take time before refunds can be made. The procedure having been determined, the delay occasioned thereby would not appear to call for steps to be taken through the Canadian minister at Washington.

TUBERCULAR WAR VETERANS' TREATMENTS

Mr. LENNARD:

Is it the intention of the government to have tubercular war veterans receive home treatment instead of treatment in sanitariums as at present?

Mr. POWER: No change is contemplated in present procedure of treatment of tuberculous pensioners under Department of Pensions and National Health.

MASTERS' CERTIFICATES ISSUED IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. REID:

1. How many certificates of service for captain or master of a steamship have been issued by the minister of transport in the Province of British Columbia since the change in the shipping act and up to the end of 1937?
2. How many of these have been issued to those other than white Canadian seamen?

Mr. HOWE:

1. 191.

2. Sixty-one; all but one being restricted to the fishing industry.

*NAMING NEW CANADIAN DESTROYERS

Mr. PURDY:

Will the government consider the selection of maritime provinces names for the two destroyers which, according to press reports, are to be purchased?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The matter is now receiving consideration.

PARLIAMENT HILL—ICY CONDITION OF GROUNDS AND SIDEWALKS

Mr. CHURCH:

Will the government take steps to remedy the dangerous condition of the roads and sidewalks on parliament hill, due to ice thereon?

Mr. DUNNING:

The federal district commission furnished the following facts:

The maintenanace of the sidewalks and roads on parliament hill is the responsibility of the federal district commission. One foreman and twelve men are on duty each day from 6 a.m. to 5 p.m. and one man daily from 5 p.m. to 11 p.m. It is their duty in the winter time to see that all walks, steps, and roads are kept clear of snow and maintained in a safe condition for the use of the public. A truck is in constant use to make available sand, cinders, and salt. During the last ten days eighty tons of sand and cinders and more than a ton of salt have been applied in this maintenance work.

The unseasonable climatic conditions of the past three weeks—rain, sleet, thawing and freezing—have added considerably to the usual difficulties of winter maintenance work, but the commission has done everything possible and has spared no expense in its efforts to make all the thoroughfares on parliament hill safe for public use.

The commission finds that there has been no negligence on the part of any of its employees engaged in this work and that all possible steps have been taken to keep the sidewalks and roads on parliament hill in a safe condition at all times. No reports were received during this recent icy period of any accidents occurring from slippery sidewalks or roads in this area.

*CREDIT EXTENSION ON INDUSTRIAL WORKERS' HOMES

Mr. CHURCH:

Will any action be taken to extend to industrial workers who are losing their homes through foreclosure or otherwise, such relief as that afforded in the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act for the benefit of farmers and fishermen?

Mr. DUNNING: This question relates to a matter of policy and it is not usual for the government to make statements on matters of policy in giving replies to questions.

2. See No. 1.

3. Thirty minutes.

4. (a)$1,282.

(b) No such classification.

*NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. GARIEPY:

Is it the intention of the government to amend, at the present session, the National Harbours Board Act, 1936, in order to give to each port an advisory committee recruited locally?

Mr. HOWE: I submit that this question is not a proper one.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

*NATIONAL DEBT RETIREMENT POLICY

Mr. LANDERYOU:

Has the government any definite plan in mind which, if proceeded with, would substantially reduce and eventually pay off Canada's national debt within, (a) twenty years; (b) fifty years; (c) one hundred years?

2. If so, in what respect does this plan differ from the policy of the past thirty years?

Mr. DUNNING: This is not a proper question. It has reference to government policy and cannot be put in the form of a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT DREDGING FLEET

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Has the government sold the dredging fleet of the St. Lawrence, or a part of it, including the marine facilities at Sorel, Quebec?

2. If so, (a) to whom were they sold; (b) for what amount were tenders called; (c) was the lowest tender accepted; (d) were any other tenders received, and from whom? (e) what was the amount of each tender received?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. (a) To General Dredging Contractors, Limited.

(b) The properties referred to were disposed of by negotiation.

(c), (d) and (e) answered by 2 (b).

PORT OF SOREL ADMINISTRATION

Mr. GARIEPY:

1. Is the port of Sorel included under the administration of the national harbours commission?

2. If not, will the said port be put under the administration of the said commission, and when?

3. Why is said port not under such commission?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.

2. This question relates to a matter of government policy.

3. The harbour at Sorel is administered by the Department of Transport as a public harbour under the provisions of the Harbours and Piers Act.

VETERANS' ASSISTANCE COMMISSION

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. What is the total cost to date of the royal commission on veterans' assistance?
