future? (c) Are such fields to be maintained for wheel or ski use, or both? (d) What provision, if any, has been made to equip all Trans-Canada aircraft with skis for winter flying? (e) Have skis been ordered as part of the equipment of Trans-Canada planes?

8. As from the date of the incorporation of Trans-Canada Air Lines, what expansion has been made in the meteorological services to meet the needs of the expanded air service?

9. Does the Trans-Canada Air Lines propose to operate any feeder or branch lines? If so, what line or lines?

10. Does the Trans-Canada Air Lines propose to invite the participation of private capital in its operation and/or the advice and assistance of Canadians who possess proven administrative and executive skill in the management of aviation transport companies?

11. When will the proposed amendments to existing air regulations be made effective, and will the said regulations, in their amended form, provide for a Canadian certificate of air worthiness?

12. Have Trans-Canada Air Lines let any contracts for the construction of hangars or any other buildings? If so, were the said contracts let on the basis of public tender, and who, or what firms or companies, were awarded the said contracts, giving their respective chief places of business?

13. Have any contracts of insurance been let by Trans-Canada Air Lines? If so, what coverage, to what companies, and through what agents, giving their respective chief places of business?

HUDSON BAY WATERSHED DIVERSION

Mr. MacNICOL:

1. Has the federal government given authority to: (a) the Ontario government, or (b) the Ontario hydro electric power commission, to divert water from the Hudson bay watershed to (1) the St. Lawrence river, or (2) the great lakes?

2. Is it still considered that the permission of the dominion is required before waters flowing into the Hudson bay may be legally diverted to the St. Lawrence watershed?

3. Has the government of Canada undertaken or agreed to pay the whole or any part of the cost of the construction of a dam on (a) the Kenogami river, or (b) the Ogoki river?

GERMAN COMPENSATION TO CANADIAN WAR PRISONERS

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. At the close of the great war, was there a definite sum of money paid by the German government to the Canadian government to be used as a compensation to Canadian war prisoners for the damage to health, life and property, which they had sustained through German treatment?

2. If so, how large was this sum of money?

3. When was it paid to Canada?

4. To whom was it paid?

5. What was done with it?

6. What was done to compensate Canadians who had suffered from German imprisonment?

Mr. RINFRET: Return tabled.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON PENITENTIARY REFORM

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. What is the total cost to date of the royal commission on penitentiary reform?

2. What are the rates of pay and allowances (travelling and living) made to each commissioner and the amounts paid to date to each commissioner, by name, under these or other heads?

3. What are the rates of pay and allowances of any kind to counsel and assistant counsel of the commission, and the amounts paid to date to each such official, by name, under these or other heads?

4. What is the total cost to date for, (a) secretarial assistance; (b) clerical assistance; (c) preparation of stenographers' report of proceedings of the said commission?

5. How many days did the commission sit to hear evidence, and how many days were spent in travelling?

6. How many witnesses were called by the commission, and what was the total amount paid for their appearance before the commission?

7. What is the total number of people employed by this commission, and total cost per month?

ROYAL COMMISSION ON WHEAT MARKETING

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. What is the total cost to date of the royal commission on wheat marketing?

2. What are the rates of pay and allowances (travelling and living) made to the commissioner, and the amount paid to date to said commissioner?

3. What are the rates of pay and allowances of any kind to counsel and assistant counsel of the commission, and the amounts paid to date to each such official, by name, under these or other heads?

4. What is the total cost to date for, (a) secretarial assistance; (b) clerical assistance; (c) preparation of stenographers' report of proceedings of the said commission?

5. How many days did the commission sit to hear evidence, and how many days were spent in travelling?

6. How many witnesses were called by the commission, and what was the total amount paid for their appearance before the commission?

ROYAL COMMISSION ON TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. What is the total cost to date of the royal commission on the textile industry?

2. What are the rates of pay and allowances (travelling and living) made to each commissioner, and the amounts paid to date to each commissioner, by name, under these or other heads?

3. What are the rates of pay and allowances of any kind to counsel and assistant counsel of the commission, and the amounts paid to date to each such official, by name, under these or other heads?

4. What is the total cost to date for, (a) secretarial assistance; (b) clerical assistance; (c) preparation of stenographers' report of proceedings of the said commission?

5. How many days did the commission sit to hear evidence and how many days were spent in travelling?

6. How many witnesses were called by the commission, and what was the total amount paid for their appearance before the commission?

Mr. LENNARD:

1. Who are the members of the royal commission on the textile industry? What are their vocations, and what experience, if any, has each member had in business within the textile trade?

2. What counsel were employed by the commission? What fees and expenses were paid to each of them?

CANADIAN DAIRY PRODUCTS

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. What was the total value of dairy products produced in Canada during each of the years 1931, 1932, 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, and 1937?

2. What was the total value of cheese exported from Canada during each of the same years?

TORY COAL COMMISSION

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What was the total cost of the Tory coal commission, and what amount was paid to the commissioner, and other chief officials and counsel?

2. What did they find or report?

3. Have any of their recommendations been carried out or acted on?

4. Have any prosecutions been started as a result of this report?

5. Did the said commission investigate the spread in prices per ton from $5.50 in 1906 to $14.50 and $13.50 in 1937-38?

6. Did the commission investigate the idea of a national fuel policy for Canada so that all fuel used in Canada should be mined and coked under the British flag, whether from Wales, the maritimes or Alberta?

7. What recommendations in the report, if any, were made to protect the consumer?

8. How many tons of maritime coal of various kinds were transported by rail, or rail and water, to the head of the lakes, (a) in 1936; (b) in 1937?

9. (a) How many tons of American anthracite, and (b) how many tons of soft coal were imported into Canada during the last year of record?

10. How many tons were imported, (a) from Wales; (b) from Russia; (c) from Germany, during the same period?

VEGETABLE SHIPMENTS FROM ONTARIO TO THE DROUGHT STRICKEN AREAS

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. How many carloads of fresh vegetables were purchased from growers in Ontario by the dominion government for shipment to the drought stricken areas of western Canada during the year 1937?

2. What was the total paid by the government for the said shipments?

3. From what local districts in the said province were vegetables so purchased?

4. How many carloads of vegetables were purchased from each of such local districts?

5. How many carloads were purchased from vegetable growers in the county of Peel?

QUEBEC SUPERIOR COURT JUDGESHIPS

Mr. GARIEPY:

1. Since the year 1921, how many persons were appointed judges of the superior court of the province of Quebec, and upon what dates were such appointments made?

2. What were the names, surnames, ages, and domiciles of the said appointees?

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE—NAVAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. GARIEPY:

1. Of the vote of $35,000,000 for the last financial year, for the Department of National Defence, how much has been expended, and if there be a balance left over, in what way will it be employed?

2. During the last financial year, has the Department of National Defence purchased vessels of any kind, and, if so, from whom, how many, and what was their cost?

3. Since these vessels were purchased, where were they operated, under whose direction, and under whose command?

4. Since the acquisition of these vessels, have they been grouped with others as part of a squadron, and, if so, what was the nature of the group, in what waters, and for how long?

5. Where are these vessels at present, what is their number and their names, and under whose orders do they conduct their operations.

SPECIAL COMMISSIONS APPOINTED SINCE OCTOBER, 1936

Mr. WALSH:

1. How many special commissions have been appointed by the present government since October, 1936?

2. By what special names are each of these commissions regularly known?

3. What is the date, or dates, of the appointment of each?

4. What are the names of each member of each such commission?

5. What salary, remuneration or emolument did each receive?

6. What other allowance or travelling expense did each receive?

7. What are the names of the counsel appointed to or engaged by each commission?

8. What salary, remuneration or emolument did each receive?

9. What other allowance or travelling expense did each receive?

10. What additional expense did each commission incur, or if final report not yet presented has commission incurred to date?

ST. LAWRENCE DREDGING CONTRACTS

Mr. GARIEPY:

1. What contracts were given since January 1, 1937, for dredging the St. Lawrence river between the cities of Montreal and Quebec?
2. To whom were such contracts awarded, at what prices and for what operations?
3. Were tenders called for in each case?
4. If so, what were the names of the various tenderers and the amount of their respective tenders?

COST AND USE IN CANADA OF CANADIAN AND IMPORTED COAL, 1935-37

Mr. POOLE:

1. How much coal was imported into Canada in (a) 1935, (b) 1936, (c) 1937; from what countries was it imported, what were the grade or type of coal, and the prices laid down in Canada?
2. What were the wholesale and retail prices of imported coal in eastern Canada?
3. What were the wholesale and retail prices of Alberta coal in eastern Canada?
4. How much money was paid in coal subsidies?
5. How much coal was used in these years by the Canadian Pacific Railroad, the Canadian National Railroads, and other Canadian railroads, respectively?
6. How much imported coal was used by the Canadian Pacific Railroad, the Canadian National Railroads and other Canadian railroads, respectively?

SCRAP METAL AND NICKEL PRODUCTION, 1935-37

Mr. POOLE:

1. How much scrap metal was exported from Canada in 1935, in 1936, and in 1937?
2. How much scrap metal did Canadian railroads sell during the said years, and to whom in Canada, and if exported, to what countries?
3. What was the total amount of nickel and necessities for armaments produced in Canada during the same years?
4. How much nickel was exported, and to what countries?
5. What was the total profit from the production of nickel?
6. What taxes are paid by the International Nickel Company in Sudbury?

SALE OF GOVERNMENT VESSELS

Mr. PARENT (Quebec West and South):

1. Has the government sold any vessels during 1937?
2. If so, (a) how many vessels, dredges, etc., were sold; (b) what were the names of each; (c) the dates of their construction; (d) the cost of construction or purchase price; (e) the length of time each was in operation since the date of construction; (f) the amount expended on each for repairs while in government service; (g) the number of employees on each of the vessels sold?
3. To whom were they sold; stating (a) the name of the purchaser or purchasers, and if a company, its name and the names of its directors; (b) the amount paid by the purchasers?

NATIONAL HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. PARENT (Quebec West and South):

1. How many civil engineers are employed by the National harbour commision?
2. What are their names, salaries and their respective duties?
3. How many persons were in the employ of the harbour commission of Quebec on the 1st December, 1935?
4. How many were there employed on the 1st December, 1937?
5. How many vessels carrying grain were loaded during the years 1935, 1936 and 1937 at the elevators at (a) Halifax, (b) Saint John, (c) Quebec, (d) Three Rivers, (e) Sorel, (f) Montreal?

POPULATION AND RAILWAY MILEAGE

Mr. BOULANGER:

According to the latest statistics, what is: (a) the present population of each province of Canada; (b) the railway mileage in each province; (c) the number of inhabitants per railway mile in each province; (d) the percentage of population of each province with respect to the total population of Canada; (e) the percentage of railway mileage in each province in proportion to the total railway mileage in the dominion?

FEDERAL GRANTS TO PROVINCES

Mr. BLANCHETTE:

What is the total amount of federal grants to the several provinces, respectively, for the fiscal years 1935-36, and 1936-37?

HYDRO-ELECTRICAL ENERGY

Mr. BOULANGER:

According to the latest statistics, (a) what amount of hydro-electrical energy has been developed in each of the provinces of Canada; (b) what quantities of such energy are now being utilized; (c) what is the maximum quantity of power that can be developed in plants completely or partially harnessed; (d) what quantity of power can be developed from sources not yet harnessed; (e) what quantities of power can be produced and utilized in Canada on a paying basis and under present conditions from sources not already harnessed; (f) what quantities of power, is it estimated, could be produced and utilized fifty years hence from the different sources in Canada not yet harnessed?

Mr. RINFRET: Return tabled.

FEDERAL PAYMENTS FOR DIRECT RELIEF

Mr. BOULANGER:

What amounts have been paid by the Federal government to each province from April 1, 1936, for what is called "direct relief" to unemployed, to farmers and to indigent fishermen?

Mr. RINFRET: Return tabled.

ITALO-ETHIOPIAN WAR—SANCTIONS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. On what date were sanctions agreed to and put into effect by Canada against Italy because of Italy's invasion of Ethiopia?

2. When were sanctions withdrawn by Canada?

3. Will the text of (1) and (2) be laid on the table of the house?

4. Has Canada approved or been asked to approve of the conquest of Ethiopia by Italy?

5. Has Italy or the government of Great Britain asked Canada's approval?

6. Will all communications relating to questions four and five be laid on the table of the house?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This stands as an order for return, tabled herewith. I am asking that the question should be made an order for a return because there is an order in council attached to the answer which I am anxious to table.

MARKET GARDEN PRODUCTS—EXPORTS AND IMPORTS

Mr. LENNARD:

1. What was the approximate value of the market garden products exported to the United States during the twelve months ending December 31, 1937?

2. What was the value of market garden products imported into Canada from the United States during the same period?

3. What proportion of this amount was imported into Ontario?

4. What was the approximate value of the same production of this produce in Canada during the same period?

5. What proportion of this amount was produced in Ontario?

EXPENDITURES ON LEVEL CROSSINGS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. On what level crossings in Canada was: (a) the grade crossing fund expended; (b) the special million dollar 1937 vote for that purpose expended?

2. Will the minister give the house details of expenditures in each case?

Mr. HOWE: Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT AMENDMENT—CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. BOULANGER:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Prime Minister of Canada and the several provincial ministers bearing on the proposal to amend the British North America Act to create a federal system of insurance against unemployment.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

BURLINGTON CHANNEL—SOUTH PIER

Mr. LENNARD:

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams, specifications and other documents in the possession of the government with respect to reconstruction of south pier, Burlington channel, during the years 1936 and 1937.

SALE OF ANTICOSTI ISLAND

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all correspondence, orders in council, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada or any official thereof and any other persons relating to the sale of Anticosti island, or any part thereof, or of its natural resources.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, in the correspondence referred to in this motion there are some documents which are of a confidential nature and which I do not think it would be proper to have placed on the table. Subject, however, to communications of that nature not being tabled, the government has no objection to the motion being carried.

WEST TORONTO CUSTOMS OUTPORT

Mr. AHEARN (for Mr. Mulock):

For a copy of all correspondence, instructions and recommendations in connection with the establishing of the West Toronto customs and excise outport as an independent port.

CHILLIWACK, B.C., AIRPORT

Mr. BARBER:

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada or any minister or officer thereof, and any other persons, relating to the establishment of an airport or emergency landing field at or near Chilliwack, British Columbia.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. PERLEY:

For a copy of all orders in council passed under the provisions of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, since August 1, 1936.

Mr. PERLEY:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents passing between the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the wheat committee of the cabinet or any member thereof and J. R. Murray, between November 1, 1935, and December 31, 1935, with respect to Mr. Murray's appointment as chairman of the Canadian Wheat Board.

GRAIN INQUIRY—CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. PERLEY:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents passing between the Minister of Trade and Commerce or his deputy and commissioner Mr. Justice Turgeon, between April 1, 1937, and July 31, 1937, with respect to the grain inquiry.

And also copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents passing between the Minister of Trade and Commerce or his deputy and Colonel J. L. Ralston, counsel for the grain inquiry, between April 1, 1937, and July 31, 1937, with respect to the said grain inquiry.

WHEAT STATISTICS

Mr. PERLEY:

For a return showing: (a) complete details of that portion of the 1935-1936 wheat crop disposed of by the Canadian Wheat Board between July 31, 1936, and December 31, 1937; (b) complete details of the disposal by the Canadian Wheat Board of wheat acquired from the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, from July 31, 1936, to December 31, 1937.

Mr. PERLEY:

For a return showing: (a) a detailed statement of all copies of cash broker's notes of sales made to the Canadian Wheat Board since January 1, 1937, to date; (b) a copy of all cash broker's notes of all sales made by the Board from January 1, 1937, to date; (c) the names of brokers and clearing sheets of options, bought or sold, since January 1, 1937, to January 1, 1938.

Mr. PERLEY:

For a detailed statement showing the number of bushels of open trades or interest of the Wheat Board during September 28, 29, 30 and October 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5, 1937.

Mr. PERLEY:

For (a) statement or report showing amount of Durum wheat bought and sold since July 31, 1937, to date, and the price bought and sold at; (b) statement showing amount of sales of Durum wheat to Italy, and amount of sales of Durum wheat to United States, since January 31, 1936, to date.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, with regard to these four motions, possibly the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) would allow them to stand until the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) is in the house.

Mr. PERLEY: That is quite all right.

Motions stand.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT

Mr. BLACKMORE:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Minister of Agriculture of Canada and the Alberta Department of Agriculture, from March 3, 1937, to date, bearing upon the negotiations between the dominion and Alberta governments concerning the application in Alberta and Saskatchewan of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

CANADIAN CORONATION CONTINGENT

Mr. BROOKS:

For a return showing the name, rank, militia unit and post office address of each member of the Canadian coronation contingent.

WEST TORONTO OUTPORT

Mr. GREEN (for Mr. Ross, St. Paul's):

For a copy of all orders in council and all communications between the government or any department thereof, and any other person or persons, containing information or request or recommendations with reference to the change of the out-port of West Toronto to the Port of West Toronto.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

Mr. PERLEY (for Mr. Edwards):

For a return showing,—1. The total cost to date of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations.

2. The rates of pay and allowances (travelling and living) made to each commissioner and the amounts paid to date to each commissioner, by name, under these or other heads.

3. The rates of pay and allowances of any kind to counsel and assistant counsel of the commission, and the amounts paid to date to each such official, by name, under these or other heads?

4. The number of (a) secretaries; (b) economic or other advisers; (c) clerical, stenographic and other assistants who are or have been in the employ of the said commission, and the total cost to date for their services, and total number of employees.

5. The number of days the commission sat and heard evidence and the number of days spent in travelling.

6. The number of witnesses called by the commission and the total amount paid for their appearance.

BROADVIEW, SASK., AIRPORT

Mr. PERLEY:

For a return showing all details with respect to the purchase of the airport south of Broadview in the province of Saskatchewan, such return to include the price paid, the names of the vendors and the amount of money spent in making the field ready for operation.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—CONTRACTS

Mr. BENNETT:

For a copy of all contracts made by or for the Department of National Defence from the beginning of the present fiscal year (April 1, 1937) to date, as well as a copy of all tenders with respect to each such contracts.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With reference to this resolution of the right hon. leader of the opposition there is no objection whatever on the part of the government to this order passing. But I should like to point out that according to the information I have received from the department, 5,842 contracts were awarded during the first nine months of the fiscal year, and the estimate is that it will take a staff of twenty a period of six months to prepare the return that is asked for.

Might I suggest to my right hon. friend that I would be very willing indeed, if he would be good enough to specify any particular contracts, to get the information as soon as possible. I would suggest also to members of the house that in order that information may be made readily available to all members, all these contracts, or as many of them as may be considered necessary, should be referred to the public accounts committee.

Mr. BENNETT: They cannot be referred to the committee on public accounts until the public accounts have been published in the auditor general's report for the next year. The present public accounts are brought up only to the end of March, and that is the reason for the motion now before the house. Perhaps if the contracts exceeding $5,000 were to be brought down, that would include those in connection with which I desire the information.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am informed that for the same period the number of contracts exceeding $5,000 is 278. I was quite aware of the situation with regard to the public accounts committee, but I thought that might be done by motion with the consent of the house.

TWEED, ONT., POST OFFICE SITE

Mr. GRAYDON:

For a copy of all orders in council, telegrams, letters, correspondence and documents of any kind in the possession of the government, relating to the acquisition of a site for a post office at Tweed, Ontario.

DREDGING FLEET—SALES

Mr. LAPOINTE (Matapedia-Matane—for Mr. Parent, Quebec West and South):

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the government and the purchaser, relative to the sale of a portion of the dredging fleet belonging to the government, including barges, dredges, etc., and also copy of contracts entered into by the government and the purchaser.

[Mr. Bennett.]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION CONTRACTS

Mr. CAHAN (for Mr. Lawson) moved:

For a copy of all contracts made since November 1, 1937, to date, by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or any of its agents on its behalf, with any persons or corporations or the agents of any such persons or corporations for the use of Canadian Broadcasting Corporation stations or chains for broadcasting commercial programs containing advertising originating in the United States, and copies of all papers, letters, telegrams or other documents relating thereto.

Mr. HOWE: The government must decline to produce these papers, for the reason that to do so would be contrary to the public interest. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is an autonomous body, independent of the ministry of the day as to its internal affairs, and in that regard it is on an exact parallel with the Canadian National Railways. Hon. members are aware that the government does not answer questions in the house relating to the internal management of the Canadian National Railways. A committee of the house brings before it the management of the railway with all documents of interest to hon. members, and the management gives such explanations as are required.

The government is willing to set up a similar committee for radio, but it does not believe it to be in the public interest to produce in the house documents relating to the internal management of the broadcasting corporation.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. BENNETT: No; far from it. If the Minister of Transport would be good enough to read the statute creating the corporation he will observe that it lives on money provided by the people of Canada, either through licence fees or by direct subventions from the government. Surely we have a right to know what those who receive such money are doing with it, it being the sole purpose of the organization to expend the moneys voted by parliament for the purposes indicated in the statute.

The hon. member under whose name the notice of motion stands is not in his seat, and if the motion were allowed to stand until he is in his place I think it would serve a useful purpose. This is a question of prime importance to the people of Canada. If what is suggested can be done, then the people's money can be spent by an irresponsible body, without parliament having any control. We might as well look the matter squarely in the eye.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my right hon. friend aware that the motion is not debatable?

Mr. BENNETT: It is marked with an asterisk.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If there is to be a debate on the subject it should be transferred to notices of motion, where it may be taken up in regular order. The asterisk opposite a notice of motion for the production of papers signifies simply that the matter is not one for debate.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the other way about in some matters.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will it be transferred?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No; just permit it to stand until the hon. member is in the house.

Motion stands.

CIVIL SERVICE—EMPLOYMENT OF MORE THAN ONE MEMBER OF SAME FAMILY

Mr. BETTS:

For a return showing—The number of cases and particulars in connection with each case, in which (a) more than one member; (b) more than two members; (c) more than three members; (d) more than four members; and (e) more than five members of the same family, including in the term family, husband, wife, son and daughter, are employed in the civil service of Canada.

Mr. RINFRET: If this order should be passed in the form proposed by the hon. member it would involve having a questionnaire submitted to every civil servant in Canada. The personnel records of each department are kept separately, and information such as that sought by the hon. member is not available in the records kept by any department. In a case where two members of a family were employed in the same department, the information might be obtained with a certain degree of speed and accuracy, but if a father should be employed in one department and three sons in three other departments, the only way by which the information could be obtained would be by having each civil servant fill out a form.

There are between fifty and sixty thousand persons in Canada employed in one capacity or another by the dominion government. The expense of printing a questionnaire, sending a copy of it to each of these employees, and then tabulating the information received, would be very great. I may add, however, that the government has some sympathy for the object obviously sought by the hon. member, and although we cannot permit the motion to pass, due to the great difficulties and costs involved, I suggest it is a matter which might well be discussed when civil service matters are before either the house or a committee of the house.

Motion dropped.

NATIONAL HARBOURS COMMISSION

Mr. LAPOINTE (Matapedia-Matane—for Mr. Parent, Quebec West and South):

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents exchanged between the National Harbours Commission and any person or persons, during the years 1935, 1936 and 1937, with respect to obtaining grain for the elevators at Halifax, Saint John, Quebec, Three Rivers, Sorel and Montreal.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. member means "for shipment through elevators at Halifax," does he not?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Motion agreed to.

A CANADIAN FLAG

PROPOSAL FOR ADOPTION OF A FLAG SYMBOLIC OF CANADA AND HER PARTNERSHIP IN THE BRITISH EMPIRE

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, a special select committee be appointed for the purpose of considering the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag, representing Canada as a whole, thereby symbolizing the dominion senior partner in the British commonwealth of nations.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution appearing on the order paper in my name is one sponsoring a recognized distinctive flag for our dominion—Canada our homeland, a senior partner in the British Commonwealth of Nations.

To all intents and purposes, at the present time Canada is a sovereign state, or a sovereign nation within a sovereign empire, and because Canada occupies such a proud position, I think it only right that this resolution be brought before the house. Of course limitations still exist to a certain extent in connection with the constitutional development of our dominion, but they are largely fragmentary, or exist only in the imagination. They will disappear, as other limitations have disappeared down through the years, through the advancement of constructive Canadian democracy.

Therefore, the resolution for a distinctive flag for Canada is one which rightly asks that a distinctive emblem be established for our new nation of "The North." The resolution may be considered from two angles of reality, first the thought back of it and, second, the clothing of that thought in suitable form. Structurally, the resolution is but a single sentence, a sentence so concise, simple and plain that he who runs may read and understand. Creators in every realm of artistic thought will readily understand what these words mean, since throughout the ages the problem relative to the production of high class art, whether in the sphere of prose, poetry, sculpture, philosophy or economics, has always been one of a twofold nature: first, the marshalling into the realm of time and space, a noble, splendid and enduring thought, and, second, the clothing of that thought in suitable form. The problem before the house in regard to a distinctive national flag is somewhat similar.

First, we must come to a conclusion with regard to the subject matter back of this undertaking or problem. Then we shall have to take the subject matter and give it external form or symbolize it in such a way that the flag created will appeal to Canadians from ocean to ocean. Naturally the subject matter must not apply to merely any one province; it will have to be broadly national, that is, comprehensive enough to include within its fold the many geographic belts of territory which make up the dominion.

After the subjective part of the problem is solved, the next thing to be done—as we have explained—is to give to the subject matter a suitable form, thus symbolizing Canadian justice, Canadian civil liberty, Canadian ordered freedom and Canadian soul and honour, not only at home and on the continent but throughout the world. First, then, there must be settlement by hon. members of this chamber of the subjective side of the problem of a distinctive national flag. After that is done, the subject matter will have to be so symbolized that a national emblem will come into being that will preeminently stand for Canada at home and abroad.

The resolution is made up of or determined by four essentials. It will be observed that the first essential is that the opinion of parliament shall be obtained, by debate or discussion, so that the matter of the adoption of a national symbol may be fully reviewed. The second essential is that a special committee, made up of members of all parties and groups, a committee representing the combined opinion of the house, shall be appointed for the purpose of considering the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag. The third essential of the resolution is that the flag adopted shall be representative of Canada as a whole. The fourth essential is that the national emblem shall symbolize the equality of status of this dominion among the self-governing dominions of the empire.

It will be observed that we have said nothing in the resolution with regard to a particular design. We believe that the question of design may very well be left to a committee of the house. During the last ten years in which this resolution has been before parliament and the country we have received hundreds of designs. However, we believe the house as a whole is not the place to settle any particular design. That can better be done in committee. However, there is no reason why this flag question should not be discussed in a general way in the debate that will take place on this resolution. We should fully discuss the general principle behind the adoption of a distinctive flag for our country. The details can come later.

It will be observed also that the resolution is singular and not plural in meaning. That has been decided upon deliberately. My opinion is that when we settle the question of a national flag for the dominion, a national flag should provide a key to all other departmental flags, the national honour flag, the national memorial flag and other flags that a young nation like Canada should adopt as soon as possible.

Perhaps it might be well in discussing this flag problem to outline the history of the resolutions which have been placed before the house during the last ten years. In 1929 a resolution calling for a distinctive flag for this dominion was placed on the order paper by myself. That resolution was not reached during the session and consequently there was no debate. If we remember correctly, that session ended in June and at the end of the session the flag resolution was in consequence found in the file of unfinished business.

In 1930, a resolution of practically the same meaning and intent was placed on the order paper. However, that being an election year, the resolution was not reached. There was no debate and the matter was not discussed or analyzed or reviewed in any way. At the end of the session, like its predecessor, it too was found in the file of unfinished business.

In 1931, another resolution was placed on the order paper, and a brief debate thereon took place on May 25, which was empire day, a very good day upon which to bring up and debate such a resolution. The present official opposition were then in power, and at six o'clock the then Prime Minister, the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), moved that the house adjourn. No further debate took place on the resolution that day and next day, on account of the adjournment, it was to be found far down on the order paper. No further debate on this resolution took place during the session.

In 1932, no action by way of resolution was taken. In 1933, another resolution was placed on the order paper. This was debated briefly and was then withdrawn by myself with the leave of the house. Hon. members will remember the conditions of financial and economic distress which existed in that year; they will recall the need for unemployment and farm relief, and because of these hampering conditions further discussion on this matter was, in our humble opinion, not in order at that time.

In 1934 the present official opposition were still in power and they took it upon themselves to do their best to get a national flag. we agreed with them in that undertaking. The result was that a resolution asking for the adoption of a national flag was moved by the then member for Nanaimo. Some debate took place on this resolution, but apparently some opposition had developed in the ranks of the government supporters. The then hon. member for Parry Sound, Mr. Arthurs, seconded by the then hon. member for Essex West, Mr. S. C. Robinson, moved the adjournment of the debate. The result was that no further discussion on this resolution took place during that year.

In 1935, the then hon. member for Nanaimo again presented a similar resolution to the house. After a brief debate, an amendment was moved to the resolution by the then hon. member for Parry Sound, seconded by the then hon. member for Carleton. A short debate took place on the main motion and on the amendment, but special controversy arose in the ranks of the government supporters with the result that, upon an intimation from the Secretary of State of that day, the mover of the amendment withdrew his motion first, and subsequently the mover of the main motion withdrew his resolution. So that settled the discussion of the flag problem in 1935. It will be noticed, Mr. Speaker, that during all these years practically no progress was made towards a solution of this problem.

In 1936, the present government had just come into power and no action was taken that year on a Canadian flag. Personally we thought the government should be given a chance to get down to its program and deal first with the outstanding economic and industrial problems confronting it. That was the stand we also took in 1937; but to-day, in 1938, this resolution is down on the order paper because two years of the life of this parliament have gone by, and we thought that perhaps this year would be an opportune time to bring the matter up, because undoubtedly the sooner it is settled the better it will be for Canada. It will mean dollars and business to this dominion. It will mean national respect at home and abroad, and the sooner Canada is recognized both at home and away from home by a suitable symbol, the better it will be for Canadian publicity, prosperity and nationhood, here and elsewhere. That is in brief the story of what took place in parliament. That is keeping the record straight during the last ten years, and it ought to be kept straight for future historians.

Again, let me ask what has taken place in this dominion since 1867 with respect to a national flag? Confederation is now about seventy-one years of age, and what is the story in this dominion of the fight, as we might call it, for an outstanding national symbol? We might claim that the movement for a national flag began away back in 1870, for it was on July 16, 1870, that the use of the blue ensign was authorized by the Secretary of State. That may be said to have started the fight in this country for a recognized national symbol. The blue ensign, as I said, was sanctioned on July 16, 1870, and it was to be flown by government ships other than warships. After the blue ensign was adopted in 1870, and its use did not seem to hurt or damage us nationally very much, Mr. Speaker, naturally the people of Canada would come to the conclusion that the time had come for a national emblem on land, and so what did they do? They did the best they could. Canadians are a very practical people, and they did what we would only expect them to do. They hoisted the red ensign on high, and they used the red ensign for years on the public buildings of this country, in Canada as it was Canada in those days, until 1904. So, from 1870 to 1904, we flew the red ensign defaced with the old coat of arms in the red part of the flag, in the fly. We used that red ensign for about thirty-five years on the public buildings of this country as our distinctive national emblem.

Then what happened in 1904? The pressure of imperialism and subordination took place, and the result was that when the red ensign was not on hand in this building—when the supply had run out—a civil servant told the Minister of Public Works of that day, the Hon. Mr. Sutherland, I think, that the right flag to fly was the union jack. The minister was thus taken into camp. And so the red ensign was hauled down and the union jack hoisted, and from 1904 the union jack has been flying on all our government buildings from ocean to ocean. That is the story, nationally speaking, of the red ensign as a flag ashore from 1871 or thereabouts to 1938.

What is the situation in regard to a national flag in Canada at the present moment? The red ensign, which had been flown until 1904, and is flying still, is not officially recognized as a distinctive flag for Canada inside Canada, but lo and behold, Mr. Speaker, it is recognized as our official flag outside Canada. It is recognized as the Canadian flag on our legation buildings at Washington. It is recognized as our distinctive Canadian flag on our legation buildings in Paris, Tokyo and London. It is recognized abroad, but there is no recognition for it at home. The result is that from this combination of circumstances we have a confusion existing over our national emblem that, to say the least, does not merit the applause of any Canadian. The quicker that situation is remedied the better it will be for all concerned because a national emblem will be a powerful factor in building up a new nationality from coast to coast, and in uniting our people behind an emblem that signifies Canadian development through the past and aspirations of Canadians for the future.

That being the story of the red ensign on land, what is the story of the red ensign on sea? The red ensign is naturally a water flag, and yet thousands of Canadians use it to-day on land as a distinctive Canadian flag because they have no other. They are using it, mind you, in conjunction with the union jack, and that is quite right and proper. From confederation until 1892 we had no water flag, but in 1892 the Admiralty in London issued an order that from 1892 the red ensign, flying the old coat of arms of Canada in the fly, should be the commercial flag or the flag for our merchant marine vessels on the high seas. That flag is our flag to-day for every ship registered in Canada. This means that the red ensign on the water is in reality our commercial flag. It cannot rightly be used on both land and sea. We are using the same ensign on land simply because we have no distinctive national flag, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is a peculiar condition of affairs to exist in a self-governing country like this dominion. I submit further that the sooner that situation is remedied the better for every real Canadian.

Now, what are we told by those who are opposed to a distinctive national flag for Canada? What arguments are advanced against a distinctive national emblem? One argument used against it, and a familiar one, is that it will dismember the empire; that it will sever our empire relations; that if we adopt a distinctive Canadian flag the Canadian confederation will dissolve. Well, it might dissolve in tears of laughter before an argument of that kind, but we do not think it would dissolve in fact. Then they tell us that if we adopt a distinctive national emblem we shall be discarding the union jack, and the union jack stands for justice, liberty and righteousness in national and international relations. Therefore we should not tolerate any movement against the use of the union jack. Let me say right here, Mr. Speaker, that no one is talking against the union jack; no one is opposing its use; no one wants to destroy it; no one wants to substitute another flag for the union jack. We all want the union jack as our flag of empire. But just the same we certainly want a distinctive emblem, a national flag for the dominion. We want to give Canada the flag representation she ought to have, not only in the empire, but throughout the world. So that argument, I think, disappears. It is based upon the idea that we are going to interfere with the union jack. Our opponents have built up their whole case on that foundation, and since the foundation does not exist the argument has no meaning and therefore should be dropped from this time onward.

Another argument against the adoption of a distinctive national flag is, we are told, because of the traditions surrounding the union jack. The union jack has great traditions. It belonged to my forefathers as much as it belonged to the forefathers of any other hon. member. We love it and prize it, and we call it our own. I am not as a Canadian so narrow-minded, however, as to intend, by adopting a national flag for my own country, to supplement the empire flag, any harm to the union jack. Down through the centuries great traditions have gathered around that flag. Those traditions, we are told, should be preserved. Well, they will be preserved as far as we are concerned, because the demand for a distinctive national flag has absolutely not anything to do with the supplanting of or doing away with the union jack.

We are also told that the union jack will unify the different nationalities making up our Canadian nationhood. That is true. We admit the argument; but if it is sound, a national emblem will do this much better, because it will be emblematic of our own country and will promote nation building within our boundaries and signify our position as a nation within the ambit of the British Empire and in the greater world without.

Further we are told that the union jack has a religious significance; that it stands for righteousness; that the holy crosses hold the most prominent place and stand for the redemption of mankind; that that is why they have been incorporated in the union jack; that the colours red, white and blue symbolize courage, sacrifice and purity, and that therefore there is a deep significance about the union jack, in that it reminds us of the blood of Emmanuel shed for our atonement, of His resurrection and ascension, assuring all who believe in Him of eternal life hereafter. These arguments used to uphold the union jack are wonderful arguments, and sound too, but they are no less applicable to the establishment for Canada of a distinctive national emblem equally as sacred as the union jack. I fail to see why such a flag would not mean the advancement and development of our country in a democratic and spiritual sense.

May I put on record some of the arguments presented for a national flag by the weekly and daily press of the nation? In my humble opinion they present the issue fully and emphatically, and the statements I shall quote are representative of the Canadian press from one coast to the other.

This is what the Winnipeg Free Press says on "Flags of the Commonwealth":

With the numerous flags, officially recognized, of the various parts of the British Commonwealth now being seen at Ottawa, the absurdity of opposition in Canada to the adoption of a flag of our own is very plain. Canada, which led the movement for constitutional freedom and whose government has been enamored of a "Canada First" policy, is the only member of the commonwealth which cannot use its official emblem on this occasion, and, for the sake of practical convenience, resorts to an irregularity.

Surely, after this conference the desire for a new Canadian flag will be unanimous.

I believe that the desire for a distinctive nationel emblem in Canada to-day is practically unanimous. There is a small though noisy opposition; I believe that we should not pay too much attention to it, but that we ought to go forward and make history in regard to this question. I quote the following from the Orillia Packet and Times, on "A Canadian Flag":

. . . But for our part we have never seen any reason why Canada should not have such a flag; and there are many reasons why, when inter-empire gatherings such as that at Ottawa are held, there should be some method of distinguishing the Canadian colours.

The inter-empire gathering referred to was that of the Empire Trade conference at Ottawa, 1932.

From the Hamilton Herald:

If prejudice could be put aside and reason were allowed to rule, it would be easy to make a compromise arrangement satisfactory to all parties.

Another statement, from the Toronto Daily Star:

The flag issue was not raised; it raised itself, and nothing could be more absurd than to suggest that under these circumstances the newspapers should say nothing about it. It is easily understood, however, that those newspapers which oppose a Canadian flag do not want it talked about on an occasion which so vividly illustrates the need of one.

The Winchester Press:

Candidly, we do not see why Canada should not have a flag that is at once British as well as Canadian. The governments of the dominions have adopted national flags. Why there should be any fuss about Canada having a flag that would be pronouncedly Canadian as well as British we cannot understand. This opposition to a "Canadian Flag" is silly sentiment and should not stand in the way of our government adopting a Canadian flag.

The Stratford Beacon Herald:

. . . If the Canadian people did decide to have a new flag it would mean doing away with the union jack as we have it now—

The old argument is used there, that we are going to destroy the union jack. There is not a word of truth in it.

—and there are many people in this country who would not care to do that—

I imagine there will be quite a number who would not want to do that.

—in fact many of them would not do it—

I am one who would not want to do it; and I am the mover of this resolution.

. . . and there would be no way to force unanimity of opinion and action.

We come to the Collingwood Bulletin.

Opposition to a distinctive flag has been based largely on a misunderstanding of the situation. Education on this subject is working towards a practically unanimous public sentiment on this subject.

From the Recorder and Times, Brockville:

The Expositor thinks that if an agreement could be reached whereby a Canadian device would appear on the union jack, it would promote an intenser spirit of patriotism and citizenship, not only for the dominion, but for the empire. Canadians, it says, are surely not afraid of an emblem that would characterize the flag as their own.

Another statement, from the Brockville Recorder:

Why should there not be equal approval of the institution of a Canadian national flag to fly on land? Mr. Chamberlain probably wonders. So do a great many others, who are quite unable to fathom the reasoning of those who object to such a proceeding.

The Kingston Whig-Standard:

There is no reason why Canada should not have its own distinctive flag. It will make us no less loyal and no less a part of the British Empire.

The Perth Courier:

There is no thought either in any Liberal's or Conservative's brain to do away with the time-honoured union jack in our national flag. We all love the old flag and its Christian three-cross design too well to abandon it for any other. No other flag has so wonderful a history or has earned so loving a tribute from its far-flung peoples as this emblem of the empire; and so we in Canada must honour this feeling and all the sentiments involved by retaining in the most prominent corner of any flag that may be adopted this old union jack with its historical and fond memories.

The London Advertiser, which has consistently upheld the proposal for a distinctive national flag, has this to say:

The present flag situation is so ridiculous that it is a wonder self-respecting Canadians can be found to defend it. Prime Minister Bennett is using the Canadian flag on his own motor car at Ottawa so that it will not be mistaken for a British delegation car during the imperial conference. The delegates from every other dominion have brought their national flags, and they must be surprised and amused at the absence of any flag to denote the greatest dominion of all. The opposition to the official recognition of the Canadian flag on Canadian soil is just a piece of silliness of which Canadians should be ashamed. It lends itself to annual twelfth of July oratory, but even the Attorney General of Ontario has been fed up on it, and he presented the commonsense view to his fellow Orangemen at the last celebration.

The London Advertiser further states:

Only Canada, among the dominions, has no distinctive Canadian emblem, except—and this is the ridiculous paradox—one which is flown only overseas, or on the high seas. If all Canadians knew this the opposition to the movement for a Canadian flag would be dissolved in laughter.

This is one from the Orange Sentinel which I think I should read:

They refer—

"They" means those who advocate a distinctive national flag.

They refer to Australia, to South Africa, and the Olympic sports. Canada has the Canadian ensign which serves the purpose of her merchant marine at sea, and we have yet to see a strong argument that any Canadian is embarrassed by the Union Jack flying over the Canada house in London, Washington, Tokyo or Paris.

As a matter of fact, the union jack does not fly over our legations abroad; I made that plain this afternoon. It is Canada's so-called and unrecognizable flag that flies over those legations, but we cannot fly it at home. Therefore the movement for a distinctive Canadian flag persists and will persist.

Next I quote from the Regina Leader:

It is pretty obvious that before many years Canada will decide to have a Canadian flag that will have its origin in two main ideas: Canada, as a nation in her own right, and Canada as a partner nation in the British commonwealth.

The London Free Press—the second London newspaper to comment upon the subject—makes this statement:

There is no reason to believe that if we had a Canadian flag embodying the union jack and signifying loyalty to the British Commonwealth of Nations there would be any suggestion of disintegration of the British Empire.

The Saskatchewan Star-Phoenix says:

It is to be hoped that Mr. McIntosh's motion will be received more intelligently, and that the discussion in the House of Commons will be marked by light rather than heat.

The Montreal Witness has this to say:

But Canada has abundantly shown that she wants a flag of her own, and there is really no room for difference of choice as to what it should be. The received emblem of Canada is the maple leaf, now bronzing in the fall. The golden maple leaf has become as sacred as any emblem may be by having been worn by thousands of our fallen soldiers and having been proudly brought home on the collars of our returned men, who sang everywhere The Maple Leaf Forever.

I have attached to these notices a note that the Kiwanis' organization went on record a few years ago with regard to a Canadian national flag, and I have before me a resolution passed by the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association, Saskatchewan division. May I read it:

Resolved, that this convention of Saskatchewan division, Canadian Weekly Newspapers, assembled in the city of Saskatoon, go on record as endorsing the compaign of Mr. C. R. McIntosh, member of parliament for North Battleford, in his efforts to secure the consent of the government of Canada to the selection of a suitable flag for the dominion of Canada, to be known as the flag of Canada.

This resolution was carried unanimously. I have also attached to the notices from which I have quoted, a verse by a local poet of Vancouver, Mr. Fred A. Burgess. He puts the case very well. The first chorus reads:

For Ireland has her harp and shamrock,
England floats her lion bold;
Even China has a dragon,
Germany an eagle gold;
Bonny Scotland has a thistle,
Turkey has her crescent moon,
And our friends, the Yankees, too,
Have their old red, white and blue—
Every race has a flag but our own.

This presents completely the case for a national flag. In coming to a conclusion on this all-important question many viewpoints may be considered. We might have a national flag based on the white ensign; we might be able to base it on the red ensign; we might base it on the blue ensign. Australia has founded her national flag on the blue ensign; southern Ireland has a tricolour scheme, green, white and orange thus making use of the colour white, one of the predominant British colours. This flag is a co-equal flag with that of Great Britain. Newfoundland's flag is based on the red ensign. We are flying a flag—the red ensign—which is not officially recognized as our land flag. There are many instances in which the three ensigns might be used as bases for a national flag. Then we might have a flag with a union jack in one corner, but that is something which will have to be decided by the committee and the House of Commons. We might have a flag in which there would be no union jack. Some people advocate that, but I do not. I suggest that had this question been settled a few years ago that argument would never have arisen; but so far as the argument is concerned I do not believe there is much public opinion in Canada in favour of it. With the spirit of co-operation and harmony prevailing, a simple and beautiful national emblem can be evolved.

I am not discussing any particular design; but in my opinion the maple leaf should find a prominent place on our flag, and I believe the union jack should also be there, prominently displayed. That, however, is a matter which can best be decided in committee. I am firmly convinced that with goodwill prevailing, with tolerance and patience, and with loyalty to this young nation and its constitution we can make progress in the house and in committee in coming to a satisfactory decision upon this extremely important problem.

I leave the question with hon. members. The very fact that we have in Canada one flag that is not officially recognized at home while the same flag is given official recognition abroad is an anomaly that should be corrected without delay. If it is, I believe that it will mean advancement democratically for this nation and it will give us that respect nationally and internationally that is due to us as a rising young dominion on the north American continent—a nation great to be in the annals of mankind.

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques-Cartier) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, convinced of the necessity of a national flag for our beautiful country, I consider it my duty to support the resolution proposed by the honourable member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh). I do not intend to go into the history of the matter, but simply to offer a few arguments in favour of the establishment of a national flag. Every country in the world, from the most humble to the most powerful, has its national flag. Each country on every continent, in every part of the world, has its emblem, of which it is proud. Whether throughout the ages it bore the name of oriflamme, guidon, banner, standard, or was called something else, the emblem represented first individuals, then clans, groups and finally an entire nation. The mediaeval knight, defender of all good causes, was always accompanied by his equerry bearing a banner decorated with his lord's coat of arms. Even then men understood the importance of having some sort of emblem to identify them. The idea seems to have spread simultaneously in all parts of the globe. Every nation has its flag. In the British Empire itself, outside the mother country, Australia, the Irish Free State, New Zealand, the South African Union have their respective flags, and these countries all belong to the same family of nations. Thus, including Great Britain, at least five British nations have their distinctive flag. I do not see that anyone can object to Canada adopting a national emblem as its sister nations have done.

We have already taken a step in that direction by adopting a national coat of arms as other countries have done. Furthermore, this coat of arms bears a device indicating the size of our country: A mare usque ad mare.

Since we have adopted, as the honourable member for North Battleford pointed out a moment ago, a device and a coat of arms which are recognized by the whole country, why should we not have a national flag? Had we done so a few years ago, we should now have a Canadian flag, playing for our beautiful country the same part as that of the other nations. It would be a rallying-point. It would fly on our navy, on our merchant marine, on our public buildings, on our schools, on our residences. It would be displayed at the head of our processions and at all great patriotic manifestations. It would form a link between Canadians from all provinces. A Canadian flag would contribute to the unity of the dominion.

From a purely practical point of view, the Canadian flag would advertise Canada in other lands. Our tourists, like all other tourists, would display it throughout the world. This would be excellent publicity for Canada. This need of having an object to represent an idea, an association, a people, a union, is not something new. It reveals itself in guilds, unions, brotherhoods. All such organizations have their banners. And these banners are not only chosen after long consideration, but the person selected to bear it must be elected by a majority of the members and he fills an honoured post in the organization. When I was a boy, the first thing we did after forming a group for purposes of play was to find a long staff to which we would fasten some kind of a rag which represented the flag of the group. It is so in industrial and commercial life. Every manufacturer who produces an article of good quality hastens to register a trade-mark indicating that the article was produced in his factory. This trade-mark is his own; it is his flag. As a man of honour he protects and defends it as the soldier defends his country's flag. He allows no unscrupulous competitor to use it. He does not permit his employees to debase it. If to meet competition he has to choose between unprofitable prices and lowering the quality of the articles bearing his name, he will rather register another symbol, in order to preserve the value of his original trade-mark, which is his flag.

May I remind honourable members of something which they know very well, perhaps too well, something that has become part and parcel of our political life? At every election, do we not ask the voters to elect us because we carry the glorious Liberal flag? And do not our opponents do the same thing, claiming that they are fighting under the good old Conservative flag? So even political parties recognize the necessity of a symbol to represent their opinions. This symbol, even though it has only an abstract existence, is called the flag, so suitable is the term.

If organizations of all kinds deem it indispensable to have some kind of a symbol to express their unity, it is all the more necessary for our great country to have one. Such a symbol should be for Canada, as for all other countries, a national flag, a Canadian flag.

Undoubtedly, there are many people who are under the impression that we already have such a flag. In fact, if you refer to the Journals of the House of Commons for 1937, page 167, in connection with the re-establishment of our trade relations with Russia, you will find the very words of a telegram from the Acting People's Commissar for Foreign Trade:

> I beg to confirm the receipt of your telegraphic communication to the effect that the Canadian government have decided to cancel order in council of February 27, 1931, pursuant to which the importation into Canada of certain commodities originating in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics was prohibited.
>
> I hereby inform you that in consequence of the above I shall cancel my order of April 20, 1931, prohibiting all organizations and trade representatives of the U.S.S.R. to make any purchases of goods of Canadian origin as well as the chartering of vessels under the Canadian flag.

Of course, the choice of a flag will be a delicate matter, we must be extremely careful, and not let partisanship interfere. If it were possible to find an emblem that would recall at the same time our origins, and our association with other British nations, together with the fact that we are a Christian people, that would be the ideal thing. Shall we ever be able to discover the symbol which will meet all these requirements, so as to make it our national flag? I hope so. It is one of these cases where all men of good will shall have to take the initiative, and where the greatest measure of tolerance from all sides shall be tested.

It seems to me that there are enough fair-minded members in this house to form a committee which could agree upon a representative design that would be satisfactory to all true Canadians.

Why should we not have our own flag? Why should we be the only remaining great British dominion without any characteristic emblem? Since all other nations each have their own flag, including the sister nations of the British Commonwealth, why not have also a national flag for Canada?

The adoption of a national flag by Canada could not be construed as a provocation against any one. Our fair country would only follow the example of all other nations, great or small. As regards those timid souls who see in the adoption of a Canadian flag an act of hostility towards the mother country, it would be sufficient, I suppose, to remind them of Australia, New Zealand, Ireland and South Africa. Have these great British nations been shaken at all in their allegiance to the sovereign, or to British institutions, through the fact that they have their own flag? To say so would be an insult to those nations.

There are those who would see in this a suggestion of secession from the mother country. What a mistake! What a foolish idea! Canada is merely in the position of a grown up boy who, coming of age, settles down and obtains all those things that are necessary for setting up an ordinary home. Such action is not considered by the young man's parents as an act of hostility, as a kind of provocation towards them. On the contrary, the young man's parents and friends encourage him and they cannot show too much admiration for his deciding to become a man. Instead of bothering him or putting obstacles in his way, they help him. Let Canada select a national flag—she also having come of age—and the Canadians will be glad of that. It will be another step towards progress, towards national development.

I have much pleasure in supporting the resolution moved by the hon. member for North Battleford, which reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, a special select committee be appointed for the purpose of considering the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag, representing Canada as a whole, thereby symbolizing the dominion as an equality partner in the commonwealth of British nations.

Mr. Speaker, before resuming my seat, I wish on behalf of the electors of Jacques Cartier and of those back benchers who are here present, to add my congratulations and compliments to those that have been tendered this afternoon to the right honourable the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) by qualified authorities in this house.

Mr. O. B. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, while I have no great demand from my constituency for a national flag, the people perhaps being more interested at the present time in difficulties of a personal nature, being situated in the drought area, I feel that the subject is interesting from an informative point of view.

When one is contemplating a national flag he is likely to be influenced by conflicting emotions. He may desire the retention of the union jack because of British alliances, and because it is symbolic of the many historical events in the process of building the British Empire. There seems to be a considerable amount of confusion about our flags in the minds of Canadian people, and while the National Anthem creates a reverence for British monarchy and institutions, the singing of "O Canada" stimulates the joy of everything purely Canadian.

I am thinking at the moment of the people of many different nationalities comprising Canadian nationhood who immigrated to Canada for a purpose. The object prompting such a move was doubtless the desire to secure an improvement in their standard of living and, believing Canada afforded that opportunity, after much deliberation they decided to take the momentous step. I can almost feel the tumult of emotions that struggled for predominance in the breasts of these many individuals before deciding the most uncertain action of their lives. They had to decide whether to hold steadfast to their old traditions and institutions, or set their eyes on a new star, trusting—and in human life how very important that quality is. They were anxious to contribute their efforts, be they large or small, to the moulding of a new nation. The young men and women born in Canada, who are not moved by the same sentiments as previous generations with regard to old world institutions and the symbols that represent their struggle for emancipation, look for emblems depicting more particularly Canadian history, while still retaining possibly a symbol of our progenitors, as does the Canadian coat of arms.

The red ensign of the British merchant marine ships, with the Canadian coat of arms in the fly, after floating for thirty years over every dominion public building in Canada was displaced, and the union jack restored.

The shield on Canadian marine flags goes back to the very dawn of our official flag. In order to place a description on the record for those who may read the report of the debate, may I state that in the upper left hand canton are depicted the three golden lions of Normandy, brought from the ancient French province of Normandy by William the Conqueror, and first inscribed on our flag by Richard I of England. In the upper right hand canton we have the lion of Scotland. In the centre cantons we have the harp of Ireland, and also the fleur-de-lis first placed on the British flag by Edward III, in honour of the French princess who was his mother. Beneath these four cantons we have three maple leaves representing Canada. This is placed on the fly of each of the two marine flags of Canada. At present Canada's only flag is the red ensign. In 1892, the dominion government passed a regulation allowing the arms of Canada to be placed on the red ensign for mercantile purposes. The fact that there is no legal right, so far as I know, to fly this flag on land, may account for the change to the union jack a few years ago.

I heartily agree with the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) who advocates the adoption of a national flag for Canada, the importance of which he has brought to our attention. It is of interest, however, to know that Canada already has a flag which is 176 years older than the union jack or, as correctly described, the union flag. When I say Canada has a flag, I refer to the flag of Nova Scotia, a part of Canada, although it is conceded that she did not want to be. I am pleased to see a number of representatives from Nova Scotia in the house.

It is a matter of record that in 1625 Charles I of England granted to Nova Scotia a coat-of- arms and a flag with an orange tawny field. This flag, as I have said, is 176 years older than the union jack. The circumstances in connection with the making of it take us back to the days of Queen Anne. We find that after the Treaty of Union was signed between England and Scotland on January 16, 1707. Queen Anne was requested to appoint ensigns armorial to conjoin into one flag, the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew, and in May, 1707, the flag was displayed at St. Paul's Cathedral in London, where a solemn celebration was held to commemorate the union.

It was not, however, until 1801, when Ireland was joined in the legislative union that the cross of St. Patrick was added. The result of this addition is the union jack or union flag in use to-day by Great Britain and all her colonies.

It may not be a bad idea for the house humbly to pray the province of Nova Scotia for the privilege of flying this as the national flag of Canada. In the centre of the blue cross of St. Andrew, on the flag of Nova Scotia, we find a red lion, all of which is placed on an orange tawny field. This is a very attractive flag indeed, and one no doubt of which Nova Scotia is proud.

We have adopted the beaver as a national emblem. We find it was first used in 1630 by Sir William Alexander, who received in 1621 a grant to colonize Nova Scotia from King James I of England, who was also King James VI of Scotland. So far as I know, no objection has been raised by Nova Scotia to the use of the beaver as an emblem. Therefore I feel confident that Nova Scotia would not refuse us the use of her ancient flag.

New Zealand, Australia, and South Africa have flags of their own. I can remember how anxious we were at one time to take part in the conflict in South Africa. Recently there has come to my notice an article from a Vancouver paper dealing with the flag of South Africa. Dated at Vancouver, September 27, 1937, the article states:

> When the team of forty-three South African lawn bowlers arrived on the Pacific coast during their trans-Canada tour, they were determined to include a pilgrimage to a tree stump at Campbell river, Vancouver island, in their sight seeing.
>
> It was from a stand of timber at Campbell river that a British Columbia fir was felled last summer, trimmed to a 105 foot flag pole and sent to Johannesburg, South Africa for the city's 50th birthday celebrations.
>
> Attempts to transport the huge gift from the sea to Johannesburg by rail five hundred miles away, were abandoned in favour of roads because of the many sharp curves in railroad tracks. At some points only the tip and the butt of the pole rested on freight trucks.
>
> A second problem arose with the erection of the pole, for nowhere in South Africa may the Union Jack take precedence over the flag of the Union of South Africa, and it is usual to erect twin flag poles.

[Mr. O. B. Elliott.]

There is, however, another matter which must be considered before the adoption of a national flag can follow. I refer to the meaning of the word "Canadian," and in this respect I should like to quote from "Canada 1937." Under the heading of racial origins, to be found at page 24, I find the following:

> The object of securing information on racial origin at the census is to ascertain from what basic ethnic stocks the Canadian population, more particularly the recently immigrated population, is derived. The answer "Canadian" is not accepted under this heading, as the purpose of the question is to obtain, in so far as possible, a definition of "Canadian" in terms of racial derivation. It is clear that to accept the answer "Canadian" to the question on racial origin would confuse the data and defeat the purpose for which the question is asked.

May I suggest that the census taker could readily ascertain racial derivation by asking information as to the parentage of the individual, which I have no doubt would be supplied in all cases. As there is no provision on the census tables of Canada for the enumeration of Canadians, it is apparent that the paragraph just quoted from "Canada 1937" is a subterfuge, an explanation which does not explain but which accentuates the omission of the word "Canadian" from the official record. As we all know, were Canadians enumerated on the census, some provision would necessarily have to be made for Canadians to exercise their franchise at the polls as Canadians. Therefore I consider it somewhat of an anomaly that we should be discussing the adoption of a national and official flag for Canadians when even the hon. member for North Battleford is not officially a Canadian. Of course something is wrong and I suggest that we make it right. Is it true, as the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl) says, that there was no confederation or federal union? I leave the question with you: Are we still a colony?

Mr. F. C. BETTS (London): Mr. Speaker, I feel strongly about this question, but I shall endeavour to follow the excellent example of the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) and couch my views in moderate and dispassionate terms. The resolution reads:

> That in the opinion of this house, a special select committee be appointed for the purpose of considering the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag, representing Canada as a whole, thereby symbolizing the dominion as an equality partner in the commonwealth of British nations.

As was pointed out, it would be ridiculous to pretend that by adopting what is referred to as a distinctive Canadian flag we would be jeopardizing the position of the dominion in the empire or be weakening the part that the empire plays to-day in the affairs of the world. To say that would be putting the situation altogether too strongly. My objections to the resolution, which I shall state simply and shortly, are these: There never has been a time in the history of the world when the British Empire played such an important part as it is now playing in the preservation of such world peace as still remains and in the observance of fair play and justice and all that Christianity stands for. Therefore, this is the time when everything that we in this dominion can do to identify ourselves with the British Empire as closely as possible should be done.

One way in which we can foster and strengthen that bond is by exercising what I deem to be one of our greatest privileges, the flying wherever and whenever possible of the union jack. Unfortunately we are subjected to many influences which tend to weaken our imperial connections. The radio and the press of the country to the south are constantly disseminating influences that are in no sense of the word imperial, let alone Canadian. As an antidote to these often undesirable influences we have the union jack. To do other than fly it when and where we may, would in my opinion be bad policy. Something is said in the resolution about a distinctive Canadian flag. The union jack was sufficiently distinctive for the 60,000 men who laid down their lives for Canada in the great war. It is distinctive enough for me and, I believe, for the vast majority of those whom I represent.

There is another practical consideration. I do not think the mover of the resolution or any one else will deny that the most desirable type of immigrant we can get is the immigrant from the old land. Those are the immigrants whom we wish to attract above all others. Surely it would be a consideration in the minds of such people if they knew that when they reached our shores they would still find floating in the proudest position of all the emblem to which they had become accustomed. In some of the press references which the hon. member for North Battleford read into the record something was said about silly sentiment in discussing this question. Whenever we discuss a flag, whether it be a Canadian flag, the union jack or any other flag, a certain amount of sentiment must enter into our deliberations. There is a strong feeling of sentiment for the union jack. My hope is that it will be preserved and increased because it is an honourable sentiment.

There is sentiment in our feelings towards Shakespeare, Milton, Shelley and Burns, and the works of these men arouse the same feelings deep in our breasts as are aroused when the union jack is mentioned. Therefore, for my part, Mr. Speaker, I deplore any move to fly any other flag than the union jack. In my opinion the motion is untimely, and such a motion would, in my view, be untimely at any time. I shall vote against it.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasant duty to compliment the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), first, upon the appealing and convincing way in which he has presented his case to the house, and second, upon his tenacity in bringing up again and again in the house and promoting this most laudable project, which unfortunately so far has not met with the approval of this chamber. The perseverance and energy of the hon. member were not unknown to me because I saw him at work in his constituency of North Battleford, where I lived for many years, and where I am proud to say I had occasion to vote for him. As one who is no longer interested in his constituency I wish to tell the hon. member for North Battleford that not only in his constituency but in many other parts of Canada, probably owing to his attitude in connection with a national flag, he is looked upon as a true, devoted and broad-minded Canadian.

I saw fit to make these few remarks with regard to the hon. member for North Battleford, because a decision such as the one we are about to take might seem queer, even wrong in the estimation of those who, though I believe they are in good faith may consider it as a sacrilege, as it were, the fact of seeking to change in any way the British flag in order to have a strictly Canadian flag.

While I have the opportunity, I take great pleasure in paying my own and my constituents' compliments to the right hon. the Minister of Justice. I wish him health, happiness and success on this 34th anniversary of his coming to this house. These wishes are all the more sincere since the success of the Liberal party, the government and the country are so closely connected with the success, the happiness and the good health of the right hon. Minister of Justice. They may, to a certain extent, smack of selfishness, but I may assure the right hon. Minister of Justice that they are nevertheless profoundly sincere.

The reason I am taking the liberty of saying a few words in support of the motion introduced by the hon. member for North Battleford, is because I believe Canada has reached such a measure of self-government that we should enjoy all the essential characteristics which such autonomy entails. It may be—and I share this opinion—that we ought to retain substantially the character of the British flag, but we should make it distinctly Canadian by adding to it our emblem, as, for instance, the maple leaf. I wish to express my admiration for the British flag which, for many years, and even many centuries, has victoriously flown all over the world. We must admit that under the protection of that flag, except for the bad treatment that was meted to us in the early days of British domination, we enjoyed liberties and privileges of which we would certainly have been deprived under many another conqueror. The crosses of St. Andrew, St. George, and St. Patrick which are to be found on the British flag well indicate the union and cooperation which bind together the oldest members of the empire, and they also show that these elder members of the British Empire wished to have their emblem on the British flag. I think it is expedient that Canada add her own emblem so as to show that it is also her flag.

Since the other colonies, or I should rather say the other members of the British commonwealth have their own flag, why should not Canada have hers? As the hon. member for London (Mr. Betts) said a moment ago, we must admit that in a discussion where feelings intervene, reason and logic do not always prevail. But since we are only seeking to add our emblem to the union jack, I think there is no ground to protest against adding to the old flag anything that would make it more attractive and more characteristic in the mind of Canadians. Besides, the lack of a distinctive Canadian flag is a paradox, an anomaly. A proof of this is the fact that, in those countries where Canada maintains legations, she must create some kind of a flag different from that of the empire through the addition of the Canadian coat of arms. Thus, Canada has a flag, outside its territory, but she has none for her own citizens.

On the other hand, the empire is not a federation. I do not think, either, that the idea of centralization has met with such a measure of approval among Canadians, that the latter should be willing to keep forever as their own the mother country's flag. A Canadian flag would no doubt hold much more attraction for Canadian citizens. Such a flag would appeal much more to the imagination of children and better arouse their national pride. It would form a link that would unite more closely the French and English speaking native born Canadians with those who are simply naturalized Canadians. The thought or ambition of those people who came to our country was not simply to become British subjects. I rather believe that they were determined to become plain Canadian citizens. Again, who could deny the fact that every nation must have her own flag. It is futile, if not ridiculous, to cast doubts upon anyone's loyalty in such debate. I resent the suggestion that those who would adopt a Canadian flag have no attachment or loyalty towards the crown. This is not definitely stated but it is hinted, or insinuated, and every one can read between the lines; on the other hand, every one is quite free to say or think whatever he pleases. And I shall take the liberty, and avail myself of this opportunity to say that I am neither ashamed nor afraid to state that, while second to none in my loyalty towards the crown, if the interests of the mother country should ever happen to conflict with those of my native country, without the least hesitation, I would devote myself body and soul to Canada.

In reality, the opposition against the adoption of a Canadian flag is caused by imperialistic feelings. Let us hope for the day—the sooner it comes, the better it will be for us all—when it may be possible, in our country, to discuss matters of interest solely from a Canadian viewpoint. Meanwhile I believe the best way of being a good British citizen is to remain a good Canadian.

There are in Canada groups whose traditions are not identical. It would be neither wise nor fair to wish for the disappearance of those traditions, but these different racial groups must meet upon a common ground. A national flag, along with our splendid national hymn, would provide this common ground and constitute a closer bond first between the provinces—they need it—and then between native born Canadians and naturalized Canadians, who should all be proud, at this stage of our history, to declare as a matter of principle that one country is enough for any man and that, from a practical viewpoint, the boundaries of their true fatherland should not extend beyond those of Canada.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I first will address myself to some of the remarks made by the mover of the resolution (Mr. McIntosh). If I understood him correctly he said that in 1933 a resolution similar to that which is now before the house was withdrawn because of the distress in the cities and the serious condition in the country. If that reason was effective in 1933 it is a first class reason for withdrawing the resolution to-day. I am sure that conditions in the constituency of the hon. member and other parts of the west are not so gratifying that this house can afford to waste its time debating an educational or academic motion of this kind. People in the west are crying to Ottawa for measures, whether they be the building of reservoirs, diverting rivers, or other constructive operations that will bring relief to the troubles caused by the drought; they are not, I believe, very much interested in the question of a flag, but are more concerned with their own pressing difficulties. I know very well that that is the situation in the east, and I am sorry to observe that while conditions did improve for a time, in the last month or two they have been getting worse.

Yesterday I spent the day with some friends in a railroad town not far from Ottawa and had a conversation with three railroad men. One of them remarked, "I see that the house is going to debate a resolution in connection with the flag. I want to tell you that so far as I am concerned, not only is the union jack good enough for me, but I am much more interested just now in getting a job." He said that fifty of the engine repairers in the town I am referring to had been laid off from the car shops because the large new locomotives are so powerful that they can run from Detroit to Toronto, and from Toronto to Montreal without a change. This man remarked to me, "As far as we are concerned we are interested in getting jobs at the present time; we are not interested in you men down there wasting your time debating a question which at best is only an educational question."

The hon. member who proposed the resolution quoted certain expressions but did not use them himself. I wish to compliment him on the mildness of his language and on the way he said what he had to say. Some of the quotations he used, however, intimated that anyone who has the nerve to oppose this resolution is prejudiced, that to do so is absurd and could have no other motive than a silly sentiment; he also produced a clipping which applied the word "ridiculous" to anyone presuming to oppose the motion. I do not intend to be deterred from what I have to say by any such expressions, neither do I believe such terms would be employed by the hon. member himself. On the other hand, respecting as I do the views of other hon. members, I expect them to respect mine.

I recall the hon. member said that the sentiment throughout Canada favouring the adoption of a so-called distinctive flag was almost unanimous. Before I sit down I shall be able easily to show that that is not so; that on the contrary, opinion against the change is much stronger; that the organization which is responsible, as I see it, for creating the agitation to induce someone to bring this type of resolution before the house has for several years past been engaged in advocating a new flag, and that its late president, to whom I shall refer later, resigned because he believed that that organization was advocating the disruption of the British Empire. I do not argue that such a result would follow the adoption of a new flag—far from it. I am merely repeating what some of those in the organization behind this movement have been quoted as saying.

The hon. member who moved the resolution said that the Saskatchewan weekly papers are unanimously in favour of this proposal. With his powerful eloquence and his position as an outstanding editor in the province, if he went to a meeting of the Saskatchewan Weekly Newspapers Association and could not persuade them to adopt his resolution, or at any rate to support his point of view, I should be surprised.

Mr. McINTOSH: I was not there.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, the weekly newspaper which the hon. member so ably edits lauded such a resolution. Am I not right in that? His views are well known in Saskatchewan. He has said something about Newfoundland. I must correct him in that particular, because on a trip to Newfoundland I discussed the flag situation with the commission. I found that the union jack is the flag used on land, and on the water they have a similar flag to ours, using their coat of arms on their blue ensign in much the same manner as we do, as well as on their red ensign.

We have already had two suggestions as to what could be put on a new flag. One was a maple leaf, which is a wonderful emblem. The beaver was also referred to, I believe by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Elliott) as a suitable emblem to place on the flag. But I should like to call attention to what was said by the hon. member for London (Mr. Betts), and I agree with it, that as it is we have sufficient difficulty in this country in trying to maintain a sentiment of loyalty to Canada, and a sentiment for the maintenance of Canada as part of the empire. There is no question that some are affected by the press of the republic to the south making jocular references to our traditions, our government and our king. We are also exposed to radio influences; I have myself heard many speeches delivered over the radio to which it was not very pleasant for a Canadian to listen.

I endorse, therefore, what the hon. member for London has said, that in this matter we should go very slowly about doing anything that would tend to break down our sentiment towards the union jack and the old land.

As I have so far been for the most part replying to what has already been said in the debate, Mr. Speaker, if you will call it six o'clock I will give my own views when the house resumes after recess.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Speaker, just before the house rose I believe I said that in view of the peaceful penetration of this country by newspapers from the republic to our south and by radio programs from the same source—and I might also add by commerce—in my judgment we should be very careful about starting anything new that might in any way weaken our adherence to our traditions and those of the empire to which we belong.

Perhaps it would be best right at the commencement of my remarks to correct a statement often made, which I think we have all read in the literature that has been sent to us recently by an organization which is pronouncedly against the union jack. I believe it fitting that at this moment I should point out that we have three official flags in this country. The one that was made official first is the blue ensign, which was made an official flag for Canada's government marine by the Colonial Defence Act of 1865. That flag bears on its fly the Canadian shield. The second official flag is the Canadian red ensign, which is used by our merchant marine on the seas and the lakes. That red ensign was ordered by an admiralty warrant in 1892. I might just interject here that when the house rose, someone, I have forgotten who, intimated to me that he felt that Canada ought to have a flag, and apparently he meant a distinctive flag, because if he went to Montreal or elsewhere and saw ships coming in, he could not tell from the flags which were Canadian ships. That is not correct; his information was wrong, and I desire to correct him. I now say that all Canadian merchant ships have flying at the stern the Canadian red ensign. Then, of course, we have the union jack, which in 1912 was ordered by the Secretary of State for the colonies as a land flag for Canada. So we have three official flags: the union jack on land, the red ensign with the Canadian coat of arms on the fly for our merchant marine, and the blue ensign with the Canadian coat of arms for our government marine.

I might say that when I was overseas last summer, in anticipation of the probable reintroduction of this resolution, which I believe has been before the house now on six or seven different occasions, I endeavoured to find out everything possible about the origin of those component parts which go to make up our flags and the heraldry associated with them. I went back into antiquity as far as I could, visiting the signal offices of the Admiralty, the factories where they make the admiralty flags and the record offices of the great newspapers in London as well as the great magazines such as the Illustrated News, the Graphic and others. I wanted to try to disprove to my own satisfaction the statement that the union jack on land is not a distinctive Canadian flag; I wanted to disprove the statement that our red ensign with the coat of arms on the fly and the blue ensign with the coat of arms on the fly were not distinctive Canadian flags.

I have convinced myself, in any event, that they are more distinctive to Canada than almost anything of which I can conceive; that is, if one considers that a flag, to be distinctive of a country, must at least appertain to the races that go to make up that country. I will say this, that the more I searched and the further back I went into antiquity, it appeared to me that the race that had the most to complain about, as far as flags go, was the English race itself. The English people themselves would have more right to complain about their flag not being distinctly British, or ours not being distinctly Canadian, than any other race. Take, for instance, the union jack itself, with its three crosses. St. George's cross was originated not in England but in Asia Minor. The Greeks used it long before the English did. Of course they used a white cross on a blue field, while the British used a red cross on a white field. It is called St. George's cross because of the martyrdom, according to legend, of St. George on April 23, 361. St. George's cross on a flag was brought to England in 1194 by a Norman king, Richard I, on his return from the crusades. It was not of English origin at all; but the English, being broad-minded and steeped in business above everything else, were not perhaps so particular about the ordinary things, and were happy to obtain it. As I have said, that cross was introduced into England in 1194 by Richard I, a French-Norman king.

Then take St. Andrew's cross. That is not Scotch at all; but the Scotch, being receptive also, were willing to take perhaps almost anything worth while. St. Andrew was martyred at Patros in Greece in 69, and according to legend about 370 the relics of St. Andrew were found on the west coast of Scotland.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is wrong in his history there.

Mr. MacNICOL: I did not mean that the cross was adopted then. It was used in 740, I believe, by King Fergus, or some other king.

Then we have St. Patrick's cross. How much Irish is there about that? The Irish are also a fine race, and are willing to take anything that is good. St. Patrick himself was born in Scotland according to legend; but so far as the legend goes he went to Ireland and then to France. History says that his father was a magistrate for the Romans in the fourth century. Whether or not his father was Roman I do not know; but it is said that his mother was French, and St. Patrick's cross was introduced in Ireland about 1169 by the son of a Welsh king. In other words, the English themselves got their cross last. The Scotch got theirs in 740, the Irish in 1169 and the English in 1194.

As far as these crosses go, they are anything but English. Why there should be any feeling against the three crosses on the union jack is something I cannot comprehend. So far as the armorial bearings and the shields on our flags go, what is there about them that is English or Scotch or Irish? Again, the old country took advantage of something that was very good; they appropriated it, and finally used it on their flags. I believe it was stated in the circular sent out by the Native Sons of Canada that a flag bearing St. George's cross was the first English flag. No such thing! The early English did not have a flag. The Romans brought their flag to England, on which was a dragon or a lion. The Romans themselves had in turn acquired the symbol of a lion or dragon from Parthia, part of present Russia. In other words, the lions on our flags are not English. Originally they were brought in by the Romans from Parthia.

So it will be at once apparent that we have quite a mixture in our flags. Richard I, following the Norman procedure of having a lion on a flag, placed the Norman lion on the English armorial bearings. Then, how did we happen to get the fleur-de-lis on our flags? No hon. member will say that that is English. No; it is a very beautiful flower, and it is French. It was placed on the English arms by Edward III in honour of his French mother.

We see, therefore, that we have the fleur-de-lis from the French and the harp from Ireland. I am convinced that the English are certainly a broad-minded and generous race. As I said before, if any race has a right to complain against its own flag, then it must be the English. But they are not complaining; they are just sawing wood, and going ahead. I had expected to see every French Canadian member in the house stand up and speak against the motion. I must say that I could not understand the two hon. members who have already spoken. If they understood that the flag is more French than English they would say, "That is our flag, above any other."

When William the Conqueror landed in 1066 he brought a flag with him. I was anxious to learn what kind of flag he had. Then I searched the records of antiquity to find out what kind of flag the Britons had. Hon. members will recall that, as history relates, it was the Saxon Harold who fought against William. On Harold's flag was found a dragon, copied from the Roman flag. He was supported at Hastings partly by men of Kent, on whose flag there was a white horse. The white horse had been the emblem of the Jutes and Westphalians.

May I point out that if any flag in the world is cosmopolitan, certainly it is the union jack. I say it should be accepted as our land flag, and as our water flag we should retain the red and blue ensign carrying our armorial bearings. Those flags should suit everybody, and all races within our borders.

When William landed in England he carried with him a flag given to him by His Holiness the Pope, a yellow cross on a white field. It has been said that we must have something distinctive. Well, of what should our flag be distinctive? I have listened to speeches over the radio about Canada having a distinctive flag. Of what will it be distinctive, if indeed it is not distinctive of the races which go to make up the people within the borders of the country it represents? About the only race to which it does not refer is the English. It is more French than English. As I pointed out earlier, part of the flag is Parthenian since the lions were Roman, that is Italian and were adopted by the Romans from Parthia. There we have the cosmopolitan flag which should please every Canadian, no matter of what nationality he may be.

There is no other flag like it. Let us see what the other nations have. What will happen if this matter is given to a committee? I cannot help thinking what happened as a result of the splendid speeches made in the South African house. Their resolution was sent to a committee, and I cannot help thinking what came back from it. Of course I can say that perhaps the Canadian House of Commons is more intelligent than any other, and might bring in a better report. Personally, however, I should be very sorry to see anything of this kind sent to a committee.

Let us see what the other countries have. Most flags consist of either horizontal or perpendicular bars. The majority of them have three bars, and they are of almost all colours of the rainbow. On the flag of Albania there are three bars: crimson, black and crimson. On the Argentine flag there are three horizontal bars: blue, white and blue. The flag of Austria has three horizontal bars: crimson, white and crimson. On the flag of Bolivia we find three horizontal bars: red, yellow and green. The flag of Bulgaria carries three bars: white, green and red. On the flag of Esthonia there are three bars: blue, black and white. The colours are assembled in different ways.

Other nations have the three horizontal bars with an emblem superimposed. Then we come to the nations with flags having perpendicular bars, and as an instance I refer to the flag of France, with perpendicular bars: blue, white and red. I have found flags of five nations having three perpendicular bars. In addition to these there are the flags with perpendicular bars having emblems superimposed on the centre bar.

We now come to the other types of flags. In this connection we might refer to the flag of Turkey bearing a crescent and a star, and the Egyptian flag with three crescents and three stars. We must not forget Old Glory to the south of us, with its forty-eight stars and thirteen bars. We find throughout the world a combination of stars and bars or bars and bars, either horizontally or vertically arranged.

No other flag has anything near the same combination as has the union jack, or our own red and blue ensign. Traditions behind these flags go back to the remotest past.

I am wondering why it should be necessary to take up more time in the consideration of this motion, and I would suggest that the hon. member sponsoring it might very well withdraw his motion, and let us get on with the business of the house.

By whom has this agitation been brought about? We know it is only an agitation, because the vast majority of Canadians are not as keenly interested in the flag as they are in some other matters. They are much more interested in getting jobs. The people in the western provinces are more interested in the rehabilitation of their farms. If we were asked to adopt some measures along those lines I am sure we would be more likely to have the support of the unemployed workers in the east and the drought stricken farmers in the west.

However, the motion is before us and we must debate it. The agitation comes principally from an organization known as the Native Sons of Canada. I am a native son of the fourth generation. Although not in a direct line, some of my ancestral family were at Ticonderoga and at Quebec, so I do not have to defend my Canadianism, when it is compared with that of others who can trace back only one or two generations.

What do the Native Sons of Canada have to say? We find that they sent out a booklet described as A Catechism on Canadian Status, from which I shall quote only a few questions and answers. This is one question:

> As Canada now has no national flag—
>
> Notwithstanding the fact that I have proven we have three—
>
> —should it, when adopted, contain the union jack as a part of its design?

The answer is:

> No. It would be entirely improper unless placed in the design so as to indicate that it was so placed for sentimental reasons only.

The next question:

> Has Canada officially adopted any flag?

And the answer:

> She has adopted a flag for the use of the governor general, and one to fly on Canadian government buildings in foreign countries.

Before I forget I should like to correct the mover of the resolution in his reference to Canada House. I went to Canada House many times while I was in London and every time I visited that building I used to crane my neck to see whether a flag was flying. As a rule when people in London want to go to Canada House or to our legation in Paris they do not bother their heads to look to see if the union jack is flying; they simply find out where the building is located, call a taxi at their hotel and are dropped at the door. I am glad to say that Canada House had more union jacks flying during the coronation than any other government building in London that I noticed. There were usually four union jacks flying, and frequently one red ensign. South Africa house always had the South African flag flying, but I might say that I never saw it without a union jack as well. The same applies to the buildings of New Zealand and New South Wales. People are not interested in what flag is flying at Canada House or at the Canadian legation in Paris.

All they are interested in is the business they have to do at these places. I quote again:

Is not the flag flown by the Canadian merchant marine a Canadian flag? No.

That is the answer of the Native Sons of Canada in the face of the fact that two of the official flags in Canada are the governor general's flag and the Canadian red ensign.

The next question reads:

Should either of the two flags mentioned be considered as a Canadian national flag? No. Canada has no national flag.

Well, Canada has a national flag; in fact, it has three of them. The next question reads:

Is it proper that the union jack should be flown over Canadian government buildings? No.

Well, it is proper and it is the law of the land. What does this organization propose as a flag for Canada? I suppose every hon. member has received a copy of this catechism. And on the last page of this circular containing the president's address we are practically told that any man who opposes the adoption of a new flag for Canada should be treated as a traitor. That is fine language to use as regards any member of parliament. The flag proposed by this organization consists of a purple background with a maple leaf and crown thereon. Wherein does such a flag tell of the sentiment of the French Canadians, of the Scotch Canadians, of the Irish Canadians or of the English Canadians? There is not much on it representing what I stand for or what I want on a flag.

The hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) said that he had had a hundred, or was it a thousand flags sent to him? I have had quite a number sent to me, but most of them landed in the wastepaper basket. I show one with the union jack up in the corner and a maple leaf in the centre. A past president of the Native Sons of Canada has this to say:

I would not be a party to anything which, to my mind, would make the union jack appear ridiculous, as it does to me, in the flag of South Africa.

They have a union jack on the flag for South Africa, but it occupies only one-eighty-first of the total area of the flag. I shall not take time to discuss some of the other flags suggested as most of them are just something. This is a report of a statement made by a past president of this organization, Doctor J. Cotton:

"I have refrained for some time from attending meetings and my resignation will be sent in shortly," declared Dr. Cotton. "The original constitution of the native sons was against separation from the British commonwealth and annexation to the United States," he declared, but he added, about a year and a half ago a catechism was issued through a group in the organization. This literature, he asserted, "would cause any person who is sane to believe that the native sons were against a British connection."

I am not against British connections; I am for British connections. Earlier in the afternoon the hon. member for North Battleford said the vast majority of the people of Canada were for a new flag. The Sons of England is an important organization and some time ago I understand they sent a resolution to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I should like to quote from the Sons of England Record, as follows:

The copy of the proposed Canadian national flag was duly received and considered, and I was instructed to advise you that the members of the supreme council of the Sons of England Benefit Society are strongly opposed to any change in our flag, feeling that the union jack is good enough for Canada and is a flag that we are proud to live under.

That was the letter from the supreme secretary of the Sons of England to the national secretary of the Native Sons at Toronto. The Canadian Legion in my riding passed a unanimous resolution instructing me to oppose this motion. I think some attention should be paid to this organization. I attended a meeting of the United Empire Loyalists at which a resolution was passed endorsing the union jack as the national flag of Canada. Instead of sentiment being for a change, in my judgment it is far stronger against a change.

South Africa has two flags. As an hon. member to my left said, they always have to erect two flagpoles there as the law of South Africa states that the union jack and the union flag shall fly side by side. The Australian flag is made up of a blue ensign with the southern cross. The New Zealand flag is similar, the southern cross being arranged differently. The flag of Brazil also contains the southern cross. I have no fault to find with what has been done in other parts of the empire, but I feel that we have a flag of which we should be proud.

India has a rather attractive flag and one to which I have no objection. It is made up of the union jack with the Star of India on it surmounted by a crown. If the different countries in the empire could decide upon a uniform flag, I would not oppose it particularly. But the way we are going now, with each country adopting a different flag, we are going to end up with a hodgepodge. I made an exhaustive search into the origins of the Indian flag, the Malta flag and the Jamaica flag. In each case the union jack has been used with the respective coats of arms superimposed.

I should like to close by relating an incident which occurred during my visit to London. Perhaps you, sir, and other hon. members will remember the great banquet which was held by the borough of Westminster. That was one of the most elaborate banquets I have ever attended. There were about 100 tables, with from eight to ten people at each. The government took care to see that there would be visitors from different parts of the empire at each table. A nobleman from Malay sat close to me and I engaged him in conversation. After a speech by one of the great statesmen of South Africa I turned to this gentleman and said, "We have a wonderful empire." He had told me that originally his family were Chinese but they had lived in Malay for ten generations. I tried to write down from memory a few days later just what his reply was, and I shall quote from my note:

> Yes, we have a marvellous empire. I often ponder about these islands.

Then, as if pondering, he added these words:

> If these islands, with their culture and the knowledge of the arts and sciences, with their love of right, their respect for colour and creed, with their integrity and their valour were to suddenly sink beneath the Atlantic, the nations of Europe in dismay and madness would destroy each other. With Britain's strong restraining hand gone, nation would fly at nation, the last remaining one would be impotent, a shambles. I shudder to contemplate the tragedy that would befall Asia, befall India, befall Malay, should the flag of this country sink to rise no more.

If such a catastrophe as that did happen, Mr. Speaker, it would not matter much what flag was chosen by parliament to fly over this country because whoever got to us most quickly, and was stronger than we were, would see to it that their flag flew over Canada.

I close with the thought with which I commenced when the house met at eight o'clock. In view of the peaceful penetration of this country by the United States, by means of the radio, the press, literature and commerce, we should be very, very careful to do nothing to weaken the traditions upon which this country has been built, traditions, as I have tried to point out, that are steeped in the glories of the French, who brought with them from Europe their language and their culture to help build up this nation; and I appeal to my French-Canadian compatriots not to hasten, not to jump and vote for this resolution, because certainly now is not the time to present a resolution of this kind with the condition this country is in at present. I appeal also to my hon. friend from North Battleford to withdraw his resolution and concentrate his splendid energies and outstanding ability on supporting measures in this house which will make for the rehabilitation of those fine provinces of the west, and which will at the same time assist in rehabilitating and giving employment to thousands who are now unemployed.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker. I have only two or three thoughts to contribute to this debate. I had anticipated that I would have something to answer when the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) had taken his seat, but I am persuaded that the research which he made in the old land during the past summer must have more or less convinced him that the speech he made in the house in 1934 was not entirely right, because it seemed to me as I listened to the hon. gentleman to-night that he did not wax as eloquent or was as fluent as he was over the flag situation three or four years ago.

One expression he used was that the vast majority of the people of this country are not interested in this question of a national flag. When this question first came before the House of Commons back in 1929 or 1930 I was somewhat of the same opinion, but I have changed my mind since then. I have come to the conclusion that the vast majority of the people of Canada are interested in this question and are anxious that this parliament should do something towards adopting a national flag for this new nation—Canada.

I had an opportunity this past summer of attending two meetings of people of racial origins other than those of people from the British Isles, and I noted that the flags of the countries to which they originally belonged held a predominating position. I was interested, too, in listening to the speeches that were made at those meetings in connection with the countries from which these people came, and in their statements as to why they came to Canada. They believed that they could better themselves here. They apparently believed that they were going to help build up a new nation on this north American continent; that they themselves were going to play a part in its building up, and I wondered on those occasions why people who came here with such ambitions should not have an opportunity of honouring a national flag in their new land as they honoured the flag of the old land from which they came. These people now constitute a majority of the people in this country, for according to the 1931 census, the people from the British Isles and their descendants constitute a minority, and I believe that from 1931 onwards that minority will be found to be much smaller than it was in 1931. These people came here and brought with them the best traditions of their race, their best thoughts and culture, and they are trying to assist every other nationality that there may be in this land in building up a new nation in Canada.

I have no doubt, after talking to a good many of these people and their descendants, who came here from other lands, that they are prouder of what took place at the imperial conferences of 1926 and 1932 than we who constitute the British stock. They realized they were in a country where they were going to share in building up a new citizenship and a new nation. They are trying to play their part, and we are not being asked to do very much when we are asked to give them an opportunity of honouring a flag that they can use in place of the flag of their old land. Many of these people came from strife-torn Europe. From their childhood they may have been taught to harbour resentment against some other European country. They may not look upon the union jack with just that reverence and honour with which those of British stock view it, but they know it is a British possession—

Mr. LENNARD: And they should honour it.

Mr. BOTHWELL: And they do. But they may not look upon it with the same honour and respect and reverence that we do. Let us give them an opportunity to develop the pride they have in their new land and in the citizenship they are building for themselves. That is one thought, Mr. Speaker.

The next one came after the coronation ceremonies in England last year. I was interested in reading the newspaper accounts of them, and proud of the part that Canada played, proud to know just how Canada was honoured at that great pageantry of empire. I want to read to the house a few lines penned by a man who used to sit in the press gallery of this house, who happened to be in London at the time, giving his impressions of the position that Canada occupied in British eyes, even though she was the senior member of the commonwealth of nations at that great ceremony. He says:

> Most Britons resent Canada sponging on the old land for a flag. Moreover Canada's poverty of national pride (if the British people did not ignore it) would sensibly diminish what might be called the glorious pageantry of empire.

And again:

> It was irritating to a Canadian in England during the coronation celebrations to see this bogus Canadian ensign everywhere; to see Canada's ministers of state riding in motor cars on which the Lancashire-made emblem was flown. No doubt, if Premier Mackenzie King and his colleagues had done the right thing they would have asked that these illegal ensigns be taken down and would have pointed out to the British government that Canada did not want a flag of its own but preferred to use the British banner. Such a request almost certainly would have been refused. The British still have a keen sense of national pride. They want their own place in the empire and they would find it impossible to understand why the senior dominion desired to confuse its identity with that of the parent member.

Mr. BENNETT: Who wrote that?

Mr. BOTHWELL (reading):

> To use a British flag at the great spectacle of the gathering of the empire at the Aldershot tattoo would be to confuse the spectators. Nobody would know that the soldier carrying a second British flag represented Canada . . . Unless a spectator was so close that he could see the maple leaf on their badges, a British flag would mean that here was another regiment of home troops.
>
> In Britain, of course, this is an utterly impossible situation. A Canadian flag, in Britain, is a necessity. If one doesn't exist, it has to be invented. And hence, it is, that the textile manufacturers of the north country have discharged the function of the parliament of Canada and have produced millions of bits of bunting which are sold and displayed as Canadian flags. Incidentally, all the other dominions—Australia, New Zealand, Newfoundland and South Africa have spared Lancashire this trouble.

That was at the coronation, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BENNETT: Whose statement is that?

Mr. BOTHWELL: That was written by Grant Dexter.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought so.

An hon. MEMBER: That damns it.

Mr. LENNARD: A native son, I suppose.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I hope so. I have no doubt he is. Is the hon. member saying that being a native son is something to be ashamed of?

Mr. YOUNG: Has the hon. member any objection to a native son?

Mr. LENNARD: Of that type—yes.

Mr. BOTHWELL: He writes as follows in connection with his journey to the continent and what he saw and heard there:

> At Amiens, in the cloistered stillness of the chapel of the cathedral, the Canadian flag question took on a different aspect. Britons, Australians, New Zealanders, Newfoundlanders,

South Africans and Canadians died in the great battle which was fought a few miles to the east of the city in those terrible days of 1918 when the last desperate onrush of German troops threatened to snatch victory from defeat. Southeast of the city, in the little village of Moreul, the name of Canada is written on the hearts of the villagers; they repeat the name Canada as they would the name of the patron saint. Just outside the village are the woods of Moreul which were held by the Canadian cavalry brigade. No country ever paid a higher price in the blood of its manhood for any bit of land than did Canada for these few acres of grass and trees. . . .

One of the leading citizens of the city happened to be in the cathedral when it was visited and volunteered to act as guide. The writer put to him a question which haunts the battlefields. "Do you regard it as a miracle that men from the ends of the earth—from Australia, Canada, the United States, New Zealand, South Africa and elsewhere came here and died in the defence of land that could not possibly have any importance to them?" . . . . . The guide replied, "Yes, a thousand times yes. These men were called of God in the defence of civilization and we were specially blessed that our lives and our homes were defended. Here in our cathedral we have tried to show our gratitude not only to God but to the men who died."

He led the way around the altar to where, on one side of the lady chapel were hung the flags of those countries whose soldiers had stood between Amiens and the invader. He went on to explain that there was no flag for Canada and the people of Amiens deeply regretted this was so. Canada, alone, was missing. But it was not their fault. They had tried to obtain the Canadian flag. They had taken the matter up with the government at Paris and had been told that there was no Canadian flag. It would not be right, he said, to hang a second British flag. He felt and his fellow townsmen felt that this would be unworthy of Canada and, in any case, would be meaningless—since one British flag was there already. If the writer could assure him that there had been any change in this situation, the city of Amiens would write to Paris immediately. Unfortunately no assurances could be given. It did not seem right that the Canadian boys, of all who fell in the battle of Amiens, should not be remembered in this ancient and holy place.

Reading that article by Grant Dexter, I came to the conclusion that if I had an opportunity of speaking on the flag question in the House of Commons at this session I would embrace that opportunity. For the three reasons I have given, I hope that the house will see its way clear to grant the prayer of the resolution and appoint a committee to consider a flag. I also have received many cuts of flags, some of which will provoke discussion to such an extent that I believe any committee appointed from this house will be able to work out a flag which will truly represent the new nation of the north American continent—Canada.

Mrs. MARTHA LOUISE BLACK (Yukon): As a life member of the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire, I feel that I would not be doing my duty if I did not say just a few words on this question.

We are talking of the flag, the union jack, and of foreigners who come to this country. When they came here they came under the protection of the union jack, knowing what the union jack stands for on land and sea in Australia, in New Zealand, in India, in Canada itself. Surely they did not come thinking they were going to live under the protection of a newly made flag. Let those of us who perhaps think the union jack does not mean so much, who may be forgetting what the union jack typifies, what it means, what it holds, reflect that we have the tricolour of France in the red, white and blue; white, for purity of purpose; blue, for tenacity; and red, for steadfastness in time of trouble; the cross of St. Andrew, for the Scots; the cross of St. Patrick, for the Irish; and the cross of St. George, for the English. I ask all hon. members to stop and think before they tamper with the union jack, which has meant so much for ages past.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): I want to compliment sincerely and highly the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) upon the attitude and energy he has shown over a good many years in bringing this resolution forward for discussion on the floor of the House of Commons. At first, it is certain, it was a thankless task; but there is no doubt in my mind that the fine ideals he has propounded and the wonderful publicity they have received throughout the length and breadth of this country, through this discussion on the floor of the House of Commons, have brought about a condition of public opinion wherein I am convinced that a majority of the Canadian people would like to have a distinctive Canadian flag, which, from their viewpoint, would consolidate their bonds with the other parts of the British commonwealth.

(Translation). Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) my most sincere congratulations on this, the thirty-fourth anniversary of his parliamentary activities in this house. May he be spared for many more happy years to his own family, as well as to the large Canadian community, who look to him with such confidence in the federal field.

(Text). I wish to say a few words to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) for whom I have the greatest respect. For the life of me I do not know why this afternoon he took occasion to cast reflection on the whole House of Commons. It has always been a revelation, to me at any rate, to see the parliamentary system we have in Canada, a system that has been inherited from the mother of parliaments, Great Britain; and one interesting aspect of that system is the provision for private members' day. Apart from the activities of the government, and altogether irrespective of the party in power, it is always possible for members of the House of Commons to bring forward any questions in which their constituents and the country are interested and submit them for the consideration of the house. Private members' day is, in my opinion, one of the best safety valves that any democracy could have.

I can assure the hon. member for Davenport that we have not been wasting time in the discussion we have had during the past two weeks in the debate on the address. The hon. member, I suggest, should be the last man to have the audacity to say that during those two weeks we have been wasting the time of the house in discussing the speech from the throne. Of course, it was a foregone conclusion, not only because of the government majority in the house, but also because of the excellence of the legislation forecast in the speech from the throne, that the address would be carried. I did not participate in the debate on the address, but I found it instructive and illuminating. Why? Because, in this wonderful national forum, I could hear the representatives from every part of this far-flung dominion, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, express the views of their electors. Surely the hon. member would not say that those were lost days. The motion could have been voted down in one or two days, but this is an open forum where members can bring forward and discuss any questions they are interested in. There are many other resolutions, besides this one with respect to a distinctive national flag, that will be brought forward on private members' days, and one is glad to think that private members will have an opportunity to present their motions. The provision is a very wise provision, because it gives leeway to private members to present to the nation at large through the House of Commons the views of their particular constituencies, and allows the movers to present their particular viewpoint.

The hon. gentleman said that Newfoundland had no flag. I wish to correct him; Newfoundland has a distinctive flag. There is a union jack on it, and I agree with the statement that there is not a member of this house who would like to see the union jack disappear entirely from the Canadian flag that we shall have eventually. On the flag of Newfoundland is the escutcheon of that dominion, with the words Terra Nova and other Latin expressions. The hon. member for Davenport was not correctly informed when he said that Newfoundland had no flag.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not recall having said that Newfoundland had not a flag of its own. I did say that the land flag of Newfoundland is the union jack; their merchant marine flag is a red ensign with a coat of arms on it, and the government marine flag is a blue flag with a coat of arms on it.

Mr. BRADETTE: Canada has attained national status; but it has been well said that, unlike Great Britain, our history does not go back into the many centuries of the past; and while the union jack evokes the loyalty of all Canadians it is not a distinctively Canadian flag. So far as I am personally concerned, the tricolour suggests only the flag of France, and if I had any say about the matter I would rather have the flag that was flown under the old royalty. But it does not satisfy us, because they are not and cannot be our flags, these two flags of France.

I do not deplore the fact, as some people seem to do, that our neighbour is the great republic to the south of us. Many hon. members take occasion every now and then to cast slurs on the United States, but in my opinion we need have no regrets at being so close to that country. I do not take a back seat to anyone when it comes to loyalty to British institutions and to the British flag. I have studied the history of Britain and I believe I speak for all French Canadians when I say that they are absolutely loyal to British institutions and their ideals. But at the same time we belong to the British Commonwealth of Nations and Great Britain is absolutely satisfied to recognize our complete status as a nation. In other words, we must realize that the more intensely Canadian we are, the more British we are likely to be.

We have only to read what Lord Darling said when he visited Canada the last time—that the strength of the British Empire lies in the strict independence of its component parts and in its apparent weakness. We are not bound to Great Britain by any bonds of iron and blood. It is one of the striking revelations of modern history that, whereas twenty-one years ago the other nations of the world could not understand how it was possible for the British Empire to hold together without armies of occupation, the common loyalty of the people throughout the empire to the same ideals has been evidenced time and again in recent years. It was not any bonds of iron and blood that held us to the mother country during the war but purely and simply our common sympathy and the love we have for those "tight little islands" across the sea and what they represent. I myself, as a representative of the minority in Canada, rejoice in our freedom in both creed and language. This is the true spirit that helped to build that wonderful empire; it is the spirit that should animate all parliaments within the empire. Great Britain would be the first to welcome on the part of the Canadian people a distinctive flag of their own.

In August, 1928, during the Olympic games in Holland the governors were surprised, when young Percy Williams covered Canada with glory, winning the 100 metre race, to discover that Canada had no distinctive flag. Surely that is an anomaly.

We hear a good deal that is derogatory of the United States, but it would do many "little" Canadians good to visit that country more. It would not take them long after crossing the border to appreciate how intensely national the people there are, whether they are of German or Polish or any other extraction. They are all Americans, no matter whether their ancestors came from Germany, Ireland, England, or anywhere else. Unhappily, we in Canada do not cultivate that spirit sufficiently. The question has been asked, Who brought the immigrants into the section of the country I come from? Well, it was the old parties, Liberals and Conservatives, that brought them in. We must all share the responsibility in this matter. We are trying to make good Canadians of them, and they will be good Canadians if we give them the opportunity. In my section we have people from all parts of Europe, and they are intensely nationalistic. They have the greatest respect for their own flags, and when they come here they are surprised to find that there is not a distinctive Canadian flag; they cannot understand it. On many occasions I have seen some of these people parading with their own national flags. I asked one man why they did this, and in reply he wanted to know what our Canadian flag was, and said how gladly and quickly he would make it his own.

The hon. member for Davenport says that the legionnaires are opposed to a Canadian flag. I can assure him that there are thousands of fine legionnaires in my riding, and I know that the great majority of them are in favour of such a flag for the good reason that they are both Canadians and good Britishers.

I also have Sons of England in my constituency, and I have spoken of this problem to them. I have asked their opinion in regard to a Canadian flag, and almost always they gave me the same answer, that it was absolutely possible and feasible to be good Britishers and still have a distinctive flag for Canada. I am making these statements at this time, Mr. Speaker, because I do not want any innuendoes against the reputation of the Sons of England or any other section of our Canadian population, as all sections are naturally open-minded and broad-minded.

I do not desire to deal further with this subject to-night, Mr. Speaker; but I should like to express the fervent wish that it might be found possible at this session to send this resolution to a special committee, where it might be discussed on its merits, even though no legislation in regard to the matter were introduced this year. Finally may I express the sincere hope that eventually Canada, one of the jewels and the senior member of the British Commonwealth of Nations, will have a distinctive flag which will be absolutely Canadian.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few remarks to contribute to this enlightening and instructive discussion of a matter which has been brought up in parliament to-day for the first time since I came here in 1936. I want to congratulate the mover (Mr. McIntosh) of the resolution. His presentation of his arguments showed careful preparation and an undeniable conviction behind his sentiments. But, unfortunately, I must say that I was unable to agree entirely with the arguments advanced by the hon. gentleman. I want also to congratulate the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) on his contribution to this debate. I am sure most hon. gentlemen will feel much better after listening to the hon. member for Davenport describe exactly where the various parts composing our flag came from. I think he went back just about as far as any human being could go; I was afraid he would not stop until he had the pillars of King Solomon's temple embedded somewhere in the flag.

What I have to say in regard to this resolution is said entirely in a spirit of toleration and with all good will towards the various nationalities throughout our country who are not of the same racial extraction as myself. I make no apology, however, for belonging to a family which originally came from northern Ireland. At the same time I desire to make my remarks this evening in a spirit of great tolerance, because after all that is one of the things most essential in Canada as far as our national unity and national progress are concerned. During my remarks on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I made the statement—and I still stick to it—that in this country there is just a little too much talk about national unity and such things and perhaps not quite enough action and work towards that end. I am not so sure that a question so controversial as that raised by this resolution is a proper question to be brought up at this stage of our national development. I am not dogmatic in connection with this matter; I do not profess to have all the solutions for this problem which has been brought before the house, but I do say that we must exercise the greatest care and caution at this time because this is a critical stage in our national life. A controversial issue of this kind—and I think I make this statement in all fairness—which does not affect the very livelihood of the people, their food and shelter, is something which I do not think should be interjected into the proceedings of the house at this time. It is a matter which I think could very well be left over until another time without in any way dealing with the question on its merits, as to whether there should be a change or whether the same old flag should continue to fly over Canada.

I want to give credit to the nobility of impulse and the sincerity of purpose not only of the mover of the resolution and those who have supported it but also of those great bodies of public opinion which no doubt are urging that there should be a change in the flag of our country at this time. I have no intention of casting any aspersions upon those holding such ideas. They may be just as worthy as mine; but I submit, most respectfully, that we should not accept that argument at this time. We must deal with these questions with broad common sense and vision. I have no intention of wrapping myself in the union jack in discussing this matter, nor have I any intention of arousing any latent sentiments which might not do justice either to the resolution or to myself. There are, however, in Canada two very well defined, strong viewpoints held by perfectly sincere and honest people, which viewpoints are diametrically opposed in regard to this question of our flag. While those views are held so strongly, and since this controversy is of such a disputatious nature, I would submit most respectfully that it would be a move in the best interests of Canada if the resolution were withdrawn and not brought up for discussion at this time.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, there is another cogent reason why the resolution should not be sent on to a special committee. There are many, many questions facing the parliament of Canada to-day. There are many matters of transcendent importance to the people of our land, and I notice that in 1933 the mover of this resolution, the hon. member for North Battleford, had something to say with regard to the withdrawal of his resolution at that time, very similar to what I am going to suggest to-night. I shall not attempt to read all that the hon. member said at that time, but at page 1837 of Hansard of 1932-33 the hon. gentleman said:

> . . . I am going to ask that the house postpone its consideration of this resolution. The fact that many Canadians are without food, clothing and shelter causes me to withhold this resolution until some future occasion when it may be discussed under more auspicious conditions, thus helping rather than perhaps hurting a cause so near and dear to all Canadians strong in their national and empire zeal and faith. When this time rolls around I hope parliament will come to a flag conclusion that will redound to the welfare of this country.

To-night I take a similar view as to the propriety of this discussion. I believe to-day, as at no other time in my brief existence, the people of Canada are looking with eager and very critical eyes, on every move that is made in this parliament, because of the economic stringency through which many have passed and through which hundreds of thousands are still passing. While these matters remain for our consideration and these problems await solution, shall we as a house make ourselves ridiculous by attempting to discuss something which is not putting first things first?

In the resolution the mover, in all fairness and sincerity of purpose, whether deliberately or otherwise has put the cart before the horse. I say the resolution is not fair to those who are urging a change in the flag at this time. I believe the present situation is comparable with one where a city salesman, well dressed and riding in a shiny car, stops at a farmer's gate and, in order to sell the farmer a certain book, enters into conversation with him. The name of the book is Farming, And How To Make It Pay. At this particular time the farmer is trying to get the last two loads of hay out of the field before the rain clouds open. Without any reflection upon the book or the salesman, it is evident that a most inopportune time was chosen to make the sale, and the salesman was not likely to receive a warm welcome.

A comparable situation exists with respect to the resolution before us. I would implore the hon. member for North Battleford not to bring the matter before a special committee, because I believe the time is inopportune.

Whatever may be the merits or demerits of the resolution—and there is scarcely a resolution in which good and bad could not be found—I believe this is not the proper time for discussion.

Although I do not intend to enter into detail, I should like to point out, by way of caution and warning, that it is going to take all the tolerance, all the care and all the patriotism at the command of the Canadian people or a committee of parliament to evolve a flag which would meet with such widespread approval as the flag we now have. I leave that as a word of caution, because after all we have to be most careful in making changes of this kind. When it is a matter of bettering the conditions of our people I am certainly in favour of change, but may I close by saying simply that we can work towards bettering those conditions under the old flag. Let us leave the old flag as it is, without changing to a new one at this time.

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) upon the able manner in which he presented the resolution to the house. I wish I had the powers of oratory displayed by hon. members who have spoken. At least in some respects I agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat, and if by refraining from speaking on the question it were possible to relieve the distress of the many thousands in Canada who need help, I would take my seat at once. However, that would not follow.

I noticed, as the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) said, that for the past two weeks we discussed an amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, well knowing that the address would be adopted. Despite our knowledge of that fact, ten days of the time of the house were taken up in a discussion of the amendment.

It seems to me that Canada has assumed the responsibilities of a nation, and she has the right to make decisions regarding her participation in world affairs. That right is vested in Canada's parliament, without regard to the decisions of the mother country. I was born in Canada. My father and mother were born in Canada. My grandfathers and grandmothers, great grandfathers and great grandmothers all came from Ireland. I am proud not only of the fact that I was born in Canada but, too, of my Irish ancestry. The Irish have always contended that it was their right and privilege to fight within the empire. But when the empire is attacked from without, that is another matter entirely. I have no fear for the loyalty of Canadian people.

[Mr. Graydon.]

It would be quite impossible to decide upon a flag which would meet the approval of all the people. It is not so long ago that "O Canada" was not sung at the opening or closing of concerts. Eventually people found out that the singing of "O Canada" would not make them disloyal to the empire, but that on the contrary it was an indication that they were more loyal. Then we entered into a controversy as to what version of "O Canada" would be sung. Even to-day all people are not united on that point. Eventually we shall all sing one version, but in the meantime the empire will not be disrupted nor will Canada be charged with disloyalty.

I cannot see why Canadians could be considered less loyal or less British if they were to have a distinctive Canadian flag. Last summer we were visited by the South African Lawn Bowling Club, and the members who came to Canada were amazed to find out that we have not a flag. Many designs have been suggested, and of course I have personal preferences. I should like to see the union jack and the maple leaf embodied in the new Canadian flag.

However I am more interested in the principle. The principle involved is that Canada should have a distinctive Canadian flag, and I think that this session of parliament should not dissolve without recognizing that principle. For these reasons I have much pleasure in supporting the resolution.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, mention has been made during this debate of the fact that the resolution we are now considering has been brought forward in previous sessions, and that much of what has been said has been a repetition of previous discussions. In my opinion that is all to the good and, in view of the subject under consideration, most fortunate.

Wherever there is a suggestion of change or a suggestion of departure from custom, numbers of people find such a course unpleasant even to contemplate. It is only by degrees that many of us find it possible to free ourselves from that to which we have grown accustomed. The arguments which have been urged against having a distinctive Canadian flag have to a great extent been arguments associated with profound sentiment and tradition. While these considerations are admirable in themselves, they are not necessarily decisive. Especially in times of change, we must look not only to the past but also to the future.

I consider it fortunate that the resolution has come before the house as a private member's motion. As has been said by one hon.

member, when the subject is presented in this way hon. members generally have a sense of greater freedom of discussion. It removes the possible feeling of restraint which a government measure might occasion and permits much more in the way of a free and frank expression of view than would otherwise be the case. I agree with the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) when he says that this debate has been characterized by an expression of views which will be distinctly helpful in the forming of public opinion on this all important question.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) for having brought forward his resolution thus early in the session, and particularly upon the admirable manner in which he has presented the arguments pro and con. I shall not attempt in any way to review the discussions which took place on similar resolutions in previous years as those debates have been admirably covered by the hon. member for North Battleford. I would like, however, to call attention to the wording of the resolution. I was surprised to hear some hon. members express the opinion that the adoption of this resolution meant an immediate decision upon a design for a distinctive national flag. The question of design is entirely apart from anything that appears in the resolution. The resolution simply calls for a declaration as to the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag. If a committee is appointed and reports favourably upon the adoption of a distinctive national flag, and the committee's report is adopted, the question of design would then come up at a later time. The resolution reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, a special select committee be appointed for the purpose of considering the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag, representing Canada as a whole, thereby symbolizing the dominion as an equality partner in the commonwealth of British nations.

The important words are "the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag." I cannot see why any hon. member of the house should be at all fearful about leaving to a committee of this house the consideration of the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag. The committee would be called upon to consider the expediency of making a declaration of that kind at this particular time. Undoubtedly it would take into account the fact that there may be considerable difficulty in getting agreement as to what design should ultimately be adopted for a distinctive Canadian flag. The possibility of such disagreement might conceivably be regarded as being so important that it might seem to the committee inadvisable to recommend the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag. Personally I do not think that such would be the case. All that the house is being asked to do at the present time is to permit a committee of its members to view the situation from as many angles as possible and to report back as to whether or not they feel the time has come when Canada should adopt a distinctive national flag.

The historic facts in reference to Canada's flag are really most pertinent in a consideration of this matter. They afford strong reasons, it seems to me, why we should feel that the time has come when Canada should have a distinctive national flag. There are also practical reasons of necessity which make this desirable.

Let me briefly outline a few of the facts. I shall seek to set them forth in as concise language as I can. Following the conquest, British immigrants to Canada brought with them the British flag and it was everywhere recognized as the emblem of the colonies as of the mother country. After 1801, the union flag, more commonly known as the union jack, became the flag of the empire. This situation remained unaltered until after confederation.

Some hon. members on the other side of the house have been speaking as though the union jack had always been the flag of Britain. A great deal of what they themselves quoted went to show that only in comparatively recent times has the union jack been the flag of Britain. Only in 1801 did the union flag, commonly known as the union jack, become the flag of different parts of the empire.

After the formation of the Dominion of Canada the desirability of having a distinctive flag for use on Canadian government vessels became apparent and by order in council of February 28, 1870, the blue ensign, defaced by the Canadian coat of arms, was adopted for this purpose. This was confirmed in the King's Regulations and Admiralty Instructions, Article 123. In other words, a distinctive Canadian flag was found to be necessary with regard to government vessels and an order was passed as many years ago as 1870 to require that the blue ensign, defaced by the Canadian coat of arms, should be adopted for this purpose.

As long ago as 1870 we came to have a third flag, a recognition also of the necessity of having a distinctive flag. There were government vessels, but there was also a merchant marine. With the expansion of the merchant marine the lack of a Canadian flag caused frequent difficulties and after some discussion the Lord's Commissioners of the Admiralty were prevailed upon to issue a warrant, dated February 2, 1892, authorizing vessels registered in Canada "to wear the red ensign of Her Majesty's fleet with the Canadian coat of arms on the fly thereof."

This practice was confirmed in 1934 in the Canada Shipping Act, 24-25 George V, 1934, chapter 44, section 89. For some years after 1892, this flag was also in practice used on land as the Canadian flag and is indeed still employed in that way by many private citizens. After protests had been made, its use on government buildings in Ottawa was discontinued in 1904 and the union jack was hoisted in its place. Until 1904 we were flying the red ensign on most of the public buildings of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: With the arms of Canada on the fly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is right. In that year the practice was adopted of flying the union jack.

How was it that the union jack came to be called the official flag of Canada? It is interesting to note that apparently the union jack was never declared officially to be the flag of Canada until 1911. On April 12 of that year Colonial Secretary Harcourt addressed an official dispatch to the Governor General of Canada declaring that the union jack should be flown on land as the Canadian flag.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason it is on this building.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the reason it is on this building. In the days when that office was still in existence, the colonial secretary indicated to the governor general of this country the flag that was to be used. But the office of colonial secretary has ceased to exist in so far as it is applicable to Canada. There remains of course a colonial secretary, but he no longer has to do with the affairs of the self-governing parts of the empire. For this purpose a new office has been created, that of secretary of state for the dominions. I would respectfully point out that there is a vast significance in this change of office, a significance which has its application to the question under discussion at the moment. The question is whether or not Canada, as a self-governing dominion with equality of status with Great Britain and the other self-governing dominions, should not have, as they have, a distinctive flag, instead of having a flag which is the flag of the colonies of Great Britain and of none of the dominions save our own.

In 1911, under a memorandum of agreement between the British Admiralty and the Canadian government, ships of the Royal Canadian Navy were instructed and authorized to fly the white ensign at the stern and the blue ensign, with the coat of arms of Canada on the fly, at the jack staff. This was confirmed by Canadian government order in council of December 16, 1911.

Difficulties having arisen in Canadian government offices abroad, due to the lack of a distinctive Canadian flag, an order in council dated January 26, 1924, was passed, authorizing the flying of the red ensign, with the Canadian coat of arms on the fly, "from all buildings owned or occupied by the Canadian government and situated without Canada."

So we have to-day the curious anomaly that the flag, which we fly in Canada as the official flag, is flying by virtue of some direction which came from the colonial secretary in Great Britain, whereas the flag, which Canada flies as her own flag on buildings outside Canada, is a different flag and is flown by virtue of an order in council which was passed by the government of Canada itself. If there were no other reason, I think that fact of itself makes it apparent that the time has come when a distinctive national flag, if one can be agreed upon, is in every way desirable so far as Canada is concerned.

Now what about the emblem itself that appears on the flag? The Canadian coat of arms used on the various flags consisted until March 31, 1924, of a shield upon which were quartered the arms of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. On that date, as late as 1924, the new Canadian coat of arms which had been assigned to the dominion by royal proclamation on November 21, 1921, was authorized for use on the flags. Thus, the Canadian flag itself, so-called, when it is officially used in this way, is one that has undergone considerable change in recent years.

Hon. members who were in this house some sessions ago may recall that in 1925 the government announced the appointment of a committee of civil servants to consider the question of a distinctive Canadian flag. That committee had been set up by one of the government departments, the Department of National Defence. The fact that such a committee was set up at all may serve to illustrate one of the practical needs of a distinctive national flag so far as Canada is concerned. I have drawn attention to the fact that the British Admiralty found the necessity of having a distinctive Canadian flag so far as Canada's merchant marine was concerned. As flying developed in this country, the members of the air forces felt that it was desirable, in connection with the manoeuvres in which they would have to engage, that there should be some distinctive Canadian flag associated with their service. As hon. members know, there are, on occasions, manoeuvres when the forces are interchangeable as between different parts of the empire, for purposes of training, exhibition and the like. To distinguish the forces of one part of the empire from those of another in these manoeuvres it became obviously desirable that there should be a distinctive flag.

It so happened that the departmental committee which I mentioned a moment ago had a complexion which was not wholly congenial to all parts of the house and the country. It was a mere accident that it so happened that all of its members were found to be of one religious persuasion. Immediately a section of the press of our country interpreted that circumstance as evidence in itself of some evil design. It was therefore thought advisable that the committee should be discontinued, as it was shortly after its formation. But the purpose of the committee was a thoroughly practical, a thoroughly good and a thoroughly necessary one, namely, to see if it were not possible to work out some distinctive flag that could help meet the needs of the forces of the Canadian Department of National Defence. The fact that some years ago it was thought desirable, from the point of view I have indicated, to have the question of a distinctive Canadian flag considered by a committee of civil servants, seems to me to make it desirable that parliament should not delay longer in seriously considering the question, and at least taking the first necessary step to ascertain whether agreement can be reached as to the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag. I believe the fact that the committee made the venture it did, in the circumstances it did, has operated to postpone further consideration of the question in a way which otherwise would not have taken place. The suggestion that a committee of this house should consider the matter ought to make it possible for us to ensure the personnel of the committee being as representative as possible of all shades of opinion in this house. Such a course will enable the first step to be taken, certainly without any danger, and with a great deal to commend it.

There are many positive disadvantages and difficulties existent to-day in not having a distinctive Canadian flag. Certain of these have been mentioned in the course of the debate to-day. Perhaps I may briefly summarize the outstanding ones.

First of all there is the necessity of a Canadian flag for use on Canadian official buildings abroad. I ask hon. members, if Canada is to have legations, and I assume that we shall expand our legations rather than contract them, if we are to have commercial offices in different parts of the world, is it not also desirable for us to have a distinctive flag of our own to fly over them? As it is, we have for the purpose only a make-shift flag to-day. We are not using abroad our national flag, the flag that is the national flag at home, the union jack. At the present time the Canadian marine flag is flown over official Canadian premises abroad.

We are thus faced with the anomalous situation of the Canadian government using one flag in foreign countries and another flag at home. This is an absurdity to be found in the practice of no other country.

On the other hand, would any hon. member suggest that we should have flying from the Canadian legation in Washington, for example, the same flag that flies from the British embassy in Washington? Take the position in Tokyo. Are we to have the same flag flying from our legation there as flies from the British embassy? The same thing applies in Paris. London itself makes the need even more self-evident. Are we to have flying from the Canadian building in London, in the heart of the city, simply the union jack, while across Trafalgar Square you see the flag of South Africa, and a little further along Northumberland street the distinctive flags of Australia and New Zealand? And where there are other government offices representative of other parts of the empire, you see their distinctive flags flying from their buildings. The very fact that we are confronted now with that situation seems to me to make it imperative that we should not longer delay consideration of the advisability of having a distinctive Canadian flag.

Mention has been made of our war memorials in France, in Belgium, in Great Birtain and elsewhere. The hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) read this evening some dispatches which bear out notes I had made to the effect that correspondents have frequently pointed out that in cathedrals in Europe, where the flags of the allied powers have been enshrined in memory of the men who fell in the Great war, no Canadian flag is to be found, although the name of Canada is included in the inscription which accompanies the flags. So long as the union jack is the only official Canadian flag available for such use, the dominion will continue to be unrepresented, because the union jack will already have been used to represent the United Kingdom.

Then there is the matter of the necessity of a distinctive flag for use at international conferences. At all such meetings, when the United Kingdom is represented, the union jack will be used by the delegates from London. Even when the United Kingdom is not represented, the union jack is indelibly associated with that country in the minds of foreign observers, and its use will not gain for Canada the distinctive recognition which a national flag is supposed to evoke. When both London and Ottawa are represented at such international gatherings, the use of the union jack by the Canadian delegates will tend to identify them as part of the United Kingdom delegation. Such use might well be resented by the representatives of the United Kingdom. We had this extraordinary anomaly at the time of the coronation and of the recent imperial conference, that when my colleagues and myself arrived in London we were met at the station by representatives of the British government who told us that they had placed automobiles at our disposal for the time of the coronation and the conference, as was done in Ottawa by the government of the day for the delegates who came here on the occasion of the conference of 1932. Over the radiator of each of these automobiles was a Canadian red ensign. We were told that that flag had been put there so as to distinguish our cars from those of the other self-governing dominions and from the cars used by members of the British government. All the time we were in London we were, by the act of the British government itself, expected, wherever we went, if we were travelling by motor to travel in a car which carried, not the flag which on the authority of the British government is the flag of Canada within the dominion, but the flag which is flown outside the dominion and flown, not as is the case with the union jack in Canada itself, but under an order in council of our own government making a different provision. That of itself, as I have already remarked, is a most curious anomaly. It shows the necessity—the necessity from the point of view of the British government as well as our own—of Canada having a distinctive flag. I cannot see wherein there is any sacrifice of sentiment or loyalty in the desire on the part of its citizens that one's country should be known in other parts of the empire or in other countries of the world.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

There may have been a time when we were a colony, under the old colonial status, when we would perhaps have wished to use a flag that was symbolical, not only of the mother country, but of all the colonies as well. Having, however, reached the status of full nationhood, it becomes essential, if we are to be distinguished from other nations of the commonwealth, not to mention colonial possessions, that we have a distinctive flag of our own.

Reference has also been made this evening to the need for a distinctive flag at international athletic meets. At the olympic games and the empire games, Canada in practice is now represented by the marine flag and not by the national flag. There is nothing to justify such abnormal practice except necessity. No other dominion and no other country would think of being so represented. At the Antwerp olympic games in 1928 the confusion over the Canadian flag caused a great deal of trouble and no little annoyance.

I have already referred to the need of a distinctive flag by the Canadian defence services at home and abroad. When details of the Canadian military forces appear at home or abroad they carry the union jack as their national flag. This means that by many they are identified with or mistaken for imperial British forces, unless the observer is close enough to see the maple leaves on the uniforms, whereas the defence services of other dominions are all readily recognizable where they appear, as at the recent coronation services and other great occasions.

The red ensign with the Canadian coat of arms is used at sea. Surely it is absurd to argue that a distinctive flag for use on land is a sign of disloyalty when a distinctive flag is already in use on the sea.

I would conclude this part of what I have to say with the observation that the continued use of the union jack gives a false impression abroad, and particularly in the country immediately adjoining. The use of the union jack on anything that is distinctively Canadian in the United States does not help to emphasize the individuality of this country or its distinct nationality; it helps to submerge them altogether.

I do submit that, viewing the matter historically, viewing the matter sentimentally, or in any other way, the argument all lies in favour of recognizing that the time has come when we should very seriously consider the adoption of a Canadian national flag. I would point out that as our constitutional development has undergone considerable change, it is only appropriate that there should be in connection with that statutory change the change in other particulars which may be necessary to make distinctive in the eyes of the world the different dominions which now have the equality of status of which we speak so frequently.

There is no doubt that the great war more than anything else was responsible for developing a strong national sentiment. I believe that those who served overseas for the most part came back more zealous than any other proportionate element in our country to have a distinctive flag which would designate their own forces and help to let Canada stand henceforth in the place in which she has the right to stand.

Coming to developments which followed the great war, developments on constitutional lines, we had first, as the most prominent of the declarations, relative to our position as a nation, the report of the imperial conference of 1926, which made quite clear the position which Canada along with the other dominions had attained. This report has been referred to frequently in previous sessions of other parliaments, but there are in the present house many hon. members who were not here in the last parliament, and it might be of interest to them, in this particular connection to hear words that appear in the prefatory part of this report of the inter-imperial relations committee, which was a committee of the imperial conference of 1926. Perhaps I should preface the reading of what I wish to quote, by saying that the chairman of that committee was the late Lord Balfour, as great an imperialist, possibly, as the British Empire had, but a great political philosopher as well, and one who was capable not only of viewing the past but also of glimpsing something of the developments of the future. The wording of this report seems to me to disclose the wisdom of this country speedily making a decision with respect to a flag which will be distinctive in its nature. The report reads:

> The committee are of opinion that nothing would be gained by attempting to lay down a constitution for the British Empire. Its widely scattered parts have very different characteristics, very different histories, and are at very different stages of evolution; . . .

That is a point to which I wish to call attention particularly. The colonies are still at the colonial stage, they are still using the union jack which is the flag of the mother country; but the self-governing dominions, with the single exception of Canada, have all distinctive flags of their own. The report goes on, referring to the empire:

> —while, considered as a whole, it defies classification and bears no real resemblance to any other political organization which now exists or has ever yet been tried.
>
> There is, however, one most important element in it which, from a strictly constitutional point of view, has now, as regards all vital matters, reached its full development—we refer to the group of self-governing communities composed of Great Britain and the dominions. Their position and mutual relation may be readily defined. They are autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the Crown, and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations.
>
> A foreigner endeavouring to understand the true character of the British Empire by the aid of this formula alone would be tempted to think that it was devised rather to make mutual interference impossible than to make mutual cooperation easy.
>
> Such a criticism, however, completely ignores the historic situation. The rapid evolution of the overseas dominions during the last fifty years has involved many complicated adjustments of old political machinery to changing conditions. The tendency towards equality of status was both right and inevitable. Geographical and other conditions made this impossible of attainment by the way of federation. The only alternative was by the way of autonomy; and along this road it has been steadily sought. Every self-governing member of the empire is now the master of its destiny.

I submit that, if these words had been used by a Canadian member of parliament a few years before this particular document was written, whoever had used this language would by not a few have been written down immediately as a separatist, as disloyal to the empire, and as wishing to make Canada a country apart from it altogether. The thought that we were masters of our own destiny seemed to be abhorrent to the minds of many of our people, who contended that the destiny of Canada could and should be determined only by what might be agreed upon overseas. That day fortunately has long since passed. Canada has come to feel that it is a national entity and that it is entitled to have its national individuality and characteristics known and respected and honoured as they should be in the eyes of the other nations of the empire and of the other countries of the world.

In considering the development which has taken place in the status of this dominion, we are not only justified at this time but are obligated to think very seriously of every aspect of nationhood and of what is essential to the assertion of it. Far from being a cause for separation, or a thought of separation, we should feel, and I believe we do strongly feel, that our national freedom, the free expression of our national characteristics and aims and purposes, is of all ties the one that holds us the most closely within that circle of communities which form the British Commonwealth of Nations.

What is embodied in this resolution of the imperial conference of 1926 later found expression in the Statute of Westminster. The Statute of Westminster sets forth very definitely certain alterations made in order to remove anachronisms which in one way or another were unsuited to the new relationship of empire as they have developed. There is a more recent development, which lends a new emphasis to the subject we are discussing to-day. I refer to the wording of the oath administered at the coronation of King George VI and sworn to by his majesty himself. On that occasion, for the first time, His Majesty the King undertook, with respect to the relations of the crown to the dominions, to govern each of them according to its own laws and customs, and the coronation oath specifically enumerates the different dominions. I made a reference to this when speaking on the address. May I read to the house anew the oath which was administered to His Majesty King George VI, the obligations of which he promised solemnly to fulfil:

> Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the peoples of Great Britain, Ireland, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa, of your possessions and the other territories to any of them belonging or pertaining, and of your Empire of India, according to their respective laws and customs?

Thus His Majesty the King declared that he would govern Canada according to her particular laws and customs, exactly in the same manner as he would govern Great Britain according to her own laws and customs. Why should not custom of all self-governing dominions be the flying of a distinctive flag that helps to identify one from the other?

Please note that all of the other self-governing dominions already have their distinctive flags. We are not now debating the question whether or not there should be one flag for the whole empire. That question has already been settled by the facts of the case. I believe it was the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) who said that he would like to see one flag for the whole empire. Perhaps a good many would. But that is not the point at issue; it does not come up at this time and is not likely to come up for the reason that already Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, the Irish Free State and India has each a distinctive flag of its own. The Dominion of Canada is the one exception. The point we have to consider is whether or not we should longer remain the one exception, the one self-governing part of the whole British Empire that has not thought it advisable to adopt a national flag. That is the question, and it seems to me that in the light of the past and having regard to the future the question admits of only one answer, which is that the time has come when we should adopt a distinctive national flag.

The perspective of years makes it essential that we should consider at this time the very important question that is now before us, Canada is a growing country. She is going to increase in world influence as well as in numbers and in wealth. She will need more and more her own national emblem.. Moreover, we can consider this question now more opportunely, I believe, than at any other time. I suggest that it is important always to bear in mind that there are times and seasons for all things. There have been times in the past when to bring forward a resolution such as the one now before us would have been to create misunderstanding as to motive, a misunderstanding in other parts of the world as to the significance of the motion itself. I might go so far as to say that had Canada been the first to take such a step, her action might have been misunderstood in other parts of the empire and of the world. If Australia had not already adopted a national flag; if New Zealand had not already adopted one; if South Africa and the south of Ireland had not already adopted their own distinctive flags, then there might be some reason for hon. members to say, "Let us be careful lest we set a precedent which will be followed in other parts of the empire and lead perchance to the dismemberment of the British Commonwealth of Nations." But the fact is that as a result in part of each having its own distinctive flag the other members of the commonwealth have come to have a new pride, not only in their respective countries but in that free association which they together enjoy in the British Empire. In these circumstances, the question for us to decide is whether so far as this matter is concerned we shall remain in our present state of isolation, or, like them, adopt for ourselves a flag which shall be the emblem of our distinct personality as a people.

Let me conclude with these words. There has never been a time, I believe, when the relations between Canada and the mother country were so cordial, so completely friendly, helpful and cooperative in every way as they are at the present time. The present is the time, then, to consider this question. It will not be disposed of, in my opinion, until it is settled in Canada as it has been in the other dominions. If we do not settle it now, some issue may arise in the course of a few years which will provoke another discussion and lead to the settlement of the question in a manner that may be misunderstood elsewhere. To-day there is no possible danger of misunderstanding on the part of anyone in this country, in Britain, in Europe or elsewhere in the world, as to what Canada has in mind in seeking to have a distinctive national flag.

So, Mr. Speaker, I feel we are greatly indebted to the hon. member for North Battleford who has brought forward this resolution at this time. I hope the hon. members who have expressed quite sincerely their views in opposition to it will feel, once they understand that the motion does not go as far as they thought it did, namely the length of deciding at this time on the design of a national flag but only asks that a committee be appointed to consider whether the time is not opportune for adopting a distinctive flag, that they may support the resolution and allow it to be unanimously adopted.

Mr. R. L. BAKER (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of addressing the house on this question. I think the matter has been quite fully covered, but in case the resolution should be adopted I should like to offer a suggestion to the mover. I am not declaring my stand on the resolution itself; that is not necessary until the time comes, but I should like to know if the mover would be willing to add the words "with the union jack prominently included in the adopted design," so that the resolution would read:

—adopting a distinctive Canadian flag with the union jack prominently included in the adopted design—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The committee might include that if it wished.

Mr. BAKER: Then it would be obligatory on the committee to include the union jack in that design. If that could be done I think it would be a sound step, and I make the suggestion in the interests of safety.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to speak at any length on this matter. This question has engaged the attention of the house on many occasions. A resolution was introduced by Mr. Dickie, the then member for Nanaimo, in 1934 and again in 1935. The resolution introduced in 1935 read as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, a national flag representing the Dominion of Canada should be adopted; and that in any design for a Canadian flag the union jack must be conspicuous.

That motion was seconded by the hon. member who sits to my right, the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. White), and an amendment was moved by the then member for Parry Sound, the late Mr. Arthurs. The matter was not proceeded with and finally was dropped, because it was thought not desirable to press it in view of the urgency of other business. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made a very strong speech about a portion of that discussion and pointed out, as he has this evening, that a committee of civil servants was appointed on one occasion for the purpose of designing a national flag. The present hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) read into the record the order in council appointing those gentlemen. I observe that that order in council is set out fully in Hansard, and it provided:

The minister, therefore, recommends that a committee be appointed to consider and report on the most suitable design that should be adopted for a Canadian national flag for use ashore, and that this committee be composed of the following:

G. J. Desbarats, Esq., C.M.G., Deputy Minister of National Defence, Chairman.

Thomas Mulvey, Esq., B.A., K.C., Under-Secretary of State.

A. G. Doughty, Esq., C.M.G., LL.D., Dominion Archivist.

Commodore Walter Hose, C.B.E., A.D.C., Director of the Naval Service.

Major General H. A. Panet, C.B., C.M.G., D.S.O., Adjutant General.

Group Captain J. S. Scott, M.C., A.F.C., A.D.C., Acting Director of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

As was pointed out to-night, that committee did not arrive at any final conclusion. So the matter came into this house, on motion at one time of the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), with practically the same remarks as he made this afternoon, and the following year on motion of the former hon. member for Nanaimo, who introduced a similar resolution in 1935 On one occasion the present Prime Minister said that he would not favour a national flag which did not make adequate provision for the union jack, and this afternoon the mover of the resolution was insistent that he had no intention of dealing with the matter except on the basis of the union jack forming a conspicuous part of that flag.

The discussion that has taken place to-night, it seems to me, in part at least might well have been reserved for the committee. If a committee of the house is set up, it is for the purpose, as the resolution states, and I direct attention to the language——of considering the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag—

With all deference to my hon. friends who take a different view, I cannot see that the house should not set up a committee to consider the advisability of anything. I see no reason why it should not. Just why the House of Commons should not name a committee to consider the advisability of adopting a distinctive flag by the Canadian people I cannot see. I confess that I may be very wrong in the view I take, but surely the house can safely ask a committee to consider the advisability of a distinctive flag. It will be observed that the resolution does not go further than that; it states:

—for the purpose of considering the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag, representing Canada as a whole, thereby symbolizing the dominion as an equality partner in the British commonwealth of nations.

The last part is surplusage, as far as the resolution is concerned; I think that would be agreed at once. All that we are asked to do is to name a committee to consider the advisability of this action being taken, not to determine what the action shall be. I was surprised that the hon. member should have put forward his resolution in those terms, for Mr. Dickie's resolution was far, far wider than that. As will be remembered, Mr. Dickie's resolution provided for the flag itself. I referred to it a moment ago, and I might take time to read it again in order that there may be no misunderstanding. Mr. Dickie's resolution was as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, a national flag representing the Dominion of Canada should be adopted; and that in any design for a Canadian flag the union jack must be conspicuous.

That resolution did two things. First it said, "We must pass a resolution for the adoption of a Canadian flag," and, second, it said that in that flag the union jack should occupy a conspicuous place. That language was used, with respect to the latter part of that quotation, by the present Prime Minister himself, as well as by the hon. member for North Battleford. In view of what has been said I can see no reason why in the interests of harmony it might not be well for the hon. gentleman, with the consent of the house, to add those words to his resolution. Offences must need come, but woe unto him through whom they cometh. If by adopting the suggestion which has been made any difficulties would be overcome, I think it might be well that the suggestion should be acted upon.

Upon the large question, I expressed an opinion in the house some years ago that I believed it was desirable, as I do to-night, that the country should have some flag by which it could distinguish itself from other parts of the world. But that question is not one which should be debated in the house.

The resolution does not deal with that. It asks that a committee—not this chamber—consider the advisability. When the committee has made its report it will then be for the chamber to consider whether or not that report will be adopted. The history of the flag, its use on sea and land, have been considered here to-night. But I would like to say to the Prime Minister that if he will look into the matter he will find that a colonial secretary did not send a dispatch to the parliament of Canada, without correspondence having taken place. Sir Wilfrid Laurier at that time was contemplating going to the imperial conference, and one of the problems which confronted them had to do with our naval force.

The question was plainly put as to what flag should fly, for instance, on our parliamentary buildings, when we were in session. Although my memory is not sufficiently clear on the point at this time, I know it was not a bolt from the blue on the part of the colonial secretary as to what the flag should be. Colonial Secretary Harcourt did not do business in that way. What was done was in response to an inquiry, just as in the case of the table of precedence, and other questions, when requests are made of the colonial office. The colonial secretary transmitted his views to the governor general.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But it was the colonial secretary.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course. Nobody else could do it at that time. They ask the king; the king refers it to his government, and the colonial secretary is of course the person who makes the reply to—in those days—the governor general direct, and to no one else. That has all been changed, of course.

There was one observation made, not by the Prime Minister but by another hon. member, which should be corrected. The flag which floats on government house is the king's flag. It was settled by the king himself, and it is the flag which floats in every dominion and every union under the sovereignty of the king. It is called the king's flag because he settled the terms of it, and wherever his representative may be it is supposed to float, whether on this building, or on a building at St. John or at Halifax, or wherever it may be. In South Africa, for instance, on the one side it bears the words "The Union of South Africa" in English, and on the other side in Dutch. In this country it bears the single word "Canada," which is the same in English and in French, and there is no question of the use of different words.

That flag is a flag which was settled by the king, and is the flag which floats over the residence of the governor general, wherever he may be, whether in the capital city or somewhere else. But that has nothing to do with the question we are discussing to-night. It is a personal flag, given by the king to his governor general, and practically holds his power of attorney, indicating that he is the representative of the sovereign.

Mr. MARTIN: Is it not called the royal standard?

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is an entirely different matter. The royal standard is flown only by the sovereign himself. His representative does not fly it in the dominion. It was to obviate any discussion of that character that the king's flag was settled.

I do not propose to discuss the merits or demerits of claims which may be made before a committee, but I do propose to vote for the formation of a committee. It seems to me almost monstrous that the House of Commons should deny the right of a committee to consider the advisability of our taking any step in the world. Some years ago, for instance, the hon. member for Wellington North (Mr. Blair) introduced a resolution as to how criminals should be executed, and there was a reference to a committee to consider the advisability or otherwise of the action he suggested being taken.

To-night we deal with an entirely different matter, namely the question of a flag, and the advisability of the use of it. I can quite understand the conflict of sentiment in the minds of men surveying a matter of this kind. After all, however, it does seem that we should have some method by which to identify ourselves in the eyes of those who look upon our bunting as it floats in the wind.

I visited Australia and New Zealand some months ago, and it would be a brave man indeed who would say that New Zealand was lacking in loyalty to the British crown. Yet New Zealand has a distinctive flag which it has adopted for a definite purpose. Australia, too, has a distinctive flag, and I do not think the casual observer would state that there is less devotion and loyalty to the British crown in Australia than in Canada. In fact, I think it possible that the opposite view might be taken. Those countries found no difficulty in selecting their flags. In South Africa there was a real difficulty, and they might as well be frank to admit it. A committee was appointed, and out of the discussion in that committee there came some results. There was a good deal of acrimonious talk, but in the end there came two flags. A very large union jack is fastened on the wall of their parliament buildings, side by side with their own flag. As has been properly pointed out before, both flags fly over the official residences, and at points where justice is administered in the different parts of the union.

There were grave difficulties to be overcome. The blacks, numbering about six million, as against two million whites, were insistent that the union jack be preserved. They had their reasons. They remembered the early days of settlement when the Boers looked upon the black men as the children of Ham, and as servants to them as lords and masters. They strongly insisted that this flag be maintained. That is the reason I take it, among others, that it finds some place, although not a very prominent one, in the flag of South Africa.

Mr. Speaker, I would be needlessly taking up the time of the house if I were to discuss, as I almost had the inclination to do, many other matters arising from this one. But the resolution before us is one for the naming of a committee for the purpose of considering the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag. To that resolution I have no difficulty in giving my assent.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that in this parliament nothing is being done for the people of Canada, I am not surprised that this should be the first motion on private members' days. After the appointment of all these committees and commissions, the House of Commons almost becomes a house of caretakers, for we have no powers or prerogatives; our functions have been usurped by commissions.

The discussion on the flag is not new, nor is the suggestion of a distinctive flag for Canada. May I point out that in the last few days twenty-eight dead soldiers have been buried by the chaplain of Christie Street hospital, their bodies bound by the union jack. That flag was good enough for 600,000 soldiers who fought for you and me in France and Flanders, and it should be good enough for the civilians who stayed at home.

This is not the time to bring forward such a motion. To-day I received twenty-five letters from housewives in Toronto who are complaining about the high cost of food and of living, and instead of talking about a new flag for Canada we might reconstitute the mass buying and spreads committee to deal with it. Many people are carrying the black flag. In my riding the people are up in arms about the high cost of living. They want to know what is going to be done about butter at 38 cents a pound and other necessities. We should not be considering a distinctive Canadian flag; we should be considering the black flag that is facing so many of the working classes of this country.

This resolution talks about the dominion being "an equality partner in the commonwealth of British nations." Was Canada present to-day or represented at the opening of the great dock at Singapore? New Zealand, Australia, the United States and France were there, but where was Canada,—Canada which was first in the diamond jubilee procession in the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier who claimed to have made Canada a nation? I doubt if he would approve of the flag changes which are to be made under the auspices of this new twentieth century Liberalism which we have in this country.

If this is the most important motion to be brought up by a private member, I am willing to withdraw the resolution standing in my name so that we may get on with our business and abolish private members day. As I say, this is the third time such a resolution has been brought up since I have been in the house. In 1935, a resolution was moved by a member of the Conservative party. At one time, June, 1925, I asked certain questions about a national flag and I found out that a committee of seven civil servants had been appointed to consider the matter, all of the one religious denomination, although all good men. I believe the time is not ripe for a motion such as this.

I do not know whether Canada is in the British Empire or not. It has been contended by some of these professors in our universities and colleges and some on these commissions that Canada does not belong to the British Empire. This is what has been told to the students at McGill university and the university of Toronto, that we are a sovereign state by the Statute of Westminster. Just the other day we had quite a debate on the first reading of a bill to take away the right of appeal to the privy council. I think we have gone far enough in this direction. We should not follow the lead of South Africa and southern Ireland. The Prime Minister of South Africa has refused to take the king's oath as a privy councillor. It has been said in the House of Commons—I can give the authority—that overtures have been made to Germany and a secret treaty or agreement years ago entered into to give away part of the country covered by the Boer war treaty to Germany.

[Mr. Church.]

As far as I am concerned, I am utterly opposed to this motion. There is no demand for a distinctive Canadian flag. A great deal was said by these gentlemen who call themselves the Native Sons of Canada about what they were going to do to me if I opposed a new flag. However, I am still here and I do not know if there are any of them left in my riding. Your Honour will remember that when this question came up before, I asked for information from the government. My question will be found at page 4364 of Hansand of June 17, 1925. My first question was:

Will the government lay on the table of the house the text of a copy of order in council appointing a committee to select a distinctive Canadian flag for use ashore?

Hon. members will note that I referred to use ashore. That is where our navy is most of the time, on the shore. One of the newspapers has stated that I have asked sixty-eight questions, but I only asked not sixty-eight but twelve or fourteen and half of my questions deal with the separatism which is evident in this country in our foreign affairs. I contend it is the right of a member of parliament who represents his constituents to protest in this House of Commons against the wave of separatism which has been going through this country ever since this present government came into power in 1921. We hear a lot about this celebrated Department of External Affairs. I say that the government of the day has no mandate from the people to go on the way they are going. I claim the constitutional tradition that the Minister of External Affairs shall answer in this house for the way he administers this trust. There is a possibility and a great probability that this country will be invaded before long. We have a magnificent country with wonderful resources and it is bound to be invaded and is coveted. Germany is causing considerable trouble to Britain throughout the civilized world. We hear about her opposition to communism, but she used Russia in the great war and is using her also now for her own purposes.

It is the duty of the government to inform this House of Commons what is being done by this Department of External Affairs. From three to three and a half millions of dollars have been wasted on the League of Nations and the only result has been increased disarmament by Britain. I say that this is not the time to consider such a motion. If we want to hoist a flag, let us hoist one for another mass buying and price spreads committee; let us hoist one in a fight against the high cost of living; let us hoist one in an effort to do something practical for the working classes of the country; let us hoist a flag on behalf of the industrial workers, fifty-one per cent of whom have been driven out of their homes through foreclosures and other measures, and want the same treatment as farmers and fishermen get. I have seen homes in my riding with the red flag of the bailiff in front showing that he had taken possession of the house and put the family on the street in executions and foreclosures.

The time has come for twentieth century Liberalism to do something practical other than a flag motion. This is not a free parliament. We might as well all go home as our work here is purely academic. There is nothing left for us to do after all these commissions have been appointed. They have taken away many of the functions and privileges of members of parliament. The people are going to protest against this motion and I doubt very much if it is in order under the Statute of Westminster. These were my questions in 1925:

2. Who is asking for such a Canadian flag and for such a change, and why?
3. Is the union jack not Canada's only official flag, and was it not the one used by the Canadian expeditionary forces overseas in France, and since Canada has been a British possession?
4. Will an opportunity be given the house to discuss such an unnecessary innovation in view of Canada having no land army and no fleet whatever except the proposed Petersen fleet?
5. Is such a change of policy not for parliament to decide instead of the governor general in council?

These are the members of the committee who were to consider these matters:

G. J. Desbarats, Esq., C.M.G., Deputy Minister of National Defence, Chairman.
Thomas Mulvey, Esq., B.A., K.C., Under-Secretary of State.
A. G. Doughty, Esq., C.M.G., LL.D., Dominion Archivist.
Commodore Walter Hose, C.B.E., A.D.C., Director of the Naval Service.
Major General H. A. Panet, C.B., C.M.G., D.S.O., Adjutant General.
Group Captain J. S. Scott, M.C., A.F.C., A.D.C., Acting Director of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

That was a splendid committee, but all of one religion, it may be noted. Some were returned soldiers who had been decorated many times. But they did not want a job like that as some of them did not believe in changing the flag. Some of them had led their men in Flanders under the union jack and had seen it used many times to drape the body of some poor soldier who had been killed. No wonder the people of the motherland are wondering where Canada is going! The only thing that binds Canada to the motherland are the ties of blood and race.

Our governor general does not represent the king any more; he is just the viceroy. The lieutenant-governors of the provinces, when they call a party together, refer to it as the viceregal party. Pick up the Globe and Mail any morning and you will see where viceregalism has been installed in Canada illegally as the governor general is the only viceroy. As I say, there is no demand for a resolution of this type. It is all very well to talk about Canada first and the empire a very poor second.

As I have said before in the house and on many occasions outside the house the fathers of confederation made a great mistake when they foisted these provincial legislatures upon the country for political and not economic purposes. I believe in the policy of one king, one flag, one school and one empire such as the principle they have in the United States. That is a country which is copied very often to-day, and those are principles they follow there.

Saturday was Abraham Lincoln's birthday. Is anybody over there proposing to change their flag? They have one flag on the ocean, one flag on the land. Talk about a flag for the Canadian navy on the ocean! Has any part of our navy gone over to protect Canadian subjects in Japan? No; they hug the shore. When the naval bill was up in 1909 the Hon. Charles Murphy, then Secretary of State, a very respected member of this house, said that under the navy bill if an enemy ship was coming up the St. Lawrence, we would have first to pass an order in council before the Canadian navy could fire off a pinwheel, a fire cracker or a sky rocket. With a humbug navy of that kind, what is the use of saying we are a nation and all that?

I have no desire to talk out the resolution of the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh). I have sat on a committee with him, and I have found him very fair, and a very fair chairman. I do not want to be unfair to him or to talk out his motion, but I have been opposed to this thing for many years. The people who sent us here sent us to solve Canada's economic problems. We have been here for three and a half weeks and I fail to see any problem that we have yet solved. With conditions as they are in this country, with the many problems we have to solve, no wonder we have communism in Canada. It is the duty of this parliament to remove grievances within, because the mother country will look after grievances without. It is the armed strength of Great Britain, her navy and her army, that protect our shores, and in the old land they are beginning to wonder if Canada and the other dominions are not a drag on the British Empire.

You had an imperial conference last year. Did you solve any of these problems there? Was this question of a Canadian flag brought up at that conference? I have not been able to find out that it was.

I want to say to these hon. gentlemen who come from the west, for whom I have every respect, that I believe in the principle of confederation, the old Cornish battle cry—"each for all and all for each." What is for the benefit of the maritimes is for the benefit of Ontario, and what is for the benefit of the great prairie provinces, which are suffering so much, is for the benefit of Ontario and the rest of Canada. We should be a happy and a united people, and this question of a change of flag should not be taken up at this time, with so many real problems before the country. We have no defence against an invader in this country, on the Pacific coast or anywhere else.

The senate have hauled down the flag on their part of the building; they have gone on a three weeks' holiday, as they have no work, they say, with all these economic problems unsolved. We have been sitting here for three weeks, and we might as well have gone on a holiday also for the last three weeks for all we have done to solve the problems of the people of Canada. If you keep on appointing commissions I do not know where you are going to end up.

Instead of having a committee appointed to consider a Canadian flag we shall soon need a pan-American flag because we are depending upon the Monroe doctrine and the American fleet to protect our shores. We are depending upon the doctrine which Monroe enunciated over a hundred years ago, and upon pan-Americanism, and if what I read about this Anglo-American treaty is correct, dear knows what kind of flag we are going to have before we get through with that treaty.

I believe in a policy of Canada for Canadians. The Toronto Star for the past few weeks has been talking about income tax of our millionaires who left Canada, and it has been printing pictures of a number of Canadian millionaires who got sick and tired of taxation under the Canadian flag and paying Canadian income tax, and went off to Nassau and other places in the Bahamas, with the wealth they got out of the gold and other mines of this country. The Lord intended all these magnificent natural resources, the water powers and mines, for all the people, not just for some of the people.

True, these people who have been engaged in mining development are entitled to a large part of the profits, but not the whole thing uncontrolled. But they have got their millions out of the soil on easy terms, and are now in Nassau, and the flag they have there is the union jack, which is plenty good enough for us, and has been ever since we were a country. It is the flag we had in the early days of this country, in 1885, when the Grenadiers, the Queen's Own and other regiments, left the city of Toronto, the thirteenth battalion the city of Hamilton, and the sixty-fifth French-Canadian battalion from Montreal and from Quebec. These volunteers from Ontario and Quebec carried the union jack and saved Canada from being dislocated in the northwest. It was good enough for them, and it was good enough in the South African war. There was no demand for a Canadian flag then. The veterans of the South African war and the Fenian raid of 1866 are forgotten to-day. They cannot get a nickel from parliament, let alone a flag, and many of them are suffering. The same is true of the veterans of the great war. There is no demand from any soldier organization that I know of for a change of flag.

Instead of Canada doing something about a new flag, I think it had better do something about making a contribution of a unit to the British navy. It would be better to work with Australia and New Zealand, helping the British navy instead of putting up defences of our own. Let us fight our foes from within, as well as from without. This country is becoming steeped in internationalism. I do not know where it is all going to wind up. Our men will be unemployed and our home market will be gone.

Read Green's History of England; what does it say about the flag? I quoted from it in the house last year regarding the industrial revolution, and I am not going to refer to it further to-night.

As I was saying, with the toy fleet we have, I fail to see that we need a flag at all. In fact, if I went overseas to Japan, or for an ocean trip, I would not want to go to the Canadian legation for protection. I do not know whether it is open. I heard from some people over there that Canada was one of those responsible for Japan getting out of the alliance with Great Britain. Do Canadians in Japan go to the Canadian legation? I know of nobody who goes there. There is nobody there to protect them. They all head for the British embassy, the same as they do in Germany and other countries.

Next Sunday Herr Hitler is going to announce at a great demonstration, when the German flag is up, that he is going to get back Germany's colonies from Britain, if you please. If so, good day to the British Empire! The discussion in the house on this motion will have an unfortunate effect, I fear, in England. The mother country has made investments in Canada to protect us. She invested, and paid, for example, for the whole Rideau canal as a back door into lake Ontario. As in the war of 1812 our army was separated in Upper and Lower Canada and the Rideau canal was built to overcome this. The British paid for that, and they have made investments all over this country for defence. It is their fleet that protects our shores. We are the fifth nation in trading, and yet we have no navy. We are using the British fleet to protect our shores and our trade routes. It would be far better, Mr. Speaker, if we spent our time in trying to solve these problems of trade, defence and immigration than in talking about a flag.

I will tell the house what this Anglo-American treaty is going to do. It is going to turn the next election into a union jack election; and it is pretty nearly time we had another union jack election, to find out if we are in the empire or out of the empire and where all this separation is landing us. The government is going to have a union jack election whether it likes it or not, and motions of this kind are what will bring it along. We shall find out whether we belong in the British Empire. We are not going to follow any longer South Africa and Southern Ireland. They had an election the other day in the northern part of Ireland, and we see how the vote went.

In the last census our population was 10,352,269 people. Of these twenty-nine per cent are fine subjects of the province of Quebec, who love their native Canada and love the motherland. Another twenty-nine per cent are of foreign origin those who have come to this country. Many have been here for years; for the most part they are on the prairie; they are mostly fine people; they have done a great deal of good work out there. But they are isolationists; they do not believe in taking part in the affairs of the empire. The other forty-two per cent are the British born, English, Irish, Scotch and Welsh. While they hate war they love Canada. The parents of many of them came here years and years ago. Though some of them may be isolationists at heart, I believe that as regards a large majority of the two twenty-nine per cents and the forty-two per cent, if the motherland were in trouble to-day their young men would spring to arms under the union jack, because the majority of the people of Canada believe that Britain before God stands as trustee the world over for the peace of the world.

In conclusion, I may say that we need not look to the newspapers to give us the facts about the foreign policy of this country. I do not know whether there is actually a censorship on foreign affairs or on defence, but it appears there must be some kind of censorship or arrangement, because in the past two years in hardly any newspapers, except the Toronto Telegram and one or two other Toronto papers and like-minded newspapers elsewhere, have I been able to find the slightest reference to foreign affairs, and the people are being kept from the real facts. The members of this house are becoming almost like what they call in England and picture in the cartoons by the name of "shiffer" sisters. That is that section of the cabinet there that would cede to Germany her colonies. If we keep on we shall be "shiffer" sisters too, because we are afraid to deal with Canada's three great problems—trade, defence and the empire, or to support rearmament.

I have consulted with a great many people about this flag issue, and the general feeling is that it would be better for us first to provide a proper fleet on which to hoist a flag, and not boats like the Minnie M, the Ada Alice, the Island Queen, the Luella, and the Shamrock. I do not know where this Canadian fleet is, though I read naval orders, and I may say that my hon. friend the minister is one for whom I have regard. I first met him out at Vancouver when he arranged to take my university of Toronto senior hockey team out in the harbour there at the time we won the Allan cup in 1927. When we went out in the harbour all we could see was the union jack. I have asked in the house, Where is this magnificent fleet gone to? Where is Canada's navy? I cannot remember all their names at the moment. They have gone to Barbadoes, to St. Lucia; they have gone down to Nassau, apparently. The fleet has gone junketting in foreign waters on good will cruises, away down in the West Indies. I wish some of my colleagues could go with them; I wish we could all go down there and have a good time with this Canadian navy. Naval orders of January 2 say that the fleet has gone on a good will cruise. I asked the question whether any of this celebrated fleet has gone to Sino-Japanese waters. Of course not. There might be a scrap over there, and I would not want to be on board Canada's navy when there was one there.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, so far as this particular motion is concerned, wait until we get an adequate fleet to carry a flag and sufficient men to man the fleet. On land and sea and in the air what are we doing to-day for our own protection? Simply hoisting the pan-American flag in and out of this house. Apparently we are going to depend upon it now, instead of the motherland and its great flag the union jack that has so long protected our shores; instead of depending upon that any longer we are going to rely on another power on the north American continent.

We need to-day a Gilbert and Sullivan to write about this magnificent fleet of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). We need some concert halls for a new version of Gilbert and Sullivan's H.M.S. Pinafore, as related to our toy navy. I ask again, Where is this fleet of ours which will have a change of flag if this motion passes? Where is it now? In the West Indies, down somewhere no doubt near the millionaires. I believe that one of the fleet went overseas for the Vimy Ridge celebration and another for the coronation. Nobody knows where they are at the present time. Perhaps they have on board some visitors or members or senators or others who have gone to foreign waters for their health. It would be a good thing for the taxpayers if the members of this house could go away for three weeks also with the senate as we are doing no work for the people.

The flag in the Victorian era—that was a flag. The Victorian era built assets for the future; we have been squandering them ever since. In the days of Victoria under the union jack, the people kept the state; to-day, under the union jack, the state keeps the people. Instead of talking about a new flag, we need to-day to get the business man to hoist the union jack. Let us leave the day by day conduct of business to the men who understand and conduct business, instead of our passing a whole lot of useless motions and appointing committees and commissions of college professors to tell them how to run their business. Under the Victorian era the union jack was on top of the store in every part of Canada. Nowadays all our people are becoming proletarians; they do not own anything; they have no property. We have been slow to see how this has happened under the union jack.

Canada is becoming more and more the happy hunting ground of Americans who come to Canada seize our natural resources and then contribute nothing to the income tax. I see the young Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) here to-night. Two years ago, I think it was, I asked him if he would kindly look into the way these millionaires who hoist the union jack here can go down to Nassau and escape payment and into the revelations at Washington. He has not replied to my question. I hope he will do so this session and let us know where these people go and how they get away and no doubt hoist the union jack down there. It is a good flag, anyway. We should do well to go back to the days of Sir John A. Macdonald and remember his declaration, "A British subject I was born; a British subject I will die." I have become alarmed as I sit in the house at recent separatist developments. In the last few days we have had proposals not only to change the flag but to abolish appeals to the privy council. If those appeals are abolished, goodbye to the principles of the union jack, goodbye to the rights and privileges and functions of municipalities and the provinces, and the rights of minorities in this country. No wonder, with this wave of separatism, it is now proposed to change the flag!

The mover of the resolution states in his motion that he would have a special committee appointed. We all know what special committees are. If they are appointed they are like the royal commission, because the members of the committee just meet and sit around a table; towards the end of the session, as is known in the old country, and here, the government of the day, having a majority in the committee, will write the report for them, and the committee can vote and talk as they like and get nowhere; I have sat on many of these committees and I know what their proceedings are.

What is this committee going to consider when it is appointed? It is going to consider the advisability, if you please, of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag. Well, in my opinion, it is not advisable in the present state of unrest in the country to entertain any such distinctive proposal. In 1925, the same language was used; a committee was to consider then "the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag." Is it advisable for us to be considering a resolution such as this when we know what the condition of affairs is not only in Canada but in the world at large, when the mother country is faced with the situation that exists in the far east? Is it advisable at the present time to raise this question when we are depending upon the motherland for maritime protection?

We are trying to establish an air force in Canada. We know how war has been revolutionized in the air. If the enemy were to sail up the St. Lawrence, what would be our position? We are unprepared; while we are talking about a new flag they could blow up the citadel, proceed to Ottawa and blow up these buildings and the Chateau Laurier. They could come here and destroy our public utilities and return in five or six hours while we were talking in a committee about the advisability of adopting a national flag. This committee is going to consider the advisability of changing our flag, but the resolution does not say the change is necessary. The new flag would no doubt please a good many people in all the provinces; but, as I say, if the enemy sailed up the St. Lawrence, where would we be? Somebody in the committee might say, "We have pan-Americanism to protect us." The resolution speaks of a Canadian flag, "representing Canada as a whole, thereby symbolizing the dominion as an equality partner in the commonwealth of British nations." I say that Canada is not an equality partner; she is a sponger partner, sponging on the taxpayers of the motherland for her maritime protection, sponging on the flag we have at the present time, the union jack, for protection not only on land but on the sea and in the air. Talk about equality partnership! That was the language used in the Statute of Westminster with reference to "this British Commonwealth of Nations," a high-sounding title that was supposed to bring about the millennium in empire affairs. In my opinion it has done more to disrupt the empire than anything else. The people of Canada never voted or consented to that, and they have not voted on this question with regard to a change of flag.

And what about this committee? I have sat on several committees and I can say that some of them never meet. It would be a good thing if this committee did not meet. If we are an equality partner in the commonwealth of British nations, to use the language of the resolution, all I can say is that we are making a pretty poor showing because at the present time Canada is doing nothing but the talking; Canada is doing all the talking in foreign affairs.

One of the questions before the conference had reference to shipping within the empire. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that at the present time there are 2,000 fewer merchant ships in the British Empire than there were in 1914? Do you know that this magnificent fleet which protects our shores, instead of burning coal is burning foreign petrol from Arabia and South America? If the enemy wanted to cut off our oil supply for the navy in war, we would be without a fleet to protect our shores. The fleet used to burn coal, but now burn foreign petrol. We talk about being an equality partner in the empire, but when we are asked to do something we say no.

If we could get this house down to business we would be doing something, instead of discussing a motion of this sort. The motion speaks of a flag symbolizing the dominion. That is all we have so far as our fleet is concerned; we have the sign or symbol of a fleet; that is all. I do not know where the fleet is; I do not know what flag it flies. I think it is after eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I have not concluded.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: It is eleven o'clock.

Mr. HYNDMAN: If the house is not going to adjourn, Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 15, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

BOARDS OF REVIEW, TIME LIMIT FOR FILING PROPOSALS, ETC.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that at the next sitting the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, to make provision for the establishment of more than one board of review in any province, to provide that no new proposals shall be filed in a province after a date to be fixed by proclamation, more adequately to define the meaning of the word "creditor" as used in the act, and to extend the benefit of the act in the case of deceased farmers.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

REPORTED LIST OF ARTICLES TO BE CONSIDERED FOR TARIFF REDUCTION BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) a question in reference to the accuracy of a statement appearing in a London paper which reached me last night, to the effect that Canada has submitted an extended list of articles which will be considered for tariff reduction during the negotiations in connection with the revision of the Canada-United States agreement. It goes on to say that the list includes certain specified kinds of grain, fruits, vegetables, fish, furs, paper and pulp boards, cattle and timber. Is that an accurate report, and if so have the industries affected been made aware of the fact?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I had not known that the question was to be asked. We have information that a list of commodities has been published by the government of the United States upon which they are willing to negotiate. I assume that is the list referred to in the article. While I do not at the moment recollect all the commodities contained in the list or enumerated therein, I presume they are correct.

Mr. STIRLING: The point of my question is that it is stated that Canada has submitted a list on which Canada is willing to consider reductions in duties, and I want to know if that is correct.

Mr. EULER: No, it is not correct; it is quite inaccurate. Canada submitted a list on which they desire the United States to make concessions, and then the United States submitted a list on which they agree to negotiate. As yet however we have not received any request from the United States for concessions from Canada. I think probably that is the information the hon. member wants.

COST OF LIVING

REPRESENTATIONS OF TORONTO HOUSEWIVES' ASSOCIATION—INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) a question, of which he has been given notice. Hon. members from Toronto have been receiving batches of letters from what is known as the Housewives' Association of Toronto with regard to the high cost of food and all other necessities. Will the minister consider setting up a committee during the life of this parliament to study the question? I know there are limitations under the decisions, and this matter may be considered to be partly under the jurisdiction of the provinces, but we have the provisions of our criminal code with respect to restraint of trade and combines; and the various groups which I have described are holding meetings to fix prices. I do not ask the minister to reply to-day, but perhaps he will take this as notice.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) was kind enough to give me notice of this question, but as I received it only a short time ago I do not think he will expect a final answer at this time. I shall be very glad to bring this matter of increased prices of commodities, particularly those entering into domestic budgets, to the attention of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act and inform the hon. member as soon as possible as to what action, if any, can be taken under dominion jurisdiction to deal with the complaints to which he has referred.

THE PARLIAMENTARY GUIDE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) inquired yesterday as to the distribution of the Parliamentary Guide. He said that he would like to know who gave instructions this year to have the Parliamentary Guide distributed free to members of the house. In answer I may say that the Parliamentary Guide for the year 1938 was purchased from the king's printer on a requisition signed by the Clerk on instructions from Mr. Speaker. Payment will be charged against the item "contingencies" in vote 31 of the House of Commons' estimates for the year 1938. It is usual to purchase the guide when it is published.

CATTLE SHIPMENTS

PROVISION OF SPACE ON VESSELS FOR SHIPMENT TO ENGLAND

On the orders of the day.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) asked a question yesterday with respect to the provision of additional space on boats for the shipment to Great Britain of cattle which were shipped from western Canada to Ontario and are now ready for the British market. Her question was as to whether sufficient cargo space would be provided and what steps the government were taking toward that end. The answer is that the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce have been actively exploring the possibilities of securing additional space for the export of cattle to the United Kingdom. It is expected that further accommodation for export cattle will be made available.

THE UNION JACK

DISPATCH FROM COLONIAL SECRETARY REFERRED TO IN DEBATE ON A CANADIAN FLAG

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Would the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) be good enough to lay on the table the dispatch from Colonial Secretary Harcourt to the governor general concerning the flag to be flown in Canada, to which reference was made last evening?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENIE KING (Prime Minister): Yes.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT, 1934

SICK MARINERS AND MARINE HOSPITALS—LEVY, COLLECTION AND REMISSION OF SHIP DUES

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Canada Shipping Act, 1934 (part V, sick mariners and marine hospitals), in respect to the levy and collection, and in certain cases the remission, of ship dues.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Mr. POWER: The bill to be based upon this resolution will cover minor amendments to the section of the shipping act which deals with sick mariners. One amendment will clarify the definition of the word "voyage" in order that it may be quite clear that vessels shall not be compelled to pay dues twice during the same voyage. The second amendment deals with scows or barges which carry no crews and which hitherto had been charged dues for the benefit of sick mariners. This latter amendment applies particularly to British Columbia.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Power thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 23, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, 1934.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

CORRUPT ELECTORAL PRACTICES—AMENDMENT TO MOTION OF PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I desire to move an amendment to this motion, but before reading my amendment I have a few remarks to make. The amendment deals with the question of levies or alleged levies made in connection with Canadian National Railways contracts. I hasten to add that I am fully aware of the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) appears to believe that I am rather insistent upon this point, but he may hold that opinion simply because I have never yet had the opportunity of expressing exactly what I have in mind, and that I propose to do now.

I am introducing an amendment at this time because there should be absolutely no delay with reference to so grave a matter. Just picture the situation: an hon. member declares to the house that he knows that certain levies are being made in connection with contracts of the Canadian National Railways. Before making that definite statement he had said that political corruption was never so rampant in Canada, and it was while emphasizing that particular point that he mentioned the Canadian National Railways. To anyone who desires to know the truth, what do these statements mean?

I believe we should refer again to what has been said in this house in order to get a clear picture of the situation. For example, we find this statement:

Never in the history of this country has corruption been so rampant electorally as it is to-day. It is not a case of $5,000 or $10,000 in a constituency, but it is a case of large sums of money for corrupt purposes.

We go on a bit further and we find this:

When an organizer goes to a contractor and says that he wants one or ten per cent, that is a levy and not a contribution. What is more, I say that it threatens the very life of this state at this moment.

And further on we find this:

In view of what I know of the character of the methods by which contributions are made —they are no longer contributions but levies—

I pause here to underline the words "no longer." When a member makes a statement to the effect that these are no longer contributions it conveys the idea that some time in the past things were different. He is saying that to his knowledge at the present time things are no longer what they used to be—they are no longer contributions, but levies. Further, he says:

I say the time has come when we must provide methods under our electoral law which will not permit such a situation to continue.

Further on we find these words:

A contribution is one thing, but a levy of a certain per cent is another. The time has come when this must stop because the contractors themselves are complaining.

If this does not imply that the right hon. member who made the statement knows definitely whereof he speaks, then my knowledge of the English language is not as perfect as I think it is. But in order to prove definitely that he really meant a good deal, we find the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) saying to the right hon. leader of the opposition:

The right hon. gentleman has said either too much or too little.

And at that very moment, as all members of the house will recall, there arose an anxious cry throughout the house for the government to set up a committee, and my hon. friend from Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), whom I do not see in his seat at the moment, was the very first one to say: Let us have one "right now." Therefore at that particular time it was definitely understood that there certainly was something very wrong. Let us see what the Minister of Transport said:

Mr. Howe: As one who places a great many contracts for this government I ask the right hon. gentleman to give me a specific instance of a levy.

Mr. Bennett: I can give the minister as many as he wants, but I am not going to do it here and now.

Then here is the important part. The leader of the opposition went on to say:

What is more, I know of levies being made in connection with Canadian National Railways contracts.

Further on we have the right hon. leader of the opposition saying this:

It can be threshed out any time you want any committee of this house that you desire to appoint to go into the matter.

It was then that the hon. member for Cochrane interjected, "right now."

It may be all right, Mr. Speaker, to try to hide behind words, but when I heard those statements of the right hon. leader of the opposition—and I have gone over them very carefully—I had the definite impression that a certain meaning was to be attached to them, and I know definitely what meaning the people of this country are attaching to them. When the right hon. leader of the opposition makes a statement to the effect that ward bosses and political organizers have developed such a boldness of approach that their demands are no longer simply demands but amount to levies upon contractors, then I think it is time this house looked into the matter.

But the right hon. leader of the opposition did not stop there. He even named the amount of the levies in a case he knew about, and he said they had reached such proportions that even the contractors themselves were complaining. Now, those words of his are perfectly clear. They mean exactly what they would have meant if said outside this house or if printed elsewhere than upon the pages of Hansard.

When I heard those statements, Mr. Speaker, I did the only thing I thought I should do. I got up in the house and asked the Prime Minister if it was his intention to set up a committee to investigate the charges, and in a prepared statement the Prime Minister replied in this vein. He first reviewed the various statutes of Canada under which charges of alleged political corruption may be investigated. He pointed out that parliament had made statutory provision for the investigation of corrupt practices at elections. There was the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, chapter 50, revised statutes of Canada, 1927, under which, he said, —any person who has the right to vote may present a petition to a judge of a supreme or superior court, setting out these practices, and, if a deposit of $1,000 is made, an investigation may be held.

That is one method which the Prime Minister said could be followed to investigate the charges of the right hon. leader of the opposition. There was also a second way, which the Prime Minister outlined as follows:

Under the Corrupt Practices Act, chapter 51, revised statutes of Canada, 1927, twenty-five or more electors may present a petition to the House of Commons charging the existence of such practices, and, if a deposit of $1,000 is made—

Again I point to the $1,000—

—the house may direct the government to appoint a commission for the purpose of making an inquiry. The commisison in either case must submit a report to parliament and under standing order No. 79 it is provided that if it appears that any person has been elected by corrupt practices the house will proceed with the utmost severity.

Before pointing out these steps that might be taken the Prime Minister was very careful to remark that as I was a young member of the house possibly I was not familiar with the procedure in connection with charges of this kind. In reply I simply state, Mr. Speaker, that it is possible to know everything and yet understand nothing. I am not concerned with questions of law, nor do I propose to permit legalities to stand in my way. I cannot consider that such legal steps must be necessary or even advisable when all that needs to be done is for the house to appoint a committee of inquiry into the charges of the right hon. leader of the opposition.

Furthermore, we already have our standing committee on privileges and elections, and we all know that any question, whether concrete or academic, may be referred to a committee of this house fully empowered to investigate it.

It might also be suggested that the public accounts committee could very well look after this matter. But I say, Mr. Speaker, that we are not now dealing with one particular charge, as was mentioned by the Prime Minister; we are dealing with something which is undermining the political life of our dominion, and the scope of the public accounts committee is too narrow, in my opinion, to enable them to investigate a matter of this kind as it should be investigated.

I would also ask this question: Why should the responsibility be placed upon the public? In order to clear away this stigma on the house it seems to me that the Prime Minister and the government should move heaven and earth to find a method by which these charges can be cleared up. I know the Prime Minister to be a man of honesty and courage. I know him to be a man who does not hesitate to perform the task before him, but sometimes I think he might flinch and be reluctant to take action in a matter of this kind because he sees upon the horizon, perhaps, the shadow of another Beauharnois. I do not know, but if such should be the case, knowing the Prime Minister as well as I do, I am sure he realizes as everybody does that these charges have gone out to the country and to the people who have sent us here, and I think that the Prime Minister will help me out and do all he can to see that the people of Canada are well informed in the matter.

If the Prime Minister sees these threatening shadows upon the horizon, may I say to him that I sympathize with him and will do all I can to help him ward off any blows that may come; but if blows should come, let us face them fearlessly, let them fall where they may. I sympathize with the Prime Minister because he is not only the leader of the Liberal party but also the prime minister of all the people of Canada, and should corrupt practices be found to exist elsewhere than in the Liberal party I know that will grieve him just as much as if they were found within the ranks of his own party. If we allow these clouds to remain over this house, great will be the people's wonderment; they may begin to ask themselves whether we in this parliament have lost in a cloud of personal fear, the traditions of those who came before us, and they may lose their last glimmer of faith in our political life.

What of the youth of this country? The allegations made by the leader of the opposition have been read right across Canada and have definitely left an impression on the minds of the young people. Are we going to smash the idealism which they possess at the present time, destroy their faith in our institutions and our political life by hushing up these charges and letting them go untried? We should not be doing our duty towards the youth of this country if we permitted such a thing to continue.

I do not intend to discuss this question at great length—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PELLETIER: —because I feel that it is unnecessary. Some hon. members say "hear, hear." Perhaps that is the way they feel about it, but I believe they thereby indicate that they do not fully recognize their duty to those who sent them to this house. They should be more ready to support me in a matter of this kind.

I have a plea to make to-day. I make it on behalf of the people in general but especially on behalf of the youth of this country, and even in the interest of those who have to pay the deficits on the Canadian National Railways. I ask the members of the House of Commons to see to it that the stigma which clouds this house at the present time is swept away. Before we begin to look after somebody else's business affairs we should see to it that our own skirts are kept clean, and make it clear that we know what we are talking about. Therefore I take pleasure in moving the following amendment:

That the motion be amended by leaving out all the words in the motion after "that" and the following be inserted:

This house is of the opinion that charges of levies in connection with Canadian National Railways contracts as well as statements concerning electoral corruption should be referred to a select committee of this house with power to send for papers, persons and witnesses and to take evidence under oath and to report to this house.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): On February 1, I spoke against corruption. I pointed out that money and propaganda were used to deceive the people; that consequently the will of those who were struggling to have their desires expressed in and carried out by their governments was being overridden by secret, hidden influences that were apparently drawing their support from the wages of corruption; that red herrings were being dragged across the trail in a great many constituencies throughout this country, with the deliberate object of confusing the people. Among other things, I condemned the People's League for its activity in Alberta last summer. I pointed out with reference to the Lethbridge by-election that, strange as it may seem, the People's League was able to hold together until the election was achieved and that then the leader of the Liberal party immediately withdrew; and everybody who has been thinking at all about that matter has wondered why in the name of common sense the Liberal leader did not give the people of Lethbridge a ghost of a chance and make his statement three days before the election instead of three days after. This thing has offended and disgusted to a greater degree more people than hon. members have any conception of, because the object of the whole intrigue—shall we call it—was so manifest.

I believe that hon. members would be interested in a further development of the Lethbridge by-election. I am going to read to them, in case they have not seen it, a passage from the Lethbridge Herald of February 5, 1938, page 4. It is an editorial, and I am quoting it because it indicates the kind of thing with which we in Alberta are confronted all the time.

Perhaps the advertisements appearing in the Herald on Wednesday setting forth the campaign expenses of Doctor Campbell and A. J. Burnap in the recent by-election tell the true story. Perhaps they are a little misleading. The figures show that Doctor Campbell's committee spent $1,049, while Mr. Burnap's committee spent $237.

The figures of course do not take into account a few rather important facts.

Before I read further may I ask hon. members to weigh quickly in their minds, as I know they can do, the principles which the Lethbridge Herald is laying down in the following words:

They do not show how much it cost the taxpayers of Alberta for Premier Aberhart to make two trips to Lethbridge and spend practically a week here during the campaign.

[Mr. Pelletier.]

Are we to assume that the premier of a province is not supposed to go out and do what he can towards enlightening the people as to his point of view?

No doubt Mr. Aberhart was drawing his salary of some $200 a week during that time. No doubt also Hon. Mr. Low, Hon. Mr. Tanner, Hon. Doctor Cross, Hon. Mr. Maynard and Hon. Mr. Manning, who receive from the taxpayers of Alberta some $150 a week, also drew their salaries while they were campaigning here.

I wonder if there is not an intimation there that these gentlemen were not going to do a full year's work because, upon the invitation of the people of Lethbridge, they spent a few days in the constituency.

Mr. Speaker Dawson and Mr. Popil, two members of the legislature, also helped in the campaign. No doubt the expense accounts of the various members of Mr. Aberhart's ministry would show that they had very important business in Lethbridge during the election campaign.

The insinuation is obvious.

We leave it to the people of Alberta to judge whether the social credit campaign in the by-election cost only $237.

In view of such remarks as were made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), and in view of such evidence as comes pouring in from a wide variety of directions, to strain at a gnat and swallow a camel, as is indicated by this editorial, must strike any calm mind as being utterly revolting and disgusting.

So much by way of beginning. I should like once more to make it perfectly clear, as I endeavoured to do in my speech on February 1, that I am in favour of election reform. At that time I pointed out the way in which, since 1921, Alberta has grappled with this problem, teaching its citizens to form great people's organizations and contribute the money with which they fought their campaigns; to keep an open account in order to show where the money came from, how much they had, how it was spent and all those matters which are so necessary to keep an electorate informed and satisfied that those who are chosen to represent them are not in the pay of certain big interests. As I also pointed out, it repels us to think that, after all the effort we have put forth, which cost the people of our province an incalculable amount in anxiety, in money that they could ill spare, and in various other ways, the results should be overborne or nullified by people who are assisted from nobody knows where.

I contend that what the leader of the opposition implied is, as regards this country, absolutely true. If democracy is to continue in Canada, we must have wholesale, genuine and thoroughgoing repentance on the part of all the leading organizations who stand for election to the governing bodies of this country as well as on the part of all who stand behind the organizations. In what I have to say there is nothing personal and nothing partisan. Both parties must change. I am not deceived into thinking that because the leader of the opposition made the charge, or the intimated charge, the other side is therefore the only one that is blameworthy. I think it is a fairly good illustration of the old saying about the pot calling the kettle black. I believe that the history of both sides going back a few generations in Canada will reveal a sufficient number of unsightly incidents to make each party very reticent about levelling charges against the other. And I say this realizing fully that the present leader of the opposition and the present leader of the government may be completely innocent; indeed, I am inclined to believe that they both are. It is not their desire in any way to condone this sort of thing. What we must do, however, is to make matters different so that they will have a chance to lead the country without such intimations being thrown out and such unsightly things occurring.

It seems to me that there is a giant octopus hidden somewhere, and it is nourished somewhere near the centre of Canada. It extends long, hidden, treacherous tentacles wherever the people begin to get any sort of insight into the truth and any sort of idea of what to do about it. Whenever that happens it quietly and clandestinely strangles any movement which the people have built up. What is the cause of this? There is little use in our railing against the malady unless we seek the cause. Railing against the malady until you learn the cause and endeavour to remove it is as profitable as trying to cure smallpox by painting over or scratching off the pimples. Let us see if we can find out what the cause of the difficulty is.

Personally I believe that the first cause of the trouble is bewilderment. There exists uncertainty among the people of Canada. As a new member of parliament, I judge that it is because of the great amount of misinformation that exists everywhere throughout the country, and the misunderstanding, delusion and prejudice. If any hon. member of this house thinks he can successfully challenge the statement that throughout Canada there exists a great amount of misinformation, misunderstanding, delusion and prejudice, then it will be interesting to hear his defence. On top of all this and aggravating the whole situation there is selfishness everywhere at work confounding the confusion. Each party is in a false position. I believe it was the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Needham) who last year read a letter that was rather interesting. I am not saying that I entirely agree with what was in that letter, but there was in it a thought-provoking passage. The writer said that the Liberals have been false to true principles while the Conservatives have been true to false principles. The result is that, of course, the country has suffered all these generations.

Inasmuch as I am of Liberal tendencies myself, and inasmuch as I find that in consequence the Liberal members of the house have been and are now, shall I say, more congenial—or perhaps I understand them better—may I talk to the Liberal members for a few minutes. In the first place, are the Liberals to-day false to true principles?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let us not answer the question too readily. It is easy to answer it at once; but, are they? Let us discuss the question for a moment or two. Someone asks, who is to judge? Well, before you decide who is to judge, the first thing to do is to fix upon a standard of judgment, and that is what we shall have to do now. In the first place, Liberals for some generations have, at least ostensibly, committed themselves to the principles of laissez-faire.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): By no means.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If they have not committed themselves to the principles of laissez-faire let us acknowledge it frankly before the people so that everyone will know exactly where the Liberal party does stand. One of the chief reasons for the difficulty that faces us to-day is that no one knows where either party stands, and apparently each party is studiously and assiduously endeavouring to prevent everybody from finding out.

Let us deal with the question of laissez-faire. Laissez-faire involves four fundamental principles: first, free trade; second, free export of capital; third, no interference with contracts between employer and employee, or free association; and fourth, a metallic currency.

Mr. DUNNING: Whose definition is that?

Mr. BLACKMORE: What Canada is waiting to hear is a definition from someone in the Liberal party—a definition other than this. It only illustrates what I said a moment ago. We want to find out where these parties do stand; we want to know what the difference is between the Liberal party of to-day and the Liberal party of fifty years ago. When we know that we shall be in a position to judge.

Let us consider to what extent the Liberal party to-day agrees with these four principles and to what extent the principles themselves can be accepted. The first is free trade.

An hon. MEMBER: What about social credit?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Some hon. members are anxious to hear about social credit. When we turn on the social credit guns they will wish they were not hearing about it. A most interesting statement—interesting not only to all parties in this house but to the people throughout the country—is to be found in the words of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) when, speaking on February 7, he said:

> You cannot move to extremes in tariff policy without endangering national unity and without undermining the very foundations of federal public finance.

In other words, the principle of free trade apparently has gone by the board. The next question is, what is going to be the effect on the people when a man who has been an avowed free trader stands up in his place in parliament and makes such a statement? The effect is to destroy the confidence of the people in that man and in the party. There is no escaping that conclusion and the result is great chaos in ideas. For instance, suppose we take the question of sugar. I will discuss that question to illustrate the present chaotic thinking among the parties. Does the Liberal party as a party favour the protection of the sugar industry, or does it not? If it favours the protection of the sugar industry then it favours the protection of other industries; if it does not favour the protection of the sugar industry how can it favour the protection of others? The result is that, since we are not able to give consistent answers to these questions, we are simply in a state of chaos so far as the whole question of protection and free trade is concerned.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What has graft for the sugar industry to do with the resolution before the house?

Mr. BLACKMORE: All these things indicate why there is graft in Canada. I say that the chief reason for graft is simply the fact that neither party dares to come out before the Canadian people and tell them what it stands for. The result is that they try by every means to get power, regardless of what they will do when they get in, or what the people think they are going to do, or what the people demand, or what the effect is going to be on the morale of the people. All they are concerned about is getting into power. The chief cause of this result is this very thing I am talking about; consequently I maintain that this is strictly bearing out what I set out to say.

As a liberal party what are we going to say regarding price spreads? Western Canada suffers the gravest disadvantage and disability in that connection, because the people out there sell their produce in an unprotected market, while everything they require in order to produce those goods they have to buy in a protected market. For instance, the manufacturers of agricultural implements during the depression cut their prices only six per cent and limited their production so that they would be able to sell all they produced at a tremendously high price, while the farmer who must have agricultural implements in order to be able to produce his wheat saw his prices forced down and down and down according to world market conditions until he was producing a great deal more wheat than before the depression—or trying to—and therefore forcing the price level further down. Until that situation is faced frankly and dealt with by parliament in an effective way, there can never be justice between east and west. That is just one example. Where does the Liberal party stand on that, and what is it going to do? Nobody knows. The result is a great deal of attempted deception, and this very kind of corruption or attempted corruption which we are discussing to-day.

The next principle of laissez-faire is the export of capital. I am not going into that in any great detail, but I want to show how greatly the people become confused by all this. Capital, we are told, is exported to enable us to export goods, and the idea is that if we have free trade and get plenty of export markets war will be avoided. May I read a passage from a book published recently by a young man who is attracting considerable attention? I am not saying he is an authority, but his writings are observed on the American continent at the present time. His name is Christopher Hollis, and the title of the book is The Breakdown of Money. He uses the following words, which ought to be impressive to all those who are seeking the causes of war. I read at page 93:

> The Boer war, the Russo-Japanese war, the troubles in Egypt, on the further African coast, in the Balkans—all were terrible warnings of the inevitable nemesis of a world of exporting capitalists, each convinced that his money had a right to find its own level. Nineteen fourteen was the conclusion of the story.

Any party seeking the support of the people of Canada in an election at this time is invariably asked: What stand are you going to take on war? What are you doing about it? Are you committed to participation in a European war? Have you any entangling alliances with Great Britain? Hon. members know that is true. Why is this so? Because people are so completely bewildered with regard to the causes of war they are trying to the best of their ability to understand those causes and avoid them.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the remarks of the hon. member are not being directed to the motion before the house. I would ask the hon. member to confine himself to the motion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall endeavour to confine my remarks more closely to the subject before the house, although I think I could easily prove that these observations are strictly applicable to the causes of corruption in Canadian politics. But of course I submit to your ruling.

I hope you will permit me, sir, just to mention the other two principles of laissez-faire. One is free contracts, which would simply mean, for example, the abolition of trade unions. The other is metallic currency, which has been the cause of the most deplorable series of disasters which the human race has ever undergone. I shall leave the discussion of these until another time, but they bear most cogently upon the question we are discussing.

Now may I go on to show why these things have brought about this condition of corruption? There prevails a wide diversity of misconception. What do we mean by economic nationalism? Is it good or is it not? Is it the cause of war or is it not? There is general confusion in regard to the attitude on foreign relations. There are doubts as to the value of foreign trade, doubts as to the value of certain industries.

The Conservatives on the other hand are endeavouring to be true to their principles. I have not time to discuss that, and I gather from your opinion, Mr. Speaker, that it would be unwise for me to attempt to do so at any length. But I wish to show that the Conservatives also hardly know where they are at; nobody knows where he is at; nobody knows where either party is at. The result is that to come before the people and educate and train them so that they can think about real issues instead of red herrings is to-day next to impossible.

The question then is, what are we going to do about it? I say that the cure for all this difficulty is the truth. Are the representatives of the parties that are in this house to-day, are the supporters of parties who are outside the house, willing to let the people know the truth and let the people judge and let the people rule? If the answer is yes, then it is indeed a simple matter for us to remove this outrageous blot of corruption. Let us in this parliament set to work in an earnest attempt to discover the truth; never mind playing politics, but find what is right, what is in the best interests of this country, what are the ideas which are advocated to-day and what are the points in favour of or against each of them. That is what should be done, without any confusing of the issue. Let me say that I greatly appreciate the attitude taken by hon. members of this house; I believe they are inclined to seek and follow the truth, although previous parliaments have been less inclined to do so. Very well; if we in this parliament are satisfied that it is the truth we want, that is the first point. Then are we willing to allow the truth to go over the radio—the truth and only the truth?

Mr. MARTIN: And in the press.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And in the press, the truth and only the truth. Are we willing to have the bankers in the little branch banks in every community throughout this country know the truth and tell the truth, pure and unvarnished? If we are, it seems to me it is a proposal worthy of consideration that parliament should set aside for this purpose a sum of money before each election, on the principle that it is in the interests of this country that the people should know the truth; for a people who are uninformed, ignorant, deluded by misconceptions and false propaganda, are in an exceedingly dangerous state and are likely to do all sorts of unexpected and unaccountable and irresponsible things. Since, then, it is greatly in the interest of all concerned, and especially of governments, that the people should know the truth in the fullest possible degree, parliament should calmly and upon due consideration decide how much money may be necessary to permit the dissemination among the people of the various ideas entertained and put forward by the different political groups which seek election.

How much would it cost? We should set down a certain amount. Then suppose there are four parties facing the country at the next election, we say each of those parties shall be allowed a certain number of national hook-ups over the radio. Let each party have free speech over the radio, and let parliament pay for it; because parliament is interested in spreading the truth. There is grave danger, I say, in the people not having the truth; such a condition is likely to lead to communism, or fascism, or perhaps worse. Then, how much do the parties concerned require, within reasonable limits, to attend to stationery, advertising, pamphlets, letters and that kind of thing, all of which is necessary in conducting elections? Parliament will estimate the amount; it will set a figure, issue to the various parties the sums determined upon, and then allow them to go ahead and conduct their campaigns. Under that system the best party, according to the opinions of the people, would win.

An hon. MEMBER: What about a new party just breaking in?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then, we must consider newspaper advertising. To a great degree this type of advertising enters into the campaigns in many constituencies. If that is thought advisable, money could be set aside for that purpose. In addition, there are halls to be engaged. If halls are necessary—and we all agree that they are—and if a certain number of meetings are to be held in the halls of a certain community, let us set aside certain moneys for those halls.

We must consider also transportation. At the present time there are very strict rules in connection with the transporting of people to the polls. So far as I have heard, it is well recognized that those rules are largely ignored. In my opinion that is a most unhealthy condition. If we are going to transport people to the polls, then let us make allowances for doing so. Let us have it attended to in an open and aboveboard manner.

If these things are done we would be prepared to approach the concerns the leader of the opposition has mentioned. He implied that there were organizations in the country which were making substantial contributions to election funds. I am going to assume—and I think it is only right that we should—that those organizations are making contributions because they want their particular ideas to prevail. Perhaps their ideas are the correct ones; who knows? If they are willing to contribute certain moneys in order to have their ideas prevail, why not allow them to make those contributions in an aboveboard and open manner? Let the names of those who contributed be stated. Let the amounts be known. Let the purposes for which the contributions are made be stated. Let it be known whether it is the desire of the organization in question that the fund be allocated to the Conservative party. If it is so allocated, well and good. If it is given to the Liberal party, well and good.

That is the only way we have been able even to approach the solution of the problem in Alberta. Such having been done, we can now turn in this parliament to the task of determining the situation here. If investigations are made we will be able to go back, every one of us, and tell the truth, so far as we have been able to acquire it, and matters will be in a much healthier position when the next election comes along.

In this way we would be in a position whereby we might bring about a more enlightened Canada. I am satisfied about this, having lived in Alberta, where this thing has been done. There are plenty of people who are prepared to sneer at what has been done in Alberta, but the people who have been in the province, people who have been through those movements and know how an election is carried on out there, realize that the people's method is a great benefit. Improved practices tend to purify political life. I confess I can see no other way in which we can possibly purify and cleanse the public life of Canada, and in any way enable the people to register their will at any election.

Such being the case I take great pleasure in seconding the motion of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) that an investigation be conducted into the corrupt practice charges which have been made.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on the motion now before the house. First of all, as a member who has sat in his place for the last twelve years may I say here and now that I do not hold my seat through any kind of corruption or forced subscription of any kind to any corporation or interest.

I have read the words of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) as they appear in Hansard, and I believe he said either too much or not enough. I must state sincerely that so far as I am personally concerned no strings are attached to my own activities. There has been no corruption in connection with my election, personally, and I believe this applies to all hon. members of the house.

To show how this matter may work out may I say that only a few days ago I received a request for a subscription to be made to one of the best Protestant churches in my part of the country, and I was only too pleased to subscribe. My only regret at the time was that I could not give more. I was in a position to know of the good work that church was doing for a large number of people in that pioneer section of my constituency.

Although the suggestion is made that democracy is at stake, I must say that it ill behooves members of parliament to make the statements which have been made to-day, and I think the atmosphere must be clarified. In this connection may I point out one or two things the Social Credit party has done in the province of Alberta, both provincially and federally. May I make reference at this time to the rash promises which were made in that province? Those were promises made by a party to gather the votes of the electors.

I vividly remember the first emergency session in 1930 when, for the first time, the previous parliament was assembled in Ottawa to deal with unemployment. I well remember that on that occasion the then prime minister, the present leader of the opposition, coming from the senate after hearing the speech from the throne, entered the door of the chamber behind Mr. Speaker's chair. Walking from that point to his seat in the house he received an ovation from every section of the House of Commons. But at the same time, walking with him, over and above him, were the promises he made during the previous campaign. Regardless of his work and regardless of the energy he exerted for his country from 1930 until 1935, the fact remains that those promises remained with him, so far as the electors of Canada were concerned, and the electors would not forget them.

The mover and the seconder of the amendment belong to the new Social Credit party. I have no personal grievance against that party. My sincere and earnest wish would be that from the activities of that party we might eventually find it possible to solve some of the great questions now confronting us and, if I may use the term, to humanize the monetary system of Canada and remove some of its anomalies. At the same time I must point out to hon. members of the Social Credit party how they won their election in Alberta, and also how the federal members attained their seats in this house. I well remember that some of the electors of that province sang the verses of that song:

> We'll build a sweet little nest
> Somewhere in the west,
> And let the rest of the world go by.

Social credit was going to solve all their problems. That was to be brought about through the politics of the Social Credit party which were propounded to win the election. I say that it is the very worst kind of corruption for political parties to make promises that they know they cannot fulfil. I do not want to see any one party trying to outbid another in order to catch votes. I do not like to see them making appeals to the electorate and attempting to outbid one another in rash promises which could not possibly be implemented. I well remember that when the hon. member who formerly held the seat for Labelle, Mr. Bourassa, spoke some years ago he referred to the promises made by the then prime minister during the election campaign of 1930, and his statement was this: "Out of those promises will come one of two things; if you fulfil them you will bankrupt the country, and if you do not fulfil them you will go down in Canadian history as the greatest promiser the country has ever known."

What happened to the Social Credit party? I hold in my hand what is known as the Social Credit Manual in which is set out the system of social credit as applied to the province of Alberta and to all Canada. It purports to have been written by William Aberhart, B.A., and was copyrighted in 1935. At page 14 of the manual we find a reference to basic dividends, and I quote:

> To enable each citizen to secure these bare necessities, each of them will receive a pass book in which at the beginning of each month will be entered the basic dividend for that month, say $25.

If ever a corrupt appeal was made to the electors of a province or a country, certainly it was made right there by the Social Credit party. I am absolutely—

Mr. POOLE: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BRADETTE: Yes.

Mr. POOLE: This is, after all, only the hon. member's opinion, is it not?

Mr. BRADETTE: No, it is Mr. Aberhart's.

Mr. POOLE: It is your opinion.

Mr. BRADETTE: No, it is Mr. Aberhart's.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may put a question, but that is all.

Mr. BRADETTE: I beg the hon. member's pardon; I am not giving my opinion. As I said, I am reading from the Social Credit Manual, copyrighted in 1935 and written by William Aberhart, B.A., the present premier of Alberta. That was the spectacle we had in this country. We had a political party absolutely bribing the electors.

Mr. POOLE: No, sir. I object to that statement.

Mr. BRADETTE: It was a bribe. They were told that they would receive at least $25 a month. That is what was promised to every adult living in the province.

An hon. MEMBER: Read it again.

Mr. BRADETTE: I will read it again in order to be absolutely sure. The second paragraph on page 14 of the manual reads:

To enable each citizen to secure these bare necessities, each of them will receive a pass book in which at the beginning of each month will be entered the basic dividend for that month, say $25.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Explain.

Mr. POOLE: Explain the corruption.

Mr. BRADETTE: That was the worst possible kind of corruption.

Mr. POOLE: Explain why.

Mr. BRADETTE: No political party has the right to tell the people that if they are put into power they will dip into the public treasury in order to pay a definite dividend in good Canadian dollars. That is absolutely unfair to our Canadian spirit. A little further on in this same manual, at page 21, I read:

Basic dividends should be $25 a month for every bona fide citizen, male or female, twenty-one years or more. Children of bona fide citizens sixteen years old will receive $5 a month. Those seventeen and eighteen years old will receive $10 a month. Those nineteen, $15, and those twenty, $20 a month.

Mr. McINTOSH: Increasing the bid.

Mr. BRADETTE: That is the worst kind of election corruption we have ever heard of in Canada. Immediately after he was elected, Premier Aberhart asked the people of Alberta to give him eighteen months to implement his policies. I ask the members of the Social Credit group if Mr. Aberhart has implemented the promises he made in the election of 1935?

Mr. MITCHELL: He tried very hard.

Mr. POOLE: Did the Liberal party carry out its promise to keep its hands off our government?

Mr. BRADETTE: Question 20 in the same manual reads:

Will dividends always remain at $25 per month?

I want hon. members to pay particular attention to the answer:

No. We believe that the dividends will increase as the standard of living increases. We are not in favour of increasing the dividends, however, very rapidly at first. We would be more favourable to the distribution of greater purchasing power by means of public works or price discounts. We feel certain that the amount of dividends per month will, however, be soon increased above $25.

That is the gospel and the policy that was spread, not only throughout Alberta but also throughout British Columbia, Manitoba and Saskatchewan. It did not get into the east, but I want to tell my hon. friends that the east has been very fair to the idea of social credit; we wanted to study it. We wanted to find a solution for some of the problems we were facing. I remember attending a meeting at the Chateau Laurier at which Major Douglas, the founder of social credit, made an address. I listened attentively and open-mindedly to what he had to say and I hoped to find something useful in his formula. However, even with all his formulas I have never been able to find in them a solution for our social ills.

Major Douglas appeared before the banking committee of this house and again he brought forward his equations. We must be very careful about all these new economic equations brought forward by the theorists. Two and two does not make four according to them; it is much more complicated than that. You have figures on one side and then some letters and other symbols on the other, for the simplest questions. I was quite open-minded as far as Major Douglas was concerned, but for the life of me I never could plumb the abyss of social credit, and neither can the hon. members who have been elected on that policy.

A number of social crediters found it possible to be elected during the last dominion election. As far as they personally are concerned I have no doubt that they are a credit and an asset to our Canadian parliament, but we must remember that they were practically elected upon false promises and policies which they themselves found impossible of application when they were in power.

Mr. QUELCH: Prove that statement.

Mr. HANSELL: I ask the hon. member to withdraw that statement. I was elected by the people of Alberta not on false pretences, and I demand that that statement be withdrawn.

Mr. BRADETTE: I say that hon. members were elected on the promise of $25 per month to every adult in the province. The people of Alberta have given this provincial government all the leeway and latitude possible. Premier Aberhart has been given every opportunity to implement the promises he made and to demonstrate this wonderful new thing which was to take the people out of the depression, namely, social credit. At that time he was not worrying because he had asked the Albertans for eighteen months within which to implement these promises. That looked like a long time, but those eighteen months have elapsed and I do not think the social credit members as a group have been able to convince other hon. members of the wonderful benefits of social credit and that they have applied it to Alberta. I direct their attention to the old saying: Save yourself before you try to save anybody else.

Personally I have an open mind on these questions; I believe I would be remiss in my duty as a member of this house if I said that everything was all right and that we had no difficulties to surmount as far as the economic and financial situation is concerned. But there are serious problems which we have to face, and this is not the time when a political party should be prostituting itself by making irrational and passionate appeals to the people in the form of bribes.

I have been informed by good authority as to just what went on during the last provincial and federal elections. The social credit candidate would be addressing an audience in the rural section of the province. Naturally there would be some married women in the audience. The speaker would turn to a married woman and ask her if she were satisfied. She might reply that she was, that she had a good husband. He would then ask her, "Have you all the money you want?" The answer would be, "No, my husband is poor." Then the candidate would say, "If you vote for us we will give you $25 a month for your own money." If that was not the worst kind of bribery, I do not know what it was.

Then a social credit candidate would be addressing a group of young girls, no doubt most of whom were thinking of marrying—after all, that would be quite logical. They would be asked, "Have you all the money you want? Would you not like to have a nice hat or a nice pair of shoes?" The reply would be, "Yes, but I have not the money." Then the statement would be made, "Vote for us and we will give you $25 a month." Again I say that that was the worst possible kind of bribery.

I repeat what I said at the beginning. I believe in a hundred per cent confederation. What we want is purity as far as politics are concerned. Party funds there are, and there is no need to blush for that. I give to my own church and to other churches. That is not a fault; I am still loyal to my own church, but I also know of good work done by others. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that there is no stigma attaching to any member of this parliament, no matter on which side of the house he sits, in connection with party funds. But if corruption were rampant I would be the first one to hold up both hands for the amendment.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) upon his courage in bringing this resolution before the house. I think it is unfortunate that so far, since his speech, the debate has tended to become a purely party affair.

Mr. BRADETTE: Oh, no. You make promises too.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. gentleman is not going to divert me by a suggestion of that kind from the few words I have to say. I would hope that the great Liberal party would have some better answer than merely to hurl charges at the social credit group, little as I agree with the theories of that group. But I would like to bring the house back, if I may, to the resolution now before it.

No one can sit in this house as I have done for some sixteen years without hearing a good many charges of political corruption. No one can go through a number of campaigns east and west without being fairly sure that vast sums of money are being spent in elections. The trouble is that it is extremely difficult to secure definite proof, and most of us are not in a position to carry out the court actions which would be necessary. But two things are apparent. First of all, very large sums of money have been spent in elections, and extremely large sums in certain recent by-elections. Further than that, under the present elections act we have no means of ascertaining whence these large sums come. Some years ago when that act was being revised some of us tried to have inserted an amendment under which we would have a record of the sums given by local people and also the sums given to the central campaign funds, but the government would not accept an amendment along that line.

It is only a few days ago, as the hon. member for Peace River has pointed out, that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) made some very serious statements. It is true he did not make any very definite charges, but he made some very serious statements. I would point out to the house that he is in a somewhat different position from that occupied by the ordinary member of the house. He is a recognized official of the house, and when he makes a charge in the house it cannot lightly be set aside. As has been said by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe), he said either too much or too little. The impression that there is something radically wrong in the conduct of elections has gone abroad from one end of this dominion to the other. In my own city the Free Press, which is generally acknowledged to be a Liberal organ carried a cartoon representing the two leaders as the kettle and the pot, and the legend was, "The pot calls the kettle black." That is rather a cynical way of dealing with the matter. I do not think that charges should be made in this house by the leader of the official opposition without some investigation being made of them.

I recognize that even though this matter should be referred to a committee, it might be very difficult to secure all the evidence desired. I presume members of the government may say that they are not going to allow us to set up a committee that might go on a fishing expedition or something of the kind. I know there are limitations to the work a committee can accomplish. At the same time I feel that it is in the interests of clean government in this country that charges of this kind should not be allowed to pass unchallenged. Unless democracy can work in an atmosphere of something like reasonable freedom, democracy becomes a veritable sham. An impression is abroad throughout the country that to-day it is money that rules in elections as in a good many other fields. I think, Mr. Speaker, that when charges as serious as this, even though they are not specific, are made, they should be investigated by this house. I have therefore very great pleasure in supporting the motion of the hon. member for Peace River.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Woodsworth) expressed regret that the discussion which has taken place this afternoon should have partaken of a partisan nature. If he had that regret I must say I wish he had been wise enough to advise those around him as to the consequences of bringing in the motion on the subject to which it relates in the form in which it is. Just an hour or so ago I moved that the house resolve itself into committee of supply in order that the government might obtain the wherewithal to carry on the business of government. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) has moved an amendment to that motion, which is to the effect that the house shall not go into supply but shall do something else. What that something else is I shall remind the house in a few moments. But what would be the effect of the amendment were it to be carried? The effect would simply be that the government would be defeated, no supply could be voted and there matters would end for a time at least. It is a motion of want of confidence in the administration, and as such it is necessary that the administration oppose it so as to make possible its right to govern in this country, with the loyal support of its following in this house.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Had hon. gentlemen opposite desired a discussion in a manner which would not involve a vote of a want of confidence, there being no charge of any kind against the administration, they might have given notice of a motion in the regular way upon which the subject matter of the resolution might have been fully discussed. There would then have been perfect freedom on the part of all to discuss the matter regardless of their relationship to the government or otherwise. It is necessary, however, for me to point out clearly that the motion in the form in which it has been presented is a want of confidence motion in the administration, and if it were to carry, the government would be defeated. It is a want of confidence motion based on what? On nothing whatever in the way of substance.

May I remind the house what the hon. member said about his own amendment? I shall read the amendment first:

> This house is of the opinion that charges of levies in connection with Canadian National Railways contracts as well as statements concerning electoral corruption should be referred to a select committee of this house with power to send for papers, persons and witnesses and to take evidence under oath and to report to this house.

After he had read his motion, he asked over and over again: Is it not desirable that we should remove these shadows which are on the horizon? Is it not necessary that we should remove the shadow which is over this house? Is it not necessary that we should do away with the stigma that has been placed upon this parliament? Are we not here for the purpose of preserving the honour of this parliament, of saving it from dishonour? Let me ask my hon. friends who have spoken on the other side of this house: Who have created this shadow? Who have spoken words which have cast reflection upon this parliament, other than the hon. member who moved this resolution, the hon. member who seconded it, and I regret to say also, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett)? It is a new alliance that we have, this Conservative-Social Credit alliance, which has taken also into its fold the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth). These gentlemen have been spending their time since this parliament opened to see how far they can go in manufacturing shadows—

An hon. MEMBER: That is all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —shadows which, in their attempt to discredit the institutions of parliament, will discredit themselves more than anyone else. It is impossible to deprecate too strongly the kind of suggestion which has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite. They have not preferred a single specific charge of any kind. If they have preferred such a charge I should like them to get up and repeat it.

An hon. MEMBER: And risk their seats.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is not a member of this house—neither the leader of the opposition, the mover of the amendment, the seconder of the amendment, nor the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group—who has had the courage to stand up in this house and say that he has a specific charge to make against any member of the government or of this house or against any one of those who have been carrying on the public business of this country. I say that, until a specific charge is made, the duty of this parliament is to go on with its regular work and not permit itself to be diverted from the business of the country by shadows which are the creation of minds too full of darkness to bring forth the truth they talk so much about.

What is the kind of language which we have been obliged to listen to this afternoon? Let me refer to what we heard from the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) who seconded the amendment. He talked about an octopus—about some general feeling throughout Canada that somewhere or other there was an octopus whose long, hidden, treacherous tentacles were clandestinely getting a grip on the whole country. I wonder if that is patriotic language? I wonder if that is language calculated to create pride and esteem in the breasts of young Canadians, who he says need good examples in all these matters. The effort to besmirch parliament and to dishonour the names of men in public life is to my mind the most contemptible of all possible actions. I say that hon. members who have nothing specific in the way of charges to bring before this house had better remain silent when it comes to seeking to discredit others thereby maligning the institution of which they themselves happen to be members.

My hon. friend who moved this amendment said that when I spoke previously with regard to the subject matter of electoral corruption I read a prepared statement. He emphasized two or three times that the statement was a prepared one. It was prepared, and designedly so, and for the reason that I am going to give my hon. friend. Had I made a statement of my own my hon. friend might have been the first to say, "We are listening to the Prime Minister making his own statement on this matter. We know that he is concerned in these matters, and we therefore ask you to take his statement with a grain of salt." I requested the clerk of this house to give me a statement as to the procedure which the parliament of Canada, and in particular the House of Commons, should adopt with respect to any charges of electoral corruption, a statement that I might read to all hon. members, setting forth the position beyond possibility of contradiction or controversy. I then read to this house what the laws of this country, the laws of this parliament, have set forth as the method of dealing with questions of this kind, and referred to the rules and regulations of the House of Commons in dealing with such matters.

This is not the first time in the history of Canada that vague and general charges of electoral corruption have been made. They have been made ever since there has been a parliament, and they will continue to be made as long as we have men who are prepared to besmirch the institutions with which they are associated. In order to protect honourable men who wish to keep themselves free from that kind of thing, parliament has enacted laws to protect its members. They are a part of the laws of the country to-day. They prescribe the methods which must be followed in dealing with questions of this kind. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) says he does not care anything about laws; he is not interested in them. Well, we are. There are far too many people in this country to-day who are asserting the very doctrine which my hon. friend has asserted, that they do not care anything about laws, that they are not going to be governed by laws. It is just that kind of thing that this government is going to stop, if we can possibly do it, and regain in our country a proper respect for law. The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), who spoke a few moments ago, properly pointed out that those who adopt this tone have not only forgotten respect for law but have forgotten respect for fair and honourable methods of procedure, to an extent which a few years ago would not have been countenanced for one minute. Never before in the history of Canada, until it was done by the party to which my hon. friend who moved this resolution belongs, did any party come forward and openly offer to pay five, ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five dollars a month to those whose support it sought; nothing of that kind ever occurred before in the history of this dominion. And if we are gradually slipping down to a point where we are beginning to talk about corruption from one end of Canada to the other, and an octopus which has its tentacles all over this country, it is due to that very corrupting of the electorate in a manner and to a degree such as this country has never known heretofore.

Let me say to my hon. friends that if the laws are not adequate to deal with the question of corruption in electoral campaigns or of corruption in any other place, or way, or form, if there are hon. members who can bring forward suggestions which will make our laws better than they are, the present administration will be only too willing to work with them to the full to give such suggestions, if they are at all workable, a place on our statutes. We are only too anxious to see that our electoral laws are made as effective as possible to prevent anything in the nature of corruption. The government intends, in pursuance of its promise at the last session, to deal with the franchise and with the electoral laws again this year, so there will be an opportunity for all hon. members to come forward with any suggestions which they may have, any concrete, practical proposals which they may care to make. The government will be glad to consider any such proposals. I here and now invite hon. members, instead of wasting their time in doing what they can to defame the institution of parliament and democratic government in this country, to come along with practical suggestions whereby we can prevent in the future anything of the kind which they to-day are imagining has taken place in the past, or which actually may have taken place in the past.

What then is the method of proceeding with matters of this kind? It is well known. If anyone has a charge to make, let him make it as a specific charge, not in the form of a general allegation. What does the amendment say?

> This house is of the opinion that charges of levies in connection with Canadian National Railways contracts as well as statements concerning electoral corruption should be referred to a select committee of this house—

Since when have we begun to refer statements on different matters to special committees of this house? We would have time for nothing else were we to start that sort of thing. The hon. gentleman refers to charges of levies in connection with the Canadian National Railways. Where and by whom have the charges been made? Did the leader of the opposition make a charge? Not a bit of it. He made a general statement. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggests that the position of the leader of the opposition is one of exceptional significance and importance in this house. It is, and for that very reason my right hon. friend should have been the first to see that no general allegations fell from his lips, but that a specific statement was made in the nature of a charge if he wished to have the subject investigated. May I say to the right hon. gentleman and to every member of this house here and now that if he or any hon. member will make a specific charge with respect to corruption and will say that he has reasonable ground for believing that he can bring forward evidence to substantiate that charge, this government will give him a committee immediately to have the charge investigated. I say that not only to the leader of the opposition but to every member of this house; and further, I say that until hon. members are prepared to make specific charges they should cease to make allegations which they are not brave enough to back up or have not sufficient knowledge to substantiate in any shape or form.

We are not here as a government to fight shadows. My hon. friend says, "Let us remove these shadows on the horizon; let us remove the shadow which overclouds this house." I say, give us something of substance and we will have it investigated; but we will not spend our time fighting shadows conjured up by hon. gentlemen opposite.

And now may I mention one other matter—probably it was an oversight on the part of the hon. member for Peace River. There are certain customs which are well understood with respect to the conduct of business in this house, customs which enable debate to proceed with more in the way of information than would otherwise be possible for those participating. One of these customs is that where an amendment is to be moved on going into supply the administration should be given some notice of it, so that at least there may be an opportunity, when the house is considering the question, to have citations and references specifically quoted, that statements made in the course of debate may be substantiated. The hon. member has moved this amendment without saying a word to the government in advance about his intentions in the matter. I happened to hear a rumour that the leader of the opposition had been talking last night in the corridor with the hon. member who seconded the amendment, and they were heard to say that the hon. member for Peace River would bring something forward to-day Knowing pretty well what that something might be, I assumed that this was the kind of motion we were likely to have from him. In the few hurried moments at my disposal I sought to recall incidents in this house in previous years when the Conservative party, while in opposition, and usually beginning at the third session of parliament, started something in the nature of scandal. I therefore looked up Hansard to find out what took place during one of the sessions when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was prime minister and I found in the third session of the tenth parliament the record of exactly the same sort of thing that we have at the present moment. Everything was brought forward in much the same way. The stage was set in the first instance by having someone come along with a general charge, a general statement alleging among other things graft on the part of some ministers of the crown. That is the kind of thing that is meant by levies on the Canadian National Railways—talk of graft. At that time the very same comment was made that fell from the lips of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) the other evening—that the hon. gentleman making the general statement had said either too much or too little—and the then member for Labelle, who was sensitive in these matters of political honour, moved in this house one day that either what had been said should be put in the form of a substantial charge or that the words should be withdrawn. I had expected that this would be the form of motion that we should have had from my hon. friend to-day, namely, that either a substantial charge should be made or that the words should be withdrawn. But he has not put his motion in that form. He has gone a step farther, and as if a charge had already been made has asked that a committee be appointed immediately to investigate the matter.

Let me draw my hon. friend's attention to what was said on the occasion to which I have referred. I am not going to mention the names of those who participated, those who at the time had to do with general charges. I do not think it reflected credit upon them then, and now that they are gone I do not wish to discredit their names further. The statement was made by one hon. member that he was going to discuss certain things including graft. Then the hon. member stated further, pretty much as the leader of the opposition has done on this occasion, that he had "data" and "material" at his disposal with respect to charges. The motion that was presented to the chair by the then member for Labelle was:

> That such a statement, undefined as it is, with regard to the parties concerned, reflects on the honour of the house and of the government;
>
> That the hon. member be therefore invited, either to name the ministers and members of the house to whom he was referring—
>
> On such-and-such a date.
>
> —and to specify his charges against them, or to withdraw his accusation.
>
> That unless the hon. member complies with that request and adopts one of these two courses, he stands censured by this house.

The matter had been pretty fully discussed on a previous occasion and His Honour the Speaker was obliged, because of the previous discussion, to rule that it could not be discussed again and for that reason the Speaker ruled the motion out of order, and was sustained in his ruling when it was challenged. But the purpose of the motion was to clear the record as quickly as possible of any imputation in the one way in which parliament where a specific charge is made has always dealt with such matters.

I wish now to read to the house what Sir Wilfrid Laurier, speaking in this house with respect to that motion, had to say about the method to be adopted in dealing with general questions of political corruption, graft and the like.

Mr. BENNETT: What date was that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: April 3, 1907. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> If the object of the hon. member for Labelle is to clear the atmosphere of the house, there are cases and cases showing how this is to be done. The house has affirmed, and it is also the rule of the house which has come to us from the mother of parliaments, that the conduct or standing of any member of this house cannot be impugned except upon cause being shown and until a member rises in his place in the house and says: I have reason to believe and I can prove such and such a thing against a member. Otherwise there is no occasion to go into this general inquisition which is proposed by the hon. member for Labelle. If, at a later period, the hon. member for Labelle or anybody else thinks there is in this house any member who ought not to be a member of it, who has disgraced himself, or whose conduct ought to be investigated, it is open to him to demand such an investigation, but the house, I hope, will not depart from the sound traditions which have come to us from England and according to which there could be no inquisition into any man's conduct or standing except on charges made specifically. If, unfortunately, there are members of this house who are not fit to be associated with gentlemen, who are not fit to be members of this house, whose conduct ought to be investigated, it must be the painful duty of the house to make such an investigation—

There is a noticeable difference here from the language used by the hon. member in proposing the motion, also from the words used by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). The hon. member said that it was a pleasure to him to introduce the amendment—not a painful duty, but a pleasure. Well, it is a poor form of pleasure.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, as a matter of privilege, I did not state that it was a pleasure for me to introduce the resolution. I did not introduce the resolution; I had nothing to do with the form of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But my hon. friend said he had pleasure in supporting it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, I had pleasure in supporting it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I should have thought it would be a painful duty, not a pleasure.

Mr. PELLETIER: I simply wish to say the expression is unfortunate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To continue with Sir Wilfrid Laurier's remarks:

—but only under the safeguard which has been provided by the house. I think the common sense of the house will not allow a departure from what is a well known law of parliament, or from the rules which would be applied in England, if cases of this kind were to arise, and therefore it seems to me that we have only to maintain the traditions and rules of the house and of parliamentary government. If there are cases which arise and which call for the application of disciplinary measures, I am sure, from experience that we have had not very far back, the house will be equal to the occasion every time.

Now that has been the practice which has been followed in dealing with matters of this kind at all times, as the older members of the house well know, in this parliament from confederation to the present time. It is the practice which is followed at Westminster to-day. It is, moreover, the practice to which the present administration is going to adhere. And may I say that there is a very special reason, a new reason, a strong reason, why to-day it is all-important that we should follow this practice. That reason is this, that there is, I regret to say, an effort in our country coming from two directions, supposed to be opposed to each other but having much in common—

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Miss MACPHAIL: The Liberal and Conservative parties.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, not the Liberal and Conservative parties, but the communist and fascist parties, each of which desires to do away with the parliamentary system of political parties having free discussion on the floor of parliament and to substitute for it dictatorship. And the method which they are adopting to bring this about is to besmirch as much as they can the institution of parliament, and the names of men in public life, to make general charges, insinuations, allegations and the like, with a view to creating from end to end of the country the impression that democratic institutions have failed and that they with their dictatorships should take their place. I say, Mr. Speaker, that we are not going to lend ourselves to anything of that kind. We in this house, we on this side of the house at all events, intend to stand by parliamentary institutions, parliamentary methods of government, parliamentary procedure, to do all that we can to defend democracy and to save our parliamentary system from being defamed by those who are unworthy of having any association with it.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it shows to what low level debate may descend when the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) will stand in the chamber of which he is supposed to be the leader and repeat a conversation alleged to have taken place between two members in the corridor. Nothing could more clearly illustrate the depth to which we have fallen in this chamber.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was giving the house the only notice I had.

Mr. BENNETT: Last evening when the house rose I had a conversation with the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and I am going to repeat it in order that there may be no misunderstanding. I pointed out to him that it was not sound parliamentary practice to attack the judiciary; I told him the motion he was making with respect to remission of sentences was an unsound method of approaching the problem, and I suggested that if he desired to throw the weight of his entire parliamentary body to the support of his position a petition should be prepared, signed by them all and sent to the proper quarters. I did more than that; I pointed out to him that it was a private prosecution, not one by the attorney general of Alberta, who declined to make it, and I left it at that. And he said, "I intend to come back to it, and if I have to speak to you I hope you will have no objection to my asking you about it, in the light of your experience." As far as my memory serves me, even the words "in connection with this matter" were not mentioned. Am I right as to that?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, I bear testimony that that is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not even mentioned. Now we are told in the house that the Prime Minister had notice that some discussion of this kind was to take place this afternoon because someone eavesdropping heard something which did not occur. Then he talks about besmirching the honour of parliament and about shadows! Well, the shadow was falling, it is true; the lights were going out at that time, and possibly that is the shadow he had in mind. That is the first matter to which I direct attention.

If there has been a besmirching of the honour of parliament and if the reputation of parliament has been lowered in the public mind it had its origin, as everyone knows, in the Beauharnois scandal. There is no one in this country who does not know that. The man on the street knows, the young man and the young woman on the street know that this power company contributed a million dollars to the Liberal campaign fund in 1930.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not true.

Mr. BENNETT: That was found as a matter of record.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is absolutely untrue.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman should know—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my right hon. friend wants to debate scandals we will talk about the Pacific scandal and a few others.

Mr. BENNETT: We will not talk about the Pacific scandal; we will talk about something that happened in our day and of which the right hon. gentleman says he has knowledge. He says it is not true. His Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) was one of the members of that committee who signed the report.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. BENNETT: He agreed to the report. He made certain exceptions after the report came out.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend will find that Mr. Gordon moved the adoption of the report and I demurred.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a correct statement. Mr. Gordon pointed out that in the committee the hon. gentleman had not demurred. Of course it is obvious he would have to demur in view of the attitude taken by his party. Everyone knows that in that incident we have the origin of the present attitude of the public towards this House of Commons. I did point out that the treasurer of the Liberal party was one who received $200,000 from Beauharnois, and I read that the other day in the house.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What about Mr. Aird?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I read the other day; that is the record. And I pointed out that it is not sound practice that one should occupy a position where he has to vote on matters affecting, for instance, the export of power under a private act, and be at the same time the treasurer of the Liberal party. That is what I said, and I repeat it now. Let there be no misunderstanding with respect to that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my right hon. friend that the gentleman he refers to is not the treasurer of the Liberal party.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, he was a few months ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, he has not been at all. The Liberal party has a committee which handles its finances; no single individual is the treasurer of it.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat that it was given out at a meeting which took place in this city before the election of 1935, and at which Mr. Massey was present, that the Hon. Donat Raymond was treasurer of the Liberal party. That statement I am now told is untrue. But he appeared as such, not long since.

I went further; I pointed out that a member of the senate, who was head of the federal Liberal organization, was not the man who should be in a position of having to vote upon matters, when he was responsible in part for the collection of campaign funds.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He is not.

Mr. BENNETT: He in part was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He is not.

Mr. BENNETT: And does it, as he will tell my right hon. friend if he asks him—and has done it; that is more of it. Let there be no misunderstanding about the matter. He has done it. We have two members of parliament in the senate occupying the positions I mentioned, coupled with the fact, as was stated a few days ago, that these two gentlemen met the cabinet to discuss the physical organization of the Liberal party. I said that, also, was a bad principle.

I say again that if there was anything that originated the present attitude of mind of the public towards parliament, or towards this House of Commons, we find it of course in the Beauharnois scandal, and everyone in Canada is aware of this. Out of that there has grown up the impression, which may or may not be sound—I pointed out that it is an impression—that campaign funds are often gathered in large sums from large power and other projects.

In Ontario to-day a campaign is being carried on with respect to funds which are supposed to have originated from this same Beauharnois, in connection with the local election, in which Mr. Bethune Smith was treasurer of the Liberal party and connected with the power interests as well. The so-called Pacific scandal which my right hon. friend mentioned a minute ago was in connection with a few sums of $20,000 or $25,000. In the case of the Beauharnois scandal we have $200,000 at a lick, collected by Senator Raymond from the Beauharnois interests.

I said the other day, and I desire to make it clear to-day, that I have nothing to withdraw. I made no statement with respect to any member of this chamber. I was very careful not to make any statement with respect to any member in this chamber. For whatever my weaknesses, I at least know that if one were going to deal with that, he would deal with it as Israel Tarte dealt with it, and as others have done; he would stand in his place and make the statement with respect to the hon. member of the house in question.

I did not refer to any hon. member. I was interrupted when I was making my statement with respect to corruption and I say here again that the country is being destroyed by electoral corruption. I was talking not of federal elections alone. I was talking also about provincial elections. I was talking from investigations which I myself have made, which have no reference to this house or parliament. I was talking about conditions which have grown up by which large sums of money have been gathered together by making levies upon those who receive positions, upon those who have contracts, and upon others, which debauch the national life of Canada. I made no reference to any hon. member of the house. I believe it will be found that I have as high regard for the Commons House of Parliament as any man in it. I at least can face responsibility for anything connected with Beauharnois—I had at least the common sense to say, "Not one dollar; I would rather be defeated than take a cent of it."

Let us go a step further. I can readily understand that a new member of the house —and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) is a new member—would deal with the question as though it were a matter affecting this chamber, rather than one affecting the method by which campaign funds are gathered together. This afternoon the hon. member for Lethbridge referred to the returns made on expenditures in elections. I have taken the trouble to look to some extent into returns made by members of the house. I have tried to find out what it cost them to run their elections. Is there a man within sound of my voice who will say that this in any sense indicates the money that was spent in his constituency?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman challenges me, as a member of the house, to speak. So far as I am concerned, to the best of my knowledge my returns indicate the amounts spent in my constituency.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, and I thank the hon. member for directing my attention to that fact. I was speaking about expenditures of which he would have no knowledge, made in ways over which he would have no control. The whole problem is how to deal with that matter.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: I have given some little attention to that problem, and have considered how it might be dealt with. In England and in Australia they have seen fit to put limitations upon amounts which might be expended. In Australia, where they had much the same conditions as we have talked about this afternoon, they also impose compulsory voting, so as to lessen improper expenditure.

I know, too, our statute provides that if a member who has not made returns takes his seat in the house, he is liable to a penalty of $500 a day. There is at least one hon. member who has sat here and who has voted, but who, according to the report of the returning officer, has made no return. What are we going to do about a situation of that kind? Well, somebody would have to bring action against him, and thereby incur the odium of bringing such action. Can we not deal with it in some other way?

When the elections act comes before the house for consideration I propose to offer certain observations and to make certain suggestions with respect to amendments, by which we may endeavour to cure the conditions to which I have referred, for it is a canker eating at the very life of the country. We all know that England went through that period. Hon. members will recall that history credits Walpole with saying that every man had his price. Hon. members will recall how the matter was dealt with. It was a long time, in England, before they attained to that excellence in the conduct of elections which now prevails in that country. Has anyone who has any interest in the expenditure of public moneys taken the trouble to ascertain where the money came from which was provided in the recent by-elections? Where did it come from? Did it come off the trees? Did it come out of the air? Who put it up, and why?

These are questions which come up periodically. It was to a matter of that kind to which I was directing attention the other day when the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) interrupted me and stated that he had to do with a number of contracts for the Canadian National Railways, and stated that he knew nothing of this. Well, I did not suggest that he did. He suggests that he had no knowledge of it. Well, will my worst critic say or suggest that I said he had? What I did say, in answer to his statement, was that I was prepared to show that levies were being made on contractors—and that is an entirely different matter. It has not to do with the honour of the house. It has not to do with the respectability of individuals, unless you bring home to them the knowledge of it.

I have no reason for suggesting that the Minister of Transport had any knowledge of such a condition, and I have not said that he had such knowledge. An effort has been made to make it appear that what I said was that individuals were responsible for this. That is not what I said, nor was it inferred. What I did say was that those who were in charge of the raising of campaign funds were getting funds in that way. We do not have to leave this city, apparently, to find it out. I am sure there is not within sound of my voice a member who, if he takes the trouble to inquire, will not find that those who sell goods or have contracts are being asked for contributions. I said the other day that I am not hypocrite enough for a single minute to deny that contributions are made to the campaign funds of political parties. Of course they are, and we all know they are. What is more, this is done very often with the best of motives.

Sir Joseph Flavelle has said that he had contributed to political parties from his youth. When he earned his first dollar his mother suggested that part of it should go to the church and part to his party. He said that the Right Hon. Mackenzie King was assisted by his contributions when he was running in Waterloo. He made that clear in the public statement he made the other day when addressing the shareholders of the Canadian Bank of Commerce. He said, "Although I think I am a Tory"—I do not know whether he used the word "Tory"—"I did that."

I happen to know that one of the leading contributors to the Liberal party, now no more, said that he believed it was quite proper that rich men should make contributions in order to enable those who were not of their political faith to be able to live in the communities decently and maintain their positions. As a matter of fact that gentleman was one of the contributors to the Asquith fund. What is more, if the right hon. gentleman would only take the trouble to think for a moment he would realize that there are presents and gifts made to men who are not regarded as being in favourable financial circumstances to enable them to maintain their position. Hon. members know that quite often purses are presented to public men. Personally I think that is wrong, but it is done. Reference was made to that on one occasion in the house.

That is the point I was endeavouring to make the other day. I repeat it and I withdraw no word of what I said. It must follow that there are hon. members who know just as well as I that their friends are making contributions to political campaign funds. I was making clear the difference which exists between the contribution that a man makes and an enforced contribution, which I said was a levy. If I say to a contractor, "You have to pay ten per cent, or even one per cent," I am putting him in a position which I think is manifestly unfair. For instance, if you have men who do business with the departments and who are entitled to sums of money, whether for rebates or for refunds of overpaid customs duties or otherwise, it is neither right nor proper that they should be approached with the suggestion that they should contribute part of that money to a campaign fund.

I mentioned these things the other day and if the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) had not interrupted as he did, on the assumption that there was some reflection upon him, which in a moment he knew was not so, this statement would not have been made. But it is a statement that stands; that is all. If the government desire to have the statement investigated, let them do so. But I do not think it comes with very good grace, after the record in connection with Beauharnois, for the Prime Minister of this country to rise in his place in the house and talk as he did this afternoon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I rise to a point of order. I should like to know at once whether my right hon. friend is reflecting in any way, directly or indirectly, upon my integrity.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know whether it is called integrity. The right hon. gentleman was the Prime Minister of this country when that episode took place. The record speaks for itself; let there be no misunderstanding about that.

Mr. MARTIN: Shame.

Mr. BENNETT: You may call "shame" as much as you like, but the fact is that you are the man who should be shamed because your leader took you into the valley of humiliation.

Mr. MARTIN: I am proud of it.

Mr. BENNETT: I would expect the hon. gentleman to be proud of going into the valley of humiliation.

Mr. BRADETTE: How about buying out the Conservative party?

Mr. BENNETT: Let there be no misunderstanding. The records are there and we can send and get them. I say it ill becomes the Prime Minister of this country to make the observations he has made to-day. I did not reflect upon the honour of any member of the house and let him stand in his place who says I did.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say you did.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the right hon. Prime Minister say that I reflected upon the honour of a member of the house? What member?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Every member.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad the right hon. gentleman is so universal in his observation because he denies the effect of universal observations. Is it a reflection upon the honour of every member of the house that I direct attention to one of the crying evils of our day? Is it a reflection upon the honour of every member of the house that I point out that corruption is a canker which is eating the very life of this country, just as it is in the case of other countries? Do I offer an apology when the right hon. gentleman says that I reflected upon the honour of every member of the house? The singular thing is that he is the only one who seems to think so.

Mr. MARTIN: We all do.

Mr. BENNETT: How delightful.

Mr. MARTIN: Shameful.

Mr. BENNETT: I repeat—and I want there to be no misunderstanding about it—that no one word of what I said the other day do I withdraw or apologize for. It was a statement of solemn truth known to many people. But I did not reflect upon the conduct of any member of the house. When I have occasion to do so, I shall do so in terms which will lead to no misunderstanding.

It is also erroneous on the part of the Prime Minister to say that the only methods of dealing with these matters are those indicated in the speech which he made the other day. He referred to the Controverted Elections Act and other methods, but has he forgotten the West Huron election? Has he forgotten the inquiry with respect to the Brockville election? Does he not remember that the committee on privileges and elections dealt with the matter of ballots on different weights of paper being substituted for correctly initialled and prepared ballots? That is the evidence which was established, not in the courts but in a commitee of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly.

Mr. BENNETT: These matters were brought up in the house with respect to the conduct of that election and with respect to charges of graft similar to those to which he is now referring, having taken place in 1907. I wonder if he has read the subsequent proceedings that took place in connection with many of the matters which were mentioned? It is not for me to traverse at this time that long record. There are men from western Canada who know what happened. What is more, there are people who were made bankrupt and ruined financially because of the outcome of those very transactions. All this is known. Every time I hear people talk about irrigation in western Canada I realize, as most men do, what happened in that connection.

I wonder why it is that we are unwilling to spend a little time in going over the political history of our country. Many members of the house know—I do not say all of them—that they are assisted in the conduct of their elections from some central fund. More than that, they know that that fund is collected by somebody before the election takes place. I remember one of the leading ministers on the Liberal side saying to me in a personal conversation that the difficulty about holding an election at that particular time was the fact that they had no money. Those who take the time to read the speech of the Prime Minister in connection with the Beauharnois scandal and the valley of humiliation will understand fully what I mean. He pointed out the difficulty in the conduct of parties and elections and organizations without money.

Those are the facts to which I was directing and to which I still direct attention. If these matters affected this house alone, the problem would be simpler, but I was also dealing with provincial matters over which this house would have no jurisdiction. That is the reason why I did not endeavour in any sense to specify particular transactions to which reference could be made. Those are matters with which the provinces themselves must deal. This house will have before it the elections act and I trust that an endeavour will be made so to safeguard the sanctity of the franchise as not to allow corrupt forces and influences to prevent the free and untrammelled will of the people from being expressed at the polls. That is the purpose which I had in mind when I directed attention to the matter.

I am not greatly concerned, at my age, about many things. I have seen, I have known, I have encountered the accumulated money of my opponents to defeat me, and what is more I have seen it used on a tremendous scale with respect to one matter only that I shall mention, and that was when Alberta was not allowed to have its own natural resources. All one has to do is to look at the records of those days and one has a very clear appreciation of the situation. I speak whereof I know with respect to these matters, and I say the time has come when we must endeavour to the best of our ability to provide ways and means that will at least do something to curb these scandalous practices.

The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) complained very bitterly because one of the members of this chamber said that corruption was like an octopus. The right hon. gentleman said that it was a bad thing for the people of this country to have to listen to the idea that the money power was thus powerful. Well, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister himself said that the struggle of this parliament must be a struggle against the money power. Those are not my words; they are his. That is not my statement; it is his. He said this parliament must grapple and fight with the money power. And so, when a member says that corruption is an octopus which fastens its tentacles upon the body politic and destroys it, the simple question is, is it true? That is the issue.

There is one thing more. The right hon. gentleman spoke of the dangers that threaten the body politic from communism, on the one hand, and from fascism on the other. My recollection is that he found the chief fascist in the world, Herr Hitler, a most entertaining person and a man who is doing great work.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: That is all right.

Mr. BRADETTE: It is all wrong.

Mr. BENNETT: You cannot have it both ways. You cannot have it, as a distinguished guest, that he is a very great man, and at the same time try to arouse the fears of the public with respect to him. After all, it was not necessary for the right hon. gentleman to travel all the way to Germany to see what he regards as a dictator because I recall that during the election in 1935 he pointed to me sitting opposite as a combination of Hitler and Mussolini.

An hon. MEMBER: Stalin too.

Mr. BENNETT: I guess they had him in it, too. So it should not have been necessary after the election to ascertain where fascism might be found. Then when we speak of dictatorships—

Miss MACPHAIL: A little louder.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say that the voice of the dictator in the land is becoming louder every day, and I think there will be no difficulty in hearing it if the hon. member listens with care.

It is very difficult to deal with some problems by order in council, but it is easy by order in council to destroy a wheat board, for instance. Just pass an order in council, and the wheat board is gone; you have destroyed an act of parliament. Imagine if that had been done by those who now sit to the left of the Speaker! What would we not have heard? It is easy, of course, to enter into discussions in secret, as they have a perfect right to do, without enlightening the great mass of the public with respect to questions which affect our trade and commerce, but if that had been done by those who went before, what a manifestation that would have been of fascism and dictatorship! Yes, it makes a lot of difference where we sit, and the right hon. gentleman who sits to the right of the Speaker to-day as Prime Minister finds the situation entirely different from what he did when he sat to the left. Then everything was wrong; everything was black; everything that was done by those in office in those strenuous days merited only criticism, abuse and vilification. But now, clothed with power, sitting in the seats of the mighty, hon. gentlemen on the government side by a stroke of the pen pass an order in council that destroys the wheat board—and all is well in Israel! We took other steps, to which reference will be made as the session proceeds, to accomplish similar ends. But now, because attention is directed to one thing that does merit the condemnation of every thoughtful Canadian, young or old, rich or poor, you are besmirching the honour of the house—when no reference was made to any member of this house! Reference was made to a member of the other chamber but that had nothing to do with this particular chamber.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that while this motion is not in my judgment the correct method by which to approach the problem which the member for Peace River desires to deal with, nevertheless the methods indicated by the Prime Minister the other day with respect to controverted elections and matters of that sort do not exhaust the powers of this house to deal with the problem, and when the electoral law is up for revision, as it will be, we can at least expect that the Prime Minister and his government will, with every member of the house, see to it that every possible provision is made to prevent these evils from continuing in Canada. The experience of other countries cries aloud to us.

There is no question of shadows. I was not dealing with shadows; I was dealing with realities, and very real things too. I was dealing with actualities, and, as I said the other day, instances could be multiplied if one so desired. But that has to do with something which is outside this chamber. It has to do with an individual and the methods he pursues in doing certain things. No one complains that he, as leading member of an organization committee, should do certain things. But the methods pursued we have a right to criticize, and we do; everything that I said on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I repeat, and I say that if the government take any offence at what I have said they have it within their power to adopt that resolution and deal with it.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I repeat to you what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) said the other day, after listening to all the words of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett): he still either said too much or too little. One's mind goes back, as I am sure yours will, Mr. Speaker, to previous occasions during the third session of a parliament when the Conservative party has been in opposition. Particularly my mind goes back to the session of 1926, because of a curious coincidence. The tool of the Conservative party on that occasion with respect to charges was the member for Peace River —a somewhat tragic figure, as time developed.

Mr. PELLETIER: Mr. Speaker, I—

Mr. DUNNING: I would remind hon. members of the house that they may read—

Mr. PELLETIER: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, I cannot possibly sit in my place and be called a tool. I object to that remark and I want it withdrawn.

Mr. DUNNING: I was referring to a peculiar coincidence.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman cannot call any hon. member a tool. I rise to a point of order. The minister cannot call any member of the house the tool of anybody.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not call any member of the house a tool of the Conservative party.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister said that the member was the tool of the Conservative party.

Mr. DUNNING: I said that the then member for Peace River was—

Mr. BENNETT: No, you said this member.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DUNNING: The record will speak for itself.

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. gentleman did say that it was a coincidence, did he not?

Mr. DUNNING: Well, Mr. Speaker, may I go on?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw first.

An hon. MEMBER: There is nothing to withdraw.

Mr. POOLE: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman did say that the hon. member was a tool of the Conservative party.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

An hon. MEMBER: He did not.

Mr. POOLE: He did say so.

An hon. MEMBER: How does the hon. member know?

Mr. POOLE: Was I not listening?

Mr. SPEAKER: There is nothing to withdraw.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, it is astonishing to me, in endeavouring to be reasonably pleasant in the house, that hon. members in the opposite corner, whose language is so generally condemnatory of the rest of us, should take offence at a reference to a gentleman who is not now a member of the house. It is curious, however, a coincidence which will appeal to anyone who reads Hansard of the session of 1926, the coincidence between the action of the Conservative party on that occasion and the action taken at this time by the present hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier). It is a coincidence, I say, that it should be so. Perhaps coming events cast their shadows before.

Now with regard to the resolution before the house, where are we? It is, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) indicated, a plain want of confidence motion, designed to force the government's supporters to vote against the amendment. There is no other course for them to follow unless they are prepared to vote the government out of office, and so they can be represented—all of us can be represented, and will be represented —as favouring corruption in this country, and as voting down an investigation into what? Charges? No. Charges are mentioned in the amendment; but in the hon. member's own speech, in the speech of his seconder, in the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North, they all indicated that no charges had been made.

Mr. HEAPS: I never spoke.

Mr. DUNNING: I mean the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I beg my hon. friend's pardon. They all indicated what we all know to be the truth, that no such thing as a charge was laid. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) indicated the truth when he said that a black shadow had been cast—cast deliberately for political purposes by the leader of the Conservative party in order to endeavour to rehabilitate the fortunes of his own party, in the manner in which the same effort has been made before, by throwing mud at everybody who is trying to administer the affairs of this country.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I do not intend to put up with that sort of thing here. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has contravened the rules of the house in two respects: first, by the use of the word "deliberately"; second, by attributing a motive to a member of this chamber. The rule with respect to that was read the other day. He may not do so. If he does so he contravenes the rules of the house.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, I am not conscious of breaking the rules.

Mr. BENNETT: Consciousness is not the point. The hon. member did it.

Mr. DUNNING: If I have broken the rules, I shall withdraw any statement which had that effect in your opinion, sir.

Mr. BENNETT: Well then, we shall have a ruling on the question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: If that is so, Mr. Speaker, I assume we shall have a ruling.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has risen in his place. On the point of order raised, he said that he will withdraw anything that is out of order in your opinion. Your Honour is the custodian of the rules of the house, and therefore I take it that you will make a decision, whatever that decision may be.

Mr. SPEAKER: What words does the right hon. gentleman take objection to?

Mr. BENNETT: I object to the use of the word "deliberately," in the first instance. I object more seriously to attributing a motive; he said it was to "rehabilitate the fallen fortunes of the Conservative party." The rule is that no hon. member may attribute motives to another.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the task would be an impossible one, I withdraw the expression.

Mr. BENNETT: One would expect, Mr. Speaker, that a gentleman occupying the position of Minister of Finance would not accompany his withdrawal from an improper position with an offensive observation respecting the remark which he himself made. The rule is clear. He withdraws or he does not. A conditional withdrawal is beyond the rules. Therefore I take it that one with the experience of the hon. gentleman will make the amende honorable and withdraw his offensive expression.

Mr. DUNNING: I did withdraw, Mr. Speaker. It is true that I labour under a disadvantage. If I want to say anything in the house I usually do it straight out, in plain language. I am not equipped personally for so wrapping it up as to convey an insinuation and an impression and the shadow of a charge but to stay nevertheless within the rules of the house. If I transgressed—well, again, unqualifiedly, I withdraw the statement that this effort was a deliberate attempt to rehabilitate the fortunes of the Conservative party. I withdraw it.

To come back to the point at issue, I say that the leader of the opposition stands just where he did when the Minister of Transport interrupted him. He is one of the most experienced parliamentarians in the house, and he knows that he does not occupy the position of an elder statesman who is free to lecture all the rest of us and the country at large upon the evils of humanity and of political parties, and the weaknesses to which all of us are subject. He is the leader of a political party, the leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition in the house, and therefore his words are far closer in their significance than they would be if as a retired statesman he went out and made speeches—as he would be capable of doing and as he could usefully do—to the people of Canada upon the general political morality of the Canadian people.

We have had to-day an exposition of the question of general political morality, and the right hon. gentleman says that is all he really intended the other day. But he went further—true, in response to an interruption from my colleague, the Minister of Transport, who, I suggest, had a right to think that some of the words used a few moments before by the leader of the opposition might have an application to one of the great departments of state, the minister of which is responsible for the letting of many thousands of contracts. The leader of the opposition used these words: "What is more, I know of levies being made in connection with Canadian National contracts."

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: I hope the right hon. gentleman will believe that I am as anxious to stop any such practice as he can possibly be. There is only one way of following up a statement like that, and that is for him to rise in his place and say, "Mr. Speaker, the contractor I meant was so-and-so, the amount of money was so much," and then we would deal with the charge.

Mr. BENNETT: And be out of order in doing it.

Mr. DUNNING: I assure my right hon. friend that so far as this side of the house is concerned he will have unanimous consent.

With regard to the general question of political morality, as the leader of the opposition has well said, all of us who have had long experience in public affairs know the difficulty of surrounding our elections with adequate safeguards. The Prime Minister was absolutely right when he said that the attack of those who are trying to foist upon the democratic countries of the world the authoritarian system is directed at that weak spot in the democratic armour; and everywhere in every democratic country you will see what we have here—letters from fascist organizations in Canada amplifying and enlarging upon what the leader of the opposition said in the house the other day and demanding all sorts of things in connection therewith, using it as the basis of their literature and their propaganda in favour of an authoritarian state in Canada as a means of getting rid of this sort of thing.

Well, democracy has had its difficulties with regard to public morality in relation to expenditures and all that sort of thing. But it is possible for us to talk about it in the house; it is possible for those who know of wrongdoing to rise in their places and state it; it is possible for this body of men to examine it, and it is possible for this body to punish the offenders. May I point out that in an authoritarian state a man who said what the leader of the opposition said would by now be in another sphere; he would have been "liquidated" or—what is the other word?—"purged". As for my hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Pelletier), what would have happened to him, I shudder to think.

I was interested in the observation of the leader of the opposition that there ought to be some means of regulating contributions for political purposes. But may I illustrate to him out of his own experience how difficult this must be. In the last parliament one of his supporters made the statement that the leader of the opposition contributed three-quarters of a million dollars in order to elect himself and his party. There was nothing wrong with that.

Mr. BENNETT: Only it was not true.

Mr. DUNNING: I think this is the first time my right hon. friend has ever denied the statement.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh no.

Mr. DUNNING: At least publicly. But in any case, perhaps I shall not be rubbing a sore spot too much when I say that it was a lot of money even if it was not three-quarters of a million dollars. And in saying so—

Mr. BENNETT: It did not embarrass me.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course it does not and should not embarrass the right hon. gentleman. But what a commentary it is upon his own exposition of the use of money power in elections! If my right hon. friend was fortunately able to do that because he had the money, I shall tell him a secret. In the same election I went into debt in order to try to get elected, and I did not succeed. This again illustrates the very difficult problem in a democracy of dealing with these matters of campaign funds and the use of money in elections. I do not think there is a country anywhere in the world in which even the claim is made that this problem has been solved and that elections and election expenses are now in a perfect condition. The extremely complex set of laws which they have in the republic to the south, the elaborate publication of campaign funds, sources of campaign funds, collections and so forth, have convinced nobody. There also there are loopholes through which the evil doer may pass and does pass.

What we can do in this parliament is this. As the Prime Minister has indicated, from the last session we have the report of the committee with respect to the election act. The government intends to make definite suggestions to the house with respect to the tightening of control over election practices and over monetary matters in relation to elections. Further than that, the government has already engaged eminent counsel to assist in developing these suggestions to which I have just referred.

There is just one way for us to deal with this matter, and that is never to forget, as we have all this afternoon forgotten, that the honour of this institution of which we are members is more important than any other single thing. If the people of this country lose faith in the integrity of this institution then nothing else is of much use. Do I hear my hon. friend from Dufferin-Simcoe say that the Liberal party would be out if the people lost confidence?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I did not say that; I did not say such a thing.

Mr. DUNNING: Will the hon. member repeat what he did say?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I have no hesitation in repeating it. If democracy were discredited at the present time it would be the Liberal party's fault, with one hundred and seventy members behind the Prime Minister.

Mr. DUNNING: If democracy is discredited at the present time it may be because of some action of the Liberal government which is discreditable.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I did not say that.

Mr. DUNNING: And my right hon. friend or any of his supporters has an opportunity to make a charge, which will be investigated immediately. Second, democracy can be discredited by the spreading of a cloud of suspicion, the careful spreading of poison, which was started by my right hon. friend's speech in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and has been continued steadily ever since. There is scarcely a newspaper in Canada to-day carrying news of proceedings in this house which does not convey, without any propagandist purpose, the idea that there is something corrupt in and about this institution of which we are members. Anyone reading the speeches delivered by the hon. members for Peace River and Lethbridge in cold blood cannot but reach the conclusion that democracy in this country is a corrupt thing.

There is one way for us to advance in the direction in which our people want us to go in these matters, that is to forget so far as in us lies our partisan interests and when the time comes that the election laws of this country are before the house, to concentrate on and cooperate in creating in this country as good and sound machinery as can be created, as good provisions as can be devised to ensure the highest possible standard of public morality. But that course is not rendered easier by the casting of shadows, the projecting of octopuses—or should it be octopi? I trust that after this resolution is defeated we shall not hear all over this country that the Liberal party was afraid of an investigation—

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): You might

Mr. DUNNING: I suppose we might. I suppose that is what we may expect, and that is one of the reasons why we cannot advance in clearing up anything which may be wrong. Two courses are open; one is to make a charge and stand by it; the other is to say: We are dealing with a general condition, affecting every citizen of Canada. When the time comes that we have before us the laws of this land dealing with that condition, let us all unite like men to make those laws what they ought to be.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): It is not my intention to say very much in this debate. I think far too much has been said already. There has been far too much heat shown and far too little reason. I believe that the hon. member who moved this amendment—I did not know anything about it beforehand—moved it in good faith, thinking he was drawing this matter to the attention of the house in the way provided for doing such things. We must remember that the hon. member is comparatively new to the house. This is his third session, and it takes longer than that to become familiar with the rules of procedure and know the ways in which matters requiring to be rectified may be brought to the attention of parliament. But I believe it was with the best of intentions that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) brought this question up.

It was, however, unfortunate, that his seconder, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) covered ground that it was not necessary to traverse at this time. In my opinion he took a wrong course. But that could have been remedied had the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) been wise enough to take a different line in continuing the debate. He should have realized that the hon. member for Peace River did what he did in good faith, and if he did not do it in the right way, the right hon. gentleman should have taken some other method of drawing it to his attention.

The Prime Minister raised the point that the government was not notified. Now, if the amendment had the effect of a motion of want of confidence, that was no new course. I have before me a striking example of the way in which matters of this kind are sometimes brought up. On February 25, 1935, almost three years ago, the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) introduced a motion of want of confidence in the government of that time on their unemployment policy. The late Sir George Perley, who was leading the house, in the course of his reply complained that he did not receive notice of the motion until the hon. member had about half finished his speech. Questions of this kind are sometimes introduced in that way. Why try to raise such a partisan atmosphere in the house? Let me say to every hon. member who is interested in the preservation of democracy, as I am sure most if not all of us are, that the display in the house to-day is a blow to democracy and parliamentary government in this dominion.

Mr. MARTIN: Who started it?

Mr. LAWSON: The Prime Minister.

Mr. MacINNIS: We do not need to go into that. Let us bring this to an end now, and, if there is something that must be examined into and investigated, let us find some better way of doing it. I suggest to the hon. member for Peace River that he now withdraw his amendment and let the matter drop, because we have already had too much discussion of it in the present atmosphere.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the hon. member have leave to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. PELLETIER: Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house let me say—

Mr. SPEAKER: I draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that if he speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. PELLETIER: It is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Go ahead.

Mr. PELLETIER: If the house is still sitting there are three or four things that I should like to mention in connection with the debate that has arisen this afternoon.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think if the hon. member wants to withdraw his motion he has no right to speak further.

Mr. HEAPS: He can close the debate.

Mr. MacINNIS: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think when a member withdraws a motion he is entitled to make some remarks before withdrawing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He can explain his withdrawal.

Mr. DUNNING: In connection with his withdrawal.

Mr. PELLETIER: In connection with the withdrawal of the amendment may I point out that I had no idea that in bringing it in at this time it meant a vote of want of confidence in the government. I did not adopt this procedure with any idea of defeating the government at the present time. If the carrying of this amendment would mean the defeat of the government I cannot take that course. But if the government is willing to appoint the committee, I am quite willing to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh no.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member withdraw his motion?

Mr. PELLETIER: Withdrawn—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: Withdrawn by leave of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I want to say something on another matter.

Motion withdrawn.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

LANGUAGE QUALIFICATION OF PERSONS APPOINTED OR TRANSFERRED

Mr. WILFRID LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) moved the second reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Civil Service Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of the bill is to provide that no person already belonging to the civil service in a province, and unable to speak French, may be transferred, in either a permanent or a temporary capacity, to the province of Quebec. I know that necessities of administration sometimes compel a minister to appoint to positions in the province of Quebec under his department, officials who, while fully competent in other respects, do not speak the language of the majority of people in that province.

From the moment of their arrival in Quebec, such officials necessarily come in contact with the French speaking public, and their inability to speak the language of the people with whom they have to deal sometimes gives rise to annoyances sufficient to create the impression that Quebec is not treated as it should be, and to bring about in the long run the very thing every hon. member wishes to avoid, namely conflicts detrimental to Canadian unity.

Without attaching any blame to any of the departments concerned, which evidently select for such positions the officials at their disposal, I am confident that by amending the act in the manner indicated in the bill it would be possible to create a staff capable of speaking French with ease and fluency. There would thus be opened to our bilingual young men positions which, so far, they have had difficulty in obtaining.

The officials I have in mind, those who speak only English, passed their civil service examinations in an outside province and, on being transferred to Quebec, were not subjected to any further test. I suggest that in such cases further examinations be held, and that officials appointed to positions in Quebec be required to prove their ability to understand the people of that province, and to be understood by them. Not only is this fair, but it would work out to the advantage of the service.

It is principally the officials of the Department of Agriculture sent to Quebec as inspectors of live stock or farm products who find themselves in contact with a population almost entirely composed of people speaking the French language. May I add that outside the civil service mistakes of that kind are also made. Even in the ancient city of Champlain, which is certainly the most French of all cities in America there is an engineer in charge of all national defence undertakings who cannot speak a word of French.

I acknowledge with pleasure the good will shown by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) in connection with the employment of French speaking officials; but to every complaint I have made to him he has replied, through his deputy minister, that he had at his disposal no engineer who could speak French.

I am fully convinced that if the act contained a section compelling every official called upon to serve in Quebec to prove, through examination, his knowledge of the French language, this would be a step towards that unity which is so greatly needed to-day. Moreover it would give to those people in my province who possess the required qualifications an opportunity to obtain these positions. One can scarcely conceive of a French Canadian official unable to make himself understood in English being transferred to Toronto or Kingston. His stay in either place would surely be a short one.

I do not wish to make a lengthy speech; still less do I wish to raise the racial cry. I request simply that my province be placed on the same footing as the other provinces. Firmly convinced of the justice of my cause, I am content to rely upon the broad-mindedness of hon. members for the passage of the bill.

(Translation). Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to provide that no person already belonging to the civil service in a province and unable to speak French may be transferred, in either a permanent or temporary capacity, to the province of Quebec.

I realize that administrative necessities sometimes compel a minister to appoint to positions in Quebec province coming under his department officials who, though highly competent, do not speak the language of the majority of the people of that province. Such officials, from the moment of their arrival in Quebec, necessarily come into contact with the French-speaking public, and their inability to speak the language of most of the people they have to deal with sometimes creates annoyances sufficient to produce the impression that the province is not treated as it should be and to bring about in the end the very thing that every member of this house desires to avoid, that is conflicts detrimental to Canadian unity.

Without attaching any blame to any of the departments concerned, which evidently select for such positions the officials they have at their disposal, I am convinced that by amending the act in the manner indicated in this bill it would be possible to create a staff able to speak French with ease and fluency. There would thus be opened to our bilingual young men positions which so far they have had difficulty in obtaining.

The officials I have in mind and who can speak only English passed their civil service examinations in some other province and naturally were not subjected to any further test on their transfer to positions in Quebec. They are chiefly officials of the Department of Agriculture sent to Quebec province as inspectors of live stock or of farm products and who, since the majority of the population of the province is French, find themselves in contact with a French-speaking public.

There have also been transferred from other provinces to Quebec, as a result of administrative necessities, inspectors of revenue, of customs and of immigration, who could not speak French at all. I may add that similar errors are committed outside the civil service. For instance, in the ancient city of Champlain, certainly the most French of all the cities of America, the engineer in charge of all the works of the Department of National Defence does not speak a word of French. Nevertheless, I acknowledge with pleasure the good will shown by the Minister of National Defence in regard to the employment of French-speaking officials; but to every complaint that I have made to him on that score he has replied through his deputy minister that he had no official able to speak French at his disposal to replace the engineer in question.

I am quite convinced that if the act compelled every official appointed by the Civil Service Commission to fill a position in Quebec province to prove his knowledge of the French language by an examination, it would be a step towards that unity which is greatly needed at present. Moreover, it would give to those of my province who possess the required qualifications an opportunity of obtaining these positions. It would be difficult to imagine the case of a French-Canadian official unable to make himself understood in English being transferred to Toronto or Kingston His stay there would surely be short.

I simply request, Mr. Speaker, that my province be placed on the same footing as the other provinces. Firmly convinced of the justice of my claims, I rely on the broad-mindedness of the members of the house for the passage of this bill.

The traditions which we cherish so dearly should be understood by those who come into contact with us. The fact of having in the province of Quebec federal officials who can make themselves understood by our people would mean a great step towards a truly Canadian ideal.

One of my colleagues pointed out to the house the other day the veneration in which we should hold the monuments of the ancient city of Champlain. He was right. Just as each one of the stones of old Quebec evokes a page of our history, each one of our traditions has contributed to the greatness of this Canada which we all hold so dear. The soul of Quebec is well expressed in the following immortal lines of Victor Hugo:

> Voulez-vous qu'une tour, voulez-vous qu'une église,
> Soient de ces monuments dont l'âme idéalise
> Tout à la fois la forme et la hauteur,
> Attendez que de mousse elles soient revêtues,
> Et laissez travailler à toutes les statutes
> Le temps, ce grand sculpteur.

It is time that has produced the union of the races in this country. Time has allowed us, with the marvellous control lever which is the French language, to preserve our traditions, to retain our Catholic faith and to grow from 60,000 to 3,000,000. Time has permitted us to play, on the banks of the St. Lawrence, on this North American continent, the rôle of last sentinel of French thought and genius. Time has made possible the realization of the dream symbolized by the monument erected to Wolfe and Montcalm in Quebec.

Let it not be forgotten, Mr. Speaker, that no one has contributed more than the French Canadian to the union of the two races which make up the population of this country. I am sure that the English-speaking majority of this house, remembering the constant efforts of our people to understand them better, to speak and even master their language, as the right honourable the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) said so eloquently yesterday in paying tribute to the eminent statesman who directs the Ministry of Justice—I am sure that this majority will render justice to the French element by approving the bill of which I have the honour to move the second reading, seconded by the honourable member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe).

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I think I would fail to discharge properly my duties were I not to express approval of the amendment to the Civil Service Act proposed by the hon. member for Quebec Montmorency (Mr. Lacroix). To my mind the amendment is based on justice and common sense. During the first session of this parliament I made the following statement:

A certain discontent seems to exist in the province of Quebec regarding the number of positions held by French speaking Canadians in the federal service.

In support of that statement I gave certain statistics which may be found on page 2720 of Hansard of 1936. Since I made that statement conditions have not materially changed or improved.

What I am about to say I intend to say in a frank and candid manner. My criticism is not against the government; it is against the actual system and possibly indirectly against those who apply the system. Throughout the province of Quebec there is a feeling that federal civil service positions are not awarded in the correct proportion to French and English speaking Canadians. I am quite prepared to admit that considerable misapprehension exists as to the power and jurisdiction of the commission. I shall even go so far as to say that many people, unfortunately too many, still have the impression that members of the House of Commons or ministers of the government have the final say in recommending and designating who, among several candidates for a civil service position, shall have the appointment. This is not the case. I know that the commission has the first and last say in the matter of making appointments. If that is not the fact I should like someone to tell me.

I should like to cite one instance which occurred in Cap de la Madeleine. About two years ago the civil service commission invited applications by bilingual candidates for the position of caretaker for a post office building which had just been erected. That town has a population of about 10,000, and I doubt if one half of one per cent of the people are English speaking. This caretaker would not have to speak English more than once in ten years in the carrying out of his duties, unless he took the notion once in a while to go down in the basement and address himself to the Scotch anthracite coal pile. It took the commission about a year to realize the true situation, and then new applications were invited. This happened six months ago, but as yet the examination has not been held nor has the date been announced. No doubt it will take another six months to close this matter finally. The result is that it has taken over two years to fill the position of caretaker in a post office. There are many candidates for this position and I may say they are all exasperated at the delay.

Many people throughout the country are dissatisfied with the commission. I know many members of the House of Commons are dissatisfied, and I would not be surprised to hear that some ministers are not totally satisfied. This feeling is regrettable, but it has existed for a number of years. The sooner the system is either changed or improved, the better it will be for all concerned. After all, the commission should not be looked upon as being an absolutely permanent and unchangeable fixture. It should not be considered as a bureaucracy.

Reverting to the dissatisfaction and misapprehension that exist in connection with the work of this commission, I want to say most emphatically that the one factor which has contributed the most to creating this dissatisfaction and misapprehension is the appointment by the commission of persons to certain positions who can hardly speak the language of those with whom they would come in daily contact in the fulfilment of their official duties. That such a state of affairs has existed in the province of Quebec is not to be doubted. These things will happen again unless the law is changed, as suggested by the hon. member for Quebec Montmorency, and it will be to the detriment of those good relations which should exist between French and English populations in this country. I name no one. I have no personal animosity against those who are holding positions in the civil service which they are not fit to hold. My sole and sincere desire is to do away with such unwise, unfit, and I will say, unfair nominations.

The present amendment will serve the purpose in view. Candidates who seek a bilingual position ought to submit to a bilingual examination, and moreover, the bilingual test should be one of the most important items of the examination. I repeat that one who cannot speak the language of those with whom he is bound to act naturally cannot understand their mentality or customs, and he cannot but be a failure and a cause of friction. I venture to say that if there is dissatisfaction and suspicion in the province of Quebec in regard to the civil service commission, it is due to the fact that some people have been appointed to positions who could not satisfactorily fill them because they could not speak the language or understand the mentality of the people with whom they had to deal.

Some may suggest this grudge seems to exist only in Quebec. It may possibly be so, but to those who find it strange or singular that the grudge or dissatisfaction should be limited to that province I would say that they are not acquainted with the facts or aware of what is taking place in Quebec. Those people who so wonder would appreciate the circumstances better if the situation were reversed. Suppose a man from the province of Quebec who could hardly speak English, and knew little about the mentality or customs of the English speaking people of this country, were appointed to a civil service position where he had to deal with people in the city of Toronto, for example, or Calgary or some other English speaking city. I wonder what the people there would say of such an appointment. I am sure they would have reason to be dissatisfied and to have a grudge against the system that permitted such appointments. How long would they stand for it? I do not say that the people of Toronto are not as fair-minded as the people of any other city, and I am sure they would not stand very long for a man holding a civil service position who could not speak the language which is generally spoken in that city.

In the province of Quebec, not all the people—for I do not want to exaggerate—but some people, too many people, in fact, feel that they have generously, and with resignation and self-denial for the sake of peace and harmony, stood for such appointments until their patience is exhausted. This is not a threat; it is rather a warning and a statement of facts. It is a statement of a most unfortunate reality. The proposed amendment to the Civil Service Act will remedy this grievance, and I therefore most heartily support it because I think it will remove one of the causes of unrest in my province.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, with the object which this bill endeavours to accomplish there is not a member of this chamber, I think, not wholly in accord. It is reasonably clear that public officials who transact business with the public should be in a position to communicate with a majority of those whom they serve, or with the minority as well. Hence it is that the civil service commission has provided for bilingual appointments. If the matter has worked out unsatisfactorily, I think we all would regret it, but I believe that the method taken by this measure is not sound. It is the method to which one objects, and not to the principle, and inasmuch as the principle of the measure is the only matter under consideration on the second reading I suggest to the government that this is a proper measure to be submitted to the special committee on the civil service, if such a committee is to be appointed.

I remember distinctly some of the difficulties which the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Lacroix) has mentioned, and it was the aim generally of ministers to provide that candidates for civil service positions in Quebec should have a bilingual knowledge, and in some of the other provinces the advertisements calling for applications distinctly said: "A knowledge of French is essential." That has been the course followed heretofore in this country. If in the working of it out it has not been found entirely satisfactory, this measure would have the effect of limiting rather than expanding the opportunities of those who reside in the province of Quebec for civil service appointments. I think it would restrict, and not enlarge, their opportunities, and for that reason I suggest, the purpose intended being highly commendable, that the measure itself should be referred to a special or standing committee, if there is one that can deal with the matter, in order that it may be determined whether or not the end can be attained without the restrictive provisions of this legislation. This amendment would be very far-reaching, and in my judgment would have a contrary effect to that intended by both hon. gentlemen who have spoken in favour of it. All that would be required, in my judgment, would be that the community to be served is such that the appointment necessitates a knowledge of both languages; for, as one hon. gentleman has said, even though the minority is small, it has a right to be communicated with in the language it understands, and particularly where the large majority of the population is communicated with in only one language, to appoint a person who understands that language imperfectly would be wrong and entirely opposed to the principle underlying the Civil Service Act.

I am far from endeavouring to discuss the details of the amendment, which, I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will at once see, will have the effect of restricting rather than enlarging the opportunities, because they would segregate each province as such, instead of carrying out what has been so long in the minds both of parliament and of the commission, that those who serve communities in which both the English and French languages are used should have knowledge of both these languages to enable them properly and adequately to discharge their duties. There have been many difficulties; I know of them; but I can say I do not believe that at any time there has been a deliberate effort on the part of either the civil service commission on the one hand or ministers on the other to prevent, either directly or indirectly, those who are appointed to the public service from communicating with the community they serve in the language of the majority of that community. If it were so, the sooner it is stopped the better, because it is desirable that the men who occupy these positions should be able to communicate with those who are affected by the service rendered, in either the French or English language, they being the two languages which are officially recognized in this country.

I make these observations from some knowledge and experience with respect to the matter, and with the earnest desire to see the principle for which the hon. gentlemen are contending given effect to, but not, in my judgment, by the legislation now before the house, which in detail, I repeat—and I think the Minister of Justice will, upon examination, agree—effects a restrictive principle, rather than enlarges the opportunities for those who will be served. If it were referred to a committee, the Civil Service Commission, I feel satisfied, would be able to arrive at a solution that would meet the difficulties to which the hon. gentleman has referred and which, in my judgment, should be remedied at the earliest possible date.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I desire to say only a few words on this bill, as evidently, from the remarks made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), and my own, it will be found that both sides of the house are practically in agreement on the principle involved. I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Lacroix) upon the very able way in which he has presented this bill; I would also express my congratulations to the leader of the opposition for the short but illuminative remarks that he has made about the bill.

This question has arisen in the past in many ways, both inside and outside the house, and I might say that there has been an effort to find a solution to the problem, although in practice it evidently has not reached its full expression. May I point out in the first place that already there is in the Civil Service Act a section which to a certain degree touches on this point. Section 32 of the act provides that:

> Every examination under this act shall be held in the English or French language, at the option of the candidate; and notice of every examination shall be published in the English and French languages in the Canada Gazette, and such notice shall state the number of positions that it is expected will be open for appointments, the positions that are then vacant, and in each case the qualifications required for such positions.

It has been the practice in a number of cases in advertising positions to state whether the two languages are required, or whether only one of the languages is necessary. As regards transfers, section 21, subsection 3 of the act provides:

> Except as to appointments to positions in the headquarters of the several departments and other portions of the civil service at Ottawa, the appointments to any local positions in any province shall, so far as practicable, be made from persons having resided in such localities for a period of at least one year immediately preceding the date last fixed for receiving applications for such local positions.

And in the civil service regulations, section 54 further provides:

> In recommending a transfer in which a change of residence is involved, the deputy head of the department in which the vacancy exists must certify that the position in question cannot be filled efficiently by local promotion, or must advance sufficient reasons for his recommendation to satisfy the commission that in this particular instance it is in the best interests of the public service that transfer should supersede promotion.

It will be seen from these quotations that in the Civil Service Act and in the regulations of the commission some attention has already been given to the language question and also reservations have been made to make as much as possible the transfer from one province into another exceptional cases. I might quote also, but it would delay the discussion, passages from the annual report of the civil service commission, 1934, where this commission deals with this matter and points out certain of the things that I myself have indicated this evening. But apparently these precautions have not been sufficient, and the number of cases alluded to by both members who spoke before the leader of the opposition indicate that we have still to contend with conditions whereby it is possible in certain instances to have federal officials deal with a portion of the population whose language they do not speak. I think we all agree that this is undesirable. To that extent, I believe, the house should be unanimous in accepting the principle involved in this bill.

But I have some sympathy with the remarks made by the leader of the opposition as to the exact wording of the sections proposed as amendments. In the first place, I think that although the language question should be primary, it is desirable that the amendments should not be made stringent to a point where they might prevent either the commission or whoever is in charge of the appointment from giving consideration to other qualifications which may be required in exceptional appointments where a scientist or other technical man or a person of special experience may be needed. In the second place I am not sure that by making the province the territorial limit within which this bill is supposed to act, there is not a danger that in certain instances we may arrive at the opposite goal to the one we wish to attain. If this bill were adopted in its present form there is a danger that a strict interpretation of it might, for example, prevent the appointment of a French clerk in certain territorial portions of other provinces where there is a French minority.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the restrictive feature of it to which I referred.

Mr. RINFRET: I must say, though, that as a rule the French people speak both languages and I think the average Frenchman could qualify even under such conditions, but I would not at all wish this bill to appear to have a racial flavour about it. The principle involved in the bill, as I understand it, is just as well intended to preserve the rights of one portion of the population as the other, and to ensure in both cases that any federal employee, whether he is French or English, is in a position to converse in the language of the people with whom he is associated.

I might say that it is the intention of the government to move very soon for a special select committee on civil service matters, and I appreciate the proposal of the leader of the opposition. It was also the intention of the government to suggest that this bill should be referred to such a committee. I believe, though, if we are all agreed on the principle of the bill, that this bill should pass its second reading, be approved by the house, and then stand on the order paper until such time as we may be able to move for its consideration by that special committee.

Mr. LAWSON: Will the minister be good enough to tell me whether there is any definition in the present Civil Service Act, which this bill proposes to amend, of the word "local" or the words "local position," which are constantly used in the section as amended in the bill?

Mr. RINFRET: The hon. gentleman appreciates the fact that this is not my bill. I agree with the suggestion that it should not be drafted exactly in the language in which it appears, but we are all agreed upon the principle and I think the bill should be given its second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISION AGAINST REFUSAL TO EMPLOY OR DISMISSAL FOR MEMBERSHIP IN TRADE UNIONS

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the criminal code.

He said: As I intimated when I introduced this bill, its purpose is:

—to prevent employers from refusing to employ, or from dismissing employees, or conspiring with others therefor, for the reason that they are members of a trade union.

As it is lawful for workmen or employees to form themselves into trade unions and to bargain collectively, it should, as a matter of public policy, be unlawful for employers to seek by overt acts or intimidation, threats or conspiracy to prevent them from belonging to such trade unions.

The right of labour to organize is recognized by the treaty of peace. I quote:

The right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers.

Section 497 of the criminal code distinctly exempts trade unions from the class of unlawful organizations: notwithstanding that, it is extremely difficult in practice for trade unions to carry forward their organization work. As an example of the arrogant attitude of employers I might quote what was said by some of them during the investigation by the textile commission. The president of one company said:

The men can belong to any union if they like. We do not ask a man if he belongs to a union or what his religion may be, but the board of directors refuse to recognize the union, any union.

The president of another company said:

I never had to deal with a union here before, never heard of such a thing, and I am not going to be led by a lot of such folk as if I might just have a rope around my neck and be led like a lamb to the slaughter.

Another manager said:

We have no objection whatever to our employees joining any kind of organization they feel so disposed to. I don't think we would be prepared to consider dealing with any organization. Because we would very much prefer to deal with them as individuals. Because there are always people who get in control of these things, or it seems to be the case, who have very radical ideas, imaginary ills or problems.

And yet another:

The company will not permit any third party to interfere between the management and the employees or to take away from the employees their rights as individuals to deal with the company.

I wish to give one honourable exception. The president of one particular company made this statement:

We as manufacturers . . . we have got the right to organize ourselves. Isn't it right that labour should have the same right?

That is all that I ask for in this measure.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): You ask that what you refer to should be made a crime.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes; I ask that the criminal code be amended in this respect. The Minister of Justice suggests that this is not by nature a crime. As he is aware, I am not a lawyer, but as a layman I have been reading some sections of the criminal code. I find, for example, that breach of trust by a public officer is a crime punishable by five years' imprisonment. I find that obstructing an officiating clergyman is a crime, for which one is liable to be sentenced to two years in prison. It is enacted that the head of a family shall provide the necessaries for any child under sixteen and for his wife; if he fails to do so he is guilty of a crime and is liable to a fine of $500 or one year's imprisonment or both. I find that the issuing of a false prospectus, statement or account by directors or officers is a crime. I find that even cheating in playing at any game or in holding the stakes or in betting on any event is a crime, and renders one liable to three years' imprisonment. I find that sending false telegrams is a crime, the punishment being two years' imprisonment.

I would read section 501:

Every one is guilty of an offence punishable, at the option of the accused, on indictment or on summary conviction before two justices and liable on conviction to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or to three months' imprisonment with or without hard labour, who, wrongfully and without lawful authority, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing anything which he has a lawful right to do, or to do anything from which he has a lawful right to abstain, . . .

My amendment is very much along the line indicated in the foregoing section. Or let us take section 502:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, in pursuance of any unlawful combination or conspiracy to raise the rate of wages . . . uses any violence or threat of violence to any person, with intent to hinder him from working or being employed at such trade, business or manufacture.

In other words, certain things which employees may do become crimes, and I suggest that if we have a provision against such actions we should also have in the criminal code a provision enabling employees to organize in order to carry on their activities.

The Trades and Labour Congress has time and again presented the case of labour to the dominion government and to the various provincial assemblies. I quote from a recent document:

While the provisions of the criminal code relating to conspiracies in restraint of trade are not, in virtue of express exemptions, applicable to trade unions or to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection, the right of employees to organize, or to join, trade unions is not secured or protected by any positive law on the subject; and under the decisions of the courts in one province, namely, Ontario, trade unions, in so far as their objects may be in restraint of trade, have been held to be unlawful associations.

As representing organized workers, we receive numerous complaints from wage earners who are threatened with dismissal if they dare to join a union of their own choice and as trade unionism is necessary to set up Canadian living standards in our industries, we submit that it is strongly to be condemned that employers should continue to have it in their power to prevent their workers from joining a union and we desire to solicit your assistance in removing such authority over their workers from all employers, although only a minority of them endeavour to impose such restrictions.

Now the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada has been attempting to have suitable legislation passed by the various provincial legislatures. I shall not go into that matter. But it seems to be necessary that provincial legislation should be supplemented by federal legislation.

With regard to the constitutional aspects of the case I should like to quote from the submission made by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, in January of this year. Referring to the jurisdictional question the submission states:

We base this statement on two important principles laid down by the privy council itself in dealing with our constitution. The first of these principles was given in a decision of 1896

(the Distillers' and Brewers' case) when their lordships stated that they did not doubt "that some matters, in their origin local and provincial, might attain such dimensions as to affect the body politic of the dominion and to justify the Canadian parliament in passing laws for their regulation or abolition in the interests of the dominion." Obviously this means that a matter of civil rights or of a local or private nature in its origin should cease to be reserved exclusively to the provinces when it becomes of such prominence as to attain national significance.

The second principle, contained in the decision on the Radio case (1932) may be taken either as an extension of the first, or as parallel to it. Lord Dunedin in giving judgment had established that the point at isue was given by the act neither to the dominion nor to the provinces. As a residual power, and as a matter esentially national, jurisdiction was declared to rest with the federal authority.

One other paragraph from this document:

Thus, it seems to the Trades and Labour Congress that the intention in the mind of the original promoters of the British North America Act and the needs of to-day in regard to the constitution are in agreement, namely, that the central government should be able to exercise those functions one would expect to find a central government possessing, that is to say, jurisdiction in questions of common import throughout the nation in matters where uniformity is highly desirable, in matters where the size of the problem exceeds provincial competence, as well as in matters more readily recognized as interprovincial in scope.

One other quotation touching the constitutional aspect, also from a memorandum of the Trades and Labour Congress:

On the rights of wage earners to organize for their mutual protection, and on the right of union workers to bargain collectively, we would like to say a special word. We realize that jurisdiction in these matters rests with the provinces at present, rather than with parliament, and in the past year we have approached the several legislatures, seeking protective legislation, with success in some cases. We firmly believe, however, that the dominion parliament also should recognize the rights of the workers to freedom of association and collective bargaining in as far as its jurisdiction extends—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH (Reading):

—by providing suitable penalties for proven cases of interference with these rights. It is a fact that the workers are not interfered with by the law in their desire to organize, but experience has shown that that is not enough. So long as any employer may apply economic pressure to prevent organization among his employees, it is impossible for his workers to enjoy their full civil privileges. If our recommendations for amendment to the British North America Act were carried out, parliament would have full jurisdiction to legislate on this matter in pursuance of the recommendation of the International Labour Organization, but as suggested, even under existing conditions, we strongly urge the government to ask parliament to take such action as it can to assert the principle of the right of the workers to organize.

Again I would say that is what I am trying to accomplish by this bill. Look at the situation from the practical standpoint. The old individual bargaining is a thing of the past. We see an example of the old-fashioned type of personal relations in the shoemaker sitting on one side of the bench and his man on the other. They are almost equal in bargaining power. But to-day behind the foreman or superintendent stands the manager; behind the manager a board of directors, and behind the directors millions of money, and very often also an employers' association. What chance has the single employee in bargaining with a great aggregation of that kind? He is simply in a hopeless position. So that if he is to have anything like real civil rights with regard to his daily work he must be given the right to organize. The employer should not be permitted to intimidate him, or dismiss him for the sole reason that he has seen fit to join a union. One has only to go out into industry to realize how necessary legislation of this sort is. Several years ago I described to the house what I had observed in some company towns that exist in some of the more remote parts of Canada, little isolated communities where a great plant dominates the situation, where the company not only owns the factory or plant but owns the houses, owns the streets in some cases, owns all the utilities of every kind. An individual employee is absolutely helpless in such cases. It is going a short distance indeed to ask that the government should step in to protect an employee under such conditions. This bill provides for the employee only what employers are now enjoying.

Had I time I could read lengthy extracts from resolutions which have been passed in favour of this bill by various labour organizations across the country. Further than that I can show that not merely in industrial unions but even in some professional associations that are being organized to-day, the employees of big concerns, as for example newspapers, are discriminated against for no other reason than that they belong to a union and through that union seek to promote the interests of themselves and their fellows. I urge, Mr. Speaker, that the government would be merely carrying out principles of fundamental justice in preventing this intimidation on the part of great corporations.

SUPPLY

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND NATIONAL PARK—STATEMENT OF MR. BENNETT ON MOTION OF PRIME MINISTER

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for committee of supply.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): One of the opportunities afforded to bring grievances to the attention of parliament is when a motion is made that the house resolve itself into committee of supply. Fortunately in the case to which I am about to direct attention there is no amendment involved, and I trust that no censure can be read into my remarks. It is rather an exposition of facts which I shall make, with the hope that the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) will take steps to remedy what is in fact a great grievance on the part of many people residing in the small province of Prince Edward Island.

In the year 1936 it will be remembered that parliament enacted chapter 43 of our statutes which provided for the establishment of a national park in Prince Edward Island. Section 5 of that act provides that the area for the park shall be provided by the province free from all claims of any kind. That statute became law on June 23, 1936.

Prince Edward Island has a legislature in which there are no opposition members. They are all supporters of the government. On April 18, 1936, the legislature passed chapter 17 of the statutes for that year, the relevant section of which reads:

1. For the purpose of selecting a site for a national park area or areas in the province, the provincial secretary and any other person or persons authorized by him or by the executive council may enter upon any land or premises alleged to be suitable for such site and may make an inspection and survey of the same.

2. If any lands within the province are deemed to be suitable for a national park, the lieutenant governor in council may make an order vesting such lands, together with all buildings, appurtenances, easements, streams, and water courses thereto belonging or adjacent in His Majesty the King in the right of the province of Prince Edward Island absolutely.

Then follows a provision with respect to the expropriation order. Naturally some provision is to be expected dealing with the question of the compensation to be paid. We find that section 5 reads:

If, within a reasonable time from the making of the order in council, a satisfactory agreement has not been reached with regard to the amount and apportionment of the compensation to be paid by the government of the province by way of compensation for the lands and premises thereby expropriated, the lieutenant governor in council may make a further order fixing the amount of such compensation, and the provincial treasurer may thereupon pay the amount so fixed into the Court of Chancery, to be apportioned and paid out upon the application of any of the parties entitled thereto. Such payment into court shall fully discharge the claim of all persons whatsoever for compensation in respect to the expropriation of such lands.

Then follows section 6:

The lieutenant governor in council may take such further steps as are necessary to vest the lands so expropriated in His Majesty in the right of Canada or in any such department, officer or trustee on behalf of the government of Canada as may be proper for the establishment of a national park on such site.

It therefore is apparent that this legislation was predicated upon a statute passed by this parliament, by which we undertook certain obligations with respect to a national park in Prince Edward Island, or an area in Prince Edward Island to be acquired by that province.

The province, instead of expropriating the lands, as would be done in the case of a railway company, or by the crown, merely passed a statute vesting the lands indicated by the surveyor in the crown in the right of the province. That, in itself, meant that men and women who had inhabited and occupied lands for generations, the ancestors of some going back to the eighteenth century, found that their lands were vested in the crown in the right of the province of Prince Edward Island. The province undertook that upon the acquisition of the lands they were to be vested in the crown in the right of the dominion, as a national park.

Now we come to the next important question, that of compensation. These old farms, old homes with traditions and sentiment attaching to them, were vested in the crown in the right of the province of Prince Edward Island, for purposes of a national park. In the case of a railway exercising the right of eminent domain, or in the case of the crown exercising the right of eminent domain, there is provision either for arbitration or for the hearing of the claim before a district or county court judge.

But, behold what was done in this case—and if you want an illustration of what happens in a province where there is no opposition in the legislature, give your attention to what happened here. The province, in the right of this government, took the right to declare what compensation should be given to those owners. I hold under my hand the notice which was given in one case, that of a woman who had constructed a number of cabins on the shore. She rented those cabins to tourists, making a profit of about $2,000 a year. This is the letter which was directed to her on August 10, last:

> I am directed to advise you that the executive council has authorized settlement for the lands formerly owned by you and expropriated for the purpose of a national park, in the full amount of $1,935.
>
> A search of the title to the lands is now being made and payment will be made at this office when satisfactory evidence of title is filed and arrangements are made to remove any buildings that may now be on the land.
>
> Yours truly,
> P. S. Fielding,
> Deputy Provincial Treasurer.

I venture to say that it is not within the knowledge of any member of the house of a case where the vendor of land was to have the price he was to receive, when it was taken from him by compulsion, set by the purchaser. But that is what happened here.

Without the right of court action, without the right of being heard before an independent tribunal, and without the right of arbitration or judicial determination, the owners of these old homes have had them taken from them by a vesting order in the form of a statute passed by the legislature of Prince Edward Island. The price they are to receive as compensation for their lands and buildings is to be fixed by the same government which took them from them. If no settlement can be arrived at, the authorities simply write a letter in which they say, "You are to get so much money."

I say that when we are the beneficiaries; when we have invited this action to be taken; when prior to this we enacted a statute which said that we would provide a national park when we got the site, and when as a result of that the legislature took the step, in the manner I have indicated, to provide that site, it is not right or in consonance with our idea of British justice that these people should have their lands or homes taken from them, or that they should be dispossessed so that a national park might be operated by the Dominion of Canada. It is not right to have the price fixed by the government which took the property from them.

In other words, the person or persons—this being a government—in whom the property is vested by legislative act can fix the price to be paid to the man or woman deprived of his property. Is that not a real grievance? Is that not a wrong which we should not tolerate, when we are to become the owners of the property? This is not a matter of politics, because many of these men and women are, of course, of necessity supporters of the present federal government. I do not suggest they are all supporters of this government, and the government in Prince Edward Island. One of the ministers in the federal government, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) sits as a representative of that province. It is quite obvious that this matter should receive the consideration of the house.

They have asked that the grievance be presented at the earliest possible moment. A petition was sent to the Minister of Mines and Resources reciting all these facts and he, very properly, says that this is not a matter over which at this time he has that control which would enable him to act. The government, however, has the power to communicate with the government of Prince Edward Island, just as in times past successive ministers of justice have communicated with the provinces for purposes of amendments being made to legislation, so that they might be made intra vires where formerly they had been ultra vires.

I believe that we have here a grave abuse of power; I think I am using a term which is not too strong. This is an abuse of power. The court of last resort in England, has settled the principle upon which damages should be assessed, where property was taken by compulsion. That was a case against the old Canadian Northern Railway Company where the proceedings went to the privy council and the principles which governed were laid down. Those principles have not been observed in this case for here the compensation to be paid is settled by the party that compulsorily took the lands from the owners!

It seems to me that these people are entitled to the application of the law of their country. Does the minister not agree that it is high-handed in this twentieth century that men and women should have their property taken from them by compulsion and then have the principles that apply in the settlement of the compensation they are to receive made no longer applicable to their case? Should a government of the day that takes the property be permitted merely to say, "We will give you so much money?"

One man went there to establish a particular agricultural industry, the growing of a certain kind of plant in a particular soil. He was compelled to leave; his case has been settled and he has left the country. Of course, that was inevitable. There is another instance in which land was expropriated and the individual said that he would not take the price offered. The authorities then said, "Oh, well, we do not need it now." There is a decision that once the power of expropriation has been exercised, after you have had the property for months, you cannot suddenly, because a man will not take what you offer him, say, "Well, we do not want the land now."

Acting under instructions from the owners, men proceeded to tear down some of the buildings and to treat the property as property belonging to the crown in the right of the province. The transfer to the crown in the right of the dominion as such of course has not been registered, but the actual transaction has been completed as the officials of the national parks branch are on the property and exercising jurisdiction over it. They have warned these unfortunate people that they must leave and that cabins can no longer be permitted. This farmer and his wife have operated these cabins as a means of livelihood. As I said, their business brought in a net of $2,000 a year and they have been offered $1,960 for their property.

I am drawing this matter to the attention of the minister at this time rather than waiting until his estimates are before the house as I think it is a matter which he and his colleague the Minister of Justice should direct to the attention of the government of Prince Edward Island. The authorities there should be asked to modify their legislation, as has been done frequently, for the purpose of enabling justice and right to be done. It is true that the first act was passed in 1936 and the year within which it could be disallowed has passed; but the amending statute, which gives force and validity to the statute of 1936, was not assented to until April 9 of last year and therefore will stand for disallowance for many months yet. This is chapter 24 of the statutes of 1937, and I refer particularly to section 3, which reads:

> This act shall be construed as being retroactive to the time of passing the act hereby amended, and as having the same force and effect as if the provisions hereof had been incorporated in the original act.

If the Minister of Justice deals with that statute within twelve months of the date of its receipt, there will be ample time in which to bring about such amendment as will enable those who have been prejudiced to bring their cases either to the courts or to a board of arbitration in order that they may receive compensation to which they are justly entitled. I think that is a fair suggestion to make to the minister under the circumstances.

I hope we are not to undertake the management of a national park which has been brought into being by depriving citizens of their rights under the law, and by taking from them by an arbitrary act of the legislature any right to have a court or a board of arbitration determine the amount of compensation they should receive for the injuries they have suffered through the compulsory taking of their property. I submit that is not an unfair proposal to make, and I make it to the minister before his estimates are brought down in order that the matter may be brought to the attention of the Prince Edward Island government.

I realize, of course, that the minister may say that he is here simply to operate a national park when the site is given to the government and is not concerned about the method by which the site is acquired. There has been a deprivation of the right which every British citizen is supposed to have of recourse to some tribunal for the purpose of settling the amount he is entitled to receive from the person who takes his property. The person who takes his property should not be permitted to say arbitrarily, "I will give you $1,900 for what I have taken. Willy-nilly you must take it, and that is all you get. You have no right of recourse, either to the courts or anywhere else."

The existence of such a condition I believe calls for the exercise of a power which in days gone by has frequently been exercised by ministers of justice who have brought the attention of provincial authorities to certain situations and asked that they be amended. Within the year that must elapse from the date of the receipt of the 1937 statute there will be ample time for the minister to bring this situation to the attention of the government of Prince Edward Island. Their legislature has not met this year and there would be an opportunity to remedy one of the gravest injustices which has ever been perpetuated against the people of any province.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Does my right hon. friend know the date of that enactment?

Mr. BENNETT: I mentioned just now that the operative part was made retroactive. The second act was assented to on April 9, 1937, and I do not suppose it would get to the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) until some time in May. Therefore, there would be ample time to deal with this matter. That is why I took advantage of the first opportunity to bring it to the attention of the government.

I assure you, Mr. Speaker, and other members of the house, that I would not have done so had it not been for the urgent necessity of doing it promptly.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of some regret to me that my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) did not give me any intimation that he proposed to bring this matter before the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not think it was a matter that required any notice.

Mr. CRERAR: Consequently I am not as well acquainted with the facts to which he has alluded as I otherwise might have been. It is quite true that a park was established in Prince Edward Island. I think my right hon. friend knows that under the parks act the province has to supply free of charge the site to be set aside for the park and convey title to it to the government of Canada. The federal government has nothing to do with the manner in which the provincial government acquires the area for the park, other than to see that it is suitable for park purposes.

I recall one communication I received subsequently to the designation of this area as a park by the provincial government. This was from a gentleman in New York who has a summer cottage within the present park boundaries. He requested that he be permitted to occupy the cottage each summer as long as he wished to do so. I replied that that was a matter of arrangement between himself and the provincial government. If he passes title of his land so that it could come in the ordinary course to the federal government, I informed him there would be no objection on the part of the parks authorities to permitting him to enjoy his summer holidays in the cottage he has been accustomed to as long as he wishes to do so.

I am doubtful of the wisdom of the suggestion made by my right hon. friend. It really amounts to this, that in a matter which is purely the concern of the Prince Edward Island government, we should say to them before we proceed with the further development of this park: You must do thus and so with the people from whom you have secured the property. I know of no instance, Mr. Speaker, where such a power has been exercised by the federal government at any time or any place, and as a matter of fact it is non-existent. It is quite true that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) after reviewing the legislation passed by the provincial government, might have recommended disallowing that legislation, but this is not a matter calling for such action. I believe there have been some differences of opinion between the provincial government and some of the people from whom it secured part at any rate of this area, and if my recollection is correct I think we may have some legislation this session to make some rectifications in the boundaries of the park as designated in the act alluded to by my right hon. friend.

I do not know that there is very much more I can say about the matter. I shall, of course, take my right hon. friend's suggestion under consideration, as I am always happy to do in matters affecting my department. But when my right hon. friend suggests that the federal government should draw formally to the attention of the Prince Edward Island government that they have done wrong, and that they should correct that wrong before we proceed further in the development of this park, I cannot follow him that far. I have no doubt, however, that his admirable speech this evening will be reported in the Prince Edward Island papers, and I venture to hope that if any injustice has been done, the Prince Edward Island government will take notice of the criticism of my right hon. friend, and will set about to correct any such injustice.

Mr. BENNETT: May I just explain to the minister that I do not propose to move a motion, and I did not even think it was necessary that he should answer what I said. I was merely bringing the matter to the attention of the government. If for a moment I had thought it would involve any action at the moment I would certainly have given my hon. friend notice because otherwise it might be thought I was discourteous. As I say, I merely desired to bring it to the attention of the government and had not even contemplated the minister stating what he has stated to-night.

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I was urged during the course of the summer to bring this matter to the attention of the house to see if some redress could not be provided in the unfortunate situation that has arisen in Prince Edward Island, in a province that is a national park in itself without the setting aside of any specified area for national park purposes. Injustice has been done in certain instances, and if the minister had journeyed to that province himself and had personal knowledge of what has been done through the instrumentality of the act which has been referred to in the house to-night, I am sure that he would have been vitally interested in the human side of the picture which could be presented.

Here are people settled on a certain piece of land. I know of one family, in particular, who to the third generation have occupied a small piece of land. The man is earning a living for himself, his wife, and small family partly from the land and partly through fishing nearby during the season. He has been dispossessed of his land and given inadequate compensation. He has been forced to go to another part of the island far removed from where he has been in the habit of carrying on his occupation of fishing.

I know of another instance, a hotel in which some people of Charlottetown have invested a certain amount of capital. The success of the hotel is largely dependent upon a nine hole golf course that surrounds it. Unfortunately this national park takes away a very large portion of that golf course, leaving the hotel stranded, without the golf course to attract summer visitors.

I could cite many other instances of people having been dispossessed without the opportunity of presenting their case to a reasonable tribunal. They have just been told: Your land has been taken from you, you are allowed so much, you have no recourse in the way of presenting your claim before a higher tribunal. That is manifestly unfair; the people who have been done this injustice should have redress, and it can come to them only through the influence of this federal government.

I know that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is just as well aware as I am of the instances I have cited and of the hardship that has been inflicted on certain people on the island. Other hon. members from the island province are just as well aware of these facts, and I have no doubt that as they study the effect of the act which was passed by the legislature of Prince Edward Island they will agree with me that the human side of the situation has not received adequate attention from the powers that be. I would urge upon the minister in charge of the matter, and also on the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), to give some consideration to the human side of the problem which has developed as a result of that legislation. It is that side in which I am peculiarly interested, and I feel that the people affected are looking to the federal government, not to disallow the legislation, but to direct the attention of the provincial government to the effect that their legislation is having in conjunction with the legislation passed by this parliament.

I have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) commit himself in public addresses to the suggestion that it is very easy for a Liberal government in the provincial field to cooperate with a Liberal government in the federal field. This is a splendid opportunity to show that what he said on numerous occasions is exactly what he meant, and that it can be done. I should like to see this practical example of cooperation tried between a provincial government and the federal government, both of the same political stripe, and then I feel sure that the members from the island province will go home highly pleased with the work of this session if only these few people who have been harshly treated are more adequately and justly dealt with at the hands of the government, by the Minister of Justice or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), who is peculiarly interested in that province.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, listening to the last speaker (Mr. Walsh), there came to my mind what a hullabaloo would be raised in the house if, in connection with a matter wholly within the jurisdiction of the legislature of the great province of Ontario, for example, or the great province of Quebec, hon. members undertook to attempt to direct the provincial legislature how it should legislate in a matter wholly within its jurisdiction.

Mr. BENNETT: We are doing so now. There are the padlock laws.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): They are trying to direct you.

Mr. DUNNING: The statement of the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) was in error in at least one particular. Take, for instance, the golf course illustration which he used. That golf course is not a part of the national park. True, it was originally intended to take it in, but the very facts which he recited caused a reconsideration of the matter and the golf course does belong to the hotel property.

Mr. WALSH: I know. I signed a petition to that end, myself.

Mr. DUNNING: I happen to know of that particular instance. I should not like the impression to go abroad that by any means all of the people affected by the proceedings which have been alluded to are either dissatisfied or consider themselves injured. That is not the case. I am not aware of the precise number who regard themselves as aggrieved, and because of the fact that the subject matter is wholly within the competence of the provincial legislature I have not deemed it my business to attempt to direct how they should legislate regarding a matter wholly within their own competence. But I do think that, as a member from the province, I should as far as I can try to prevent the impression from going abroad that a large number of people have been injuriously treated by the legislature of their province. It is true that this matter is one of active controversy in Prince Edward Island. One has only to read the press of that province to know that certainly there are two opinions with regard to it. There is a very, very strong opinion that the people whose lands have been taken have been generously treated. I know that opinion is held by a great many people on the island. As one of the members, when I was down there last summer I think I heard both sides of the question discussed, and in my opinion we in this house would be well advised not to attempt to interfere in a matter which is between the people of Prince Edward Island and their legislature and government.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): It seems to me that a fundamental principle is involved in the question which has been raised here, and that is the right of the purchaser to determine the price which shall be paid for property that is taken, purchased or expropriated. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has just put the case as though this whole matter began and ended as between the government of Prince Edward Island on the one hand and the owners on the other. It is not quite that; it is rather a three-sided proposition, a proposition in which the government of the dominion also come in, and if they find in the transaction anything that is fundamentally wrong or contrary to the principles of justice, they should not put their seal of approval upon it.

It seems to me that the minister, and also the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), will agree that where there is a difference between the parties, when the dominion or a province is taking over property, as to the value of that property, some machinery independent of the party taking it, the property should be set up to determine the value. That appears to be lacking in this case. It is one where the province taking the property determines the value where it is in dispute. That does not seem to me to be fundamentally sound; it is almost like taking stolen property; and before the dominion puts its stamp of approval on the taking over of the property, it having been brought to its knowledge that this condition exists, it should take some steps to remedy something which looks like, or really is, injustice. It is fundamentally unsound that, whether it is a province or the dominion which acquires property and a dispute arises between that authority and the owner, the government should have the last word and say, "This is the value and this is what you must take." To my mind that is a sort of fascism. There should be some tribunal or some way of determining what is the honest, fair value of that property.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of Supply, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

Pensions Branch

Canadian Pension Commission—administration expenses, $534,330.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Before proceeding to the discussion of any of these items, perhaps I may be permitted to make a few observations with regard to the new set-up of estimates generally and to offer a suggestion or two to the members of the committee. It will be observed that this year, in this department as in all others, the details of the work have been set out at much greater length than has hitherto been the custom. Personally I welcome this innovation, because it shows the house and the country more clearly than ever before just what are the functions of the different departments.

If this has been accomplished, perhaps a greater responsibility devolves upon members of the committee to keep more strictly within the rules of order in discussing matters pertinent to the item which is before them. I say that as much in the interests of members of the opposition as in the interests of the minister himself. I believe that all those who have been members of this house for any length of time will agree with me that there is nothing more disconcerting or more annoying to a serious-minded member than to be interrupted, when he is pursuing some line of thought on the matter before the committee, by a question which is not at all relevant to that item. I respectfully suggest that, in view of the fuller information given, the proceedings will be conducted in a more orderly and perhaps more leisurely fashion—and after all we are likely to be here until next August—if the rules are observed more closely than has been the case in the past.

With respect to the department whose items are now before the committee, whereas in the past a considerable number of its functions, as far as expenditures were concerned, were bulked together, and it was extremely difficult for hon. members to keep to the subject, it is now pretty clearly shown, I think, on the estimates just what items refer, let us say, to pensions, what items refer to unemployment assistance, what payments refer to the different courts and to the machinery set up for the purpose of awarding pensions.

In order to make my meaning more clear, I would suggest, subject of course to the wishes of the committee, that we proceed by dealing with matters which refer more directly to pensions. The first item that I should like to take up would be No. 215, dealing with administration expenses; the second would be No. 218, dealing with pensions themselves; the third would be No. 224, dealing with the veterans bureau, the agency set up to provide for the proper preparation of claims, and the fourth would be item No. 212, with regard to the pension appeal court. I am prepared to proceed now with item No. 215 with regard to administration expenses of the Canadian pension commission.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The item will be found on page 27 and the details on page 153 of the main estimates.

Mr. GREEN: The minister's suggestion is more for his own benefit than for the benefit of the opposition. I suggest that he would achieve his end better if, to use a slang expression, he would not try to slip one over us in this way, but would give us, before we proceed with this item, a brief sketch of the situation as it exists to-day across Canada with regard to soldier problems, and in particular a statement on the recommendations of the veterans' assistance commission. It is agreed, I believe by all persons interested in soldier problems that the question of the unemployed veteran is now and has been for several years the main problem facing the returned soldiers of Canada. In 1934 the problem was placed before the then government by the Canadian Legion. In 1935 the Hyndman committee was appointed and made a thorough investigation.

Mr. POWER: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to insist, but my hon. friend will not give me credit for good intentions and therefore, perhaps, I shall have to insist that the item under discussion has nothing to do with unemployment assistance nor has it anything to do with the condition of unemployment throughout Canada. We are dealing with the administration of pensions and not with administration generally. I suggest that the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. GREEN: That may be, but the problem of the unemployed veteran underlies all these pension estimates.

Mr. POWER: There is a vote dealing with unemployment assistance and I am quite willing to give my hon. friend the fullest assurance that when that vote comes on he shall have a whole day to discuss the unemployment assistance commission's report if he so desires. At the present time, we are dealing with pensions, which has nothing to do with unemployment.

Mr. GREEN: Last year we were met with exactly the same sort of proposal. The veterans' assistance commission made an interim report and the veterans throughout Canada were waiting to hear what action the government proposed to take on that report. We were told, however, "You will have a day later on to discuss the situation." Well, we got a day about one week before parliament prorogued. I submit that we should have a statement from the minister with regard to this report of the veterans' assistance commission.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The point raised by the minister is well taken. This vote has to do particularly with pension matters and discussion in the committee should have reference to this item alone. Shall the item carry?

Mr. BETTS: Not by any means. Duly impressed as I am by the elaborate paternal remarks of the minister—I never heard before that he was an authority on this point but apparently he is—may I with all deference to his eminence ask what the details of the item are?

Mr. POWER: I shall be glad to read them all; they will be found on page 153. If the hon. gentleman will put on his glasses he will probably be able to read them. Here they are: One chief medical adviser; ten medical officers, grade 5; nineteen medical officers, grade 4; one secretary; three chief clerks; two head clerks; one accountant, grade 2; four principal clerks; four clerks, grade 4; three pension clerks, grade 2; four pension clerks, grade 1; six clerks, grade 3; eight clerks, grade 2; one clerk, grade 1; one confidential messenger; one messenger; one senior messenger; ten investigators, grade 2—

Mr. BETTS: May I ask what the duties of a confidential messenger are?

Mr. POWER: A confidential messenger, I should imagine, would have a very difficult job. First of all, he would be obliged to know how to read, and perhaps how to write, and possibly, after being told once or twice, he would know what were the duties of the chief medical officer or where the chief medical officer's office was, and to whom he should deliver messages. He would have to know who were principal clerks, and he would also presumably have to know the way to their various offices. The other duties that devolve upon a confidential messenger, I am sorry to say, I do not know.

Mr. GREEN: I do not mind being ruled out of order, but we have tried in dealing with soldier problems, from the first session of this parliament, to deal with them in a non-partisan way. Now you see what will happen if the minister persists in his refusal to make a statement. We are only too anxious to cooperate with him, and I suggest that he would be very much ahead of the game if he would tell us now what he proposes to do about the recommendations of the veterans' assistance commission, so that we may know how to treat the whole soldier question.

Mr. POWER: I, too, have sat on the other side for a great many years and I have often had the pleasure of keeping a minister busy for a prolonged period, though usually I did not attempt to block his estimates when they were non-contentious. Far from intending to make this a partisan matter, I have never attempted to treat it in that light since I came here. But I am not prepared at the present time to make a statement with regard to unemployment assistance. We have matters relating to pensions which are very important, and I believe the pension question should be discussed in this house. There is a vote of over $40,000,000, a most important item. I began with the most important item in the whole department, and I suggest that my hon. friend will have ample time during the course of the session to discuss everything he wants to with respect to pensions. If he wants to keep me here for an hour or more—well, we are likely to be here until August and it does not matter. I can stay here trying to pass items as long as he can stay blocking them.

Mr. GREEN: There is no desire—

Mr. BENNETT: The word "blocking" is out of order under the rules of the house.

Mr. POWER: I withdraw the reference to blocking. I simply refer to what my hon. friend said a moment ago, that the question asked by the hon. member for London (Mr. Betts) was an indication of what might happen if I would not acquiesce in all the whims of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. BETTS: I said nothing about blockade.

Mr. NEILL: There was a reference to sitting until August. That is a distinct threat.

Mr. BETTS: If there is anything improper in asking the duties of a messenger I do not know what it is.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. POWER: I did not say it was improper, but the hon. member for London seemed to think there was something peculiar about that question because he threatened me with others like it. I have no objection whatever to discussing the duties of any members of the staff.

Mr. GREEN: There is no question of threatening. We simply want to find out for the ex-soldiers of Canada what the minister proposes to do about this report of the veterans' assistance commission. He has had it now for two months; when are we to be told what he is going to do about it? Must we wait until July? This is the third session of this parliament. He has dragged along—

Mr. POWER: Do I understand my hon. friend to say that I have dragged the veterans' unemployment problem along for two years?

Mr. GREEN: Well, it has looked something like that at times.

Mr. MacNEIL: There is no desire to harass the minister; there is every desire to facilitate consideration of his estimates; but he must be well aware that there is a general problem in which ex-service men all across the dominion are interested, touching not only pensions but many other aspects of their circumstances. Recommendations have been made by the veterans' assistance commission. Some of the matters under discussion are of great importance; others are relatively of less importance. It would be a distinct advantage if early in the discussion of his estimates the minister would indicate what his intentions are in regard to implementing the principal recommendations of the commission. Then the discussion would centre on those matters of foremost importance. Therefore I warmly support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) that the minister should deal first with items not quite as important as pensions, until it is indicated for instance whether or not he will introduce a bill amending the Pension Act this session so as to give effect to important recommendations which I understand he now has under advisement. I think the minister should recognize the sincerity of our desire in that regard, that we simply want to give our chief attention to those matters, which are of outstanding importance.

Mr. POWER: In view of my hon. friend's courtesy in putting his request I have no objection to stating that the commission which has been referred to on several occasions made no recommendation whatever in respect to pensions, so that under the item of pensions I do not think there could be any discussion of the commission's report. It did refer to such matters as war veterans' allowances and unemployment assistance, and I have actually in preparation, to be brought down within the next week or ten days, very important legislation dealing with that matter. But I am not prepared to discuss that legislation at the present moment. I do not think it would be proper for me to discuss half-baked legislation before I am ready to put it before the house. For that reason I suggested that we begin the discussion of this item relating to pensions, which is not likely to be touched by any legislation. No pension legislation is likely to be introduced this year, at any rate none arising out of the report of the veterans' assistance commission.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): I find myself in complete accord with the procedure proposed by the minister, and not in accord with the suggestions of the hon. members for Vancouver South and Vancouver North. I think the returned soldiers throughout the length and breadth of Canada have complete confidence in the Minister of Pensions (Mr. Power)—

Mr. STEWART: Oh no.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): —and I think the best that hon. members can do is also to have complete confidence in him. He is bringing down his estimates in the manner which he deems to be in the best interests of government, of the department, and of all concerned, and we should not try to embarrass him by raising these questions, but rather should consider the estimates which he is prepared to present to the committee to-night.

Mr. GREEN: I would merely point out that according to newspaper reports the minister himself told the dominion legion convention at Fort William two or three weeks ago that legislation aimed at dealing with veterans' unemployment problems in a broad and generous way would be introduced in the House of Commons with a minimum of delay.

Mr. POWER: Quite right.

Mr. GREEN: If the minister is not prepared to make a statement to-night with regard to the recommendations of the veteran's assistance commission, how soon will he be ready to make that statement?

Mr. POWER: As I have already stated, within a week or ten days. But I am not prepared to tell my hon. friend the exact hour and minute at which I shall bring down the legislation. I gave that undertaking to the legion convention at Fort William, and I stand ready to carry it out. But surely it is not and never has been the custom while I have been in the house for hon. members to insist that in the first week in which the general business of the house is being carried on certain legislation be laid before it. This legislation is being prepared; it will be brought down at the earliest possible time. I repeat the pledge I gave to the legion at Fort William.

Mr. MacNEIL: Perhaps the minister will be good enough to advise us in regard to this difficulty. Many of us have received since last session important recommendations from organizations of ex-service men dealing with proposed amendments to the Pension Act. We are anxious to have them discussed at the proper time. We feel that at this session certain amendments at least should be dealt with. We of course are aware that the report of the veterans' assistance commission does not deal specifically with pension problems. But surely if the minister is not able to announce anything definite at this time in regard to pension legislation, he will give us the opportunity to debate these important amendments in a discussion of the estimates that will come later when his policy is determined.

Mr. POWER: Why would not my hon friend discuss these recommendations with respect to pension legislation now? We are on pensions; this is a proper time to bring these matters to the attention of the government.

Mr. BENNETT: This is only administration.

Mr. POWER: But the whole objection so far has been that I am proposing to discuss the pension group of items one after another instead of skipping about from one branch of the department to another. I have stated that for the greater convenience of the committee we would, if the committee agree, begin with the functions of the pension commission generally. Perhaps this would not be quite the proper item on which to discuss the proposed amendments, but the next which I suggest that we should take up, the vote of forty odd millions of expenditure in the way of pensions, would be an appropriate item on which my hon. friend could make all the suggestions he pleases with regard to amendments to the Pension Act.

Mr. CHURCH: Under the rules of this house and of the British parliament administration items bring into review the whole administration of matters relating to returned soldiers. In the British house the other day this same question was up, and it was not dealt with in a technical way. Representing a city which sent more soldiers to the great war than any other city in Canada, I am surprised that twenty-one years after the war returned soldiers are still walking the streets looking for employment while employment commissions and committees usurp the powers of this house. What has been done since the last session? There are rules and regulations that ex-soldiers be given preference—

Mr. POWER: I regret to interrupt, but surely the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. CHURCH: Positions on the bench, positions in the senate and positions all through the civil service—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: —are being given to civilians, while soldiers are walking the streets.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. The vote before the committee is No. 215, details of which will be found at page 153, dealing with the Canadian pension commission.

Mr. BENNETT: No; it deals with administration expenses—

Mr. DUNNING: Of the commission.

Mr. BENNETT: —which involves the whole problem of administration.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. member should confine himself to the matter before the committee.

Mr. CHURCH: I understood that years ago. I was in the house before the hon. member. I am here to-day as a representative of the people, and you are not going to pass five cents of this item until I have my say. I know the rules of the house, and if necessary I shall appeal to the Speaker.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: That is the hon. member's privilege. But he, or any other hon. member of the committee, must confine his remarks to the vote before the committee. The minister has pointed out that in another vote, one for $40,900,000, general remarks may be made, but they cannot be made on this vote.

Mr. BENNETT: With all due deference to you, sir, I think you are wrong. I submit that the vote for administration expenses involves the whole problem of administration and everything connected with it. Even if we wished to, we could not cut down the vote for $40,900,000. We cannot in any sense amend it, because it is statutory and fixed by law. We have no control over it. That item for $40,900,000 is something which, under a statute of parliament, we are bound to vote. The amount has been determined by the pension commission.

But under the present vote we are dealing with administration expenses, and the vote involves the problem of administration, details of which are set out at page 153. There we have the whole problem, including the number of men employed, the reasons for their employment, and everything connected with the matter.

Mr. POWER: I regret to take issue with my right hon. friend on the point, but I believe if he would read from page 27 of the estimates he would find, under item 213, provision for departmental administration.

Mr. BENNETT: I have read it.

Mr. POWER: Item No. 213 deals with departmental administration. On that vote perhaps the point would be well taken. Departmental administration would cover any matter which is now being discussed, and with respect to which I called the hon. member to order. It would cover unemployment, because such salaries are covered by departmental administration. If the right hon. gentleman will observe what is written in the book of estimates he will find that item No. 215 follows the item of salaries of commissioners, and that the administration expenses are those of the Canadian pension commission. The Canadian pension commission do not deal with unemployment, but deal purely with pensions.

I think on reflection the right hon. gentleman will come to the conclusion that in all probability under the present item any hon. member could discuss anything connected with pensions or with the Canadian pension commission, but it would not be competent for him to discuss any other matter which would come under some other branch of the department.

With respect to the contention of my right hon. friend that the $40,900,000 represents a statutory provision, may I say that that is so, but only to a certain extent. It is not statutory in the sense of a fixed vote being statutory. It cannot be, because the evidence is right here.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not suggest it is, with respect to salaries.

Mr. POWER: It is not statutory in the sense that the salary of a commissioner is statutory, where is it set down in the legislation that the commission chairman shall receive a salary of so much and that the members of the commission shall receive so much. That is statutory, in the real sense of the word. But to say that a vote of $40,900,000 is statutory, and that it has to be voted, is going a bit far.

Last year it was $41,500,000, and that was not statutory. On reflection I think my right hon. friend will come to the conclusion that there is a vast difference between a fixed sum to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund, and so stated in the statutes, and an amount which may vary from year to year.

Mr. BENNETT: I think I can make perfectly clear the difficulty the minister has indicated. A statutory obligation may be of a twofold character. It may be indicated in terms as to what the amount of the statutory claim may be, such as judges' salaries, salaries of commissioners and matters of that kind. Then there is the second type—

Mr. POWER: Which need not be voted.

Mr. BENNETT: This amount, do you say?

Mr. DUNNING: No, the first part, marked with the letter "S".

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. But the amount of $40,900,000 is statutory, because it is a computation passed under the terms of a statute, which cannot be modified without repeal. That is the whole position. That is, under authority of a statute, $40,900,000 must be provided.

Mr. DUNNING: It must be voted.

Mr. BENNETT: No; it must be provided and voted under authority of the statute. Therefore it is a statutory obligation of the Dominion of Canada and, as such, cannot be lessened, unless the statute is amended or repealed.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes; adjudication can change it.

Mr. BENNETT: On the adjudication as made, this is a statutory obligation now fixed at $40,900,000, on a series of computations, which computations are made under the terms of the statute. They cannot be more or less, once the adjudication is made, unless under authority of the statute.

Suppose we were to pass a resolution reducing the item by a million dollars, hon. members will realize that at once we would have the position of having contravened a provision of the statute.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, because adjudication is made under the statute, and the provision at once makes it a statutory obligation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The numbers entitled to pension might vary, from year to year, under the statute.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister answers my question when he adds the words, "under the statute."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should say consequent upon the statute.

Mr. BENNETT: There can be no variation in the item, except under the statute.

Mr. POWER: The minister would have no alternative except to bring in legislation to change the system of adjudication.

Mr. BENNETT: That is my view.

Mr. POWER: But we have strayed away from the theoretical point as to whether or not it is statutory. Perhaps I would agree with my right hon. friend that in one sense it is but in another it is not. It is not statutory in the sense that it shall be passed without discussion by the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: Correct.

Mr. POWER: The item of $40,900,000—which, by the way, is not before the committee—is an item which is always discussed and can properly be discussed by the committee, even though there might be some doubt as to the propriety—yes, I will say more than that—or as to the legality of someone moving to reduce it.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point I made. At page 151 we find the branch administration details.

Mr. POWER: We are not on that yet.

Mr. BENNETT: We are on item No. 215, which item deals with administration expenses, and follows the words "salaries of commissioners," which has reference to the administration by the commissioners.

Mr. POWER: Of the commission only.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I say that. It is not the administration of the department, but the administration of the pension commission as found at page 153 in the details. That opens up the whole question of the administration by the commission of the Pension Act.

Mr. POWER: Of pensions.

Mr. BENNETT: Not departmentally.

Mr. DUNNING: May I be permitted a word of explanation of the new form of estimates, as it might apply to discussion. It was the intention, in preparing the new form, to have one item, and one only, in each department under which the general discussion of the administration of that department would be facilitated. The balance of the items deal with specific matters. That is the case in each department. However, in the case of this department there are two administrative items, one relating to the department generally, being No. 213, and the other one relating to the administration of the pension commission. The reason for these items is to give opportunity for the ordinary discussion of pensions administration apart entirely from the discussion of other aspects of departmental matters and thus to get rid of the somewhat confusing discussion which has occurred in the past in committee of supply when one member would ask a question relating to some particular matter and another member would follow with a question relating to something else miles away. The hope is to give better service to the members of the committee by way of information and by confining the discussion within reasonable limits. The present vote would permit a discussion of everything connected with the administration by the pension commissioners of the work entrusted to them, but I submit that it does not permit a discussion of other aspects of departmental work.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted to say a few words about this item of $534,330, being a decrease of $18,196 from last year? The details of this item are to be found at pages 151 and 153 of the estimates. I am surprised that there should be a necessity for such a large number of officials twenty years after the war. In the details I see listed a deputy minister, an assistant deputy minister, a draughtsman, stenographers and clerks. Is it not the duty of all these officials to see that the act is carried out? Is it not the duty of these officials to see that preference is given to returned soldiers? I am receiving letters all the time from all over Canada complaining about the administration of this act. Returned soldiers cannot get a job on the Canadian National Railways, and twenty years after the war there is still plenty of evidence that returned men are out of work. I think it would be better if we had a committee of ten or fifteen members to which these estimates could be referred so that there might be a businesslike discussion of this matter.

Mr. BETTS: Would the minister give the particulars of the item of $6,500 for materials and supplies, as set out on page 153?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. POWER: That would cover stationery and other supplies needed by the office of the Canadian pension commission and its employees throughout the country.

Mr. HEAPS: I was surprised to hear the minister give such a strict interpretation of the rules of procedure. I can remember that when he was sitting to the left of the Speaker he was not quite as strict in his observance of the rules.

Mr. POWER: Owing to the looseness of the rules he was probably able to carry on in a manner which was embarrassing to the minister and at the same time to some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the chamber. With the desire to endeavour to reform the procedure he suggested very humbly that perhaps better progress could be made and a better understanding of this whole pension problem arrived at by proceeding in an orderly and leisurely fashion. I have no objection to going back to the old rough and tumble scramble where everybody talks at once on every possible subject, but I think it would be more in order if the committee would deal only with pensions at this time.

Mr. HEAPS: I realize it is far better that we should conduct our business in an orderly manner, but I notice that the minister has chosen an appropriate time to start this orderly way of doing business. However, I rose in my place to ask for a little information. I notice from the details on page 153 that the number of employees in the department has been reduced to some extent as compared with last year. Could the minister state if that reduction has been made because of there being less work in the department, because we have reached the peak so far as this work is concerned, or is it for other reasons?

Mr. POWER: Does the hon. gentleman refer to the decrease in the amount of the item?

Mr. HEAPS: No, in the number of employees.

Mr. POWER: There is a decrease of nine, due largely to the fact, I believe, that a number of employees of the Canadian pension commission were absorbed into other branches of the department. As a result of an amendment in 1936 to the Pension Act the department received authority to take over employees from the pension commission. Prior to 1936 there were two so-called water-tight compartments, the departmental employees and the Canadian pension commission employees. It is now possible for the department to draw on the pool in the pension commission. My hon. friend is quite right in thinking that to some extent the work of the pension commission has decreased. He will notice on looking at the estimates that the amount involved in the payment of pensions is considerably less than it was last year.

Mr. GREEN: How many pension commissioners are there at the present time? I notice from the annual report of the department that the arrears of cases have been practically eliminated. It was our understanding that as soon as the arrears were caught up with the number of commissioners would be reduced, thereby decreasing the expense.

Mr. POWER: When I came into the department there were twelve commissioners. One commissioner was added under the legislation of 1936, but four retired last year. At the present time there are nine commissioners, a decrease of three as compared with August, 1936.

Mr. LENNARD: Will the minister explain the item of $40,000 for professional and special services?

Mr. POWER: That refers to the employment of outside professional men, mainly doctors, etc. I have not the list before me, but I believe there are probably ten or fifteen specialists in Toronto, with the same number in Montreal and a proportionate number in other cities, who may be called from time to time. This vote would be for fees to be paid to these men.

Mr. LENNARD: Would they all be medical men?

Mr. POWER: All medical men.

Mr. LENNARD: What would the special services cover?

Mr. POWER: There might be the odd amount for legal fees if the pension commission decided to prosecute in cases of fraud, but I do not know of any during the past year.

Mr. LENNARD: Would the minister explain the item of $75,240 for temporary assistance?

Mr. POWER: Under some kind of regulation of the moguls of the treasury board it is impossible to make more than a certain percentage of the employees of a department permanent. Only 80 per cent can be made permanent; the remainder are temporary employees, and the only nomenclature I can find for them is temporary-permanents or permanent-temporaries. Some of them have been in the department for five or six years or more; but there is a rule now, generally observed throughout the whole civil service, that only 80 per cent of the employees in any department shall be permanent.

Mr. LENNARD: Are these employees engaged by the civil service commission?

Mr. POWER: Yes, all of them.

Mr. GREEN: How many members of this staff are returned men?

Mr. POWER: Ex-service men comprise 92 per cent of the male staff of the whole department.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any reason why it should not be 100 per cent?

Mr. POWER: There are such employees as office boys, and I suppose there is an odd instance of a technical man who has managed to get in. Then there are a few men who are not ex-service men, who have been in the department since its inception. I think my hon. friend would be pretty well satisfied if every department could show 92 per cent of ex-service men.

Mr. LENNARD: Why have the office boys' salaries been materially reduced?

Mr. POWER: I do not know that they have been, but I shall be glad to look into the matter and have the office boys call on my hon. friend and see that he is satisfied.

Mr. LENNARD: Would the minister explain the item of $80,000 for transportation and travelling expenses?

Mr. POWER: That is for the travelling expenses of the quorum members, who, as my hon. friend knows, travel from one end of the country to the other and hold sittings; also for travelling expenses of pensioners and applicants. Reverting to the question of office boys, I find that there were two office boys, and now we have only one, so I shall be able to send only one to my hon. friend.

Mr. MacNEIL: Consequent upon the amendments of 1936 in regard to the staff of medical officers, I see there is a reduction of only one. Has their status in any degree been altered, or were there any transfers from the department to the commission? Are they solely responsible to the commission and not in part to the minister?

Mr. POWER: Generally speaking, the medical men who were connected with the pension commission have remained there. There has been no very great change. One was transferred to the health branch of the department because we needed a new man.

Mr. BAKER: Has the minister studied and is he quite satisfied with the expense of running this department in relation to the amount of money the returned men are actually receiving? What percentage of the amount the men actually receive in money does the cost of operating the department represent?

Mr. POWER: We have had calculations and estimates of that made during the last twenty years, and generally the minister contents himself with saying that the cost of administration is about three per cent. My hon. friend would probably find that it is more if he went into it, because I know that when I was sitting opposite I satisfied myself that the cost of administration, if one took into consideration overhead and one thing and another, would probably go over three per cent. But that arbitrary figure, so to speak, has been fixed for the last fifteen or twenty years, and we all stick by it because we do not know of any other. I move, Mr. Chairman, that this item stand.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise divisions—general administration, $1,106,150.

Mr. LENNARD: What is the explanation of the increase in this item?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): The net increase in this item is $96,490, accounted for in this way: the increase in permanent salaries amounts to $82,990, made up as follows: Restoration of five per cent deduction, $44,880; statutory increases, $24,765; thirty-five temporaries made permanent, $33,840; salaries of three employees transferred from undervaluation branch and one from investigation branch, $5,880; additional amount required due to reclassifications and promotions, $5,065; making a total of $114,430. From that must be deducted the following: sixteen positions abolished, $23,865; saving by the promotion of officers at less salaries than paid their predecessors, $7,575; making total reductions of $31,440. That makes a net increase of $82,990, which accounts for the greater part of the $96,490 increase. The remainder is made up as follows: There is an increase of $25,700 in printing and stationery; a decrease of $10,000 in temporary salaries, and a decrease of $2,200 in travelling expenses. If the hon. member will add the $25,700, and subtract the $10,000 and the $2,200, he will get the net increase of $96,490.

Mr. BAKER: Why should the general administration costs of this department rise so much? It is true that the revenues collected are considerably more than last year, but the collections are made largely on the same number of items, the only difference being that the items themselves are larger. For example, it should not cost the department any more to collect $5,000 of a man's income tax than if $2,000 were collected from him the year before. How does the minister explain such a big increase in the administration? In round figures, surely only the same amount of work has to be done.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have just explained it. The greater part of it is due to the restoration of the five per cent deduction. That comes to $44,880, and the statutory increases amount to $24,765. Then certain officers who have been classified as temporary have been made permanent, and that moves them from other estimates into these particular estimates and accounts for the increase of $33,840. I do not know that I can give the hon. gentleman any better explanation than that; but he will see that when you have to add nearly $45,000 on account of the restoration of the five per cent cut, and nearly $25,000 because of statutory increases, that is quite a big part of the increase which is shown here.

Mr. BAKER: Is that the final five per cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BAKER: Then are we safe in saying, or can we hope, that you do not anticipate the continuance of this great big increase of $96,000 every year in the running of the administration?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not anticipate it, no. One can never tell. The hon. gentleman has himself pointed out quite a notable fact, that the collections of the Department of National Revenue as a whole—I am not speaking now of the customs and excise divisions—have increased enormously in the past two years. I quote now from memory and in round figures: In the twelve months just before I took over the office in October, 1935, the net collections for the department of national revenue were about $305,000,000, and for the twelve months two years later they were about $435,000,000. There has been a very great increase in the amount collected, and it is accounted for not merely by larger sums being obtained from the same number of transactions, but by a very great increase in the number of transactions, making necessary some increase in staff. But the figures that I have given show that most of the increases here are made up, not at all by an increase in staff, but by restoration of the five per cent deduction and by statutory increases. The increase in staff is shown in the details at the back of the book.

Mr. BAKER: Of course it is quite true that improved conditions of trade and commerce in Canada and generally throughout the world have naturally caused bigger collections to be made. But while we are making bigger collections, the effort of the department, one would think, would be to endeavour to get the same revenues at the same cost if possible. However, I am pleased to hear that the minister, in view of this five per cent now being added, which is the final addition to the one hundred per cent salaries that have been drawn, does not anticipate in the future these continued additions to general administration costs.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall take the last five years, for example, and give, not the figures of revenues and expenditures but the percentage cost of collection. Starting at 1930, that is for the year 1930, the percentage cost of collection in customs and excise was 3·30 per cent; in 1931, 4·45; in 1932, 4·87; in 1933, 3·86; in 1934, 3·37; in 1935, 2·97; in 1936, 3·20; in 1937, 2·71; and for the first nine months of 1937-38, 2·45.

Mr. BAKER: Of course the more you collect the less the percentage should be.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, it is going down pretty rapidly.

Mr. BAKER: It is quite natural that it should.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. SPENCE: That was not due to the minister's efforts; that was due to better times.

Mr. STEWART: I notice on page 147 of the estimates that the cost of temporary assistance for the year 1938-39 is estimated at $415,395, while for 1937-38 it was $210,455. That seems a striking increase in that service. Would the minister give the committee some details or an explanation of the reasons for that increase?

Mr. ILSLEY: This does not come under the vote that we are discussing, because temporary assistance is not under general administration, but I have no objection to going into it now if the hon. gentleman would prefer that I do so. One of the reasons for some increase in temporary assistance—

Mr. STEWART: It is nearly double.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but a large item was due to a change in policy with regard to overtime. In this department there had grown up over the years the practice of paying a large number of customs officers very large sums for overtime services. The rate paid for overtime work was substantially higher than that paid for ordinary work. During the past year we have made a substantial—I was almost going to say a drastic—change of policy in that regard, and whereas the overtime paid by the department for the year 1936-37 was $228,639.51, the overtime paid by the department for the first nine months of the present year 1937-38 was only $13,216.27. So we have cut out the greater part of our payments for overtime. But we have been obliged to take on about 140 or 145 additional officers, who appear in the item to which the hon. gentleman has referred—temporary assistance. That would be the main reason for the increase in temporaries. But there has been some increase in temporaries apart from overtime, due to the increase in activities on the frontier. There has been a tremendous increase in tourist business and also a very large increase in imports.

Mr. STEWART: I thank the minister for connecting those two items, because the next question I proposed to address to him was as to the difference between the items of overtime in 1937-38 and in 1938-39. On the same page, in 1937-38 the overtime was $294,952, and for the current year it is $150,000, a difference of about $144,000 of a saving in overtime. But for temporary assistance the increase is much greater than the saving in the payments in respect of overtime.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not very much.

Mr. STEWART: Well, substantially so. It is an increase, and I suppose the only answer that the minister can make is that it is giving an additional number of men employment; but it is really not effecting an economy in the end.

Mr. ILSLEY: It did effect an economy. I am not sure whether it was a large economy, but it is not as my hon. friend has just put it. The number that have been taken on are doing more work than was being done by the overtime men. There has been an increase in the number of temporaries to do the work that was performed by the officers who had been doing overtime, and there has also been an increase in the number of other temporaries. We had to do this in order to meet increased business. If we had left the overtime system as it was we would have had to increase the staff substantially to take care of the increased business in export, import, tourist business and excise.

Mr. LAWSON: With respect to this item No. 204, would the minister be good enough to indicate whether the appointment of the temporary employees as permanent was in the customs or the excise division or in both; and in either event what type of employees were they whose status was changed from temporary to permanent?

Mr. ILSLEY: The change of status took place in the customs and excise divisions. This vote deals with general administration at head office of the customs and excise divisions, and the change took place in both. These temporaries were made permanent.

Mr. LAWSON: That is something in the routine of events; it is not a matter of taking a group?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. LAWSON: Following through to page 141 I find that there have been apparently several new appointments of importance. The minister will see an item with regard to a "dominion customs appraiser, values," and immediately under that there is provision for a secretary, customs division. Apparently there was not a secretary in 1937-38. Will the minister tell me the name of the present secretary and when he was appointed? Was it a civil service appointment?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is merely a reclassification; these individuals do not represent additional appointees. Mr. Taylor is now secretary of the customs division; last year he was head clerk. The same applies to the position of assistant secretary.

Mr. LAWSON: Customs division?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: A little further down the page there is provision for a chief, customs check branch. Is that a promotion or a new appointment?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a promotion. My hon. friend will see that there is a large reduction in the other column of head clerks. These are simply called by different names. They are reclassifications, and do not represent new people brought in.

Mr. LAWSON: May I take it that all the instances in the column showing the number of persons holding positions in 1937-38, which indicate what would appear to be new appointments in the column for 1938-39, are promotions and not new appointments?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: But there are twenty-two new appointments.

Mr. ILSLEY: These are temporaries made permanent. If the committee would permit me, my colleague the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) would like to get into committee to-night, and I shall not ask that this item be passed. We could let the item stand and call an item to enable the Minister of Transport to get in.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Marine Service—maintenance and repairs to wharves, $7,500.

Mr. BROOKS: This is a small item for the maintenance and repair of wharves in Canada. Where are these repairs being carried out?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): There are some two thousand wharves entrusted to the Department of Transport for management. The item covers small repairs to these wharves, the average item being under $50. If there are major repairs to be carried out, the work is done by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. BROOKS: Are these wharves in inland waters or on the sea?

Mr. HOWE: Both. Last year the following amounts were spent: Nova Scotia, $693.42; Prince Edward Island, $1,524; New Brunswick, $193; Quebec, $1,035; Montreal, $521; Prescott, $100; Parry Sound, $1,257; British Columbia, $567. These are the amounts that were spent in the different agencies.

Mr. LENNARD: What is the reason for the increase in connection with lighting?

Mr. HOWE: There is no increase in the main item; it is the same as it has been for the last three years.

Mr. LENNARD: An increase is shown here.

Mr. STIRLING: Does $4,500 provide for the lighting of all government wharves in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. LENNARD: An increase is shown for lighting of $750 as compared with last year's item.

Mr. HOWE: There has been a reallocation of the item; the total of the item is not changed. We transferred about $1,000 out of materials and supplies into the lighting item because experience has shown that a larger expenditure is required for lighting and a lower expenditure for materials.

Mr. STEWART: How much was spent last year out of the corresponding vote?

Mr. HOWE: Last year we spent $7,135.

Item agreed to.

To provide for breaking ice in Thunder bay, lake Superior, and other points deemed advisable in the interests of navigation, $30,000.

Mr. STIRLING: What does "and other points" mean?

Mr. HOWE: The contract for ice-breaking in Thunder bay covers one or two small adjacent harbours. I think this is the third or fourth year this contract has been in force.

Mr. STEWART: What was spent last year out of the corresponding item, and to whom were the payments made?

Mr. LAWSON: Is it one company or several?

Mr. HOWE: Last year there was spent $30,000. It is a contract calling for an annual payment of $30,000. The contract was with Sinmac Lines Limited.

Mr. STEWART: What does the contract require the contractor to do?

Mr. HOWE: It calls for him to open the harbour, commencing at a date set by the marine branch, and to maintain navigation in the autumn up to a date specified by the marine branch for closing navigation in that harbour. It also includes transportation of lighthouse keepers to certain lights, and opening of harbours such as Rossport and, I think, possibly one or two other small harbours nearby.

Mr. STEWART: Were tenders invited for this service, and is there a written contract for it?

Mr. HOWE: There is a written contract for it. The contract was renewed last year at the same rate as before. It is a three year contract, that expired last year and was renewed at the same rate for three more years. The price we have now is one of the lowest contract prices we have ever had for that service.

Item agreed to.

To provide for Canada's share of the cost of the north Atlantic ice patrol, $6,000.

Mr. STIRLING: What is undertaken by Canada under this patrol?

Mr. LAWSON: And with whom?

Mr. HOWE: The north Atlantic ice patrol was set up in 1914. Thirteen different nations are parties to the agreement. The patrol has been managed by the United States, and the cost is divided among the various nations in agreed proportions. Canada's share of the cost is three per cent per annum, and the cost varies slightly from year to year but Canada's share never exceeding $6,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Do Canadian ships carry out the patrol?

Mr. HOWE: The work is done by United States ships.

Mr. STEWART: What was expended last year under the corresponding vote?

Mr. HOWE: In 1936 the amount expended was $4,566, and in the previous year, $5,331.

Item agreed to.

Marine service administration, $18,040.

Mr. BROOKS: Will the minister explain the increase over the previous year?

Mr. HOWE: The increase is made up of statutory increases, $240, and restoration of salary deduction, $740.25.

Item agreed to.

Administration of floating equipment, $28,835.

Mr. BROOKS: What is meant by floating equipment?

Mr. HOWE: The equipment of the department, boats of all kinds, was administered in earlier years by several branches of the department, by the ship channel branch, the dominion steamers and the ice-breakers. All our boats are now administered by this branch. The moneys covered by this item were formerly in the ship channel vote, the vote for miscellaneous services relating to navigation, and the dominion steamers and ice-breakers vote. Now we have a branch which manages boats of all kinds belonging to the Department of Transport.

Mr. STEWART: I assume from the minister's statement that this vote does not include any floating equipment under the control and operation of the Department of Public Works. Those remain as they were?

Mr. HOWE: Quite right. It relates only to those of the Department of Transport.

Mr. STEWART: I understood the minister to say it included all the floating equipment of the government.

Mr. HOWE: No; the floating equipment of the Department of Transport.

Mr. BENNETT: Does this include the operation of dredges?

Mr. HOWE: Such dredges as we have.

Mr. BENNETT: While you have sold during the year, have you not, a large number of these, you still have the same number of men and the same expenditure?

Mr. HOWE: The men were there before but their duties have been reallocated. There has been a readjustment. We had no vote last year to correspond with this, but the men were in the department last year.

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister give the committee more details of the floating equipment, of what it consists?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The minister could have that information for the next sitting.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 16, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

THE UNION JACK

DISPATCH FROM COLONIAL SECRETARY REFERRED TO IN DEBATE ON A CANADIAN FLAG

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Yesterday the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) asked if I would lay on the table the dispatch from Colonial Secretary Harcourt concerning the flag that is flown in Canada, to which reference had been made on the previous evening. I have the dispatch in my hand and I think it would be of interest to hon. members generally to be apprised of it. If the house will permit, I should like to read the communications. The first is:

Ebenezer, Saskatchewan, Canada,
March 11, 1911.

The Secretary,
His Imperial Majesty,
King George V.

My Lord,

I am the teacher at one of the public schools in the Canadian northwest.

An order has recently been issued by the department of education that every school in the dominion shall fly the national flag, and there seems some uncertainty amongst the people in this locality as to the flag this school shall have. I hold that the Union Jack pure and simple, is the national flag of the British empire throughout the world; but find some people on this side of the Atlantic have a notion that the "red ensign" with Canadian coat of arms (the naval flag) should be used in Canada.

[Mr. Howe.]

I shall be much obliged therefore if you would say which is in order.

Trusting to receive the favour of your reply.

I beg, etc.,
John F. Stedman.

Colonial Secretary Harcourt wrote to the Governor General in connection with this letter as follows:

Downing Street,
12 April, 1911.

My Lord,

I have the honour to transmit to Your Excellency a copy of a letter received by the King's private secretary from Mr. J. F. Stedman respecting the national flag to be flown in Canada.

I shall be glad if Your Excellency will cause the writer to be informed that the Union Jack is the national flag of Canada as of all other parts of His Majesty's dominions.

I have the honour to be,
My Lord,
Your Lordship's most obedient, humble servant,
L. Harcourt.

Governor General,
His Excellency,
The Right Honourable,
Earl Grey, G.C.M.G., G.C.V.O.,
&c. &c.

There are two other communications I should like to read, the first being:

Ottawa, Ontario,
2nd May, 1912.

The Secretary of State for the Colonies,
London.

Dear Sir,

Will you kindly inform me what is, according to correct usage, the proper flag for a citizen of the British empire to use in his own grounds or on his house on say 24th May or Dominion day or other occasion when flags are used.

I mean by this, is the red ensign correct on land: as it is said by some to be the exclusive flag of the merchant marine. Is the flag of Canada correct for this decorative purpose? (Red ensign with badge of Canada in the fly.) Is the Union Jack correct? May any or all of these flags be used by a private citizen, who has no official rank?

Kindly address me, care of the general office: National Transcontinental railway, Ottawa, Ontario, Canada.

Yours very truly,
George S. Hodgins.

The next communication reads:

Downing Street,
21st May, 1912.

Sir:

I have the honour to transmit to your Royal Highness a copy of a letter from Mr. G. S. Hodgins in regard to the flag which should be used by private persons who are British subjects.

2. I should be glad if you would be good enough to cause Mr. Hodgins to be informed that the Union flag is the national flag of Canada as of all other parts of His Majesty's dominions. and may be flown on land by all British subjects: and that the red ensign, with the arms of the dominion of Canada in the fly, is intended to be used only by Canadian merchant vessels.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your Royal Highness' most obedient humble servant,
L. Harcourt.

Governor General
His Royal Highness
The Duke of Connaught and of Strathearn,
K.G., K.T., K.P., G.C.B., G.C.S.I.,
G.C.M.G., G.C.I.E., G.C.V.O.,
&c., &c., &c.,

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): It will be remembered that I directed the attention of the house to the fact that the colonial secretary did not of his own motion undertake to declare officially what was the Canadian flag. It will be recalled that I made that quite clear on the pages of Hansard. My argument has been abundantly verified; for it will be observed that Mr. Harcourt was simply answering a question which had been directed to His Majesty the King by a citizen in Saskatchewan. It would hardly be correct to say that that was the first official statement as to what the flag of Canada was; for there was a circular showing that the official flag of the whole British Empire was what was called the union jack, and it was not until long after that, that there was any question of any other flag being used by any part of the king's dominions. But the point I tried to make was that under no circumstances did the colonial secretary undertake to indicate what the position was except in answer to an inquiry directed to the king by the teacher in Saskatchewan.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to discuss the matter, but what my right hon. friend has just stated makes it necessary for me to point out that what he has said is not entirely correct. It is correct with respect to one of the communications I read, but not with respect to the other. The second communication was from George S. Hodgins of Ottawa, addressed to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, London, not to the secretary of His Majesty at all, asking if he could be informed as to the correct usage in respect to the flag, and the secretary of state replied to the governor general—there was no reference to His Majesty or to His Majesty's secretary—that he would be glad if the governor general would cause Mr. Hodgins to be informed that the union flag was the national flag of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: And it was in answer to an inquiry. That is the point I was making.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 24, to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1929.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—EMPLOYEES

Mr. BOULANGER:

What are the names, duties and salaries of employees of the Department of Agriculture of Quebec who carry out work controlled and paid for by the federal Department of Agriculture?

Mr. RINFRET (for Mr. Gardiner): Nil.

RUSSIAN COAL IMPORTATIONS

Mr. LENNARD:

How many tons of coal were imported into Canada from Russia during the twelve months ending December 31, 1937?

Mr. EULER:

146,656 tons (of 2,000 pounds).

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. FAIR:

1. How many bushels of wheat were held by the Canadian Wheat Board on January 1, 1937?

2. How many bushels were purchased during the year 1937?

3. How many bushels were held on December 31, 1937?

4. Are the officials of the wheat board still drawing salary?

5. What was the cost of operating the wheat board in 1937?

Mr. EULER:

1. 54,491,000 bushels.

2. No purchases made during 1937.

3. 6,961,000 bushels, of which 6,557,000 bushels were cash wheat converted from futures into cash wheat suitable for seed and sold to the Saskatchewan government for spring delivery. The balance of 404,000 bushels were futures.

4. Only the chairman.

5. As the board operates on a fiscal year ending July 31, no figures are available showing costs for the calendar year. The net cost for the fiscal year was $111,359.83.

I might add a word of explanation with regard to the answer to the fourth question, which asks whether the officials of the wheat board are still drawing salary. I take this to mean the commissioners constituting the board. Of course, the regular staff of the board are still receiving salary because they are still discharging their duties.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S OFFICE

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. How many new appointments were made in the Auditor General's office last year?
2. How many promotions were made in the Auditor General's office last year?
3. Who made the recommendations for promotions in the Auditor General's office?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Fourteen.
2. Nine.
3. Promotions are made by the civil service commission on the basis of ratings prepared by the chiefs of branches and supervisory officers of this office.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—LEGAL COUNSEL IN PROSECUTIONS, THREE RIVERS

Mr. GARIEPY:

1. Since January 1, 1936, was Mr. Fernand Choquette, K.C., of the city of Quebec, or Mr. Gerard Fauteux, K.C., of the city of Montreal, engaged by the Department of Justice in actions instituted by the said department, or by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, in the judicial district of Three Rivers?
2. If so, what were said actions?
3. What sums were paid to the said Fernand Choquette or Gerard Fauteux for their services?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East):

1. Yes, both of them, with J. Louis Marchand, Esq., of Three Rivers, P.Q., as associate counsel, in cases instituted by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, in the circumstances set forth in No. 2.

2. The actions concern persons involved in an organization which covered a large area in the province of Quebec for the purpose of transporting and distributing illicit alcohol.

To date, 43 charges have been preferred under the provisions of the criminal code for conspiracy to defraud the revenue.

Investigations by the R.C.M. Police prior to the preferring of charges covered a period of almost two years and Messrs. Gerard Fauteux, K.C., and Fernand Choquette, K.C., were the original appointees as counsel for the Crown to assist in segregating the evidence and preparing charges entered at Montreal, Quebec City and Three Rivers, P.Q.

In view of the importance of these cases and the long study which the two legal counsel gave them from their inception, it was essential that their services be retained to prosecute at the three points mentioned.

The following persons who had been engaged in the transportation and distribution of illicit alcohol were charged at Three Rivers, P.Q., with "conspiracy" under the provisions of sections 444 and 575 of the criminal code, and in addition, under Section 169 of the Excise Act: Ovila Champagne, St. Stanislas, P.Q.; Adelard Champagne, St. Stanislas, P.Q.; Hérve Duchesneau, Three Rivers, P.Q.; Ludger Duchesneau, Three Rivers, P.Q.; Remi Bousquet, Three Rivers, P.Q.; Raymond Thiffeault, Three Rivers, P.Q.; J. Bte. Demers, Grand Mère, P.Q.; Ovila St. Jean, Laviolette, P.Q.; Lionel Audet, La Sarre, P.Q.; Noel J. Begin, La Sarre, P.Q.; Albert Fortin, Jonquière, P.Q.; Andre Roy, La Tuque, P.Q.

In addition Ovila Champagne was charged under section 157 of the criminal code for attempting to bribe a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who investigated these cases.

In all the aforementioned actions the following were employed as legal counsel:

(1) Gerard Fauteux, Esq., K.C., Montreal.

(2) Fernand Choquette, Esq., K.C., Quebec City.

(3) J. Louis Marchand, Esqu., as Associate Counsel, Three Rivers, P.Q.

3. Gerard Fauteux, Esq., K.C., $1,544.74.

Fernand Choquette, Esq., K.C., $1,081.18.

J. Louis Marchand, Esq., nothing paid to date as account not yet received.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES INSPECTION SERVICE

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

What is the total amount that has been collected by the weights and measures service in connection with scale inspections since January 1, 1930, under the following headings: (1) fees; (2) cartage; (3) special expenses?

Mr. EULER: As the records of the weights and measures inspection service are based upon the fiscal year, figures for calendar years are not available. Further, it is impossible to segregate fees collected for scale, inspection and the following statement gives the total fees collected in connection with the inspection of all trade equipment for the fiscal years, as indicated:—

Fiscal Year	Inspection Fees	Cartage	Special Expenses
1929-1930	$341,151 30	$54,491 75	$5,976 80
1930-1931	358,402 75	49,080 90	6,135 15
1931-1932	349,195 30	47,892 05	2,801 20
1932-1933	332,244 80	47,134 90	3,289 30
1933-1934	347,497 20	46,651 75	1,707 10
1934-1935	351,414 65	46,810 90	2,214 10
1935-1936	346,592 75	47,050 60	1,824 20
1936-1937	342,583 15	44,481 50	2,892 15
1937-Jan. 1938	304,362 73	36,462 90	4,492 12

PROTECTION OF RAILWAY CROSSINGS

Mr. LANDERYOU:

1. How many railway crossings in Canada were protected by bell and wigwag signals in the years 1930 to 1937 inclusive, giving the number for each year?

2. How many accidents occurred at railway crossings protected by bell and wigwag signals, giving the number of people killed or injured, in each of the years 1930 to 1937 inclusive?

3. To what tests were the bell and wigwag signals subjected in Canada before they were finally adopted by the railway commission?

4. Where are the bells and wigwag automatic railway crossing signals manufactured?

5. How many were purchased by the government in each of the years 1930 to 1937 inclusive?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Year	Bells and Wigwags
1930	374
1931	430
1932	437
1933	445
1934	461
1935	507
1936	585
1937	616

Note: The protections shown above are those towards which a grant was made from the grade crossing funds. We have no record of such protections installed without assistance from the board's funds.

2. Year	Accident	Killed	Injured
1930	24	13	26
1931	15	8	17
1932	24	17	23
1933	19	8	26
1934	22	5	20
1935	24	10	32
1936	20	12	26
1937	27	11	38
Totals	175	84	208

3. Inspections were made of installations in the United States where they have been in use and their efficiency established.

4. In the United States.

5. The board of railway commissioners do not purchase equipment of this nature.

GENERAL DREDGING CONTRACTORS LIMITED

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Has the federal government given any guarantee or made any promise or agreement of payment to the General Dredging Company Limited?

2. If so, what is the amount of such guarantee, and for what purpose was it given?

3. Has the government paid any money to the General Dredging Company Limited during 1936 and 1937? If so, what amounts have been paid, and for what purpose?

4. Is the government renting any equipment belonging to the General Dredging Company Limited? If so, (a) did any of such equipment formerly belong to the dominion government; (b) what are the terms of rental?

5. How much money has been paid to the General Dredging Company Limited in each of the years 1929 to 1935 inclusive?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3.

Payments	Work concerned—Dredging
* Fiscal year 1936-37 $ 2,117,561 27	St. Lawrence Ship Channel
" " 1937-38 2,061,814 57	" " " "
$ 4,179,375 84

4. No.

5.	Payments	Work concerned—Dredging
Fiscal year 1929-30	.....	St. Lawrence Ship Channel
" " 1930-31	$ 273,654 54	" " " "
" " 1931-32	1,926,824 17	" " " "
" " 1932-33	2,240,628 46	" " " "
" " 1933-34	2,270,350 00	" " " "
" " 1934-35	4,729,999 87	" " " "
" " 1935-36	5,382,988 49	" " " "
	$16,824,445 53

SALE OF SOREL SHIPYARD AND ST. LAWRENCE SHIP CHANNEL DREDGING FLEET

Mr. GARIEPY:

1. Since January 1, 1937, has the government sold, in whole or in part, the government shipyards located in the district of Sorel, or the government fleet operating on the St. Lawrence or Richelieu rivers?

2. If so, to whom, when and for what price?

3. Were such sales made after tenders were called?

4. If so, what were the names of the tenderers and the amount of their respective tenders?

5. If only part was sold, what are the details?

6. If the said transaction was made without tenders being called, why were tenders not asked?

7. On whose recommendation was such transaction made?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. (a) General Dredging Contractors Limited; (b) July 22, 1937; (c) $1,708,544.

3. Sale was by a negotiated agreement.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. Sale included the property known as the government shipyard, together with wharves, buildings and other structures, equipment, machinery, stores, etc., also the vessels comprising the St. Lawrence ship channel dredging fleet, including floating or other equipment, together with their gear, machinery and accessories, also certain surplus marine equipment connected with Montreal harbour.

6. Having decided to go out of the dredging business because of uneconomic costs, it became necessary to dispose of the Sorel shipyard which had been operated chiefly for the repair and maintenance of the dredging fleet. Only one concern was in a position to take over the shipyard and plant, namely, General Dredging Contractors, Limited, who had the St. Lawrence ship channel contract, and the offer of that firm was accepted.

7. On the recommendation of the officers of the marine branch of the department

[Mr. Howe.]

CANADIAN PAVILION AT PARIS EXPOSITION

Mr. LECLERC:

1. What are the names and nationalities of salaried employees who constituted the personnel of the Canadian pavilion at the Paris exposition last year?

2. Did the government make an exhibition of Canadian folk-lore?

3. If so, of what did it consist?

4. What are the names of the individuals who were in charge of this exhibit in the Canadian pavilion and outside?

5. Were these exhibits good advertising for Canada?

6. Did the government receive any complaints from Canadian visitors to the exposition, and, if so, from whom, and of what nature?

7. Is the same exhibit to be shown at the Glasgow exposition this year, and will it be in charge of the same representatives?

Mr. EULER:

1. Oscar Belanger, M.P., commissioner, French Canadian; J. O. Turcotte, exhibition commissioner, French Canadian; J. U. Bayard, building superintendent, French Canadian; Miss Musso, stenographer, French; J. Barada, attendant, Canadian; Miss Gendrau, in charge of information bureau, French Canadian.

2. In the proper meaning of the word, no, but there was an exhibit of the traditional arts and handicrafts of Canada.

3. Semi-precious stones, silver and gold, clay pottery, sculpture, book binding, wood carving, rugs, quilts and Indian work.

4. Madame Juliette Gaultier, French Canadian.

5. Yes.

6. Only two complaints were received by the department from visitors, as follows:—

(1) From W. C. Rean, Toronto, to the effect that the Canadian pavilion was closed at 7 p.m.; (2) from Thomas Dickson, the Hampton Manufacturing Company, Limited, Montreal, who claims to have visited the exhibition one morning and found no one in charge of the building or the exhibits.

As regards the first complaint, it might be explained that out of 40 countries participating, only four kept their exhibits open during the evening, due to the requirements under the French law of employing a double staff. As regards the second, it is inconceivable that the Canadian building would be without staff at any time.

7. No, as this is an industrial exhibition.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—EMPLOYEES

Mr. PURDY:

What are the names, positions and respective salaries of the full time employees of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Mr. HOWE: On Monday last I thought it necessary to advise the house of the parallel between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and Canadian National Railways, and to say that, in the matter of each, the government must decline to divulge to the house matters having entirely to do with the internal affairs of the corporation. I stated at that time and I repeat that if any hon. member wishes a committee of the house to call the officers of the broadcasting corporation before it and to ask them to bring any documents that may be required, I shall be glad to recommend to the government that this be done.

LANDS VACATED BY SOLDIER SETTLERS

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. How many parcels of land have been vacated by soldier settlers?

2. What was the total indebtedness against these parcels at time of vacation?

3. How many of these parcels were resold to others, and what was their total sales value?

4. How many of these parcels were disposed of to municipalities free of cost or as gifts?

5. How many of these parcels were disposed of otherwise, giving particulars?

Mr. COLDWELL: Withdrawn.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

RETURNED SOLDIER INSURANCE

Mr. LANDERYOU:

1. What are the total number of policies issued by the commissioners of the returned soldiers insurance to persons who have seen service in: (a) France; (b) other war areas in the great war?

2. How many of these policies were cancelled by death of the insured?

3. How many of the above policy holders have surrendered their policies for a cash surrender value?

4. What are the total number of policies that have been issued to persons who never saw service beyond the shores of Canada during the great war, the number of these policies cancelled by the death of the insured, and the number of policies that have been surrendered for a cash surrender value?

5. What are the total number of policies issued to disability beneficiaries, the number of these policies that have been cancelled by the death of the insured?

6. What are the total number of policies issued to persons who never saw service beyond the British Isles during the great war, giving the number of policies that have been cancelled by the death of the insured and the number of policies that have been cancelled by cash surrender value?

ELIMINATION OF RAILWAY CROSSINGS

Mr. MULLINS:

1. How many railway crossings were eliminated each year since 1931, inclusive?

2. Where were they located?

3. What was the cost of the elimination of each of these crossings?

4. Who paid for same, and in what proportion in each case?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

WHEAT STATISTICS

Mr. PERLEY:

For a return showing, (a) complete details of that portion of the 1935-1936 wheat crop disposed of by the Canadian wheat board between July 31, 1936, and December 31, 1937; (b) complete details of the disposal by the Canadian wheat board of wheat acquired from the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, from July 31, 1936, to December 31, 1937.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am sure that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) will believe me when I say that there is not the slightest intention of withholding from him or from other members of the house any information which can be obtained with a reasonable degree of expenditure of time. I communicated with the chief commissioner of the wheat board with regard to the question, and I have a telegram from him stating that the securing of this information—

. . . involves complete details of sales of approximately 84 million bushels comprising innumerable entries. Tabulation and typing this information is vast undertaking. Our staff working under pressure and will be for next two months preparing for distributing seed and feed grain and if details as requested require be furnished shall have to employ additional staff under supervision heads of departments who are at present busy other work. Cannot estimate how quickly information could be made available. Assure you board have no deside evade responsibility this matter but imperative present full staff must be employed seed and feed work as time before seeding limited.

I read that to indicate that it is a tremendous task to secure this information, and under the circumstances I suggest to my hon. friend that he might drop the question.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. PERLEY: I cannot see that there is too much detail involved in preparing an answer to this question. A report of the operations of the board in respect to the 1935 crop was issued by the chairman of the board on July 31, 1936. As I remember it, there were some three million and several thousand bushels remaining of the 1935 crop. As the minister has stated, the balance, making up eighty-five or eighty-six million bushels, was taken over from the old wheat board. What I should like to know, and what I think it is quite easy to procure, is the number of bushels, indicating the different grades, and the price at which it was disposed of, in order to find out what would be the balance —a report similar to that which was issued, as the minister knows, on July 31, 1936, to show the final disposition of the balance of the wheat. I do not believe that a report such as was issued on that date would entail very much difficulty. It is not a detailed statement with respect to every man or every firm that bought a bushel of wheat; it is with respect to the number of bushels, the price at which they were sold, and the amount received for the balance.

Mr. EULER: I can only take the motion in the terms in which it is expressed. If the hon. gentleman does not really desire complete details, I suggest that if he could frame a simpler motion which will not entail all the expenditure of time and money that the present motion calls for and will involve, he should do so, and withdraw the present motion and submit another one.

Mr. BENNETT: May I direct the attention of the minister to the fact that the statute creating the wheat board provides that this information shall be sent to the minister, and that it is not from Winnipeg that this is sought; it is the information given in the weekly reports which are sent in and signed by the auditors that should be brought down.

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend surely does not mean to intimate that all details of the various sales of eighty-four million bushels of wheat come to the minister. They assuredly do not.

Mr. BENNETT: Not all the details.

Mr. EULER: That information is in the possession of the board at Winnipeg, and nowhere else, and the information must be compiled by the board in Winnipeg. I am compelled to accept the word of the chairman who, I think, is perhaps more familiar with the work entailed than anyone else is, and I am accepting his word in that regard.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister read the telegram he sent to the chairman?

Mr. EULER: I did not send him a telegram. Just for the information of my suspicious friend—

Mr. BENNETT: Now, the hon. gentleman will withdraw that. There is no reason why he should be thus out of order. Strange as it may seem, he has no right under the rules to say that. I ask the simple question because the rules require that the letter sent should be read as well as the reply. You cannot take one side of it only; and I ask the minister what he asked the Winnipeg people.

Mr. EULER: For the satisfaction of my right hon. friend—and I did not anticipate he would couch his reply quite in the language or the tone in which he did—I may say that when the motion first appeared on the order paper I simply took the leaf out of the order paper, sent it to Mr. McIvor for his comment and made no suggestion whatsoever. I say that in anticipation, perhaps, of something else that might be said.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I did not say "suggestion."

Mr. EULER: I did not indicate in the slightest degree to Mr. McIvor what his answer should be. I will say that in any case. As a matter of fact, I might as well make a complete story of it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, on a question of order, standing order 51 reads:

> Notices of motion for the production of papers which the member asking for the same intends to move without discussion, shall be marked by him with an asterisk and shall be placed by the clerk on the order paper above "Notices of Motions," under the heading "Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers." All such notices when called shall be forthwith disposed of; but, if on any such motion a debate be desired, it shall be transferred by the clerk to the order of notices of motions.

We have been hearing a debate for ten minutes, and I suggest that this motion, if not disposed of immediately, should be transferred to notices of motions.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. minister is right, of course.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point that has been raised is well taken. These notices of motions for production of papers are not debatable.

Mr. EULER: At the risk of offending against the rules, I merely wish to say that my proposal to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) was that perhaps he could frame his motion in a simpler way so that it could be accepted.

Mr. PERLEY: I am agreeable to having it transferred to notices of motions.

Mr. SPEAKER: Transferred to notices of motions.

On the motion of Mr. Perley:

For a return showing, (a) a detailed statement of all copies of cash broker's notes of sales made to the Canadian wheat board since January 1, 1937, to date; (b) a copy of all cash broker's notes of all sales made by the board from January 1, 1937, to date; (c) the names of brokers and clearing sheets of options, bought or sold, since January 1, 1937, to January 1, 1938.

Mr. EULER: Exactly the same objection that I raised to the previous motion applies to this.

Mr. SPEAKER: Transferred to notices of motions.

On the motion of Mr. Perley:

For a detailed statement showing the number of bushels of open trades or interest of the wheat board during September 28, 29, 30 and October 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, 1937.

Mr. EULER: With regard to this motion, the objection seems to be that, as worded, its meaning is not quite clear to the chairman of the wheat board. He does not understand what is meant by the words "or interest," and I suggest to my hon. friend that he draft the motion in such a way as to make perfectly clear what information he desires to obtain.

Mr. PERLEY: I can do that right here; simply strike out those words. I just want to know what were the open trades.

Mr. EULER: That is quite satisfactory.

Mr. RINFRET: According to the rules, the hon. gentleman cannot have three notices of motion under his name, so that if the first one is transferred I do not think it is in order to transfer the other two.

Mr. EULER: This one is not transferred.

Mr. RINFRET: That applies to the second.

Motion as amended agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. Perley:

For (a) statement or report showing amount of durum wheat bought and sold since July 31, 1937, to date, and the price bought and sold at; (b) statement showing amount of sales of durum wheat to Italy, and amount of sales of durum wheat to United States, since January 31, 1936, to date.

Mr. PERLEY: With the permission of the house I should like to amend this motion by inserting the words "by Canadian wheat board" after the word "sold" in the second line.

Mr. EULER: Again at the risk of offending, I suggest that I might answer this question orally: (a) No durum wheat has been bought or sold since July 31, 1937, by the board except for the account of the Saskatchewan government; (b) no direct sales of durum wheat were made by the board to Italy, nor did they make any direct sales of durum wheat to the United States.

Mr. PERLEY: That is quite acceptable, if the minister will agree to give us the amount of wheat sold by the trade to Italy and the United States—the exports.

Mr. EULER: I suggest that my hon. friend put a motion on the order paper.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

On the motion of Mr. Lawson:

For a copy of all contracts made since November 1, 1937, to date, by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or any of its agents on its behalf, with any persons or corporations or the agents of any such persons or corporations for the use of Canadian Broadcasting Corporation stations or chains for broadcasting commercial programs containing advertising originating in the United States, and copies of all papers, letters, telegrams or other documents relating thereto.

Mr. LAWSON: If I might be permitted to say a word, unfortunately when this motion came up on Monday I was absent from the house, and the house kindly allowed it to stand. I have read the utterances of the minister on that occasion. I regret that I cannot concur in the position taken by him, that it is not in the public interest to give this information. On looking into the matter, sir, it would appear—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAWSON: —that it is not a point of order for you—

Mr. DUNNING: Order.

Mr. LAWSON: Well, I raise a point of order. It is very seldom that I offend against the rules of order in this house, and I might have been given the courtesy of being permitted to utter two more sentences. Now I will raise a point of order. I object to this motion being transferred to notices of motions; for if it is it will probably never come up this session and I do not propose to have the discussion sidetracked. My point of order is that I did not mark my notice of motion with an asterisk and therefore I am not within standing order 51 of the house, which I have read with considerable care. Had my motion originally been placed under notices of motions, where the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) so graciously suggested the other day that it might go, I might have been heard in this house. I was merely pointing out to you, Mr. Speaker, that I had come to the conclusion that it was not a matter for your ruling; that the question on which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) and I differ is one for the decision of the house. I desire an opportunity to debate the matter. I am not pressing to debate it now, but I insist that I have an opportunity during this session.

Mr. HOWE: I must repeat what I said on Monday. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as incorporated by this house is an autonomous body with its own board of directors and its own manager—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In order to be impartial I must point out that the rule applies to the Minister of Transport as well.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Lawson) which was negatived on the following division:

YEAS

Messrs:

Anderson	Lawson
Baker	Lennard
Barber	Lockhart
Beaubier	McGregor
Bennett	MacInnis
Betts	MacNeil
Black (Yukon)	MacNicol
Blackmore	Macphail
Brooks	Marsh
Brown	Marshall
Cahan	Massey
Church	Mitchell
Clarke (Rosedale)	Needham
Coldwell	Pelletier
Douglas	Perley
Esling	Poole
Fair	Quelch
Graydon	Rowe (Athabaska)
Hansell	Spence
Hayhurst	Stewart
H aps	Stirling
Hyndman	Tustin
Jaques	Walsh
Johnston (Bow River)	Wermenlinger
Kuhl	White
Landeryou	Woodsworth—52.

NAYS

Messrs:

Barry	McCallum
Beaubien	McCann
Bertrand (Prescott)	McCuaig
Bertrand (Laurier)	Macdonald (Brantford City)
Black (Chateauguay-Huntingdon)	McDonald (Pontiac)
Blair	McDonald (Souris)
Blais	McGeer
Blanchette	McIntosh
Bothwell	McIvor
Bouchard	McKenzie (Lambton-Kent)
Boulanger	MacKenzie (Neepawa)
Bradette	Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre)
Brasset	McKinnon (Kenora-Rainy River)
Brunelle	McLarty
Clark (Essex South)	MacLean (Cape Breton North-Victoria)
Clark (York-Sunbury)	McLean (Melfort)
Cleaver	MacLean (Prince)
Cochrane	McLean (Simcoe East)
Coté	MacLennan
Crerar	McNevin (Victoria, Ont.)
Damude	McPhee
Davidson	MacRae
Deachman	Mallette
Denis	Martin
Deslauriers	Maybank
Donnelly	Michaud
Dubois	Mills
Dunning	Moore
Dussault	Motherwell
Elliott (Kindersley)	Mullins
Emmerson	Mulock
Euler	Neill
Evans	O'Neill
Factor	Parent (Terrebonne)
Fafard	Patterson
Farquhar	Pinard
Ferguson	Plaxton
Ferland	Power
Ferron	Purdy
Finn	Raymond
Fleming	Reid
Fournier (Hull)	Rennie
Francœur	Rhéaume
Fraser	Rinfret
Furniss	Roberge
Gariépy	Robichaud
Gauthier	Ross (Moose Jaw)
Gladstone	St-Père
Glen	Sinclair
Golding	Slaght
Gosselin	Streight
Hamilton	Sylvestre
Hanson	Taylor (Nanaimo)
Hill	Taylor (Norfolk)
Howard	Telford
Howden	Thauvette
Howe	Tomlinson
Ilsley	Tucker
Isnor	Turgeon
Johnston (Lake Centre)	Turner
King, Mackenzie	Veniot
Kinley	Vien
Kirk	Ward
Lacroix (Beauce)	Warren
Lacroix (Quebec-Montmorency)	Weir
Lalonde	Winkler
Lapointe (Matapedia-Matane)	Wood
Lapointe (Quebec East)	Young—140.
Leader
Leclerc
Leduc
Little

Mr. THOMPSON: I was paired with the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. MacMillan). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. SENN: I was paired with the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Sanderson). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. EDWARDS: I was paired with the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Elliott). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

PACIFIC COAST INDIANS

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo):

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams, reports, recommendations, instructions and other documents exchanged between the Minister of Mines and Resources, the Department of Indian Affairs, and any agent or official thereof, and any other persons with respect to the custom of the potlatch amongst Pacific coast Indians, especially of the Kwawkewlth agency.

When I submitted the notice of motion I requested that it be printed without asterisks. Since then I have had a promise of the complete cooperation of the Indian department and for the moment this motion is dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion dropped.

BRITISH COLUMBIA AND YUKON TERRITORY

Mrs. BLACK:

For a copy of all orders in council, letters, telegrams, correspondence and documents of any kind exchanged between the government of Canada or any member thereof and the government of British Columbia or any member thereof, with respect to the Yukon Territory, since the 1st day of April, 1937, to date.

THE CUSTOMS TARIFF

MOTION FOR COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE APPLICATION AND COLLECTION OF DUTIES AND PRACTICE RESPECTING DRAWBACKS

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw) moved:

That a special committee, the members thereof to be selected at a later date, be appointed to investigate:

(a) The application of the Customs Tariff by the officers and clerks of the Department of National Revenue;

(b) The collection of customs duties;

(c) The practice now followed in applying the present law respecting drawbacks;

And that the said special committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and to report from time to time.

He said: Mr. Speaker, speaking in this house on February 3 I said that the people of this country were being regimented into purchasing their supplies from certain people in the country and at prices fixed in accordance with the ideas of those people. I said that the taxing power of parliament had been turned over to privileged interests, and that prices were being artificially raised in this country in order that certain industries might be subsidized. The levying of taxation is a function of parliament. I say now that through successive changes in the Customs Act and the Customs Tariff the authority of parliament in tariff making has been delegated to a department of the government, and that through rules and regulations laid down by that department an importer of goods to-day cannot discover by reading the tariff act as passed by parliament what amount of duty will be charged upon his goods when they arrive at the border.

As a matter of fact the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), as an importer of goods into this country, would be unable to-day to recognize his own handiwork. An act is brought down in this house purporting to set the rates of duty upon articles imported. By the time the rules and regulations of the department are applied the amount of money collected upon those articles is at a rate entirely different from that set by parliament when the act was passed. I am not here criticizing the Department of National Revenue; I am stating that we in this parliament have delegated to a department of the government the tariff-making powers of the House of Commons, and that the passing of a budget now simply becomes a hollow mockery. No importer of goods can gain any idea, from the act that we pass, as to how much money he will have to pay upon the goods being imported. No member of the House of Commons, no ordinary citizen, can import goods and know what he will have to pay. Even the best customs brokers in this country from time to time have to amend their entries in order to comply with the rules and regulations of the Department of National Revenue.

I say, Mr. Speaker, it is high time we in this house, and more especially the members on this side of the house, looked thoroughly into this matter, so that parliament may again perform this important function in order that the importation of goods may not be unduly restricted and discouraged, which of necessity must engender ill-will towards Canada in the countries to which we export. We on this side of the house were elected on a policy of expanding trade, and in many regards this government is entitled to great credit for having followed that policy up to date. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley also has credit due him for his actions in this regard, but there is still a great deal of barbed wire to be cleared away before we shall be able to import goods freely.

The principle of protection in Canada has been furthered in many ways. I will set them out under headings.

1. By the raising of the ad valorem and specific duties.

2. By the expansion of the number of items in the customs tariff.

3. By the fixing of values for duty purposes.

4. By the fixing of value for duty purposes in combination with the application of the anti-dumping legislation covering imports that compete with goods made or produced in Canada.

5. By the extended application of the dumping duty.

6. By drawbacks.

Over a period of years, Mr. Speaker, the ad valorem tariff has been raised in this country, and of late a habit has grown up of adding to that a specific tariff which in many cases amounts to more than the ad valorem rate. To some people this may seem to be a painless method, or perhaps it is done only in order to fool the people, who are the voters. In 1903 there were 645 items in the tariff, of which 447 were dutiable and the remainder free. At the present time there are over fifteen hundred items in the customs tariff, some of which are again subdivided. It is sometimes difficult to raise or lower the tariff upon an item which includes many articles. It is much easier to deal with these things if the item is split in order that it may include, perhaps, only one article. Possibly this has been done in order to mete out tariff favours to some people.

Under heading No. 3, Mr. Speaker, the simplest method of raising the tariff is through the raising of the value for duty purposes. At times it is very difficult to get parliament to raise or lower a tariff, but when parliament has passed the Customs Tariff and parliament has given the Department of National Revenue authority under the Customs Tariff and the Customs Act to value for duty purposes, it is a very simple matter to raise the value placed upon the goods to be imported, and thereby raise the rate simply because there are no members there to protest; simply because the people of Canada generally do not know what is going on.

I intend to use a hundred dollars' worth of goods as an example to show the successive changes in the Customs Act and the Customs Tariff. I am assuming that the rate of tariff has not been changed since 1867 I do not intend to place on Hansard all the amendments to the Customs Tariff and the Customs Act, but I ask the minister to be good enough to place these upon the order paper so that we may all know exactly what changes have been made. In 1867, under the Customs Act, the provision which is now section 35 of the Customs Act read as follows:

> In all cases where any duty is imposed on any goods imported into Canada ad valorem or according to the value of such goods, such value shall be understood to be the fair market value thereof in the principal markets of the country whence the same were exported directly to Canada.

These were the qualifying words in the section dealing with value for duty purposes. That was meant to be the export price of goods in the principal markets of the country of origin. A hundred dollars' worth of goods coming in at forty per cent duty would pay $40. In 1883 the Act was amended and the qualifying section then read:

> The value for duty shall be the fair market value thereof when sold for home consumption in the principal markets of the country of origin.

The home consumption value might mean an addition of ten per cent. Therefore, our one hundred dollars' worth of goods would be increased by ten per cent for the home consumption price. The duty value would then be $110 and with a tariff rate of forty per cent, this would mean the payment of $44. The result would be 44 per cent instead of the forty per cent as passed by the House of Commons.

Three changes were made to this section in 1921. The first change was that the value for duty should be determined by the wholesale price in the country of origin. The second change was that in no case should it be less than the cost of production, plus a reasonable amount for profit, and, third, that the minister was to be the sole judge of what that reasonable amount would be. We now have our hundred dollars' worth of goods with an export price of $100, plus twenty per cent for wholesale price, totalling $120. There would then be a profit of ten per cent if the minister did not happen to be a Canadian manufacturer, or probably twenty per cent if he were. The value for duty would now be $144, which at forty per cent would mean a payment of $57.60 or $57\frac{6}{10}$ per cent as against the forty per cent provided for by the House of Commons.

In 1922 the section was amended to introduce exchange rates, and the value for duty was computed and levied under regulations passed by the minister. The rates set by parliament were used only as figures in the determination of the value. On our hundred dollars' worth of goods the minister's value might be $150. At forty per cent there would be a payment of $60, or a rate of 60 per cent. In 1937 the minister still had the right to determine the value and our example would give the same results.

Section 36 must be read in conjunction with this last section, number 35. In 1907 section 36 set the discount rate for cash that an exporter might allow to an importer. In other words, if an exporter wanted to allow an importer five per cent for cash, the customs department said that that could not be done; that two and a half per cent was the limit that could be allowed in setting the value for duty purposes. In 1930 this section really came into play. Taken along with section 35 it meant that the value for duty of imported goods in no case should be lower than the price to wholesalers or jobbers in the country of origin; that in no case was the value to be lower than the cost of production plus a reasonable advance for selling costs and profit. The minister was to be the sole judge of what that advance should be, and his figures were to be final. This meant that the authority of parliament to set rates had been delegated to the officers of the department.

In 1934 parliament delegated to the governor in council other rights and placed more authority in the hands of the minister and the department. In 1936 this section was amended and the provision that the minister was to be the sole judge was dropped. However, the value for duty was determined by the selling price for home consumption plus a reasonable advance for selling costs and profit. One hundred dollars' worth of goods would have ten per cent added to cover selling costs and twenty per cent to cover profit. This would make the final valuation $132. A rate of forty per cent would mean a payment of $52.80 or 52-8/10ths per cent instead of the forty per cent set by parliament.

This is not all. Customs officials must now be able to determine the production costs in other countries and must be able to state what are reasonable selling costs and what would be a reasonable profit. This is in order that further protection may be given to Canadian manufacturers. The other day I heard a phrase used in this house which sticks in my memory. It was "compensatory adjustments." I should like to know what is meant by "compensatory adjustments." Does it mean that the farmers, the lumbermen, the miners and the fishermen of Canada are to be given the same treatment as the manufacturers of Canada? Does it mean that these people are to be allowed their cost of production with a reasonable advance for selling costs and profit? What a hope that would be, Mr. Speaker! Of course we know it is absurd to imagine that such a thing would be done.

There is no use in endeavouring to spread a disease of this kind in the country. It is now a cancer on the body politic; it is time we put the X-ray on it. That is the reason I ask for this committee. It may take a major operation to correct the disease, but we are fast approaching the point where it will be a question of kill or cure.

Referring now to the fixing of the value for duty purposes in combination with anti-dumping legislation covering imports competing with goods made in Canada, in 1922 an amendment to the Customs Act was passed which gave the minister power to set values for duty purposes and thereby imposed the anti-dumping legislation in order to protect natural products of a class or kind grown or produced in Canada. The purpose of the legislation at that time was to protect growers of fruits and vegetables in this country from undue importations while the Canadian farmers' crops were moving to market. In 1930 this section was amended to cover any goods imported and sold or on consignment under such conditions as would prejudicially or injuriously affect the interest of producers or manufacturers, the minister being given the right to fix the values, and the values so fixed to be construed as the fair market value. Here was the final blow for the importer. He had to guess what the minister and his officials had in their minds and what they would do before he was able to import goods. This amendment was certainly designed and passed to hinder and restrict the flow of trade.

In 1934 the section was amended so that it would not affect empire goods. In 1936 it was again amended, this time to give an importer the opportunity to appeal to the tariff board against the value fixed, but the uncertainties regarding valuation still persist and constitute a decidedly limiting factor in respect to the importation of goods into Canada. By the provisions of this section the minister may fix the value for duty of any goods and his valuation shall be the fair market value. Under this section, in 1937 the minister was given authority to make regional tariffs on fruits and vegetables, and under this section also there was brought down an amendment which, as I read it, certainly amazes me. It is section 43a(1) of the Customs Act:

All values for duty heretofore fixed by or on a basis or by a method prescribed by the minister or the commissioner of customs—

Mark those words.

—or the assistant commissioner of customs, acting or purporting to act pursuant to the provisions of section forty-seven A of the Customs Act, chapter forty-eight of the revised statutes of Canada, 1906, as enacted by section three of chapter eighteen of the statutes of 1922, or of section forty-three of the Customs Act, chapter forty-two of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, or of section forty-three—

And so on with different sections. In other words this was an admission to parliament that although parliament had delegated powers —the widest kinds of powers—to the national revenue department, when they were given those powers they did not stay within them, and the minister had to come to this house and have an amending section passed to sanction the actions of the officials of the department and clothe them with the authority of parliament. Under this section our one hundred dollars' worth of goods becomes whatever the minister, the commissioner of customs or the assistant commissioner of customs wishes to increase it to.

In conjunction with all these sections of the Customs Act there is section 6 of the Customs Tariff, which is the anti-dumping legislation. It first made its appearance in 1904. It was placed there for the purpose of protecting Canadian manufacturers against actual dumping based on the then Customs Act, which placed the value as the value for export in the country of origin. It could not at that time be placed against the free list but only against dutiable goods, and at that time, if any article carried a tariff or combination of tariffs which amounted to fifty per cent ad valorem, the dumping duty could not be applied at all. Besides, it was limited to fifteen per cent as an advance for duty purposes.

In 1907 this section was changed to apply to the free list as well as to the dutiable list. In 1930 a major revision of section 6 of the Customs Tariff took place, which altered the whole basis of tariff making in Canada. This section overrides the whole Customs Act and Customs Tariff in the addition of values and the application of the dumping duty. The increased valuation for duty purposes now becomes proof of dumping, and superduties are imposed. The imposition of an ad valorem tariff of fifty per cent, which previously had exempted the article, was thereby cancelled. The maximum advance for duty purposes of fifteen per cent became fifty per cent. If the invoice for goods to an importer were less than the fair market value of the same article when sold for home consumption in the country of origin, or less than the fair market value as determined under sections 36 and 41, or less than the fair market value fixed under sections 37 or 43, a dumping duty was applied equal to the difference between the invoice price and the fair market value so fixed. In other words, the definition of dumping was altogether changed. Once the department said that the value should be higher, immediately and automatically the dumping duty came into play.

Now take our example, one hundred dollars' worth of goods. Parliament says the tariff rate shall be forty per cent. Value fixed, $200; duty at forty per cent, $80; dumping duty, fifty per cent of the increase, $50, a total of $130, or 130 per cent. Remember also that the import excise tax of three per cent goes on the whole amount of $230 and becomes seven per cent instead of three per cent, making it $137. Add that to the original value of $100 and you have $237 upon which the eight per cent sales tax is computed, instead of $140 as parliament intended it to be.

In 1936 this section was amended to determine what were made in Canada goods. It was established that thenceforth not less than ten per cent of Canadian consumption must be produced in Canada before goods could be classed as made in Canada goods. But, Mr. Speaker, we are still in this position, that one hundred per cent of the consumption of these goods manufactured in Canada must be charged higher prices because the duty must be raised and dumping duties applied in order to protect ten to fifteen per cent of the production which is made in Canada.

Under this protective tariff system we have a system of drawbacks on goods for reexport, and it has the effect of defeating the protection given to certain Canadian industries who produce goods needed by other Canadian manufacturers for their finished articles. The Canadian manufacturer wants protection only one way. He does not want to pay for it on anything he has to buy; he wants it to be paid only on what he has to sell. Therefore when certain goods are purchased by the manufacturer which go into the production of goods that are to be exported, instead of buying from the Canadian protected manufacturer he buys the goods from some other country and claims and receives a drawback thereon.

In addition, there are drawbacks on home consumption goods. You will find several pages of them at the back of the Customs Tariff. These are used in order that some manufacturer in Canada who is producing articles which are not protected, articles which are on the free list, may be able to import goods that are protected and use them in his own goods which are not protected; or it may be that there is a lower tariff on the finished article made in Canada, than there is on the partly finished article entering into its manufacture. Therefore the drawback is allowed in these cases.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another use for the drawback: when the Minister of Finance lowers the protection on the finished article to the Canadian manufacturer, he can return to him a large part by giving him a drawback on imported goods that enter into the manufacture of home consumed goods. Under these circumstances under our protective system it is the greatest wheedler who gets the drawback.

We should look into this matter also to determine whether all the drawbacks that are claimed and paid should be claimed and paid. I contend it is a pretty difficult thing to determine whether the conditions set before the department are really the true conditions, and what brings that to my mind is evidence that came out in regard to certain gentlemen engaged in the textile industry who came to this government and told them they were going to be swamped by the importation of certain goods, and it was found out later that no such condition obtained.

In conclusion, the purpose of my resolution is to prove to parliament and the country that parliament has delegated to departmental officials important taxing powers of parliament, and that this procedure is not in the best interests of the people of Canada.

I ask for a committee for the purpose of bringing before parliament practical men engaged in the importing business to show from their records and from their statements under oath whether or not this delegation of power has had a bad effect on the business life of the people of Canada; to what extent it has raised prices on home manufactured goods to the consumer, and to show that it has lowered the purchasing power of the consumer.

I say to the Minister of National Revenue that the Customs Act and the Customs Tariff have placed upon his shoulders a responsibility that should never have been placed upon the shoulders of any man in Canada. Parliament, through these acts, sir, has directed him to see that the interests of certain Canadian producers or manufacturers shall not be prejudicially or injuriously affected by the importation of goods. There is not one word of direction in those acts in regard to the interests of the great consuming public. These directions defeat the aims of democracy, they take away majority rights and substitute therefor privileges for a small minority. They take from one section of Canada and give to another. They are the negation of freedom; they are the negation of liberalism; they are the means of regimentation of the people; they are the cause of a lower standard of living throughout Canada. They are the main cause of unemployment in the great basic industries of this country. They are unduly restricting and unduly complicating the import and, thereby, the export trade upon which the large percentage of our people live. They maintain prices of imported goods and eliminate healthy competition from abroad, which creates an artificial price level in Canada. They hinder, delay and discourage the flow of imported goods. They cause ill-will toward Canada in the countries where we hope to sell large quantities of our farm products and the products of our mines, forests and fisheries.

These acts are older than some of the infant industries which they are framed to protect ad infinitum.

It is time, Mr. Speaker, that this parliament looked into these matters. It is time we closely considered revamping these acts and making them conform with conditions and needs of the year 1938. Let parliament take back the powers that have been delegated to departmental officials.

As a member of parliament I protest against this way of carrying on the country's business, and I ask parliament to consider this resolution in the best interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort): In rising to second this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I am sure it is entirely needless for me to say that there is no intention on my part—and I know there was none in the minds of those who framed and put the resolution on the order paper—to reflect in any way on the minister (Mr. Ilsley) or his officials, or on their integrity, their intelligence and sense of fair play. Particularly would that not be the case in reference to a minister who during the past few years has made for himself a record which probably has not been excelled by any other minister of the crown administering the customs department since confederation. Every member of this house knows something at least of the burdens that have been cast upon his shoulders, which, as the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) has said, should never have been placed on the shoulders of any one man in Canada.

So far as the officers of the department are concerned, I have less acquaintance with them, but I am just as well satisfied that they are doing everything to the best of their ability to carry out the system under which they are working.

The department that we are asked to investigate is something like Topsy in Uncle Tom's Cabin. It never was made; it just "growed." And the hide-holes and all the rest of it grew up along with it as a result of conditions about which it is needless to speak at the moment.

My opinion with regard to matters of this kind is that it should not require a special motion or resolution of the House of Commons to ensure investigation of departments from time to time. I believe that every department should be subject to investigation by the House of Commons at regular intervals in order to familiarize members with the conduct of business in the various branches of government, to familiarize the heads of departments with the intent of parliament and to familiarize the country with both. It would also enable us to get the reaction of the country to the conduct of affairs if such investigations were carried out openly by members of parliament. I submit that it should be done, and I believe that the time is coming when it will be done.

When the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) was Minister of Agriculture he did everything he could in this house, everything that lay within his power, to bring about a thorough investigation by the House of Commons of his own department, from year to year. I remember sitting where I am now and listening to the minister, as he then was, putting through his estimates. Opposition members would call "Carried" and I remember the then minister saying, "No, t is not carried, and it is not going to be carried until more is told of the work of this department, because this is the only occasion on which that work can be made known to the country."

I suggest that there is no reflection on any department of government in the request for an investigation from time to time for the purpose of familiarizing members of the House of Commons with the detailed operations of that department. In the past twelve years, that is to say, since I first entered this house, and in the intervening years during my absence, I have not known ten per cent of the members of the house, including myself —and I have a fair acquaintance among the members—who were familiar with the detailed workings of the department which we are discussing at the moment. I remarked this to one of my colleagues this morning and he said that I would be safe in cutting the percentage down to five or even less. This is an extremely important department. I do not believe there is another one that touches the people more closely or one with which they are more concerned, except, possibly, the Department of Justice. Some people may think it strange that I should rate these two departments as I do, but in my opinion the Department of Justice is, if anything, the most important of all the departments inasmuch as it so closely affects the life and liberty of the subject. I repeat, the collecting of revenues, and the opportunity to assist or to hinder industry as the case may be, make this an extremely important department.

I will not discuss the question of revenues at the moment, but if I have time later on I will touch upon it. I find, however, that there is considerable bewilderment in the country on the part of some would-be importers with regard to what they have to pay for certain goods, the classification of those goods, and charges and so on. I submit that it is time that the state of uncertainty in this connection was removed. Some years ago I had an inquiry from a would-be importer who wanted to bring in a certain article from the United States to Vancouver. I took the matter up with the department and could not possibly get a rate that would be satisfactorily definite to this man. This was many years ago but I am satisfied that the same condition has prevailed more or less in the years in between. This fact is a source of trouble to a great many people, particularly those in the primary industries. By primary industries I do not mean the farmers of any particular type but all the primary industries, because they are all affected by the customs tariff in the conduct of their business. Of course, this department touches every individual in his purchase of goods.

I am told sometimes that it is better to hide taxes, to cover them up so that the people will not be conscious of what they are paying; but in the process they grow immensely, just as some plants do when you cover them up. If you cover certain plants with the proper material and leave them under proper conditions as to temperature, air and humidity they grow very fast. These charges in connection with the tariff grow apace pretty much in the same way, and for that reason the Chancellor of the Exchequer in Great Britain was right when he said, "I could tax the shirts off the backs of the people of these islands and they would never know what was happening to them if I were allowed to do it by indirect means."

As regards added charges such as I have mentioned, I will not go into any details but I have here a page from one of the oldest newspapers in Canada, the Montreal Daily Herald, of Thursday, November 18, 1937. I find quotations on various cars blazoned all over the page. I will quote a few to show what the tariff does to the people and how important are the operations of the Department of National Revenue. What I am about to quote will convince the house, I believe, of the importance of knowing the workings of the department. There should be no room for suspicion in the mind of anyone that any charge is being made in that department except such as is sanctioned by the parliament of Canada.

I will take one or two motor cars, not manufactured in Canada, at any rate so far as I know. For the Cadillac V-8, 60 type, touring sedan, the price quoted at the New York motor show held not long ago was $2,085, while in Canada the Montreal price was $2,450, according to this reputable newspaper. For the LaSalle V-8 coupe, two passenger, the price in New York was $1,300, and in Montreal $1,890. I do not believe that that car is made in Canada. I am taking the prices at random. Take the Hudson Six types. For the coupe, three passenger, the New York price was $909, and the Montreal price $1,255. For the custom eight touring brougham, capacity six, the New York price was $1,155, and the Montreal price $1,565. The Chrysler, a favourite Canadian make, is quoted at the New York show at $918, while the Montreal price was $1,230. These prices are for the business coupe. The coupe is $963 in New York, and $1,301 in Montreal.

An hon. MEMBER: That is for a used car.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If the $1,301 is for a used car it is still worse. The car will give good service, there is no dispute about quality with respect to these cars, the question is one of price. Take the Chrysler Imperial Eight types. The business coupe, capacity two, was $1,123 in New York, and $1,559 in Montreal.

It might be fair to touch on some of the more commonly sold cars, because, after all, these prices affect a good many people. Let us take the Chevrolet. The Master town sedan was quoted at Plattsburg, New York, at $732, and the Montreal price is $1,040. The coupe de luxe at Plattsburg is $775, and in Montreal $955. I find here a car described as the universal car, a new Ford. The price in Plattsburg of the standard coupe, 85 horsepower, is $688, and in Montreal, $867. The 4-door sedan de luxe, 85 horsepower, five passenger, is $836 in Plattsburg and $1,052 in Canada.

There are many others I could quote; the difference in price is pretty much the same. I will not take up time reading more prices, however. I will simply observe that the people have to face these vast differences, while in many instances the goods they import are of a kind not made in this country. We must all realize, I am sure, how important it is to this house to know the workings of a department of this kind; they should be thoroughly understood, both inside and out. Such a department should live in a glass house open to the public, so that the people might become familiar with its operations. There would then be no room for suspicion, and no one would fear that conditions not sanctioned by parliament existed.

There is another consideration. It is important for Canada that the maximum amount of revenue be collected by the department. Someone might tell me that the argument that the department should collect as much as possible is a strange one for me to use. I say it is important that the maximum revenue be collected. I know of only one way to bring that about, that is to allow the business to increase to its natural maximum, not to put any difficulties in the way. Everyone knows there is a maximum point, which is reached when conditions are mutually satisfactory. A lowering of price may bring more profit, but prices may be lowered too much and so a loss entailed. But there is always a point where price and cost and bulk of sales coincide to ensure the highest profit or the highest revenue. For that reason I believe this matter should be checked up very closely.

I have in my hand an official document, the report of the proceedings of a committee of the house, from which I should like to read three paragraphs. It is the report of the special committee on farm implement prices which sat last year. At page 1295 it says:

> 20. That regulations of the Department of National Revenue, under the above provisions, have resulted in the inequality of treatment of importers of a like class and that the whole matter should be the subject of survey by the minister of that department.
>
> 21. That these regulations have resulted directly and indirectly in the retention in the United States of profits arising out of the operations in Canada of certain United States companies and that these profits have been subjected to income tax in the United States instead of in Canada.

22. That indirectly this retention of profits in the United States affected the price level of farm implements in Canada as the true profits arising out of their Canadian operations were not properly appreciated by the United States companies.

Two things have happened; prices of farm implements have been held at a higher level than they might otherwise have been, and revenue that should have been collected in Canada was collected in another country, a very undesirable condition of affairs.

I believe that a very interesting statement which I read the other day is true. It is found in a book by Albert Edward Wiggam entitled Marks of an Educated Man. The writer says:

> The highest possible philanthropy and program of social welfare and moral uplift is the scientific organization of business. I think it is. We are in a business world, and when that business is badly organized everyone suffers. When business is efficiently organized everybody benefits.

I have not said that the business of this department is badly organized; but in view of what has taken place, I say it should be investigated by the house. The other day when the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) was advocating in the house a regional tariff under the Department of National Revenue there was a good deal of opposition expressed in a nice way to that proposal. But we have had now for some years a regional tariff or a system of regional tariffs in Canada. I think it is the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) we have to thank for that; I believe it was during his administration that regional tariffs were first adopted. Whether that is so or not, the principle has been adopted that not all tariffs are suited to conditions everywhere in this country. It is true that at the present time the regional tariff is confined largely to natural products; but there is no reason why, once the principle is conceded, it could not be extended along other lines.

Let me refer for a moment to other difficulties, other anomalies in the administration of the tariff. At page 948 of the proceedings of the committee on farm implement prices the witness, an official of the department, who was trying his best to give that committee a picture of things as they are, was asked:

> Q. There has been no change since that time?
> A. No.
> Q. For Massey-Harris, that constitutes the position to date?
> A. To date, the present ruling on which Massey-Harris are importing.

> Q. As compared with International Harvester Company—International Harvester Company get a twenty-five per cent discount on implements?
> A. Right.
> Q. On tractors International Harvester Company get what?
> A. Twenty per cent on all tractors except model WD40 on which the discount is twenty-five per cent.
> Q. And on repairs International Harvester Company get what?
> A. Repairs to above machines, consumers' list price less discount of thirty-five and twenty-five.
> Q. What would that net? Will you figure that out, please?
> A. Fifty-one and one-quarter per cent.
> Q. As compared with the net which you gave us of 42·62?
> Mr. Macdonald: What you are talking about there, about the reduced price, the discount is 49·75.

That is said by one member of the committee. Another member said, "No." The witness answered, "fifty-one and one-quarter." Counsel for the committee said, "The discount is fifty-one and one-quarter."

> Q. That is International Harvester Company?
> A. Yes.
> Q. And the Massey-Harris figure, net, you gave a few minutes ago was what?

And the answer was, "42·62," as against 51¼ in the case of the other company. I shall read a paragraph or two more in order to indicate how that difficulty came about. Counsel for the committee asked:

> Q. I must confess, Mr. Hooper, I do not follow you. If you take Massey-Harris Company in Canada, they allow their dealers a less commission than the International Harvester Company for the reason that the Massey-Harris absorb some of the local freight from the dealer to his customer. The International Harvester Company do not. They expect the dealer to take care of that unless he can pass it on to the farmer. So that their discount allowed by a company, but which is less than another company, is usually compensated by some other feature of the contract. Why would the department make a distinction between Massey-Harris and the International Harvester Company on a tractor or an implement or a part of either of equal quality value? Why should there be any difference at the port of entry when the Massey-Harris present, let us say for the purpose of argument, to bring it out clearly, a binder of equal quality value? Why should there be any difference in the basis on which that binder enters Canada in the percentage of fair market value of that binder in the United States?
> A. The answer to that is, I think, that in 1935 the International Harvester Company became aware that that portion of the law requiring the value for duty purposes to be no less than the wholesale price had been repealed, and they requested the department to study their situation and consider whether a greater discount could not be given than the one under which they were operating. That study was made, and the discount was established at twenty per cent off dealers' price and subsequently to twenty-five per cent. The Massey-Harris Company did not request any lower value for duty purposes than they had been operating on since 1917 and did not ask for any better discount than they allowed in their own sales in the United States, and we have accepted the price at which they sell to others in the United States as establishing the value for duty purposes.

Q. With the result that the department, while it changed its policy, or the basis on which it applied the existing law to the International Harvester, did not think it was their duty to pass that on to other members of the industry as a general ruling rather than a specific ruling applying to only one company?

A. No, we did not; and only now the department has lately under consideration a system whereby we would give one ruling to the entire industry. That has been the policy which has been advocated in the department, but it has not yet been approved. It would be a departure from the procedure of years.

Q. You see what a very great weapon is placed in the hands of the administrative department of the government?

A. Oh, yes.

Q. You can see that?

A. I quite see that.

That bears out what I said, that it would be a departure from the procedure of years, that this was not framed specifically to do things it was meant to do, but, like Topsy, it "just growed."

I should like to continue with many more extracts of the same nature to prove to the hilt the contention we are making, that it is time to bring about a change in matters of this kind. I shall read just a few lines more from the proceedings before the same committee sitting the next day to that from which I have quoted. A request for information by correspondence was put in, and I want to say that the officials of the department had, probably rightly, refused to bring it in, but the minister saw that whatever was requested by the committee was promptly placed before it. I want to thank him now as I did then for his cooperation with the committee at every stage of the inquiry that we were conducting. But a matter of rubber tires for tractors came up, and the witness did not have the correspondence with him on the night in question. So on March 30, as reported at page 995, an explanation was given as to changes affecting rubber tires. The following letter was addressed to the chairman of the committee:

In respect to rubber tires for use on internal combustion traction engines, concerning which I gave evidence before the committee on Wednesday the 24th instant, I may state that these articles were first ruled as admissible as complete parts of the tractors on the 28th March, 1933. A copy of this ruling is attached. This carried on until June 1936, when the ruling was changed classifying such rubber tires under tariff item 618b.

The committee has asked what brought about the change in the ruling. In this connection, after going over the files, and discussing the matter with the commissioner of customs and the dominion customs appraiser, I find that in the latter part of May or early in June, 1936, the commissioner of customs was interviewed with respect to this ruling by Mr. Berkenshaw, sales manager of the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company Limited, and Mr. A. R. Caldwell, customs manager of that company. I believe the commissioner was also interviewed subsequently by either one or both of these gentlemen. The commissioner was unaware of the existing ruling and after examining the tariff files containing the ruling was of the opinion that the ruling was not correct, that the articles were more definitely covered by the provision in tariff item 618b for rubber tires, and changed the ruling in a letter to the Firestone Tire & Rubber Company of Canada Limited, dated the 10th June, 1936, file No. 181155. I am herewith submitting copies of representative departmental letters on this matter, including the letter to Firestone Tire & Rubber Company of Canada Limited and previous letters on the subject. There are, of course, other letters but they are all of a similar nature.

I want to point out that the date on which that change was made is significant. Apparently the minister was not aware of it; there is nothing said about that, though naturally he will feel obliged to take responsibility for it. Later on, in answer to questions by myself, this is the evidence that was given:

Q. I am referring now solely to farm tractors, free of duty, coming in with iron tires. Now, later on the manufacturers put on rubber tires?

A. Yes.

Q. Was there any difference made at any time at the beginning with regard to the importation of rubber tired tractors?

A. No. From the first time the question arose the department ruled that the big low-pressure tires that were adapted only for use on tractors were a complete part of the tractor.

Q. That was always free?

A. On the ones under $1,400.

Q. Yes, of course. Then, later on when they began importing tires for repair purposes, for replacement purposes, were they free at any time?

A. The same situation followed through.

Q. What made the change that caused the appeal to be made to the Tariff Board?

A. Well, the department in its wisdom decided it might not be right and they changed.

Q. First, they decided they were free?

A. Yes.

Q. And then they decided they were dutiable, and then an appeal was made to the tariff board, and the result of that appeal was respected and they were brought in free?

A. Yes.

Q. When would you say that the change was made from free to dutiable?

A. I think it was in June, 1936.

Q. June, 1936, that they were made dutiable?
A. Yes.

Q. Will you tell me how the department made up its mind or came to that conclusion?

A. Well, the tire item is not what we call an n.o.p. item. That is items which are general items and which are not all inclusive. The abbreviation "n.o.p." means "not otherwise provided for." We have an item 618-B which reads, "tires for vehicles of all kinds" without that abbreviation "n.o.p." And after we reviewed the case we decided that maybe we were not right; that it was a specific item and that the tires were actually specifically provided for there and we accordingly changed our ruling.

Q. Would you mind answering me two questions in that respect? I should like to know who made the first ruling and who appealed against that ruling, how the appeal came to be made that led to the reconsideration of the item, and then who made the item dutiable without apparently getting a legal interpretation, or if you did get a legal interpretation from the justice department, I should like to know the history?

A. We did not get a legal interpretation.

So a ruling that had held for some years was thrown into the discard apparently because a representative of a tire and rubber company came along and convinced the department that that should be done. A little later in the same day the question as to how this came about was still being gone into. The witness was not quite sure; but a former minister of trade and commerce, the present hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) was a member of the committee, and he said:

I think we can get at it, a blind man almost could get at it; one of the tire companies applied for it. I don't suppose there is any doubt about it. Bring the record and let us see it. I think Mr. McLean has put his finger on a very important thing. What right has the dominion appraiser or anybody else got to change an existing practice established under a law made by parliament?

The greatest significance there lies in the fact that at the time, in June, 1936, when that change was made by the commissioner and the customs appraiser, at the request of an official of a tire and rubber company, this house was sitting. Hon. gentlemen were here, and they had authority to deal with the matter, if it was considered necessary that that should be done. The result of changes of this kind means that a bureaucracy is growing up in our country. Our people do not trust bureaucracies. They have the wisdom of centuries behind them in refusing to do so, because under bureaucracies changes can be made otherwise than in the full light of day. This is bad for the country and bad for the morale of the officials. I am satisfied that it is bad for administration and, as the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) said, it puts an intolerable load on any minister of the day.

I hold in my hand a few thoughts along that line written by one of the most prominent men of Great Britain which, however, I am not going to read at length. Lord Hewart of Bury is the author of a book entitled The New Despotism, and hon. members would find their time well spent if they looked over some of the arguments contained therein. Lord Hewart deals with an act of parliament that was passed in 1925, which gave to the minister in charge of municipal affairs—that is not his correct title, of course—power to remove, by order, any difficulty which might arise in the application of the act, together with other powers. Lord Hewart points out that the case would have to be serious before any minister would actually undertake to use such powers; nevertheless those powers were given to a minister. The learned writer of the book thought it quite extraordinary that parliament should confer that power on any minister for a period of four years. As the hon. member for Moose Jaw has shown, this power has been growing in Canada since confederation, and is not limited to any particular period. The court in Britain before which an action arising under the act was heard, made this reference in its unanimous judgment:

This I think, though I say it with some hesitation, may be regarded as indicating the high water mark of legislative provisions of this character. It is obvious that if this court had taken another view of the case presented to us to-day and had decided to quash this order as having been made ultra vires, the minister might to-morrow, under the provisions of section 67, have arrived at the same end by making an order and removing the difficulty.

Then Lord Hewart went on:

Now it will probably be admitted that matters must have gone rather far before a minister thought fit to propose, and parliament, either deliberately or by inadvertence, consented to approve a scheme that empowered a government department, on grounds of expediency, to make departmental orders modifying the provisions of the statute which conferred the power. A little inquiry will serve to show that there is now, and for some years past has been, a persistent influence at work which, whatever the motives or the intentions that support it may be thought to be, undoubtedly has the effect of placing a large and increasing field of departmental authority and activity beyond the reach of the ordinary law. Whether this influence ought to be encouraged, or whether it ought rather to be checked and limited, are questions into which, for the moment, it is not necessary to enter. But it does at least seem desirable that the influence itself should be clearly discerned, that its essential nature and tendency should be quite plainly exhibited, and that its various methods and manifestations should not be allowed to continue and multiply under a cloak of obscurity.

And mark this, Mr. Speaker:

The citizens of a state may indeed believe or boast that, at a given moment, they enjoy, or at any rate possess, a system of representative institutions, and that the ordinary law of the land, interpreted and administered by the regular courts, is comprehensive enough and strong enough for all its proper purposes. But their belief will stand in need of revision if, in truth and in fact, an organized and diligent minority, equipped with convenient drafts, and employing after a fashion part of the machinery of representative institutions, is steadily increasing the range and the power of departmental authority and withdrawing its operations more and more from the jurisdiction of the courts.

Later on, dealing with very much the same thing, he adds:

But other considerations apply if a mass of evidence establishes the fact that there is in existence a persistent and well contrived system, intended to produce, and in practice producing, a despotic power which at one and the same time places government departments above the sovereignty of parliament and beyond the jurisdiction of the courts. If it appears that this system springs from and depends upon a deep seated official conviction, which in turn it nourishes and strengthens by each successive manifestation of its vigour, and this, when all is said and done, is the best and most scientific way of ruling the country, the consequences, unless they are checked, must be in the highest degree formidable.

That there is in existence, and in certain quarters in the ascendant, a genuine belief that parliamentary institutions and the rule of law have been tried and found wanting, and that the time has come for the departmental despot, who shall be at once scientific and benevolent, but above all a law to himself, needs no demonstration. There is an agreeable story, not too old, of a distinguished Anglo-Indian civilian, who, returning home on leave after a prolonged absence, passed the houses of parliament on his way from Victoria to Charing Cross. "What place is that?" he asked. "That, sir," was the answer, "is parliament—the houses of parliament." "Really," he exclaimed, though his exclamation was in fact slightly different, "does that rubbish still go on?" Everybody knows the frame of mind, and everybody has met some of the teachers in that school.

But another aspect of the matter is illustrated by a well known conversation which took place, not so many years ago, between a distinguished treasury official, if the epithet is not tautologous, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It happened that matters had not gone quite smoothly in the House of Commons that evening. The departmental specialist was not, for once, able to say to his chief, after the rising of the house, with that air which as nearly approaches a tone of triumph as official decorum permits, "well, sir, we have got our clauses." What he did say was that he wondered whether all this palaver was really necessary. After all, what was the good of the House of Commons? And how perfectly useless was the House of Lords! Why should the work of the expert be always at the mercy of the ignorant amateur? Why should people be allowed to try to govern themselves when it was manifestly so much better for them to be governed by those who knew how to govern? "Seriously," he asked, "could not this country be governed by the civil service?" "Undoubtedly it could," replied the Chancellor of the Exchequer, "undoubtedly it could. And I am quite sure that you and your colleagues would govern the country remarkably well. But let me tell you this, my young friend: at the end of six months of it, there would not be enough lamp posts in Whitehall to go round."

I know that officials of the Canadian civil service do not look on the public business of Canada in that way, nor do they take that attitude towards the House of Commons, but there is always a possibility of bureaucratic methods developing when there is more or less of a mystery about rulings made by departments. With the multitude of rules and changes and classifications in the work of this department, it is possible that that is what might happen. It is all important for this country, from the standpoint of trade and industry and revenue, that there should be no suspicion of that kind. It is too important that the people of this country should retain their faith in democratic government wherein all the people are represented and wherein all the members of parliament take part in making the laws. For this and other reasons, I second the motion which has been proposed.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the tone of the two speeches that have just been made in support of this resolution. On reading the resolution some time ago I thought that possibly an attack upon the administration of the department was to be made, but hon. members who have addressed the house have made it abundantly clear that they have in mind defects in the system rather than the administration of the system by the department. I am pleased that that is the case because, having had two years' experience as the head of the Department of National Revenue, and having worked with the senior and other officials of the department, I have no hesitation in paying them a sincere tribute for their efficiency, for their honesty and for their integrity and bona fides. I have come in contact with many hon. members of the house in connection with departmental matters and also with many members of the business public of Canada and I think it is safe to say that the Department of National Revenue now commands and has commanded for years the respect of the business and industrial communities of Canada.

I should like to make a few observations with regard to the criticisms of the system that have been made by the mover of the resolution. I believe the house realizes that this is an intricate and difficult subject with which to deal. I am afraid it is also a dry subject and that being the case I do not intend to read any of the sections of the act or any of the regulations passed under the provisions of the act. I want to express in the simplest possible language—language that will be understood by laymen generally—the principles that underlie the Customs Act.

The officials and the minister of the Department of National Revenue have to do with two difficult classes of problems, that is, with valuations and classifications. The mover of the resolution referred mainly to valuations, while the seconder had something to say about classifications. Needless to say investigations must be made and decisions rendered from time to time by the senior officials and the minister in classifying goods under one or another of the items of the customs tariff and in valuing goods for duty purposes. I do not know of any system of customs administration that would get rid of the necessity of these departmental decisions.

For instance, take one matter referred to this afternoon by the seconder of the resolution. He referred to the classification of rubber tires for tractors. In this connection representations had been made to the department, and the senior officials, in the course of their respective duties, were convinced that a mistake had been made. They altered the classification, just as has been done from time to time in connection with other items. Otherwise it would be impossible for the business of the department to go on. An appeal was taken from this decision to the tariff board and the tariff board supported the decision in part and reversed it in part, and the matter was settled. The case was a fairly normal one, and I do not know of any system of customs administration in the world which would do away with the necessity of decisions of this kind being made by departmental officials.

I want to refer now to valuations. The basis of our system of valuations is a rule which has been established in this country since at least 1883, that the value for duty purposes shall be the fair market value of the goods, when sold for home consumption, in the market whence they were imported. I know that many Canadian people believe that the ad valorem rate is reckoned upon the cost of the goods imported. They think that if goods can be bought for one dollar in another country and the rate of duty is twenty per cent, the duty will be twenty cents. That is an inaccurate way of stating the case. The basis of our valuation for duty purposes is not the invoice price, not the cost; it is the home market value. As I say, this has been the case for the last fifty-five years, and I believe the same rule applies in other countries. If this is to be continued as the basis of our customs valuations, it then follows that investigations must take place and decisions be arrived at as to what is the home market value.

Mr. HOWDEN: What does the minister mean by "home"?

Mr. ILSLEY: I mean the value in the country of origin, the country whence the goods were shipped at the time they were shipped to Canada. This is defined very precisely in section 35 of the act.

Mr. HEAPS: Is that the selling price at home?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the fair home market value.

Mr. HEAPS: Would that be the selling price?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not necessarily the selling price, as I shall explain in a minute. In perhaps ninety-five per cent of the cases the home market value would be the invoice price, but there are some cases in which the two prices would not correspond. There are of course levels of prices in the home market, but that opens up another question into which I did not think it would be necessary to go this afternoon.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does that also apply to valuations made on used cars coming into Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: Used cars are prohibited.

Mr. COLDWELL: When they do come in.

Mr. ILSLEY: With the hon. gentleman's permission, I will ask the house to keep in mind section 35, which contains the rule to which I refer and which is the basic, fundamental rule of customs administration. There are two or three other sections, 36 and 41 and 43, which the house might also bear in mind. Sections 36 and 41 are subsidiary to section 35 and really are designed to carry out the purposes of section 35. Section 36 provides that the value for duty shall not be less than the cost of production in the country of origin, plus a reasonable advance for selling cost or profit. That section is based upon the theory that the selling in the home market at less than cost of production plus reasonable advance is a temporary selling, a distress affair, a practice which if continued will put those selling the goods into bankruptcy and should not be accepted by this country as the fair home market value. That is the purpose of section 36. In the administration of that section, if the department receives a complaint that goods imported into this country are being purchased at less than the cost of production plus a reasonable advance, it is necessary for the department to make investigation as to the cost of production in the country of origin, prepare a report and then, possibly, make a ruling. So there again is the necessity of departmental or ministerial investigation and decision.

Mr. McCANN: Who determines the cost of production in the home market?

Mr. ILSLEY: The departmental officials. The application of it is very limited. Investigation is made upon complaint, and it is a very minor, subsidiary section.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Where does the complaint come from?

Mr. ILSLEY: Ordinarily the complaint would come from Canadian competitors of the foreign suppliers.

An hon. MEMBER: I thought so.

Mr. EDWARDS: Why would it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not understand why they should not complain if they want to.

Mr. DEACHMAN: The question I raised is due to this. Suppose a manufacturer is bringing in raw material for his own use, and a competitor complains; where does he get his information? How does he get the information about the importation of which he complains? From the departmental officials?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are various ways in which he might realize that importations were taking place at a low price. He would know the price at which they were being resold in Canada. There are complaints, anyway.

So much for section 36. The third section I referred to was section 41. That section applies to cases where there is no established home market value, and to certain other peculiar cases, and under the circumstances outlined in the section the minister is authorized to fix a fair value. The principles upon which values are fixed have been worked out with great care by the department over a period of years and so far as I know there is no secret as to what those principles are. As I have said, section 41 is not very important, but it is necessary because, if there is no home market value, if there is no consumption in the home market, or if goods are not sold in the home market under conditions similar to those which govern their importation into this country, somebody has to fix what is the fair value for importation.

Another section of the act, namely section 43, is based upon entirely different principles; it permits the Minister of National Revenue, under the authorization of the governor in council, to make arbitrary valuations. It is at variance with the principle underlying the Customs Act. This section was inserted a few years ago. The history of it was given this afternoon by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross). During the last two years it has fallen almost into disuse except in respect of fruits and vegetables, but it is applied to those articles and is the only system that we have been able to work out to control their importation, if it is desirable to control it. I do not know of any better system. At any rate that is the main function of section 43.

When this government assumed office there were between twenty-five and thirty-five valuations of manufactured goods under section 43. With the exception of three, these have all been cancelled in so far as importations from countries entitled to the benefits of the most favoured nation and intermediate tariffs are concerned. So the main use of the section is, as I have said, in its application to fruits and vegetables. Although this is a matter of policy, with which I as an administrator am not primarily concerned, I believe that the justification of this section for application to other than fruits and vegetables is as an emergency instrument. Indeed I applied it once for a short period as an emergency section, in regard to the importation of coronation souvenirs, and there was practically no complaint from the people of Canada. That was, I thought, a legitimate application of section 43, a section which is at variance, as I have said, with the principle of section 35.

In a reform of the Customs Act such as the mover of this resolution possibly has in mind, the first question that must be answered is this: Shall we retain or shall we abandon home market value as the basis of our customs valuation? Once that principle is decided everything else can follow along naturally. Some countries apply a different principle. Great Britain has as its basis cost plus insurance plus freight, and that system has some advantages. There is one disadvantage, in a country situated as Canada is, in this cost basis. A home market basis is very much harder to evade than a cost basis. A cost basis on customs valuation makes rebates as between purchaser and seller very much easier, and our geographical position is such that it would be, I feel sure, a very serious problem for Canada if Canada were to abandon the home market basis and adopt the cost basis.

In the administration of the Customs Act the government and the minister should keep in mind certain broad principles. The gentlemen who have spoken are quite right in saying that the act should not be administered, the tariff should not be applied, by the department primarily as an industry protecting device. The protective feature is of course present in our tariff, but the department is the Department of National Revenue, and our primary concern is to apply the tariff that we have to apply, to administer it strictly, regardless of the effects of its application on industry in the country or outside. It is very difficult to get people to appreciate or understand that point of view. We are continually being besought to place goods in a low classification because it would help the importer, or in a high because it would help the manufacturer; or we are asked to make a low valuation to help the importer or a high valuation to help the manufacturer. But these are not the considerations which should govern the department. These are matters which should be defined in the act, and then the act should be strictly administered, because any other administration would be an unfair one.

I have laid down in two or three speeches that I have made on the subject of the department in the last two or three years the principles which I have tried to follow and have the officers of the department follow.

The first principle is that the department should be regarded primarily as a revenue-collecting agency, rather than as an industry-protecting agency. Protection of industry will follow collaterally, of course, because that is the design of a protective tariff; but our concern is to collect the revenue which the law says we shall collect, in accordance with the tariff.

The second principle is that no unnecessary administrative barrier shall be placed by the department in the way of imports. I am free to admit that the tariff can be administered in a way that will make importation difficult, and there have been times when this has been done. Your regulations may be so strict that certain commodities cannot be imported, and delays in appraisals and various devices might be resorted to, if we wanted to do so, which would be technically within the law but would make importations difficult. That could be done under any system. Parliament cannot help it. It has to be left to the good sense and principles of the government of the day. But I do not think it is sound administration to erect unnecessary administrative barriers in the way of imports. In other words, we should not be astute to devise regulations within the law for keeping imports out, nor should we manipulate the law or regulations to do so. That principle has been laid down and is being followed by the department at the present time.

The third principle is that importers should be able to ascertain in advance, with as much certainty as possible, what they will be obliged to pay in the way of duties upon any importation. It is not possible to do that completely at times because they must be prepared to declare, and if necessary to show, that they are importing at the fair home market value. This may seem difficult to hon. members, but it is not so in practice. Usually importers will know pretty well the prevailing price in the country of origin, and if they import at that price they are safe; there is no question of what they have to pay. The instances given by the mover of the resolution, in which he got a forty per cent tariff up to a 150 per cent tariff, are supposititious cases; they are not actual cases, and I do not think they would happen in actual practice. If by $100 worth of goods he meant goods worth $100 in the home market, a forty per cent duty would mean that an importer would pay $40 not $100, $120 or $150. So I think the difficulties of administration in that respect were unduly stressed.

Mr. YOUNG: If the minister will permit a question, was there a recent ruling with regard to rubber footwear, and if so, under what section of the act was it made?

Mr. ILSLEY: Rubber footwear is one of the three articles which are still subject to valuation under section 43. The value was lowered under the recent ruling because it was considered by the department that it was unduly high. That is substantially what was done in regard to rubber footwear.

Just one other matter. The impression was given, I fear, this afternoon, that the discretion of the officers of the department and of the minister is unchecked, unregulated, uncontrolled. Lord Hewart's book, The New Despotism, was cited, and the house was given to understand that we are a law unto ourselves. That statement should be qualified because, at every point where it has been possible to do so an appeal to a judicial tribunal has been provided. The old tribunal that heard the appeals was the board of customs, but since 1932 the tribunal which hears the appeals is the tariff board. The tariff board has a degree of permanency and a judicial cast which does not apply to the officers of the Department of National Revenue, who are crown officials collecting revenue for the crown; but the department's valuations, their made-in-Canada rulings, their classifications, their everything, in fact, except rulings under section 41, are all subject to appeal to the tariff board, and that has been provided by changes in the law or by order in council since the present government took office. So it is not correct to say that our discretion is uncontrolled or unregulated. Other countries have the same system.

As to the instances given to-day, it is only fair to say that we did not change the duty paid on rubber tires except in so far as we were right in doing so, because, as I say, an appeal has been provided to the tariff board.

Reference has been made to the home consumption drawback system. I do not know whether it is incumbent upon me to enter into a defence of that system; in fact, I do not know whether I believe in it or not myself. Under our tariff a great many articles are dutiable or not according to the use to which they are put after they are imported. The officials of the department do not like these items, and I do not like them, because they make it necessary for the department to police importers. When an importer says he is going to use a certain yarn for the manufacture of silk, and thereby gets it in free, it is necessary for the department to make a check on him to see that he uses it for that purpose and that he does not resell it. These are not regarded as desirable items from an administration standpoint. But I do not think it makes very much difference if you have items like that, once you admit the principle involved, because whether you do it by items in the customs tariff or by a system of domestic drawbacks the result is the same. As a matter of fact, the system of domestic drawbacks is safer for the crown because the crown collects the money in the first instance, and the importer is then obliged to show that he put the goods to the use which qualifies them for drawback of part of the duty before he can get that duty returned. I am sure, however, that the government will be prepared very seriously to consider a change, and perhaps a repeal, of the schedule relating to domestic drawbacks. It might, however, entail the addition of a corresponding number of items in the customs tariff to effect the same end.

The mover of the resolution made some reference to the administration of drawbacks, and intimated that perhaps the greatest wheedlers got the most in drawbacks. I want to assure the house that the amount that an applicant for drawback gets does not in any sense depend upon his wheedling ability. The payment of drawbacks is much more severely and strictly regulated than that. Drawbacks are paid when proof is placed in the hands of the department that the goods qualify for drawback, and a large number of auditors check up on the facts that are presented to the department. After that the auditor general has access to our drawback records, and at times has questioned the payment of drawbacks by the department, whereupon the matter has been gone into anew to see that we were keeping strictly within the law. I do not believe that there is any looseness in the payment of drawbacks. The payment has to pass the treasury board and the auditor general, if he requests it, and council. It is regarded as an important matter to be paying these sums, and they are paid out in as strict a way as they would be paid out by any business institution in the country.

I come now to the specific proposal of the mover of the resolution, that is that the operations of the customs division be subject to review by a parliamentary committee. Personally I regard it as an unusual request, for this reason. Ordinarily, unless there is some charge of wrong-doing on the part of the officials of a certain department, one does not ask for a parliamentary committee to investigate that department. The hon. gentlemen who have spoken to-day have made it clear that they do not intimate or charge that anything of the sort has been done; they simply say that they would like to be given the means of finding out whether we are carrying on as we ought to do. I think that in essence the resolution before us to-day is a challenge to the system which prevails and not to the administration of that system.

In my opinion, a parliamentary committee is not the proper body to go into that question. That is a matter of principle which will have to be dealt with upon the introduction of legislation into the house. For several months now—

Mr. YOUNG: That would be better done after we knew exactly what applied.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will give my own views in that respect. Since May last an inter-departmental committee has been working on the revision of the Customs Act. The committee has met weekly since that time. It consists of the Chairman of the Tariff Board, Judge Sedgewick, Mr. Norman Robertson of the Department of External Affairs; Mr. Hector MacKinnon of the Department of Finance; Mr. H. D. Scully, Commissioner of Customs, and Mr. C. P. Blair, who for a great many years was assistant commissioner of customs. This committee has done a great deal of work on the Customs Act and has advanced the work to this stage, that it is about to circulate its proposals to other departments which are interested in customs administration. When they receive the comments and criticisms of these other departments they will prepare a report on the act and make that report to me, and I shall then introduce the consolidated and revised Customs Act at the next session of parliament. When that legislation is introduced these questions of principle which have been gone into to-day by hon. members will certainly have to be considered at length by the house. I do not know whether the act will be referred to a special committee or to the committee of the whole house, but that will be the time to consider changes in principle and a change in the system if such a change is thought desirable. In view of the fact that the work of revision is under way, I hope that the mover of the resolution will not press it this afternoon.

I think the house is indebted to the hon. member for plunging into the Customs Act and bringing on this discussion. Unfortunately, as the seconder of the resolution said, a great many people fight shy of such a dry subject, and any member of the house who will interest himself in the administration of the act is entitled to credit for so doing. I would suggest, if it is agreeable to the mover of the resolution, that this discussion has served its purpose for the time being; that the resolution be withdrawn, and that this matter be dealt with next year when the Customs Act is before the house.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): First of all I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) upon having introduced this resolution, and I hope that this discussion will not close now; for it has not been a discussion. We have heard only three speakers, the mover and seconder of the resolution and the minister, and I think it would be regrettable, in view of the fact that legislation will be introduced next session, if this matter did not receive some consideration from different viewpoints in the house. I hope that the mover will not withdraw the resolution, at least until it has been further discussed.

I have been interested in public affairs ever since I went to western Canada, nearly thirty years ago—twenty-eight to be exact—and during that time the tariff has been discussed in season and out of season. I came to the conclusion some fifteen years ago, when I was associated with the old Progressive movement, that as far as I could see the tariff had been used more or less as a debating issue or a smoke screen by the two political parties, and that there was in reality very little difference in their administration of tariffs. That impression has been confirmed in the past few years. I have often been taken to task for the statement that the only difference I could see between the policies of the two parties with respect to the tariff was that the Conservatives always advocated a high tariff and that the Liberals when in power maintained a tariff which was high. I could not see the difference between the two. Someone suggests to me, a tariff that was not too high. I think I shall leave it as I stated it originally; for I think that is the fact.

The mover of the resolution has performed a service in bringing to the attention of the house the fact that it is not altogether the tariff or the tariff schedule that really counts, but the valuation of goods for duty purposes. The house should go into the matter of valuation for duty purposes much more thoroughly than we have gone into it this afternoon. I was on the farm implements committee last year. The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) referred to some of the statements made there, and I recollect how difficult I found it to follow some of the arguments as to the way in which valuations were made for duty purposes.

The mover of the resolution gave certain dates as to when the power of parliament over customs duties had been restricted, if I may put it in that way, by the granting of further power to the minister or to the commissioner of customs. I noted that several of the years he mentioned, 1904, 1907, 1922, 1936, 1937, were all years when we had a Liberal administration in power, and that to a large extent the Liberal party is responsible for the method of valuation and the tariff policies that we now have. And in view of the fact that throughout all these years the tariff has been made an issue in western Canada and throughout Canada—and I say an unreal issue—I would point out to the mover and seconder of the resolution, as well as to other hon. members, that to-day we have in office a Liberal government with the largest majority which any government has had since confederation, and they should either carry out their declared policy in regard to this matter or drop the discussion altogether.

The other day the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) outlined the history of the matter from the time of confederation, and, if I remember correctly, what he said was to the effect that in a large measure all we have succeeded in doing is dividing the people and creating a lot of hard feeling. That is true. I should like to see the house tackle the economic problems that confront the country. If this government do not intend to do anything in relation to the tariff, then let us tackle some other problems that need to be tackled and cease dividing our people on an issue which apparently is an unreal issue.

Let me add that regulations made by the department often undo the thing that parliament intended to do. I have in mind particularly the $100 exemption which was granted to returning tourists. Regulations have been issued by the department which have negatived that privilege to a very large extent. Last year I spoke of a case of the importation of a set of rubber tires, which could be brought in in the car but could not be brought in on the wheels of the car. This year I was crossing the boundary into Canada and the official asked me if I had anything to declare. As a matter of fact I had not. In the course of conversation with this official he told me of a new regulation which had been put into effect last summer, that if you bring a pair of shoes or an article of clothing bought abroad into the country in your baggage, it comes in free, but if you wear it when you come in it immediately becomes dutiable. Now since most people who cross the border into say the United States and stay forty-eight hours may buy shoes or shirts or some such articles and wear them, is it fair or reasonable or proper that such a person buying something for his own use should pay duty on it, whereas if he brings in something in his baggage, possibly for someone else, it may come in free of duty? I heard an hon. member on the Liberal side say, "Yes, that is fair." I say it is unfair, because it negatives the desire of this parliament to grant that exemption.

Mr. YOUNG: It is stupid, too.

Mr. COLDWELL: There are other regulations of a similar kind. I have a friend who was honest enough to declare a shirt that he bought in the United States. When he crossed again some time later, a few days within the four months' period, having bought a little radio in the United States and being honest enough to say he had bought the shirt on the former occasion, this made the radio set become dutiable. Now the intention of this parliament in enacting that provision in the 1936 Canada-United States trade agreement, was that it should be given as a privilege to the people of Canada who went abroad on a visit to bring back goods to the value of $100 free of duty.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask the hon. member, if he were the minister administering the act, not an outsider without responsibility, would he not feel obliged to keep within the wording of the item, rather than giving it what he calls a fair construction which might not be within the meaning of the tariff? Would he not feel that that was the proper thing to do?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not criticizing the minister; I am criticizing the system. I do not think what I have said is amiss, because if a man enters Canada wearing a pair of shoes bought on a visit to the United States, surely those shoes are for his own personal use, and that was the intention of parliament when it adopted that provision.

Mr. ILSLEY: The item says "contained in the baggage."

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, someone once said that the law is an ass. If the difference between bringing in something in baggage or wearing it on one's person makes it liable to duty then I would agree.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what our ruling is; but if the hon. member will bring the matter up in connection with the estimates, I shall look into it and tell him what the ruling is.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should be glad if the minister would look into the matter. I think he will find that what I say is true.

There are some other points that I should like to discuss, but I see it is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 17, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the name of Mr. Pelletier be substituted for that of Mr. Kuhl on the select standing committee on privileges and elections.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

*DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—EMPLOYEES

Mr. BOULANGER:

What are the names, occupations and salaries of employees of the Department of Agriculture or of individuals whose work is paid for or controlled by the Department of Agriculture and who, performing their duties in French Canada, do not know sufficient French to make themselves understood by the men with whom they come in contact and to explain to them the object, aims and advantages of the laws which they administer?

Mr. RINFRET: The department keeps no record from which this question could be answered. I might point out, however, that the matter involved is already the subject of a bill which has passed its second reading, and which will be referred to a special committee to consider the operation of the Civil Service Act.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—STATION CBL

Mr. LAWSON:

1. What were the total number of hours of broadcasting on station CBL during the weeks commencing January 1, 1938, January 8, 1938, January 15, 1938, January 22, 1938, and January 29, 1938?

2. What number of hours of such broadcasting on such station were: (a) programs originating in Canada (sustaining or commercial); (b) programs originating in the United States (sustaining or commercial)?

3. Of such programs originating in the United States what number of hours were commercial programs for which the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation were paid?

4. In each case where the same commercial program originating in the United States was broadcast over station CBM at Montreal, please indicate.

Mr. HOWE:

The following information has been supplied by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation:

1. January 1, 1938, 111.45 hours; January 8, 1938, 112.00 hours; January 15, 1938, 112.00 hours; January 22, 1938, 112.00 hours; January 29, 1938, 112.00 hours—Total, 559.45 hours.

2. (1) Programs originating in Canada:

(a) Sustaining: January 1, 1938, 47.00 hours; January 8, 1938, 46.30 hours; January 15, 1938, 48.00 hours; January 22, 1938, 45.45 hours; January 29, 1938, 45.55 hours—Total, 233.10 hours.

(b) Commercial: January 1, 1938, 16.00 hours; January 8, 1938, 16.35 hours; January 15, 1938, 17.20 hours; January 22, 1938, 19.50 hours; January 29, 1938, 18.20 hours—Total, 88.05 hours.

Total in Canada, 321.15 hours.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

(2) Programs originating in the United States:

(a) Sustaining: January 1, 1938, 30.30 hours; January 8, 1938, 30.40 hours; January 15, 1938, 28.40 hours; January 22, 1938, 28.25 hours; January 29, 1938, 29.30 hours—Total, 147.45 hours.

(b) Commercial: January 1, 1938, 18.15 hours; January 8, 1938, 18.15 hours; January 15, 1938, 18.00 hours; January 22, 1938, 18.00 hours; January 29, 1938, 18.15 hours—Total, 90.45 hours.

Total hours in United States—238.30 hours.

3. 90.45 hours.

4. The following commercial programs originating in the United States were also broadcast over Station CBM at Montreal:

January 1, 1938—Jell-O (Jack Benny), Jergens-Woodbury Program, Campbell Soups (Amos 'N Andy), Firestone Tire and Rubber Company, S. C. Johnson and Son (Fibber McGee and Molly), General Electric "Hour of Charm", Carnation Milk Company, Tender Leaf Tea, Royal Gelatine (Rudy Vallee), Maxwell House Coffee "Good News of 1938", Kraft Music Hall (Bing Crosby).

January 8, 1938—Same as above.

January 15, 1938—Same as above.

January 22, 1938—Same as above.

January 29, 1938—Same as above with the addition of Borden Company "Hughes Reel".

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—COAL PURCHASES

Mr. BROOKS:

1. What prices have been paid during the past two years, and are now being paid, by the Canadian National Railways for coal purchased in: (a) New Brunswick, and (b) Nova Scotia, giving number of tons purchased, and price per ton?

2. Is an allowance made to the railway for the cost of hauling Nova Scotia coal to New Brunswick points?

Mr. HOWE:

1. It has not been the practice to make public prices paid by Canadian National Railway management for materials and supplies, though such information is made available to the select standing committee on railways and shipping, if requested.

2. No subvention, but such shipments would secure benefit of the 20 per cent reduction from normal tolls, as provided by the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

CROWSNEST PASS AGREEMENT

Mr. PERLEY:

1. What classes of goods were carried by the railroads at special rates under the Crowsnest Pass agreement during the year 1937?

2. Which of such commodities are carried at the same or less rates than provided for in the Crowsnest Pass agreement?

3. What is the present rate on each of such commodities, and what was provided for by the Crowsnest agreement?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Grain and grain products.

2. All such commodities are carried at Crowsnest Pass agreement rates.

3. Present rates on grain and flour irom points on the Canadian Pacific Railway to Fort William are those provided for by the Crowsnest Pass agreement with that railway, and are:—

Miles to Fort William	Rates per 100 lbs Cents
419·1..	14
419·1 to 474·7..	15
474·7 to 552·2..	16
552·2 to 577·0..	17
577·0 to 683·1..	18
683·1 to 742·5..	19
742·5 to 817·1..	20
817·1 to 851·8..	21
851·8 to 927·5..	22
927·5 to 1012·0..	23
1012·0 to 1119·1..	24
1119·1 to 1191·0..	25
1191·0 to 1251·8..	26

These Crowsnest rates were made applicable to Canadian National Railways by amendment to the Railway Act in 1925, chapter 52.

QUESTIONS REFERRING TO STATEMENTS APPEARING ON HANSARD

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, referring to one or two of the questions on to-day's order paper, may I say I do not think the government should be asked if its attention has been called to something that appears on Hansard. Questions of that kind are much too wide of the mark. If an hon. member wishes to get specific information on any point, he should state the point himself. I mention the matter not to pass over the questions at the moment, but rather in the hope that this type of question will not be asked in the future.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION PROPERTY PURCHASE

Mr. LAWSON:

1. What quantity or acreage of property was purchased by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation during the years 1936 and/or 1937 near Hornby, nineteen miles west of Toronto for a 50,000 watt broadcasting station?

2. What price was paid therefor?

3. From whom was the property purchased?

4. What person or persons acted as agent for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, if any?

5. What commission, if any, was paid such agent by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

6. Were any valuations obtained by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation from independent valuators before such purchase was made?

7. If so, who were the valuators?

8. What was paid to each of such valuators for such services?

9. What capital expenditures were made by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation during the years 1936 and 1937 for the acquisition of the properties for the construction of the 50,000 watt broadcasting stations or broadcasting towers other than at Hornby, nineteen miles west of Toronto?

10. What are the locations of any such properties so purchased?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—DEFICITS AND GRAIN SHIPMENTS

Mr. BRUNELLE:

1. What were the deficits of the Canadian National Railways for each of the years 1922 to 1937 inclusive?

2. How many carloads of grain of all kinds were hauled by the Canadian National Railways from prairie provinces during each of the years 1922 to 1937 inclusive, to (a) Vancouver elevators; (b) great lakes elevators; (c) Port Churchill elevator?

RAVENSCRAG, SASK., FARMERS

LACK OF FEED FOR LIVE STOCK AND NEED OF RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, may I draw the attention of the government—I note the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is not in his place—to the fact that I have been informed by a group of farmers in the Ravenscrag district in Saskatchewan that they have had no feed or fodder except two cars of feed since the first of February, their stock are starving, there is three feet of snow in that locality, and relief is very urgent. I draw attention to the fact in order that the government may take the steps that are necessary for dealing with the situation.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I thank my right hon. friend for drawing the attention of the government to this matter, and if it has not already received attention, I can assure him that it will.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL ASSISTANCE

FEDERAL GRANT TO ONTARIO—REPRESENTATIONS OF CITY OF BRANTFORD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), but before doing so I should like to read, with the permission of the house, a telegram I have received to-day from R. J. Waterous, mayor of the city of Brantford.

Brantford very much concerned over refusal of federal government to increase grant in aid of province of Ontario, which possibly means a considerable reduction by the province to Brantford towards the cost of relief, thus materially increasing the burden of relief on the municipality. Please use every effort on the federal government to increase grant to province.

I would ask the minister if there has been any change in the basis of the grant to the province and whether any reduction has been made in the amount of the grant.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): In answer to the question just put to me by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Macdonald), I would say that the grant in aid to the province of Ontario for the months of October, November and December was set at $465,000 per month. Under the terms of the agreement now before the province, the grant remains at $465,000 per month as a maximum, or thirty per cent of the total cost of material aid in the province, whichever amount is the lesser. That is the arrangement which is incorporated in the terms of the agreement now before the Ontario government.

RULE AS TO ANTICIPATION OF ACTION OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I have given notice to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) about a feature of my recent question which is not covered in the answer: I refer to an announcement made in the press by the minister yesterday that he had rejected Ontario's offer of 40, 40 and 20. I wish to know whether that decision is final; because I would direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, on a point of order regarding the minister's answer, to motion number 11, page 12 of the order paper, which was placed there on January 27, before this deputation was received, and to citations 243 and 393 as set out in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. The effect of paragraph 243 is that you are not to anticipate the action of parliament on a question if it is to come before the house soon. This motion was on the order paper on January 27; it was to come before the house so soon that only two motions were ahead of it, yet the minister has given his answer over the head of parliament, without letting the Ontario or Toronto members know. I would ask your honour to consider the point and give your decision to-morrow or the next day.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will look into the matter raised by the hon. member.

DIVERSION OF WATER

PROPOSED RAISING OF GREAT LAKES WATER LEVEL —CORRESPONDENCE TO BE TABLED, TO INCLUDE ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY AND EXPORT OF POWER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): In to-day's newspapers there is a dispatch from Washington quoting congressman Andrews as having read to the United States congress a letter from Premier Hepburn of Ontario making certain proposals to raise the water level of the great lakes by diverting into lake Superior the waters of two rivers in northern Ontario. In this connection, may I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if he has altered his position in this connection from that expressed by him in a letter to Mr. Stewart Lyon, then the chairman of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission, on September 7, and referred to in a Toronto Telegram editorial on January 24 last, namely "that he"—the Prime Minister—"does not propose even to ask the United States authorities for their provisional consent by letter to the diversion of Long Lac water into lake Superior." Apparently Mr. Lyon, in a communication with the press, quoted the Prime Minister's letter of September 7.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not recall in its entirety the letter to which my hon. friend has just referred. I am inclined to think that the reference he has made covers only a part of the letter, and it will be necessary for hon. members to have the entire letter before them in order to see precisely what was said. I imagine the only way whereby hon. members can satisfy their minds as to exactly what has taken place in correspondence, between the government at Ottawa and the government at Toronto, and between Ottawa and Washington, is to have all the correspondence printed and tabled, not only that on the question of the diversion of waters of the great lakes and the rivers but also with respect to the St. Lawrence waterway project, and with respect also to questions of the export of power.

Anticipating that all of these matters would come up for discussion at this session, I gave instructions some time ago to have the correspondence brought together and prepared for the printer so that it could be brought down in printed form at an early date in this session. The premier of Ontario has already given publicity to a good part of the correspondence relating to the question of the export of power and to other matters which relate to the larger project. I think it may be assumed that he has no objection to all the correspondence being tabled; in fact it has been so stated. It has been necessary to ask the United States government whether there was any objection on their part to having all the correspondence tabled, and they have replied that they have no objection; It is the wish of our government that all of the correspondence should be tabled, so I hope that early next week it will be possible to present to the house in the form of a white paper—it will be a book of some small dimensions—all of the correspondence on these three important subjects.

RADIO BROADCASTING

CANCELLATION BY STATION CKCL OF ADDRESS BY R. L. CALDER, K.C., FROM OSHAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I would like to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) why and by what authority the arrangement to broadcast an address by R. L. Calder, K.C., of Montreal, was cancelled last evening by station CKCL? Mr. Calder was speaking under the auspices of the United Automobile Workers of America, on civil liberties, from Oshawa.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): My hon. friend gave notice yesterday of this question. I communicated immediately with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and found that they had no knowledge of the subject matter of his question. However I asked the officers to make inquiries, and to-day I am advised that Mr. Bailey of the United Automobile Workers of America, applied to private station CKCL for time on the station to broadcast an address by Mr. Calder from Oshawa. The station advises the corporation that they discussed the matter with their own officials and decided on their own initiative that they did not want to carry the address, and in communicating their reply to Mr. Bailey they stated that their decision was their own, and had nothing to do with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

COST OF LIVING

REPRESENTATION OF TORONTO HOUSEWIVES' ASSOCIATION—STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) on Tuesday referred to letters he had received from Toronto with regard to increased prices of food and other commodities. I stated at that time I would inform the hon. member as soon as possible what action might be taken under dominion jurisdiction to deal with this matter.

In reply to his question I think it would not be advisable to adopt the hon. member's suggestion of setting up a committee on this matter at the present time, having regard to the constitutional limitations to which he has referred and the fact that matters connected with the constitutional powers of the dominion government and the governments of the provinces are now being investigated. If there are grounds for believing that trade combinations are fixing prices to the detriment of the public, the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act may be invoked in the regular manner by the hon. member's correspondents or others who know of the existence of such combinations. For the investigation of matters of price which are dealt with under provincial legislation, as in the case of milk, the provisions of the provincial legislation may similarly be invoked.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

JURISDICTION OF RAILWAY COMMISSION IN CASES OF DAMAGES CAUSED BY ERECTION OF SNOW FENCES

Mr. O. L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) moved the second reading of Bill No. 5, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: I do not think it is necessary for me to say very much about this bill. It contemplates a minor amendment to the Railway Act, and it speaks for itself. It is hardly necessary to say that the bill is presented with the best of intentions. Its purpose is to afford some measure of relief to farmers who have difficulties with big railway corporations.

Section 203 of the general Railway Act gives the railway companies permission on or after the first day of November of each year to enter upon private lands alongside a railway and to erect snow fences on those private lands belonging to farmers. These snow fences cause the snow to accumulate on the land to a depth sometimes of twenty-five or thirty feet. I submit that this right which is given to the railway companies is absolutely out of the ordinary. It gives the companies power to enter upon property that does not belong to them. Of course, it is of great advantage to the railway companies, for it enables them to effect a great saving in labour and material. I do not think it is proper that the railways should have the right to make such a considerable saving at the expense of poor farmers.

It is true that at the present time section 203 of the act gives to the farmers the right to apply to the courts for redress; but everyone with experience in the practise of law knows that such a right involves a good deal of expense, much delay and a lot of trouble. The purpose of the bill is to provide a more expeditious, easy and economical way of settling these claims than by obliging the farmers to go to law. The damages sustained by the farmers are evident. These snow fences, especially those of more recent design, cause the snow to accumulate, as I have said, to a depth of twenty-five or thirty feet, and that snow remains on the ground for a very long time in the spring.

Mr. BENNETT: They must be removed on the first of April.

Mr. BOULANGER: Yes, the snow fences are removed on the first of April, but the snow is not; the snow remains on the ground and only the sun can dispose of it. Take as an illustration my own parish of St. Charles de Bellechasse where I was born and brought up. That parish was settled about the middle of the eighteenth century. In fact it was established in 1745. The railway through that parish was built in 1855, and it is no fault of the farmers if their farm buildings, their orchards and their gardens are in proximity to the line. Their farms, their gardens and their orchards were there before the railway was built. The railway was built through the most settled part of the country, through farms, adjacent to buildings and houses, through vegetable and strawberry patches, gardens, orchards and so on. What happens is this. In the fall the railway people enter upon these farms without permission and erect snow fences. True, on the first of April these fences are removed but the snow remains for quite a long time. Sometimes it is there until June. It leaves the land entirely unsuitable for vegetable and fruit growing especially, and also causes fruit trees to freeze and die. It is responsible for considerable damage, and the only recourse of the farmers is to go to law, running the risk of having their cases dragged from the court of first instance to the court of appeal, and incurring a lot of costs.

I propose to do away with this system and have the board of railway commissioners decide upon these cases. As everyone knows, the board of railway commissioners is not bound by any strict rules of procedure. It settles cases in an equitable and amicable way, and it is not obliged to observe the rules of procedure that are followed in courts of law. That is one advantage; but the major advantage is, of course, that before the board of railway commissioners there are no costs. It is a poor man's court, because there is no tariff of fees applicable to cases heard before the board. This would be a great advantage to the farmers. Another advantage would be that the board of railway commissioners could settle these cases once for all. The board could have their engineers or their officials look into the situation on any farm and come to a fair conclusion as to what the damages might be from year to year, and with that estimate before them could make a definite settlement once for all of such claims. A settlement of this kind cannot be made in the ordinary courts because those courts can only assess damages that have already occurred; they cannot give anything for damages which a plaintiff has not yet suffered. Moreover, they are obliged to adjudicate upon cases where the damages have occurred within two years of the date of submission of the claim to the courts. According to the law of the province of Quebec—and I believe it is pretty much the same in the other provinces—claims for damages of this description are outlawed after two years, and so the farmers in our section have to take action every two years for settlement. The board of railway commissioners is not bound by the civil code of the province of Quebec or by the rules of procedure of that province, and under the Railway Act it could be provided that the board shall settle all these claims once for all—with regard not only to damages that have already been sustained but also to any damages which farmers are likely to suffer in the future.

Last year when the bill was presented to the house the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) had a few objections to make. One was that the board did not wish to take on any more work. That is only natural. They think that they already have enough to do. I do not believe, however, that this bill would result in any great increase in the work they have to do. Their duties would be increased only to an infinitesimal extent, and I am sure that if they look at the matter again they will decide that their objection is not a very serious one. They might have one case or two or three or four cases a year in a section of the country where there was a great accumulation of snow, but that is not the condition in all parts of Canada. Another of their objections, as the minister told us last year, was that the litigants would have to come to Ottawa to plead their cases. In practice this is no objection, because in practice litigants do not travel to appear before the board of railway commissioners; the members of the board travel to meet the litigants. They go about the country, to Regina, Winnipeg, Vancouver, Montreal, Quebec, Rimouski, Halifax, as the case may be, and meet the litigants where the litigation arises and the witnesses are available and the record exists. Therefore the objection does not seem very serious; there would be no change in the procedure of the board because it is travelling already. The only difference would be that instead of having five or six cases at a session in Winnipeg, for example, they might have seven or eight.

Another objection which was raised by the minister last year was that there now is a system of arbitration provided for the settlement of these cases. Under that system the complainant and the railway company each appoint an arbitrator, and a third arbitrator is appointed by a judge. In regard to this arbitration system I think the minister has been misinformed. It applies in the case of lands required for the construction of railways, but, if I read the law correctly, it does not apply to damages caused by the operation of a railway. When damage is caused by railway operation complainants have to go before the ordinary courts; it is like any other action for damages. You have to take action in the ordinary way, follow the procedure, and run all the risks of cases in courts.

This risk of costs results in great injury to the farmer, because it is exploited to the limit by the railway claims agents. I do not blame them for that; it is their job to discourage claims against the railways, and they use all the arguments that they can invoke. They go to the farmer who has a claim against the railway company on the ground that his land was covered by thirty feet of snow, thus preventing the planting of potatoes or strawberries in time, or whose fruit trees have been damaged or killed by frost during the winter on account of accumulation of snow, and they say: We will fight you in the courts; your farm will be eaten up in costs if you do not accept the offer we are making. And of course the poor farmer gets scared and accepts in settlement of his claim an amount which is perhaps a mere fraction of the real damage he has suffered.

If these claims could come before a tribunal where there is no risk of costs it would be a great service to the farmers. I am sure the board of railway commissioners is competent to adjudicate on these small damage actions. I do not know all the members of the board but I know a few of them; for instance I know well the chairman and the vice-chairman. They are capable lawyers of great experience; they have been in public life, and they possess the milk of human kindness. I am confident that they would be able to deal with these cases admirably, and would deal with them in the interest of and to the advantage of the farmers.

I will not say more, sir, because the bill speaks for itself. The arguments in favour of it are self-evident, and I commend it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): I rise to say a word in support of this bill. I am pleased that the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) has brought the matter before the house. It is a great inconvenience and cause of loss to farmers to have these snow fences erected on their farms. But the railway companies are not the greatest sinners in that regard; provincial, county and in some cases municipal highways are protected in the same way. The railways and the provincial and municipal authorities, without asking the farmer's consent, go on his property and erect snow fences, probably twenty-five yards inside the road fence. These snow fences catch a very large amount of snow during the winter. I have seen field after field where by reason of the accumulation of snow it was ten days to two weeks after the rest of the field was sown before the farmer could cultivate that land along the road. Also I have seen the crop there damaged, because a late crop is never as good as one sown earlier.

It has always seemed to me a great injustice that public bodies can go on a farmer's land in this way. I speak from personal experience. In some cases the fences are not removed by April 1. The inconvenience to the farmer is considerable and something should be done. I am heartily in accord with the provisions of the bill.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): This bill makes a substantial change in the method of dealing with cases affecting snow fences adjacent to railways. It cancels the present method of dealing with such cases, and provides a new one. Perhaps in order to refresh our memories I might read the relevant section of the Railway Act:

203. Every railway company may, on and after the first day of November, in each year, enter into and upon any lands of His Majesty or of any person lying around the route or line of the railway, and erect and maintain snow fences thereon, subject to the payment of such land damages, if any actually suffered, as are thereafter established, in the manner provided by law with respect to such railways.

By this bill the words "in the manner provided by law" are to be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

. . . by mutual agreement, and failing such agreement, by the board of railway commissioners for Canada, who shall determine and fix the compensation to be paid the owner by way of damages. Such compensation shall be determined and fixed by the board, where possible, in respect to future as well as present or past damages suffered by the said owner.

I think my hon. friend misunderstood my objection of last year, when he said it was that the board of railway commissioners would be overworked. I admit at once that the board of railway commissioners is one branch of the government that is not overworked at the present time, and I have no objection to this bill on that score. I do believe, however, and it is the opinion of my own officers and of the railway board, that the present method of disposing of these claims is less cumbersome, more expeditious and apt to be more just than the method now suggested in substitution therefor.

The present procedure is very simple. The railway and the person damaged attempt to reach an agreement. If they fail they go to the local judge, who practically acts as arbitrator between the two parties. If either party is dissatisfied with the decision of the local judge that decision can be appealed to the higher court in the province, but unless the amount in question is in excess of $5,000 the appeal is limited to one higher court. In that way it becomes a local matter. The hon. gentleman who made this motion said that the question involves the height of the snowdrifts, the damage to trees and a number of other considerations in connection with which local knowledge is of immense importance in arriving at a decision. Usually the parties to the dispute, including the judge, are residents of the locality. They understand these matters and are able to arbitrate the case in a satisfactory manner.

As I say, this bill sets aside that procedure. No longer will it be possible to place the matter before the local judge. It now becomes mandatory that the case be brought before the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. I will admit at once that it is a debatable point whether this is a better procedure than the other, but I might point out that the railway commission would be strangers to the locality in question. It is true that once a year, or perhaps once in two years, the board travels from coast to coast holding sittings at various centres, but even hearings of that kind will not make the board familiar with the particular facts in disputes of this kind. I question very much whether the decision of the board would be more just or more acceptable to both parties than the decision rendered under the present procedure.

There is, of course, another matter involved. This bill would change the functions of the board of railway commissioners. In 1916, 1917 and 1918 a great deal of pressure was brought to bear on parliament to place the jurisdiction over the settlement of land disputes as between the railways and the public in the hands of the board of railway commissioners. At that time the board very strongly took the stand that they were not constituted for that purpose; that their machinery was not suitable for that purpose, and that decisions of that kind should be left to the ordinary courts. The board take exactly the same position in this case; that is, that their machinery is not suitable for deciding cases of this kind. However, I think the fundamental question is whether the citizens of Canada would be better served by the new type of court proposed by the bill or by the present procedure, and I believe that matter should be studied by a standing committee of this house. I therefore suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this bill be read a second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT

JURISDICTION OF RAILWAY COMMISSION IN CASES OF DAMAGES CAUSED BY ERECTION OF SNOW FENCES

Mr. O. L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) moved the second reading of Bill No. 6, to amend the Government Railways Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this second bill amends the Government Railways Act, and it is introduced for this reason: The Government Railways Act is still on the statute books, and there is a question as to whether or not it is still applicable to the railways which were formerly government property and which now form part of the Canadian National Railways. That question has not been decided in a definite and categorical manner, and the act contains a provision in regard to damages caused by snow fences. Therefore, in order to be on the safe side, I am also presenting this bill to amend the Government Railways Act.

I am not going to repeat what I said when I explained the bill which has just been given second reading, beyond this: A moment ago the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) said that the procedure before the board of railway commissioners would be different from the procedure which exists at the present time before the superior courts, for instance. I do not see that there would be any difference. If the bill passed we would proceed before the board of railway commissioners exactly as we now proceed before the superior court. The plaintiff would bring his evidence; he would produce his witnesses and would present his written proof before the board just as he does before the superior court at the present time. The only difference would be this: At the present time if he loses his case before the superior court he may have to pay hundreds of dollars in costs to lawyers on both sides. Under the new system proposed, if the plaintiff lost his case before the board of railway commissioners he would not have to pay a cent in costs.

The minister says, "Well, the members of that board are not familiar with that kind of work. They are not as well able to adjudicate in these small damage actions as the local judge would be." I know that Mr. Garceau, for instance, the vice-chairman of the board, is an experienced lawyer in Quebec, and I am sure that Mr. Garceau, with his knowledge of the civil law of that province and with his long experience, could decide a small damage action just as well as any judge of the superior court or the circuit court. I would not be afraid to go before Mr. Garceau, where I am sure I would obtain a decision just as equitable as I might obtain from the judge of any court. The board goes to Quebec, for instance, many times a year. The litigants of that district would go to the court-house, where they go now. They cannot go anywhere else. If they have a damage action against the railways they have to go to the court-house now to have it adjudicated upon, so in that respect the procedure would be just the same, but instead of going before Mr. Justice So-and-So of the superior court they would go before the board of railway commissioners, in the same building. They would proceed exactly in the same way. They would make out their case in the same way, and receive a decision just as good as they could receive from a court. The only difference would be that they would not have to pay hundreds of dollars in costs, if they lost their cases.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the remarks I made on the previous bill apply to this one, and I would suggest the same disposition of it.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROPOSED AMENDMENT RESPECTING OPERATION OF MOTOR CARS

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend the criminal code.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving the second reading of the bill, I wish to call the attention of the house to the great slaughter occurring on our highways. Almost every road is coloured red with the slaughter of men, women and children. This slaughtering is done in a manner that is disgraceful, and presents the most important domestic problem with which we have to deal this year. I may say that it is one of Canada's chief problems, and parliament does nothing about it.

We are satisfied to devote a whole lot of time to flag waving, but the government of the day does not seem prepared to sit down and consider what must be done for these helpless men, women and children whose homes have been ruined and whose lives have been wrecked. All this goes on, and yet this high court of parliament sits here and does nothing to deal with these practical problems, which would be a work for the benefit of the people. They do nothing but appoint commissions, and that kind of thing.

I believe a few facts should be drawn to the attention of the house. The subject of the bill has been discussed in the house for three or four sessions. One of the commandments of God is: Thou shalt do no murder. Many men of real worth, through carelessness and selfishness, are recklessly violating not only the laws of God but those of men. No invention has contributed more to the comforts of our people than has the motor car, but, like every other invention we must consider its use as one thing and its abuse as another.

During the past century scientific discoveries in medicine, chemistry and physics have resulted in untold good to humanity, but, as in the abuse of inventions, in war they were a curse to mankind. In like manner, to-day the abuse of the motor car is a curse to mankind. Looking into the question one finds invariably a tremendous annual loss from deaths, accidents, injuries, and so on. One finds untold sorrow and suffering with intense pain and grief, almost exceeding anything the human imagination could conceive. The suffering brought about by these machines is equalled only by that inflicted by plagues, pestilence, famine, battle, murder and sudden death.

It would be misleading and unfair to attempt to attribute all the blame for these horrors on the highways to all people who drive and use motor cars. The fact is that ninety-five per cent of drivers are trying to obey the law. It is the remaining five per cent about whom I am complaining. They cause the trouble. One has only to see the records to understand the facts. As I study the records of cases I am driven to the conclusion that beyond any doubt the small minority are the major cause of the trouble. They appear to have exploited, for their own pleasure and profit, the generous tolerance of others. They use their cars in an irresponsible, careless and unchristian way. The fault is grievous, and they can have no ground for complaint if they are put under restraint through application of the criminal code. Ignorance and thoughtlessness are not palliatives. Obedience is the only reparation they can make, and it is long overdue.

I should like to quote the observations of the late Chief Justice R. M. Meredith, who was on the supreme court bench for about forty years. These are his words:

> And as now nearly everyone is a car owner, and car driver, young and old, of all sorts and conditions, it is difficult to get justice in even a civil action. Car-driver jurors have nearly all the speed fever; and self-preservation instincts are so strong that they will not be persuaded to decide against drivers who have been no more unlawful than they themselves often, if not commonly, are.
>
> What then is the remedy? I think it should be; make the laws plain and reasonably severe and enforce them; and cancel licences freely. And at the other end of the matter, give no licence to anyone who is not proved to be mentally and physically, and from experience and a knowledge of the highway laws, thoroughly capable.

As I see it, the situation calls for united effort on the part of church members, community clubs, boards of trade, municipal councils and, in fact, all public bodies. Great sorrows, broken lives and shattered homes resulting from such holocaust are just as real as the nation's supreme sorrow following the war. How long will this suffering have to continue?

I believe three features dominate the conduct of motor traffic to-day. First, we must consider the indifference shown by the five per cent of drivers of the rights and privileges of the people using the highways. Then, there is the indifference to the convenience of others; there is excessive speed, and congestion. Ever since man has learned to direct a machine more powerful than himself he has asserted his superiority over his neighbour. "Make way or take the consequences" is the cry of the reckless driver. Yet, this indifference is limited to only a small number. Fortunately only a small group out of the large body of drivers is responsible for the damage. The majority of motor car drivers have only a hazy knowledge of the mechanism of their machines. For absolute control, the only condition in which a car is fit to be driven at thirty miles an hour is when there is perfect adjustment and perfect conditioning. Even so the machine is potentially as dangerous as a loaded gun, and must be handled with equal care and vigilance. A moment's inattention may be fraught with dire results. Every motor vehicle is a dangerous implement, even when controlled by the most expert, and requires incessant vigilance in all circumstances, and especially at speeds above thirty miles an hour.

As I said, transportation should be a means to an end, not an end in itself. I say when the matter is brought before the house and the Department of Justice it is not treated as it should be. It is a major problem, and it is almost impossible for administrators and legislators to give too much time to it. Inside of an hour after the adjournment of a debate is moved, more people are killed. If wooden crosses were used to represent the people who in twelve months have been killed or injured by motor cars they would, if placed a foot apart, cover parliament hill and reach to Lansdowne park. The figures show that last year in the city of Toronto sixty-eight people were killed, 3,608 hurt and 170 drivers were gaoled. In 1938, to date, there are six dead, 295 hurt and 36 drivers gaoled.

I have received the totals from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics; I do not know whether or not it is permissible to place two or three small tables on Hansard, but I believe if I may be permitted to do so it will assist hon. members in realizing the gravity of the problem. One table, No. 13, gives the number of deaths resulting from automobile accidents between the years 1927 and 1936.

It shows that while in 1927 there were 865, in 1936 there were 1,313. In 1928, there were, 1,082 and in 1929, 1,300. The table shows that the months in which there are most accidents are from May to December, including the holidays around the Christmas season.

The second table, No. 14, deals with the deaths resulting from automobile accidents by provinces. Table No. 15 shows the average per 10,000 registered motor vehicles. Another table gives the deaths from motor car accidents in cities of over 40,000 population. In this table we have the figures for Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver, Hamilton, Ottawa, Quebec, Calgary, London, Edmonton, Windsor, Verdun, Halifax, Regina, Saint John and Saskatoon. The tables are as follows:

Table 13.—Deaths in Canada Resulting from Automobile Accidents, by Months

Year	Total	Jan.	Feb.	Mar.	Apr.	May	June	July	Aug.	Sept.	Oct.	Nov.	Dec.
1936	1,313	55	38	55	93	89	89	145	185	159	169	133	103
1935	1,224	55	59	65	60	87	94	125	129	156	141	147	106
1934	1,115	34	35	38	49	89	104	147	142	140	133	113	88
1933	955	65	37	46	43	72	83	113	124	109	120	84	59
1932	1,120	79	51	51	53	78	89	127	133	119	137	109	94
1931	1,316	53	52	49	76	111	127	127	179	150	158	135	99
1930	1,290	30	31	38	77	102	127	168	181	163	152	125	96
1929	1,300	41	27	42	66	107	132	192	168	174	157	136	58
1928	1,082	29	25	30	55	74	92	131	145	136	158	106	101
1927	865	16	19	34	49	67	98	121	111	138	92	58	62

Table 14.—Deaths Resulting from Automobile Accidents, by Provinces

Year	Canada	P.E.I.	N.S.	N.B.	Que.	Ont.	Man.	Sask.	Alta.	B.C.
					Total Number
1936*	1,313	7	58	41	371	563	53	47	72	101
1935	1,224	2	57	40	314	571	53	40	45	102
1934	1,115	5	41	52	275	528	41	30	61	82
1933	955	2	47	22	256	416	38	32	64	78
1932	1,120	1	51	49	311	497	42	35	49	85
1931	1,316	5	49	45	355	574	60	50	67	111
1930	1,290	10	54	72	338	517	60	51	77	111
1929	1,300	1	61	47	323	556	68	56	71	117
1928	1,082	2	40	31	279	437	53	74	75	91
1927	865	2	31	25	252	387	32	24	35	77

* Preliminary Vital Statistics.

Table 15—Average Per 10,000 Registered Motor Vehicles

Year	Canada	P.E.I.	N.S.	N.B.	Que.	Ont.	Man.	Sask.	Alta.	B.C.
1936*	10.59	9.17	12.56	12.27	20.43	9.54	7.07	4.60	7.39	9.52
1935	10.42	2.43	12.97	12.81	18.40	10.12	7.50	4.21	4.79	10.47
1934	9.82	6.94	9.78	17.87	16.62	9.74	5.82	3.28	6.83	8.91
1933	8.82	2.88	11.62	8.20	16.00	8.00	5.53	3.78	7.43	8.81
1932	10.05	1.43	12.39	17.47	18.77	9.35	5.87	3.83	5.64	9.34
1931	10.96	6.46	11.20	13.38	19.77	10.21	7.94	4.61	7.00	11.33
1930	10.40	13.51	12.54	20.67	18.89	9.16	7.57	3.93	7.50	11.22
1929	10.82	1.63	15.30	14.76	19.05	10.12	8.74	4.30	7.12	11.23
1928	10.05	3.68	11.39	11.00	18.79	8.90	7.45	6.08	8.40	10.25
1927	9.15	4.56	10.31	10.19	19.62	8.87	5.01	2.25	4.74	9.92

* Preliminary Vital Statistics.

Table 16.—Deaths in Canada Resulting from Automobile Accidents Reported by Cities of over 40,000 Population

Cities	†1936	1935	1934	1933	1932	1931	1930	1929	1928	1927
Montreal	110	109	101	104	121	143	136	151	109	126
Toronto	80	74	88	65	88	111	67	107	81	87
Winnipeg	19	24	19	18	22	25	30	25	24	18
Vancouver	36	43	25	28	41	46	43	45	42	35
Hamilton	23	16	27	22	20	31	41	37	29	23
Ottawa	21	25	19	25	25	19	24	26	17	17
Quebec	18	17	14	8	14	15	17	17	10	14
Calgary	12	10	11	7	9	12	12	11	13	8
London	21	13	13	20	12	21	18	16	13	9
Edmonton	11	7	9	10	8	16	15	10	8	7
Windsor	22	25	14	16	13	17	15	17	22	24
Verdun	6	6	4	1	5	..	1	1	2	2
Halifax	14	13	10	14	8	9	6	14	10	5
Regina	3	5	5	1	1	11	8	()	()	(*)
Saint John	5	5	7	1	6	6	12	5	2	4
Saskatoon	4	1	2	3	4	3	4	()	()	(*)

† Preliminary Vital Statistics.
* Not tabulated.

In France, with a population of 42,000,000, 4,415 people were killed in motor accidents in 1936; in Germany, where they are spending vast sums on road building, with a population of 67,000,000, the number of people killed last year was 8,381; in the United States, with a population of 128,000,000, in motor accidents in 1935, 37,000 people were killed, or half the number of their soldiers who were killed in the great war; in England an average of twenty people are killed each day, or about 6,000 in a year. The figures for England last year were 6,000 killed and 200,000 injured in motor accidents. I am taking these figures from the House of Lords report.

In England, in the ten years up to December of last year, 66,000 were killed and 2,000,000 injured in motor accidents. Fancy, in the mother country alone, 66,000 people being killed and 2,000,000 injured on the highways! An average of two children are killed per day in England. In one year in England 50,000 school children were killed or injured. These accidents are estimated to cost the nation £200,000,000 a year. This estimate is from a new textbook on public highways, published in London, which I am sorry is not available in the library here. It is frequently referred to by the Minister of Transport in England, and I hope the Parliamentary Library will get a copy. That is to say, in a year there are more people killed than there were soldiers killed in the whole Boer war. The hospitals in England are all facing deficits from road accidents. The cost of English hospitals is estimated at three hundred thousand pounds a year.

I ask the government very seriously to consider this question and to let parliament know what they intend to do about it. The traffic on the English roads is very great, greater than elsewhere. In the United States, for example, there are eight cars to every mile; in France, four cars to every mile; Germany, fifteen; England, ten; and in Canada, fifteen. In Canada to-day deaths as a result of motor accidents are a great national scandal.

The key to the situation, in my opinion, is the human factor. The wider the roads, the more numerous the accidents. An examination of one hundred thousand cases of road accidents in the mother country over a period of two and a half years has been kindly sent to me, with a very fine letter of information, by the present Secretary of War, the Right Hon. Hore-Belisha, who so ably presided over the transport department in England for three or four years. I have not time to read it, and I wish I could be allowed to put it on Hansard. I can give a few figures to show what that great Minister of Transport did in the old land, where they have some of the best roads in the world. When they reduced the speed limit to thirty miles an hour the accidents dropped by fifty per cent, and if they could get the speed down to twenty miles per hour the number of accidents would decrease at a further rate. I should like the minister to see a copy of this report which Mr. Hore-Belisha has sent to me; it is a very valuable and interesting document. Mr. Hore-Belisha finds that the relative severity of accidents in areas not built up, and where speeds would normally be higher, is greater; that the proportion of accidents which occur at junctions, especially in built-up areas, is very high; that over one-third of the persons injured were pedal cyclists; over twenty-nine per cent, pedestrians, and over eighteen per cent, motor cyclists or their passengers.

He goes on to refer to the comparative severity of casualties to motor cyclists, over one-third being either killed or seriously injured, and the report gives tables in which the accidents are classified.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the key to the whole problem is the human factor, and a study of these cases shows that the wider the roads, and the more you spend on them the more accidents there will be. These accidents, it is shown, occur in clear, not foggy, weather, and it is on week-ends and at Christmas and other holidays that most of the accidents occur. In Canada the bulk of accidents occur after April and continue to the end of the year, especially the summer week-ends and Christmas.

I doubt if our roads policy in this country is a wise one. We have our good roads associations and they are urging legislatures to build more roads; our uneconomic roads creating railway deficits are a nuisance, and I think we have the most uneconomic road system in the world. They compete against our railways, on which we have spent four billion dollars. We allow motor trucks and buses on roads to be used on roads built fifty years ago for horse-drawn traffic, and we let modern motor cars drive over these same roads at a very fast pace of from fifty to sixty miles an hour. It was the railways that ruined the canals a hundred years ago, and to-day it is the motor buses and motor cars that are ruining the railways. The mortality in these road accidents is appalling. Canada's rate is high; England's rate is not as high as that of the United States or Germany, but it is higher than that of France and Canada for our population. It is a living scandal of first importance; it is disgraceful.

Another menace on our congested highways is the glaring headlights, which in conjunction with beer parlours and the truck traffic, make it impossible to drive in safety in Ontario at night, and conditions are getting worse. Lord Justice Maughan, that great jurist who so ably sat in the privy council said in the House of Lords last fall that all "his experience on the bench went to show that a stiffening of the law would tend most substantially to reduce the number of accidents on the roads." The new wider roads in Germany have not reduced accidents, and in England the experience is that there is an increased mortality in road accidents resulting from the straightening and widening of roads permitting of higher speeds. We as a House of Commons know we can reduce these accidents and we meet and do nothing about it, nor do the press or church.

Compare the accidents in the air or on the railways with motor car accidents and you will find that they are almost negligible in comparison with the holocaust on the highways of this country. At level crossings we have our bells and wig-wags, but according to a return brought down in this house last year there were 175 accidents at level crossings, in which 84 people were killed and 208 injured. The problem is so pressing that there should be no more delay. The government's policy is not simply laissez-faire; it is laissez-mourir—let the people die as they like—let them die for all the government cares. I say, Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to allow such conditions to continue longer in this country. The present slaughter cannot be allowed to continue. Accidents largely arise through a lack of courtesy or because of impatience, hurry, bad manners or because one driver forgets his duty to his God and neighbour and refuses to give way to another.

What is the church of God doing while all this is going on? When we had an epidemic of infantile paralysis all over this country, caused by ragweed and other conditions, the deaths from which were trivial in number compared with the number killed in motor car accidents, the whole press of this country was aroused. We all remember that terrible college disaster at St. Hyacinthe, which is a reflection on our building laws and fire prevention regulations. There was mourning all over Canada for the people of our fine province of Quebec and sympathy with the grief of the parents of the young children who perished in that terrible disaster, and with the heads of that fine seminary of learning and education. If any disease were to take the toll of the motor car, medicine and science would know no rest until some cure for the disease had been found. Look at the fight that science and preventive medicine are making against cancer, tuberculosis, diabetes and other ills. But hundreds of thousands, Mr. Speaker, are being slaughtered or severely injured in motor car accidents in this country; yet the press and the church say little or nothing about it and give little attention to it. We need to deal with this problem along bolder lines.

I want constructive action from the government. True, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is overworked and has already a heavy department and I doubt if we should put this work on him. I was not in the house the other day when a just tribute was being paid to him, but I have known him for a great many years and I am sure he sympathizes very deeply with the object I have in view in this bill and would do all he could to prevent the slaughter, if he could go further, as he always strives to do good. We want definite and immediate action. Constitution or no constitution, something must be done without further delay to prevent this slaughter. Our road system fails to provide the safety it should for pedestrians and cyclists and farmers. In the South African war, lasting two and three-quarter years, there were 7,492 people killed. During a period of the same length in England 16,000 people were killed in motor car accidents. People nowadays in their mad rush and hurry hold life less sacred than they used to, but the grief of parents mourning for their children, the grief of husbands and wives, is just as deep as that of those who lost members of their families in the South African war.

What is the government going to do about it now? These casualties are the more deplorable in that too often they mean that wives and young children are left without the breadwinner. During the South African war it was usual for Queen Victoria to receive news of its progress and of the casualties. One day the war minister walked in and told her that twenty-three of her soldiers had been killed the previous day. The poor old queen wept, and said, "Let a telegram be sent to the relatives of every one of these men." If the king in these days were to send a telegram to the relatives of the 6,000 people who were killed and the 200,000 who were injured as a result of motor accidents in England last year, he would have no time to do anything else.

It shows that to-day we hold life less sacred than we used to do. In my opinion the church of God should be up and doing. It is not doing all it should do; it should take some constructive action. Are our Canadian people entirely lacking in any sense of balance while all this goes on?

I have already referred to the dangers of delay. The pedestrian, in crossing the street, is somewhat to blame. There has been some reduction in the number of child casualties because the cities have guides to conduct children across the streets.

In my opinion this is a great national evil, and it is a shocking and scandalous state of affairs that it is going on all over the country without anything being done by anybody. What do the legislatures of this country do? Nothing. What does this high court of parliament at Ottawa do? One of its branches, the senate, goes off on a three weeks' holiday, saying, "We have no work." There is work to do right here. Look at what the House of Lords did in regard to this question. Would our senate do it? No chance! I have before me the report of a debate in the House of Lords, in which right honourable and right reverend prelates of the church of England who took part emphasized the importance of dealing with an evil which is crippling the mother country by depriving her of the flower of the nation, the youth of the day. I ask the church of Canada to be up and doing, to bring this problem to the attention of the people and of parliament. It is not a political question—far from it. I put it before the minister at this time and hope to be able to offer some constructive suggestions. The Right Honourable and Right Reverend Bishop of Winchester in the House of Lords made some splendid practical suggestions. This right reverend prelate called the country to arms to stop it all.

Coming to the bill itself, on the second reading we can discuss only the principle of the measure not the clauses. As regards the clause referring to drunken drivers, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) made in the last debate a very wise remark about beer parlours, which was taken up by a section of the press, about drunken drivers, and the experience of other countries confirms what the hon. member said. My right hon. leader also alluded to this matter in a very able address he made last session. I have drafted a new clause this year to take care of this point, because, according to some judges, you cannot convict or it is hard to convict under the present section of the criminal code which is full of loopholes. I have therefore stricken out the old clause and substituted:

(4) Every one who, while under the influence of alcohol or of any narcotic, to such a degree as to make him incapable of exercising a safe and proper control of any motor vehicle or automobile, drives or attempts to drive such motor vehicle or automobile, is guilty of an offence—

And why should he not be? Why are these people allowed to go out in such a condition on highways built for traffic as it was fifty years ago, roads constructed in the ox-cart days, as were our rural and some suburban and urban roads—for I do not refer altogether to the improved roads. Why are they allowed to go out on roads suitable only for horses and horse-drawn vehicles and rush recklessly along at fifty to sixty miles an hour, to send people into the cemetery in the twinkling of an eye? I say it is all wrong. It is race suicide.

We then come to another section, "Racing and cutting in." The investigation made by the Minister of Transport in England shows what terrible tragedies result from this practice. The right honourable prelate in the House of Lords, the Bishop of Winchester, called this pest "cads."

On page 2 also is a subsection, "Causing death in a culpably negligent manner." It takes two people to make an accident, and the question of fact is for the jury. In many cases the decision has been taken from the jury.

"Person having caused death not to drive for two years." Why should a man who has killed another person be allowed to drive within two years? In my opinion he should not drive any more. I know that if I killed a person I would not want to drive again.

It is also provided that persons shall not drive if under eighteen years of age. Objection may be taken to that clause. May I inform the house that, in the debate in the House of Lords, speaker after speaker rose and said that nobody can drive a locomotive on a private right of way unless he is a skilled man, and yet immature boys and girls of fourteen and sixteen are permitted to drive cars. I was on the street the day before Christmas. A Toronto Transportation Company street car was diverted down Bay street along Wellington between Bay and Yonge to get around the loop more quickly. There were trucks about, and one truck blocked the street car. The motorman and the conductor got out to move the truck. There were about twenty-five passengers in the street car. But neither conductor nor motorman could move the truck. A boy of twelve moved the truck. He was asked how old he was and he said he was twelve years of age. He could drive when he is twelve; boys who say they are fourteen think they should be entitled to drive when they are only eleven. Remember the accident at Vineland last September, where a school boy who was driving four or five of his companions, girls and boys, towards a railway crossing did not hear the bell or see the train, and all of them were blotted out. I agree with the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) that the age limit should be raised. The motor car is the most dangerous mechanism that we have. Why should somebody of immature age and judgment be allowed to drive? The Reverend Mr. Austin Ireland, M.A., anglican rector of Thorold, who conducted the burial service on these Vineland people, cried out from the pulpit to parliament to put a stop to such conditions, and driving by children of immature age although some are good drivers. No doubt many of our best drivers are quite young, but owing to the abuse of the permission to people to drive when under age, something should be done about it.

As to confiscating cars, if one looks over the criminal code he can find many confiscatory clauses. They confiscate pistols; they confiscate all kinds of things of personal property under the code; why should not parliament extend the power to cover such criminal offences by drivers of cars?

To cover all the matters referred to would take too long, for there are other bills to be considered.

Regarding driving when a licence has been suspended, that has been done in many cases, and it is only common sense that under the code this should be made an offence and a penalty exacted. Also we have those hit and run drivers, the cowardly people who leave their victims lying on the pavement. I could show hon. members some photographs of these victims—men and women and little children, even babies, knocked down on the road, and the drivers have escaped. The section should be stiffened up all along the line.

I have mentioned that the court may impound the motor car. Why should not a person who drives recklessly or negligibly a highly dangerous machine not have the control of it taken away from him? Why should not the licence of such a person be revoked? No wonder people are being killed; our criminal code is twenty years behind the times in the way it deals with this problem. It is the function of juries to take the law to be what the judge says it is, but to decide questions of fact, but in a large number of cases the judge takes the case away from the jury and allows the defendant to go free.

This bill is not perfect by any means. I do not profess that it is. I cannot be expected, as a private member without adequate help, to do all that is required. I have brought the problem forward a number of times and laid it before this parliament. I have done my duty as I see it. I have no apologies to make. What are hon. members going to do about it? Are they going to allow the respected Minister of Justice just to rise after I sit down and move the adjournment of the debate, or are they going to continue this discussion and demand immediate action? A great prelate said in the House of Lords that this was the most important domestic problem England had. The Bishop of Winchester, who made that remark, also told the House of Lords that if they did nothing else but continue to sit every day for a month until they solved the problem, their time would be well spent, and this was the solemn duty of administrators and legislators. The representative of the Minister of Transport in the House of Lords was asked what he intended to do about it. He was not allowed to escape by moving the adjournment of the debate, but had to appoint a select committee. He offered to appoint a commission, but the House of Lords, being practical men, would not accept that suggestion. The matter had been made a football of long enough. They wanted a committee. After what I have seen of committees, however, I have not, for some of these select committees, the respect I used to have.

I submit that the road contractors and cement people have too much influence in these good conventions at the present time. They go up and down the country, they go to the conventions, and they have such influence both in and outside the conventions that they will do anything to persuade the legislature to spend more money on existing uneconomic roads. Let the government announce some practical action here and now.

I have given only a small portion of the facts I have, and if the minister has no objection I should like to put on the record the two pages of tables from which I quoted. In fact, I read most of it. It was obtained from the bureau of statistics and it would give hon. members a good idea of the situation.

That is all I have to say in moving the second reading of this bill. I make the motion in the hope that something will be done, and I trust that other members will speak. They have an opportunity to-day to take part in the debate now or never. They know the findings of their magistrates and county court judges and juries all over Canada. Let us support the law officers of the crown; let us support law and order in the country. We must have order on the highways so that Canada will be leading the van instead of lagging behind the motherland and Germany, France and the United States in coping with this awful death problem.

This is not a party matter. No one knows who will be the next victim. I may be the next one, some hon. gentleman sitting in this chamber to-day may be a victim, and I would be sorry if any of them were not here next year. I ask them, therefore, to rise in their places and express the views of their respective constituencies. Let them tell us what they think of the law and what, in their opinion, should be done to deal with this terrible menace that is ruining the lives of men, women and children and shattering the homes of the country.

Mr. F. C. BETTS (London): In rising to second the motion I should like to commend the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) for his persistence in pressing this matter and for the eminently thorough and practical manner in which he has presented his arguments in support of the bill. I can add very little of use to what he has said, but there is something that I should like to say.

In my opinion, the provisions for cancellation or suspension of licences are particularly useful. We have tried to deal with the senseless slaughter on the highways to which the hon. gentleman has had reference, and to meet the situation by means of short terms of imprisonment and fines, but our efforts have been entirely fruitless. As my colleague has pointed out, the motor car has become such an integral part of present day life that if we deprive motor owners of the right to use their vehicles as a punishment for offences committed while they are in control of their cars, we are proceeding in a manner which will impress these people, and the only manner which will impress them.

In my view the right to use these extremely dangerous machines is conferred after a very superficial test. Much could be done by more severe regulations along these lines. Practically every accident on the highway is preventable. As a practising lawyer who has had many cases to review, I can say that a careful analysis of almost any accident will show that it was caused in the first instance by excessive speed and in every instance by failure to take adequate care.

It is a great pleasure to me, therefore, besides being a duty, to speak in support of this bill. I would qualify my remarks on the second reading by saying this: I doubt whether we shall be any further ahead by substituting the words "under the influence of alcohol" for the word "intoxicated." That is a matter of terminology, and no matter how the condition is described in legislation it is a question which will always present grave difficulty to any tribunal that has to pass upou it. In the main, however, the bill is an excellent one, is much needed legislation, and I hope it will receive the support of the house.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I have given a very great deal of consideration and thought to the number of accidents that are occurring on our highways, with loss of life, through motor cars. I fancy that every member of the house has done so, and I doubt if there is any of us who has not had occasion to regret the loss of a friend suddenly through some accident of the sort. I recall so many instances; I recall one in which, only a few hours before, I was talking to a young woman, who was going away happily, and then I took up the newspaper and found that she had been killed at a street corner in an accident which, of course, might have been prevented.

The question before us is a very simple one: Shall we make a criminal offence, punishable in the manner indicated in this bill, of violation of a statute which we are about to create with respect to accidents of this kind? Frankly, I think we should. I think the time has come when we can no longer permit laxity of control to prevail in Canada.

Dealing with a matter of principle, here we have to consider the question of restraining young people from driving cars. Now, I have had occasion, as I doubt not every member of this chamber has had, to regret seeing young persons driving motor cars. A motor car weighs very frequently two tons; it seldom weighs less than a ton or a ton and a half. Practically any one of them, however small it may be, will weigh over a ton—I refer to those used in this country. It is true that motor cars weigh less than that in the old country, the small Morris car for instance. To entrust a child of eleven, twelve, thirteen, or fifteen or sixteen years of age, boy or girl, with a machine of that kind upon the highway, is in itself a lack of prudent caution on the part of those who have control of these children. See what it means. The momentum with which that body will strike any given person or machine is obtained by multiplying the rate of speed by the weight. If it is going at only ten miles an hour, one gets some understanding of the tremendous momentum with which it strikes any person who may be in the way of its movement forward. Can we afford as custodians—we are custodians in a large sense of the safety of the public of this country, in that sense at any rate—can we afford to permit this thing to continue, to have these people driving cars?

The second principle is the suspension of the licence. We have not been doing that in this country to the extent which we should. You may say that the provinces can deal with this, but the provinces cannot adequately deal with the question of the criminal character of the offence, and it should not be a law that applies only to one province, it should be universal and passed by this dominion. In England, where of course they have one law, there is a certain well known peer who drives a car very rapidly. He has had his licence suspended for a year's time. The other day they suspended for life the licence of one who under the influence of intoxicants was driving his car at a high rate of speed, resulting in injury but not death. There is only one way in which you can make control effective in this country, and that is by an amendment to the criminal code; because it is useless to talk about making it effective in Ontario and not in Nova Scotia. We must have a law applicable to the whole dominion. I know of no better field in which you can utilize the criminal law than in that very field. After all should it not be a crime thus to endanger human life? We have our criminal code filled with sections dealing sometimes with mischief, sometimes with conspiracy, sometimes with various small matters, but we have never been hesitant in declaring that any offence against the safety of human life should be regarded as a crime. Is it not the duty of this parliament now to take adequate steps to safeguard those who are travelling on the streets of our country on foot? The House of Lords held—and I commend to my friends in this chamber the reading of Lord Buckmaster's judgment—that it is the pedestrian who has the right of way, not the machine. I can never forget seeing, when passing through the village of Ipswich after that decision, a mother with her child saunter across the street just as leisurely as was possible, while the motor cars had to slow down and wait while she went over. Pedestrians have the right of way. Tell me, Mr. Speaker, to what extent have pedestrians the right of way in Canada? Ask yourselves that question. All of us know what it is to dodge out of the way of motor cars in this country. They drive by with as much nonchalance and complacency as though they owned the road and we were trespassers. Has not the time come to assert ourselves and say that people who thus endanger human life have committed a crime—because in my judgment it is endangering human life and should be made a crime.

I think this statute is not sufficiently stringent with respect to the suspension of licences. I should like to have it provided in the sections which follow that after the first offence the licence be suspended for a period of years, and I should like to go as far as having it suspended for life. That is the only way that my safety can be secured. Let us be personal and selfish about it; what right has the Minister of Justice to have his life endangered, when he crosses the street to-night, by someone who says, To the blank with him; we are going to drive our car as we see fit. It is a dark night, he is struck; the driver leaves him dying and rushes on. That happens in this country; you only have to read the daily press to see it.

The figures given by the hon. member for Broadview as to the number of deaths resulting in Great Britain, Germany, the United States, Canada, are simply appalling. Think of 37,000 people being killed in the United States in 1935. There are communities in the United States that you and I have been in where we have to dodge to get across the street without being hit by a motor car. We know of one city in particular in Europe where the pedestrian has to risk his life any time he tries to cross the street. Is it not time we should intervene, and should we not intervene in the public interest.

As to the question of those driving cars under the influence of liquor, I think nothing except the most powerful punishment will have any effect. When two or three men are tied up in penitentiary for a year or two for driving motor cars while under the influence of liquor it will have the effect of stopping them. I wonder how many hon. members have seriously analysed the number of accident cases that are referable to drink. I confess I have. I have been appalled to find that nearly all the fatal accident cases may be attributed to drink. I am sorry to say that, but it is true. Carry your minds back to these things. I am not referring to that terrible accident where those driving the car were under age; I am referring to the class of cases that make the second branch of what I have to say, namely the class in which accidents occur by reason of the drivers being under the influence of alcohol. The question of defining when a man is intoxicated has always been a matter of great difficulty. For instance, habitual drunkenness is defined and interpreted in a recent English statute. The question of intoxication has usually been regarded as a matter of proof, and it is for the jury or the judge, as the case may be, to draw the inference from the evidence as to whether or not the person was under the influence of intoxicants so as to be deprived of the power of control which is essential in the driving of a machine such as a motor car.

Laws, Mr. Speaker, are of two kinds; at least there are two phases in which we can consider them. One is the punitive effect, that is, the punishment of the offender; the other is the deterrent effect. If we enact a provision of this kind I submit we shall produce a salutary effect upon drivers of motor cars; it will operate as a deterrent against men going out to drive cars while under the influence of liquor. I believe that. It has been my experience with respect to law and its administration. I am confident that the deterrent effect of a statute of this kind is not easy to over-estimate. Why? Because it has behind it a sound body of public opinion. One of the main reasons why sometimes some laws are better enforced than others is that you have behind them an enlightened and powerful public opinion. I am satisfied that the public opinion of this country demands that we should make it punishable, severely punishable, if you will, to drive a motor car under the influence of liquor.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: That being so, let us grapple with this matter and not offer any apologies with respect to it. It is all right to say that the provinces have laws; so they have. But the criminal code is another thing altogether. It applies from coast to coast; it puts all provinces on an equality; it makes possible the punishment of the man in one part of the country equally with the man who lives in another part. In my judgment it leaves the whole situation in a proper perspective with respect to the risks involved and the danger incurred when you have a motor car under the control of one who has been using intoxicants improperly.

The question whether or not a jury may return a verdict on a manslaughter charge for culpable negligence has long engaged the attention of those who are familiar with the development of criminal law. Manslaughter is of course based upon the assumption that there has been culpable negligence, but juries are human and prone to say: We will not convict our friend of manslaughter; it is a terrible thing to contemplate, but when the alternative is put to them in the form indicated by this bill, a conviction for culpable negligence, you have a situation of an entirely different character. I do believe that the count for culpable negligence in an indictment would do much to make punishment of the offenders secure and possible where now they escape. All of us unfortunately know, Mr. Speaker—and perhaps it is to the credit of human nature—how difficult it is for a jury of men to sit down and say that their neighbour is to be found guilty of manslaughter. They find it difficult to believe that he was so oblivious to what was going on and so absolutely unconcerned that he did not take proper care, and that manslaughter was the result. But you ask them whether or not they are ready to convict for culpable negligence and that sounds different. That does not sound so bad. After all he may have been just a bit negligent in his job. He may have become careless; he may have been lighting his cigarette or his cigar; he may have failed to take those steps which a man should take to ensure the safety of the passer-by on the street or the highway. If he has done so it seems to me that the question of making it possible to find a verdict of culpable negligence, when the charge of manslaughter is too offensive in the mind of the jury, should be a matter with which we should deal.

There remain only two other matters in the bill that need be mentioned at all. One has to do with the functions of judge and jury. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that it was the act of a great jurist in Great Britain that decided that it was for the jury to come to a conclusion on the question of libel or no libel. Now the question of fact for the jury to determine is as indicated in this section which is part of the bill. It should always, it seems to me, be a matter of fact to be determined by the judge if sitting as judge and jury, and by the jury where there is a jury.

I should like to add just one word more, with regard to the question of impounding motor vehicles. I have not been practising my profession, except to read the cases, for over ten years. One of the last cases in which I was engaged concerned a motor car, a new Cadillac, which came from the province of British Columbia into the province of Alberta laden with liquor, in contravention of the provisions of the Alberta act. The government of the province seized the car and the liquor. The magistrate convicted the accused of an offence under the statute and confiscated the car.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Was it under the criminal code?

Mr. BENNETT: No, under the liquor act. I think one prosecution was under the criminal code and the other under the liquor act, but of course it was under the liquor act that they confiscated the car as well as the cargo of liquor. I was entrusted by the government of Alberta to deal with the matter and ultimately the case went to the privy council, where it was decided that it was properly confiscated.

If we confiscate a car in the province of Alberta because it contains liquor coming from British Columbia to Alberta, what would you think about simply confiscating a car that kills a man? What would you think about making automobile drivers understand that this sort of thing is not going to be tolerated any longer in Canada? What would you think about making it clear to the man who has eight or ten thousand dollars invested in a car, "You are running the risk of losing that eight or ten thousand dollars by your carelessness, by your negligence, by your disregard of the rules that ordinarily should govern the conduct of men." Sometimes—I am sorry to say this, Mr. Speaker—the measure of carelessness is the measure of newly acquired wealth that enables a car to be purchased costing a large sum of money. That is a very terrible thing to say, but some of us have seen newly acquired wealth express itself in very expensive cars, and drive by with such an entire and utter disregard of the convenience of others; whether it splash them with dirty water from the street or hurl them into the ditch is a matter of profound indifference.

Should we not take steps to stop it? We have the power. We should not leave it to the provinces to deal with it, so that one does and the other does not; we should make it of universal concern in Canada to see that this thing is stopped and that the man whose car brings about this result is punished. It has been part of the law in England from the very start of things, and it is the law upon which was based that old theory of the deodand, that anything that brought about the death of a subject could be destroyed or forfeited; confiscated, as we say sometimes. Forfeited to the crown is the other expression. It was amazing what excellent cars the province of Alberta did get by reason of its confiscation of those automobiles, for the purpose of carrying on its ordinary business, without having to buy them. It was an amazing thing. If, for instance, the mounted police and others of our organizations that require motor cars had them provided at the expense of some of these negligent persons I think it would be a very salutary lesson on the one hand and a very easy way to get motor cars on the other. It might be worthy of consideration; I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) would be interested.

I do not desire, sir, to take up the time of this house with any further observations. I suggested to the minister that I might speak before he did; not that I think I can in any sense influence his judgment. Far be it from me to assume any such thing as that, but I know how judicial will be his approach to this difficult problem, and the observations I make are expressed in the hope that as he does approach it he will realize that any action he takes to bring about the results which are indicated by this bill will, I believe, meet with the warm approval not only of the members of this chamber but of that great public outside the chamber who are running the risk every day of having their lives taken from them by the carelessness, the indifference and sometimes the drunkenness of those who have these machines under their control.

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I had not planned to speak on this bill but, having listened to the three excellent speeches which have preceded mine, I am convinced that there is a point which is of the greatest importance and upon which as yet no comment has been made. Accordingly I am taking the liberty of speaking before the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in order to direct his attention to it, so that he may incorporate it in his reply, a matter which seems to me to be fundamental in connection with the principle of this bill.

I listened with a great deal of interest, as I always do, to my colleague and neighbour the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), and I congratulate him, as I do the hon. member for London (Mr. Betts) and my right hon. leader (Mr. Bennett), who followed, on their approach to this matter, endorsing most heartily what they had to say. On the other hand it seems to me that the bill under consideration at the moment fails to go far enough and stops really far short of the point which I think should be reached. The bill deals with effect rather than with cause.

By that I mean, who are driving cars? Who get licences to drive cars? How do we know that those who are driving cars are qualified to do so? The hon. member for Broadview referred to the record that had been achieved in Great Britain, the lowering of the number of accidents occurring each day or each year, if you like.

Those of us who have visited the United Kingdom recently have seen attached to licence plates a white plate bearing the red letter "L", indicating that the one in charge of the car is a "learner" or a probationer as an automobile driver. He has applied for his licence and has come up to certain qualified standards, and from then on for, I believe, at least the period of a month, and in some cases as long as three months, he must carry the learner's plate on the rear of his car. This indicates to all and sundry that he is not as yet a qualified driver, and to look out for him. He is not permitted to drive alone at any time during the learner probationary period. He must have accompanying him one who is the holder of a full licence.

I think all who have had experience in driving cars in Canada realize that both on our highways and in our cities there are drivers who are by no means intoxicated, but who act as if they were. I have seen signs on the back of cars which read, "Look out; I may do something foolish." That seems to be one of the best signs which could be attached to some cars I have seen. All hon. members must realize that, as the hon. member for Broadview said, in the vast majority of cases it takes two to make an accident. We have all had the experience where the driver in front of us or the driver coming in from our right or left, or the driver coming towards us, has done something extraordinarily foolish, which has manifested to us the fact that he did not understand the control of a motor car.

There are people driving motor cars to-day —we all know them—whose vision is impaired. There are those who are colour blind, who cannot tell a red light from a green one. There are others who are entirely unfamiliar with the mechanical operation of any machine, let alone an automobile. They know that if they press forward their left foot, shift the lever, and press the right foot as they let go with their left—so far as one can let go of one's foot—the chances are the car will start. After that, heaven alone knows what will happen. Yet, for one reason or another they have been able to convince someone that they are qualified drivers of motor cars and are then permitted to take charge of their cars, and proceed through our cities and on our highways.

I know that at the moment the granting of driving permits is in the jurisdiction of the provinces, and for a permit to drive a car, one applies to an official in his own province. Notwithstanding anything that has been said so far in regard to drunken drivers, and all that it implies, or in regard to reckless drivers, and all that that implies, it seems to me the fundamental cause of accidents throughout the country is the fact that so many who are driving cars are not qualified drivers in fact, but only in name.

It seems to me that as we have here a national menace, the granting of licences should be a federal function, and could come under the control of federal regulation and law, rather than have the granting of licences left to the individual provinces. Perhaps control might be under the criminal code, or whatever statute would be suitable.

Let me illustrate. Let it be assumed that the laws of British Columbia are extremely strict in the matter of examination for a driving permit, whereas the laws of, say the neighbouring province of Alberta may be less strict. I do not know what the conditions are in those provinces, and I use them simply in a hypothetical case. Yet the man who receives a licence in the province where the requirements are not rigid can go to the province where the requirements are rigid and drive with just as much freedom as he would have in his own province.

Therefore we have here a national question. Implied in the bill is the desire to curtail accidents, and to reduce them to a minimum. When I say that the bill has touched upon the effect rather than the cause I mean that we have left out the most important single facts in the whole question. Therefore I would heartily recommend to the minister that in addition to what is covered by this bill he might give consideration to what I have just suggested, and turn his mind to the question whether or not it is possible, or if you like, within the jurisdiction of the criminal code, to make it criminal to drive a car without adequate knowledge of it, and without being fully capable of so doing.

One more word and I shall have finished. Those of us who have been in the United Kingdom recently have realized that they have gone a long way in traffic regulation through what is called "controlled" and "decontrolled" areas. In certain areas, or rather along certain stretches of highway, one sees the now familiar signs and realizes that he is not under any circumstances permitted to drive over thirty miles an hour. Then along other stretches he sees other now familiar signs, bearing different markings, and he knows there he can drive at any speed, provided he does not drive recklessly. The combination of "decontrolled" and "controlled" areas, along with the new requirements for the gaining of a licence in great part have brought about the substantial lowering of the number of accidents noted in the United Kingdom.

Then, further, our highway laws vary from province to province. To drive in one province under one set of laws, and to drive in another under another set, is confusing to the traveller. Who knows, as he travels from province to province, or even from town to town, whether he can turn to the right on a red light or whether he cannot. He does not know whether he may drive at only thirty miles an hour on a highway or whether he may travel at fifty. It is all very well to say that no one should proceed from one province to another without fully acquainting himself with the various laws in the various provinces. But, after all, we are approaching the stage when a trans-Canada highway will be an actuality rather than a politician's dream, and probably we can think about driving from one end of the dominion to the other, through the nine provinces.

Surely when we consider the awful toll that is being taken upon human life, not only in cities but on our highways, a toll not only due to intoxicated drivers or reckless drivers, but partly as a result of drivers without adequate skill to drive a car at all, a lack of knowledge of the machine itself and a lack of knowledge of the traffic laws in the provinces, it must be realized—and I am quite sure my right hon. friend will agree with me—that there should be some dominion-wide, common code which could be recognized as the highway code of this whole dominion. Perhaps that is not easily accomplished. I can readily understand that the right hon. gentleman will see many hazards in the way of each of those matters, but I think that when we consider the bill we should also consider the matters I have mentioned, in addition to that which already has been so ably said by hon. gentlemen who have spoken before me.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything on this matter, but the older I get the more determined I am to give credit where credit is due. I am convinced that at least in Ontario we are tightening up in the enforcement of traffic laws. I should like to give one concrete example. In the forenoon of one of the holidays a citizen in my district drank a bottle of beer. He and the group with which he was associated were having a picnic in the afternoon and he was driving his car. He was summoned to court because he had taken the beer in the forenoon, and had to spend two weeks in gaol. I have noticed considerable tightening up in Ontario, and while I may not agree with everything done by the premier of that province, I must say that when he takes a thing in hand he gets somewhere with it.

I should like to find out the cause of our accidents.

Mr. SPENCE: Most of it is through lack of courtesy.

Mr. McIVOR: I know that some men are allowed to drive cars who are thinking of two or three things at the same time. I know, too, that some of our youth even at sixteen years of age can drive cars better than I can. I should like to know how many accidents are due to intoxicated drivers. If our government will allow at one place the thing that causes accidents and then condemn it at another place, I think it is time we were sure of the cause of our accidents. I am not so sure that extreme punishment will prevent them. I backed into a street car once, but I never did it again. I think intelligent men and women will profit by the mistakes they make. The accidents to-day are appalling, and I will support any law or anything that will help to save the lives of our citizens, and especially of our women and children who cannot afford a car.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a few words on this bill, from another angle. Many members have spoken from different angles, but I do not think anyone has so far touched on the cost to the public as a result of these accidents. The large increase which has taken place in the number of injuries and accidental deaths over the past ten or fifteen years has had a very considerable effect in raising insurance rates in respect to the automobile. One must realize that insurance is a cooperative proposition; therefore it affects every individual, and if we are to continue to have more deaths and injuries from automobile accidents we are going to have increasingly higher rates of insurance.

Some twenty years or so ago, in the list of the causes of death under life insurance policies over a period, it used to be that diseases of the heart and arteries stood first in the causes of death; next came cancer, and down in the ninth or tenth place, accidents. But gradually over a period of years, due to higher speed and so on, and the increasing number of accidents which took place, we find that while diseases of the heart and arteries still stand in the first place, with cancer next, the third most prevalent cause of death to-day is accidents, and the increase in the number of deaths from accidents is practically all accounted for by the automobile. Despite the fact that preventive medicine has had such a tremendous effect in increasing the average span of life, automobile accidents are counteracting that benefit to a great extent, and life insurance is not getting the benefit of a decrease in the number of deaths generally. If we do not do something about these accidents, life insurance premiums may have to go up. Certainly they will not decrease as they should, and that affects everybody.

There is one other matter to which I should like to refer. I do not think it is the habitual drinker who is causing these accidents and deaths; I believe it is the man who takes drinks only now and then. These occasional drinks speed him up. Speed is another factor that is contributing to the increase in the number of automobile accidents—speed out of all proportion to the safety of road traffic. I certainly shall endorse this bill.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a strong consensus of opinion in this chamber as well as outside in favour of some tightening of the law against reckless driving on the public highway. I am in sympathy with the general principle of the bill that has been submitted by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), and I also agree with most of the sentiments which have been expressed here this afternoon.

In addition to the many causes that have been given for the higher mortality on the public highway, there is one other which perhaps I should mention. It is that our public highways to-day are used more and more for the transportation of goods, as well as for providing services between various communities in this dominion. The transportation of goods over the public highways between towns and cities and provinces to me is a matter of great concern, and I have no doubt that this traffic contributes to a very large degree in creating conditions of greater danger on the public highway. We find these great vehicles constantly on the highways, creating a hazard which never existed before, and I have in mind the vehicles that are used by both individuals and corporations. It is not uncommon to find on the public highway to-day a heavy vehicle itself weighing many tons, carrying a load of eight or ten tons, and often it will have one or two, and sometimes three, trailers behind it.

In connection with this transportation of goods a question arises which does come under our jurisdiction, and that is the question of the welfare of the men who are hired to drive that kind of vehicle. I have no doubt that the companies engaged in this kind of business select the best men they can get, but it is not uncommon for these men to be out with a vehicle for long hours at a stretch. They may be out for ten or twelve or fourteen hours at a stretch. While the man may not be driving the truck all that time, nevertheless he is on duty indirectly for the whole of that period, and a man who has been out with a truck or other vehicle for eight or ten or twelve hours at a time is no longer in a fit condition to drive on the public highway. This in itself creates a greater hazard both for the trucks on the highway and for traffic in general.

I realize that the granting of these licences is exclusively a matter of provincial jurisdiction; nevertheless I feel that in view of the number of accidents on the highway and in the interests of the individuals themselves, something should be done by tightening the existing law to make the punishment fit the crime at least in some instances. A driver who has been found guilty of driving a truck or car while under the influence of liquor should not be allowed to drive on the public highway for quite a long time. He should not be allowed to drive a truck or any other vehicle, and in addition the car he was using should be impounded for a certain length of time. That would be one safeguard for the public. I do not drive a car myself, and so I can speak perhaps more freely.

I hope that the minister in dealing with this question this afternoon, and after attempting to gauge what public feeling is in the matter, will not take a negative attitude in regard to this bill. His department, I have no doubt, has been engaged in studying this question for some time, and I hope that he will give his general approval to the principle underlying this bill in order that we may take in this house steps which will tend to make traffic on the highways much safer than it is at the present time.

Mr. A. H. MITCHELL (Medicine Hat): I have driven many thousands of miles, in many provinces, in several countries, and under all manner of circumstances, and I have a great deal of sympathy for the average motorist and for the administrators of the various laws governing behaviour on the highways. I know there are many avoidable accidents as well as some that are unavoidable. I know also that the demand for speed and the construction of automobiles with tremendous acceleration, power and high velocity appeal to something in my nature that makes me behave differently in an automobile and on a highway than I would do in a drawing room. I speak simply as an experienced automobile driver, and I say that I do not believe laws can be passed to make people courteous and considerate of the rights and privileges of others. In a matter of this kind, where the safety of life and limb is involved, the deterrent effect of these proposed amendments to the criminal code appeals to me, and I feel that the matter should be effectively dealt with, and not lightly dismissed. If this particular bill is not passed, some measure having at least the same effect should be substituted for it.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): May I say immediately that it is my intention to introduce a bill to amend the criminal code, which will be rather extensive, containing alterations of many sections; that not only the proposal of the hon. member who introduced this bill (Mr. Church) but the various suggestions which have been made this afternoon by the speakers will be carefully and duly considered and weighed, and that we shall try to carry out any proposal which is possible and which comes under our jurisdiction, if there is some improvement to be made.

This has been a very interesting discussion, although to some extent a painful one. There is no doubt that the number of deaths caused by motor accidents in Canada is appalling, and that the progress of the motor car levies a heavy toll upon the lives of our fellow citizens. It is the same and even worse in other countries.

The sponsor of this bill has referred to a debate in the British house on this very question, in the month of December. I have read that debate, which any hon. member can see in Hansard of the House of Lords of December 8, and I find from the interesting discussion which took place there, that they are far from considering that the state of the criminal law is the cause of the numerous accidents which happen in the United Kingdom. Indeed, among the matters incident to the discussion, speakers dwelt, for instance, on the consideration that their roads had not been built primarily for the use of motor cars. They spoke of curves, and so forth, and it was suggested that, even at the cost of millions of pounds, the roads should be rebuilt, it being thought that was the main cause of the accidents. They discussed the question of regulations, of an examination, for example, every year when a driver comes to renew his licence.

The point which the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) has just raised, of competent drivers who are compelled to work for too long hours, also may be relevant to the cause of accidents. But these matters can not very well be dealt with under the criminal code. In the British parliament, of course, they control all that, while here in Canada the provinces control the roads, the licences, and the age of the drivers. I shall consider the subject carefully, but I am free to confess that if a province enacts a statute that the minimum age at which a person may receive a licence shall be sixteen years, or seventeen years, or eighteen years, we cannot legally by an amendment to the criminal code make it a crime. I am not convinced that this parliament can take such action. However, the question is so tremendously important that I am willing to consider everything which has been suggested to-day, to see whether there is not a possibility of making some progress towards doing away with at least part of the evil. I do not know that even a conference as between the provinces to come to some sort of uniformity in the regulations would be effective; that, as suggested by my hon. friend Mr. Massey—I always forget his constituency—

Mr. MASSEY: Greenwood.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am thinking of him more than of his constituency. I do not know that it will be possible to arrive at some sort of national method or policy in connection with our highways.

This having been stated, I agree almost entirely with what was said by the hon. member who introduced the bill, with regard to the principles governing the matter. It is when I come to connect the bill with those principles that I find some difficulty about the matter. For instance, I am in agreement with my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) with regard to those who drive cars while under the influence of liquor. It is unthinkable that any one who has not his faculties should drive a car and endanger the lives of men, women and children on the streets or on the highways. But when we come to such a definition of the law as will prevent such accidents there are difficulties to be dealt with. For instance, I am afraid I do not agree that the changes suggested by my hon. friend would be an improvement. Instead of the word "intoxicated" he suggests the words—

Mr. BENNETT: "Under the influence of alcohol."

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, but it is more than that. The words are:

. . . under the influence of alcohol . . . to such a degree as to make him incapable of exercising a safe and proper control of any motor vehicle or automobile.

I am not sure that this would not loosen the law instead of tightening it; but, again, I am willing to give the matter the most careful study.

With regard to subsection 7 of section 3 it is proposed that:

Any person who, by the operation or use of any vehicle in a culpably negligent manner, but not wilfully or wantonly, occasions the death of another person, shall, upon conviction, be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months or to a fine of not more than one hundred dollars, or to both.

Section 951 of the criminal code provides:

Every count shall be deemed divisible; and if the commission of the offence charged, as described in the enactment creating the offence or as charged in the count, includes the commission of any other offence, the person accused may be convicted of any offence so included which is proved, although the whole offence charged is not proved; or he may be convicted of an attempt to commit any offence so included.

Subsection 3 reads:

Upon a charge of manslaughter arising out of the operation of a motor vehicle the jury may find the accused not guilty of manslaughter but guilty of criminal negligence under section 284, and such conviction shall be a bar to further prosecution for any offence arising out of the same facts.

Section 284 provides that the offence of manslaughter may be reduced to criminal negligence, and the penalty is two years in prison. My hon. friend would change that so that the offence would be culpable negligence and the penalty would be three months instead of two years. I may say that I intend to propose an amendment to this section in view of the fact that the judgment of the criminal courts in England leaves some uncertainty as to the meaning. I believe that the amendment which I intend to propose will be preferable to the section suggested.

An hon. MEMBER: Is the minister referring to the Andrews case?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes. My hon. friend also proposes in his bill that anyone who has caused death while driving an automobile shall not be allowed to drive for two years. I shall not discuss the question whether the suspension or the cancellation of a driver's licence is not a purely provincial matter, but his amendment would be applicable to anyone who has caused the death of any person while driving an automobile, although the death might not have been caused through the fault of the driver. I do not think an innocent person should be penalized. However, that could be changed. I have already stated my doubts as to whether we could make it an indictable offence for anyone under eighteen to drive a motor vehicle if under the law of the province such a person has been granted a licence to drive a car.

I do not think I can add anything to these remarks except to say that I am impressed by the intense feeling which seems to prevail in the house, and I am sure everywhere, that if anything can be done within our jurisdiction to try to prevent or to minimize to some extent this terrible evil which we have in the country, so as to save the lives of at least a few of our fellow citizens, we should do it. My hon. friend has said in advance that the debate will probably be adjourned. I am afraid there can be no other course. It is impossible to give consideration to what has been suggested on all sides this afternoon, and even to the various provisions of the bill itself, without asking the house to adjourn the debate, so that every one of these suggestions may be fully weighed and considered before the bill which I intend to propose as a government measure is introduced. I therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

APPLICATION OF PROVISIONS OF CHINESE IMMIGRATION ACT, REVISED STATUTES, 1927, CHAPTER 95

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved the second reading of Bill No. 11, respecting Japanese immigration.

He said: As I explained on the first reading of the bill, the purport of it is to place Japanese immigration into Canada on exactly the same plane, neither higher nor lower, as that occupied by the Chinese since 1923 when their immigration was last dealt with.

Ever since British Columbia joined confederation the question of oriental immigration and their penetration into every phase of life and industry in that province has been a consideration and an ever-increasing problem for us to deal with there. As far back as 1875 we find the province of British Columbia passing an act forbidding orientals to have votes. At that time the oriental immigration was entirely Chinese; there were no Japanese. At this point I might follow to its conclusion the history of Chinese immigration, as I want to use it as a parallel to what we should do in connection with the Japanese. Large numbers of Chinese were brought in to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. Their competition in the labour market attracted the ill-will of the labour element, and on representations made the dominion government first in 1885 imposed a poll tax, or an entrance fee if you like, of $50 per head. In 1901 that was increased to $100 and, in 1904, to $500 on every Chinaman entering Canada. It did not apply to Japanese. It was intended to restrict Chinese immigration, but it was not effective. There may have been a temporary check, but it did not amount to anything. It did lead to an undesirable condition, little if at all better than peonage, because large Chinese financial companies would put up the $500 and the man's fare and would proceed to retrieve their money by a lien on the wretched man's wages. That has been done away with for fifteen years, but I am told that there are still Chinamen contributing out of their scanty earnings to repay these big companies which financed their entry into Canada.

Without going into the methods that led to it I will say shortly that in 1923 we passed chapter 95, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, and I might quote briefly its provisions. From beginning to end it does not use the word "exclusion"; it simply says that entry into Canada is confined to the following classes of people of Chinese origin or descent, then naming the classes: the diplomatic service and those connected with them; children born in Canada going away for their education; merchants and students. That is all. No labour immigration whatever is allowed. And merchants and students are strictly limited; they have to have a passport issued by the Chinese governmeint and visaëd by our agent in China. The result has been—it may suit some to say that it is not total exclusion but to all intents and purposes it is total exclusion of Chinese, which it was intended to be. It has worked well, cured a long-standing sore, and there has been no ill-will or dissension or discontent among the Chinese so excluded, with only one exception; they resent and will continue to resent the fact that we have discriminated against them in favour of the Japanese, because we allow a certain number of Japanese to come in. The Chinese also have their pride and do not like this.

Now I have before me the last report of the department of immigration, issued a few days ago. It shows that during the last fiscal year one Chinese immigrant and three students were admitted. And they have a system of allowing Chinese in on temporary permits; missionaries, professors and people like that can come in for a short period, generally six months. Forty-two such permits were issued, and more than half, in fact the bulk of those so admitted, had left Canada within the fiscal year. Chinese went home under circumstances such that they would never be allowed to come back to the number of 1,362. So you can imagine that the Chinese population is rapidly disappearing. Among those that are left the birth rate is very small, because the women are few in number; it only amounts to 5.7, so, that matter is settled.

I have in my hand a report issued by the British Columbia government, prepared by the research department of the economic council, they appear to have been very capable thorough scientific men and their conclusions have been justified by time. They say that in the years 1938 to 1940 inclusive there will be an approximate decrease—note that—of 452 Chinese males thrown upon the labour market. Later on I shall tell you what the effect will be as regards Japanese labour coming on the market, it is a very different story. The Chinese who are left here are treated with respect, they are generally merchants carrying on trade between the two countries, and there is no ill will between us at all with the single exception which I have mentioned.

Coming now to the Japanese, a very different tale must be unfolded. We have a weird thing called a gentleman's agreement with the Japanese. We have had it for many years. It was preceded in 1907, or possibly 1906, by riots in the streets of Vancouver; feeling then as now was running very high—I think it is more intense now—there were riots; I think the Japanese consulate was stoned and windows broken. The Hon. Mr. Lemieux, our late lamented Speaker, was sent to Japan to negotiate what was called a gentleman's agreement. I should like to quote from the debate which took place on his return. Mr. Macpherson, then the member for Vancouver, speaking in the debate, as reported at page 2087 of Hansard of 1907-08, said:

They—

That is, the then government.

—have carried on negotiations with Japan which have resulted in stopping for all time any further influx of Japanese coolies into our country.

Mark that! And I suppose Mr. Macpherson believed what he said. But Mr. Sproule said, "How do you know?"

Mr. Macpherson: I will tell my hon. friend how I know. The Minister of Labour has just come back from Japan and he has stated in parliament upon his responsibility as a minister of the crown, that we need never fear any further immigration from Japan. That statement has been accepted by the house; that statement has been accepted by the country.

Mr. Sproule: No.

Mr. Macpherson: My hon. friend says, no.

Mr. Sproule: The hon. gentleman says that statement is accepted by the house and by the country. Had we not years ago a similar statement from the government that the Japanese would regulate immigration, and yet the Japanese government have not regulated immigration to the satisfaction of even the hon. member himself?

He then speaks of a period "four or five years ago," that is, four or five years precedent to 1907 or 1908. So that between thirty-five and forty years ago we were told this old love story, that we could trust the people of Japan and everything would be lovely. And now conditions are worse than they were then.

I think we are the only country in the world, at least we are the only dominion that has an arrangement with Japan which allows labourers to come in. Some of them have gentleman's agreements, but none to let labour come in. Here I should like to allude to—I do not want to use a harsh word so I will say the secrecy that has always been allowed to cover up and put a smoke screen around this gentleman's agreement. That is one of the worst features of it. I find that in 1908, the Hon. Mr. Lemieux was speaking and he gave a short statement as to what this gentleman's agreement was. It was the most vague and indefinite thing you can conceive. Let me quote the sense of it. I refer to page 1610 of Hansard of January 21, 1908. This is from a letter signed by a Japanese statesman —I do not know what his title was—addressed to Mr. Lemieux:

Acting in this spirit and having particular regard to circumstances of recent occurrence in British Columbia,—

That is the riots.

—the imperial government—

That is the Japanese government.

—have decided to take efficient means to restrict emigation to Canada. In carrying out this purpose, the imperial government, in pursuance of the policy above stated, will give careful consideration to local conditions prevailing in Canada, with a view to meeting the desires of the government of the dominion as far as is compatible with the spirit of the treaty and the dignity of the state.

That is the Japanese state. Well there is nothing very definite about that. Someone had the temerity to ask in the house just what was to be done: "Will the hon. minister tell the house to what extent the Japanese government promised to restrict emigration?" Mr. Lemieux replied:

My hon. friend is too inquisitive. I will not answer, not from disrespect for him, but because if I did answer I would commit an act unworthy of a Canadian representative and unworthy of myself.

Because he had agreed to various unknown, unstated things; he talks about stringent regulations and then refuses to give the information to the house. Then he says:

There is, however, one feature of these regulations which I am authorized to make public.

Then he refers to restriction of immigration; but it is all up in the air, in the clouds, and as we afterwards found out it stayed in the clouds. The result was that although the thing was supposed to be in existence, nobody knew anything about it. I once asked an immigration official this question: "If the Japanese gentleman's agreement calls for only four hundred a year"—for that is what it did at the time—"why did seventeen hundred come in last year?" The answer I got was, "I don't know. I have never seen the gentleman's agreement, and when a fellow comes along and says he is coming in under the gentleman's agreement, we allow him to come in because we do not know anything to the contrary." There was an entire lack of what you might call fixity as to what the thing was or what it meant.

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask at what time the incident took place to which my hon. friend just referred?

Mr. NEILL: The gentleman's agreement was in 1908.

Mr. CRERAR: When did the seventeen hundred Japanese come in?

Mr. NEILL: It was along about 1917, as far as my memory serves me, but the figures were always exceeded. The gentleman's agreement was not a gentleman's agreement; it was a gentleman's joke as far as one party to the bargain was concerned.

We are talking about a gentleman's agreements. I have in my hand a gentleman's agreement about which there is no secrecy. This is a white paper, which corresponds to our Canadian blue-books, issued by the government of South Africa. Here is the gentleman's agreement made with Japan, all above board; here they say who are to be allowed in, and who are not: 1. Tourists; 2. Persons visiting the Union solely for the purpose of study or scientific investigation; 3. Wholesale merchants and buyers of South African produce for export as well as their respective staffs; 4. The wives and children of any person admitted under paragraphs 1, 2 and 3. That is all. There was no labour immigration there; no permanency, because the agreement continues:

> The permits issued under this understanding shall be for one year—

And they were renewable at the option of the government. To make it quite clear that South Africa was to remain a white Africa, this further clause was added:

> Children born to any such person during such temporary domicile shall have no claim in consequence to Union nationality, birthright or domicile.

That is a very fine gentleman's agreement; it is above board, for all to read and understand, and there is no labour immigration involved at all. It simply covers, as I have said, the diplomatic service, tourists, scientists, wholesale merchants and their wives and children.

However, we got a gentleman's agreement, such as it was. It proved to be Dead sea fruit as far as we were concerned, partly due to the secrecy involved and partly due to the necessarily loosely worded agreement made between two gentlemen who, it is expected, will vie with each other to see that they live up not to the letter but beyond the letter of the agreement. It does not work, however, when you make agreements like that and one of the parties is so mentally constituted, probably by tradition and heritage—I do not blame them altogether—that they do not deem it any dishonour to break even a written bargain, as we have seen in recent times, let alone one so vaguely expressed. That was the weak point.

After the war, feeling again ran very high, and in the spring of 1922 the hon. gentleman who now represents Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), but who then represented Vancouver Centre, called together the British Columbia members. I think that was the first and only time the British Columbia members united about anything. There were four groups represented in that room on that occasion, and we agreed to introduce a resolution asking for the total exclusion of orientals. The government insisted on taking out those words and putting in "effective restriction," saying that meant the same thing. At page 1573 of Hansard for that session I asked:

> Can the leader of the government give us an asurance that, in his mind, the words "effective restriction" in the amendment convey such a measure of restriction as is, at least, equal to the present immigration act in force in Australia to-day?

In Australia at that time they had no gentleman's agreement, or if they had they also had a test by which the Japanese were totally excluded. It was a language test, which I need not go into now. The answer was:

> Mr. Mackenzie King: I have in mind the same object exactly as the people of the country to which my hon. friend has referred had in mind when they enacted their legislation, namely to have a restriction that will be effective.

The then leader of the opposition, the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen, suggested other words. He said, "Well, if you do not like the word 'exclusion'; if that is offensive to the Japanese, why not use the word 'prohibition'?" When that was not accepted by the government he suggested other words, such as "for residence purposes," but that was not accepted. Then he suggested another phrase, "bringing to an end further such immigration for residence purposes." He made an honest attempt to produce something that would really mean effective restriction, but the government did not accept any of his suggestions and put through their amendment using the words "effective restriction" instead of "total exclusion."

After that our committee of British Columbia members more or less disbanded and lost heart. Three of us carried on, two members from British Columbia who were on the Liberal side at that time, and myself. But we soon found that effective restriction did not mean the same as total exclusion, as carried out in Australia, by any means. However, we got something in 1923; we got the Chinese exclusion act put through, to which I have just referred. It worked well and, as I have said, it would have been all right if only we had included the Japanese as well. We used every influence we possessed and every influence we could influence to try to get the Japanese included as well.

Some of the members who came into the house when I did, in 1921, will remember—some of them have happily and conveniently forgotten—that during the strenuous times of 1922 and 1923 and more particularly 1925 and 1926, the minor groups in the house possessed a great deal more influence in regard to legislation than they do now. Even the voice of a lone independent was more vibrant before 1926 than it is now that big majorities have become the order of the day. Possibly that is a good thing for the big parties, but I do not know if it is a good thing for the small groups and the people they represent, who are generally what might be called underprivileged or those seeking some social or legislative justice but who are not sufficiently powerful to attract or command the notice and attention of the bigger parties. However, we kept on. We got the act respecting the Chinese, and it was a success. I well remember the bitter controversy at that time. The senate was lobbied; we were lobbied, and there was a tremendous uproar over the passing of that act, but there has not been a word of objection since. It was a success; in a word, it worked.

We were denied the same legislation with regard to Japanese. Time went on. My two confreres from British Columbia were defeated, largely because of the attitude of the government they had supported in making these promises and not delivering the goods. I persevered, but it was not until 1928, six years after the promise, that I secured even a measure of fulfilment of that promise with regard to the Japanese. The government of that day amended the gentleman's agreement, and so far as that amendment went I give full credit and thanks to the then Prime Minister, who is also the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). He did two good things. First he cut the number down from 400 to 150. Then, more important, he arranged that the great bulk of these immigrants would come in under the jurisdiction, so to speak, of our Immigration Act and our immigration authorities. That was a very good thing indeed. He also arranged that immigrants had to have their passports visaëd in Japan by one of our agents there. It placed the agreement more or less under our control—but only more or less.

Since then the agreement has been in force and I am told—and it is easily ascertainable—that in several cases and, perhaps, in most of the years, less than the quota has come in. Perhaps that has been largely due to the depression and, in later years, due to internal conditions in Japan.

However, the usual loophole has been discovered, as it always has been, and always will be, by which more Japanese have come in under this gentleman's agreement, as it is interpreted. I need not go into it now, but it does permit people to come in that I, at least, never contemplated would be allowed to come in except under the quota. If it came about that the Japanese were determined to force immigration, they would be able to do it, under the terms of this loophole. The really fatal mistake was in not making the Chinese act of 1923 apply to the Japanese also. The United States had done it, just about that time. They were threatened with tremendous consequences; sabres and swords were waved, but nothing happened. They were threatened with an enormous loss of trade—which would have lasted only two or three months. Trade will always go where trade finds it is best adapted to go, and it does not pay attention to matters of this kind.

If we had done it then we would only have been in line with the other dominions and, so far as I know, with other countries as well. The principle has often been laid down to protect the people native to a country against incursions, however legal, of aliens. By the native I do not mean the aborigines alone; they may be natives in the sense of having long occupancy in a country.

In Kenya colony in East Africa the British government, which has control, said they found it necessary to record their considered opinion that the interests of African natives must be paramount, and that if and when those interests and the interests of the immigrant nations conflicted, the former should prevail. That was the view taken by the British government.

Next we find General Smuts in a speech referring to the "warping influence of the fear of ultimate black domination." If we substitute the word "Japanese" for "black" we have described the situation in British Columbia in our own country. He there mentioned the "warping influence of the fear of ultimate black domination."

Mr. K. K. Kawakami, one of Japan's most distinguished publicists, in an article written a few years ago said this:

> People accustomed to low wages and therefore a low standard of living can successfully compete with and ultimately defeat people with a higher standard of living.

Sure. Here is the last illustration. I see connected with it the name of Sir Shenton Thomas, the gentleman who opened the Singapore base the other day. He was the governor, or whatever the position is, of the Malay colony. In this case, the Chinese and Indians, who were aliens, came in bringing in capital and dominating industry, and they were beginning to make demands for a place in the sun—jobs in the civil service, and permanent positions like that. He gave them what is described in the article as a cold rebuff when he announced that there would be no appointments to administrative positions among non-Malay Asiatics. They became angry, and said that much of the development was due to their effort, and so on.

Sir Shenton Thomas said that he did not deny that fact, but argued that the Malayan was in danger of being dispossessed in his own country, and that therefore special measures were necessary for his own protection. Some extensive land reservations which can never pass out of Malayan ownership, and certain non-manual government branches virtually reserved to Malayans, are included in such measures.

That gives an illustration of what I have in mind. But we took the opposite view. Let me quote Mr. Lemieux in this connection. I do not suppose he thought he was making history, when he said, at page 1591 of Hansard for 1908:

> The policy of this government has always been to let Japan herself regulate and restrict voluntarily the emigration of her subjects;—
>
> That is, the emigration to Canada—
>
> —any other policy would not have been successful with that nation.

That is the trouble. We have surrendered our right of control of the immigration into our country of the subjects of a foreign nation. There was the initial mistake, and it has endured ever since. That will conclude my observations on this phase of the matter. I would ask that you call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, the modified gentleman's agreement of which I spoke before six o'clock, and which came into effect, I think, in September, 1928, had five major bad consequences or effects.

First, it missed a good opportunity of settling once for all a question that was bound to rise up again and again, and be more and more troublesome each time it came up.

Second, being a gentleman's agreement, of very necessity its terms were so slack that it offered large opportunities for evasion. I said, in speaking this afternoon, that the quota had been generally lived up to. Yes, according to the figures you will get over at the immigration department, if you send for them, that is correct.

But this is an instance that came to my notice. It is in a confidential statement, and I cannot give its source, but every name is given, and I can guarantee its bona fides. The mounted police had in hand certain fraudulent transactions in connection with birth certificates, and they found that seventy-five Japanese birth certificates had been faked and 117 fishing licences illegally obtained. The Japanese interpreter—and the interpreter is always Japanese, never a white man—went to the penitentiary for two and a half years over that, but I do not suppose there is a member of the house who has ever heard a word of that transaction but myself. Now, if after investigation they managed to find seventy-five such instances, surely we can suppose that at least three times that number actually evaded the regulations. Other members, no doubt, can give similar instances.

In any case, even supposing there is no evasion, the Japanese agreement allows an increase of the adult Japanese population every year in a situation which is already overloaded. I quote again the British Economic Council's report, which was a very valuable document, and time has proved how accurately and carefully it was drawn up. They say that in the years from 1936 to 1940 the increase of Japanese will throw on the labour market 3,874 people, or an average of 774 a year. That was not an increase to the population by way of infants, but the number that would be thrown on to the labour market in those years, and it gives an average —and they itemize it, by both birth and immigration—of 774. That could well be done away with, considering the situation in British Columbia.

The third objection is that in times of depression, when it is necessary to forbid our own white citizens from the British Empire entering this country, and the Bennett government in, I think, 1931 or possibly 1930, passed an order in council seriously restricting the immigration of ordinary labourers from the British Isles, and necessarily so, for the protection of the Canadian working man—

Mr. BENNETT: It is still in force.

Mr. NEILL: But at that same time, under the gentleman's agreement, the Japanese could send in their quota, and as much more as they could get away with, in defiance of any immigration order the government had passed. That is the serious objection. It is a wholly untenable and undesirable position for us to be in.

Fourth—and this is one of the major objections—it hands over the control of immigration to the judgment of an alien nation—a thing that is not done anywhere else in the world.

Let me quote from page 2039 of volume 2 of Hansard of 1908, and this is no mere back bencher like myself speaking, but a man whose words are entitled to some respect, the late Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden. He said:

> Now I come more particularly to the results of the mission to Japan of my hon. friend the Postmaster General. The real object of his mission was to induce Japan to exercise that control over immigration into Canada which we should be able to exercise ourselves. It is one of the attributes of the sovereign power of any state to restrict, or even altogether prohibit, the entrance of aliens within its territory. If we had preserved that right by the stipulation insisted upon by the Conservative government in August, 1895, there would have been no difficulty. We did not reserve that right; therefore, having passed over to the Japanese government that control which should have been exercised by ourselves, it became necessary for my hon. friend the Postmaster General to go to the Japanese government and to ask them to exercise some control and some regulation.

At another point the same gentleman moved an amendment to this effect to the motion which was before the house, at page 2146 of the same volume of Hansard:

> That this house while expressing its profound appreciation of the friendly intentions and courteous assurances of the Japanese government, and while declaring its sincere desire for the most cordial relations with the Japanese people, desires nevertheless to record its strong protest against a policy under which our wage-earning population cannot be protected from destructive invading competition except by entreating the forbearance and aid of a foreign government.

The words "wage-earning" might now be taken out and there be inserted instead "the population of British Columbia", because it is no longer the wage-earners' problem, but applies to every industry, high and low, in the province.

Worst of all, the agreement even as amended puts us in the most invidious position as regards China. China has been a divided nation, and therefore has received perhaps less attention than she should have, but she will come back a unified nation with her four hundred millions of population, with her trained soldiers—I think it was General Gordon who said that the Chinese soldiers were the best in the world—and with her market potentialities of four hundred million purchasers. We will go to China and she will say: You want to trade with us, but why do you treat us so differently from the way you treat the Japanese? And what answer can we give? We shall then be in this position: Either we shall have to reinstate Chinese immigration, which is very undesirable, or under the pressure of China's population of four hundred millions and her soldiers we shall have to put the Japanese back where I now seek to put them. If we are going to do it under pressure from China then, why not let us do it now with all the good will that comes from a free will act of justice? Let us do it now rather than under pressure later.

I remember that Mr. Meighen, when the debate was on in 1922, said this:

> Let us proceed to argument. I stated first that there had been effective exclusion of the inhabitants of China in the United States. My hon. friend—

That was the then Prime Minister:

> My hon. friend says: "Oh, yes, but China is not a first class power."

Then Mr. Meighen continued:

> Are we to modify our language according to the number of troops that there may be in the nation to which that language refers? I do not think Japan would expect us to do that; I do not think China would be flattered to know that that is the reason she is excluded.

That is all I have to say about the gentleman's agreement. I have been told that my bill does not go far enough; that it does not touch the biggest feature of all, and I admit it. The biggest feature of all is the enormous birthrate of the Japanese in British Columbia about 38 per thousand as against 18. I have in my hand figures, and I shall give them briefly.

The school enrolment in British Columbia in the ten years 1927 to 1937 went up twelve per cent; the Japanese enrolment went up eighty-eight per cent. These are significant figures; multiply them by the next ten or twenty years and what kind of situation does it present to your mind? The answer is, of course, that we cannot stop their birth rate—unless we are prepared to bring them under the provisions of chapter 258 of the revised statutes of British Columbia—but we can at least stop adult immigration coming in to add to the vicious circle—more immigrants, more children, more men and women thrown on the labour market, and not only the labour market but all industries in British Columbia. Since even 1923 the legal immigration would mean perhaps twenty-three or twenty-five hundred people, all young people with the potentialities of large families. It may be said: Let us deport them. That is impossible. But we can at least stop the legal entry of them, and above all stop the loopholes that seem inevitably to be connected with any gentleman's agreement, however carefully drawn.

I ask support of this bill on its merits, to correct past errors and prevent more. I ask support from hon. members from all over Canada. It may be said that the east has no such problem. I tell hon. members from Quebec province and also those representing the industrial centres of Ontario: It does concern you. It concerns you vitally. Your line of defence against fatally cheap labour competition is not Montreal or Toronto; it is in British Columbia; it may be our trouble to-day, but it is your's to-morrow. If you in Quebec had the oriental population that we have the numbers would be 265,000; in Ontario they would be 312,000. Just where would you be then? Remember they are all of alien thought and mind and tendency; they are all one body, acting and thinking as a unit. Just where would you put 312,000 in Ontario, and how would you like to have them?

I ask support to this bill with no idea, no hint of taking advantage of the popular prejudice on account of what has gone on during the last year or two. I have never mentioned the war. I ask support on a non-partisan basis. This is not a bill brought down by the government, immediately ipso facto to be opposed by the opposition. It is not brought in by the opposition, immediately to be regarded as suspect by the government, as a device to embarrass them. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) recently said, with reference to a matter brought in by a private member, "It is a good thing to have a frank and sincere consideration of the subject." It may be well said, if we pass this bill, that it is not the act of any party in the house, it is the act of parliament, which is paramount. Therefore, in all sincerity, I ask the support of every member of this house to this bill.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): In rising to speak in support of this bill I realize that it is difficult for hon. members from the other provinces of Canada to appreciate the situation in British Columbia. I thought this afternoon, as I saw the attention with which the members present in the house were following the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), that it would have cheered the hearts of the people of British Columbia if they could have been in the gallery to notice that attention. Because after all this question of Japanese immigration is of vital importance to our province, and there is no way in which the people of the rest of Canada can win the friendship and gratitude of British Columbians more readily than by listening to their case on this subject of immigration and helping them to solve the problem. It is a problem which is steadily getting worse; the position has become more serious year after year. I believe I am the only real British Columbian in this house.

Mr. MacNEIL: Oh! Oh!

Mr. STIRLING: Explain.

Mr. GREEN: Our province is represented by members who were born in Scotland, in Ireland, in England, and one hon. member, of whom we are very proud, was born in Sweden; we even have members who were born in Ontario and the maritime provinces; but I am afraid that I am the only one born in British Columbia. Apparently the old adage, "A prophet is not without honour save in his own country," is applicable to that province. However, I mention myself for the reason only that ever since my childhood—and I am sure that most of the younger men and women who were born in British Columbia have had the same experience—this issue has hung over the province like a black cloud, steadily growing larger, the situation steadily getting worse. It would be impossible for my fellow members from other parts of Canada to realize how seriously we treat this matter, and I ask of you to-night that in considering this bill you approach it in a non-partisan and non-political way, as fellow Canadians concerned to solve a difficult problem in a sensible manner.

The real problem with which the people of British Columbia are faced is this: First of all, how can oriental immigrants and their descendants be assimilated? That is the basis of the problem. Second, if these oriental immigrants and their descendants cannot be assimilated, then what is to be done with them? It is not only the most serious problem facing British Columbia but also, I suggest, one of the gravest questions facing the people of Canada as a whole.

The first step towards a solution is to stop further immigration. That course was taken many years ago by the other nations which were faced with the same difficulty, for instance, by Australia, New Zealand, and the United States of America. Canada herself went part of the way as far back as 1908, when she nogatiated a gentleman's agreement with Japan limiting Japanese immigrants to approximately 400. Again in 1923, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has pointed out so clearly, Canada realized that oriental immigration must be further checked, when she enacted the Chinese Immigration Act. At that time the Chinese population of British Columbia was far greater than the Japanese population, and the Chinese were coming into the country in far larger numbers than the Japanese. The question of Chinese immigration was more serious than that of Japanese immigration. The parliament of Canada, under our present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) faced that problem and passed the Chinese Immigration Act. The result has been that in the thirteen years following the enactment of that legislation only eight Chinese immigrants have been admitted to Canada. The government of British Columbia estimates that the Chinese population of that province is falling; that it has dropped approximately five thousand during the last six years, and is now only about twenty-two thousand.

Canada again recognized the principle that further immigration should be stopped, or at any rate should be further checked, when in 1929 the Canadian government negotiated an alteration in the gentleman's agreement with Japan, cutting down the number of immigrants from 400 to 150. But during the thirteen years in which only eight Chinese came into Canada, there were 3,411 Japanese immigrants coming into the country and the Japanese population was growing steadily. Now the British Columbia government estimate that there are approximately 30,000 Japanese in the province, and it is certain that that province has reached the stage where it can absorb no more. The time has come to stop further Japanese immigration.

To show you the attitude of the people of British Columbia I quote from an editorial appearing in the Vancouver Daily Province of February 2, this year. I believe it gives the opinion of practically every one in British Columbia. This editorial reads in part:

> We have plenty of room for immigrants, but it is immigrants who are assimilable that we want and the Japanese are not assimilable. We have about 30,000 Japanese in British Columbia, now, and these, with their natural increase, are rather more than we can comfortably handle. All immigration from Asia should be stopped.

There are several features of this Japanese immigration which make it very serious. The first is that practically all Japanese immigrants settle in British Columbia; they do not spread out to the other provinces. For instance, in the last fiscal year 103 were admitted under the gentleman's agreement, and of that number 101 settled in British Columbia, only two settling outside; those two went to Alberta. Over ninety per cent of the Japanese in Canada reside in British Columbia, whereas of the Chinesse less than sixty per cent reside in our province, the others being scattered throughout the other provinces, and yet a worse feature is that ninety per cent of the Japanese in Canada are concentrated in the coast area of British Columbia. They are not scattered across the province, but are concentrated along the coast. Just to bring it home to hon. members from other parts of the country I would point out that if the same proportion of the population of Manitoba were Japanese, you would have this picture: there would be 30,000 Japanese settled within a few miles of Winnipeg. That would correspond to the actual settlement about Vancouver. In Ontario, on the same basis, it would mean 150,000 Japanese settled in and around Toronto and central Ontario. In Quebec there would be 120,000 settled, say about Montreal and Quebec and up the St. Lawrence valley. In New Brunswick there would be 17,000 settled around St. John and up the St. John river, and in Nova Scotia there would be 20,000 Japanese settled in and about Halifax. That will give you some idea of the Japanese settlement in British Columbia at the present time.

The second serious feature about this immigration is that there are more women coming in than men, and that has been the situation for many years. For instance, during the last fiscal year there were thirty-nine males and sixty-four females, and on December 31, 1936, the Japanese population of British Columbia consisted of approximately 56·7 per cent males and 43·3 per cent females, the percentage of females having risen from year to year. With the Chinese on the other hand, 90 per cent were males and only 10 per cent females.

The third serious feature is that the birthrate among the Japanese population in British Columbia is far higher than that of any other race. The Japanese birthrate is twenty per thousand; the birthrate of whites in British Columbia is only 13·6 per thousand, and the Chinese birthrate is 6·1 per thousand. This shows that the situation is bound to get worse from year to year.

Mr. NEILL: I think the hon. gentleman will find that the Japanese birthrate is higher than that, 36 or 38.

Mr. GREEN: Well, it is bad enough. The situation is really this: There is growing up in British Columbia a state within a state. The Japanese people do not intermarry with the whites; and mind you, they are just as much opposed to such intermarriage as the whites are. It is not a question of one race being superior and the other inferior; the simple fact is that intermarriage is not wished by either race. Then there is the question of language. The Japanese even have their own schools after the regular day school in order that Japanese children born in British Columbia may learn the Japanese language as well as the English.

Again, employment in the industries of the province is seriously affected. For example, in the fishing industry, one of our great industries, there are over 2,000 licences issued to Japanese, and we estimate that there are over 1,200 Japanese fishing boats plying up and down the coast, in and out of our harbours. In order to get licences the Japanese must be naturalized, and I do not think there is any question that in many cases they have taken out naturalization papers just for the purpose of being able to get fishing licences.

There are thousands of Japanese farming, carrying on principally poultry farming and the growing of small fruits; many of them are scattered up the Fraser valley. At the present time hundreds and thousands of prairie people are coming into British Columbia as a result of the drought and they are forced to compete with these Japanese already settled on the land. We have a chance to help the very best settlers any province could wish to have, and yet we are handicapped at every step because there are so many Japanese engaged in the same line of endeavour.

Many of them have gone into the lumber business, into pulp and paper, and into mining, while in the cities on the coast hundreds of them are in business. I have before me a list of the licences issued by the city of Vancouver in the year 1937, showing that there were 795 licences issued to Japanese and 644 to Chinese. covering nearly every line of business. There are fifteen Japanese apartment house proprietors; nine auto repairers; thirty-nine barbers; eight boot and shoe repairers; eighty candy merchants; one hundred and fifteen cleaners and dyers; forty-four dressmakers; eighteen fish dealers; twenty-one greengrocers; one hundred and ten grocers. And I was told shortly before leaving for Ottawa, that there was even a real danger of the Japanese running the chain stores out of the grocery business in Vancouver, from which hon. members can realize what effect they have on the white merchants who are trying to compete with them. There are also seven tailors; one hundred and twenty-nine lodging houses; eleven manufacturers; thirty-two restaurants; fourteen miscellaneous retail stores; seven jewellers; twenty-three wholesale dealers; ten express and dray enterprises and many other occupations.

The competition of these immigrants with our white people is absolutely unfair. They have a lower standard of living. Their ways of living make it frightfully difficult for us to carry out our social security laws. It is very difficult to make them comply with those laws, which means unfair competition for the white people who do try to comply with them. In farming their competition is most unfair, because farm labour immigrants, who have to be placed with Japanese farmers, work for a few dollars a month or a year; no one knows what they get, probably not much more than their board; but the result is that the Japanese farmer with this cheap labour is forcing off the land the white farmer who has to pay proper wages to his men. The same thing is true in fishing, Japanese helping other Japanese. The Japanese merchants in the cities live in the back of the stores, and not having expenses to meet such as the white merchant has, can drive the latter out of a district. It has always been believed, although I cannot prove it, that the Canadian Japanese Association or the Japanese consulate stands behind these men financially when they wish to buy a farm or a fishing boat or go into business, and that they can get capital from such sources at a rate of interest far lower than can be obtained by a white man.

That gives the house a rough picture of the situation. Always we have been met with the statement that we must do nothing which will upset our relations with Japan, but I believe that the Japanese government appreciates our difficulty just as well as we appreciate it ourselves. The Japanese government has on different occasions shown an understanding of the situation; these gentleman's agreements are evidence of that; and I believe that government will realize that this situation is one with which Canada must deal. I think Japan will respect us all the more for facing the problem. I cast no aspersions on the Japanese people or the Japanese government. That nation deserves the greatest credit for what it has done, for the way it has progressed. Probably no nation in the history of the world has done so well in so short a time. The Japanese race are merely different from our race; perhaps in some things they are not as good, in others are better. But our problem is simply the question of whether or not we can assimilate the race in this nation we are trying to build.

In conclusion, I would emphasize again that the need for this legislation is clear, and that now is the time to act. The problem gets more difficult the longer it is put off. There is no reason why parliament should hesitate about these obvious remedies. After all, the Canadian people are a people of courage, of initiative, of sound judgment, and the Canadian parliament should show courage in tackling such problems as this. We boast of being a nation, and this parliament should realize that nationhood involves being able to decide for ourselves what is to be done in Canada. Let us treat this matter as the serious national problem it is, and thereby as well show the people of British Columbia that it is possible for them to have their problems considered here and dealt with, despite the fact that parliament sits three thousand miles away from that great province.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): The oriental question in British Columbia is one of the most serious questions facing the people of that province to-day. It has come to the front perhaps more during this time of depression than at any other period. I have always held the opinion that Canada maybe was wrong in differentiating as between the oriental races; I believe we should have treated the Japanese the same as we treated the Chinese, and not favoured the people from Japan while excluding the Chinese. The two hon. members who have spoken before me on this question have covered practically every aspect of the situation, but there are one or two matters upon which I should like to dwell in the short time at my disposal. I say that because later on I intend to deal with this question as it affects the fishing industry in our province, particularly on the Fraser river.

I wonder how many hon members are aware that the Chinese who come to this country have contributed well over $21,000,000 to the national exchequer. They are practically the only oriental people coming to this country who have had to pay a head tax. From the records of the immigration department I find that from 1885 to 1923, which was the year that the doors were closed to the Chinese, the sum of $21,223,150 was paid by some 82,370 Chinese entering Canada. So I do not think the Japanese have cause to complain that they are being picked upon at this time if our criticism is levelled more at them than at the Chinese. I may point out that the number of Chinese in Canada is getting less, due to the fact that many of them are dying off, and also that only ten per cent of the Chinese in British Columbia are females as against fifty per cent of the Japanese, who, I believe, have a studied policy in connection with their emigration of seeing that enough females go to the various countries along with the males so that the Japanese stock will be maintained in those countries. I wonder how many hon. members are aware that according to the Japanese year book, issued, I assume, under the authority of the Japanese government, in 1930 over 28,000,000 yen were sent back to Japan by Japanese residents abroad, and that the total number of Japanese abroad in the various countries of the world in 1930 was 634,913. The total for the United States and Canada was given as 120,000. They have gone into practically every country in the world, including Great Britain, where the report shows some 1,500.

I was interested in figures presented by the Japanese delegation which came to Ottawa in 1936, and appeared before the franchise and elections committee. They seemingly came armed with information as to the numbers of their race resident in British Columbia. They told that committee that according to a census taken by themselves there were only some 19,960 resident in that province. Of that number 10,965, they stated, were Canadian born, leaving only some 8,995 who, therefore, must have come into the country. Yet, according to the Japanese year book for 1930, Japan claimed to have over 21,000 resident in British Columbia alone. A careful survey was made in British Columbia by the provincial government and a very conservative estimate of the number in that province would be 30,000.

Mention has been made of the increasing birth rate. It is rather a problem, because the estimated birth rate of the Japanese is between fifty and sixty per thousand as against eighteen per thousand for the white population. If it were worked out in that ratio it would be discovered that even if we closed the gate now—and by the way, I am in favour of that—in twenty-five years there would be 67,000 Japanese in British Columbia.

While I am all in favour of the principle of the bill, I am afraid that we are just a little late in closing the gate. There is another aspect of the matter, in connection with the number who have come in during the years of the depression. While that number is not as alarming as in years gone by, still it is disturbing indeed to find that Japanese with five or ten acres of land in the Fraser valley can make application, and have been doing so, under the dominion immigration laws to bring in the odd Japanese, presumably to work on the ranch. But if one would follow up that man who is brought in, it would be found that he stays perhaps one month or two months working on the land and then is slipped into industry. It is no wonder that our people are very much perturbed over such a situation, when in many industries they find men from Japan who have been here only three or four months but who have found employment while our own people have been walking the streets.

I well remember making the statement in the house in 1931 that there were hundreds if not thousands of citizens of Japan in this country illegally. The then Minister of Immigration—I suppose he had to do it—got up and denied the truth of such a statement. But, Mr. Speaker, I discovered that later on instructions were issued to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to make a careful survey, or as careful as possible, of the situation. Just before I left for Ottawa to attend the present session I was told by the authorities that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had discovered close to six hundred who had entered this country without papers, surreptitiously, and that nine hundred others had suddenly left the country when they realized that they were going to be checked up by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. That is a serious situation. I was not glad to hear the statement; I mention it here because it substantiates what I said on the floor of the house when I was on the other side of it, that there are hundreds and hundreds of Japanese who entered this country surreptitiously, and we have advocated that perhaps a closer check should be made of their numbers, with a view to finding out exactly who should or should not be in this country. I should like to have serious note taken of the entry of those who come presumably to work on the land but who, after being here one, two or three months, find their way into various industries and compete, and very successfully, with our own people.

My purpose in rising at this time, Mr. Speaker, was to join with the two previous speakers and the sponsor of the bill. I am entirely in accord with the principle contained in this legislation and desire to lend it all the support of which I am capable, although I realize that the matter is not one capable of easy solution. We may, at least, take a step in the right direction.

I am not going to make any extended remarks at present because on the order paper in my name there is a resolution asking for a cut in the number of Japanese fishing licences, and when that resolution is under discussion I intend to deal with the matter as it affects the fishing industry in British Columbia and particularly in the Fraser river area. My purpose in rising at this time is at least to show where I stand on the question, and I trust that a solution may be found so that, if at all possible, a stop may be put to the entry of these people, and they may be placed on the same footing as those from other oriental countries.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, no doubt it will be found that the members from British Columbia are unanimously in favour of the principle of the bill which has been introduced by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). I think the previous speakers are to be complimented upon the restraint they have exercised, because much might have been said that would have added to the bitterness and the racial prejudice which are becoming more and more evident in that province.

The chief arguments in support of the bill have been ably stated already. I merely wish to indicate my support of the principle incorporated in this measure, and to touch upon one or two phases of the problem as they appeal to me. I think there is no longer any point in encouraging immigration from Japan, particularly that class of immigrants that enters into direct competition with the workers in our industrial enterprises in British Columbia. Any further immigration can only serve to aggravate a problem of which all the representatives from British Columbia are fully aware and which in some respects casts a shadow over community development, harmony and cooperation in many areas in that province.

One point I wish to stress at this moment is that the situation is bringing about dangerous friction and racial prejudice, producing a tension in community life that is not to be desired. In my opinion this tension is due very largely to the growing distrust of the policy of the Japanese authorities with regard to this problem of immigration. There is a growing conviction—and no doubt on this score the government has definite evidence—that the agreement has been violated in many respects, to the disadvantage of the people of British Columbia. Whether or not that conviction or belief is well founded, the uncertainty exists, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has stated, because of the ambiguous terms of the gentleman's agreement. No one can be at all definite as to the number of people, particularly Japanese labourers, who are being admitted into the province at this time, and therefore I wish to indicate my support of the principle contained in this bill. I think there would be no better time to raise the barriers against immigration from Japan.

I had hoped that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in his remarks would indicate just how he would suggest negotiations might proceed so that the barriers might be raised without precipitating any international complication. No doubt by proclaiming this amending bill at the proper time any such complication might be successfully avoided; but after some study of this problem I am definitely of the opinion that, in the interests of our own population in British Columbia, at this time we should not give the Japanese people any preferential consideration in regard to immigration regulations, and that in order to prevent any aggravation of a serious problem we should take definite steps to raise the bars against further immigration.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the bill before the house, and to congratulate the mover and also the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) upon the very able manner in which they have placed before the house arguments in favour of the measure.

I do not intend to go into details. All I wish to say is that for several years the matter has been brought before the house, and it has always been looked upon by the people of eastern Canada as one confined to British Columbia. But I think, now that trouble in the orient has developed, and in view of the rush on the part of the Minister of Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) to see that defences are built on the Pacific coast, that not only the government but the people in eastern Canada feel that the oriental problem in British Columbia is a Canadian problem.

I am not going into further particulars, but I would ask every hon. member, whether from Ontario, Quebec or the maritime provinces to take the measure into serious consideration. It has been said that we are a little late in closing the gate. I agree with that. It should have been closed at the time we closed the gate against the Chinese. There was just as much reason to close it against the Japanese. Due to that action there has been little or no immigration from China, and yet we are on the very best terms with that country.

I trust that the government may accept the bill and that it may become law, so that we may now close the gates and relieve the problem which we have on the Pacific coast.

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss in my duty if I did not rise in support of the bill so ably presented by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). At the same time I should like to compliment him upon the able manner in which he presented the position of British Columbia and, I believe, the position of Canada, with regard to the problem of oriental immigration.

May I also congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) upon his very able contribution. I, too, with the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) am pleased at the lack of bitterness which has been shown by hon. members who have discussed the measure. Only those people who come from British Columbia can realize just what oriental immigration to that province really means. I was pleased to hear that the hon. member for Vancouver South is a native son of British Columbia. But, even at that, I think I have been watching the oriental problem in that province longer than he has, and probably I appreciate the problem as well as he does, even if he does come from Vancouver, where the great majority of Japanese are.

The oriental question in my constituency has reached the same proportions, in relation to the population, as it has in Vancouver. For instance, the tomato canning industry around Kamloops is almost entirely in the hands of Japanese, Chinese and Hindoos. To some extent the native Indians work when the tomatoes are being picked. Most of that business is in the hands of the Japanese.

Very little could be added to what has already been said. There are one or two observations, however, upon which I might spend a few moments. One of these is the difficulty the law enforcement officers of British Columbia encounter in making the orientals live up to the minimum wage laws. I believe the Japanese are the greatest offenders in this respect. Possibly their business methods are responsible for this fact. It may be that not any more than other people have they a desire to evade the law, but there is an evasion of the law by reason of their business method. For instance, there may be twenty employees in a shingle bolt camp who must operate under the minimum wage laws as laid down by the province. The Japanese evade the law by forming partnerships, and each man working in their shingle bolt camps would be working as a partner of the concern. They are all bosses, and the law would not apply to them. They will work for fourteen or sixteen hours, or as many daylight hours as there may be in a day, for half the wages a white man would receive for eight hour's work. I believe nothing more need be said, except to point out how utterly impossible it is for white labour to compete under those circumstances.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has called attention to the illegal entry of Japanese. This may have been going on along the coast of British Columbia, from the northern end of Vancouver island up to Alaska, to a far greater extent than the Royal Canadian Mounted Police realize. By people who live in the country around there I am reliably informed that there come in many Japanese in what are supposed to be boats that are fishing in those waters. They are landed, and the boat goes back to Japan. I do not live in that part of the country and do not know whether this assumption is based on fact, but I have received reliable information to the effect that it is so.

I think the time has long since passed when we should have closed the door. But let us not wait until the white people have been forced to leave—because, either that must happen, or we must reduce our standard of living to that of the Japanese—I say we should close the door.

For these reasons I most heartily endorse the principle of the measure the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has introduced.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, probably it is not necessary to add much to what has been said in support of the measure. Perhaps it is desirable that we should not go much farther in the matter at this time. We do not know yet what action the government proposes to take with regard to the bill. But it should always be remembered—I think it has always been noted in the house—that hon. members from British Columbia have been a sort of listening post for the rest of Canada on this oriental question.

If hon. members would care to take the trouble to look back through the volumes of Hansard they would find that the burden of the debates which have taken place in years past has to a great extent been borne by members from British Columbia. This is but natural, for it is in that province almost entirely that the question is driven home, time and time again, as to whether the time has come—indeed, if it has not passed—when Canada should say who should enter her ports of entry.

We must remember the delegation of four young Japanese who, two years ago, appeared before the special committee on the elections act, and I well remember the impression those four young people made on members of the committee other than those from British Columbia. I remember also how it was the duty of certain British Columbia members of that committee to draw to its attention certain facts on the opposite side of this question, and I need hardly say that the members from other parts of Canada were very much enlightened when they heard of what had been happening, the situation that had been growing up in British Columbia for the past generation. During the existence in the early days of this century of the Anglo-Japanese agreement, come to by the British government, I think, in the middle nineties, Canada's position was nothing like so clear as it has been since the amendment of that agreement. I do not know whether the Canadian government of that day was consulted by the British government or not, but Canada did find her hands to an extent tied by the existence of that agreement. That agreement was modified; Canada's hands were untied, and in my opinion for several years past it has been open for Canada to say to whom we should open our ports of entry.

Reference has been made to the fact that perhaps at the basis of this whole matter is the question of assimilability, and I think the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) is greatly to be commended for the delicate way in which he handled his reference to assimilability. We do not want on this occasion, or on any occasion, to speak words in the house which could in any way be taken as an affront by another country, one with whom we have been on friendly terms, one from whom we desire to buy and to whom we desire to sell those commodities which are mutually beneficial to both countries. We desire, therefore, to handle this matter as best it may be handled, remembering at the same time that we owe a debt not only to the people who were instrumental in placing us individually in this house but to all the citizens of Canada, and most particularly that we owe a debt to those who are not yet born in this country.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just a very few words in connection with this matter. As has been already pointed out by members from British Columbia, the matter of oriental immigration into that province not only is one of considerable importance to British Columbia but eventually will be of importance to the whole of this dominion. The oriental problem has given me much concern over quite a number of years because it has never been faced honestly and squarely in this dominion. It has been made a political football on every possible occasion. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) says that it is a little too late to close the gate. The gate should never have been opened. Greed for cheap labour brought the oriental to British Columbia, and greed for trade has kept him coming in.

While I am in agreement with the bill brought before the house by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), I must say that the circumstances in which the bill is now brought before us are no better than they were two years ago when I raised the question here, and when my motion was unanimously voted down by both the major parties in the house. It is not often that one is vindicated so soon. On that occasion the hon. member for Comox-Alberni accused me of dishonesty in bringing the matter forward. Let me read his closing words in speaking to my resolution at that time. They will be found at page 387 of Hansard of February 20, 1936:

> We have to take into consideration international and world-wide conditions to which the Prime Minister referred, and for that reason I acquiesced in the reduced immigration which, I say, is a great improvement on the open door policy arising from the gentleman's agreement which existed previously, and under which as many as 1,700 in one year came in. Although I know it would be popular in British Columbia that we upset the present agreement, I am not asking that we do so. I would ask that it be rigidly adhered to and enforced and, for the reasons stated, not enlarged. I earnestly hope the house will turn down the resolution.

Mr. NEILL: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, will the hon. gentleman read the resolution, so that we may know what he was talking about?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes; if the hon. gentleman says he wants the resolution read, I probably shall have time to read it. The resolution asked for the exclusion from Canada of people of all nationalities to whom, because of race or religious beliefs, we cannot extend the full privileges of citizenship.

Mr. NEILL: Read it.

Mr. MacINNIS: If the hon. gentleman will turn it up for me, I shall be glad to read it.

Mr. NEILL: He is afraid to read it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Oh, I am not afraid to read it. I have stated its subject matter quite clearly.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that I was in agreement with the principle involved in the bill; but I realize that at the present time there are great difficulties, and those difficulties will have to be got over in some way. I am afraid, however, we cannot overcome them just by the introduction of a bill at the present time. But I wish to say that any measures adopted by the government to put an end to oriental immigration will have my support and approval.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, what I shall say about this question will be said in a very few words. If we will not grant the fullest rights of citizenship to a people, we should not permit them to root themselves in our land among our people and in our economic living. If these people will not or cannot assimilate with our Canadian people, then by that very fact they cannot be permitted peacefully or otherwise to take from us that which is ours.

We citizens of Canada should be permitted to avow allegiance to only one country, and no individual in Canada should be permitted to be and act as a Canadian who avows allegiance to more than one nation. He must forsake the one and cleave to the other, and be definite in that to which he allies himself. If gentleman's agreements are made—and, Mr. Speaker, there are such human beings as gentlemen—then, being made by gentlemen, those agreements should be kept. If the agreements are broken it appears that they were not made entirely by gentlemen, and if there is anything wrong with any agreement which permits an introduction of Japanese into our country, that agreement should be changed. So I feel that I must definitely support the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), although I question that the government can do more than take the attitude of the house under counsel and advisement.

Japan is a feudal country, amazingly enlightened by the industrial progress created in the British Isles in the nineteenth century, and sealed to every other country in the world. Bushido, the spirit of Japan, is a feudal spirit, and we cannot deal with the Japanese as we deal with our own people. Great men and great women there are among them, with amazing minds and fine intellects; but the measuring rod for us in our Canadian citizenship and all that it implies must definitely be applied to them, and if we cannot determine their acceptability by that measuring rod we must not allow them to use the Japanese rod on our Canadian backs.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the fact that the leader of the government may desire to make some observations on the question of policy, I think it desirable that I should present at this moment such remarks as I desire to make. First of all, I congratulate the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) upon the instructive speech that he made in proposing the second reading of this measure. I think that no member of the chamber can do otherwise than realize that the whole situation has been very thoroughly and carefully canvassed and that all the relevant features of what has taken place have been clearly placed before the house. I think it well also that the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), who has very strong views on the subject, has dealt with the situation with great moderation.

I well recall when I first had the oriental question, so-called, brought to my attention. It is now between thirty-five and forty years since that took place. I was then engaged professionally in business that took me frequently to the coast, and one of the members of a provincial government, who subsequently sat in this house and is now in the senate—the uncle of the hon. member for Vancouver South—directed my attention to what he conceived to be the serious situation which would arise in Canada if the immigration of orientals continued and their numbers increased as rapidly as promised. I am frank in saying that it did seem to me to be ridiculous to think that a few hundred people might thus embarrass the national life of Canada.

A few years later I took the trouble to investigate what was taking place in a particular school area in the city of Vancouver. I also had occasion during the last ten years to make a fairly close study of what was occurring on the Pacific coast, in shipping and other activities of a certain portion of our oriental population, and I realized then that the hon. gentleman who spoke to me so many years ago was absolutely correct in his diagnosis. As regards the information that has been given to the house this afternoon and evening, dealing with the question of numbers, the method by which they came to our country, and their increase, these are all matters which I am sure the house has received with very serious concern, because, as it now appears, they are matters of tremendous importance.

I could add something to that; but in view of the fact that very special conditions prevail at the moment in China and Japan, it is not desirable that anything should be said in this chamber which would give cause for acrimonious references or for either party to the conflict to believe that we were taking a position which was actuated by prejudice. It is quite clear, however, that in British Columbia a very serious situation is arising, and it may manifest itself in strange ways, unless we are exceedingly careful, within the next few months. The men with whom I have come in contact in recent weeks and months lead me to believe that their patience is well-nigh exhausted. I appeal to some of my friends opposite if that is not a fair and correct statement of the situation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not for a moment have it thought that I desire to exaggerate by a hairbreadth so serious a matter, but I think I have not stated it too strongly in the terms which I have used.

That being so, I realize of course the difficulties of the government in dealing with the matter. I realize the difficulties, for instance, that I would have if I were called upon to deal with a situation that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has to deal with at this moment. Why? Because we are endeavouring to maintain, shall I say a measure of neutrality in a great conflict that has aroused the passions and prejudices of many people in many parts of the world. This is certainly not the time nor is it the place to discuss what I conceive to be the well settled national policy of the empire of Japan.

I quite agree with what was said this evening by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, that China must one day "come back." I care not who you are; if you have taken the trouble to read something of the history of Chinese civilization; if you have read the Life of General Gordon as it applied to his experience in China, you cannot but realize that they are a very great people, a people numbering four hundred millions, whose ancestors, a warlike race, swept over the whole of the country south of Manchuria and conquered wherever they went. These people, four hundred millions in number, will come back. At the moment they are, although not mortally stricken, engaged in a desperate conflict with one of the most highly mechanized and powerful nations in the world.

I repeat that it would be out of place to discuss what I conceive to be the national ambition of the Japanese empire. They have made it known to us at many times and in definite terms; they have not been hesitant in expressing their views of what they believed their mission was, and their destiny, and they have indicated clearly on more than one occasion what they believe to be their place in Asia.

This is not the time to discuss the matter, but one may point out that this great dominion of ours marches upon the Pacific ocean. Our coastline on the Pacific is long; it is all in the province of British Columbia. Although I had intended to refer to the matter, I think perhaps I should not make any reference to what my investigations, such as they are, lead me to conclude to be the facts as to the knowledge that these people possess of our coastline, our ports, our harbours and our resources in British Columbia. I shall refrain from making that reference.

Now, as the government has endeavoured to maintain neutrality, my friend the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) has pointed out that our hands were tied in days gone by; for the action of the British government —I believe it was in the days of Lord Lansdowne at the Foreign Office—did not leave us that measure of freedom of action which we now possess and which we have possessed for some years. As we now possess that freedom of action and that ability to deal with the situation in its entirety, that ability which an autonomous people should possess, I think in our effort to maintain neutrality we should be fair to both the Chinese and the Japanese; and as we have placed absolute restrictions upon the Chinese, apart from the limited exceptions which have been referred to to-day, and which really are no exceptions to the general prohibition, I think we should take similar action with respect to the Japanese.

I am wholly in accord with this measure; I do not believe that we should play favourites in this matter. On the other hand, an immediate action of that kind could only be construed in one way, having regard to the unfortunate conditions which prevail in the orient, and therefore I say to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that as a member of this house, with a certain measure of responsibility and knowing something of the great burden of obligation that rests upon a government at a time like this in endeavouring to observe neutrality, I could not vote for a measure which did not restrict the operation of the act until such time as it came into force by proclamation. In any event I believe it would be necessary to provide that the act should not come into force until proclaimed. It well might be that for reasons which are apparent it would be desirable, perhaps, rather than have the act come into force by proclamation, to fix a date a year hence, say, or whatever time might be regarded as reasonable, in order to enable the government to make such adjustments as might be decided upon through representations to the Japanese government and through negotiations carried on through diplomatic channels.

But, that action should be taken, I am bound to say to the right hon. the Prime Minister I have no doubt. I say that with some hesitancy, because, when the matter was first brought to my attention some thirty-five years ago, I was of the view that a great people such as this nation, living in a vast area such as Canada, need have no concern about a few hundred people from the orient. I have stated already that I have had to change my opinion in the light of what has occurred. Indeed, I care not who you are; you cannot visit the Pacific coast of Canada; you cannot go up that coast as I have done in a boat and see the fishing operations, coming in contact and talking with those who have settled in our country and have attended our schools, without arriving at a definite conclusion. I suggest to the government, with a full realization of their difficulties and responsibilities, that we should not hesitate to declare ourselves as determined to maintain the same measure of treatment, now that we are free to do so, to those who come to our land from Japan as to those who come from China. This will make for peace; it will make for a better understanding, and in the end it will make for the development of our Canadian civilization. I am satisfied that that is so.

I think it would be unwise, Mr. Speaker, for one to say what crowds in upon one's mind with respect to this matter. I am not unmindful of exactly what is involved, and I shall content myself therefore with saying that with the principle of this measure I am wholly in accord. It is necessary if we are to maintain our neutrality between the great ancient empire of China, now in so sad a situation, and the young and vigorous empire of Japan—young in its present manifestations. If we are to maintain that measure of neutrality which the government is anxious to preserve, and if we are to assist in bringing about lasting peace by the action we take, I cannot but think that we must treat both the Chinese and the Japanese on exactly the same terms. If I remember my history, the more ancient civilization is that of China. It has behind it a record of achievement in arms, in arts, and in culture that leaves most of our western civilization somewhat envious. I believe that we must do what I have suggested if we are to maintain an even balance, a neutrality between those two countries.

On the other hand, not for a moment would I pass the bill in its present form. Without placing a time limit as to when it should come into force, or providing that it should become effective by proclamation, I think we would be courting a very serious situation indeed, and one which we could not contemplate at this particular moment, having regard to our earnest desire to keep our own country out of the conflict in Asia. I entreat the government to realize how serious the situation is, and I think I can say to the Prime Minister that his Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) has a clear appreciation of it. Having come into this country from the old land, without any inherited prejudices or any feeling of animosity in the matter, he has seen conditions as they have developed under his very eyes; his conclusions, I have no doubt, have been communicated to the Prime Minister in council and otherwise, and I believe that if his views are as unchangeable in this regard as they are upon the monetary problem, he will still feel, as he has expressed himself in times past, wholly in accord with the views which have been put forward this evening.

I repeat, however, that I would not for a moment suggest to the Prime Minister that the government should permit the bill to be enacted and go into force just as it stands, as a peremptory prohibition, without some provision which would enable the government for a year at least, through diplomatic channels and otherwise, to convey to the people of Japan the will of the parliament of Canada, that the gentleman's agreement, so-called, could no longer be made effective. If I were to say what was in my mind with respect to the gentleman's agreement, I think I would but read the report of the League of Nations and the Lytton report as indicating just why I would no longer call it a gentleman's agreement. I do not think I am going too far when I make that observation, though I shall not go further lest it be said that one has stirred up acrimonious feelings in a matter of this kind. I believe, however, now that we are free, as compared with our position in days gone by, to deal with this matter, that we should not hesitate to do so, because it is obvious that to permit a foreign power to determine who should come into this country under the terms of an alleged gentleman's agreement is a violation of all the rules which govern the national life of a country that pretends to be a nation, and is at variance with what I conceive to be the Japanese notion of a self-respecting and independent thinking people, namely the Canadian people. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have indicated the trend of my own thought and the conclusion my own observation has led me to with respect to this matter. I have endeavoured to make it clear to my fellow members that I conceive it to be a matter no longer concerning British Columbia only, but one which touches the life and hope and ambition and ideals of the whole Canadian people, and that the longer action upon it is delayed the more difficult its ultimate solution is going to become.

One of the reasons why one hesitates to press for an immediate solution is to be found in the fact that events taking place in Asia would render it open possibly—possibly I say—to a wrong construction, and might place us in an invidious position in the eyes of the peoples of the world in our alleged endeavour to maintain neutrality. Therefore, while I should like to commend the hon. member who introduced the measure to the house, and hope that the government are prepared to accept the principle of it, I am one of those who, accepting that measure and believing strongly in it, would not for a moment urge its passing in its present form, as I believe it would be a very dangerous thing for us to do at this time. But I believe that we should pass it and add to it a section by which it would be provided that the measure should become effective only—I should think we might well say—on the first day of July, 1939. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni may think I am taking a great liberty with him when I make that suggestion, but I think the reasons for it will occur to him at once. I trust that in order that the whole Canadian people may be a unit in dealing with this question we may place ourselves on record in the manner indicated, and not embarrass the government in their endeavours to maintain neutrality by providing a lengthy period of time within which our friends—our friends I say—the people of Japan, may understand that the end of our patience has been reached and that we no longer desire to maintain an agreement which is predicated upon false principles and in its application has been found to be an incentive—I shall not use the strong word I should like to use—to entry into this country of large numbers of their citizens.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like, Mr. Speaker, my first word on this measure to be one of thanks to the hon. members of the house who have participated in the debate for the moderation of tone which they have shown throughout in discussing a question which they recognize is of much wider concern than to our own country alone. I should like particularly to thank the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) for having helped to interpret to the house the position of the government in dealing with this situation at this time. I say frankly that I know of no single measure which has appeared on the order paper thus far, or of anything that is likely to come up for discussion in this parliament, that has caused my colleagues and myself personally the same great concern as has the appearance at this particular time of the measure introduced by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). He himself has made quite clear in the debate this afternoon that the measure which he has presented is one of Japanese exclusion. I wish to emphasize that fact. The bill which we have before us at the present time, innocent as it may appear in its phraseology, and limited in its scope as the hon. member who introduced it has said it is, is nevertheless, according to his own statement, one of Japanese exclusion. That raises a question which is serious indeed. I would ask the house to consider whether in the light of the situation as we know it to-day, not only in the orient but throughout the world, it is advisable for this parliament at this time to enact an exclusion act against the Japanese.

The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) in the course of his remarks said that he thought we should speak no words that can be taken as an affront to another country. With that sentiment I think we are all most heartily in accord. I think the house and the country are to be congratulated upon the fact that in the debate which has taken place to-day, in which hon. members have had perfect freedom to express their views, there has not been, unless one might wish to be censorious, a word spoken that could be taken as an affront by any nation. That is a very great relief to my own mind, knowing the responsibility which rests upon a government as to what may be said or done with respect to the different measures that come before the house. I remember in the debate on the address expressing the hope that hon. members would realize how very grave the international situation is to-day, and that things would not be said in this house which, however well they might be understood here, might be capable of being wrongly interpreted elsewhere, and that above everything we should be most careful at this time to avoid adding any fuel to the flames of international strife which are already far too widespread throughout the world. It is in questions of this kind that racial hatreds and prejudice have their roots. They serve so often to start a train of discussion that arouses or fosters international bitterness and hatred which lead in directions and to consequences of which those who may be responsible for them at the beginning have no conception whatever. So, to-day, in considering the position the government should take on this measure, up until almost the last moment I asked myself whether it would not perhaps be in the interests of Canada—and when I speak of the interests of Canada in this matter let me say I am thinking of the interests of the entire British Empire and of the democracies of the world at the present time—whether it would not be perhaps in the interest of us all that I should immediately follow the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and point out frankly to the house how a measure that meant Japanese exclusion if proceeded with at this time might be viewed on the morrow in Japan and by countries associated with Japan, and ask the house to allow me to move the adjournment of the debate. But the more I considered it the more I felt certain that hon. members would have a full consciousness of the seriousness of the international situation and could be expected to do just what they have done, namely, speak their minds quite frankly with respect to the problem, treating it as a national problem, which it is, but being careful in the expression of their views not to say anything which might be capable of being misunderstood elsewhere.

I agree entirely that this is not a problem of British Columbia alone. Those of us who come from the other provinces of Canada must have an intense sympathy with the citizens of British Columbia who have had to carry pretty much the whole burden of one of the greatest national problems with which our country is faced. It is a grave and acute problem, and is presented in its gravest and most acute form in British Columbia. I would say to our friends from British Columbia that I am sure hon. members from all parts of Canada realize that they have a very grave situation to meet there, and that we all are most anxious to join with them in every possible way in furthering its solution. But we believe that they, as well as those of us from other provinces, will recognize that we have to be more than circumspect at this time as to the manner in which we seek to arrive at a solution.

My right hon. friend has spoken about his first interest in the question of oriental immigration, and referred to it as having been some forty years ago. I have on my desk at the moment a report on immigration to Canada from the orient and immigration from India in particular which, as Deputy Minister of Labour, I prepared for the government of Canada in 1908. My interest in the oriental immigration question arose naturally and inevitably in connection with the position which I held as Deputy Minister of Labour from 1900 until 1908, and also during the years immediately following when I was Minister of Labour. In the course of those inquiries I had the exceptional opportunity while visiting Great Britain of conferring with many of those who had most to do with oriental problems, and particularly problems of emigration as they affected India. Later I was sent on a mission to confer with the government of India on the question of emigration from India to Canada. Subsequently I went to both China and Japan to discuss with the governments of those countries matters affecting emigration from those lands to Canada. From that time to the present I have followed this question as carefully and as closely, I think, as any question that has interested me in public life. I have realized, as everyone must who looks at world trends and movements to-day, that despite what any government may do, each year makes more inevitable the drawing nigh of the day when we shall see how the great question of differences between the peoples of the orient and those of the occident are to be finally settled, whether it is going to be possible to settle these differences by peaceful means, or whether we are to have in the end more in the way of international conflict as the only means of settlement.

I personally believe that everything which can be done that may avoid conflict, should be done. I think in the attempted solution of these great international problems, we should do everything we can to avoid the possibility of conflict, and it is from that point of view that the government takes its position with regard to this particular measure.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni, as I have said, stated that the bill he had introduced was one providing for Japanese exclusion. He put it on the ground that we had excluded the Chinese and that therefore we ought also to exclude the Japanese. May I say that I agree with the view expressed by the right hon. leader of the opposition, which I think is the view of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and, I might say, of all hon. members here, that so far as China and Japan are concerned, the citizens of those countries deserve like treatment in matters of this kind. I do not think there is any reason why the one people should be favoured more than the other. Indeed I would go further and say this, that all that bears upon the question of immigration from Japan or China also bears upon the question of immigration from India to Canada, with this in addition, that the problem as respects immigration from India is complicated still further by the fact that the natives of India are British subjects. So, in considering this question, we must view it in the light of its bearings upon all the oriental peoples.

My belief is that the question of oriental immigration is best settled by agreement, if it can possibly be settled in that way, rather than by exclusion acts, which are offensive in the eyes of oriental peoples. There is no single measure, I think, more likely to arouse the indignation of a people than that an act, which is avowedly an exclusion act, should be enacted against them by another country. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni says, "Well, the Chinese do not take any exception to this. They seem to be quite satisfied." May I say to my hon. friend that he is entirely wrong in that assumption. The Chinese government and the Chinese people have resented very much the fact that they are totally excluded from Canada, and they have made representations to the government time and again to that effect. I remember that the former Chinese consul general in this city—notwithstanding a consul general has not the rank of a minister and therefore has not the same immediate approach to a government to speak in the name of his nation—when we were previously in office, repeatedly came and spoke about the wrong that China felt was being done her because of the act that had been passed by this parliament. When I was at the League of Nations in 1936, Mr. Wellington Koo, who has been the chief exponent of China in the trying times with which that country is faced at the moment, spoke to me very strongly about the harm that he thought our legislation was doing Canada in the eyes of the Chinese. He pointed out that he thought China might be one of the best markets for Canadian wheat; he thought China might be a good market for much of our other produce; that China had many reasons to have kindly feelings towards the dominion, but that to his certain knowledge the act we had passed had been to the prejudice of our trade with that country.

Mr. NEILL: Was not the fundamental reason for their objection the discrimination that we exercise in allowing Japanese into the country and not allowing Chinese to come in?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, that was not it. I am glad my hon. friend has asked the question, for while that was mentioned, it was not the principal reason.

The question arises immediately as to whether the way to remedy a situation, if you have done an injustice in one direction, is to seek to perpetuate that injustice still further by similar action in another direction. I am not saying that we have done an injustice; I am simply stating the view which the Chinese government take of the situation, in having their nationals excluded from this country. I am not at all sure that an agreement might not be reached with both China and Japan on a reciprocal basis which would lead practically to no emigration at all from those countries to Canada or from ours to China or Japan. I do not think there are many people in Canada who in the years to come will wish to go as labourers or domestics either to China or Japan. I am sure, however, there will be many who will wish to go as merchants, and others who would wish to go for purposes of trade. I believe the people of the orient are just as wise as we are in realizing that there is a great economic question here which is bound to occasion perpetual misunderstanding between countries unless it is adjusted in some reasonable way, and I feel that if approached in the right manner they will be prepared to meet other countries in a spirit which will help to save the situation.

The problem is not one of inferior or superior races. It is not a racial problem at all. The problem is one of different civilizations, of different economic structures in the different countries. As long as there are those differences there is bound to be unrest as a consequence of immigration which leads to unfair and undue competition on the part of those who have lower standards of living and who may not assume the same measure of responsibility with regard to their citizenship as do the citizens of the country to which they come. I think it is from that broad point of view, that this question must be faced.

I do not agree with the statement that what is known as a gentleman's agreement cannot be kept. I shall give to the house figures which prove that in the last few years the gentleman's agreement between Canada and Japan has been kept. I venture to say that under no exclusion act would it be possible more effectively to restrict those coming into the country than has been the case under this arrangement, as administered in the last few years, ever since, in fact, the opening of our legation in Japan.

Regardless of what legislation or agreement exists, undoubtedly there will always be efforts to smuggle men into other countries. That effort would go on under an exclusion act just as much as it would under a gentleman's agreement fixing numbers at a very few.

Mr. BENNETT: There is more difficulty about identification.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, no difficulty about identification, either, due to the way in which the existing agreement is being carried out. I shall have a word to say about that in a minute.

I am now pointing out that an agreement, supported by effective regulations, is just as capable of efficient enforcement as is any exclusion act. The experience of the last few years has taught us that conclusively.

I should like to say a further word about the Chinese attitude toward the present legislation. May I tell the hon. member for Comox-Alberni what has occurred since the beginning of this very year. When the new Chinese Consul-General, Doctor Chang-Lok Chen, who has just come to Canada, arrived in Ottawa, he came to call on me at my office, shortly after his arrival. Like many of his fellow citizens, Doctor Chang-Lok Chen is an exceptionally well informed and cultured gentleman. He is a graduate of the University of Chicago and of Yale University and holds the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. He acted as Consul-General in Calcutta, was a Consul-General in the United States, and is now in our capital as a Consul-General of China in this country.

On his first call Doctor Chang-Lok Chen spoke about our legislation against China. He made no mention whatsoever as to its being discriminatory against China in comparison with Japan. Rather he spoke of the friendly relations which he would like to see further developed between China and Canada. What he actually said was that his government hoped that when the unfortunate conflict in the east was ended we might find it possible to do for China what we had already done for Japan, namely send a minister to China who would be in a position to meet the Chinese government in the discussion of matters of mutual interest to the two countries, and who could be of assistance in helping to further what he believed would be a very substantial trade between the two countries. He was explicit, however, in saying that this subject could not even be tentatively discussed at the present time, because he realized that so long as there was a conflict in the orient, such as is proceeding to-day, he could not ask the government to consider the advisability of taking the step he had indicated. He thought that would not be possible until the conflict was completely over.

I said the present agreement with Japan was one which had been effective in restricting immigration from Japan to Canada. Before I conclude I shall read to the house the statement I made on June 28, 1928, with respect to the agreement reached at that time. I am not going into the history of what occurred during the past forty, thirty, twenty-five or twenty years to account for the thousands of Chinese and Japanese who came into the country during that period. All hon. members know the reason for the numbers. We recall that there were those who were seeking to develop the province of British Columbia and who believed the best way to do it was to bring labour from the orient, just as in the early days when the United States was being developed labourers were brought from Africa and from other countries to help develop the new territories and resources of that country.

To-day we are reaping the fruits of greed and avarice—if one wishes to use those terms to describe the desire of men to enrich themselves as rapidly as possible. That is only a consequence of the great law which rules the conduct of nations as well as that of individuals. The children pay for the sins of their fathers, and the extent to which we in Canada to-day are suffering from an excess in the numbers of orientals in our country is due to the fact that there was a period, not so long ago, when the country was prepared to believe that it was desirable to permit large numbers of a class of coolie labour to come into Canada to build our railways, work our mines and help develop other of our resources.

Since that period has passed, each government, as it has been in office, has sought to meet the situation as effectively as it could, in the light of the then existing conditions. There are many factors we are apt to lose sight of as the years go by. For example, in connection with this very matter of Japanese immigration, we do not think about what the Anglo-Japanese alliance meant some years ago, more particularly to other parts of the British Empire than to our own, nor what was then felt by the government of the day in Canada in recognition of a responsibility with respect to any step taken by Canada which might have ill effects in other parts of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

I wish to point out particularly that any action taken by Canada which would occasion resentment by any country in the orient would be resented, not merely as a step on Canada's part, but with the relationship of all its parts what they are, as something to be resented against the whole British commonwealth. In the light of the present world situation we cannot, whatever we do here, afford to lose sight of our obligation to other parts of the British Empire.

In seeking to deal with this matter of Japanese immigration it has been felt by all governments in Canada hitherto that a settlement by agreement, if it could be effected, was preferable to a step which was certain to be strongly resented. In his observations the hon. member for Yale made a further reference which I believe is worth keeping in mind. He referred to the obligation felt by hon. members from British Columbia toward those who returned them to this chamber. He referred as well to the obligation which all of us owe to those who will follow after us. I should like to emphasize that. In the working out of great international problems, nations do not forget the actions taken by one generation when, in a subsequent generation, a time comes to remember those actions.

I believe that acts of good-will and good intent are remembered equally with those which have occasioned resentment. If we can preserve good-will with other countries, and at the same time effect a satisfactory solution of our problems, we are not only serving our own generation, but serving future generations, and doing so in a much better way than we would by any other course.

My statement in 1928 was the following—

Mr. NEILL: What date?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is to be found in the debates of this house for June 8, 1928, page 3980:

> I am pleased to be able to inform the house that following conferences with the Japanese government, in which the Canadian government made clear the difficulties created in western Canada by the economic competition of Japanese immigrants, the Japanese Minister for Foreign Affairs has informed us through the Consul-General of Japan at Ottawa, that the government of Japan does not contemplate that the total number of emigrants to Canada, including agricultural labourers and domestic servants, and wives and children of Japanese emigrants resident in Canada, will exceed a total of 150 annually. We have further been informed that steps will be taken to terminate the practice of sending for so-called "picture brides." The administrative measures directed to this end will go into force on September 1.
>
> The Canadian government has indicated to the government of Japan that hereafter in the case of immigration from Japan, as from other countries, the Immigration Act and procedure, including the provisions for viseing of passports and pre-investigation of applications will be administered by Canadian officials.

That was the position in 1928. The question that is most important at the moment is:

Has the agreement been lived up to? I can say to the house that it has been more than lived up to; that instead of the government having had difficulty in restricting the numbers to 150, the numbers have not by actual check and count reached 150 per annum since the agreement was made. Since we have had our legation in Japan, each passport has been visaëd by our own officers and inspected by our own immigration officials as these nationals of Japan have arrived in Canada. Let me give the figures. The administrative arrangements under the agreement did not come fully into practice until April 1, 1930, though the substance of the agreement became effective from September 1, 1928. The total Japanese immigration under the agreement has been as follows:

Japanese Immigration Under Agreement

Fiscal Year	Total
1929-30	135
1930-31	128
1931-32	135
1932-33	94
1933-34	99
1934-35	74
1935-36	68
1936-37	80

It will thus be seen that the number of Japanese immigrants entering Canada has been well within the maximum provided in the agreement. For the eight years from 1929 to 1937 the average is practically 100 a year, and for the past five years the average number has fallen to 81 a year.

Now I ask hon. members of the house, What is to be gained by passing an exclusion act at this time when, under an agreement made with Japan, the government of this country is bound to admit, and is glad to admit, that during the past five years the total number of Japanese who have come in under that agreement has not averaged over 81 per annum?

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the Prime Minister a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly.

Mr. GREEN: How does the Prime Minister account for the discrepancy between the figures he has given and the figures shown in the report of the Department of Mines and Resources, at pages 242 and 243? The figures there are quite different and show that in three or four years the gentleman's agreement was not kept.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad the hon. gentleman has asked the question, because he is not distinguishing between Japanese nationals admissible under the agreement, and Japanese who are admissible as British subjects. The figures he is looking at, if I am not mistaken, include not only those who have come in under the agreement but in addition some who have come in as of right, a right which they would have under an exclusion act, namely, as British subjects. They include Japanese British subjects who have been abroad and have come back to Canada, or have gone abroad and married and have brought their wives back to Canada, or have had a family and brought its members back to Canada. That is a right which every Canadian citizen has. When a man is a Canadian citizen he has the right, even if he does not take advantage of it, to have a wife and family and to bring them in from any country. It is in the exercise of that right that some of these Japanese have come back, thereby increasing the total. I was just going to give those additional figures to the house.

Mr. GREEN: I think it was stated in the terms of the agreement which the right hon. the Prime Minister quoted a few minutes ago that the 150 would include the wives of Japanese who went from Canada as naturalized subjects, married abroad and brought their wives back.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I did not make any reference to them. What I said was this:

> The government of Japan does not contemplate that the total number of emigrants to Canada, including agricultural labourers and domestic servants, and wives and children of Japanese emigrants, resident in Canada, will exceed a total of 150 annually.

Mr. GREEN: Surely that third classification covers just these cases—Canadian Japanese who went back to Japan.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. If a Japanese comes to this country who is not already a citizen, and brings his wife with him, she in addition to himself is counted as one of the quota of 150. If he comes back with a wife and five children, six additional of the quota have been taken up: the wife and children, with himself, making seven in all. Counted in that way the total quota has not been reached, and the figures I have given are the correct ones.

Mr. GREEN: Actually the immigrants who have come in for several years have exceeded the number of 150, have they not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am coming to just what the number was. Let me make it perfectly clear that the agreement relates to Japanese nationals coming to Canada, whether they be men, women or children, and the quota cannot exceed 150, and it has not exceeded 100 on the average in the years the agreement has been in force. The average for the last five years has been about eighty-one.

Of the other group, those who are British subjects, who have been back in Japan for a time and have returned to Canada and brought with them wives and children, there have been a certain number, but the addition is not anything like the hon. member for Comox-Alberni would have the house believe. I shall give the house the exact particulars.

There are a limited number of Canadian nationals of the Japanese race entering Canada each year. These are, of course, completely outside the agreement. For the most part they are wives or children of Canadian nationals who returned to Japan and married, and later have come back to Canada. The number in the past eight years averages twenty-five women and fewer than ten children a year. In the past five years only fourteen women and three children a year have come in.

The complete total of immigration from Japan is to be found in the figures I have given, and I say, Mr. Speaker, that if there are any others outside that number who have come in, they have come in surreptitiously and illegally, and they could and, in all probability, would come in in exactly the same way, though perhaps in larger numbers, if there was an exclusion act.

In the light of these figures, which cannot be challenged, for they are authentic, as recorded by our own government officials who have been watching the whole business very closely, I ask hon. members, Is it desirable at this time to go further and pass an act which will totally exclude the Japanese? What would be the effect of passing such an act? We have one instance of record which might help us to discover what would be the result. The United States Government in 1924 passed an act. They did not call it an exclusion act, but it came to that, and the minute that act was passed an international situation developed which was a very, very serious one indeed, one the like of which I think none of us would care to see precipitated at this particular time. Let me give the house the particulars because they illustrate exactly what would inevitably follow from the course which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has suggested, were it adopted as his bill proposes.

The United States law of 1924 took the form of an amendment excluding "aliens ineligible to citizenship." Under existing statutes, citizenship of the United States was confined to persons born in the United States, regardless of race, and to naturalized persons, naturalization being limited to "free white persons and to aliens of African nativity and to persons of African descent." While aimed at the Japanese, it applied to all Asiatics. According to the Japan Chronicle, an English paper published in Kobe:

> No diplomatic event for many years aroused so much comment and excitement as the passage of the exclusion law in the United States.
>
> Resolutions of both houses of the Japanese diet, public demonstrations, newspaper articles, missionary societies, all protested vigorously.

If that was the case in 1924 upon the enactment of an act by a great country like the United States, I wonder what would be the effect in Japan to-morrow if it were announced that one of the British dominions—and it would not be distinguished at all from the British Empire as a whole—had taken this particular measure.

May I pause here to say that one of the most regrettable features of the international situation to-day is that there are busily at work in Japan at the present time numbers of persons who are doing all they possibly can to foment differences between Japan and Great Britain. That is generally known. The British government in its reports has referred over and over again to that fact. It has endeavoured to have the public distinguish between what is the true feeling and the feeling that is being stirred up for ends that are anything but justifiable or worthy. That is the situation to-day. We must remember also that in every country to-day which is engaged in conflict there is a peace party as well as a war party. It so happens that in some countries the war party has gained control. That is the situation in Japan; and the party in control has taken measures with which, unquestionably, a large number of the people have no sympathy. There are those in Japan who are struggling to maintain the friendship which has existed over so many years between the British and the Japanese, and I say that we, as one of the dominions of the British commonwealth, ought to do, and I believe will do, all that we can to preserve that friendship to the greatest degree possible, and certainly we ought to do nothing to increase the emnity that is being fostered.

I have in my hand a copy of a treatise on Oriental Exclusion, by Mr. R. D. McKenzie Ph. D., professor of sociology in the University of Washington. Let me read a paragraph or two of what is said in that publication about the effect upon the Japanese, and the Chinese of the United States act of 1924. At page 42 the writer says:

> To the Chinese the act of 1924 was but another form of persecution and "gratuitous affront" added to a condition that was already severe enough.

At page 45:

To the Japanese, the passing of the law came as a bolt from the blue, at once a suggestion of lack of national good faith in carrying out the gentlemen's agreement, and a reflection on national pride and racial dignity. The Japanese opposed the act during the period of its inception and still oppose it on political rather than on practical grounds.

Then he quotes what is an extremely interesting and valuable dispatch, one which bears directly on the measure that is before us at the present time. It serves to illustrate what we might expect if the bill of the hon. member from Comox-Alberni were to be enacted. It is a communication from Ambassador Hanihara to Secretary Hughes of the United States dated April 10, 1924. This is what the Japanese ambassador had to say to the government of the United States:

To Japan the question is not one of expediency but of principle. To her the mere fact that a few hundreds or thousands of her nationals will or will not be admitted to the dominions of other countries is immaterial, so long as no question of national susceptibilities is involved. The important question is whether Japan as a nation is or is not entitled to the proper respect and consideration of other nations. In other words, the Japanese government asks of the United States government simply that proper consideration ordinarily given by one nation to the self-respect of another, which after all forms the basis of amicable international intercourse throughout the civilized world.

In concluding his volume, this writer, at page 180, makes the following observation after a careful study of the whole situation:

Exclusion differs from restriction principally in the mental attitudes involved. The practical results of the two methods are about the same. Each limits the number of arrivals. Each presents about the same kind of individual and administrative problems. Exclusion, however, differs radically from restriction from the standpoint of group attitudes. Exclusion discriminates in a manner that is offensive to the racial and national dignity of the group excluded. This is especially true when exclusion is based on the principle of ineligibility to citizenship. For then it conveys the obnoxious implication that the people excluded are biologically inferior.

Both China and Japan, according to the repeated utterances of their representative leaders, accept the principle of immigration restriction. They realize that it is in the interests of all concerned to prevent a too rapid intermingling of the races. They do object, however, to being discriminated against on the basis of race when such discrimination is unnecessary to achieve the end desired. There seems to be no fundamental difference of opinion regarding the objective. The conflict arises in connection with the method employed. It has been pointed out on numerous occasions that the quota principle, as at present applied to Europeans, if applied to Asiatics, would admit such a negligible number that the practical end of exclusion would be achieved and without the sacrifice of international good-will.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that these are words of wisdom, which should be carefully pondered at this time with respect to the course that is proposed in this bill.

My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition has said that he agrees that the bill should not become operative immediately but that a date should be fixed some time hence when it would come into force. May I ask the right hon. gentleman if he really believes that this would at all relieve the situation which would be certain to develop once parliament passed a measure of this kind. I come back to what the hon. member for Yale said, that he hoped no words would be uttered in this house which would cause any affront to any nation. Well, if that is the hope of all of us here, must we not be doubly careful to see, not only that no words cause an affront but, what is much more important, that no act of the parliament of Canada causes an affront? That is the really serious thing. That is a consequence we have to consider with regard to this measure.

Other countries will understand that in our parliament as in all parliaments hon. members express themselves in different ways, some may say things which they themselves later on may come greatly to regret; and most countries fortunately are prepared to make allowances for that kind of thing. But when it comes to a parliament enacting a measure, there one nation speaks to another. I therefore submit that at this time, with the affairs of the world what they are, this parliament of Canada should not contemplate for one minute placing an exclusion act upon its statutes, especially an act directed against Japan, where we have before us the evidence that, so far as Japan is concerned, she has been perfectly loyal to the agreement that now exists and has more than carried out its terms.

I know that at a time like the present, with feelings aroused as they have been by the conflict in the orient, passions are more easily stirred, people discuss these questions much more freely; they go much further in their language and assertions; reports become exaggerated, and little by little a new situation is created. And I am afraid it is only too true that in British Columbia at the present time there is an extremely serious situation arising from that very fact, and from the further fact that the depression has emphasized the extent of the competition of the oriental with our own people. I would ask this question however: Shall we be making the situation any better so far as British Columbia is concerned if we take the course that is proposed here to-night? Would not the effect rather be, so far as British Columbia is concerned, that instead of being faced with one problem, which is very difficult, that province would be faced with a second problem which would be equally menacing if not more dangerous? We are finding it necessary now to take what steps we possibly can to ensure the security of the people of British Columbia. We must, therefore, be doubly careful to see that our actions give no cause for offence.

During the past few years and particularly of late the government has been investigating very carefully and fully the matter of surreptitious immigration into the country. As I have said, whether you have an exclusion act or you limit by agreement, there are bound to be efforts at entry on the part of those who wish to get into the country and who are not free to do so under existing arrangements. Those efforts may succeed in part; for although a country does its best in its administration of its laws, it is not possible entirely to frustrate such efforts. But the different departments of this government have been exercising a careful scrutiny of the whole situation, and in the light of recent developments, doing so to an extent that has not been attempted in the past. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) mentioned this evening that he himself had learned that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had discovered many cases of illegal entry and that some nine hundred persons had been sent out of the country in consequence. The officials of the immigration department, the fisheries department, the external affairs department, the mounted police, the intelligence branch of the defence department, have all been working together, at Ottawa, with respect to regulations, and in British Columbia in actually seeking to enforce the laws and regulations and to prevent aliens from coming into the country surreptitiously and to send out those who have come in illegally. They have been doing so of late to a degree that has never been attempted heretofore. We intend to intensify that investigation into illegal entries into Canada, and I wish to assure the house that everything that the government can possibly do to prevent anything in the nature of illegal entries will be done.

With that assurance, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I have said enough to cause the house to feel that I would be justified in moving the adjournment of this debate. I think it would be unfortunate were hon. members compelled, with the international situation what it is to go on record at this particular time with regard to this bill. A division would certainly serve only to place in a very false position many of those who are desirous of doing only what is best from a national and international point of view and who realize that the time has come when we must look at all controversial questions in the light of the present world situation. Their position would certainly be misunderstood. There are, I know, many who for local reasons would wish to support the measure, who for international reasons might well feel they could not. I hope they may be spared that necessity.

I would therefore move that this debate be now adjourned, and in doing so I hope the house will fully appreciate the motives which actuate the government in taking that step.

Mr. NEILL: The motion is not debatable, Mr. Speaker?

The ACTING DEPUTY SPEAKER: The motion is not debatable. Mr. Mackenzie King moves, seconded by Mr. Dunning, that the debate be now adjourned. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. NEILL: No.

The ACTING DEPUTY SPEAKER: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

COPYRIGHT AMENDMENT ACT, 1931

FURNISHING OF LIST OF DRAMATICO-MUSICAL OR MUSICAL WORKS OWNED OR CONTROLLED— PUBLIC RADIO RECEPTION OR GRAMOPHONE REPRODUCTION

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 12, to amend the Copyright Amendment Act, 1931.

He said: I desire to preface my remarks on this bill with the assurance to hon. members that it does not in any way prejudice the rights and privileges of authors or composers. It does not refer to literary copyrights; it refers only to dramatico-musical or musical works. Specifically the bill refers to the Canadian Performing Right Society, a corporation engaged in the business of acquiring copyrights and collecting fees in compensation for the use of music. This society claims to hold, by assignment, from the American society and from English and European societies the copyright to between two and three million titles, but in reality it does not know just what it does own. It claims to own practically everything on the air, and with that assumption there has been no interference. The society has actually registered between 150,000 and 200,000 titles and the purpose of the amendment to the Copyright Act is to require the society to furnish to those from whom it exacts payment a certified list of the music which it actually does control.

Invariably when an amendment to the Copyright Act is suggested we are reminded Canada is a signatory to the Berne international copyright convention and that as such we have certain obligations. May I again assure hon. members that this bill does not in any way violate any such obligation. Successive international conventions have made it clear that the means of redress and the extent of protection of authors and composers are governed exclusively by the laws of the country in which protection is sought. Canada has an excellent Copyright Act. It affords to composers and authors as much protection as is afforded by the copyright act of any country in the world.

The purpose of this amendment is to protect the public. This bill is not offered in a spirit of partisanship, because the Copyright Act has been administered by governments of both parties. The great difficulty is in the wording of one section, which gives this society authority to collect fees for all the music which it claims to own. Now that is a pretty large order, because a man can claim almost anything. Not many hon. members pay out money to someone merely because he claims a right to collect it; they want to know more about it. It is this authority claimed by this society which has permitted it to run wild. It has run so wild, has carried on its business by such aggressive and dictatorial and oppressive measures that it has harassed the small users of music. Surely it cannot be said that the proposal merely to require this society to furnish people with a list of the music it controls is a very great burden. If a person in British Columbia, say Prince Rupert, desires to know from this society whether it has the copyright on a certain piece of music the society simply tells him to go to Ottawa and ascertain for himself. That is not a very courteous answer. Those people far away cannot, without considerable difficulty, send to Ottawa or have people in Ottawa look up for them a copyright registration. I have printed matter showing that if you write to the society asking whether they control this, that or the other piece of music the society maintains the right to charge for the information.

As to the exact ownership of these two or three million titles which the society claims, let us see whence it comes. In the first place there was an assignment from the American society. The American society is not in very good odour in the United States. If hon. members were to look at the magazine Time, the issue of December, 1935, they would find that four very large companies owning about forty per cent of the music controlled by the American society had withdrawn from that society and they did not return to the fold for nearly a year. Yet the Canadian society is collecting fees from Canadian citizens for music belonging to a company which had withdrawn from the American society. Therefore it is not a very dependable assignment. Furthermore, if you look to the United States, you find that the American society is in continuous trouble; that the states of Washington, Montana, Nebraska, Wisconsin and Florida have outlawed the society by legislation, and that some eighteen other states have passed legislation to curb its activities. In Canada we find that twice the Manitoba legislature has passed resolutions asking this government to curb the activities of this society. It is because of the society's oppressive tactics and because of complaints which I have from my own district that I think it advisable to refer to some of them.

Take first the fact that this society is capitalized with ten thousand shares of which only two are held in this dominion, the remainder being owned in the United States and England. The society is practically dictated to by the directors in New York. The society started collection of fees at a minimum of $10. There never was a maximum limit. Then the charges increased in accordance with certain conditions and the number of times music was produced. Then arbitrarily the society raised the minimum fee to $30. It was that increase and the many protests which resulted from it which brought about the appointment of His Honour Judge Parker as a royal commissioner to inquire into the matter. What did he find? Hon. members will see from his report that there were no Canadian authors having membership in the society, no Canadian authors or composers participating in its profits; that the funds collected were remitted to the United States after deducting only sufficient to carry the overhead. It was as a result of that report that the government appointed this appeal board to revise the society's tariff.

That appeal board is to be commended, because had they not acted as they did we do not know what figure these fees would have reached. First there was a minimum of $10; then up it went to $30, then down to $5, a figure fixed by the appeal board. And where the society went out to collect $30 and could not get $30 they were willing to take $20, and if they could not get $20 they would take $10. I know of specific instances in my own community.

They also take advantage of the fact that the government through the appeal board revises their tariffs. They say to the people: This is our tariff as revised and approved by the government appeal board. The application forms also refer to their repertoire. It is an application to use the society's repertoire and the licence issued is a permission to use the society's repertoire. Well the society has no repertoires and never had. It does not know to-day what it owns. When they tell us through their paid lobbyists who have been patrolling the corridors of this building that it would be impossible to prepare a list, that a list would be so expensive, I do not think it is asking very much, because a list of the works this society owns would hardly make a book larger than the Montreal telephone directory.

The provision is that titles shall bear the date of the copyright, so that it may be readily seen when that copyright expires. Then, as occasion requires, additional leaves can be handed the licence holders in order that they may know what is the new music. As to the work which they contend the preparation of these lists will entail, I should like members to read some of the application forms and the printed matter of this society, in which they impose upon licence holders requirements which are absolutely incredible. First of all they ask the applicant to fill out his forms according to periods. That period may be for a week, for a month or for a quarter, and when he makes that application he undertakes to fill out a weekly, monthly or quarterly report. Then they require him to tell, first of all, whether the music is vocal or instrumental or mechanical. They want him to tell whether it is produced by a piano, a piccolo, a gramophone, a saxophone or a radio. They want him to tell the name of the author and the name of the arranger and he must tell just how many minutes, how many hours and how many days this music is performed.

Then they tell the applicant how to arrive at the basis of charges, and I am reciting this because it indicates the work which this corporation imposes upon applicants from whom it seeks to collect licence fees. Why, it requires one to tell first of all the title of the music and how many minutes that music has been played. Then it says that a certain charge is made to hotels, to restaurants, even to boarding houses, to cabarets, to skating rinks, to stores and all down the line in these places where small music is performed and where it was never intended that licence fees should be collected. They say the charges against these various places of business are to be calculated on the hour performance basis. The hours of performance are calculated, first of all, by multiplying the number of musicians, the greatest number of musicians, including the leader and soloist, in any one performance in any one hour of the time by the number of hours. Then you carry on a series of calculations and multiplication. You multiply that by the greatest number of days on which music is produced. Then you multiply the greatest number of days by the greatest number of weeks in any period. Then you multiply that by the rate of one and a half cents an hour, as they put it, and you must make your report accordingly. On that basis is fixed the rate that one must pay. Then, worse than that, if you fail to make that report the printed matter of the society tells you that the fees which you have already paid will revert to the company, and if you continue to use this music without having obtained another licence you are said to be infringing the Copyright Act.

At a previous session I referred to this society as a racket. Well, it has had that designation from many sources. I said that it carried on its business by way of threats. Well, the president of the society took exception to that and threatened a libel suit. I looked up the dictionary and found that the best or rather the most charitable interpretation of the word "racket" was "a system of securing money to which one is not entitled." I think that applies very well to this society when it attempts to collect fees for music of which it is not the owner. I also cited the case of the Eaton Amateur Dramatic Society, which sought to put on the Pirates of Penzance, and obtained a quoted price from the broadcasting station. They were told that they would have to get a quotation from the Canadian Performing Right Society, and they obtained a rate of $61. The broadcasting station thought that was so excessive that they turned the matter over to their solicitor, who found that the Pirates of Penzance was no longer copyright but was in the public domain, and that this society had no right whatever to collect fees on that work. That is just one incident, and I do not think it unreasonable at all to ask this society to supply to those from whom it seeks to collect fees a list of the music for which it demands payment.

Another amendment to this act is in connection with the small users of radio music and, as I say, it is a matter in which every constituency in Canada is interested, since it affects every hotel, every dining room, restaurant, skating rink, store, lodge hall and so on. It was never intended that these people should be penalized by the collection of these fees. The amendment to this act simply says that these small places shall not pay for music which they receive over the radio. The appeal board was given a tariff at the end of November, with a request from this society that the various broadcasting stations pay to it for the year 1938 the sum of $145,000. The appeal board cut that sum down to $83,000, which was a pretty good cut. It just indicates that this society is rather reckless in its charges. But that $83,000 applies only to receiving sets for domestic purposes, in other words receiving sets in homes. Of this $83,000, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation pays to this society the sum of $32,000. So the men having radios in these little places of business, having paid the government licence fee, feel it is not right that they should be called upon by this society to pay additional fees.

Those are the principal features of this bill, and I hope that hon. members will look upon it not as a party matter but simply as a means of serving their constituents by requiring this society to hand them a list of such music as they claim to control.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, having noticed certain abuses arising from the interpretation of the Copyright Act in matters of radiobroadcasting, I wish to point out to the house some of them which will indicate, I believe, the importance of passing, if not the two proposed amendments, at least the second one, which relates to licences required of owners of receiving sets. It might have been better to change the definition of the word "performance" in paragraph 2 of the act. However, the amendment contained in paragraph two of the present bill will remedy many abuses, and I am glad to support it.

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) has already explained the methods of the Canadian Performing Right Society, which monopolizes copyrights and uses them not for the benefit of authors but for its own benefit and at the expense of the public. I shall merely point out the case of hotels, restaurants and clubs. In every village there is at least one hotel, restaurant and store which have one or more radio receiving sets used by the inmates or by visitors. The set is in operation the whole day and even the entire evening, broadcasting the news of the day, sports news, hockey games, musical compositions, etc. Should there happen to be broadcast in the course of the day or evening a musical work or a song subject to copyright, the merchant, restaurant keeper or hotelkeeper whose receiving set was operating at that moment and who has not paid a copyright fee or obtained a licence becomes liable to an action in damages or a penalty of as much as $200, even although copyright fees had been paid by the station broadcasting the music or the song. Mark well, the hotelkeeper, merchant or restaurant keeper did not select the song or musical work, which indeed may annoy him; the choice is made by the broadcasting station. More than that, Mr. Chairman. Supposing that in the Royal York hotel in Toronto, for instance, the orchestra should broadcast a musical composition, the hotel has to pay a copyright or licence fee to the company holding the copyright. The station broadcasting the composition or song also has to pay a licence or copyright fee. And the small village hotelkeeper, merchant or restaurant owner who happened to leave his radio open during that time has likewise to pay a licence or copyright fee. Should he not do so he becomes liable to an action for damages or to a penalty of as much as $200.

A similar situation exists in the cities; in fact, I may say that it is even worse. Take the case of the Chateau Laurier in Ottawa. Should a musical work or a song be broadcast from there by a radio station, the hotel would have to pay a licence fee for having performed the composition; the station would have to pay a licence fee for broadcasting it, and the hotel would have to pay a third licence fee for any receiving set situated within its walls. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that that is pure exploitation and that it is time to put an end to it.

It is objected in certain quarters that the proposed act would constitute a contravention of the Berne international convention. The Berne international convention was concluded in 1886 and revised in Berlin in 1908. Surely this convention, signed in 1886 and revised in 1908, could have no relation to radiobroadcasting which at that time did not even exist. Broadcasting began in a practical way only in 1921 when the first licences were issued to stations in the United States. It has since developed in the different countries.

In 1927, at the second International Juridical Conference on wireless telegraphy held at Geneva, at which most of the countries of the civilized world were represented, there was submitted the following proposition: "Copyright fees are payable as well by all proprietors or operators of receiving sets in a public place." This proposition, Mr. Chairman, was rejected by seven votes against three, with three delegations not voting.

One year later, in 1928, at the conference convened in Rome for the purpose of revising the Berne Convention, the opinions were still uncompromising. And those who followed its proceedings declare "that it would not have been possible to attain an agreement if the question of public receiving sets had been discussed." Indeed, the Court of Amsterdam decided in 1929 that "according to the law of 1912, the word performance may be applied only to the fact of performing the work at the broadcasting station where such work will be broadcast."

On the 20th of January, 1930, the Court of Copenhagen delivered a similar decision. On the 19th of October, 1931, the High Court of Germany, although Germany like the other countries already mentioned, was a signatory to the Rome Convention of 1928, decided that:

> The operating of a receiving set does not constitute a new process from the legal point of view, but only a part of a complex broadcasting process which begins with the production of sounds in front of the microphone of the broadcasting station, and ends with the reconstitution of the sounds by an indefinite number of receiving sets. And this complex whole represents a "public performance" or a "commercial reproduction" of the musical work.

If section 11 bis of the Rome convention, by which the word "broadcasting" was added, were to cover the case of receiving sets, the Court of Copenhagen, the Court of Amsterdam, and the High Court of Germany, all of countries signatory to the Berne and Rome conventions, surely could not have rendered such decisions.

So that, according to the interpretation of the conventions of Berne and Rome by the three nations I have just mentioned and who were signatories to those conventions, nothing stands in the way of the proposed legislation exempting radio receiving sets from copyright fees.

The ACTING DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is eleven o'clock.

Mr. RAYMOND: I shall not be very long.

The ACTING DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman has consent, he might conclude in a moment or two.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. RAYMOND: I might add the opinion of a jurist who is a specialist in the matter, Hoffman, who stated at the fourth International Juridical Conference of 1930:

> The person who installs a loud speaker is not giving a performance, he is simply divulging the performance of somebody else.

The same opinion is held in the United States. For instance, in a case decided in the State of California, where the broadcasting station had obtained permission to broadcast the author's protected works, Judge McCormick made the following statement:

> The performance in such cases, takes place in the studio of the broadcasting station, and the operator of the receiving set in effect does nothing more than one would do who opened a window and permitted the strains of music of a passing band to come within the enclosure in which he was located. It is true that it is the voluntary act of the person turning the dial on the receiving set that enables electricity to animate the mechanism so as to make audible within hearing distance of the receiving set that which is disseminated from the broadcasting station, and which is on the air by reason of the broadcast, but such voluntary action, in my opinion, is far from "performing" the copyrighted work. The performance, which is licensed as just stated, occurs entirely in the studio of the broadcasting station, where the copyrighted musical composition is lawfully used, and the action occurring at the receiving set is simultaneous therewith, and is in no sense a reproduction of the musical composition that is being lawfully performed at the broadcasting studio. The action, play, and use of the copyrighted composition has been completed within the studio.

Mr. Speaker, I think it would be unfair to ask a fee for a radio receiving set from people who have no control whatever over programs selected by the broadcasting station. As a result of such a policy, any receiving set owner would have to shut his radio when speeches, addresses, the day's news, market quotations, musical programs are broadcasted lest he might happen to listen to some song coming from a broadcasting station and subject to copyrights held by the Canadian Performing Right Society.

That, I think, would be both arbitrary and abusive. The Canadian Performing Right Society is already collecting a royalty through the licence fee from the performing artist; it is also collecting a second royalty through the licence fee paid by the broadcasting station, and a third one for the same work from the owner of the receiving set. The simple mention of the fact is sufficient to prove the absurdity of such a proposition.

These facts, Mr. Speaker, and also the authorities I have just quoted tend to prove conclusively, to my mind, that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kootenay-West does not interfere with the Berne convention as amended by the Rome convention; the effect of this amendment, if adopted by the house, would be to prevent abuses on the part of any company monopolizing copyrights for the benefit of a few exploiters.

On motion of Mr. Turgeon the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Dunning the house adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Friday, February 18, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

First report of the standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Plaxton (for Mr. Moore).

UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL ASSISTANCE

FEDERAL GRANT TO NOVA SCOTIA—REPRESENTATIONS OF CITY OF HALIFAX

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Before the orders of the day are called: I am advised that the city of Halifax has passed a strong resolution with respect to the agreement proposed between the dominion and the province of Nova Scotia, pointing out that the city has been very careful in its distribution of relief and has received a relatively small sum of money for that purpose as compared with other cities of Canada. The question is whether or not the government is prepared to reconsider the terms of the agreement between the province of Nova Scotia and the dominion in the light of the effect it would have upon the city of Halifax. If the hon. gentleman does not desire to answer the question now, it can stand as notice and he can answer it on Monday.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): This matter has been brought to my attention by the hon. members for the city of Halifax; also I have received a telegram direct from the city clerk of Halifax, and am communicating with him by telegram to-day.

RAVENSCRAG, SASK., FARMERS

LACK OF FEED FOR LIVE STOCK—STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Yesterday the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) asked a question with respect to the alleged lack of feed for live stock and the need of relief experienced by farmers at Ravenscrag, Saskatchewan. The answer to my right hon. friend's question is that, following the receipt of complaint by the dominion Department of Agriculture from Ravenscrag, Saskatchewan, it has been ascertained that six hundred and twenty tons of fodder have been delivered to the local improvement district in which Ravenscrag is located, and the one adjacent to the north to which deliveries have been made from Ravenscrag. Three carloads have been delivered to date to Ravenscrag in the month of February and one hundred and forty tons are on order for delivery to that point.

Complaint received on February 17 from Ravenscrag by the government of Saskatchewan, by whom the fodder is distributed, was signed by farmers who did not reduce their live stock to the basis on which feed is being supplied, when given an opportunity to do so with assistance from the dominion government.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 17, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a bill passed annually by parliament for the appointment of auditors for parliament of the Canadian National Railways. The bill is in the usual form. The Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act states that auditors shall be appointed by resolution of parliament, but the passage of this bill has been found to be a practical method and has now been followed for several years.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 1—Appointment of auditors.

Mr. BENNETT: How is the remuneration for the auditors fixed?

Mr. HOWE: The remuneration is fixed annually by order in council. For several years, I think since the passage of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, the remuneration has been $50,000 per annum.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

BOARDS OF REVIEW, TIME LIMIT FOR FILING PROPOSALS, ETC.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, to make provision for the establishment of more than one board of review in any province, to provide that no new proposals shall be filed in a province after a date to be fixed by proclamation, more adequately to define the meaning of the word "creditor" as used in the act, and to extend the benefit of the act in the case of deceased farmers.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I had better outline briefly the amendments which are contemplated by the bill which will be based upon this resolution. In doing so, I do not want to anticipate the detailed discussion on the bill itself but to give, so far as I can, general information. A number of members advised me last night that they would be unable to be here to-day but would like to be present when there is any general discussion of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and in that regard I would point out that there will be opportunity for general discussion both on the second reading of the bill itself and in committee of the whole on the bill. At this time I shall content myself with a brief outline of the nature of the proposed amendments and the reasons therefor.

The bill will seek to amend the act in five important respects. The first amendment will attempt to define more adequately the word "creditor," so as to include as a creditor of a farmer a person holding a mortgage, hypothec or other charge upon the property of the farmer even though no privity of contract exists between the farmer and such person. The practice of the boards of review in the various provinces in dealing with cases in which there is no privity of contract has varied quite considerably. Recently, however, certain decisions, particularly one by the appeal court of the province of Ontario, have made it necessary to have a clarifying amendment, which will now make it clear that the word "creditor" does include the creditor of a farmer, although no privity of contract exists between that creditor and the farmer, because of the fact that he is a mortgagee of a previous owner of the property.

The second amendment is designed to permit the legal representative of a deceased farmer to apply to the court for an order to continue proceedings under a proposal filed by the farmer before his death or for leave to make a proposal on behalf of the estate of a deceased farmer, and the court would be empowered to grant the necessary application upon being satisfied that a member of the family of the deceased farmer resides, and will continue to reside, upon the farm, and intends and is able to operate the farm.

The third amendment is intended to change the present provision which provides that a stay of proceedings is effective only for ninety days, subject to extension by order of the court. Where a delay in hearing the case occurs the official receiver has to apply to the court within ninety days for an extension of the order, and in some cases many extensions have had to be obtained. The new provision will make the stay of proceedings effective until the proposal is finally disposed of. Any creditor, however, may in the interim apply to the court for an order to proceed should circumstances develop justifying such action.

The fourth amendment proposed will enable the governor in council to appoint more than one board of review in a province. In some provinces the number of cases referred to the board has been so great that the boards have not been able to keep up to date with the work. It is not anticipated that action will be taken in all provinces under this amendment or that action will be taken except under circumstances which indicate that such is absolutely necessary in order to catch up with the work and clear it up.

The fifth amendment will enable the governor in council by proclamation to provide that no proposal shall be filed in any province after a date fixed in such proclamation. This amendment is in order to enable the government to meet the very varied conditions which exist in Canada with respect to the operation of this act.

Strong representations have been made from some of the provinces that the operation of the act is no longer beneficial but rather harmful to farmers in that the conditions which gave rise to its enactment and its operation in the province, have now sufficiently improved that there is no need for it; and representations are also made that the fact that it does continue to operate under such circumstances has an impairing effect upon the credit of farmers. The government desires to be in a position to treat each province according to the circumstances of the farmers in that province. By providing that the act should cease to operate, that no new applications will be accepted after a certain date, the same method is followed as was adopted in bringing the act into force. It is hoped that the amendment will relieve the government of a great volume of requests from some provinces for the complete repeal of the whole statute, because the government have no doubt that the statute is still a necessary instrument in certain provinces. The intention is to keep it in operation in every province so long as real need for it is demonstrated. But the government is definitely of opinion also that the continuance in operation of this piece of machinery within a province after the need for it has vanished tends to lower the credit of the agricultural industry in that province, which is to say the least an undesirable result.

That, Mr. Chairman, is a brief explanation of the purpose of the amendments which will be covered by the bill to which this resolution is a preliminary. On the second reading of the bill and in committee I shall have available all possible information with respect to the operation of the act. As I stated at the outset, a number of hon. members on both sides who are not here to-day have asked to be given an opportunity to get such information from me, and I can undertake to be in a position, if not to answer all questions, at least to supply such information as I have on every aspect of the matter when we come to the further stage.

Mr. STEWART: Mr. Chairman, the amendments proposed by the minister are twofold. Taking the latter one first, I heartily approve of it on the grounds he has put forward. During the past two years I have had many interviews with farmers who felt that the act was detrimental to them in that they did not come under the act but desired to borrow money and found the act a serious obstacle to their doing so. For that reason they advocated repeal. I had proposed and in fact had drafted a bill to present to this house which differs from what the minister has outlined in only one respect: I was going to suggest July 1, 1938, as a suitable date for the repeal of the act in Ontario. I admit at once that the minister may be in a better position to judge when the repeal in any province should become effective, but I think the date I mentioned is a reasonable one for Ontario. It is to be borne in mind that this act has no application to a debt incurred after the enactment of the legislation in 1934, over three years ago. The act of course is based upon the assumption that the farmer is insolvent; that is the fundamental requirement.

Mr. DUNNING: That his business as a farmer is insolvent. That has an important bearing on some suggestions.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. STEWART: I do not quite get the distinction, but there may be one in the mind of the minister. If a man's business is bankrupt it seems that he is bankrupt himself. However, the act is based upon that assumption; unless that situation exists the act has no application. Bearing in mind that the act came into effect in 1934, surely the farmer to whom it was intended to apply must have found out by this time whether or not he is insolvent in respect of his liabilities prior to 1934. So it seems to me that a reasonable time has elapsed, having in mind the object of the legislation, which was of a temporary nature, designed to keep farmers on the farm rather than have them sold out and everything cleaned up, even the creditors getting very little out of it. Keeping these facts in mind I believe it is the general feeling that we may well terminate this legislation in Ontario. I have had many communications with farmers about it. True, I have had some representations to the contrary, but they are not nearly as numerous or as convincing as those in favour of terminating the operation of the act.

As to the other amendment, the act of course is based on the assumption that there is a relation of debtor and creditor. A farmer who acquires a farm subject to a mortgage to which he is not a party does not occupy the position of a debtor to the party who holds the mortgage. On that ground I think the minister will agree that the relation is not that of debtor and creditor, and the act has been interpreted as having no application to cases of the kind. I can see some difficulty if this amendment is made. Take the case of a farmer who purchased a farm at a high price shortly after the war when prices were high. He paid a substantial amount of his purchase price, perhaps paid it down cash, giving a mortgage for the balance. The relation of debtor and creditor undoubtedly existed between the purchaser and vendor in that case. But another man comes along and acquires this farm on quite a different basis. It may be fair that as between the original parties to the transaction the debt should be cut down, and it may not be at all fair that as between the last purchaser and the original mortgagee it should be cut down. There is a difference there.

As to proceedings instituted by a farmer now deceased, I have had several cases of that kind, and I am glad the minister proposes to limit the amendment to cases in which say a son or heir of the deceased is staying on the farm. That conforms to the spirit of the act. I think the minister will agree it would be quite proper to say the original intention of the act does not apply where an estate is being wound up and none of the heirs or parties interested are going to stay on the farm.

Reserving the right to make any further comments when the bill comes down and we know its exact language, I think it is along the right lines. But I again press the minister to consider the first day of July, the national birthday, as the time for termination in Ontario.

Mr. DUNNING: I hope I made it clear that the intention is to set a date within a province after which no new applications can be received, but the act will continue to operate in that province pending the disposition of cases concerning which application was received prior to the date set in the proclamation. It is felt that examination should be made before definitely determining the date, but my hon. friend's suggestion is not far from my own view as to what it should be in Ontario.

Mr. STEWART: I quite agree with that. It was my intention to make it clear that the wording of the bill I intended to introduce was exactly along that line, that no new applications should be received after the first of July. Of course all those pending, of which there are a large number, should be cleaned up, which will take possibly a year.

Mr. DUFFUS: Will it be permissible to insert further amendments when the matter is being discussed later in this session in committee?

Mr. DUNNING: It is an amending bill, of course, and when the bill is in committee of the whole house the whole act is before the committee. At that stage it is quite permissible for anyone to suggest an amendment, provided that it does not involve a charge upon the revenues of the crown or create a tax; this cannot be done unless it is preceded by a resolution such as the one now under consideration. But ordinary amendments of course can be proposed during the committee stage of the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Chairman, I think the government is to be commended for bringing down amendments to the act at this time. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act has operated now fairly successfully for almost four years, but the circumstances that prevailed at the time the act was passed do not still exist. While in some provinces the need for the act may be growing less, in others there is need for an expansion of the scope of the act.

I do not propose to go into the conditions in other provinces, in this regard, because I am not familiar with them, but with reference to the province of Saskatchewan—and I think other members from that province would agree with me—the administration of the act has been received very favourably, and there is a widespread desire on all sides that the scope of the act should be expanded. At the annual meeting of the Canadian Chamber of Agriculture in this city on the 27th day of January, in the course of his speech Mr. J. H. Wesson, the president, outlined four suggested amendments that he thought would be in the interests of agriculture, particularly in Saskatchewan. I do not think it is necessary for me to take the time to read those amendments; no doubt the minister is familiar with them, and, if I may judge from his remarks, they are being included in the bill that is to be brought down. I point that out to show that all sections of opinion in Saskatchewan, including the United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section, the wheat pool, agricultural societies and so on, recognize the service that this act has been to the farmer and are asking for an extension of its scope. I have before me a resolution which was passed unanimously by the legislature of Saskatchewan last year. So rarely does a resolution pass unanimously in the legislature of that province that in itself that fact makes it worthy of note. All parties agreed on the following resolution:

That the legislature of the province of Saskatchewan, while deeply sensible of the great assistance rendered to our people by the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in the solution of their financial difficulties occasioned by the present depression, aggravated by unprecedented drought in our most productive areas, are of the opinion that experience of the working of the said act in our province renders desirable amendments thereto whereby it may be provided:

Then it lists them:

(1) That personal representatives of the estates of deceased persons may be permitted to take advantage of the provisions of the said act as fully as such deceased person could do if alive.

(2) That the board of review be given power to rehear and amend proposals formulated prior to the 1st of December, 1936.

(3) That the scope of the said act be widened to permit of real property owners in cities, towns, villages and hamlets making proposals under the act to obtain adjustment of mortgages, agreements for sale, liens and other encumbrances on their real property.

(4) That, where default has been made in performance of the terms of a proposal previously formulated through circumstances not within the control of the debtor, the board of review may prohibit bankruptcy proceedings being taken against him and may make such further or other order as the circumstances of the case warrant.

(5) That the provisions of the act be extended to make it applicable to retail merchants and traders so as to enable them to claim the benefit of the act.

(6) That the province of Saskatchewan be divided for the purposes of administration of the act into a sufficient number of areas with boards of review to expeditiously carry out the work of debt adjustment under the supervision of the present chairman.

(7) That, where lands are subject to a registered mortgage or mortgages and the registered owner of the said lands is a farmer who is not a party to each of the said mortgages, such farmer shall be considered a debtor in respect to all the said mortgages and entitled to the benefit of the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and the board of review may make such order as it deems just and proper, both with respect to the said registered owner and his liability in respect to the said mortgages, and with respect to any mortgagor or mortgagors in the said mortgages and the mortgagor's liability in respect to the said mortgages.

(8) That the provisions of the act be extended to make it apply to cases where an owner of a farm has sold or leased his farm and given possession to the purchaser or tenant, as the case may be.

And, further, that this legislature urges that amendments to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, embodying the proposed changes, be promulgated at the present session of the federal parliament.

This resolution was adopted unanimously on March 2, 1937. The lawyer members of that house who drew it up must have had their tongues in their cheeks, since even to me—and I am not a lawyer—some of the suggestions it contains would appear to be outside the scope of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and would come rather within the Bankruptcy Act. Nevertheless it indicates that there is a widespread desire in that province, at least, for the retention of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and the extension of its activities.

I want to say just a word with reference to the five amendments that have been outlined by the minister. At the present moment I have on the order paper a bill in this connection, and I am very glad that everything contained in that bill, with two or three exceptions, will be found in the government's legislation. The amendment permitting the estate of deceased farmers to come under the protection of this act in my opinion is a move in the right direction. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was found to be intra vires because of the fact that it dealt with insolvency, which under section 92 of the British North America Act is within the jurisdiction of the federal government. It would therefore seem that the insolvency of the estate of the deceased farmer ought to have the same right to come, and should come, under this act.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Then I think the amendment to subsection 1 of section 11, to extend the stay of proceedings until the proposals shall have been settled, is also a move in the right direction. In Saskatchewan, because of the volume of applications, the boards of review have been running about a year behind, and when application for a stay of proceedings had to be made every ninety days it occasioned considerable unnecessary work. I think the minister is doing the right thing in making this amendment.

The question of privity of contract has become a problem only recently, and has not yet affected us in Saskatchewan, though undoubtedly it will, in view of the decision of the Ontario supreme court in the now famous Gofton v. Shantz case, in which the following decision was given:

A purchaser of mortgaged property who has not covenanted to pay the mortgage debt is not a debtor of the mortgagee and therefore not entitled to an adjustment of the debt under the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act; there being no relationship of debtor and creditor, secured or otherwise, between such purchaser and the mortgagee, a proposal under the statute made by the purchaser is not binding on the mortgagee and will have no effect upon the final foreclosure order made in the action to foreclose the mortgage.

From what I can gather from the study of statistics given by the minister's department, in returns from questions asked last year, that would affect a great many hundreds of cases which have been settled in the belief that there was a privity of contract and—

Mr. DUNNING: Thousands of them, probably.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes, I believe it would run into thousands. I was being conservative by confining it to hundreds. I think an amendment along this line will save a great deal of chaos in regard to that situation.

The suggestion that we have more than one board has been asked for repeatedly by different bodies from Saskatchewan. I notice in an answer to a question I received the other day from the minister that in Saskatchewan 1,116 cases are awaiting the attention of the board of review, and that is the situation at a time when conditions are so bad that people are not bothering about seeking any debt-protecting legislation. Should we have a crop this summer and creditors begin to press their claims, in my opinion the volume of people asking for protection under the act will be doubled or trebled. Certainly there is a need for at least two boards, one to work out of Regina and the other out of Saskatoon.

I come now to the fifth suggestion by the minister—and I am not so directly concerned with it, because it is inserted in the interest of provinces where the act is not working as suitably. Perhaps I should be more correct if I said that need for the act is not as pressing as it is in the province from which I come. There is only one thing about which I should like to be clear, and undoubtedly the minister will clarify the point when the bill comes up. I should like to know how it will be decided in each province whether or not the people in that province want a cessation of the activities of the board of review. I should like to know whether a vote of the legislature will cause an announcement to be made that no further applications will be received, or whether some other method will be taken. I hope some safeguard will be taken to see to it that in a province, like Saskatchewan for instance, the good work that has been done and that can be done will not be stopped by any premature cessation of the activities of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act administration.

Before I take my seat I should like to suggest one or two things the minister has not outlined, and which he may be willing to consider between now and the time the bill is presented to the committee. I have in mind the interests of the retired farmer. The minister and every other hon. member from the west knows that in every small town and village there are numbers of people who have left their farms and have been living in the small towns. They have expected to live for the rest of their days upon the proceeds from the farms they have leased. They now find that under the definition of the term "farmer" as it appears in paragraph (f) in section 2 of the bill, they are not farmers, because they are not persons engaged "in the tillage of the soil." For that reason they are not in a position to ask for a reduction of their debts, or that a proposal be formulated between them and their creditors. The result is that in many cases they are continuing to pay heavy interest, and to meet debts which are now out of all proportion to the value of their property. I know that in very many cases they are in the serious position of being in danger of losing their properties.

In some cases these people are in a position which is almost worse than that of the actual farmer on the farm. The farmers have the ordinary means of subsistence, but these people have not. Their only source of revenue has gone. During the last few years their farms have produced nothing, and they are now in the position where they are expected to pay taxes and interest on their debts, despite the fact that they have no income and have no way of obtaining a settlement with their creditors, through the act.

I wondered if the minister might consider, between now and second reading of the bill the possibility of accepting an amendment which would extend the definition of the term "farmer" to a person who was the owner of a farm, but who had rented or leased it, and whose main source of revenue was to be derived therefrom. I have in mind the positions of those who appeared before the first board of review that was set up.

Mr. DUNNING: Has the hon. member given any consideration to that other retired farmer, the one who has not his farm leased under the circumstances outlined by the hon. member but has sold the farm subject to mortgage and is in a position of a creditor under the act? Some of the most heart-rending letters I get with respect to the administration of the act are not from debtors. Debtors are being protected by the operation of the act. I am just as sympathetic with the retired farmer who is a creditor and is trying to live honestly on the proceeds of what is owing to him as I am with the debtor retired farmer described by the hon. member. The difficulty with respect to the act is that we tend to look at it from one standpoint only.

I could not refrain from interjecting these observations, because they bear so completely upon what the hon. member was saying. The next door neighbour might be in exactly the opposite position, but there would be no mercy for him; he gets nothing. That is one of the great difficulties of this legislation.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am glad the minister has brought that up, because I am aware of the problem of the retired farmer who is a creditor. But the reason I am emphasizing the case of the debtor retired farmer is that the creditor retired farmer is not primarily a problem which faces us in Saskatchewan. I believe that is one more common to the east.

Mr. DUNNING: But it is a problem under the act.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Oh, yes; it is a problem under the act. But I am presenting suggested amendments, in view of the problems, particularly of the people on the prairies. The Saskatchewan brief presented before the Rowell commission showed, for instance, that 83·5 per cent of our farm debt was owing outside the province. In the main it is not owing to creditor farmers, but to mortgage and loan companies. That, I believe, is not so true in Ontario. I realize however that the Minister of Finance must think in terms not only of Saskatchewan but of Ontario and the other provinces, and that in those provinces there are creditor farmers.

I am presenting the case for the debtor farmers in Saskatchewan, who far outnumber the creditor farmers, as the minister knows. Their problem is a serious one, and I am wondering if the minister could not consider it between now and the time the bill is given second reading.

I should like to refer to another amendment which might be made, namely one respecting the rehearing of cases which came before the first board of review in Saskatchewan. I refer to the board which operated prior to December 1, 1935. Last year and this year I have asked the government with respect to the reduction of debts under the previous and present boards. The answers I have received show that under the old board of review the reduction was 27·8 per cent. The reduction by the present board in 1936 was 43·9 per cent, and last year the reduction under the present board was 44·38 per cent, or about a sixteen per cent greater reduction in debts under the present board in Saskatchewan than under the old board. In other words, the man who was unfortunate enough—if I may use that term—to have his case considered by the previous board of review had a much poorer proposal formulated than did the man whose case came before the present board. There is a feeling on the part of those who went before the previous board of review that they got a most unsatisfactory adjustment. Having gone through two bad crops since that time, which have accentuated their difficulties, they are now in a position where they cannot meet the proposal that was made.

There is one other thing to which I should like the minister to give consideration. A proposal is formulated on the basis of the farmer's capacity to pay and the farm's capacity to produce at the particular moment, but that proposal might not be feasible a year or two later. In the intervening period there may be one, two or three crop failures, which means that what may have been a satisfactory adjustment becomes a very unsatisfactory adjustment two or three years later. I know the situation is a difficult one; I realize that if you keep constantly rehearing these cases you will get nowhere. There has to be a fixed point somewhere.

I was wondering if there would be any possibility of placing in the act a provision to the effect that where a new agreement is formulated by the board of review it should contain a clause stating that when a farmer's crop does not exceed a value of $6 per acre—I am suggesting an amount rather than quantity of crop—in that year there shall be no interest charged and he shall not be expected to make a payment on principal. Unless we do that, here is what is going to happen: If we continue to have crop failures in Saskatchewan—we all hope we will not, but it is a possibility—what is a satisfactory adjustment to-day will have to be reconsidered later as the interest continues to pile up and the farmer continues to lack the wherewithal to pay.

It might be interesting to hon. members to look at the figures given last Monday in answer to a question. The total debt against the farms of Saskatchewan is given as $43,243,842.33. There has been a total reduction in principal of $14,533,477.92 and in interest of $966,124.32. The total debt has now been reduced to $27,744,240.09. But that debt is still against property valued at $25,866,768. In other words, in spite of the reduction, which is the best we have had, the debt still stands at 108 per cent of the total value of property. When we consider in addition the payment of interest for one or two years we must realize that the adjusting of these debts will have to be done all over again. I am cognizant of the fact that it is a big problem and that the Minister of Finance has to think in terms not only of the prairies but of all the Dominion of Canada. However, in view of the fact that it is now suggested that this act may be operative in certain provinces and inoperative in others, I was wondering if it would not be possible to insert a clause to the effect that the agreement shall stipulate that where a farmer does not have a crop valued in excess of $6 per acre, in that year there shall be no accumulation of interest and no principal paid.

Miss MACPHAIL: For once I agree wholeheartedly with what has been said by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was presented to the house some years ago as offering the best method available at the moment of dealing with the accumulated debts of our farmers. I voted for that act because I believed it was the best we could do at the time. I believe the act has operated for the good of all concerned as applied to farmers who bought land at high prices in 1928 and 1929, or perhaps before that during the war, and had not been able to get started before a depression came. Some of these men have gone through two depressions. The people who owned this land really got more than it was worth, based on its producing capacity.

But there is another side to the story. I have heard of some very pitiful cases in Ontario of farmers who had sold their land and gone to live in a village or town, having just barely enough to keep them going. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was passed and these people found that their interest was reduced, or in some cases stopped altogether. These interest payments were all that they had to live on. The person buying the farm, even at too high a price, may be in debt, but at least he has the land to till and is able to grow some potatoes and get some meat and vegetables which the man who sold the farm cannot get.

Although I have not the full details before me at the moment of the many cases with which I am familiar, I do know of one man living in my own village of Flesherton who is blind and who has had the most slashing reductions made in his interest payments for the last two years. I cannot defend a thing like that; from the human point of view it is indefensible. The man on the land at least has a chance of getting some milk and cream and meat and vegetables, but the man who formerly owned the property has not this opportunity. This particular case may touch our hearts more because of the affliction of the creditor, but there are many others just as deserving. I know of women living in the villages throughout Ontario who are worrying themselves to death because the small incomes which they had have been halved or at least very much reduced.

There is another aspect of this problem in Ontario. Any one who has money to-day is afraid to lend it to a farmer. Therefore, our young skilled farmers, the very people we want to keep on the land and really the only people worth keeping on the land from a production point of view, cannot get loans to enable them to buy farms.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the most serious consequence.

Miss MACPHAIL: They try to manage, or their fathers may try to help them, but anyone who knows anything of farming to-day knows that it is impossible for a man to make enough off the land to extend his holdings to any great extent. Some of these men have a great deal of ability and energy, but they are finally forced off the farms into the cities or towns. They may not be actually unemployed, they seldom are, but if they are working they are displacing someone else. I can name scores of such cases, as can every member of this house.

Somewhere in the line someone is displaced from a job and goes on relief. Then in a city like Toronto or Winnipeg, or maybe in Ottawa, some person thinks up a scheme of putting that fellow, who knows nothing about farming and never will, back on the land. He never gets a chance as he is not taken and put on land in Ontario and Quebec in a neighbourhood where there are schools or churches or neighbours, but put up in a part of the country where a goat could not live; yet he is expected to make a living there. We pay any amount of money to take him off relief schemes in the cities; we put him up in the north, and then after a while we pay more money to bring him back to the city, when what we ought to be doing—and I feel that this does come under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act—is to provide loans at reasonable rates of interest, amortized over a long period, to young skilled farmers. Possibly the greatest injury that the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act has done—and I as one individual acknowledge some responsibility for it—is to make it impossible for the farmer who has capabilities to get a loan to enable him to start farming.

Mr. STEWART: Drying up credit.

Miss MACPHAIL: It is certainly drying up all kinds of credit: not only mortgage loans, but when many farmers to-day want to get a line of credit at the store, or wish to buy some farm implement, or maybe a cheap car, they have the greatest difficulty in obtaining it, because the merchants who are selling to them have sore memories of fifty per cent reductions in what they were owed by other farmers who had recourse to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. I believe that the best type of farmer—and again I am speaking only for Ontario—has made a great effort, although deeply in debt, to keep away from the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Many of them have not been able to do so, but the best have tried very hard; for they fear the thing we all fear, the scorn of the neighbours. After all, what we all want most is to be respected by those with whom we associate. So that some who deserve help most have never come under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, because they dread the stigma of it, while some who have come under it—I speak from personal experience—are hopeless from any point of view; you might save them now but you would have to do it again in five or ten years or at some time.

This does not apply to Saskatchewan—the two cases are so different. In one province the mortgages are held outside, there have been crop failures, but almost all loans in my part of Ontario are held locally and the hurt is felt locally. Had we thought when we passed this measure of some way of lending money to the debtor so that he could pay part of what he owed, I think that would have helped.

Mr. DUNNING: A great deal of that has been done, of course, under the farm loan act.

Miss MACPHAIL: Well, not in Ontario.

Mr. DUNNING: It could not be made automatic.

Miss MACPHAIL: In Ontario we are having great difficulty in getting loans for farmers. The Ontario government had an unhappy experience and is now—I suppose "liquidating" is the right word. The dominion government has a loan board, but they do not make loans.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes.

Miss MACPHAIL: Well, it must be to very special people.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Miss MACPHAIL: It is very difficult to get a farm loan.

Mr. STEWART: The ones who need them most cannot get them.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Miss MACPHAIL: Anyway I cannot get loans made; there is something wrong with my politics, or something.

Mr. DUNNING: No, there is no politics about it.

Miss MACPHAIL: There may not be, but you cannot get loans. You might get one out of a hundred applications, but what are you going to do about the other ninety-nine?

Mr. DUNNING: I will give information at another time when it is in order to do so with regard to the farm loan board and loans in the province of Ontario.

Miss MACPHAIL: No "information" will settle the cases I have in mind. We have made applications and have not got loans.

The other thing that the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act has done is to lower land values. Farm values have fallen through that and the liquidating of loans by the Ontario government, because undoubtedly they are glad to get rid of the land and are selling it at very low prices, and in cases where farmers have to retire through ill health or other compelling circumstances they must get rid of their farms. I find in my own immediate neighbourhood that a good many farmers have gotten old age pensions and turned their property over to the government as a last resort. They had to do something and that was the thing they finally did; they signed their property over to the provincial government and took twenty dollars a month. In many cases—I can think of three at the moment—the man being the older got the old age pension, but he has since died, and I do not know what is going to result from a condition of that kind, where the woman on the farm cannot get a pension and does not own the farm. All of this is indirectly linked with the lowering of farm values through our very peculiar handling of the matter. I urge in the wrong place, and will in the right one when I get another opportunity, that instead of a "back to the land" we evolve a "stay on the land" policy so that young men will be encouraged to remain on the farms when they want to stay, as many of them do, rather than shove them off and spend great sums of money to get unsuitable people on unsuitable farms.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I have just one short suggestion to make to the minister, in connection with amendments to this act. It is contended that section 142, subsection 2, along with section 143, subsection (j) must be interpreted in such a way that a farmer who once has had a proposal approved is not able to make an assignment under the Bankruptcy Act. The contention is made in that regard that, in all these cases where a farmer has not been able to live up to the proposal—and in many cases that is so, particularly in the drought area of the west—he is refused a discharge under the provisions of bankruptcy proceedings because he has committed an offence under the Bankruptcy Act. The courts have no jurisdiction to grant a discharge, whatever may be the cause, if the farmer has ever made a proposal for a composition which has been acted on. I merely wish to direct these particular sections to the minister's attention so that when the bill is before the house he may have had an opportunity to consider the contention that is made.

Mr. TUCKER: I gathered from an interjection which the Minister of Finance made when the hon. member for Weyburn was speaking that he was under the impression that the board of review had adjusted debts in some cases—I understood him to say, in thousands of cases—where there was no privity of contract. The boards of review in Saskatchewan have never undertaken to adjust debts in those cases; for example, where somebody bought a piece of land subject to a mortgage to which he was not a party and later applied for the adjustment of that debt the boards of review in Saskatchewan—both the old board and the new one—have refused to interfere because, they said, there was no privity of contract. I suggest that the minister give consideration to a provision making available the benefit of this amendment to the act to those who in the past have appeared before those boards and received no consideration. I know of several cases where, because of the fact that the only debt was the debt owing on the farm and the person who was on the farm had not made the original mortgage and was not a party to it, the board refused to formulate any proposal. Under the law as it stands a man cannot, as I understand, make a second application, so that those people who have in this regard been refused any help under the act will not get any unless there is provision for the making of a second application.

There are other cases where the board would have made a proposal dealing with the debts where there was privity of contract, but the main debt was of this nature and so they said they could not make an effective proposal at all. Now we are making this change, I submit everybody should be permitted to have the benefit of it. That is just as important, I think, as giving the right to people whose cases were dealt with in the past by the first board of review to have their proposals reviewed, which I think should also be done. For example, when an order is made by the present board of review, there is a crop failure clause under which, upon the production of a certificate from the sheriff of the district that there has been a crop failure in the area where the farmer's land lies, all payments are postponed automatically for one year. That may not be the exact wording of the clause, but that is, I believe, its effect.

Again, there are cases where there has been a great change in the farmer's circumstances from the time the first order was made. I do not suggest that there should be provision for a second application as of right, but I do suggest that there should be some machinery whereby, if just cause can be shown, an order can be made by some competent judicial official that the applicant may apply for further consideration of his case, by the board of review, so that he may get the benefit of these amendments and also in proper cases a review of a proposal made by the first board of review.

Before I sit down I should like very much to congratulate the minister and the government upon bringing down these amendments, and particularly the one providing for discontinuance of the provisions of this act in certain provinces. Since the beginning of this parliament I had heard a great amount of dissatisfaction expressed from other provinces in regard to this act and I was afraid that so much pressure would be brought to bear that the government might consider repealing the whole act. I think everyone from Saskatchewan will agree with me that the act has been and still is fulfilling a need in that province that simply had to be and still has to be met, and so I think everybody is satisfied that the act should continue to be in force in Saskatchewan for some time to come. I believe even the creditors are satisfied with the administration of the act in Saskatchewan because the apparent large reduction of debt is a reduction more or less only in form. The board of review has cut the debts down only to the amount that they figured the farmer was able to pay, and they certainly have left it at that amount. Every fair-minded creditor, after he has come out from a hearing by the board of review, realizes that the board has left him all that he could hope to collect anyway. The fair-minded creditor realizes that there has been a fair writing down of the debts of the farmer to an amount that he can handle, and that there has been no real hardship to anybody. So I say that there has been a great deal of satisfaction, especially in connection with the administration of the act in Saskatchewan under the present board of review, and when the time comes to appoint further boards, as I suppose will be done in order to cope with the work, I hope the new board will be at any rate under the general supervision of the present chairman of the present board of review.

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): Mr. Chairman, possibly I am looking through the glasses of a retail distributor when I make some criticism of the administration of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in the province of Manitoba. I have always thought the act was very unfair. I have regarded it as cheap legislation, although I have always felt that the good farmers of this country have every right to protection at a time when they find it very difficult, from causes for which they are not to blame, to pay their debts. I call it cheap legislation for this reason, that if the government wants to do something for the farmer, why not do it at the expense of the country as a whole? Why put the entire load on the unsecured creditor, and particularly on the retail merchants? The farmers of this country were entitled to protection; there is no doubt about that, and I agree with what the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) said in her discussion of the act. But this is no time to make valuations of a farmer's assets upon which to base the debt which it is calculated he will have to pay in the future. Land has no value to-day compared with what it had in the days when the debt was incurred. In 1929, when the depression set in, nobody knew how long it was going to last. Many farmers found that they needed credit, and they could not get it from the banks or the loan companies. Right here I want to make this statement, that I believe the banks and the loan companies have forfeited every right they ever had to do business in this country at any time, now or in the future.

Mr. DONNELLY: Close them all out.

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): Certainly. Why did they lose faith in this country? I venture to say that when times are good again and land values high, they will want to be doing business again. I have been in the loan business for a long time, and I have known these loan companies to refuse to accept payment of loans without a three months' bonus, but they would gladly do it to-day. They missed their chance, and because they missed their chance, has the government the right to say that they shall get their money, or that the unsecured creditors of this country are the men who will take the loss?

I know as many farmers who are suffering from the injustice of this act as I do retail merchants, and I should like to cite a case or two.

A man sold his farm—at a high price, I admit. The farmer had been farming for many years, but he sold the farm and moved into town. A number of years went by, from 1929 to 1933, but he got no revenue from his farm. He was lucky to have a bank account to support him. After some years he wanted the farm back, and in the meantime the man who had bought it had never paid a dollar of principal on the mortgage on the farm. All the farmer wanted to do was to get his farm back, but he could not do so.

Another man sold his farm for $10,000 cash, and immediately bought another from his neighbour at half the price, paying no cash but taking over a mortgage of $5,000. He then proceeded to gamble away every cent of the $10,000. Five years went by and the mortgagee never got a cent from that farm. Finally it was to be sold for taxes. The original owner at a hearing of a board of review offered the man $2,000 to get off the farm, but the board would not agree to it.

What time is this to make valuations and say that a man's debts shall be adjusted according to the value of his land and other assets? I say it is not the proper time.

I can cite another case where the board made an adjustment by which the debtor was not to pay one single cent during 1937 except the share of crop to the landlord, and for seed from the municipality. Unsecured creditors were not to get any money until 1938. This man sold three carloads of grain and bought practically a new car for which he paid about $600 in cash. The unsecured creditors got nothing, and their accounts were reduced ninety per cent in some cases.

Many an honest farmer has loaned a farmer across the road $500 or more and given him seed wheat, and now he finds that these debts have been cancelled. The banks and the loan companies, as soon as they saw a depression was on, took chattel mortgages and every other form of security it was possible to get from the farmer. No wonder the young farmers are finding it difficult to-day to get credit. In view of the way this act has been administered, I can see no reason why anybody should extend credit.

Again I say that the loan companies and the banks, in our province at least, have lost the right, if they ever had any, to do business, and I hope they will not get the opportunity again. I say this as representing a farming constituency. I have every sympathy with the man who wants to pay his debts. There should have been a debt adjustment; there is no doubt about that, but like the hon. member for Grey-Bruce, I say the best men, the honest ones, are not the ones who are taking advantage of the act. I think the act will have to be continued, but let us have some justice in its administration. Why should the retail merchants and the unsecured creditors be the ones to help keep the farmer on the land? Let the whole nation do it; because when prosperity returns to the farmer the whole nation will benefit. The unsecured creditors will have to take a loss, and it will just be a memory. I figure that the act was a vote-catcher right from the start, and was not properly administered. I am sorry some criticism is due the government, as this is the third session of this parliament and it is the first time the act has been amended. I hope it will be made more workable, particularly in Manitoba.

Mr. HYNDMAN: As I represent an agricultural constituency, and also the home of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning)—

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, you are my member!

Mr. HYNDMAN: I should like to say a few words on this act. I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail). I agree wholeheartedly with the last speaker (Mr. McDonald, Souris). If ever there was an act passed by any government to destroy the credit of the farmer, the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was that one. If I had been in the house when this act was passed I would have voted for it. I do not advocate its cancellation, but one thing I do advocate is a change in the administration of it, because very unfair judgments have been rendered in certain cases. I will quote one example. A farmer in Carleton county had a large mortgage on his farm. He had to borrow $500 from an old couple in the village who had retired. He borrowed another $300 on a note from another farmer who could ill afford to lend him the money but who did so to enable him to pay a hospital bill. Then this farmer applied for an adjustment of his debts. It came up before the judge, and what did the judge do?—He reduced the mortgage by half,—with which I agree—but he cancelled the $500 note and the $300 note. I claim that was an injustice; it should never have been done. It is the administration of the act which is at fault. When this act was passed it is true the farmers were in hard straits. I agreed with it at that time.

The hon. member who spoke last said this act was passed to get votes. If my memory is correct practically all the members in the house at that time supported the act. But when it is said that it was an act passed to secure votes, I am afraid that during this past year it was used to secure votes. A farmer, the president of the Liberal association in Carleton county, applied for an adjustment of his debts under this act, and he got a most favourable adjustment. Then what did we find this farmer doing? Going out to every farmer in the county of Carleton and saying: "If you vote for Mr. Hepburn I will see that you get the same adjustment as I got." Now, that is politics.

Miss MACPHAIL: I think that was boasting.

Mr. McCANN: How did it work?

Mr. HYNDMAN: It did not work out in Carleton county.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, I am sure he does not want a wrong impression to go abroad by way of reflection on the board of review for Ontario. I may advise him that Mr. Justice Hope has been chairman of the board of review for Ontario; there has been no change at all, and I am quite sure my hon. friend would not desire to have the impression go abroad that he thinks the board of review for Ontario, headed by Mr. Justice Hope, would be affected by political considerations in making any award. I say that in all seriousness because I do not believe my hon. friend intends that, but that is the impression his words would convey.

Mr. HYNDMAN: It was the judgment of Hon. Mr. Justice Hope that I was referring to a moment ago in connection with the cancellation of those notes.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, that is different from a political criticism.

Mr. HYNDMAN: I venture to say that if any farmer who desired a favourable adjustment of his debts approached any justice in Canada he would certainly not get anywhere with him; it would not have any influence on his decision.

Mr. DUNNING: No charge of political interference has ever come to my attention with respect to the adjudication of any board of review. I am bound to say that in fairness to all of them.

Mr. HYNDMAN: I agree with that, but the last speaker said this act was passed to secure votes, and I am saying that the president of the Liberal association of Carleton county told farmers that if they voted for Mr. Hepburn he would help them to get a favourable adjustment of their debts. Therefore I think there is as much politics with the present government, if there is any at the present time, as when the act was passed. And I know there is none.

I would like to see a change in the administration of this act. I would not like to see the act cancelled, but I am afraid that if it continues in force and we get decisions of the kind that have been given in some cases in the past we are going to ruin the credit of the farmers. I say in all sincerity that any farmer in the county of Carleton who has had an adjustment of his debts has destroyed his credit in any store or bank or anywhere else in the country. I have had experience with it through adjustments under this act and I have never said a word. I have had my own debts cancelled—

Mr. DUNNING: Oh no, no.

Mr. HYNDMAN: I have had accounts owing to me by farmers cancelled up to the extent of thousands of dollars.

Mr. DUNNING: That is better.

Mr. HYNDMAN: I have never complained of that.

Miss MACPHAIL: You have an indemnity.

Mr. HYNDMAN: Well, possibly that is the reason. I feel that if the government want to do something for the farmers of Canada—I have suggested this before, and the time is coming when they are going to have to do it—let them cancel all farm loan mortgages held by the government; cancel every one of them.

Mr. McCANN: Santa Claus.

Mr. HYNDMAN: No Santa Claus about it. The amount of money that was spent in the last by-election in Quebec, down in St. Henry, would cancel all the farm loan mortgages in that province, and that was just to fill up a hole down there. That is the only criticism I have to offer about the administration of the act; I maintain that it is destroying the credit of the farmers.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I should like to ask the minister a question. In view of the statements made by the hon. member for Rosthern, where an application was rejected by the board of review because the person did not qualify under the act as it now stands, and where amendments may be made to the act under which that person would qualify, would he then become eligible or would he not?

Mr. DUNNING: I would have answered the hon. member for Rosthern on that point if I could have done so. As, however, I indicated at the outset of my remarks to-day, I came prepared to give a certain amount of information on the act generally, but I rather expected, in deference to the wishes of a number of members who are not here, the kind of discussion that has occurred to-day to take place either on the second reading or in committee of the whole on the bill itself. Therefore I have not sufficient knowledge as to what the legal consequences of an amendment such as is now contemplated would be with respect to those who could not qualify prior to it. However, I shall give consideration to all the points which have been raised in this discussion and be ready, I hope, not to deal with everything which may be put forward but to give such information as is possible on the second reading or, more particularly, and perhaps more suitably, in committee of the whole on the bill itself.

I am more than gratified in connection with this thorny subject to find the very pleasant welcome which my efforts to deal at least partly with the situation have received at the hands of the committee. I expected quite a difficult time; I still expect it. I do not remember, in the course of a rather long administrative career, having had a more difficult piece of legislation to apply to the widely varied conditions of Canada than this Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Every member has spoken out of his knowledge of the circumstances affecting the people with whom he is individually familiar in his own district or his own province, and I am quite sure that every member in so speaking has done so with all sincerity and in all good faith. But to attempt to create a machine which will deal with all those varied conditions, or to attempt, as some members would, to set up conditions so that a board of review would have to do this in such and such a case or would have to do that in the other case, would be a very great task. You run immediately into the fact that conditions elsewhere demand different standards, and therefore you must have discretion on the part of your judicial body. The moment you commence to build regulatory fences around your judicial body, that in these circumstances you must do this and under those circumstances you must do the other, you run up against the tremendous variety of conditions existing from one end of this country to the other, and you cannot set up regulation which would be nationwide in its efficiency and scope.

All that you can do, Mr. Chairman, beyond what is now contained in the act, is to see first that there is a judge of the high court, which is one of the best guarantees of impartially from every point of view. When I say that, it does not mean that judges are perfect, but it is the best we can do, and then we must see to it that we associate with them men of high character in the capacity of debtors' representatives on the one hand and creditors' representatives on the other. From my experience, the more you surround that body with regulations the more difficult you make it for them to work out a solution for the individual farmer under the widely differing circumstances of agriculture from the rocky coast of Nova Scotia to Vancouver Island in the west.

Broadly, I am very well pleased with the reception that has been given the honest proposals, and of course I shall have to consider, when the bill reaches the committee, such other concrete suggestions as may be made for further amendments. The discussion this afternoon probably will give me an opportunity to present more information when the committee stage is reached. Possibly hon. members might now allow the resolution to pass and the bill to be introduced, so that they might study the matter we are talking about, thus making it a little easier to discuss it at the next stage.

Mr. DONNELLY: There is just one suggestion I want to make to the minister before we pass this resolution. I fully appreciate the position of the hon. member for Souris when he says that in his district the unsecured creditor receives no consideration whatever and that the secured creditor is the only one who receives consideration before the board of review. We have had two boards of review in Saskatchewan. Under one of these boards our situation was much the same as that mentioned by the hon. member for Souris. The secured creditor received every consideration; the unsecured creditor received none. At the present time we have a board of review that gives consideration not only to the secured creditor but to the unsecured creditor, and we find that the board is working very, very much more satisfactorily than it did before.

I am afraid, when the minister says he is going to set up two boards of review, that we may have one board giving one kind of decision and the other board giving the other kind of decision, and there will be no uniformity at all. I would ask the minister to consider the advisability, instead of setting up two boards of review, of making the present board very much larger, with six, seven or eight members, so that it may be divided up, with three men going to one place and three to another. The chief justice, or the man who is in charge, could look over all the decisions so that we would have some uniformity in the decisions given in each province, or at least in that of Saskatchewan.

Mr. DUNNING: With regard to the question raised by the hon. member I have before me, of course in great detail, the percentage reductions made by the boards of review in each province with respect to both secured and unsecured creditors. I know the hon. member for Wood Mountain will forgive me when I say that the figures do not quite bear out the full extent of his statements with regard to the relationship of the boards of review in Saskatchewan to the secured and unsecured creditors respectively. That is to say, there is an element of truth in what he says, but he has stated it rather more extremely than the figures would appear to justify.

With regard to the suggestion of the hon. member as to one board of review being divided into two, I must confess that I have given a great deal of consideration to that possibility. It would be quite beyond the physical capacity of one chairman to do what the hon. member suggests, virtually to act as chairman of two boards of review. I am assured by a number of chairmen of boards that the work is very taxing indeed. I appreciate the problem of getting uniformity of method as between boards. In the last two years, however, we have made considerable progress towards getting uniformity of methods as between the board of one province and the board of the neighbouring province, and surely, having succeeded thus far, we shall be able to get a reasonable degree of uniformity as between two boards in the same province when we appoint them. However, we shall discuss that point again.

I should like to come back to the remarks of the hon. member for Grey-Bruce. I have had time to ask a question as to just what the farm loan board did in Ontario in 1937, and I find that 515 individual farm loans were disbursed in that year to an amount of $1,033,000. That is not many, but it is 515.

Miss MACPHAIL: In my constituency alone 515 need loans.

Mr. STEWART: How many applications were made, as a result of which 515 loans were advanced?

Mr. DUNNING: I sent out hurriedly to get the information over the telephone.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to prolong the discussion, but may I say that generally speaking the board, operating under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, has performed a distinct and definite service to the farmers in Saskatchewan. I would approve of extending the number so that there would be two boards of review; even the suggestion of the hon. member for Wood Mountain might be worthy of consideration. I believe that would facilitate the hearing of cases now awaiting consideration.

The chairman of the board of review has laid out plans, principles and policies to which he has adhered during the term of his appointment, and he hears about five cases per day. On that basis it will take several years for him to dispose of the cases already before him. We approve, too, the suggestion that the term "creditors" should be amplified and defined and, likewise, that the benefits of the act be extended to cases of deceased persons.

We would like to have it made definitely certain that those who have had hearings before the board in 1934 or 1935 and who, for one reason or another, have not been able to live up to the terms of the orders made, should still have an opportunity of again appearing before the board.

However, I had something else in mind when I rose to speak. Residents of towns, cities and villages in Saskatchewan are dependent upon the prosperity of rural Saskatchewan. In fact, their livelihood depends upon the rural area. Where, as has been the experience of Saskatchewan, a great part of the province is adversely affected by drought, and where thousands of farmers find themselves unable to pay, residents in the cities, towns and villages have been the losers. This situation was recognized in Saskatchewan by a resolution passed by the Saskatchewan Legislative Assembly in 1937. The matter was made the subject of a petition in Regina. Some 13,000 individuals attached their signatures to the petition, and many others in urban centres have expressed themselves as being in accord with the suggestion that the principles of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act be extended to residents of cities, towns and villages.

There are many workmen, clerks and professional men of one kind or another who prior to 1930 invested in homes, but who to-day find themselves in such a position that they may lose those homes. The act does not apply to those thousands of people. It may well be said that in their cases voluntary adjustments would be the remedy or, in the alternative, that there should be bankruptcy. It is true that the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act are open to those individuals, but no trust company or trustee in bankruptcy will accept an estate which consists of a piece of property covered by a mortgage and subject to taxes.

In many urban centres taxing authorities have large claims against such properties, and many individuals know that they can hope for nothing in the future. They are about to lose their homes, either through the action of vendors under agreements for sale, or through the city taxing authorities, or through the mortgagee under the mortgage. This is a very real fear in the hearts and minds of many thousands of honest citizens who would pay if they possibly could, but who, under present circumstances and conditions, are losing heart. They find that the rate of interest continues at the rate which prevailed prior to 1928. I had an instance brought to my attention a few days ago with respect to a house purchased in 1928 for $7,500. Already $7,600 had been paid on it; the balance still owing on the property was $3,500, and the kind-hearted vendor under the agreement for sale offered to reduce the rate of interest from eight to six per cent. He was willing to do that only within the last few months. That experience could be multiplied in hundreds of instances.

I would ask the minister seriously to consider the absolute necessity, in so far as thousands of people are concerned—and I shall speak only for Saskatchewan—of extending the principle of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act to those men and women, in order that they may be assisted in saving their homes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 25, to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

Pensions Branch—Canadian pension commission—administration expenses, $534,330.

Mr. MacNEIL: Does the reduction in the estimate indicate any reduction in services to pensioners?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): No.

Mr. MacNEIL: What is the medical staff at the Shaughnessy hospital at Vancouver under the jurisdiction of the pension commission? Could we have their salaries and whether they are on full or part time? I should like to know also the names of consultants under the jurisdiction of the pension commission.

Mr. POWER: I shall give only those attached to the pension commission and not those attached to treatment or administration. They are:

Dr. J. W. Laing, medical officer, grade 4, $4,080.
Dr. B. F. Keillor, medical officer, grade 4, $4,120.

There was a Doctor G. A. Minorgan attached to that staff, but he has since been transferred so I shall not include him. The next is:

W. R. Congdon, pension clerk, $1,920.
J. Valentine, investigator, grade 2, $1,560.
T. J. McKenty, investigator, grade 1, $1,500.
M. Wallace, clerk, grade 3, $1,620.
W. Bloom, clerk, grade 2, $1,440.
Miss A. E. MacDonald, stenographer, grade 2, $1,380.
Miss G. M. Baxter, stenographer, grade 2, $1,380.
Miss E. G. Heney, stenographer, grade 2, $1,380.
Miss B. M. McCarthy, stenographer, grade 2, $1,320.

Mr. MacNEIL: Does the pension commission employ consultants at that point?

Mr. POWER: Occasionally we employ the services of consultants.

Mr. MacNEIL: Who is definitely in charge of pensions administrations?

Mr. POWER: Doctor Keillor.

Mr. MacNEIL: Would it be possible as a matter of administration to ensure that the medical pension authorities shall have the unrestricted right to secure the authorization of medical treatment when a pensioner requires it? As I understand it, the procedure now is that with a man on pension and requiring treatment, either for the disability for which he is pensioned or for a disability which has a bearing on his general health, the pension medical authority has no right to authorize treatment, it being necessary to refer the matter to the treatment branch of the department, and the man may or may not get treatment. I submit it would be a distinct advantage and probably remove any possible conflict between the two authorities if the medical men of the commission could of their own right indicate that a pensioner must have treatment. This is applicable especially to the neurological cases. The situation is far from being a happy one as a great deal of dissatisfaction exists with regard to treatment of neurological cases. Subsection 2 of section 28 of the act reads:

> When in the opinion of a medical neurological expert an applicant for pension or a pensioner has a disability which is purely functional or hysterical no pension shall be paid, but such member of the forces shall immediately be referred to a neurological centre for treatment.

I am advised that in a number of cases the treatment branch has refused to give the medical attention advocated by the pension medical authority. It may be a case where the pensioner comes under class 2 and would not receive pay and allowances, receiving simply comforts while an inmate of an institution. I should like the minister to do whatever is possible to clear up this point. The same thing might be said about dental treatment.

Mr. POWER: If a man is on class 2 treatment, as my hon. friend knows, he would continue to receive his pension and his family would receive relief if necessary. I understand the first part of my hon. friend's question was directed to whether or not the pension medical authorities had the right to order treatment. They have the right to order treatment for observation and they do so. In so far as I am aware, there has been no conflict between the two branches. My hon. friend quoted the section of the act which confers certain power on the pensions authorities with respect to neurological patients. I believe the terms of that section are carried out. I understand my hon. friend's complaint is that they do not receive pensions, not that they do not receive treatment.

Mr. MacNEIL: My information is that they do not always receive treatment; that that matter lies entirely in the discretion of the treatment branch. I am told that the medical officers of the department are not always in accord with the judgment of the pensions medical authorities and that sometimes treatment is not secured as indicated.

Mr. POWER: As far as I am aware, if treatment is required they get it. I do not know of any conflict such as my hon. friend mentions, although there may be some. He has stated that pensions were not allowed to certain neurological cases. He was a member of the committee of 1936 which requested that a board be set up to inquire into these cases and into the treatment of neurasthenic cases generally. That board was set up and, as my hon. friend knows, some kind of report was made. The report was tabled last year; I do not have it with me at the moment, but I can very easily get it.

Mr. MacNEIL: My point is that if the pensions medical authorities in their judgment considered treatment to be necessary and so recommended, that authority should be final without any question by the treatment branch. The pensioner should be taken into an institution and given all necessary treatment, quite apart from observation. I feel that if the minister and the officers of the department investigate this matter they will find that there have been instances where treatment has not been extended to a pensioner even though the pensions medical authorities considered it advisable.

Then I referred to dental treatment. As an example, an arrested tuberculosis case might be returned to his home, possibly some distance from the institution. The pensions authorities might say that this man should have dental treatment for the maintenance of his health, so that he might secure proper nutrition to avoid relapse. When that recommendation reaches the treatment branch they may say that dental treatment can be extended only in a departmental institution. I have before me a copy of the regulations governing this matter. The man may live a long way from the institution and he is thus automatically barred from treatment. As he is a class 2 patient the department assumes no responsibility for the expenses of the journey to and from an institution. If a man resided at Powell River in British Columbia, it might be more expensive for him to undertake a trip to the institution than to have the dental treatment done at home. I submit that the pensions authority is responsible for his health; it is in the public interest to see that his health is cared for as well as possible, and if they say that this man, in the interest of his health, requires dental treatment, there should be no option; the treatment branch should take the man in and give him dental treatment and provide for transportation expenses.

Mr. POWER: As far as I know that is done at the present time.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister give the committee the number of applications that have been made for pensions during the calendar years 1936 and 1937?

Mr. POWER: That would be, of applications to the pension commission and not to the quorum?

Mr. GREEN: If the minister does not have it for the calendar years, perhaps he could give it to us for the fiscal years.

Mr. POWER: I would not have it for this fiscal year, but I have it for the fiscal year 1936-37; it is in the annual report of the department for the year ended March 31. The number of applications up to this moment during the fiscal year 1937-38 would not be in my book, but I can very easily get the figures up to, let us say, December 31, 1937. I shall have that information for my hon. friend later on.

Mr. GREEN: It would be possible to give the number of applications for the two calendar years?

Mr. POWER: Oh, yes, we could get that readily enough. Pensions applications, April 1, 1936, to March 31, 1937, appear on page 64 of the report of the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. GREEN: For last year?

Mr. POWER: For last year. The applications are segregated into different groups, and if my hon. friend does not mind I shall give them as they appear in the report:

Nature of Application	Granted	Not granted	Total Applications	Dual decisions	Investigate
(a) Injury or disease	1,914	4,397	6,311	437	500
(b) Claims, I.D.S.	22	83	105	..	5
(c) Section 12	40	110	150	..	1
(d) Death.	414	1,603	2,017	..	51
(e) Retroactive pension	1,528	389	1,917	..	20
(f) Assessment.	292	285	577	..	103
(g) Claims disability not obvious.	15	4	19	..	..
Total	4,225	6,871	11,096	437	680

That was for the year April 1, 1936, to March 31, 1937. My hon. friend will understand that I have not the same information in anything like similar detail for the present year, but I can procure for him the number of applications filed with the pension commission from March 31, 1937 up to the last few days.

Mr. GREEN: The point I wanted to make is whether or not there is an increase in the applications for pensions.

Mr. POWER: I would think not. I am not able to say definitely whether the number of applications for pensions has increased or not. I could perhaps get at it in another way by telling the hon. member of the cases ready for hearing by the quorum, but I do not think that is what he wants.

Mr. GREEN: I want to find out whether there are more first applications coming in now than there were before.

[Mr. MacNeil.]

Mr. POWER: I can readily get that information, although I do not have it here, but I believe that generally speaking they must be falling off in some small degree.

Mr. GREEN: Could the minister give us a rough idea of the number of appeals from the Canadian pension commission to the quorum of the commission which is the second court so to speak?

Mr. POWER: That is, after first and second hearings?

Mr. GREEN: Yes.

Mr. POWER: I can say that the rate at which they are coming in now is about 150 to 200 a month, whereas a year ago there were about 500. There is a substantial falling off in the rate at which they are going up to the quorum. As to the number that were heard in the year from March 31, 1937 to date, I would have to get that information; I can procure it at any time.

Mr. GREEN: Well, the last fiscal year, that is the year ended March 31, 1937?

Mr. POWER: We have not that at the moment, but I shall get it.

Mr. MacNEIL: I now have the regulations issued in October, 1937, with regard to dental services. Those eligible to receive dental services at the expense of the department are:

Class 1. Ex-service men who require dental treatment for conditions accepted by the Canadian pension commission as the result of dental injuries or disease related to service.

Class 2. Ex-service men who are undergoing courses of medical or surgical treatment as in-patients in a hospital or sanatorium, certified by the specialists in charge of the case and notified to the C.M.O. "attention dental surgeon," to require dental attention as an essential part of the treatment occasioned by pensionable disabilities.

Class 3. Ex-service men receiving prolonged treatment in a departmental institution who are not eligible for dental treatment under the preceding provisions of this clause shall be given whatever dental attention the dental surgeon may certify to be absolutely necessary for their health and comfort.

Class 4. Ex-members of the Canadian expeditionary force who are hospitalized class 2, (P.C. 91).

As far as I can discover, the interpretation placed upon this is that it does not relate to those men requiring dental treatment in order to improve their general condition. They may not have had dental injuries on service, but in the opinion of the pensions medical authority dental attention would, for instance, assist in remedying other conditions for which they are receiving attention. My information is that in all cases they do not get that dental attention even if recommended by the medical authority. My point is that when the medical authority authorizes the treatment, there should be no question about treatment by the dental branch.

Mr. POWER: I can only repeat that I should like to be informed of any particular instance of that kind, because I am under the impression that when dental treatment is required it is given, and I do not know of any instance, although the hon. member may have one in mind, where the pension medical adviser stated that dental treatment would be of some use to an applicant or to a pensioner, that it was refused. If the hon. member has such an instance I should be glad to know of it. We have had considerable discussion with officers of the Canadian Legion with respect to dental treatment, and as far as I know this matter is all cleared up at the present time.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is the minister in a position to give assurance that when such recommendations are made by the pensions medical authority they will be carried out?

Mr. POWER: I do not know that I could give any general assurance except that the regulations under P.C. 91 are being carried out, and a little more, so far as the department is concerned. We are not sticking strictly to the letter of the regulations under P.C. 91; we are doing a good deal better than that. When the men go into hospitals for treatment, we see that they have mouth examination and that they get all the treatment necessary, even to the replacement of dentures.

Mr. MacNEIL: Does the minister's assurance apply to neurological cases?

Mr. POWER: I am not quite sure about them; but if my hon. friend is referring to the cases mentioned in the act, where the pension commission has the right to order treatment, the men get it. If, however, he is referring to instances where the patient himself thinks he is a neurological case and should have treatment, I think my hon. friend will agree that some medical authority ought to decide whether treatment is needed or not. In most cases one cannot depend upon what a neurasthenic man thinks about himself, but must have some medical authority to decide.

Mr. MacNEIL: In regard to disabilities in this category, I am not suggesting that action should be taken merely upon the request of the prospective pensioner, but as the minister is aware, there has been a distinct disagreement of opinion as to the policy of the chief neuro-psychiatrist.

Mr. POWER: But not as between him and any other medical man. As between the chief neuro-psychiatrist and my hon. friend, I admit there is a difference of opinion. I will say also that the board of experts gave an opinion which seemed to coincide largely with that of the chief neuro-psychiatrist of the department. I think my hon. friend will admit that, will he not?

Mr. MacNEIL: The position is very largely this, that since that board has issued its findings on this question, there is still more dissatisfaction. I do not know who was responsible for the selection of that board.

Mr. POWER: I think I am responsible for that, and if my hon. friend wants to discuss with me the members of the board and whether they are qualified or not, I think when I mentioned their names—and I could have them brought down in a moment—most hon. members would agree that these men are known as the very highest authorities in that particular field. I do not think my hon. friend will question that.

Mr. MacNEIL: I am referring to the pensions authorities at the moment. We have found that in dealing with these cases we have had very fair treatment from the chairman of the pension commission. He has dealt very fairly with some extremely difficult cases, and in a number of instances pensions have been restored or protected under the section of the act providing that where pension has been paid for five years continuously, and there has been no wilful misrepresentation, there shall be protection. I am seeking the assurance from the minister, as far as he is able to give it, that if the pensions medical authority indicates that treatment would assist these men and perhaps save a general break-down, and that sort of thing, treatment will be given by the treatment branch. With that assurance I would be satisfied.

Mr. POWER: Again I do not know of any conflict as between the two branches. I am informed that there is none as between the pensions medical men and the treatment medical men with respect to the particular class of cases to which my hon. friend refers.

In answer to my hon. friend who inquired as to the cases before the quorum, the situation as corrected to January 25, 1938, is that applications now ready for hearing before the quorum amount to 500. This is the smallest number of pensions claims awaiting local hearing in over fourteen years. Active claims in the hands of district pension advocates amount to 3,376, and this includes all cases in which a claim for entitlement to pension has been filed and action is under way. I have a note here which can be taken for what it is worth—it is only an estimate—that it is expected that fifty per cent of these cases will be settled by means of the 1936 procedure without recourse to local hearing. A great many now, when they have their case fully prepared and the precis is sent out to them, decide that it is not worth while prosecuting their claims any further.

Mr. GREEN: How many claims were granted and how many rejected by the quorum during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1937?

Mr. POWER: That will be found in the annual report for the year ended March 31, 1937. At page 65 it gives a summary of quorum decisions of the Canadian pension commission from April 1, 1936, to March 31, 1937, as follows:

Summary of Quorum Decisions of the Canadian Pension Commission, April 1, 1936, to March 31, 1937

Disability Applications—Entitlement

Nature of Applications	Results of Decisions
	Granted	Not granted	Listed for re-hearing; investigate	Totally withdrawn	No Jurisdiction	Total
(a) Injury or disease	673	3,089	973	20	2	4,757
(b) Death	36	455	123	2	....	616
(c) Section 12	....	7	1	....	....	8
(d) Claims incurred during service	23	143	33	1	....	200
Total	732	3,694	1,130	23	2	5,581

Mr. GREEN: What was the approximate percentage of claims granted by the pension commission, and the percentage granted by quorums of the pension commission?

Mr. POWER: The last time I inquired into that I was told, if I remember correctly—I can check up these figures—that the percentage granted on first and second hearings ran approximately between 16 and 20 per cent, but when it came to the quorum the percentage was very much lower. I did not get any definite figures on that. Of course, when they go still higher to the appeal court the percentage is infinitesimal.

Mr. GREEN: I suppose it is negligible.

Mr. POWER: Infinitesimal, I admit.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any reason why the quorums of the commission could not handle the appeal work now, with the reduced number of applications? After all, they are the bodies that actually see the men; the court of appeal does not see the men at all. If the quorums could handle the work, this might lead to a great deal more satisfaction.

Mr. POWER: I have no objection to discussing the whole appeal question, and if my hon. friend wants me to do so now I shall be very glad to. It is, I admit, a most interesting question.

As he knows, the appeal provisions were placed in the Pension Act largely for the protection and assistance of the soldiers. In my opinion—and I say this without any desire to offend anyone—those provisions were used by the crown to a greater extent perhaps than they should have been.

Mr. GREEN: And still are.

Mr. POWER: I think the appeals are now down to about thirty a year as compared with two or three thousand.

Mr. MUTCH: Is that thirty out of 13,379?

Mr. POWER: Appeals by the crown this year number, I think, about eighty. During one year, 1931 I believe, they amounted to some two thousand—perhaps that would cover 1931, 1932, 1933. That, I think, was consequent upon an abuse by counsel for the crown of their right to appeal. That is merely my own opinion; it is the opinion I had then and I still maintain it. A great many of those appeals by the crown were affirmed. Later on, under legislation in 1933, a reviewing officer was appointed and the effect of that was undoubtedly to stop this very large number of crown appeals. The reviewing officer handles all these appeals and recommends them. Neither the crown as such nor the department nor the minister nor anyone else has anything to do with the matter; the reviewing officer is entirely independent; he decides on his own judgment which decisions of the quorum should be appealed. At the present time appeals are very few.

In 1936, knowing that the appeal system had not worked to the satisfaction of ex-soldiers generally, I made a proposal in the house which would have had the effect of abolishing the appeal court and bringing about some such system as my hon. friend now suggests, that is, to have really a court of review in the pension commission.

Mr. GREEN: I am not necessarily suggesting it; I am asking about the present position.

Mr. POWER: I might as well tell the story chronologically. I do not think I have forgotten anything. That suggestion incorporated in proposed legislation was put before the committee, and the committee almost unanimously, at the instance of the returned soldiers themselves—I speak subject to correction, but I think almost every association was opposed to the combination of the appeal court with the pension commission—reported to the house that that particular section which I had introduced into the bill was not approved by the committee.

I understand that there is still an agitation for the abolition of the appeal court. I may say that within a very short time a great deal of the work of the appeal court will have disappeared. The claims now outstanding before the appeal court are only 380, and in 1936, when I suggested that the court be abolished, there were something like 2,300 or 2,500, well over 2,000 anyway. Now they are down to about 300. We are giving consideration, although the matter has not reached the stage of getting into legislative form, to the question of what is going to happen to this court when it no longer has any appeals before it. That is being considered on the ground alone of the expenditure of public money, without any relation to the number of applications which the appeal court saw fit to grant. It may be advisable to make some provision in the near future for the day when the appeal court will no longer serve any useful purpose. Of course it must be remembered that some of these appointments are for ten years, and provision would have to be made for appointees now holding positions in the court.

Mr. MacLENNAN: I suppose it may be that claimants are realizing that it is useless to appeal.

Mr. POWER: Perhaps my hon. friend is right. The system at present is: There is a first hearing; then there is further preparation and a further hearing before the commission; after that a quorum sits and sees the applicant and decides upon his case. By the time he has gone through that and not succeeded in getting entitlement he has probably come to the conclusion that it is not much use proceeding further. That may account for the small number of appeals more than anything else; I would not say definitely.

Mr. BETTS: Can the minister give the number of appeals by the crown and by the soldiers for the last fiscal year, and the result of them?

Mr. POWER: I find these figures in the summary of the work of the pension appeal court for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1937:

Decisions Rendered on Appeals

By applicants from pension tribunal decisions—
Allowed	0
Disallowed	122
		122
By applicants from decisions of the Canadian Pension Commission—
Allowed	9
Disallowed	105
Remitted	2
		116
By applicants from decisions of quorums of the commission—
Allowed on jurisdiction	5
Allowed	8
Disallowed on jurisdiction	1
Disallowed	2,171
Remitted	17
		2,202
By the crown from decisions of quorums of the commission—
Allowed	23
Allowed on jurisdiction	1
Disallowed	26
Disallowed, sec. 67 (3)	7
Disallowed on jurisdiction	1
Remitted	27
		85
		2,525

That is a total of eighty-five that the reviewing officer on behalf of the crown placed before the appeal court.

Mr. GREEN: That shows how very little chance there is for an applicant to succeed before the court of appeal. The crown seems to have a much higher batting average than the soldier applicant. I suggest that the time has come when we should abolish these appeals by the crown. After all, the soldier has won his case before the quorum, before the men who actually saw him; then he is faced with an appeal by the crown to a court sitting here in Ottawa, which does not see the man and has no chance to size him up; they can disallow that successful decision. I know of nothing that is more upsetting to the disabled returned men. I suggest that the time has now come when we should abolish these appeals by the crown. After all, they are very few, and very little money is involved. I think we might take that step at this time.

Mr. POWER: As the work is decreasing to such an extent that soon the appeal court may not be required, and one hon. member suggests that it be abolished, though such a course appears drastic, that might be the better suggestion.

Mr. GREEN: Well, the minister knows the position in the department and the facts; he is the one who must make the decision, but in any event I suggest that at this session we wipe out these crown appeals. They are most disturbing to the returned men.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. YOUNG: Are we on item No. 215 or No. 217?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We are on item No. 217.

Mr. POWER: There is an item relating to the appeal court, but I was so unsuccessful on the last occasion in my attempts to reform the House of Commons that I thought I had better not try.

Mr. MacNEIL: What are the present arrangements for quorum sittings in Vancouver?

Mr. POWER: There is a quorum there. Colonel Peck is, in fact, the only one. The system which we proposed to inaugurate in 1936 has perhaps not worked as well as we anticipated. There is only one quorum which has a base; that is the Vancouver quorum, and Colonel Peck has his chief office, if I may so call it, in that city.

Mr. MacNEIL: Who sits with Colonel Peck?

Mr. POWER: It varies; it is not always the same man. I am told that last time it was Colonel Riley.

Mr. GREEN: I do not know whether this is the proper place to raise the question of returned soldiers' insurance, but I cannot find it under any item. I wonder if the minister could give us a statement of the position in that regard. Quite a number of the soldiers who had this insurance, had, I understand, to let it lapse. Some of them are now in a position to pay the premiums, and I should like to know whether it would not be possible to put through some scheme whereby these men could now renew their policies.

Mr. POWER: I wish my hon. friend would talk to the Minister of Finance with regard to that matter. He has the administration of the returned soldiers' insurance. Does my hon. friend not think I have enough on my conscience without having that also?

Mr. GREEN: The minister is quite a lot nearer the ear of the Minister of Finance than I am.

Mr. POWER: Not at all.

Mr. BETTS: Would the minister explain why there is a substantial drop in transportation and travelling expenses, from $100,000 to $80,000?

Mr. POWER: Presumably that is due to the reduction in the number of commissioners. There was a reduction of four for a while, and there has been a reduction of three since the month of May. They have not travelled so much because there were not so many cases ready for hearing, and since the beginning of 1936 they have made an effort to clear up all cases, so in former years they had to travel more than in the last year. This also includes expenses of witnesses and applicants as well, and so there is a large reduction.

Item agreed to.

Pension appeal court, $44,630.

Mr. GREEN: This is the much talked of court of appeal, and I see they are getting an increase of $3,000 in their vote this year. How does the minister explain that?

Mr. POWER: The net increase is $2,781. The restoration of the five per cent cut accounts for $2,071; there are salary increases for some of the staff, amounting to $360, and there is an increase of $350 in sundries, which I assume is due to printing, perhaps one or two trips, and things of that sort. I should like to point out to the committee that the estimates were made up in a rather peculiar way this year, and I am not responsible for that. The comparison is made not with the appropriation of last year but with the vote in the main estimates of last year, and that vote did not include the five per cent which was restored to the civil servants. So it will be found on looking at all these votes that the addition of the five per cent will account for the increase which appears in very many of them. Really almost all the increases are accounted for by the five per cent restoration or by statutory increases, which, as hon. members know, are given to civil servants under certain conditions.

Mr. GREEN: If the court of appeal were dispensed with you would save all this money.

Mr. POWER: I suppose then the difficulty would be what to do with the members of the court. Presumably some provision would have to be made for them by way of pension or retiring allowance, and some provision also would have to be made for the staff. I would not like to be responsible for simply throwing the whole staff out on the street at the moment.

Mr. MULOCK: What is the unexpired term of the members of the court?

Mr. POWER: Mr. Justice J. D. Hyndman was appointed 19-1-31 by P.C. 108, dated 19-1-31; terminates January 18, 1941. Colonel L. P. Sherwood, V.D., was appointed 27-9-30 by P.C. 2268, dated 27-9-30; terminates September 26, 1940. Mr. E. R. Richard, LL.B., was appointed 1-10-33 by P.C. 1882, dated 16-9-33; terminates September 30, 1943. Doctor R. J. Kee was appointed 1-7-36 by P.C. 1659, dated 7-7-36; terminates July 6, 1946.

Mr. GREEN: I suppose there would be expansions in other branches of the department? For instance, in connection with the war veterans' allowance and unemployment assistance there might be a chance to take care of them?

Mr. POWER: That may be a very good suggestion.

Mr. MUTCH: Would the minister indicate what the effect of passing this particular item at this moment would be on the possibility of getting rid of this board within the next year?

Mr. POWER: I do not think it would have much effect. I would think this was one of those statutory-non-statutory provisions, because I think the statute calls for the payment of these salaries. I am not quite sure now, but I shall look up the Pension Act. I think it calls for the payment of certain salaries to the members of the court, and I do not know what we would do if the house refused to vote the salaries. The salaries would still be in the statute.

Mr. MUTCH: I should like to suggest to the minister that we could get many interesting suggestions from the soldiers themselves as to what to do with them.

Mr. LENNARD: Would the minister explain the considerable increase for temporary assistance?

Mr. POWER: With respect to temporary assistance the explanation is the same as I have already given. Under certain rulings of the treasury board it is impossible to make permanent more than eighty per cent of the members of any unit of the government. The remainder must stay temporary, though some of those who are temporary have been there for a number of years.

Mr. LENNARD: What would be the nature of this assistance?

Mr. POWER: They are clerks, stenographers and so on, all appointed by the civil service commission.

Mr. GREEN: Would the figures on page 75 of the report of the department for the fiscal year 1936-37, which show that there were fifty-three entitlements conceded by the appeal court and 2,472 not conceded, give a summary of the work of that court in so far as applications by the soldiers are concerned?

Mr. POWER: That is a summary covering all the decisions, is it not?

Mr. GREEN: That includes the cases the crown won also, does it?

Mr. POWER: I would say so.

Mr. MacNEIL: As the minister quite correctly stated, this matter was given careful consideration by the parliamentary committee of 1936, and at that time it was hoped that some steps might be taken, as was said then, to take some of the judicial starch out of the pension appeal court. A medical member was appointed to the court and certain amendments were made to the act, notably that requiring unanimous judgment with regard to appeals by the crown. Some improvement was noticeable, but in viewing the matter since then I would certainly advocate the abolition of the pension appeal court and, I would say to the minister, the sooner the better from every point of view, particularly that of the ex-service man. I believe if he took some such action it would receive the general support of ex-service men across Canada. The chief consideration is that the appeal court is functioning in such a way as to deprive ex-service men of that which they were assured of under the act, namely the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. POWER: The hon. member knows that the appeal court would not admit that.

Mr. MacNEIL: Probably not, but the minister is well aware that this body has completely forfeited the confidence of ex-service men. Representatives of the men no longer feel free to take their appeals with confidence to this court. That is a lamentable situation.

The court is functioning with all the rigidity and severity of the procedure of an exchequer court, and I say that procedure is not proper or just when dealing with pension cases. My point is that the quorum is the last court before which the applicant is given a personal hearing. The case is reviewed subsequently by a court before which he does not personally appear. The quorum, dealing with the case from the evidence before it, always has in the background the possibility of their decisions being questioned by the reviewing officer, and possibly reversed by the appeal court. There is a tendency, as we say in the vernacular, to pass the buck to the pension appeal court.

I am of the opinion that approximately twenty per cent of the cases before the appeal court, and disallowed, should have received the benefit of the doubt. However, the general attitude of the quorum has been not to take any chances on their decisions being reversed. Certainly the statistics show that, so far as appellants are concerned, the appeal to the court is a joke. The severity of the procedure works to the disadvantage of the appellant. Less than one per cent of the appeals are allowed, I am informed, although a higher percentage of appeals by the crown are allowed. I think if the minister wishes to make certain that the applicant gets the benefit of the doubt, particularly in the class of cases now under review, the earlier the appeal court is abolished the better for the appellants.

Suitable provision might be made for the retirement of members of the court and the staff, so that no hardship would result. I must point out, however, that the main consideration is that there must be more generous treatment in accordance, I believe, with the intention of parliament. I believe that more generous and sympathetic consideration must be given, certainly in connection with applications where the benefit of the doubt might be given.

Mr. POWER: I have before me now the summary of decisions to October 31, 1937, from the time the court started. Perhaps these figures will give a better picture of the situation than any explanation I could give the committee. The following table will give the figures in connection with appeals:

Appeals
By the crown	245
By commission counsel	2,947
By applicants	10,187
Total	13,379

I take it that appeals by the crown are appeals by the reviewing officer under the legislation of May, 1933. It would appear that he has taken 245 appeals on behalf of the crown. Perhaps that should satisfy the hon. member who has spoken, and should be stated in justice to the reviewing officer. The appeals by commission counsel were made during 1931, 1932 and up to May 1933 and, as will be noted, number 2,947. I said before that they were in the vicinity of 2,500, and I am now in a position to give the exact figure.

The following figures are those for entitlement:

Entitlement		Dual decisions
Conceded	1,282	7
Not conceded	12,001	89
Total	13,283	96

The following table gives the pension result of conceded appeals:

Pension Results of Conceded Appeals

	No.	Annual liability	Gratuity amount
In payment	1,041	$363,774	$2,675
Granted gratuities	39	....	....
No disability	156	....	....
Not eligible	21	....	....
Not yet assessed	16	....	....
Pre-dated	9	....	....
Total	1,282	$363,774	$2,675

The next table gives the classification of pensions in payment:

Classification of Pensions in Payment
Disability	950
Widows	84
Mothers	6
Children	1
Total	1,041

When these figures are set out in Hansard I believe they will give a complete picture of the activities of the pension appeal court, since its inception.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has not given the number of successful and unsuccessful appeals by the reviewing officer.

Mr. POWER: I believe I left those figures upstairs, but I shall give them to the hon. member later. I have the figures.

Mr. GREEN: The reviewing officer's percentage of wins has been far higher, all the way through.

Mr. POWER: No; from the figures I saw a few moments ago I would say that last year it was about fifty-fifty, if we include certain appeals by the crown which were disallowed on the ground of jurisdiction. I believe there were fourteen or fifteen of those. Then, there were cases remitted for further hearing. I believe there would be a little better than fifty-fifty in favour of the soldier, out of the total of 245.

Mr. GREEN: I mean the crown won about fifty per cent of their appeals.

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Whereas the soldier applicants won between five and ten per cent.

Mr. POWER: No; about fifty per cent of the crown appeals were decided upon favourably by the court, and the other fifty per cent decided in favour of the soldiers. I do not wish to be misunderstood in this connection. I am not speaking of those appeals by commission counsel.

Mr. GREEN: But appeals by the soldiers had an entirely different result. They were successful in very few cases.

Mr. POWER: The total, including those of the reviewing officer, stands at 1,282, as against 10,187. Roughly, it is better than the figure which has been mentioned on a number of occasions. I believe that soldiers generally have been speaking about something less than one per cent, whereas it is nearly ten per cent.

Mr. GREEN: According to the figure for the last fiscal year it works out to about two per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: I have had several occasions to take notice of appeals made by the government against the decisions of the pension commission. In most of those cases the persons concerned have wondered why the government should appeal from a body created by that government. It seems to me a most unusual proceeding to have a pension commission appointed by a government and, upon a decision being handed down by that commission, to have the government appeal from the decision of the body it has set up. Many people cannot understand why that should occur.

Mr. POWER: There were only eighty-five of those last year, and so they do not amount to much. However, I suppose the principle is that the commission is an independent body. The only reply to the hon. member is that as the government supplies advocates, doctors and every other convenience within its power to enable a man to prepare a case, government officials may think that at least they should have one officer who could say a word once in a while.

Mr. HEAPS: Why should the government appeal from a tribunal which it has appointed itself?

Mr. POWER: That happens quite frequently. The crown may appeal from a court set up by itself, such as an appeal from the exchequer court to the supreme court. In 1930, when this new machinery and set-up was established, it was considered by those of us who were working on the framing of a pension act and of creating this machinery, that unless the crown were given the same right of appeal from the decisions, there might be created in the minds of the judges or of the commissioners or of the members of the tribunal the idea that they were there to protect the crown. As a result they might not give the soldier the full benefit of the doubt to which he was entitled. Mistakes were made because the theory of the act was not clear. Prior to 1930 returned soldiers came before committees on many occasions and said that they did not want to deal with the Canadian pension commission because that commission was putting itself in the position of guardians of the treasury. Frankly, I think everybody agreed that many members of the commission probably took that attitude. In the new set-up it was decided that both sides would have a fair chance to talk. The soldier was given his lawyer at government expense and the crown had what was known as a commission counsel.

I believe abuses occurred, but I pleaded only one case before a tribunal myself. At that time I challenged the commission counsel to say something against the contention which I had been upholding in order that he might not sneak behind my back and go to appeal. He allowed judgment to be given in favour of my client and three months afterwards we were before the appeal court. I told him if he had anything to say to say it then; I wanted to settle the case then and there, but he did not say a word. It may be he had received instructions he should not have received, or it may be an attempt was being made to destroy the 1930 act. Whatever it was, the fact remains that in my opinion there were far too many appeals by crown counsel.

Mr. O'NEILL: In my opinion, there is one great stumbling block in front of the returned men. When a man applies for a pension he may be confronted with the fact that when he took his discharge from the army he was medically fit, according to his statement. Possibly less than two weeks after he was discharged he found out that was not so, and may have even gone to hospital. There are also those cases of men who were in certain lines of work before they went to war but who found out on their return that they were not medically fit to carry on the same work. They were forced to take inferior positions at lower rates of pay. These men are considered as being medically fit simply because they are able to work. A man, when he went to war, may have been in a job that paid $200 a month, but on his return finds that all he can do is work at a job that pays only $125 a month. Is there any way in which cases like this could be taken care of?

Mr. POWER: As a distinguished supporter of labour and labour causes, my hon. friend will, I think, agree that the principle laid down when this Pension Act was conceived was that a man with a disability should have that disability assessed according to his value in the ordinary labour market. That is to say, a lawyer who was earning $10,000, $15,000 or $20,000 a year before the war—there was the odd one—and was disabled, through the loss of his eyes, and prevented from carrying on his pre-war occupation, would have his pension assessed at 100 per cent on the basis of his value as a pick and shovel man in the ordinary labour market. His pension would not be computed on the basis of what he had been doing prior to the war. The people who framed this Pension Act felt that there had to be some basis upon which to work, and that is what they arrived at. Pensions are paid on the basis of a man's capacity to earn in the ordinary labour market. If he has lost an arm, then it is considered he is disabled to such a percentage as a pick and shovel man would be. No consideration has ever been given to a man's pre-war occupation.

Mr. O'NEILL: There is just one more observation I have to make. If that is what you pay a labouring man when he loses his value as a labourer, then a general should be paid on the same basis. When a general is awarded 100 per cent pension he should not be getting $400 a month as a pension, he ought to get $60 a month.

Mr. POWER: I did my best to please my hon. friend by taking away from the general who went to a hospital his general's pay; he no longer gets $700 a month plus $400 a month. In so far as the general scheme of pensions is concerned, this matter has been brought up time and again. Hon. members who have followed the discussion know that even if we took away the pensions to generals, colonels, majors and captains, took the pension away from all grades down to lieutenant, we would not increase by one per cent the pensions paid to the non-commissioned ranks. The annual report gives the number of the officer class receiving pensions.

Mr. FINN: Are the generals who were not injured in the war entitled to pensions of $7,000 or $8,000 a year?

Mr. POWER: I have nothing to do with that.

Mr. FINN: Who deals with that?

Mr. POWER: The Minister of National Defence.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

APPLICATION OF PROVISIONS OF CHINESE IMMIGRATION ACT, REVISED STATUTES, 1927, CHAPTER 95

The house resumed from Thursday, February 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Neill for the second reading of Bill No. 11, respecting Japanese immigration.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): I had not intended to participate in this debate, chiefly because my district of Parry Sound has no local and no immediate interest in Japanese immigration; but after listening to the impressive presentation of the bill by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), it was forced upon my judgment that this matter is not merely one of importance to British Columbia, but is indeed of national concern. Therefore let me say at once that I desire to discuss the subject from a national standpoint.

The district which I have the honour to represent has its own very special problems and difficulties which on this occasion it would not be proper for me to discuss. But I would not truly represent the innate loyalty and the sympathetic citizenship of my people if I did not voice to the hon. member who introduced this bill our understanding of the gravity of the situation which confronts, in this matter, his people in British Columbia. It can truly be said of provinces as of individuals that, when difficulties occur, friendship divides our sorrows and doubles our joys, and I would say to the hon. member who introduced the bill that the friendship of the district of Parry Sound towards the great province of British Columbia is, I believe, typical of the friendship of the entire province of Ontario in its sympathetic attitude towards this problem, although not many Ontario members have yet discussed the bill.

This debate has furnished, to my mind, an outstanding contribution to the tolerance, and forbearance of the different provinces of Canada and their representatives in this house, and their loyalty to the spirit of confederation at a time when, perhaps, as between provinces we may find it desirable to reinforce our loyalties. We have heard these grave issues put forward by nearly every hon. member from British Columbia, in such impressive language as to command our sympathy, but with a tolerance of expression which is a great and lasting evidence of the loyalty of the great mountain province to Canada and to the British Empire.

I am fully in accord with the principle of this bill. I am equally impressed with our obligation to refrain from choosing this time in our history to enact an exclusion bill against Japan. The figures given yesterday to the house by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) covering Japanese immigration under the existing agreement impressed me, as they must have impressed every hon. member, with the fact that Japan has kept, yes, better than kept, the agreement which she made with us, not only in the letter but in the spirit of her agreement. Eighty-one Japanese immigrants a year entered Canada during the past five years, when pursuant to the agreement they could have sent us 150 each year. Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I ask, Is this the time to pass an exclusion act against Japan, without having made any friendly approach to her to alter or revise our gentleman's agreement, without having said to her, "We find our agreement too onerous; we desire honourably to withdraw after a reasonable lapse of time?" Can you imagine the mother of parliaments, in the present plight of world affairs, taking such a course? What would be thought of us in London to-morrow were we to pass this bill to-night?

I am not one who believes that in fiscal matters, tariff matters or any other issues, we should slavishly follow the desires of the mother country unless we are assured that the interests of Canada prompt us so to do. We are growing up. We have attained a stature of power and privilege which a few years ago we did not enjoy. But therewith we have assumed an added responsibility. Remembering this, and weighing all the facts, is there any hon. member who would choose this time to pass an exclusion act against the Japanese? It has been demonstrated to my satisfaction by the Prime Minister, and beyond all doubt, that were we to pass this bill to-night, British Columbia to-morrow would be in no better position than it is under the agreement of to-day.

On the other side of the picture, what might the possible consequences be? Can we forget that if very serious consequences, consequences we hesitate to contemplate as even possible, resulted from our conduct in passing this bill, who would bear the brunt of trouble? Our courageous, loyal, much-beloved friends who live on the Pacific coast in British Columbia would undoubtedly bear the brunt if trouble ensued.

Mr. NEILL: We are bearing it now.

Mr. SLAGHT: Of course my hon. friend is right. They are bearing a burden now or the members of this house would not have felt such a sympathetic desire to help that province. But will the hon. member indicate to me any of the nine provinces which since confederation have not borne to some extent a special burden in the interests of the unity of Canada and the spirit of confederation?

I have mentioned the mother of parliaments. Can we be unmindful of the history of the past two years? Can we forget that crisis after crisis have arisen in Europe, in the Mediterranean, in India, in Egypt, and lastly in the orient, as to which those British statesmen who have been at the helm during that trying period have had to show great judgment and great forbearance, forbearance which at times, with our conception of the British flag and British traditions of the past, we have sometimes marvelled they were able to maintain? But with all the differences that might rightfully exist as to this incident or that and the course that has been followed in the motherland with reference to it, who is prepared to say, bearing in mind the conditions of armament and preparedness or the lack of it through the years, that in the main the sacrifices and forbearance which the British statesmen have shown have not been in the interests of the British Empire, including the interests of Canada? Then, Mr. Speaker, if that be so, if that be a reflection towards which we are entitled to direct our minds in a discussion of this problem let us, as my hon. friend across the floor did the other day, give testimony to our judgment and our own forbearance in this matter, which has in one sense an international or world aspect. Most great world conflicts, Mr. Speaker, if you go back in history, have been touched off by some incident in itself entirely insignificant as compared with the results that have followed.

The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) made, in my view, an extremely helpful contribution to this debate. He has declared that in its present form he will not vote for this bill. He suggested, in a desire, I believe, to be helpful, a possible solution, to the effect that we should pass this bill with the appropriate amendments which would prevent it from coming into operation until so proclaimed by the governor in council after a period of one year or some longer period. He suggested that that might meet the thought or feeling in the house that it would be dangerous to pass this bill in its present form. May I with the greatest respect for the right hon. gentleman, so far as his discussion of this problem is concerned, suggest to the house that that solution entirely overlooks the oriental attitude of mind. I do not think, if that course were followed, we could hope to mollify Japan by saying that for the next twelve months she might, under existing conditions, send 150 more of her nationals to Canada. That would not in any sense remove the sting contained in the passing of this bill.

We heard quoted by the Prime Minister yesterday an extract from a very much respected Japanese representative in 1924 with reference to the legislation which the United States was then putting into effect. What he said, in short, was: "It is not with Japan a question of expediency." Had he been discussing our bill he might have said: "It is not with Japan a question of twelve months more freedom to send 150 more of our nationals to enter Canada. No, it is a question of principle with Japan," this Japanese representative said. "It is a question of respect for our nation; it is the injury to our national pride which would follow." As Professor McKenzie puts it—I am not quoting him exactly, but this is in effect his conclusion that was quoted yesterday—the danger in exclusion lies in the mental attitude it provokes. Surely, Mr. Speaker, we know enough of Japanese pride and of the magnificent traits of a kind which that nation has evolved, her courage and her national pride, to realize that to permit 150 more of her nationals to enter this country within the next twelve months would be a sprat indeed if we attempted, as our conduct would imply, to use it as a solace for the injury to her national pride. If that be true, I believe that this discussion has literally been a good thing for the house and for Canada. I believe that from it we emerge with a fresh sense of our responsibility in present-day times, a fresh sense of our responsibility as a nation which arises from the greater power as a nation which we have of late years acquired.

Let me conclude with this thought, directed in the main to the hon. gentleman who so ably proposed this bill, and directed also to the members representing British Columbia whose special burden, he said, this is to bear, that the sunshine is stronger than the tempest and the storm, and there is always a far horizon for onward-looking men.

Mr. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, it might be asked why a member from an eastern constituency should wish to take part in this debate, but as has been so ably stated by my hon. friend the member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), this is a question which affects not only British Columbia but the whole Dominion of Canada. While at first sight it might appear that the citizens of the constituency of Stormont, which I have the honour to represent in this house, are not directly affected by the issues raised in this bill, they are from a national point of view affected, and it is from this angle that I desire to speak upon it.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, may I associate myself with the very wise remark made in the house yesterday by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) when he said that we should be most careful in our words upon this subject, that no word should be spoken which might be construed as an affront against any other nation. With that thought I am entirely in agreement, and I believe hon. members who have spoken have followed that advice.

I had the good fortune during the course of last year to make a trip to that beautiful province of British Columbia. Among the many things which I saw there, among the beauties of the province, without referring to them in any more specific manner, may I simply say that the city of Victoria with its beauty, the city of Vancouver with its tremendous possibilities, are sights which have remained in my mind.

But there is another thing which has remained in my mind, and that is the oriental question. I can quite sympathize with hon. members from British Columbia, because as travellers in that province, no matter where we went, whether in the hotel, in the theatre, in the restaurant, or as we went through the farms or along the coast where we saw what was going on in the fishing industry, we were struck with the magnificence of that province. I know I express the sentiments of hon. members when I say that our sympathy goes out to the people of British Columbia in respect to these burdens which they have to endure.

Unfortunately, while to them it may appear to be a question of a local nature, it is chiefly a question of an international nature, and one linked with the policy of Canada in international affairs. The international policy of Canada has been declared to be one of strict neutrality. With that policy I am heartily in accord. Some hon. members do not agree with that policy. There are also people and groups outside the house who disagree with it and who two years ago would have liked to see us impose sanctions against Italy. There are others who would like to see us take a stand with reference to the government in Spain. There are others who would like to see us impose a boycott on Japanese merchandise coming into this country. I saw the other day in a Montreal newspaper a picture of a street scene in Montreal depicting a parade organized and engineered in favour of a boycott of Japanese merchandise. Fortunately the authorities stopped the parade, and I believe that was a good thing from an international standpoint. I believe also that the same policy of neutrality which we put into effect as far as these other countries are concerned should be considered with reference to this bill. What would be the position of this country if we adopted this bill? It has been referred to as an exclusion act so far as Japanese are concerned. If we were to adopt the bill we should be going against our policy of strict neutrality. The act would be one which might be construed as hostile to Japan, and which in present conditions which are fraught with great danger might very well cause a great deal of trouble.

I believe that the proper solution is that suggested last evening by the Prime Minister when he spoke of conciliation and of agreements which had been entered into between this country and Japan. He referred to an agreement entered into in 1928, by which Japan undertook not to send more than 150 immigrants a year into this country. From 1929 to 1935 the average number of Japanese coming into this country was 100, and during the last five years the average was eighty-one. True, this does not take into account the number who entered from Japan surreptitiously, but it would be impossible even by the bill which is before us to-day to do away with that angle entirely. We have the assurance of the Prime Minister that various departments of the government are doing what they can to solve this difficulty.

I therefore say that I am in agreement with this bill in principle, but would suggest that this is a most inopportune time to pass it. I believe this is an inopportune time because of the seriousness of the international situation. I believe we can well look to Great Britain and the United States for an example so far as this is concerned. Neither of these countries has seen fit in the tense international situation through which we are passing to do anything which might be construed as hostile by the countries which are at war. I believe also that it would be inadvisable to have a division upon this bill at the present time. It is therefore my hope that the hon. member who presented this bill so well may now deem it wise to withdraw it.

Mr. V. J. POTTIER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): It was not my intention at first to speak on this bill. However as representing the other extreme of Canada geographically I think it fitting that I should make at least a few remarks on what, it seems to me, should be the broad Canadian view. The constituency which I have the honour to represent is situated at the extreme southeast corner of Canada, farthest away from the province to which this bill is of chief concern. The subject matter and the effect of the bill briefly are the exclusion of Japanese from Canada. I find on looking through Hansard for years gone by that this is an old topic; it has come up a number of times. I think it would be advisable to look back and see the reasons why a similar law was not passed on former occasions when the matter came up for consideration.

The last time that the Japanese question was discussed in full detail was in 1923. On that occasion the question before the house now was argued, very ably, by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). At page 1449 of Hansard for that year the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in a short sentence gave the reason why the Japanese should not be excluded at that date. In other words, in 1923 the house saw fit to refuse to pass this law. Therefore, unless conditions have changed; unless times are different; unless there is some reason for changing that view, I submit that we should follow the policy which was agreed upon and adopted at that time. I should like to quote from Hansard for 1923, at page 1449, where the then Prime Minister said:

> The Japanese government offered itself to restrict the number of persons coming into the country in accordance with arrangements which might be made between the government of Canada and the government of Japan.

This is the part I wish to emphasize:

> It was a matter, I think, mostly of national pride with the Japanese. They desired to preserve, in the face of the world at all events, the right of their citizens to go anywere—

That, Mr. Speaker, seems to have been the reason why at that time we did not see fit to exclude the Japanese from coming into Canada. As the Prime Minister stated, the Japanese were willing to fix the number of their nationals who could enter Canada. An agreement was later made, under which that number was limited to 150. If that is the only price we have to pay in order to avoid hurting the pride of Japan, particularly with world conditions as they are to-day, it appears to me that we should take the broad Canadian view and realize that by sacrificing that agreement and excluding the Japanese we would be offering an affront to that nation. It appears to me that this would be an inopportune time to take the drastic step contained in this bill and change the policy which has been followed up to the present time and which it was not thought wise to change in 1923, when conditions were entirely different. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni admits that the agreement in regard to the 150 Japanese was carried out. As I remember it, the Prime Minister, in referring to this matter last night, said that the Japanese who had come in under that agreement numbered one hundred or less annually.

If we pass this bill, in effect we are going to hurt the pride of Japan by saying, "We do not want you," or "We think we are better; we think we are superior." There is nothing that a man or a nation will resent as much as something which touches his or its national pride in that way. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni admitted in 1922 that we should not do anything which would interfere with the trade between Canada and Japan. That reference appears at page 1543 of Hansard for 1922. Perhaps the most eloquent words ever heard in the house were those used by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in closing the debate in 1922, when he was suggesting what should be the broad Canadian view. Those words appear at page 1547 of Hansard for that year, as follows:

> If this house accepts the resolution and the government enacts not only the necessary legislation indicated in the resolution but also the registration scheme I have already indicated, I believe we will to-night do a great thing for British Columbia, a great thing for Canada and a still greater thing for posterity. For I have a vision, sir, of a greater Canada, of a Canada far greater than that which our narrow vision and our limited ambitions to-day can realize.

I think if we passed this bill we would be doing just the opposite. I believe the broad Canadian view should be that we do nothing which, under existing conditions, would in any way hurt the national pride of Japan, as the Prime Minister of the day said in 1923.

Mr. J. A. GLEN (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, during the course of the debate on this bill it was admitted that while it directly and primarily affected British Columbia, yet there were in it implications which would affect the international policy of Canada. Therefore I thought the voice of Manitoba should be heard as well as that of British Columbia. I have taken the position that because of the implications contained in the bill any member, be he from Nova Scotia or from British Columbia, may take part in this debate without being accused of intrusion.

In his speech yesterday the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) made it abundantly clear, in explicit terms, which appear on page 567 of Hansard for yesterday, that this bill deals with a matter no longer concerning British Columbia only, but touching the life, hope, ambition and ideals of the whole Canadian people. He realized, he stated, and was fully alive to the probabilities involved in the passing of this bill and the danger that such action would be open possibly to a wrong construction and might place us in an invidious position in the eyes of the peoples of the world in our alleged endeavour to maintain neutrality. The right hon. gentleman made his position clear, as one would expect him to, and in doing so he followed the traditional British policy that where there is an issue before the house involving the safety of the realm, it must be considered without any partisan thought. The right hon. gentleman, speaking not only as the leader of a party but also as a citizen concerned with the welfare and safety of Canada, took that position. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) followed the same course. He has pointed out in this and many other debates, and throughout the country, that the first consideration and paramount concern in the mind of the government must be that it shall do nothing which might be a contributing factor to bringing Canada into a war.

Do hon. members realize what would be the enormity of our offence in passing this bill, which on the face of it is so innocuous and seemingly free from harm, if that action resulted in international misunderstandings and wrong interpretations? Everybody knows that parties in an international, national or personal conflict always seek the motives underlying any act which might have a bearing upon the conflict. What, I ask you, would be the reaction of Japan if we passed this bill? The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has made a presentation of the bill in that splendid manner we always expect from him, an expectation in which we are never disappointed. I say to him that despite all his arguments, convincing and earnest as he may be in his presentation, that which will be remembered and enlarged upon will not be his argument, but rather some words which may be taken from the context of his speech and which may have no bearing upon his argument at all. As all public men know, sometimes a single sentence is taken from the context, although that sentence may not convey the meaning of the arguments which have been adduced.

I say to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that I am satisfied that if this bill were to pass and Japan were to deal with it, the words used by him on page 556 of Hansard of yesterday would be the words to which they would direct their attention, and upon which they would form their judgment. These are the words of the hon. member:

> We will go to China and she will say: You want to trade with us, but why do you treat us so differently from the way you treat the Japanese? And what answer can we give? We shall then be in this position: Either we shall have to reinstate Chinese immigration, which is very undesirable, or under the pressure of China's population of four hundred millions and her soldiers, we shall have to put the Japanese back where I now seek to put them.
>
> If we are going to do it under pressure from China then, why not let us do it now with all the goodwill that comes from a free will act of justice? Let us do it now rather than under pressure later.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni says "Hear, hear." I think he must have missed the point I was trying to make, namely that these words will be taken from the context of his speech, and on that, if they got to a point of considering it, the decision would probably be made by Japan. His arguments would be of no avail.

Has anyone thought for a moment about how the passage of this bill will be considered by nations engaged in war, as they are at the present time? Would it not be considered as an unfriendly act towards Japan, and a breach of that neutrality which until now we have resolutely maintained? The answer of many would be that the Japanese would be wrong in so interpreting the bill. Possibly so; but I recall in this connection what is stated in the Monthly Summary of the Deliberations of the League of Nations. The Summary deals with the conflict between China and Japan in Volume XVII, No. 9, issued in September, 1927, and directs attention particularly to the underlying causes of the dispute. At page 197, following a report of a special committee, the assembly stated:

> The report analyses the official declarations in which the Chinese and Japanese governments have stated their attitude and policy since the beginning of operations, and concludes by asserting that the two countries take very different views as to the underlying grounds of the dispute, and as to the incident which led to the first outbreak of hostilities, but that the military operations carried on by Japan against China are out of all proportion to the incident that occasioned the conflict; that such action cannot possibly facilitate or promote the friendly cooperation between the two nations that Japanese statesmen have affirmed to be the aim of their policy; that it can be justified neither on the basis of existing legal instruments nor by the right of self-defence, and that it is in contravention of Japan's obligations under the Treaty of Washington of 1922 and under the Pact of Paris.

Despite the considered opinion of the assembly and despite the fact that the whole world believes that the Pekin incident was far too trivial to cause war, the battle and conflict still continue.

Following what I have just read we find this:

> In its second report, the subcommittee stated that the present situation in China was a matter of concern not only to the two states in conflict but, in a greater or less degree, to all states. Many powers were already directly affected in the lives of their nationals and in their material interests. But even more important was the interest which all states must feel in the restoration and maintenance of peace. It was the league's duty as well as its right to attempt to bring about a speedy restoration of peace in the far east, in accordance with existing obligations under the covenant and the treaties. It could not be admitted that the conflict could of right be settled only by direct methods between the Chinese and Japanese governments. On the contrary, any appropriate means by which peace might be reestablished, in conformity with the principles of the covenant and the provisions of existing treaties, must be examined. Even at this stage of the conflict, before considering other possibilities, further efforts must be made to secure the restoration of peace by agreement. The league could not lose sight of the fact that one party was not a member of the league and had, in relation to the work of the advisory committee, expressly declined to cooperate in political matters with the league.

The assembly realized, as all of us do, that the war might ultimately affect not only the two countries concerned but, in a greater or lesser degree, all states. I say that for that reason Canada must not supply the match to light the flame.

Every hon. member in the house, I am sure, has been assailed by individuals and organizations throughout Canada pressing them to take action or to enter protest against Japan. Among those who have approached me there have been men and women whom I would call pacifists. At all events they are men and women regarding whose peaceful inclinations there could not possibly be any doubt. They do not know exactly what they want or what should be done. All they say is that something should be done immediately. I have asked and now ask all of them this question: Do you realize what you are asking me to do? Do you realize that in the mind of every hon. member there lies the fear that some day, as a representative in parliament, he might be called upon to vote on an issue which might mean war? I have said to those people that I prayed to God that the day would never come when I would have to make such a decision.

Some say: Why not apply sanctions? I recall that in recent years sanctions were very much in vogue. I was reading not long ago an article written by Mr. Beverley Baxter, a member of parliament in London, whose contributions appear regularly in Maclean's magazine. I have not a copy of the publication before me, but I can recall vividly what he said in response to a person in Alberta who had written to him. This man referred to the fact that Great Britain had received many rebuffs in the Mediterranean during the Ethiopian controversy and that, generally speaking, she was in a decadent position. Mr. Baxter replied to the correspondent by pointing out two prominent facts in connection with the application of sanctions. First, when Britain asked France if she could have the use of French ports as naval bases in the event of war between Britain and Italy, France replied that at that time she was not satisfied that it was necessary to have a war with Italy. The other fact was that at the assembly of the league fifty-five nations had agreed to the application of sanctions; but when the sanctions were applied it was discovered that France and Britain, to their eternal credit, had lost out in trade operations with Italy, while many of the nations in the fifty-five which had agreed unanimously to apply sanctions had increased their trade, some doubling and others tripling their previous trade with Italy. The point I am trying to make is that when you shake the mailed fist as an answer to another nation's aspirations and hopes, then you invite retaliation.

We in Canada cannot afford to take any action that would affront Japan and that might be the subject of diplomatic negotiations. We should not take any action that would cause repercussions in trade in future years. It has been said that we have gone almost to the end of our patience with regard to this matter. I would point out again the patience shown by the old country statesmen in their handling of international complications. I stand sometimes in amazement at the forbearance which has been exercised by the British government, and particularly that exercised by Mr. Anthony Eden, the foreign secretary. Surely there was sufficient provocation in the methods adopted by Italy for any nation with red blood to fly to arms. Nevertheless Great Britain has stood for all this, and instead of there being conflict today in Europe, we have at least a state of neutrality.

I ask hon. members to look at the map of the world and consider the position of Australia. If it is true that Japan is seeking an outlet for her tremendous population, there is one country in the commonwealth which is more likely than any other to be subject to attack from the orient. That country is Australia. Australia is a vast continent, sparsely settled, with a climate suitable to orientals, and it is located just south of Japan and very easy of access. If Canada were to pass this bill and its implications were resented by Japan, the result might be the bringing of the British Commonwealth of Nations into the arena of possible war. We would be doing a disservice to Australia by contributing to a possible invasion of her shores.

When the people of Canada realize what war with all its horrors means, I do not think they will want their public men to take such action as may cause a breach of our relations with any other country. I do not say for one moment that British Columbia is not having trouble with the Japanese, but I do say that the latter part of the speech of the Prime Minister, where he referred to the efforts being made by his government in connection with surreptitious immigration, should be broadcast throughout the country and particularly throughout British Columbia. I know the situation in British Columbia fairly well as I am there nearly every year. I know the feelings of exasperation with which the people there view this problem, but this matter should be considered in the light of what has been said by the Prime Minister. He is reported on page 575 of Hansard of yesterday as follows:

> During the past few years and particularly of late the government has been investigating very carefully and fully the matter of surreptitious immigration into the country. As I have said, whether you have an exclusion act or you limit by agreement, there are bound to be efforts at entry on the part of those who wish to get into the country and who are not free to do so under existing arrangements. Those efforts may succeed in part; for although a country does its best in its administration of its laws, it is not possible entirely to frustrate such efforts. But the different departments of this government have been exercising a careful scrutiny of the whole situation, and in the light of recent developments, doing so to an extent that has not been attempted in the past.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, I beg to call your attention to the fact that "Blucher has arrived." It is nine o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

Pensions branch — pension appeal court, $44,630.

Mr. POWER: During the course of the discussion this afternoon a question was asked as to the number of appeals lodged by the reviewing officer. From the date of the appointment of the reviewing officer, which was some time in May, 1933, to January 1, 1938, the cases reviewed numbered 2,262 and those appealed, 294. That figure does not seem to coincide with that of 245 which I gave to-day; I am not quite sure about it. But that represents 294 out of 2,292. The crown appeals have been disposed of by the pension appeal court as follows: Withdrawn because no right to appeal, 17; crown appeals allowed, 72; remitted to commission, 87; crown appeals disallowed by decision, 77; crown appeals disallowed by section 67, 3; 1936 amendments, 23; awaiting decision, 18; total 294. Therefore, I was perhaps not quite within the mark. It would appear that only seventy-two of the 294 were allowed; that is to say, the crown won the decision in seventy-two cases. The remainder of the cases were otherwise disposed of.

Mr. BETTS: When the committee rose I was about to ask the minister whether, having regard to the fact that a very much higher percentage of the appeals of the crown succeed than of the appeals of the men, his opinion is that perhaps the court of appeal proceeds on a wrong basis in considering those appeals.

Mr. POWER: I could not say. I have not any idea. I do not know on what basis the court of appeal proceeds.

Mr. BETTS: Well, would the minister assume, having regard to the fact that one of the two parties succeeds in a great many more cases than the other, there may be something wrong in the principle?

Mr. POWER: At the present time, if the information which I have just read is exact, it would appear that my hon. friend's premises are not right, but that in the cases reviewed or placed before the appeal court by the reviewing officer a larger number were decided in favour of the soldier than were decided in favour of the crown—of these cases at any rate.

Mr. BETTS: Of these cases, yes. But if the minister will take the cases over a representative period, say—

Mr. POWER: Well, this is over the whole period.

Mr. BETTS: The whole period?

Mr. POWER: The whole period that the reviewing officer was functioning. I am speaking only of appeals made by the crown; I am not speaking of appeals made by the applicant. I do not want to lead my hon. friend into error.

Mr. BETTS: Perhaps I did not make my point clear. It is that, of all the appeals which come before the appeal court, whether by the crown or by the soldier, the crown succeeds in an overwhelmingly large proportion of the cases. The minister will grant that.

Mr. POWER: I do not know that I would go quite that far, because there are no longer any crown appeals except those taken by the reviewing officer. The appeals taken by the crown are no longer a factor—only 294 since May, 1933. I think my hon. friend will admit that that is not a very large number, and of that number only seventy-two, I think I said a moment ago, have been decided in favour of the crown.

Mr. BENNETT: Seventy-four.

Mr. POWER: No, seventy-two. So I do not think that is a factor in the discussion of the subject. Probably what my hon. friend is most anxious about are the appeals taken by the applicant against a decision rendered by the quorum. I am free to say that in those appeals the applicant has not had a very large number of favourable decisions. The latest figures which I have are those of a progress report made on January 31, 1938. It seems to cover the ground which we went over this afternoon, so it would not be of much use to repeat it. This is a report of an earlier date, covering December, 1937, which perhaps gives a better indication of the work done: Notices of intention to appeal filed on behalf of applicants from decision of pension tribunal, 2; from decision of quorum, 58; from decisions of Canadian pension commission, 6; appeals taken by the crown, 3. That is a total of sixty-nine new cases were placed, apparently, before the appeal court during the month of December. Decisions rendered on appeals by applicants from decision of quorum: Allowed, 2; disallowed, 102; remitted, 1. Appeals by applicants from decisions of Canadian pension commission: Allowed, 1; disallowed, 9; remitted, 1. Appeals by applicants from decisions of pension tribunal: Disallowed, 5. Appeals taken by the crown from decisions of quorum: Allowed, 1; disallowed, 1; disallowed under section 67 (3), 1; remitted, 2; a total of 5. Appeals finally disposed of during the month, 126. Leave by commission to entertain fresh application: Granted, 3; refused, 8. Leave to renew under section 21 of the Pension Act: Granted, none; refused, 3. Applications for compassionate pension or allowance under section 21: Granted, none; refused, none. That would be all the work; it would give a complete picture of the proceedings of the appeal court during the month of December, 1937.

Mr. BETTS: I think I can clarify my question if I put it in this way. The minister will grant that, if we consider all the occasions on which the soldier has come before the appeal court in the capacity of either appellant or respondent, there is no doubt that he has succeeded in an almost negligible number of cases; I think two per cent would be an outside estimate. Having regard to that, does the minister not feel that there is something radically wrong in the manner in which the appeal court deals with these cases?

Mr. POWER: I think it is a matter of appreciation and any hon. member of the committee can form an opinion from the figures which have been laid before him. Perhaps consideration should be given to a factor which I mentioned this afternoon, that by the time the cases reach the appeal court they have been pretty well combed over, and if the appellants have not been successful up to that time—and my hon. friend knows that the very largest number of cases heard by the appeal court have been through every other court—it may be rather difficult to establish entitlement by the time they get there.

Mr. YOUNG: I desire to bring to the attention of the minister and the committee a case in which I, along with the returned men and other citizens of Saskatoon, have been interested. It is the case of Mr. M. P. Morpurgo, deceased. This man was born in British Guiana. He came to Canada in 1912 and shortly thereafter to the city of Saskatoon. He was a man of very small stature, about five feet one or five feet two, and weighed about one hundred and twenty pounds; he was darker in complexion than, perhaps, any man in the house, but that, I trust, will not be held against him. He was in his own country a dentist, and in Saskatoon a dental mechanic. Although of very small stature he believed it was his duty to enlist, and did enlist in the year 1916. He performed no very glamorous or heroic act. He was never outside Canada; but he joined the forces, and I think everyone will admit that after he joined, his actions were directed not by himself but by his superior officers. If he did not get outside Canada, I trust again that no one will hold that against this soldier, but rather he is entitled to every consideration to which any other man who joined the army would be.

I cannot state that what caused his accident was anything very heroic. As everyone knows, as a soldier he was obliged to march, and in marching to wear the kind of boots and the kind of socks which our army supplies. He developed nothing very serious, merely a corn on his foot; that is all; but owing to some treatment given by himself or someone else the corn became infected. To make a long story short, his leg also became very badly infected, and finally, after some years of rigorous treatment by skilful medical and surgical men, the man had to lose his leg and wear thereafter an artificial limb.

His case for pension came before the pension commission, and he was granted a pension. One Sunday night, coming from church, about eight-thirty o'clock—it was a rainy night and the streets were dark compared with the ordinary night—as this man was crossing the street he was knocked down, had his skull fractured, and died a few hours afterwards.

His widow applied for pension. The case was heard before the pension commission in November and December, 1934, and pension was not granted. The case was heard again on April 4, 1935, and there was a disagreement on that occasion. Of the two commissioners who heard the case, one believed that the widow was not entitled to pension, and the other commissioner believed that she was. There is a provision in the act that in case of disagreement another member of the commission shall be asked to sit in on the case. In this particular case the acting chairman of the commission was asked to come in. The acting chairman at that time was Mr Justice Taylor, of the Manitoba court of king's bench. Knowing that there had been a good deal of confusion and disagreement in the case, he reviewed it very, very carefully, and after reviewing it very, very carefully he was of the opinion that the widow was entitled to pension. So now the decision had become two to one in favour of the pension being granted to the widow.

But we have a reviewing officer, apparently, for the Department of Pensions and National Health, whose duty it is to review all these cases. Having reviewed this particular case he came to the conclusion that the evidence was not convincing enough. I take it that if we have a reviewing officer he must keep on reviewing, or there would be no use for a reviewing officer. This case was heard in March, 1936, by the president of the pension appeal court and one other member. On that occasion I was present and I must say that I was greatly impressed with the extreme formality which I saw in that room that day. This court—I hate the name of court in connection with this—did not sit on the same level as the lawyers engaged in the case; it had to have its bench somewhat elevated. The greatest formality was exercised in addressing this pension appeal court. There was one man hired by the crown, a lawyer, prosecuting the case, and another man hired by the government, defending. It seemed more like being in a court of law than anything else I know. So far as formality is concerned in our ordinary courts, that is the proper thing. I believe it is one of the things which make for that high regard which we all have for our courts, and it has contributed to the excellent record they have established. But in cases of this kind I must say that personally I disagree with the form and set-up which I saw, and with the extreme formality in conducting the case. The case was heard in the month of May, 1936. After it was heard, there was no judgment given for some time. I sent communications on different occasions asking that a decision be rendered by this court, and I was finally told that owing to certain legislation which had been passed by this house, they thought there might be some advantage in rehearing the case by a third member of the court. This third member was added; the case apparently was reheard, and after the rehearing in the month of September, no decision was rendered until about the middle or later of the month of December. I am going to read part of the judgment which was given in that case by Mr. Richard:

This is an appeal by the crown from a majority decision of a quorum of the commission ruling death due to fracture of the skull attributable to service.

The evidence discloses that the late Mr. Morpurgo was pensioned for the loss of a leg which had been amputated in 1929 or 1930, above the thigh, and that he had been furnished, by the department, with an artificial limb; that on account of his artificial limb, his freedom of movement was somewhat curtailed; in fact, that sometimes his limb would stiffen or lock, in which case he would have to stop and make adjustments in order to get the limb working properly again; that about 8.30 p.m. in the latter part of September, 1934, the deceased, while crossing a street in Saskatoon, was hit by a motor car and died the next day as a result of a fracture of the skull sustained in the collision. The driver of the car swore that he never saw the deceased prior to the car striking him. One witness testified before the coroner's inquest that the deceased looked in the direction from which the car was coming just before or as he left the curb to start across the street. Another witness said that just as he was hit, he turned and saw the car. There is evidence that the car was travelling slowly at the time of, and just prior to, the collision. There is no evidence that it was travelling at an unreasonable rate of speed.

To hold that death, due to fracture of the skull, was attributable to service, one must necessarily find an absence of negligence on the part of the deceased and of the driver of the car, and, more important still, one must find that but for the deceased's artificial limb, the collision would not have taken place. The fact that the driver of the car did not see the deceased prior to the collision is, in itself, some evidence of negligence on the part of the driver, or, if not some evidence of negligence, is ground for inferring negligence on his part, as no explanation appears in the evidence to account for his failure to see the deceased prior to the car striking him.

There is no positive evidence of negligence on the part of the deceased. There is, likewise, no evidence that on the evening in question, his limb was not working properly, or that he had at any time to stop and make any adjustment to it. In fact, there is no evidence to establish or provide a basis upon which it may be reasonably inferred that the artificial limb contributed in any way to the collision. To hold that it did is to base the conclusion on pure conjecture. It is a matter of common knowledge that people with sound limbs are being run down every day on our streets.

In my opinion, the evidence does not establish that death due to fracture of the skull was attributable to service. I would allow this appeal.

The president of the court said:

I agree with the conclusion arrived at by my colleague, Mr. Richard, who would allow this appeal, and merely wish to add that in order to succeed in a claim for pension in respect of the death of an ex-soldier it must be established that the death was attributable to service. Section 11 (1) of the Pension Act reads as follows:

"In respect of military service rendered during the war,

(a) pension shall be awarded to or in respect of members of the forces who have suffered disability in accordance with the rates set out in schedule A of this act, and in respect of members of the forces who have died, in accordance with the rates set out in schedule B of this act, when the injury or disease or aggravation thereof resulting in disability or death in respect of which the application for pension is made was attributable to or was incurred during such military service."

In conjunction with section 11 there must also be read section 73, which is as follows:

"Notwithstanding anything in this act, on any application for pension the applicant shall be entitled to the benefit of the doubt, which shall mean that it shall not be necessary for him to adduce conclusive proof of his right to the pension applied for, but the body adjudicating on the claim shall be entitled to draw and shall draw from all the circumstances of the case, the evidence adduced and medical opinions, all reasonable inferences in favour of the applicant." Shortly after this court came into operation the following interpretation was put upon this latter section:

At this point I should like to draw to the attention of hon. members this interpretation, which personally I had never heard of until I found it in this document:

Proof or evidence of the fact must be of the same general nature as is required in a court of law, as, for instance, in a damage action for injuries or death. The method of proof might justifiably be more elastic but the proof must be positive and not left to mere conjecture, suspicion or surmise. It may happen that on a consideration of the whole case the evidence may preponderate as against the applicant, but while he would in that case probably fail in a court of law, it was intended by parliament (section 73) that notwithstanding the weight of evidence against him the applicant should succeed, but always provided a prima facie case at least is established or made in the first place, and if on the balance of the two a real and substantial, but not a fantastic, doubt in his favour is left in the minds of the tribunal or court.

Then he goes on to say:

Since this interpretation was given by the court there have been several amendments to

The Pension Act, as well as two parliamentary committees, and parliament, which must be presumed to have known of this interpretation, did not see fit to in any way amend either section 11 or section 73. We have stated time and time again that in order to raise a reasonable doubt, as contemplated by section 73 of The Pension Act, there must be some facts established from which such reasonable doubt can be inferred.

In the case before us we have nothing whatsoever in the way of facts from which we could infer that it was the deceased's inability to move his leg which caused the unfortunate accident, but on the contrary we could reasonably say that it was due to some negligence on the part of the motor car driver. That, however, does not assist the claim.

To my mind the whole case is one of pure surmise, guess, or conjecture, which, as above stated, cannot be regarded as proof. With regret, therefore, I would allow the appeal.

Now, what is the evidence in this case? The evidence is that this man was crossing Second avenue, our busiest thoroughfare, from the east side to the west. It was a night on which it had been raining, and was rather dark. Anyone driving in that city as I have done for the last number of years will know that on such a night as that it is very difficult even to know whether your own lights are on, and the light round about is not very bright. The driver of this motor car was going north on Second avenue; he was passed by a street car. At the south part of the intersection there is a safety island. The street car stopped, and again he passed that street car and slowed down, as he says in the evidence, which is corroborated, almost to a standstill. He started up from that point and his own evidence is that he was going at the rate of eight miles an hour. Two girls who were crossing the street at the same time and who said they are accustomed to driving cars say he was going at a speed not greater than from ten to fifteen miles an hour. He was asked whether or not he was attending to his business and looking straight ahead, and he said, "I had both hands on the wheel, I was looking straight ahead and I did not see this man."

The evidence further is that the man left the curb on the east side of the street walking towards the west, the girls walking the other way. They met him eight feet from the curb and they say that at that point he was looking south, and that they, following his example, also looked south and saw the car some distance down the street. The man kept on and the evidence further is that when found he was lying with his head north; one man says the head was on the east rail of the east street car track. The evidence also says that this man was hit by the left fender of the car. I might say further that the evidence of many people is that he had to walk with a swinging motion of his left leg which impeded his movements at all times. We have the further evidence of his wife that during his last month or two this leg was known to lock on different occasions.

Then, how far did he get? He was going across the street until he came to the street car track and at that point he was hit by the left side of the car. Had he been just one foot further across the street he would not have been hit by this car. The judgment which I have before me says that there is no evidence to show that he might not have been hit except for some negligence on his own part. It also presumes that the driver of the car is the man guilty of the accident. Well, the evidence is that this man in that car was driving at a very careful rate of speed, according to his own evidence eight miles an hour, and the greatest speed suggested by any witness is from ten to fifteen miles an hour; further, that he was looking in the direction in which he was travelling and had both hands on the wheel.

I call the attention of the committee to the fact that if this benefit of the doubt clause means anything at all, surely this is a case in which it should have been construed in favour of the applicant and not against him. There is not an hon. member of the house but will recognize that a man with that kind of artificial leg cannot walk as quickly as a man not so handicapped, and consequently when some danger is in front of him he simply cannot get out of the way as he could if he had two good legs. Is there any hon. member who believes that this man could not have made that extra foot if he had not been impeded by the artificial leg? I ask that in all seriousness.

Personally I did not know this man, but I have taken a great deal of trouble to inquire from our own officials in this department in our own city. They felt very keenly about it; they have made representations. I have talked to the doctors who looked after him; I have talked to many returned soldiers who knew him intimately and knew the difficulty he had in walking, and their unanimous opinion is that he would have been perfectly clear and safe but for the fact of his having an artificial leg.

A minister of the crown came to me one day and said, "What have you been saying about the president of the pension appeal court?" I said, "I don't know that I said anything very much." "Well," he said, "he came to me to say, 'Have I to stand all this abuse when I am protecting the treasury?'" That was the Minister of Finance who came to me in a very kindly spirit. He has known me for a number of years, and he was not really trying to protect the treasury, but he thought I might have been saying something about the president of the appeal court and asked me about the circumstances. Apparently great exception was taken by the president to a letter which I had written, and which contained the alleged abuse. I propose to read this letter in order that it may be on the record. It is addressed to the president of the pension appeal court, and is as follows:

Saskatoon,
December 21, 1936.

Mr. Justice Hyndman,
Pension Appeal Court,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Sir:

Re: $205 M. P. Morpurgo, deceased

I thank you for your letter of the 17th instant re the above case. I am very sorry indeed to learn of this decision. It is needless to say I disagree entirely with the decision. The judgment seems to be based on very fine legal technicalities. I cannot help observing that this was passed by the quorum, by a majority of two to one, one member of which was also a judge of the court of king's bench.

Persons here who are acquainted with the whole situation are unanimous that the pension should be granted. By this I mean that all those who spoke to me, and to whom I spoke, consisting of a fairly respectable number, are of this opinion.

The meaning of the legislation giving the benefit of the doubt would not appear to have very much significance. What we really require is more in the way of real justice and less in the way of legal technicalities.

One statement you made during the discussion of the case, when I was present, deserves more than passing notice. It was that if this case were granted it would cost the country $20,000 and that was a lot of money. I respectfully suggest that that was a highly improper remark to make. Whether it would cost $20,000 or more, or less, should not have been a thought coming into the mind of one giving judicial decision on the merit of the application.

I wish to thank you for your personal courtesies for keeping me advised from time to time regarding this case.

Wishing you the compliments of the season—

That is signed by myself. I do not know whether it would be considered the gross abuse that he was referring to if he had in mind my mentioning the remark which he made in my presence when that case was being heard. To me it seemed a very improper remark to make, to say, "If I grant this pension it will cost $20,000, and that is a lot of money." I do not believe it is any part of the duty of any court to take into consideration whether a judgment will cost $20,000 or more or less, or to have anything whatever to do with the amount of money involved. That is up to the parliament of Canada; that has been settled by an act which has been placed in our statute books, and the only thing the court should be interested in is whether or not the applicant is entitled to a pension. I have a letter also from the president of the appeal court, dated December 17:

I must apologize for not replying to your letter of December 8th before this, but for various reasons I did not get around to it.

With regard to this case, I may say that at the time it was argued, we were all unanimously of the view that no claim for pension had been established, that is, that there was no proof, in the sense of the Pension Act, that the death of the ex-soldier was attributable to service. To say that his death occurred as a result of his inability to escape from the oncoming motor car, because of his leg condition, is a pure guess and conjecture only, and not proof in any sense of that term.

In fact, it would appear that the responsibility, prima facie at least, must rest on the driver of the car. This is the law of Saskatchewan and the motor vehicles act raises a presumption in law that the motor car driver is liable for injuries to pedestrians, in the absence of proof that he was not negligent. Apart altogether, however, from this statutory presumption, it would appear that the motor car operator in this case was to blame, and he admitted that he never saw the deceased and did not know what he struck. It would seem most peculiar that a motorist at the locality of the accident, which was well lighted, and if he had his lights properly on, did not see the deceased. If the accident was caused by negligence on the part of the motor car operator, then it was not due to any fault or disability in the deceased himself.

I may add, for your own information, that the delay in giving judgment was with the object of endeavouring to make sure that we were not wrong in our view, and to make doubly sure if possible, we discussed the case with several judges of the highest courts in different parts of Canada, whom we happened to have the privilege of meeting in Ottawa—one of them being a very able chief justice, and there was complete unanimity that the claim could not be established.

I realize how much in need the widow is and it would have been a matter of great pleasure to be able to come to the opposite conclusion, but we are bound by the Pension Act and, as you know, unless soldiers can bring themselves within the terms of that act, it is impossible to grant a favourable award.

Again regretting very much indeed our inability to assist this widow, and wishing you the compliments of the season, believe me—

That is signed by the president. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to make two or three observations. In the first place, this application was heard by a pension tribunal, and was refused. New evidence was adduced; the application was heard again by two commissioners, and there was disagreement. The chairman of the court, a justice of the court of king's bench in Manitoba, was called in, under the terms of the act. I believe he was an able man. He was once the leader of the Conservative party in Manitoba, and I take it that able men are selected to lead that party; I assume that statement would be agreed to by hon. gentlemen opposite at all events. In any case I am prepared to say that a careful selection was made in the appointment of this gentleman to the bench. He gave careful consideration to this case and he was of the opinion that the pension should be granted.

Now I come to this last letter, in which I find what is to me at least an extraordinary thing. Apparently before the members of the appeal court made up their minds they went out and consulted judges of other courts, who never saw the witnesses, probably never read the evidence and only heard a review of the case as given by the president of the appeal court. I am wondering whether or not it was the judges who had no right to any say in this matter who influenced the judgment of the appeal court.

It has been said that a great deal of conjecture entered into the matter. Is it mere conjecture when a man, wearing an artificial limb, crosses a street on a night such as that, and has only a few inches left to go? If he had two good legs he could have made that last little distance, which certainly was not more than a foot. Am I to believe that the benefit of the doubt means anything whatever in this case? I want to put on record a few figures which I obtained the other day from the department, which may settle some of the questions raised by some of my hon. friends to-night:

Herewith is certain statistical information relating to the operations of the pension appeal court which was asked for this morning by Dr. A. MacG. Young, M.P.

Appeals by applicants from unfavourable decisions of the pension tribunal, Canadian Pension Commission or a quorum of the commission:

1. Applicants' appeals allowed during the calendar year 1936	27
2. Applicants' appeals disallowed during the calendar year 1936	2,291
3. Applicants' appeals allowed during the calendar year 1937	16
4. Applicants' appeals disallowed during the calendar year 1937	2,490

Appeals by the Crown from decisions of a quorum of the commission in favour of the applicant:

1. Crown appeals allowed during the calendar year 1936	16
2. Crown appeals disallowed during the calendar year 1936	32
3. Crown appeals allowed during the calendar year 1937	23
4. Crown appeals disallowed during the calendar year 1937	43

The foregoing figures have reference only to appeals which were finally disposed of during the calendar years 1936 and 1937. They do not include cases which were remitted for further consideration, applications for leave to reopen, and other miscellaneous references to the court. The gist of the statement is that during the two year period mentioned a total of 4,938 appeals were disposed of by the pension appeal court. Of these 118 were resolved in favour of the applicants, and 4,820 against the applicants. The number of applications resolved in favour of the applicants by courts of the Canadian Pension Commission during the two year period covered by this report was 1,266. It will be observed that the crown lodged appeals in only 114 of these cases and that of these 114 cases, 75 were resolved by the crown in favour of the applicant.

We have heard a great deal to-night about whether or not this pension appeal board was rendering service. I would say to the committee that if the decisions were given, as I believe they were in this case, on strict legal technicalities, where the soldier's widow did not receive the benefit of the doubt, this will explain why it was almost useless for an applicant to bring his case before the appeal court. I am satisfied myself, from what I have seen in the court itself, and from the records which I have seen, that the pension appeal court is not serving a useful purpose for the returned soldiers of this country.

I want to say, further, that once a pension is granted by a quorum of a commission, so far as I am concerned I believe that pensioner is entitled to get the pension, without the crown employing counsel to find some way whereby the pension may be set aside. I am definitely opposed—I have said this outside and I want to say it in this chamber where I can be heard by all—I am definitely opposed to the crown taking appeals from the decisions of the pension commission where the applicant has received a favourable decision. A soldier takes a great deal of trouble to present his evidence, and may get a favourable decision from the quorum. We then employ men to take from the soldiers that which our own appointed quorum gave to them. There is something wrong with that system. I am just as satisfied that in this particular case justice was not done as that I am standing in my place in the house.

I would rather take the opinions of those good returned men, and others in that city who knew the man well, who knew the conditions in the city on that night, and who knew the circumstances of the whole case intimately. They are unanimously of the opinion that the widow was entitled to that pension. I would rather take their verdict than a judgment of the pension appeal court. I do not believe in all the formalities which we have. Perhaps there may be some use for an appeal court, but the figures I have given to-night would lead me to conclude that there is not very much reason why we should have an appeal court or why we should continue having one.

I do not wish to say anything unfriendly with regard to the personnel of the court. I believe that their point of view is not right. Perhaps I should not say this, but I do say it most kindly, that Mr. Justice Taylor was himself a returned soldier and a judge of the court. The president of the appeal court, a former judge of Alberta, is not a returned soldier. The same is true of Mr. Richard; he is not a returned soldier. I do not know whether those men look at the problem in quite the same light. I would not like to be unfair and to say that they do not, but I merely mention the point.

I do know this, that the judgment of those who intimately know the case in Saskatoon, and the judgment of those men in Saskatoon who have been trying to be fair, would be at least to me of more value and carry more weight than the judgment of the pension appeal court. I have often heard the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and other hon. members say that where there is a wrong there must be a remedy. I believe that in this case there is a wrong. I appeal to the minister and to the committee to find some way whereby this widow, who is in great need, will be given the pension which I believe she deserves.

Why was there all this delay from May until December? Why go to other judges to find out their opinions, if it was a clear case, where there was no doubt? I ask that in all sincerity. More than that, a skilled judge in the quorum was of the opinion that there was a good case. There was some doubt at least in the minds of some. I say that under the act passed by parliament, which act I claim was misinterpreted by the pension appeal court, the widow did not get the benefit of the doubt.

Once more, before I sit down, I am going to ask the minister to give consideration to this case and, if there is any way possible, to see to it that justice is done and that she gets her pension.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Chairman, the facts as related by the hon. member are, I believe, substantially as disclosed by the file. The application received a great deal of consideration from the different bodies set up to deal with pension applications. I believe the hon. member gave all the facts, in so far as they are available, to the committee.

On November 13, 1934, the Canadian pension commission decided that death was not related to service. On December 18, 1934, the Canadian pension commission decided that additional evidence does not alter the former decision. On April 4, 1935, the application was heard by a quorum of the Canadian pension commission, commissioners Jones and Gray. A disagreement resulted, Commissioner Jones finding that the accident was consequential upon the pensionable disability, and Doctor Gray finding that death was due to an accident which was in no way associated with the service disability.

On February 8, 1936, pursuant to the statutory provision with regard to a disagreement between two members of a quorum of the commission, the case was referred to a third member and was considered personally by the acting chairman of the commission, Hon. Mr. Justice Taylor, who concurred with Commissioner Jones and found that the soldier's death was attributable to his service.

On March 6, 1936, the reviewing officer did not concur in the finding of the quorum of the commission and directed that an appeal be lodged on behalf of the crown. Among other reasons the reviewing officer gave these for appealing the decision:

> It is considered that the reasons given by the members of the quorum, who are of the opinion that death was attributable to service, are not convincing, are to a considerable extent based on conjecture and are not corroborated by the evidence given at the coroner's inquest.
>
> It is further considered that, as entitlement decision in this case depends almost entirely upon a correct appreciation and interpretation of the evidence before the inquest as to the details of the accident, it is advisable that this claim should be completely considered by the pension appeal court, particularly in this respect, and before any final decision as to entitlement in respect of death is given.

On December 22, 1936, there was a judgment of the pension appeal court in which Mr. Justice Hyndman set forth his reasons and Mr. Richard also gave his reasons. I do not think the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) or any other hon. member will ask me to express an opinion as to the value of a judgment rendered by the appeal court. I cannot do that. I am not in a position to do it. I have not the facts before me, and I do not think hon. members, other than the hon. member who has just spoken, have sufficient knowledge of the facts to render any judgment.

Mr. BENNETT: And this is not a court of appeal.

Mr. POWER: I was about to say that parliament has set up the machinery to decide on the merits of these cases. Parliament has divested itself of that duty, and has prohibited the minister from taking sides in matters of this kind. I regret to say that I can make no suggestion to the hon. member as to what further procedure could be followed, any more than I can make a suggestion to him were he to ask me with respect to a non-appealable case in any of the courts of his province or in the Supreme Court of Canada.

It would appear that the appeal court carefully considered the case. There was some delay, but I should like to point out to my hon. friend that if anything that delay was of some value to the applicant. The appeal in this case was lodged in March, 1936, and came up for hearing in May of that year. It will be remembered by hon. members that at the session of 1936 legislation was enacted to the effect that when the crown had lodged an appeal, in order to succeed it was necessary that the judges be unanimous. This could have been of material assistance to the applicant because, if the appeal had been heard and decided in the month of May, when it first came before the court, that statutory provision for the protection of applicants would not have been effective. When the case was heard the second time in September, 1936, that provision which gave a claimant a better chance than had existed previously was in existence. It would appear that the three members of the court who heard the case were unanimous in their decision against the applicant.

With respect to Mr. Justice Hyndman, I may say that he has had a long and distinguished career as a member of the supreme court of Alberta. Prior to that he was a distinguished member of the bar of that province. I have less knowledge of the legal ability of the other two members of the court, but I am convinced that all the members are conscientious men. I am sure that when they give their decision they do so to the best of their knowledge and ability and in all conscience according to the judgment which they think is the proper one in the circumstances. That is all I can say on the subject.

Mr. YOUNG: I was careful to say that the delay was due to certain legislation, but I also pointed out that the case was reheard in September and no judgment given until December. If there had been no doubt in their minds the decision could have been given at once. Instead of that, they sought opinions from other judges. If there had been no doubt in their minds, they would not have done that. I must say that I was very unfavourably impressed by two things. The first was that in my presence it was stated by the president of the court of appeal that if that case was granted it would cost the country $20,000, and that was a lot of money. I was present and I heard that. Then he went to the Minister of Finance and he said, "Am I to stand for abuse when I am protecting the treasury of this country?" I do not believe that is a proper attitude to take with regard to a matter of this kind. It so impressed me as to make me consider more carefully the number of cases which went to appeal and the number of appeals granted. I was perhaps considering this matter more carefully than other hon. members who never have been in that court of appeal.

I want to say to the minister that if that is the attitude that prevails, the sooner we do away with the appeal court the better. This afternoon some hon. gentleman on the other side said that where there was a dispute and a returned man appealed, he might have his case reheard by other members of the same board. I am quite certain that there is far less formality and technicality before the quorum, where the witnesses appear, than there is before this appeal court. In conclusion I want to say that we must either humanize this appeal court or do away with it entirely.

Mr. BENNETT: Because this matter is one of such great importance I venture to make a few observations. I do not think a week goes by when I am in western Canada that I do not receive complaints regarding the adjudication of claims for pensions. I recall a case in which a widow came to see me not very long since with her papers and complained bitterly that she had been denied the right to a pension by the appeal court because the court had held that death was not attributable to service. I might have arrived at another conclusion—I think I did—but I am not going to say that the tribunal was wrong for that reason.

Anyone who is familiar with our jurisprudence knows that the books are filled with cases where one judge entertained one opinion and another, another. The courts of appeal finally settled what the law should be. I recall what is known as the Wakelin case in which an action was brought against a railway company in England for negligence because a man had been found dead on the right of way where he had been thrown by a train that had passed and struck him. Varying views were entertained between the trial court and the House of Lords, but finally they laid down the law which has been the law ever since and which has been applied by our courts, including the court of last resort, the Supreme Court of Canada. The law is this: Unless there is some evidence to indicate that the injury or death complained of is attributable to some act of negligence, the plaintiff fails in his claim. That has been the universal declaration of law, and if it is open to pure conjecture as to how death occurred, the plaintiff cannot succeed. The reason is obvious.

Anyone who is an educated and professional man like the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) knows that the rule is that he who asserts must prove. When this poor unfortunate man was killed as a result of an automobile collision, it was the duty of those who claimed a pension to prove that that death resulted because of some defect in the appliance provided or for some reason connected with the appliance which he was using and which prevented him from escaping something about which no one knew anything. That is, the hazard that he faced was not known. It was only known that he was killed by being struck by an automobile and the assertion of the poor, unfortunate widow that the death of her husband was attributable to this appliance made necessary because of his service obviously could not be sustained. She could not prove, either by inference or otherwise, that the death complained of was attributable to anything connected with his service. That, I think, disposed of that side of the matter. I do not think that the local law in the province of Saskatchewan dealing with the question of the presumption of law when the injured person is struck by an automobile advances the matter any further.

But we must proceed one more step. The hon. member for Saskatoon has pointed out, very properly, that the statute contains a provision whereby the benefit of the doubt must be given to the applicant. But the kind of doubt to which the statute refers is not the doubt that I have indicated; it has no reference to that. The difficulty lies in the fact that if you substitute for the construction of a statute the sympathy of human nature and human kind, you always run into difficulties. That has been pointed out so frequently that I am not going to restate it. I wonder if there is anyone in this chamber to-night who would not desire to see that woman get a pension. That is human nature, and to its credit be it said, it is human sympathy.

But when you begin to apply principles that are laid down in a statute, those principles must be interpreted not in the light of the sympathy of the individuals who apply them or the sympathy of those who sit in the court and listen, but on principles that are settled by courts as to how a statute shall be interpreted. Interpretation is the duty of the court, and if it were otherwise what a mess we would be in. If our sympathies were to govern our judgment, where would we be? I recall conclusions that in a very youthful day I arrived at, with respect to what I conceived to be a great miscarriage of justice, because my sympathy entirely controlled and governed my judgment. As one gets a bit older one begins to realize that the rules which govern the interpretation of a statute, the function of the judge or a court, are rules which have been created not for the purpose of destroying the operation of human sympathies but that justice may be done to all without fear, favour or affection. And what a stupendous task it is to administer justice at all. Justice is an attribute of the Godhead. Milton said, "Not just, not God." To endeavour to administer justice is one of the most difficult of all the obligations that can be placed upon mankind. I am satisfied, knowing Mr. Justice Hyndman as I have for thirty years and knowing that very few of my acquaintance are more sympathetic than he—

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a question of guessing at it; I know he is sympathetic. But one of the reasons that an appeal court was constituted as it was, was for the purpose of preventing what may be called the play on sympathy in determining ultimate responsibility.

Mr. YOUNG: Would the right hon. gentleman not say the same thing about Mr. Justice Taylor?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but Mr. Justice Taylor approaches the problem with a warmer sympathy than would be possible when you have to determine a pure question of law. I point out, what the hon. member for Saskatoon seems to overlook, that in the ultimate analysis this case became nothing more or less than a pure cold question of law. It is easy for us in this chamber to say that that never should be so. But unfortunately or fortunately, in determining the question of liability on the part of the crown to pay pensions, we have passed a statute of this parliament, and may I add that it is, so far as I know, the most generous statute in the world. Perhaps we in this country made one mistake, and that is the reason those four thousand cases are there. I heard the Minister of Pensions in England once say that although they had made mistakes they never endeavoured to cure them because they left the precedent for future cases to govern them, believing that to endeavour by legislation or otherwise to cure them would only invite in the end chaotic conditions. He went further; he said, "We have never departed from the rule that beyond a given date we would not receive applications for pensions." Why?

Mr. POWER: They did to some extent.

Mr. BENNETT: I am just coming to that. Why? Because the laying down of an absolute period of cut-off was thought to be the only method by which one could ensure against what one might call unfair claims being preferred to the pension boards. There were exceptions, but the exceptions were so few in number as not to operate against the application of that universal rule. Now we have seen fit to extend the time and extend the time until, in the year 1936, we are hearing claims that arose in 1915 and 1916. The minister hinted at it but he did not follow it up. For obvious reasons, in his position he could not very well do so. But the fact is this, that of those four thousand claims which were dismissed on appeals made by the applicants, I venture to say in eighty per cent no one appeared; it was an impossible claim from the start; it was a claim that in eighty per cent of the cases had been presented not once or twice but sometimes ten or fifteen times before they finally reached the decision which has been indicated. Now why was this done? Because, this being a new country and we never having had to face a situation like this, we realized that there were many weaknesses. These independent men who came back feeling all right said, "We are not going to bother about making application for pension," and so they did not do so. Many of them who are in good shape, though they have a right to make a claim for a pension, have not done so yet.

Mr. POWER: We are receiving more claims on account of gunshot wounds now in comparison with the others than we ever did before.

Mr. BENNETT: Just think what a support of that position the observations of the minister are. He is now, twenty years after the peace, receiving claims for pensions for gunshot wounds. So far as I know ours is the only country in the world that is doing this.

Mr. POWER: That is because the men did not desire to claim earlier.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the very reason, of course, that the men, not feeling it necessary and desirable to make claims, did not do so. Now they are beginning to feel the effects and so now they are beginning to make these claims. Legislation on this matter has never been party legislation in this house.

There was a little attempt at it once, but we shall pass that by; broadly speaking, there has never been party legislation. Under these circumstances this legislation is legislation that has been arrived at by compromise and adjustment and giving a little here and taking a little there by men who are all returned men. In every case they fashioned and shaped existing legislation. I think it is correct—

Mr. POWER: Substantially.

Mr. BENNETT: —to say that the shaping of the legislation has been done by returned men on both sides of politics.

Mr. YOUNG: But the final adjudication was by men of whom two out of three are not returned men.

Mr. BENNETT: The final adjudication. But it has been a question of the determination of liability by the application of principles of law. I think that is a fair statement.

Mr. POWER: At one time, I believe, the appeal court did decide in many cases question of fact.

Mr. BENNETT: That was in the very early days.

Mr. POWER: The intention I had at the time the law was passed was that the appeal board should decide only on questions of law, and not fact; but they went beyond that.

Mr. BENNETT: That is true, because it will be remembered one member of the quorum decided that if a man had been in France he was entitled to a pension, and this made it a little difficult for the appellate tribunal when it had to deal with the matter.

Mr. POWER: I do not think that was quite the decision. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman has not stated the fact quite correctly.

Mr. BENNETT: I recollect that case where he said, "Were you in France? Well, you will get a pension."

Mr. POWER: That was not given, though, as one of the reasons for his decision in awarding the pension.

Mr. BENNETT: That is about the only reason he ever did give, I am bound to say, which is unfortunate.

I want to get back to one thing. The hon. member for Saskatoon has said that two out of three men who decided this case were not returned men; they were both lawyers, one a judge of fifteen or sixteen years in the appellate division of the supreme court of Alberta, and partly in the trial division, the other a practising member of the bar of New Brunswick for many years, and the third was a returned soldier and a member of the legal profession residing in this city.

One reason why that appeal court was constituted at it was, was just as the minister has said. It was originally intended they should deal with questions of law; they did have at times to deal with questions of fact as well. But in this case it is purely a question of law, and the question of doubt which has been mentioned does not arise at all, for the reasons given by Mr. Justice Hyndman in his judgment. If, for instance, there had been evidence that there was negligence on the part of the unfortunate deceased, and on the part also of the driver of the car, then the benefit of the doubt would have to go to the man; but when there is no evidence one way or the other, nothing except the bare fact that the man lies dead with a cracked skull, that does not create any presumption one way or the other. There is not even a prima facie case; there is no bent of testimony to prove anything connected with the man's death. He is dead. He was struck by a motor car. Whether that was an act arising from his own negligence or from the negligence of the driver of the car, or purely from some circumstance as to which there is no evidence at all, you have no question there upon which the application of that principle of the benefit of the doubt is to apply. It is like the case of a man who is found lying dead on the side of the right of way, and a train was known to have passed by. You could not say there was any relation between the death of that man and the passing of that train. That is what the House of Lords has decided, and the judges in the appellate division were bound by that principle of law in the absence of any proof—just keep in mind that fact—as to how the death occurred. There is no presumption one way or the other, and there being no presumption and no evidence, then of course it followed that you could not predicate liability without presumption or some form of evidence. But had there been the slightest evidence upon which a conflict arose, then it was the duty of the court, as pointed out in the interpretation placed by Mr. Justice Hyndman upon that provision, to give the benefit of the doubt to the applicant.

The minister will recall how vigorously that was threshed out in this house. The late Doctor McGibbon was here for hours dealing with that. That was why the committee made its report. It was a difficult clause to draw, to fit into legislation; but it was done, and it merely means that if you have some conflict, however small it may be, however slight it may be, then you have liability predicated, because the benefit of the doubt must go to the applicant.

Just one step more and I have concluded, and I would not take up the time of this committee were it not for the fact that I receive many cases of this kind. I have had to tell unfortunate applicants just what I am saying now, although much more briefly, and I dare say this committee wishes it were an applicant at the moment instead of having to listen as it is doing now.

The president of the court was frank enough to say to the member for Saskatoon that they had consulted leading jurists of the country, judges. Well, I can tell him that that is a very ordinary course for judges to take who are dealing with problems not of this kind at all, but with such questions as the legal effect of a man being found dead with a fractured skull. When they are dealing with the question of legal liability predicated upon the fact that a man had been killed, they might well consult leading jurists and others, the same as doctors sometimes consult together. In fact, I remember a most eminent physician who told me that he had met one of his fellow-craftsmen, who was a surgeon from another country, and that he had discussed with him very carefully a particular case. Even doctors do that without in any sense interfering with the soundness of their own judgment or the honesty of their convictions. And the fact that judges do it is well known everywhere. When they meet together one judge will say to another: "Is there any question that the mere finding of the body of a man who has been killed in an accident by coming into collision with a motor car does not, in the absence of some proof, constitute any cause of action?" In the same way a learned physician meeting another physician might ask him whether or not he could say with certainty that the use of the most important pharmaceutical discovery of 1937 would not have injurious effects upon a man's mind, to say nothing of his life. When you have new things, and even old things, physicians have been known to talk about them to one another. So the hon. member for Saskatoon cannot predicate any great argument upon that.

I am surprised to find that we have what we may call hearsay evidence introduced into this chamber. It is alleged that the president of the court spoke to the Minister of Finance, who told the minister, who told the house—

Mr. DUNNING: Do I come into this?

Mr. BENNETT: Oh yes, the Minister of Finance is in this. He is supposed to have been approached by the president of the court, who asked him whether or not he was to listen to these attacks against him, because it was being alleged that he was trying to protect the treasury. But, knowing Mr. Justice Hyndman as I do, I do not think that is exactly the way in which he would put it. I do not think it is quite consonant with our ideas of propriety that any member of the house should predicate a grievance upon a statement that somebody told him that somebody had told him that the president of the court had said so and so. That is perhaps not quite what would be expected in this chamber; I will merely leave it at that.

I am interested, as I feel every hon. member must be interested, because I frequently receive cases of this kind. I had to tell a poor lady not long ago: Unfortunately here is the unanimous determination of the court, and I know of nothing I can do for you unless you have new evidence. Once you have new evidence, you can present your case to the court once more for the purpose of having the court say whether such new evidence is of such a kind as warrants a rehearing of the case. Inasmuch as we are all interested, and inasmuch as I still believe the appeal court has served a useful purpose, not only for the state as such but for the returned men themselves, I can readily understand how human sympathy has been aroused in cases like this.

I would think less of the citizenship of Saskatoon if I were told that it did not sympathize with the widow. It is human nature that this should be so, and it is very much to the credit of human nature that such sympathies do prevail. But that has not been the method which has been used in any country I know of for the purpose of determining how these matters should be dealt with, except one. After the great civil war it was left open to any member of congress to propose that a pension should be paid to John Smith, and if he could by sufficient appeal to the sympathies as well as to the vote-getting effects of his efforts—

Mr. POWER: And log-rolling.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, that is the word I was going to use, but I hesitated in these days of international peace to use such a word as that lest it might give offence to someone who was propounding doctrines of everlasting good will in Asia. So I merely content myself with saying that what I had in mind was that with the exception of one country where a majority vote in congress carried a pension to an individual I know of no country in which it could be said that the right to secure a pension to a widow or anybody else on the basis of any claim that could be put forward should depend upon the judgment of the community in which the applicant lived. Human nature is sympathetic still, to its credit be it said, and I hope will long continue to be so. But if those charged with the unfortunate responsibility of administering a law are to be laid open to an attack upon their sympathetic natures, all we would have to do would be to induce the minister to believe that this would have a most potent effect upon the voting power of Quebec East, West, South or North at the next election, and sympathy would be so aroused that pensions would be granted to everyone.

Mr. YOUNG: I wish to thank the right hon. leader of the opposition for taking part in this discussion. He is a very able representative of the legal profession, a distinguished member of the bar. However, I should like to point out to him that in the court in which he has always practised he must prove his case beyond any reasonable doubt.

Mr. BENNETT: No; in a civil case by preponderance of testimony; in a criminal case beyond reasonable doubt.

Mr. YOUNG: That is the case in the court in which the right hon. gentleman has practised. That is also the case in the court in which the president of the pension appeal court practised before he came over here. But our statute says that that benefit of the doubt clause shall not be interpreted in that way; that the benefit of the doubt must be given in favour of the applicant.

Mr. BENNETT: Of what doubt?

Mr. YOUNG: Let us come to the doubt. First, let me say a word about the two judges. I think very properly the right hon. gentleman referred to the pension appeal court judge as a man of experience and, as he says, a man of long standing at the bar. Then I asked the second simple question, I hope not an embarassing question, What did the right hon. gentleman think of Mr. Justice Taylor? If I caught the answer aright it was this, that he was also a very able legal gentleman but he was afraid that perhaps the heart got a little in advance of the head.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not express any opinion about Mr. Justice Taylor.

Mr. MUTCH: You said he was a little warmer hearted.

Mr. BENNETT: That he was a soldier.

Mr. YOUNG: Well, that is the inference I took. I take it that both of these men are skilled in the law. Now what does this benefit of the doubt clause say? I am going to read it once more:

> . . . the body adjudicating on the claim shall be entitled to draw and shall draw from all the circumstances of the case, the evidence adduced and medical opinions, all reasonable inferences in favour of the applicant.

All reasonable inferences in favour of the applicant. I should like to ask this committee; I should like to ask any judge, Would it not be a reasonable inference that a man who was a cripple, who had an artificial leg, who, according to the evidence was careful, looked twice to the south, and who handicapped as he was had made the crossing with the exception of the last ten or twelve inches when the left mudguard of the car hit him, could, if he had had two good legs, have made that other foot and been out of danger? Surely that is the way to interpret the benefit of the doubt clause in favour of the returned soldier.

I recognize very well that perhaps the minister has no jurisdiction. But when there is a wrong there must be a remedy. I am going to ask him once more to look into this case to see if there is not some way whereby what I think almost everyone will concede was an injustice, is righted.

Mr. MUTCH: Although I had never heard of the case mentioned by the hon. member for Saskatoon until to-night, I am particularly grateful that he has brought up this case, and grateful also for the comments of the right hon. leader of the opposition, because it gives me opportunity to say in this committee something which I have been aching to say long before I came to this house. Although I am not a lawyer I could not help feeling convinced as I listened to this discussion to-night that in this instance the court of appeal had brought to bear on this particular case every conceivable argument except the one which to me is most essential. And with no particular disrespect to the legal profession I would say that the appeal court have not shown themselves to possess the least commonly practised of all qualifications, the qualification of common sense. Neither am I a doctor. I have no desire to disparage the contributions that doctors and lawyers have made either to the country during the war or on behalf of returned men since the war. But in spite of those contributions I think they have been one of the returned men's most serious liabilities since the war. In spite of the fact that I am not a professional man I can think of these decisions, as well as any other hon. member perhaps, in terms of the men who are most interested in and most affected by them, the returned soldiers.

This is not a party question; it is not a question of this parliament or the last parliament. We have made much ado about the benefit of the doubt in all questions affecting the returned soldier, and the general consensus of opinion among the returned men is that it does not mean anything. The returned man puts it rather more profanely than I think the chairman would permit me to put it here. The reason it does not mean anything is that it can be explained away in terms of the law from every conceivable case where it might mean anything to the returned men.

By and large clause 73 does not mean anything. This type of example, which can be multiplied over and over again not only in the experience of the leader of the opposition but in the experience of the humblest member of this chamber, has caused this clause to become a joke. Having no knowledge of the merits of this case, but having listened to the hon. member for Saskatoon and to the learned, but from the standpoint of the returned soldier completely ineffective defence of the situation by the leader of the opposition, I am glad to have an opportunity to say that returned men in general figure that the benefit of the doubt clause does not mean anything. If we do nothing else in this session we ought either to define this clause to make it mean something or remove it.

Mr. FINN: I have listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Saskatoon, the right hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for one of the Winnipegs. The hon. member for Winnipeg South said a few moments ago that he was neither a lawyer nor a doctor. The other evening I happened to be talking to him, out at his excellency's, and he told me that he was a curler, and that he had just returned from some part of Ontario where he had spent three, four or five enjoyable days. I was very glad that he had that pleasure, but when it comes to the returned soldiers and the legislation which is upon our statute books may I say, as I stated last year, that I had an opportunity of appearing before the appeal court, not for the purpose of presenting any argument but to accompany a gentleman from Halifax who, I believed, was entitled to consideration. After the argument had been heard Mr. Justice Hyndman, the chairman of the court, said to me, "Mr. Finn, do you desire to make any statement?" I replied, "No, Mr. Chairman, I do not. I accompanied the gentleman from Halifax only in order that he might feel at home when his case was being argued." Mr. Justice Hyndman replied, "I only wish that every hon. gentleman who sits in the House of Commons would come down with his constituents and at least give that moral support which is so necessary, even if they do not succeed."

I remember very well when I was studying law at Dalhousie university, of which the right hon. leader of the opposition is a graduate and to which he has been so financially kind. I remember that a fellow student in, I think it was, our second or final year, found himself faced with the question, What is the rule in Shelley's case? The gentleman who was not very studious was rather looking at the answers being written on foolscap by a fellow classmate who was studious, but with that the president of the university, the Reverend Doctor Forrest, came along, together with Professor McMechan, and this wonderful professor, the late Dean Weldon, was in the offing and therefore the student had no further opportunity of cribbing. He thought possibly it was a catch question, and after considering it for a while finally he made up his mind to answer it. The rule in Shelley's case, of course, which was settled by the House of Lords, was that a person could not devise or control his property "beyond a life or lives in being and twenty-one years." That is a settled principle; it applies to every person who has any wealth—and I do not think there is as much wealth on this side of the house as there is on the other.

Mr. BENNETT: You are mistaken there.

Mr. FINN: I will say to my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition, the ex-Prime Minister, that I had not him in mind. Rather I had in mind statements which appeared in the Citizen last evening in reference to the wealth which belonged to a gentleman who has passed on to "that bourne from which no traveller returns," who was highly respected in this house and in this country, and who has left a name that can be conjured with not only by this generation but by the generation which will read history in the light of his living and his passing.

In any case my friend the non-studious student thought he would make an attempt to answer the question, and he did so. He wrote down the question: What is the rule in Shelley's case? And then he said the answer was: "The rule in Shelley's case is the same as in any other man's case. Any d— fool ought to know that." The result was that he failed in more than two subjects and therefore lost his year. Professor George Ritchie, who was professor "of wills"—we used to call him "Svengali"—did not put him in to return for a supplementary in September but put him in to return at the opening of college to take a new year. It took him six years to get through, and he is not now practising his profession. So I think perhaps my hon. friend—

Mr. POWER: The hon. member should have said he was a judge.

Mr. FINN: No; I was speaking of Mr. Justice Hyndman as a judge but of the other gentleman as a fellow student and in my class at Dalhousie university, of which my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition is a graduate and of which he is very proud; and so am I. I think he has more reason to be proud than I have, because I was rather a bad boy in college and I have not lost all those qualities yet.

Mr. POWER: Was he not a bad boy in college?

Mr. FINN: Before my time. But, Mr. Chairman, I was going to say that I agree with the legal principle laid down by the right hon. leader of the opposition. It is not of a sympathetic character, not because he is not sympathetic but because the law must be interpreted as it has been placed upon the statute books. Therefore he is against the gentleman who had the wooden leg, and I do not say that unkindly or frivolously. The hon. member for Saskatoon can go home with the assurance that he has made the best of a bad case; and a wooden leg is the cause of the downfall.

Let me go further, and say that at the last session of parliament, when the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) was bringing down his estimates—and he has taken such an interest in his department, and is always available and sympathetic to the returned soldier; I know of no hon. gentleman in this house, whether he sits in opposition, or did, or sat on this side when they were here or sat over there when we were here—though I was never over there and I never expect to be—who ever made a greater success of his department.

Mr. BENNETT: Do you think it will be after the next election?

Mr. FINN: All I can say to my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition is that he should have his horoscope read. I had mine read the other day. There were no politics in it, but it said I was too generous, too kind, too sympathetic, and worried too much. I think that also applies to the right hon. gentleman, and that may be the reason he will come over here.

To resume, Mr. Chairman, last year I referred to a nurse at Camp Hill hospital. She had been overseas; she had served well, but she had arrived at the age of sixty-five. She was not entitled to pension on the ground of disability through being wounded or having a wooden leg; at least I do not think so. But, sir, she was a nurse, but had not the required time. She might have been on the Llandovery Castle, and if she had been she never would have returned to this country, any more than did Miss Fraser, who was also a nurse, the daughter of a late lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia, Hon. D. C. Fraser, who sat in this house and finally climaxed his honoured career by becoming lieutenant governor of his native province. I said last year, and I say again to-night, that in cases of this kind, where the pension granted is insufficient, the law should be elastic enough to permit action being taken. Some person should have authority where a strong equity is established, to deal with such cases.

In this instance the Minister of Pensions, through the officers of his department, saw his way clear to recommend the payment of a gratuity to help the nurse in the few years yet to be hers. I do suggest to the minister and to the government which, at the present time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is leading—and he will lead that day when he brings down the finest budget that has ever been brought down; I am giving away no government secrets, because I am not a member of the government; if I were I would not tell you—if legislation is to be brought down by the Minister of Pensions, provision should be made whereby all cases which have been adjudicated upon in the courts might be considered by the minister, or by some other persons indicated by parliament. But where there is a strong case in equity, as there was in this instance, certainly help should be given. Here we had a nurse who had served long and well, and yet at the age of sixty-five she found herself out in the cold and looking up at the citadel, thinking that while once the guns of that citadel belched forth, nothing was now belching forth from Camp Hill, not even a fifty cent piece.

It is fortunate that that case was dealt with, and I want to thank the minister for the way in which he acted. The nurse in question will have some comforts in the few years still left to her, and believe that she owes a debt of gratitude to the minister, to the government and to the house for that gratuity in dollars and cents which meant so much to her happiness of heart and mind.

Because, after all, when we begin to get "in the sere and yellow leaf" the finest qualities in the individual come out. I do not think anyone displays them more than the right hon. the leader of the opposition—and of course I do not suggest he is "in the sere and yellow leaf"; I think he is in the pink.

My other point was this: Last year I had in mind the case of an individual whose name I could not mention. He was a diffident chap living in the north end of the city of Halifax. He and his three brothers went overseas. His father, who is now dead, had served in the South African war. Each of his brothers was wounded three times, and he was wounded four times, the last wound being in the head. As a result of gas he developed a lung condition and to-day he is in the advanced stage of tuberculosis. That man receives $7.50 per month under the Pension Act, and was receiving from the city of Halifax an amount which brought him in a total of $18 per month. That money paid his board in a little dark room in the north end of the city.

I say to all hon. members, irrespective of party affiliation, that cases of this kind may be considered along with those mentioned by the leader of the opposition. He who deals with the law is a god, and therefore I would say that the Minister of Pensions should take these matters in a reflective mood, as together with his deputies he sits by the fireside trying to see if it is possible to work out a solution for such cases. It will not be very long before it will be de mortuis est with the soldiers to whom I refer, and then there will be no more opportunity. He will meet his God who, as was stated by the leader of the opposition, is a most just God, a most kind God and most charitable. I add the word "charitable," because charity covers a multitude of sins, and therefore I shall have to do a great deal of charity.

I shall be privileged to give a memorandum to the Minister of Pensions in order that he may be able to deal with this matter. Perhaps it may be the foundation stone by which a section of the amendment to the Pension Act will permit cases of that kind to be considered in a humane fashion.

I lost a nephew in the war, Lieutenant Clifford Finn, and I often think that the man who was best off is not the man, old or young, who was wounded, but the man who is over there beneath the poppies. He is better off than the man who lives to-day to whom little gratitude has been extended. He thinks that we in parliament are callous and cold when we are asked to consider the needs and requirements of the homes and families of the returned men.

When the leader of the opposition spoke he was not sitting as a judge in the house, or one interpreting the statute. He was big and strong enough to state the facts, irrespective of a possible suggestion by someone in the west that he might not be sympathetic towards the soldiers. I do not believe that is his attitude, because I have some knowledge of the attitude of the right hon. gentleman. I know about his vast charities, and therefore I say a man of that type would not single out a returned soldier and say, No, to him, unless the courts were dead against him. He would be given a hearing, if he could prove his case "beyond a reasonable doubt."

Mr. HAMILTON: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the observations of the leader of the opposition. As he has said, I think there are few in the house who do not know of cases similar to that set out by the hon. member for Saskatoon. I know of more than one. In my opinion the question with respect to the application of the clause dealing with the benefit of the doubt is a very important one.

For some years the manner in which this provision has been applied, and the results secured, have been difficult to understand. The inference permitted to be drawn seems to be an inference of fact, something which is left for the trial tribunal to decide. If first the pension commission and then the quorum, or perhaps several commission hearings and one or two quorum hearings, exercising that privilege they have of drawing inferences of fact, are unanimous in finding that there is a doubt and that the applicant is entitled to the benefit of that doubt, then I do not see how the appellate tribunal can find that there is not sufficient doubt and overrule the decision in favour of the applicant.

Mr. BENNETT: Would it interfere with my hon. friend if I put it in this way: In this case there was no evidence upon which an inference could be drawn. That is what the appellate court said.

Mr. HAMILTON: I had thought of that, but according to the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) there was apparently certain evidence given at the inquest as to where the body lay, how far it was away and where the tracks of the car were from which an inference might have been permitted to be drawn. If there is an exercise of the power to draw inferences from facts; if the appeal is dealt with as a matter of law and not as a matter of fact, where there has been so many decisions, either majority or unanimous, of trial tribunals in favour of giving the benefit of the doubt to the appellant, then it is difficult for me to see how the appellate tribunal can overrule them.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman knows that there are many cases in which juries find certain verdicts and the courts set them aside because there was no evidence upon which the findings could be made. That is the real point of this case.

Mr. HAMILTON: I appreciate that. They cannot make a finding on the facts on the ground that the finding would be perverse or something.

Mr. BENNETT: No evidence.

Mr. HAMILTON: No evidence of a type upon which a finding could be made. In overruling the decisions of whatever tribunals there may be I am not sure that the court of appeal is not exercising the functions that should be properly exercised by the quorums. They are overruling the doubt which has been found in favour of the appellant. The appeal tribunal is saying that despite the fact that it has been found that there is a doubt, in their estimation that doubt does not exist. That overruling is confined to the applying of principles of law, such as the right hon. leader of the opposition has suggested. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) that there is a feeling throughout the country that the benefit of the doubt clause does not operate fairly in favour of applicants making application for pensions.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Dunning the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Monday, February 21, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Mr. G. W. McPHEE (Yorkton—for Mr. Moore) moved that the first report of the standing committee on banking and commerce be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

FISH TRAP LICENCES

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I wish to present a petition, signed by W. W. R. Mitchell, president of the Associated Boards of Trade of Vancouver Island, and 9,595 others, all citizens of British Columbia. The prayer of their petition is that this honourable house may be pleased to order the abolition of fish trap licences in the waters of British Columbia.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I wish to lay on the table the report of the Canadian wheat board for the crop year 1936-37. The report has been printed and will be available for the members within a day of two.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

BRITAIN'S FOREIGN POLICY—CANADA'S RESPONSIBILITIES AS MEMBER OF THE LEAGUE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). In view of recent occurrences indicating a change in Britain's foreign policy, will the Prime Minister make a statement at an early day on the government's attitude to Canada's responsibilities as a member of the League of Nations?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might answer my hon. friend's question at once. The attitude of Canada towards the League of Nations remains precisely as set forth by myself in this House of Commons at the last session of parliament.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN FARM LOAN BOARD—LOANS IN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. What was the amount of loans placed by the Canadian Farm Loan Board in northern Saskatchewan?
2. What individual or firm acted as solicitor in the Prince Albert and adjacent area?
3. How much money, if any, was paid to the firm of Davis and Davis, barristers and solicitors, Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, in solicitors' fees for said board?
4. Who are the partners in or members of the firm of Davis and Davis, Prince Albert, Saskatchewan?

Mr. DUNNING:

The following reply is furnished by the Canadian farm loan board, with respect to questions 1 to 3:

1. As the loan records of the board are kept on a provincial unit basis only, the information asked for is not now available.

2. The services of J. G. Deifenbaker, Prince Albert, in the period September to November, 1935, and C. S. Davis, Prince Albert, in the period November, 1935 to May, 1937, were utilized. None at present.

3. None. The board has paid to J. G. Deifenbaker, Prince Albert, the sum of $12.75 and to C. S. Davis, Prince Albert, the sum of $207.00, on account of legal services rendered the board.

4. C. S. Davis is sole partner of the firm of Davis and Davis.

FEDERAL INCOME TAX—QUESTION OF SHARING WITH MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. CHURCH:

Is it the government's intention to grant a share of federal income tax to the municipalities where it is collected as a subvention for services rendered the government in the way of exempt property, by giving the municipalities a share of this federal collection in the same way as provincial authority shares income tax?

Mr. DUNNING: This question relates to a matter of policy and it is not usual for the government to make statements on matters of policy in giving replies to questions.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER DREDGING FLEET

Mr. POOLE:

1. Was the government dredging fleet of the St. Lawrence river ever kept idle while work was being done by the General Dredging Company?

2. How many vessels, dredges, boats, tugs, etc., have been sold by the government to the General Dredging Company since 1922?

3. What was the price obtained on any sale made?

4. What sales were made without tenders being called, and what were the prices?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The number of dredges employed by the contractors and by the department on the St. Lawrence work has varied from time to time, and it has happened that work has been done by contractors' dredges when departmental dredges were not fully employed, This has been due in part to the urgency of the work of providing a deeper and wider ship channel from Montreal, and also to the fact that contractors' dredges were able to do more work with the money available than could be accomplished by departmental dredges.

2. The following units of the dredging fleet, St. Lawrence ship channel, were sold to General Dredging Contractors, Limited, together with Sorel shipyard, on July 22, 1937:—

Dredge No. 3 (at south channel) (scrap), dredge No. 4 (at south channel), dredges Nos. 5 8, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, dredge No. 18 unfinished), Churchill No. 1.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Tugs:—Deschaillons, Becancour, Lake St. Pierre, Varennes (scrap), Contrecœur (scrap), Iberville (at south channel) (scrap).

Coal barge No. 6, hopper barges Nos. 1, 3, 4, and 5 (all at Quebec), rockbreaker No. 1, steel sand dumping scow No. 22 (at south channel).

Steel dumping scow No. 23; Nos. 24, 25, 26 (at south channel); No. 27; No. 28 (at south channel); No. 29; Nos. 30 and 31 (at south channel); No. 32.

Steel sand dumping scow No. 33; wood dumping scow No. 34 (scrap); wood dumping scow No. 35 (scrap); steel dumping scows Nos. 36 and 37 (at south channel); No. 38; No. 39 (at south channel); Nos. 40 and 41.

Winch scow No. 1, 11—Barrel floats, 3—small wood flat scows, fire scow No. 1, fire scow No. 2.

Also the following surplus marine equipment, Montreal harbour:—

Tug "Aberdeen", tug "David Sneath", dipper dredge "John Kennedy", dipper dredge No. 5; floating derricks Nos. 1, 4 and 8; launch "Messenger"; dumper scows Nos. 36, 37 and 38; flat scow No. 2 (equipped with hand derrick); hull of old concrete mixer; flat scow "A6"; flat scow No. 22; flat scow No. 31 (equipped with steam derrick); flat scow No. 55 (equipped as floating sawmill); flat scows Nos 50, 51, 52, 58, 59, 61; 3 derrick floats.

3. The lump sum consideration for the entire transfer of the shipyard property, and appurtenances thereto was $1,708,544.

4. Sale was by negotiation.

SHORT MEASURE IN GASOLINE SALES

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott):

1. Has the Department of Trade and Commerce through its branch of weights and measures, or otherwise, been made aware of short measure in sales of gasoline, wholesale or retail?

2. If so, how many complaints from each province: (a) from wholesale sales; (b) from retail sales?

Mr. EULER:

1. The department receives from time to time (nearly all in the winter) incidental complaints of short measure in gasoline, but most of them relate to apparent shortages due to the contraction of the gasoline under low temperatures (1 per cent for every 20° F.)

2. Answered by No. 1.

RASPBERRY PULP IMPORTATIONS

Mr. LENNARD:

How much raspberry pulp was imported into Canada for the twelve months ending December 31, 1937?

Mr. EULER: Raspberry pulp is not separately recorded in Canadian import statistics.

REID HILL DISTRICT, ALTA., MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. HANSELL:

1. What persons tendered on contracts for carrying mail throughout the Reid Hill district adjacent to Vulcan, Alberta, on or about the first part of January, 1938?
2. What was the amount of each tender?
3. Who obtained the contract?
4. When did he, or will he, commence his duties?

Mr. EULER: The tenders submitted for the conveyance of mail over a proposed rural mail route from Vulcan, which were opened in the Post Office department on January 28, 1938, are still under consideration,—the awarding of a contract being suspended until the result of a canvass for boxes is known.

Information concerning the tenders will be available as soon as contract is awarded and executed.

CANADA'S WAR DEBT

Mr. ISNOR:

1. What is the total outstanding war debt (in dollars and cents) of the Dominion of Canada.
2. Is this amount now being carried on the balance sheet of the public accounts?
3. If so, under what heading?
4. Is there at present a special war tax?
5. If so, what is the total revenue from such source?
6. Is said war tax being used to liquidate war debt?
7. If not, to what fund is it being credited?
8. What was the total amount received from war tax during the fiscal year of 1937?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. It is impossible to determine with accuracy what portion of the outstanding debt of Canada is "war debt." All loans issued during the war have been refunded one or more times; in some cases portions of maturing issues were paid off and in other cases refunding issues were increased to provide funds for other purposes. War expenditures were charged when made to the consolidated revenue fund, likewise other expenditures attributable to the war, such as war pensions, treatment and after-care of returned soldiers, soldier settlement, interest on and administration of public debt, etc. All revenue received by the government goes into a common fund, the consolidated revenue fund, and all expenditures are made therefrom. It is impossible, therefore, except by the use of highly hypothetical assumptions, to calculate the proportion of the present total net debt of Canada which may be attributed, directly or indirectly, to the war.

In the public accounts for the year ended March 31, 1937, a table is given (see page 51) showing war and demobilization expenditures (including adjustment of war claims) year by year since 1915, and totalling $1,695,958,569.66 as at March 31, 1935. This total, however, does not include any expenditures for war pensions, treatment and after-care of returned soldiers, soldier settlement, interest on war debt, or other indirect or consequential expenditures arising out of the war.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

4. Income tax is collected under a statute entitled "The Income War Tax Act." Various excise taxes, the tax on bank note circulation and the tax on net premium income of insurance companies other than life, are collected under a statute entitled "The Special War Revenue Act."

5. In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1937, the amount collected under the Income War Tax Act totalled $102,365,241.75, and under the Special War Revenue Act to $154,457,679.76.

6 and 7. All government receipts are credited to the consolidated revenue fund from which all government disbursements are made.

8. Answered by No. 5.

TORONTO MUNICIPAL AIRPORT

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. What proportions of the cost of the new Toronto municipal airport at Malton, Ontario, will be borne by the dominion government, provincial government, and the municipal corporation of the city of Toronto?
2. When will the said airport be opened for aerial traffic?
3. What is the estimated total contribution of the dominion government towards the construction and completion of said airport?

Mr. HOWE:

1 and 3. An agreement has been entered into between the Department of Transport and the city of Toronto for assistance in the development of the Malton and Island airports, which are now being constructed by the city authorities. This agreement calls for contributions as follows:

Fiscal year 1937-38	$100,000
" " 1938-39	250,000
" " 1939-40	100,000

The municipal authorities have advised the department that the province of Ontario is contributing similar amounts and that the proportion of the total cost of the two developments will be approximately:

Dominion government	24 per cent
Provincial government	24 per cent
City of Toronto	52 per cent

2. The officers in charge of construction for the city of Toronto notified the Department of Transport that though construction will not be completed it will be sufficiently advanced to permit of its use by high-speed aircraft not later than July 1, 1938.

MONTREAL HARBOUR BRIDGE

Mr. WALSH:

1. At what figure is the Jacques Cartier (harbour) bridge now carried on the books of the government?

2. What loss, if any, has been sustained by the port of Montreal for the year ending December 1, 1937?

3. What loss, if any, has been sustained by the port of Montreal during the seasons of 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936?

4. What savings, if any, have been effected by putting the harbour of Montreal under the National Harbours Board?

5. What increase in revenue will accrue to the port of Montreal if advertised increase in rates is put into effect (based on the volume of traffic handled in 1937)?

Mr. HOWE:

The following information is furnished by the National Harbours Board:

1. Capital cost of Jacques Cartier bridge is not carried on the books of the government except as an indirect liability in respect of guaranteed bonds outstanding. It is carried on the books of Jacques Cartier bridge at a capital cost of $18,649,077.80. Operation, maintenance and carrying charge of the bridge are covered by a set of accounts which are separate and distinct from those kept in respect of general harbour operations at Montreal, and the deficits of the bridge are provided for by annual votes of parliament.

2. Net income deficit, 1937, $1,066,514.60, exclusive of Jacques Cartier bridge.

3. Net income deficit (exclusive of Jacques Cartier bridge): 1933, $1,407,916.21; 1934, $1,787,795.57; 1935, $1,467,889.78; 1936, $1,263,654.52.

4. Expenses of administration, operation and maintenance in 1935, the last year under local commission, were $2,394,967. In 1936, the corresponding figure was $2,209,179, and in 1937, $2,136,800. In the meantime operating revenues increased from $4,032,770 in 1935, to $4,238,836 in 1936, and $4,377,350 in 1937. The net improvement on operating account over 1935 figures was, therefore, $391,854 in 1936 and $602,747 in 1937, a total in two years of $994,601, made up of $443,955 in reduced expenses and $550,646 in increased revenues.

5. Publication of any estimate of anticipated revenue must be regarded as premature at this stage. The National Harbours Board has placed before carriers, shipping agents, consignees, and other users of the harbours, draft tariffs of harbour dues, dockage and top wharfage, and is preparing to receive any representations which may be offered. The object of the board is to have substituted for present tariffs, established when the harbours were under local boards, a coordinated series of charges, designed to remove any anomalies and unfair discriminations which may now exist as between harbours that are competitive and to secure, in view of the deficits shown by the harbours, such increase in revenues as may be justified, due consideration being given to comparable charges elsewhere, costs on alternative transportation routes and other factors influencing the movement of traffic. No changes in rates are made except upon the authority of the governor in council.

*LEAGUE OF NATIONS—ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN DELEGATION ON FAR EASTERN SITUATION AND REELECTION OF SPAIN TO COUNCIL

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Did Canada's League of Nations delegation at Geneva vote on October 6, 1937, on the report of the drafting committee of the League of Nations, recommending that signatories of the Nine Power Treaty be invited to meet to examine the far eastern situation?

2. What instruction or advice was given to the Canadian delegation by the government of Canada or the Department of External Affairs on or about September 20, 1937, regarding the question of the reelection of Spain to a seat on the council of the League of Nations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. members will see that this question is really two questions, and both involve matters on which there has been a good deal of misunderstanding, but neither question is so framed that an answer limited to the point raised would be of much assistance in making the situation clear. I therefore propose to answer the question orally and in the form of a statement on the questions referred to.

The first question refers to press reports last October to the effect that the Canadian delegation in the league assembly had abstained from voting on the resolution regarding the Sino-Japanese war, and to the effect further that this was due to failure on the part of the Canadian government to send instructions promptly.

The Sino-Japanese conflict was referred by the assembly to a committee termed the far eastern advisory committee, on which Canada was represented. Some phases of the question were referred by this committee to a subcommittee on which Canada was not represented, and this subcommittee finally set up a drafting committee. The drafting committee reached agreement on the text of a report on the afternoon of October 5. An attempt was made to rush the report through the three remaining stages that same day, regardless of the consideration that a large number of members of the assembly were not represented on the sub-committee or on the committee itself. After adoption by the sub-committee it was referred to the full committee. The senior Canadian representative quite properly refrained from voting, giving his reasons as follows:

> This is the first time I have seen the two reports under discussion. I notice that they contain conclusions of great importance. I have no instructions from my government, to which I would at least like to communicate the conclusions with a view to obtaining their approval as soon as possible. Therefore, in the circumstances, I am bound to suspend my adhesion to these reports until such time as I have received these instructions. I hope they will be available before the matter is discussed by the assembly, when I hope that I shall be able to support the reports.

Later in the same evening, at eight-thirty, the report was sent on to the assembly, and it was proposed to proceed immediately with the discussion and voting. The delegates of Norway and the Union of South Africa protested that they had had no time to study the report and resolution or communicate with their governments. It was agreed to adjourn to the following afternoon.

The Canadian delegation at once cabled the resolution and their own views. That telegram was received and decoded at ten o'clock in the morning and delivered to me personally at once. The procedure adopted left no opportunity for consulting my colleagues, as it was then three p.m. in Geneva, but I concluded, in view of previous discussions and the tenor of the resolution, that no material question would arise, and therefore directed that a cable be sent in reply authorizing the Canadian delegation to support the resolution. This cable was dispatched in an hour and a quarter after the cable from Geneva had been received and decoded in the department. I brought the question before my colleagues at the first opportunity. When the reports and the resolution based on them came before the assembly that afternoon the Canadian delegation gave its support. No formal vote was taken. The procedure adopted was a negative one, which seems to be growing in use at Geneva, of considering all delegations present as supporting, unless voting contrary or declaring that they abstain. Two of the delegations present, Poland and Siam, abstained. It will thus be seen that there was no delay whatever at Ottawa, and that the Canadian delegation at Geneva was entirely justified in declining to vote on a resolution on a matter of first importance without having had adequate opportunity to consult the Canadian government. No other course would be possible if the work of the league is to be taken seriously and if members at a distance from Europe are to take a considered and responsible part in its deliberations.

The second query has to do with the voting on a question of lesser importance, namely, the election of members of the council.

Members of the house will recall that in addition to the permanent or great power members of the council, now reduced to Great Britain, France and Russia, and also Italy, which has announced its resignation, it is the practice to elect temporary members, usually for a three year term. Certain countries have developed claims in the past ten years to semi-permanent seats. Before any temporary member which is retiring can be considered for reelection the rules provide that it must obtain from the assembly a declaration of re-eligibility by a two-thirds vote. If successful it may then be a candidate for reelection. On the present occasion Spain and Turkey failed to secure the necessary majority for re-eligibility. The countries elected in place of Chile, Spain and Turkey were Belgium, Iran (formerly Persia) and Peru.

As to Canadian instructions, none were given on this occasion and none have been given for some years past. The full list of candidates is not known until the assembly is in session. I may add that information on every phase of the assembly agenda, to the extent of some hundred pages, was furnished the members of the delegation, and some points of special importance were discussed in council before the Canadian delegation left.

Following the vote the Geneva correspondent of an English paper telegraphed that the empire delegates had split on the question of Spanish re-eligibility; Canada, the Irish Free State, India and Egypt voting against Spain's re-eligibility, and the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand for it. This irresponsible statement was relayed to Canada by two Canadian correspondents in London, and in due course various editorials and resolutions appeared criticizing the alleged stand. Not one of the critics appeared to have stopped to consider whether the report could have any foundation, or what the league procedure was in such voting. The fact is that under article 2 of the rules adopted by the assembly for the election of non-permanent members it is provided:

> The assembly shall pronounce separately by secret ballot upon each request for re-eligibility.

I need only say that the correspondent who sent out this story had no information or facts whatever to base the story upon. It was an irresponsible cable, based upon guess or gossip. The Canadian delegation did not give any statement as to its vote.

I am not aware that any responsible country has ever made a statement as to how its delegation voted on a question which the league assembly had expressly provided should be balloted upon in secret. The secrecy imposed upon such balloting is a league regulation, not a Canadian decision. To break this rule because a Geneva correspondent sends out reports on subjects of which he has no knowledge would simply encourage the circulation of guesswork in the hope of provoking a denial or confirmation. For this reason, at the time the dispatches appeared, I felt it desirable and necessary to refrain from indicating how the Canadian delegation voted. I intimated, however, at the time that I thought it might be possible, in the event of the matter being brought up in parliament, to give to parliament the information sought. As the question has been asked, and a refusal to give the information requested might only lead to renewed controversy and misrepresentation of Canada's position, I have decided to inform the house what in fact was the action taken by the Canadian delegation in this case. I am not sure that in so doing I am justified under the league regulations. I hope however that my so doing may serve to emphasize the necessity for avoiding reckless news stories and unconsidered comment on questions which easily arouse acrimony and friction, and also do something to prevent similar incidents in future.

The Canadian delegation voted for the re-eligibility of Spain. The reasons why the Canadian delegation voted for the re-eligibility of Spain are very concisely set forth in a letter which I received from Senator Dandurand shortly after the vote was recorded. It is dated Brussels, November 10, 1937, and is as follows:

The Right Hon. The Prime Minister,
Secretary of State for External Affairs,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My Dear Prime Minister,

I have taken cognizance of the debate which has taken place in the Canadian press over the attitude of the Canadian delegation in relation to the request of Spain to be again allowed to present its candidature for a seat in the council of the league. The query repeatedly made to you bore on the vote which Canada gave on that question. You answered quite properly that the vote had been taken by secret ballot and that the public was not made aware of the way in which the various nations had recorded their will.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

I may say that to this date I am unaware as to the individual action of the members of the league. I do not know how Great Britain voted, nor the other members of the commonwealth, although I met them daily.

Since you stated publicly that you would give that information to parliament, if it were asked and if you were allowed to by the rules governing the assembly of the league of nations, I have no hesitation whatever in informing you that the Canadian delegation voted in favour of the re-eligibility of Spain, for the following reasons:

1. When Spain expressed in 1926 its intention of withdrawing from the League of Nations, if the assembly did not allow her a permanent seat in the council, it was suggested that an opportunity would be afforded of obtaining election to a non-permanent seat, with the right of re-eligibility on a two-thirds vote. Two years later, in 1928, the same procedure was proposed again. In order to secure the collaboration of Spain in the work of the league, a resolution to that effect was carried in the assembly by a vote of 44 to 5. Canada supported the resolution.

2. Because the Canadian delegation did not feel that the calamity of war in Spain could justify the members of the league to inflict upon this unhappy country the further humiliation of the loss of its seat in the council;

3. Because the Canadian delegation had solely Spain in mind, without asking themselves what government would represent her, to-day or to-morrow, in the assembly and in the council;

4. Because the Canadian delegation could not take sides for one faction or the other, as Canada had faithfully followed the policy of non-intervention in the affairs of Spain.

The sole duty of the Canadian delegation was to think of Spain as an entity, without interfering in its domestic quarrels.

Yours very faithfully,

R. Dandurand.

LANSDOWNE, ONT., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. STEWART:

1. Was the postmaster at Lansdowne relieved of duties within the last year?

2. If so, what were the reasons for his dismissal?

3. Upon whose recommendations was the appointment of the present postmaster made?

Mr. EULER:

1. Yes.

2. The postmaster tendered his resignation.

3. Canadian Legion and D. E. Lewis.

LANSDOWNE, ONT., RURAL MAIL ROUTES

Mr. STEWART:

1. What are the names and addresses and the amount of tenders of the parties who tendered for current mail service on each of the following rural mail routes,—1, 2 and 4 Lansdowne, Ontario?

2. What is the name and address of the contractor for each of said routes?

3. Was the contract awarded to the lowest tenderer in each case?

4. If this course was not adopted, why was the contract not awarded to the lowest tenderer in each case?

Mr. EULER:

1. Route No. 1—

Stanley Beseau, Lansdowne	$700
Harry Hunt, Lansdowne R.R. 1	720
Route No. 2—
Wm. Edward Funnell, Lansdowne	500
B. J. Middleton, Lansdowne	580
Mark A. Fodey, Lansdowne	600
Jas. Henry Moxley, Lansdowne	625
Ford Gray, Lansdowne	650
W. A. Slack, Lansdowne	750
Route No. 4—
Benedict Fodey, Lansdowne	790
Orville Clark Grier, Lansdowne	888

2. Route No. 1—
Contract awarded to Stanley Beseau, Lansdowne.

Route No. 2—
Contract awarded to Mark A. Fodey, Lansdowne.

Route No. 4—
Contract awarded to Benedict Fodey, Lansdowne.

3 and 4. No—In the case of route No. 2, the tender of W. E. Funnell was passed over for the reason that he already held the contract for Lansdowne rural route No. 3 at the rate of $625 per annum.

B. J. Middleton's tender for route No. 2 was passed over following the receipt of an adverse report.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—EMPLOYEES AND SALARIES

Mr. BRUNELLE:

1. What is the total number of employees of the civil service commission including the commissioners?

2. What is the total amount paid in salaries?

3. What is: (a) the number of permanent employees of said commission and total amount of their salaries; (b) the number of temporary employees and total amount of their salaries; (c) the salary of the commissioners and length of their term of office?

CANADIAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. POOLE:

1. How many life insurance companies are there in Canada?

2. How many are operating under federal charter?

3. How many are operating under provincial charter?

4. How many are international companies?

5. How many policies have been dropped since 1929, in each company?

6. How much money was lost by the previous policy holders?

7. What profits were made by each of the companies?

8. How many executive officers are there in each of these companies?

9. What salary is paid to each of these executive officers?

CANADIAN FARM LOAN BOARD—LOANS BY PROVINCES

Mr. REID:

1. What was the amount of loans placed by the Canadian farm loan board in the various provinces of the dominion during the calendar year 1937?

2. How many applications for loans were made during 1937 in the province of British Columbia, and how many of these were granted in the said year?

Mr. DUNNING: Return tabled herewith.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—MILEAGE OWNED AND CONSTRUCTED SINCE 1925

Mr. LALONDE:

1. How many miles of railway does the Canadian National own in each of the provinces of the dominion?

2. Since 1925, inclusive, how many miles of railway have been constructed in each of the provinces of the dominion by the Canadian National Railways, or by companies it controls, and what was the cost of each line?

COLONEL J. L. REGAN

Mr. BETTS:

1. Was Colonel J. L. Regan retired from the Canadian permanent force?

2. Was he granted a militia service pension; and, if so, how much?

3. Why was he retired and pensioned?

4. Was the pension computed upon the rates of pay and allowances which he drew as an officer of the overseas militia force of Canada or upon his rates of pay and allowances as an officer of the permanent active militia?

5. Was the said Regan at any time since November 1, 1935, in the employment of or in any way connected with the service of the Department of National Revenue?

6. Is he now in such employment; and, if so, what are his duties, and what remuneration does he receive?

PENSIONS APPEAL COURT

Mr. MacNEIL:

1. How many appeals were pending consideration by the pensions appeal court as at December 31, 1936, in the following categories: (a) appeals by the crown from the quorum pensions commission; (b) appeals of applicants from quorum pensions commission; (c) other categories?

2. How many appeals were filed with the appeal court during 1937 as follows: (a) appeals of the crown from the quorum pensions commission; (b) appeals of applicants from the quorum pensions commission; (c) other categories?

3. How many appeals were heard by the appeal court during 1937, as follows: (a) appeals of the crown from the quorum pensions commission; (b) appeals of applicants from the quorum pensions commission; (c) other categories?

4. How many appeals were allowed in 1937, as follows: (a) appeals of the crown from the quorum pensions commission; (b) appeals of applicants from the quorum pensions commission; (c) other categories?

5. How many appeals were disallowed in 1937, as follows: (a) appeals of the crown from the quorum pensions commission; (b) appeals of applicants from the quorum pensions commission; (c) other categories?

6. How many appeals were referred by the appeal court to the pensions commission in 1937: (a) appeals of the crown from the quorum pensions commission; (b) appeals of applicants from the quorum pensions commission; (c) other categories?

7. How many appeals were awaiting consideration by the appeal court as at December 31, 1937: (a) appeals of crown from quorum pensions commission; (b) appeals of applicants from quorum pensions commission; (c) other categories?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

RIVERPORT-NORTH LA HAVE, N.S., MAIL SERVICE

Mr. MASSEY (for Mr. Brooks):

For a copy of all letters, correspondence and other documents of any kind, in the possession of the department, dated within the past three years, relating to the mail service between Riverport and North La Have, in the province of Nova Scotia.

NEW ROSS CROSS-FORTIES, N.S., MAIL ROUTE

Mr. MASSEY (for Mr. Brooks):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents in the possession of the department, dated within the past two years, relating to the rural mail route between New Ross Cross and Forties, New Ross, in the province of Nova Scotia.

BRIDGEWATER, N.S., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. MASSEY (for Mr. Brooks):

For a copy of all letters, corespondence, telegrams and other documents, including therein the civil service examination reference, and generally, all documents of any kind and description, relating to the dismissal of E. W. Walker, postmaster at Bridgewater, Nova Scotia, in the year 1937, and the appointment of his successor.

[Mr. MacNeil.]

STE. GENEVIEVE DE BATISCAN, QUE., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. BRUNELLE:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents in the possession of the Post Office Department, dated from October 6, 1936, to date, with respect to a charge of political partisanship made by Willie St-Arneault against postmaster J. A. Bouchard of Ste. Genevieve de Batiscan, county of Champlain, and also relating to the investigation which followed, and its results.

Motion withdrawn.

RELIEF ADMINISTRATION—FEED, FODDER AND FOOD PURCHASES

Mr. PERLEY:

For a return showing, the names, addresses, occupation or business of persons or firms employed in connection with relief administration, as agents, commission merchants or otherwise, in the purchasing of feed and fodder in the province of Manitoba and in the state of Minnesota, and the amounts paid to each such person or firm.

Mr. PERLEY:

For a return showing,—

1. The quantities of cheese, beans, fish, fruit, vegetables, hay, fodder, feed and seed grains and other products, purchased directly or indirectly and shipped by the government into Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba for relief purposes, between the first of July, 1937, and the present date.

2. The names, addresses, occupations or business of persons, firms and corporations from whom such goods were purchased, with the quantities and value of such purchases from each person, persons, firm or corporation, showing prices paid and the points of delivery to the government and points of distribution in the said provinces.

3. The total purchase price of such material.

4. The amount paid for freight on each class of goods.

5. The total cost of storage and handling at points of shipment.

6. The total cost of handling and storage at destination.

7. Cost of reshipment, including handling and freight from first destination in Saskatchewan to final destination.

8. Names, addresses and amounts paid to all persons engaged in: (a) dividing up and reparcelling each class of said goods; (b) distributing such goods; (c) warehousing.

9. Total amount paid for demurrage, and to whom.

10. The final points of shipment from which such goods were distributed.

11. The area described by municipalities or otherwise, within which such goods were distributed.

12. If such goods were distributed to those on relief only, or to the population in general.

13. The total cost of such shipment.

14. From what vote this money was paid.

15. The amount obtained by governor general's warrants for the purpose of providing for the costs of this distribution.

16. What amount of each class of such goods was produced in Saskatchewan in the year 1937.

17. What amount of each class of such goods was imported into Saskatchewan from other provinces of the dominion, and from outside Canada, in the year 1937.

18. The part the government played in the distribution of free goods contributed by persons, firms and corporations, to Saskatchewan, and the quantities of such goods handled or distributed by the government or any official thereof.

19. The points in Saskatchewan where final distribution of such contributed goods was made.

20. The instructions given officials of the dominion government in Saskatchewan with respect to the distribution of: (a) goods purchased and supplied by the dominion government; (b) goods supplied by voluntary contribution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I imagine the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) would like to have a look at this motion, and in the circumstances perhaps my hon. friend would not object to it standing for a few days.

Mr. PERLEY: That is quite all right.

Motion stands.

ILE AU HERON BIRD SANCTUARY

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

For a copy of all papers, telegrams, petitions, and all other documents in the possession of the government, Department of Mines and Resources, concerning an order in council passed on Wednesday, the 22nd day of September, 1937, establishing a bird sanctuary under the Migratory Birds Convention Act, chapter 130, R.S. 1927, to be known as "Ile au Heron" bird sanctuary in the area including that portion of the St. Lawrence river from Victoria bridge to the westerly intake of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power plant, which lies approximately opposite the easterly limit of the Caughnawaga Indian reserve, and covering the area where hunters, fishermen and boat owners who live in Verdun, Point St. Charles, Laprairie, St. Lambert, Cote Ste. Catherine and La Tortue are prohibited at all times, within the said sanctuary, to exercise the above-named sporting recreations.

NIAGARA RIVER BRIDGES

Mr. ESLING (for Mr. Church):

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the government of Ontario, or any other persons, and the dominion government, with respect to the construction or reconstruction of new bridges across the Niagara river, between the years 1923 and 1930, or in reference to the observation bridge that was destroyed, and the removal of same as a menace to navigation.

NATIONAL REVENUE—REFUNDS OF TAXES

Mr. MASSEY (for Mr. Betts):

For a return showing, all refunds, rebates or remissions, on account of direct or indirect taxation of any kind, made by the Department of National Revenue since November 1, 1935, and in each case the amount involved, the person to whom such amount was paid, and the agent acting on his behalf.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I would prefer not to have the house pass this motion, at least not to-day. There are some very obvious objections to the motion, one of which is the time and expense that would be involved in preparing such a return. If the motion does pass this house I will ask that it be amended so as to cover a period of two or three years before November 1, 1935, as well as the two or three years after that date, but while I am getting the information as to the time and expense involved perhaps this motion might be permitted to stand.

Motion stands.

PUBLICATION "EMPROS"

Mr. MacNEIL:

For a copy of all correspondence, instructions and recommendations, relating to action by the Department of National Revenue in refusing importation into Canada of the publication "Empros."

INDIAN "POTLATCH"

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of all papers, communications and other documents received by, or sent from, the Department of Indian Affairs from or to any person or persons in connection with the custom known as "potlatch" among the Pacific coast Indians during the years 1935, 1936 and 1937.

SALE OF SOREL SHIPYARDS AND ST. LAWRENCE DREDGING FLEET

Mr. PELLETIER:

For a copy of all letters, documents, telegrams, correspondence, agreements of sale or negotiated agreements and other legal documents, in the possession of the government concerning the sale of the Sorel shipyards and the St. Lawrence dredging fleet to the General Dredging Contractors Limited.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, this duplicates a return ordered for the hon. member for Quebec West and South (Mr. Parent) a few days ago. However, both orders can be complied with by the one return.

WESTERN DROUGHT AREA

DESIRABILITY OF WATER CONSERVATION, IRRIGATION AND OTHER PROJECTS FOR REHABILITATION

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should place before parliament at an early date plans, or proposals, for a comprehensive and authoritative survey of water conservation, irrigation possibilities, and other feasible projects for the permanent rehabilitation of the drought stricken area of western Canada and its people.

He said: Mr. Speaker, may I first remark that the resolution asks not for the actual undertaking of large scale irrigation projects, but for the consideration of the appointment of an authoritative committee to look into the feasibility of such projects in western Canada.

From time to time in this parliament conditions in western Canada have been outlined, and if further proof were needed of the extent of the disaster which has befallen not only the western provinces but the entire dominion, it could, I think, be found in the submission of the Saskatchewan government to the Rowell commission. Two or three years ago it was quite usual for some public men to pass off conditions somewhat lightly by saying that one or two good crops would meet the situation. I do not think anyone familiar with conditions existing there to-day would contend that one or two crops would meet that situation.

During the past summer the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) drove over the major portion of the drought area. I drove over it at that time, and again this fall. The picture of devastation one saw was almost indescribable. If one enters Saskatchewan at the southern boundary, from the United States, or at the eastern boundary from the Manitoba border, and drives right across into southern Alberta; thence north to a point just east of Edmonton, thence in a southeasterly direction to about where the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway crosses the Manitoba border, and thence through southwestern Manitoba, he gets an idea of the appalling condition and the huge territory affected by the drought—mile after mile of burnt up vegetation in the summer; mile after mile of black Russian thistle in the fall, a picture which in my opinion is comparable only to that presented by one of the great deserts to be found elsewhere in North America. Indeed, driving over the desert last summer in the state of Washington, where the Grande Coulee irrigation project was being carried out, I could imagine myself in Saskatchewan, except that the vegetation was sage-brush instead of Russian thistle.

Because of this condition, in recent years there has been a disposition to look into the records, and to inquire if this great western country in past days has been subject to periodic droughts. I have read the reports, as no doubt have other hon. members, of the explorers who crossed the great plains during the middle of the last century, and I have noticed particularly the records left by Captain Palliser and Mr. Hind. These records indicate that in those days there had been prolonged and disastrous dry periods.

For example, at page 11 of his report, Captain Palliser says this:

After leaving the eastern limit of the country that is within the influence of the mountains the south Saskatchewan flows in a deep and narrow valley through a region of arid plains devoid of timber or pasture of good quality. Even on the alluvial points in the bottom of the valley, trees and shrubs only occur in a few isolated patches. The steep and lofty sides of the valley are composed of calcareous marls and clays that are baked into a compact mass under the heat of the parching sun. The sage and the cactus abound, and the whole scanty vegetation bespeaks an arid climate, but at the elbow the same arid description of the country was met with, and it seems certain that this prevails throughout the entire distance.

Then, at page 51 of the same report Palliser speaks of his arrival at Fort Qu'Appelle on September 13, 1858. On September 14, he started towards Moose Jaw creek, and in that connection makes this statement:

Our roads during the early part of to-day was mostly through a country moderately well wooded, over good land, well suited to agricultural purposes where there were also lakes and hay producing swamps, but towards evening, we began to observe symptoms that showed us we were again near the line of desert country, or northern extension of the North American arid basin.

Again, at page 52 of the report, September 15, 1858, he makes this statement:

Our course was due west and, as far as the eye can reach nothing but desolate plains met the views; at noon we reached a small creek called "the creek before the creek where the bones lie"; here we found water and some little grass, also a few willows and cherry bushes, but no wood fit for fuel. In the evening, reached the creek where the bones lie—

Probably that is where Regina now stands.

—where we found water and very little grass; a few willows also grew here, but no wood fit for fuel.

Then, farther down on the page he adds:

We reached the Moose Jaw creek where there was wood and water. Here our Indian, Nichiwa, advised us to bring wood for five nights along in our carts, and told us it was the last we should see between this and the elbow of the south Saskatchewan.

They camped several days later on Thunder Mountain creek, and again his comment of the neighborhood is made in these words at page 54:

The grass in this arid soil, always so scanty, was now actually swept away by the buffalo, who, assisted by the locusts, had left the country as bare as if it has been overrun by fire; even at the edge of Sage creek, we could obtain very little grass for our horses.

I need not quote more from Palliser's report, except to say that from the Elbow north he reports a wooded country, in his opinion well suited to agriculture. The description of the southern area is a description of what is now known as the drought area.

Another traveller, whose narrative is to be found in the parliamentary library, is Henry Youle Hind, M.A., F.R.G.S. He, too, explored the country in 1858, but took a more southerly route in Manitoba, and along the Souris river. At page 297 of volume I, Mr. Hind speaks of the grasshoppers, which usually accompany drought. He says:

Upon one occasion the whole heavens towards the south, east and west, appeared to radiate a soft grey-tinted light with a quivering motion, and the day being calm, the hum produced by the vibration of so many millions of wings was quite indescribable. The aspect of the heavens during the greatest flight we observed, was singularly striking. It produced a feeling of uneasiness, amazement, and awe in our minds, as if some terrible, unforeseen calamity were about to happen.

That was on July 2, 1858. Then, at page 338 he speaks of the difficulty of obtaining wood, and regrets that they carried none with them. He says:

No tree or shrub or even willow twig could be seen in any direction from our camp on the morning of the 25th.

He adds that they went supperless to bed and the customary breakfast of tea and buffalo meat was impossible. This, may I add, was the day after they left Moose Jaw forks. This description of the country before the white settler came would indicate that drought conditions were not unknown in the days when the prairie was covered with thick sod and prairie wool and when the subsoil moisture had not been depleted by the raising of heavy cereal crops. Then came years of settlement which, with intermittent but short dry periods, were years of fairly satisfactory rainfall. Because of this, the dangers ahead were not recognized by governments or by those interested in the settling of western land.

It should be noted, however, that shortly before the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were formed in 1905 the then premier of the Northwest Territories, Sir Frederick Haultain, who, I am glad to say, is still living, proposed that one province should be formed between the Manitoba boundary and the mountains. He wanted the new province to own and control its own lands and natural resources, and he particularly desired provincial control of southwestern Saskatchewan and southeastern Alberta. Sir Frederick desired to control these lands partly because he wished to retain them as ranching and grazing country. He did not consider them to be suitable for settlement, but a reading of the records would indicate that to a large extent those who wanted to open up these lands for settlement argued that it was the selfish interest of the ranchers that governed Sir Frederick's policy. There are members of this house, particularly the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), who will remember this controversy quite well.

At all events two provinces were formed and a new premier was designated for Saskatchewan by the federal Liberal government of the day. In the ensuing provincial general election Sir Frederick Haultain and his provincial rights party were defeated. Old timers in that part of Saskatchewan and Alberta continued to declare that the new settlers and homesteaders who came into that country to break the land would one day be faced with drought and be ruined. History seems to have vindicated their predictions to a regrettable degree. This dominion parliament must take the responsibility for the opening up of this territory for farming operations and, therefore, the rehabilitation of the area should also be a federal responsibility.

The cause of drought in western Canada is not hard to find. As someone said in this house during the debate on the address, it is primarily due to lack of moisture. I draw particular attention to that statement—a lack of moisture, not a lack of rain. In the days when the prairie plains were simply the haunts of Indians and grazing lands for herds of buffalo, the land was covered with short grass which made no great demand upon the stored up moisture in the subsoil. When the snow melted in the spring or when rail fell upon the natural covering, it slowly percolated through the tiny openings in the grass and down into the subsoil where it found storage space. This storage was assisted by the thick sod which from year to year formed and grew thicker, thus holding the winter snow and minimizing surface evaporation. When the pioneer settlers took over this unbroken land they found beneath it a rich store of subsoil moisture that had accumulated in this way throughout the ages.

What water ran off at that time ran into depressions to form little sloughs, lakes or marshes, and these together formed a watershed from which through seepage and capillary action the level of the subsoil moisture was kept fairly constant just beneath the prairie sod, except in those periods of prevailing drought such as Palliser indicated in his journal. The destruction of this natural earth covering by the settler's plough and the sowing of crops, together with thick growths of weeds, made greater demands on the stored up moisture than the scanty precipitation could replace in a single year. Even in years of normal rainfall, in many areas the moisture was being used up at a greater rate than it could be replaced. Our western farmers have been accused of using the moisture and the chemical content of the soil at too great a rate, but I believe that as a class the farmers do not desire to deplete their soil which, if I may so put it, is their constant capital. However, what choice have they when long periods of high production at low prices failed to enable them to meet their obligations and the fixed charges of taxes, interest, and so on?

The very tilling of the soil has helped also to make the restoration of moisture more difficult. Soil deficient in vegetable matter sheds water quickly, particularly when it is a clay soil. When raindrops fall upon the fine prairie mulch they make a film which chokes for a time the pores of the soil and the result is the water runs off rapidly. Subsequent hot sunshine bakes the clay surface and cements it. I have studied some very interesting statistics gathered by the department of agriculture in the United States dealing with the loss of moisture through the growing of crops and by the formation of this surface film. In its natural state the prairie sod has millions of tiny openings made by little roots, sometimes made by insects and worms, and the water tends to percolate to the subsoil. But with the breaking of the sod, that was ended to a degree. Previously when the raindrops fell on the natural covering they were broken up and they percolated slowly into the subsoil beneath which they formed a reservoir of moisture for future growth.

I would emphasize that to-day that covering is gone, and the wind swept plains unfortunately are with us. All this would seem to indicate that if the west is blessed again with a wet year or even with several successive wet years the restoration of subsoil moisture will not be sufficient to withstand the inevitable dry years that will follow. Because of this in my opinion we must consider ways and means of watering the land and filling the empty sloughs and lakes in the drought region and thus restore the table level of subsoil moisture of which in these days we hear so much. Moreover the drought region is extending. This is to be expected, because the intense heat of the dry land dries up land adjacent to it, and the desert tends to extend. Wind erosion follows and dust and the blowing topsoil cause still greater disaster.

There are those who say that irrigation is not feasible because there is a lack of water. But wheat is a semi-arid plant which requires a minimum of moisture provided it receives that moisture at the right time. In several of the recent so-called dry years the annual precipitation has been sufficient to ensure a crop of wheat, but the crop failed because the moisture did not fall at the right time; the subsoil moisture was lacking to carry the crop along. Hence it is not a question of large quantities of water, but of being able to deliver at the right time to the growing crops the comparatively small amount of water often required. For this purpose I believe there is sufficient water in the rivers and streams of western Canada.

A friend of mine last summer, when the days were hot, stood near Saskatchewan landing and watched the south Saskatchewan, incidentally lower than usual, roll by. He told me that the river was in flood—not a great flood such as we have known in the past, but comparatively in flood—at a much higher level than normal last year, and flowing at about eight miles per hour in a channel one-quarter of a mile wide. He estimated that if the water were diverted it would cover many sections of land one foot deep within twenty-four hours.

Mr. STIRLING: What month was that?

Mr. COLDWELL: That was in July. I do not know how correct that estimate is, but I do know that vast quantities of water are flowing through the parched lands both from the North and South Saskatchewan rivers to the Arctic seas without being utilized in any way whatever. I have endeavoured to discuss these matters with engineers and others who have looked into the problem; I have gone carefully over the contour maps of the dried-out area, and as a layman I would say that wide-scale irrigation seems to present no insuperable difficulties, either physical or financial, on the northern side of the Missouri-Coteau divide. True, some damming might be required, but the height of the land over which the water would have to flow from, let us say, the South Saskatchewan, near Riverhurst, down to the Moose Jaw area, across the Regina plains and down to the Souris at Weyburn, presents no formidable difficulties in these days of scientific engineering.

I have read that someone has suggested that any necessary pumping might be done by windmills; for the wind blows almost continually across the great plains. When I remember that windmills have been in operation for centuries in Holland, pumping water over dykes and out into the sea, I see no reason why equally cheap power should not be pumped from dammed rivers of western Canada over such heights of land as may be necessary to water at least a large part of these great plains. Electric power might be generated and utilized partly for this purpose. The valleys of both the Saskatchewan rivers lie between great banks and there are several places where dams could be conveniently located and power generated if desired. If it were necessary to divert some water from the North to the South Saskatchewan river, and to supplement the latter, irrigating the intervening county as it flowed, I believe that could be done.

Many people conceive of such channels being long straight cuts across the prairies, through hills and valleys; but that is not at all necessary. There are depressions running north and south and east and west which could form the basis for channels to be cut, and these could wind across the countryside following the line of least resistance and the most inexpensive engineering practice. The Kindersley, Rosetown and Biggar territories might be benefited in this way.

I have been told by engineers that dams placed at intervals on the South Saskatchewan, south of Saskatoon, to the point at which the Red Deer joins the South Saskatchewan in Alberta, would impound sufficient water to give moisture to the whole of central and south eastern Saskatchewan. I do not know. But that is something we should, as a parliament, find out. The little sloughs and large lakes now dry could be filled, and the table level of subsoil moisture raised again to its old level, while in many years an inch or two of water on the parched land at the right time would ensure a bountiful return for the labour expended.

Schemes like these should be investigated. I want to say quite frankly that as a layman I am not in a position to say whether such schemes are feasible or not, and I therefore deprecate definite statements made by other laymen that irrigation is an impossibility in western Canada. I have heard persons who, I am quite sure, know no more about this subject than I do, make the definite statement that all these schemes are quite impracticable. I am willing to admit that personally I do not know, but with the knowledge that I have I am persuaded that it is worth investigating. There are those who hold that a scheme of large-scale irrigation would involve an expenditure of $400,000,000. Personally that would not frighten me when I remember that we have spent more than $100,000,000 in recent years in agricultural relief, and have nothing to show for it, to say nothing of the enormous losses due to crop failures. But I am persuaded that for one-tenth of that $400,000,000 expenditure which some people have suggested would be necessary, dams could be built along the South Saskatchewan that would irrigate several million acres of good agricultural land. The larger scheme could, if necessary, be completed over a long period of years. When I see the puny efforts being made in western Canada, and contrast them with the great projects I have seen in the United States or read about in India or Africa, I realize that we should investigate thoroughly the possibilities of irrigation in our own country.

Last summer I went down into the United States and visited several of the great projects there. I went to the Fort Peck dam in the state of Montana, which is not, primarily, of course, an irrigation project but rather a flood control and power project, with irrigation as incidental to them both. There I saw an earth dam which will rise 240 feet above the river bed, the length of its main section across the river valley being 9,000 feet. The dam will contain approximately 105,000,000 cubic yards of earth, 1,600,000 cubic yards of rock, and 4,000,000 cubic yards of gravel. The great reservoir to be created by this dam across the Missouri river will store over 19,000,000 acre-feet of water. It will have a maximum surface area of 245,000 acres, and will be 180 miles long, with a maximum width of 16 miles. This will be one of the great new projects of North America. It will cost $100,000,000 and give employment to thousands of men who otherwise would be unemployed. Even the damming of either of the Saskatchewan rivers would be a relatively small affair compared to this.

Mr. DUNNING: How much land will it irrigate?

Mr. COLDWELL: I said that it is primarily not an irrigation project, but it will irrigate, as time goes by, large sections of a country which is much more difficult to irrigate than our prairie country. As the minister probably knows, it is situated in a hilly, semi-mountainous country, somewhat like our foothills, and the project is not primarily an irrigation project. It illustrates how vast quantities of water may be stored.

Mr. DUNNING: But there is plenty of prairie down below.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, and that would be irrigated. I saw the American projects around Malta, Montana, and drove from the arid prairie into a veritable garden of Eden, as did the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) just a few days before I arrived there. I then drove on across the mountains and saw another project in the state of Washington, where a desert looking very like our prairie will be watered by the Grande Coulee development from the Columbia river. There they are going to irrigate several millions of acres of desert country. These are giant undertakings, and from an examination of contour maps on both sides of the line I am convinced that irrigation projects on the great Canadian plains are relatively small when compared to these.

There are those who criticize such proposals on the ground of expense, but the alternatives are too terrible to face. Either we shall have to keep thousands of people on almost continuous relief or remove them from the lands they now occupy. Railways have been built to open up these territories and to serve communities established along the way. Men and women have built their homes there and unless we can rehabilitate this great area they face utter ruin. Schools and churches, with the usual business necessities, have been established and will have to be abandoned. The effect upon the economic structure of all Canada will eventually be profound, for eastern industry has as much interest in this rehabilitation as have the people who live there to-day. Rehabilitation of the country would not only rescue the people from poverty, misery and relief but would make available lands upon which thousands of our young people might establish homes, and might live, under proper conditions, in comparative security.

I am suggesting then that an investigation be made to see if any of these projects are feasible and that large scale irrigation if feasible should be undertaken as a national plan and as a national responsibility. There are those, as I have said, who will lift their hands in horror at the proposed expenditures; some will call them handouts to the west. But in days gone by much larger handouts of these very lands were made by the federal government to powerful interests and corporations whose headquarters were located in our eastern cities. What a wonderful gift it was. The inalienable right in perpetuity to this land was given to corporations who, without regard to surface or soil analyses, turned them over to hardy pioneers whose efforts turned them into farms, but whose obligations caused them to deplete the rich reserves of moisture and chemicals that nature had stored through bygone years.

In recent years great irrigation schemes have been brought to successful conclusion in other parts of the British empire. British engineers have watered deserts in Africa and India; in the province of Sind in India the Lloyd barrage is one of the wonders of the world. When that scheme to utilize the river Indus is fully developed it will water 7,500,000 acres and bring security in a land where the desert has made life uncertain and caused suffering to many millions. Of the great projects in the Sudan and in northern Africa I do not propose to say anything at the moment, because I have not the time; but in North America, in India and in Africa, American and British engineers have, after careful surveys, watered the deserts there, giving economic security and crop certainty not only to those who till the soil, but to millions who depend on the products of that toil for their subsistence.

My resolution does not ask the government to undertake any such projects, but to obtain an authoritative survey in order that we may know whether such a scheme for western Canada is scientifically feasible and economically sound. My suggestion now is that such a committee should consist, not of departmental officials whose ideas have perhaps been moulded to some extent by the political environment in which they find themselves, but rather of authorities such as engineers who have been connected with one or other of the great projects to which I have alluded. If it were possible, an engineer in charge of the Indus development, an engineer who has had charge of the Sudan development, an American engineer connected with one of the great projects in the United States, and a Canadian engineer of outstanding ability in this direction, or any two or three of them, would make a commission whose authority and standing could not be questioned. My objection to what has been said throughout the country regarding irrigation, both for and against, is that it is being said by laymen, men often filled perhaps with political prejudice and not equipped to give authoritative judgment upon matters of this description.

I have not dealt with the power which could be developed by large-scale irrigation schemes, but in my opinion that would electrify the whole of the Canadian northwest, bringing new comfort and power to the people who live there in this age of electricity. Moreover, in mixed farming areas, it would enable farmers to refrigerate their dairy and meat products and do much to improve the standards of Canadian farm produce on the markets of the world. For these and other reasons, which will no doubt be brought out by other speakers, I urge the adoption of the resolution.

I believe that the time has come when we have to consider this problem of the rehabilitation of western agriculture on a much larger scale than anything we have thought of doing up to the present time. I do not want to emphasize the misery and want and difficulties that face the people; I do not want to emphasize the hopelessness for the children who now live there, the difficulties in schools and the condition of teachers, all of which are due to the long periods of economic disaster and crop failure in that country. But I believe that we shall not be doing our duty if we simply say that these proposals are not feasible or if we say that the rain will fall again and the crops will grow. The history of the western country shows clearly that throughout the years that have gone by there have been from time to time long dry periods as well as wet ones, and if we have a wet period coming now we are sure it will be followed by a period without sufficient moisture. We must face that fact. I am not asking the house to authorize any particular irrigation scheme, but rather to obtain the very best advice that it is possible to get wherever we may find it, anywhere in the world, in order that we may know whether large scale irrigation is feasible or not.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): I am sure the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) will pardon me if I do not specifically follow him in his remarks. I am quite in sympathy with the tone of the resolution, but I am afraid that before I get through the house will judge that I am not able to go quite as far as the hon. member did. Nor do I entirely follow some of the arguments he has made. It is perhaps fortunate that to-day this same subject is under discussion in the legislature of Saskatchewan. On Thursday last a resolution was introduced by Mr. Stork to which an amendment was proposed by the provincial Minister of Public Works when the subject came up for discussion. The amendment rather appealed to me in the moderation of its terms. The amendment was:

> That this assembly expresses its gratitude for the appropriations made by the federal government in its general rehabilitation program and for the works begun and constructed in Saskatchewan for the conservation and utilization of water for irrigation and stock watering purposes; and further
>
> This assembly would respectfully request that sufficient moneys be provided from year to year so that detailed surveys of all watersheds not yet fully investigated be carried on with a view to facilitating the construction of all necessary projects found to be economically feasible, and also that the whole federal program be so extended and enlarged as to include the entire province.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Would the hon. member also read the motion?

Mr. BOTHWELL: The motion was as follows:

> That this assembly respectfully request the federal government to set aside an appropriation of at least $50,000,000 this year, to be used in investigation and completion of feasible water conservation, irrigation and other projects, directed towards the permanent rehabilitation of the drought area of this province.

This question of conservation of moisture in the prairie provinces and the rehabilitation of the farmers there perhaps goes back to the time mentioned by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. The Palliser report and reports of the early surveyors in the prairie regions did express doubts as to whether, on account of the lack of rainfall, the great central plains region would be suitable for agricultural purposes. Back in 1901, in the territory which is now comprised within the boundaries of Saskatchewan, we had only about 100,000 people. Since that time, through continued years of sufficient moisture to grow crops, the influx of settlers became very great, until at the present time we have 930,000 odd in that area of Saskatchewan. From the early settlement down to 1929 the people who settled there were able to make a good living. They found the soil productive, and they were able to build roads, bridges, schools, government and municipal buildings, and all that sort of thing; and the debt of the province up to 1929 was more than represented by physical assets in the province. Since 1929, on account of the drought, the country has not been the finest place in the world to live in, and the debts of individuals, municipalities and governments have mounted up tremendously.

By 1934 the dominion government realized that the taking of steps to rehabilitate that area had become a federal responsibility, and an act was later passed by the federal government under the leadership of the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) known as the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. Moneys were appropriated under that act and an organization set up to see what should be done to rehabilitate the area. That work has been carried on ever since, more money being expended each year, under three heads —reclamation, conservation and rehabilitation. We believe that the experience gained in the expenditure of that money has taught those who are interested in the projects on the ground, as well as people generally throughout the dominion, that the work that is being done is well worth while, and we all hope to see the complete rehabilitation of that whole area.

I might say in passing that I think the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act had the support of every hon. member in the house, no matter what his political affiliations. The intention was that some form of organization should be set up under which we would be able by some means to reclaim lands that were drifting and blowing away; also that we should find a way to conserve the rainfall and prevent its being carried off in spring freshets. Farmers or settlers in areas that have suffered severely from drought conditions and whom the organization could not see means of rehabilitating in the area in which they were located could be moved to other lands where they would have a chance of making good. In connection with the work of this rehabilitation board the first major step that had to be considered was what had been achieved in the past by the methods followed. In that connection I think I should go back to the work done through the dominion experimental farm at Indian Head many years ago. There they developed the idea of summer fallow for the purpose of conserving moisture. The next step in the rehabilitation plan was the development of marquis wheat, practically eliminating, as it did, the frost hazard in those areas and moving a considerable distance north the limit of territory upon which wheat could be grown. Marquis wheat has now become the standard of quality in hard spring wheats throughout the world.

The next step came in Alberta, by the introduction of strip farming and trash covering of the soil for the purpose of conserving moisture. The objectives of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act may now be outlined as follows:

1. Establishing of dominion experiment substations which are essentially outposts of the dominion experimental farms, set up under the rehabilitation program.

2. Organizing of agricultural improvement associations where individual farmers and ranchers organize for community activity, including establishing of strip farming and trash cover crop methods to control soil drifting, regrassing work and tree planting.

3. Reclamation stations established for the purpose of reclaiming land for agricultural use or of reestablishing a suitable grass cover on land which has been severely damaged by drought and soil drifting and has become a public menace.

4. Grass development for the purpose of determining improved methods of establishing grass on land subject to soil drifting.

5. Tree planting, including free distribution of trees and large scale demonstrations of field shelter belts.

6. Establishing of a fully equipped soils laboratory at Swift Current experimental station for the purpose of continuing investigations of soil moisture and soil drifting in the drought area.

7. Continuation of soil survey and soil classification in the drought area in cooperation with the provincial departments.

8. Large scale soil moisture conservation projects, including contouring, terracing and furrowing to determine the value of such work.

9. Agricultural economic survey throughout the drought area.

10. Financial assistance in reestablishing settlers now on sub-marginal lands and reseeding of these lands for community pasture purposes.

11. Assistance in developing a sheep and cattle policy in connection with sub-marginal lands developed for community pasture purposes.

12. Engineering and financial assistance to individuals and communities in building dugouts, stockwatering dams and irrigation schemes where feasible.

These are the objectives of the prairie farm rehabilitation board, and for the past few years they have been working along these lines. It is quite true, as the hon. member who preceded me has said, no person who has not seen the drifting areas of western Canada can appreciate just what they are like. Last August I circled through a stretch of territory where scarcely a green thing of any description was to be seen; with soil drifting, rolling all the time, even though scarcely any wind was noticeable. The experimental farm at Swift Current, with the assistance and perhaps under the direction of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation board, experimented on about ten thousand acres of land scattered throughout that area in half sections. They used different methods in different places to find how they could control this soil drifting, and they believe they have found a method of doing so. There is a large area, however, that has to be looked after. It extends perhaps from some place east of Swift Current to about Bassano in Alberta, south to the United States border, and north of the South Saskatchewan river as far as Lloydminster. Throughout all that area work has been done with the assistance of the experimental farms. One day last August, when driving along there were times that I could scarcely see the radiator of the car. I had to creep along the side of the road in case some other car might come out of the dust storm. Finally I came to a half-section of land just south of the railway track at Fox Valley where work had been done with the help of the dominion experimental farm. I thought the storm had gone down, that it was all over, but after I got past that half section of land I found the situation just as bad as ever.

There they had listed the west side of the land with a new machine called a lister, which throws up a heavy furrow. They had run this lister one trip across the half section, north and south, every eight rods. They found that they were able to stop this drifting by doing that—not necessarily every eight rods but possibly every twenty rods, depending upon the type of soil in which they were working. In discussing the matter with the superintendent of the experimental farm at Swift Current I was informed—and I presume it will be in his report to the department—that the territory comprised within the area I mentioned will have to be farmed in a way somewhat similar to that I have indicated, by using a lister or some machine that will do similar work. A cultivator properly equipped may and will do just as satisfactory work, and in the trenches dug by these machines they are able to conserve whatever moisture there may be.

In addition they believe that by a system of terracing throughout that area, with machines such as I have described, they will be able to conserve a considerable portion of the normal run-off water in the spring and also the rain that falls during the storms, of which we have a few even in the driest part of the area. In addition, under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act they are encouraging farmers to put in dugouts, small irrigation projects and stock watering dams. According to my information, up to January 15 of this year over eleven thousand applications had been received from the three prairie provinces in connection with these small projects. Over half of this number, or over 7,100, were from Saskatchewan; 1,800 were from Manitoba and less than 2,500 were from Alberta. Over 820 of the applications received have been cancelled, rejected or dropped, leaving over 10,500 active applications, in addition to hundreds of letters that are receiving attention. Of these applications approximately 5,500 have been authorized or approved for construction, and of these nearly 4,300 have been completed or reported completed.

That is not going to solve the whole difficulty in that country, but the prairie farm rehabilitation board and the officials of the experimental farms have encouraged the farmers to form agricultural improvement associations in various parts of the province. To-day something over one hundred of those agricultural improvement associations have been formed. The object of that is to get the farmers who are interested in a particular district together so that they can discuss their difficulties and in unison work out some plan whereby not only the individual but also the whole community will be assisted. It is believed that more can be accomplished by getting the people on the land to work together to assist themselves than can be done by any widespread government expenditure of money.

In addition to the conservation of moisture in dams, dugouts and small irrigation projects, the terracing of land, the use of the lister and that sort of thing, they have worked out a scheme whereby the lands that are not properly arable will be taken out of cultivation. In the province of Saskatchewan we have, I think, about 30,000,000 acres of broken land. In 1936 there was something over 22,000,000 acres actually seeded, and an area about one-third that size would be in summer fallow, which would bring the total to around 30,000,000 acres. It is authoritatively stated that large scale irrigation projects in that province cannot take care of more than 1,500,000 acres.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am very much interested in what my hon. friend is saying. Would he state his authority for that figure?

Mr. BOTHWELL: My authority is the engineers in Regina who are interested in the work. It has been so stated by the chairman of the board and also by the Hon. Mr. Spence, who I believe is the liaison officer between the board and the federal government. Then, I have personally discussed the matter with engineers, particularly Mr. McGavin of the water rights branch in Regina, and Mr. Russell, chief engineer on the rehabilitation program. Although a complete survey of all possible projects has not yet been made, nevertheless

I believe these gentlemen are pretty well satisfied that large-scheme irrigation projects in Saskatchewan are not possible, because they estimate that the total amount of water obtainable there is only about 11,000,000 acre feet, and about a third of that will be lost in the process of irrigation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Can the hon. member tell us the flow in cubic second feet of the South Saskatchewan river?

Mr. BOTHWELL: No, I am not able to answer the hon. member's question, without making a search. I have the information, though. Then, in Saskatchewan the condition is different from that in Alberta, due to the fact that the land to be irrigated is higher than the water which would be used in irrigation, and the water would accordingly have to be lifted. In Alberta there is the possibility of tapping streams without the necessity of an expensive system of dams, and that water could be carried down to irrigate the lower lands.

While I am not opposed to irrigation projects, and while I believe that some projects are feasible—for instance, the one from Riverhurst mentioned by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar—may I point out that, as I understand the term, and from the hon. member's description of the size of the Fort Peck dam, no large scale irrigation projects are contemplated. A project may be feasible around Herbert, and there may be the possibility of another one near Vanguard, within territory with which I am familiar.

Some of these irrigation projects may be feasible, and possibly should be constructed. But we are still not taking care of all the area. In addition to that, a considerable amount of land within the area should not be used for agricultural purposes—that is, should not be used for farming purposes. At the present time there is a plan to have areas which should not have been broken thrown back into community pastures in an endeavour to have such lands covered with grass and made them capable of producing crops for the sustenance of range stock.

Real success has been achieved along these lines in the experiments carried out at the Scott experimental station within the last four or five years. That station particularly has been experimenting with different kinds of grasses, and they find that the crested wheat grass is possibly a solution to the difficulty of getting those lands covered with grass and putting them in a condition where they can produce feed for stock which may run there.

I was much surprised to find the extent to which crested wheat grass may be the salvation of the province. Tests have been made in the past five years at the Scott station with respect to both cattle and sheep. In 1937 an attempt was made through the use of cattle to determine the relative amount of pasture obtained from grasses. The pasture fields compared were native pasture, brome, western rye and crested wheat grass. In this series the crested wheat grass was sown on the higher land to give it a more rigid test. The animals were rotated on the fields. The fields were fenced separately, and the pastures were not overgrazed. The native grass gave ten cow days per acre; western rye mixed with alfalfa gave forty; brome gave forty-nine, and crested wheat grass gave fifty-eight. To state this in another way, the relative amount of pasture from these fields was, with crested wheat grass equalling 100 per cent, brome 84 per cent, western rye with alfalfa 69 per cent, and native pasture 17 per cent.

In connection with sheep the difference in the third year was still greater. The statement is made that when western rye was practically all dead and gave no pasture, brome provided 38 per cent of the pasture and crested wheat grass gave 62 per cent. Averaging the three years, crested wheat grass provided about half the pasture on the three fields in question, brome provided slightly over one-third, and western rye provided approximately one-fifth.

These are the views of the superintendent of the dominion experimental station at Scott, Saskatchewan. In his statement he says that crested wheat grass must possess a powerful root system, and goes on to say:

> After three years the sod from these grasses was ploughed. Western rye appeared not much better than a good grain stubble, brome looked much better, but crested wheat matched the best prairie sod.

Then, later on he says:

> Another institution has collected information which further illustrates the comparative sod forming value of these three grasses. The pounds per acre of root fibre in the top six inches of soil from these grasses which had been down for three years was found to be 1,795 pounds for western rye grass, 3,783 for brome grass and 5,079 for crested wheat grass. Furthermore, excavation of these root systems showed western rye roots penetrated the soil to a depth of sixty-four inches, brome sixty-five inches and crested wheat grass ninety-six inches.

It is believed by the superintendent at the Scott station that crested wheat grass, together with the conservation of moisture through the methods I have briefly described, will save a great part of the affected area. Then, by the small irrigation projects many farmers can instal on their farms they will be able to grow from ten to twenty acres of alfalfa, which would tide them over in years of severe drought.

With these various methods it is believed that a continuation of the work now carried on under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act would be more than justified. No tremendous expenditure of money would be required, although we will have to spend more than has been spent in any previous year. Much of the initiatory work has been done, and if we are to rehabilitate the area these projects will have to be carried out.

To illustrate what has happened I obtained from the experimental farm photographs of areas on which they have worked. About forty miles south of Swift Current, near Cadillac, there was drifting soil to such a degree that most people believed recovery impossible. They did not think it could ever be put back into grass. If one were to see pictures of the drifting soil, of buildings half covered with silted soil, and sand a foot deep on the land, and then look at pictures of the same piece of land with a crop of spring rye growing on it in the spring of 1937, he would be amazed. I quote from the descriptive matter in connection with one of these pictures having to do with the Cadillac reclamation area:

> Sufficient cover has been obtained to sow grass seed on the stubble. Rainfall during 1937 was practically nil. The methods practised enabled the growing of this crop.

Then there is a picture of a crop of spring rye which comes up to a man's knees. That was grown on a piece of land that had had a foot of moving silt on it. Down near Mortlach there is another area where the same condition of drifting soil existed. This area has been recovered. One field had been abandoned and had nothing but Russian thistle, tumbling mustard and prairie sage growing on it. A picture is shown of a stand of crested wheat grass on the same field. The caption under the photograph reads:

> Seed was drilled in among the weed cover without any cultivation in April, 1936. Seedlings same up in spring of 1936 but appeared to die off during the hot, dry summer that followed. In 1937 the plants revived, made a good growth and produced seed.

These are actual photographs taken on the ground, and they show just what can be done. These experiments were carried on by the experimental farm under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and they have demonstrated clearly just what is possible in the way of recovery and reclamation. The conservation of moisture by methods found feasible up to the present time, the saving of all run-off water in the spring instead of allowing it to run away as it has been doing, proper methods of cultivation in order to stop drifting, the establishment of stock watering dams and small irrigation projects, and the taking out of cultivation of the lighter soils which, as is now known, should never have been broken up, have all been demonstrated. We believe that with a continuation of the work that has been done under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and with possibly a greater expenditure of money from year to year than has been expended in the past, we shall be able to save all of the area referred to by the previous speaker, and which I have described as extending throughout a tremendous part of that prairie country. Later on in the session, when the estimates are being considered, I hope we will have an opportunity of considering the extension of this program which has been found so feasible for the west.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, generally speaking I find myself in agreement with the objects of this motion and therefore I shall support it. I would direct attention to the fact that the federal government have incurred a certain amount of responsibility for the conditions that exist to-day in the drought areas, because they were in charge of the natural resources of these provinces when the lands were thrown open for settlement in spite of warnings issued by prominent engineers and government surveyors that they were too dry for settlement. To-day we are reaping the tragic consequences of the policy carried out at that time. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has covered thoroughly this particular aspect of the matter, and I shall not take up the time of the house to go over the ground again.

Last fall I received a number of articles from England written by Mr. A. G. Street, a farmer journalist who some twenty years ago had resided for three years in Manitoba. Last summer he returned to Canada and made a tour of the west. He has been criticized severely for the gloomy and tragic picture he paints of the drought area, but, in my opinion it is no more gloomy or tragic than the actual conditions that exist in many parts of this area. Mr. Street referred to the methods of farming which had been followed in these areas in past years, and his comments in this connection have also been criticized. While I realize that some of his arguments may not have been well founded, as a farmer who has resided for some thirty years on the edge of the drought area I know that our methods have been at fault. This fact was realized some three or four years ago by the government of Alberta when they tried by legislation to bring about a change in the methods of farming. They attempted to bring in a general policy of strip farming and trash covering and the sowing of a certain amount of land to grass. I would point out that while trash covering and strip farming may help to control the evil, they do not restore the fibre to the soil.

I agree with the resolution when it states that the government should consider cooperative measures to be adopted. This government should work in conjunction with the farmers of western Canada and encourage them to adopt a policy under which a certain percentage of the arable land of western Canada could be sown to grass. The federal government might give a subsidy or guarantee the price of wheat to farmers who are willing to sow a certain percentage of their land to grass. I realize that at first the amount sown would be quite small because of the lack of seed, but as time went on and seed became available it might be found possible to sow down twenty to twenty-five per cent of the land and keep it in grass over a period of years.

Such a policy would have a distinct advantage. First of all, it would tend to reduce the high peak of the volume of production. It would also tend to increase the low peak of production by putting fibre in the soil and thus preventing soil drifting. It would help to bring about a general stabilization of farming on the western plains. I believe that Mr. Street's articles have had at least one good effect; they will have been well worth while if they have succeeded in warning prospective immigrants in England of the dangers of settling in the drought areas of Canada. They will have been well worth while if they have succeeded in warning the people of England of the dangers of such plans as the Hornby scheme, which I consider to be nothing short of criminal folly if developed at the present time.

Generally speaking, I believe, the argument of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has been sound, and I think the same can be said of the argument of the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell). However, in certain respects their arguments differ. I believe the reason for this is that the drought area of western Canada can be divided into two categories, the permanent drought area and the temporary drought area. It is possible that under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act we may succeed in rehabilitating the temporary drought areas of Canada, provided the weather becomes normal again, but this policy is entirely inadequate to deal with the permanent drought areas.

I wish to deal more particularly with the permanent drought areas, since I am more familiar with them. The permanent drought areas of Alberta would take in that part of the province which lies in the eastern portions of crop districts three, five and seven. I refer to these parts of the province as permanent drought areas because of the fact that it has been necessary to give drought relief in certain of these areas every year since 1918, amounting to over $10,000,000 in the period from 1918 to 1935; and of course since 1935 a greatly increased amount has been paid out. The reason why drought relief was not paid out prior to 1918 was not that the country was not equally dry, but it was newly settled. These settlers came to that country with a certain amount of stock—the land was largely settled in 1910, 1911 and 1912. They were able in those days to run their stock on the open range; but as the land became more and more settled they found it necessary to confine their stock to their own holdings. It took anywhere from forty to fifty acres to maintain one head of stock, and naturally under these circumstances they were not able to maintain their families. Moreover, prior to 1918 there used to be a good deal of construction work carried on in western Canada, and it used to be the common practice for us to put in our little bit of crop and then take a contract on the railroad or some other work of the kind, from which we would make enough money to keep us for the rest of the year. But for a considerable number of years it has not been possible to do that.

I want very briefly to paint a picture of the permanent drought areas, and I do not intend to deal with the matter in an emotional way because I think the house is already familiar with the tragic conditions that obtain there. I should rather like to deal with it simply from the point of view of the facts as they exist.

In certain districts there has been a total abandonment of the land. You can travel for many miles without seeing any sign of habitation, not even a fence. The only thing to indicate that the land was once settled is that it is now covered with a short growth of Russian thistle, and every once in a while you will see a row of rocks running north, west, east and south, which represented many years of hard labour that brought little or no return to the men who did the work.

In other parts of the permanent drought area where the soil is of a better type you will find a sparse population. The heads of families in that area are getting on in years. They have lost their youth and their capital; their plant and equipment is worn out. Their stock has been greatly reduced, especially since the restrictions placed on stock last fall by the federal government; and so far as house furnishings are concerned, in many cases they are non-existent. In spite of all that, you will find that the large majority of these people are still possessed of courage and grit and determination to make good, provided they are given half a chance. I do not believe that anywhere in Canada to-day there is a finer type of citizen than can be found in those drought areas—people who have courage and determination to stick, and are just waiting for an even break to make good.

What is the problem that confronts us? Is it the salvage of the investment of capital in that area? Is it the salvage of the population? Is it the salvage of the land? Or is it, on the other hand, the salvage of all three?

So far as the investment of capital is concerned, that is gone, wiped out. Already eight million acres are under the special areas board in the permanent drought area of Alberta, either through tax sales or through people walking out and leaving the land. So the capital is gone.

Next, there is the salvage of the people and the land, and of these two the most important is the salvage of the people, because the land can be salvaged later. In the salvaging of the people, however, it will probably be found most economical to salvage the land at the same time.

Then what is the solution? It appears to me, after studying this problem for many years, that we are faced with two alternatives: either we have to move a large proportion of that population out of the area, or it must be irrigated. I do not believe we can compromise on that question. Many people oppose the idea of irrigation at this time on the ground that there are in western Canada many lands in productive areas that could be made available and settled, and that we would not be justified in going to the expense of irrigation until such land has been settled. If that is the attitude which the government prefers to take, I would point out that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act does not deal with this problem adequately enough. All they do is to make available free freight to the people in the area; but when people are at the end of their resources, when they are destitute, what good is it to tell them that they can have a box car to move out with unless they have somewhere to go? They have no money to travel around Canada looking for other land, or to maintain themselves, even if they found it, until they are in a position to be self-sustaining.

What we need, it would appear to me, is a progressive plan under which the federal government, or the provincial and federal governments working together, would make a survey of the area with a view to classifying the people into two divisions—those who want to move out, and who might have a reasonable chance of succeeding if they did, and those who wish to stay within the area and continue to raise stock.

Taking the first class, it appears to me that the first step would be for these persons to turn their land over to the government, and then for the government to compensate them for it. I say compensate them instead of pay them for the land, because the land has practically no value to-day. But because these people were encouraged to go into that area, and have put into it years of hard labour and received nothing in return, the government I think would be justified in compensating them for the work they have done. Then the federal government, working in conjunction with the provincial government, should seek to make agreements with the land-holding companies whereby the land could be sold over a term of years to farmers, making the payments sufficiently small to enable the farmers to make a living while at the same time paying for their land. This kind of approach to the problem might make it possible for the farmers who wished to do so to move out of the area. The lands so abandoned could be taken over by the special areas board, divided into economic units, and leased to the farmers who preferred to remain.

I pause to utter a word of commendation with respect to the fine work that has been done by the special areas board in Alberta in the past few years. I would point out that their program has been greatly curtailed owing to the lack of the necessary finances to carry on their work on a really progressive scale.

Coming back to the question of irrigation, personally I am not in favour of moving farmers out of the permanent drought area, mainly for the reason that in that area there is plenty of really good land. All that it needs is water. Secondly, within that area we have already established many services; we have towns and villages, roads and schools, and so forth. I think all we need in addition is water, and if we get that, we can yet make that a prosperous area.

Prior to 1921 there was a good deal of interest in and discussion of a large-scale irrigation project, and in 1922 a preliminary survey was made of what is called the North Saskatchewan project. It is generally known as the William Pearce project. The proposal was to divert water from the North Saskatchewan to the Clearwater and the Red Deer rivers, then take it down to Sullivan lake, where a storage reservoir of some million-acre feet would be formed; then carry it by the Eyehill creek and Sounding creek into Tramping lake in Saskatchewan. Below Sullivan lake approximately 470,000 acres would be irrigated and one million acres in Saskatchewan. Under the total project about 1,500,000 acres would have been irrigated and the total cost would have been $105,000,000. The cost, however, of carrying water from Sullivan lake to Tramping lake would have been excessive owing to the very sandy nature of the soil through which the water would have to be carried. It would have run the cost to about $70 an acre to irrigate the land in Saskatchewan, and for that reason the scheme has been generally condemned. On the other hand there is for Alberta a modified scheme known as the Sullivan lake project, which is believed to be thoroughly sound. Under this project the water would be diverted from Clearwater river and carried down Stauffer creek into the Red Deer river; then a dam fifty feet high would be placed below the mouth of Raven river and the water would be carried, by a canal 146 miles long, to Sullivan lake where 437,000 acres would be irrigated.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do the notes from which the hon. gentleman is reading give the number of cubic second feet that would be taken out of any of those rivers?

Mr. QUELCH: This is a survey that was made by the engineering department and it has been declared absolutely sound. The article is about five pages long and gives a complete description of the engineering features and the sizes of the various reservoirs. I shall be glad to pass it on to the hon. gentleman and he will get full information from it. It is a matter of engineering technique which I should not care to go into now. The areas irrigated below Sullivan lake would be 73,190 acres between Sullivan lake and Hanna; in the Berry creek area, 304,930 acres, and in the Monitor area, 49,240 acres. The total cost would be approximately $23,000,000. In addition to that, another 142,000 acres could be irrigated on the west side of the Red Deer river along Ghost Pine, Knee Hill and Three Hills, bringing the total cost to $27,000,000; and the total amount irrigated would be 580,000 acres.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), speaking in Alberta, said that the Sullivan lake project would cost $28,000,000; but at the time he must have been confusing the two projects, because according to the reclamation surveys—and that is the only record there is—the cost of the Sullivan lake project only would be $23,000,000 while the Sullivan lake project, plus the irrigation scheme on the west side of the Red Deer, would be $27,000,000.

I have discussed this project with the officials of the Department of Agriculture in Alberta, and they say that it is desirable. I have discussed it with the head of the water resources department, Mr. Charlesworth, and he tells me that from the engineering point of view the scheme is absolutely sound. That being so, what would appear to be the main objections? Well, once again we seem to have the same old bugbear; we have arrived at the same dead end that we have reached whenever we have discussed anything else of a progressive nature—the question of money: Where is the money to come from to finance a scheme of this kind?

We must remember that the existence of the drought area is not a local responsibility; it is recognized to-day as a national problem and a national responsibility, and as such it might well be financed under the proclaimed Liberal policy of currency and credit in terms of public need. The project should be carried out as a national responsibility without placing a capital charge against the irrigated land. If we were to try to recover the total cost of such a project by making it a charge against the land it would be absolutely impossible for the farmer to make a living and at the same time pay that charge, and no doubt that is the reason why many irrigation projects in the province have had their difficulties. They have failed owing to the high capitalization of the schemes.

This project is especially desirable in view of the fact that practically all the land which would be irrigated is already owned by the government under the special areas board, and therefore they would be in a position to divide the land into small economic units so that the farmer would have enough irrigated land to make it possible for him to grow feed and seed and to sustain his family.

I would imagine that in Saskatchewan it would be possible to put in similar projects in the area that might be classified as a permanent drought area, and we in this corner shall be only too glad to support the motion in the hope that this government may find ways and means of carrying out progressive measures of the kind I have described.

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Wood Mountain): I find myself in accord with much that has been said this afternoon regarding the condition of the people in the dried out area of western Canada. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion of the drought in western Canada and what can be done to bring about an improvement in conditions there.

The present state of affairs in western Canada is serious; it is one of the biggest problems facing the dominion to-day. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) last year told us that the dried out area in the west represented one-fourth of all the land occupied in Canada, and one-fifth of all improved farm land in Canada. In other words the drought area covers about 18,000,000 acres of improved land and 35,000,000 acres of occupied land in western Canada. It is important to the lives of about one million people in Canada. In my opinion it is a greater problem than even the railway problem. The question what we are to do with this great drought area we have in western Canada is the big problem we have to solve.

In 1934 in the house I advised the then Conservative government to make a survey of drought conditions in that part of the country and to determine for themselves what they would do. One of two conclusions could be reached, either that it was possible to farm this land, or that it was not possible to do so. If it is not possible to farm the land then it is necessary to help the people to move out, and if it is possible for the people to live in that part of the country and to farm it, then they should be given instructions in the proper methods of farming that land, and shown how to cultivate the land so as to make a living in that district. That seemed to be the conclusion. Shortly after that the Conservative government put through a rehabilitation act and work was begun towards a survey of this country in an endeavour to rehabilitate some of our people there. I agree with much that has been said with regard to the condition in that part of the country, but I do not agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) when he tells us what the cause of the condition there is.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. DONNELLY: I beg your pardon?

Mr. DUNNING: I said, "Hear, hear."

Mr. DONNELLY: I have been farming for more than thirty years and I think I know something about agriculture. If you tell me that when you cultivate the land you prevent the water from soaking into it, that the water runs off, and that it soaks better into sod land than into cultivated land, then I must find serious fault with such a theory. I cannot agree with it at all. Any man who has farmed knows that after a rainfall, when you go and look at the sod you may find the water has soaked two or three inches into it, whereas if you cross the road and look at the cultivated land you will find that the water has soaked down eight or ten inches. That is the reason why our sloughs and dams and reservoirs have dried up; the water has soaked down into the cultivated land and has not been running off as it did when the sod was there. There is no doubt of that. We have been farming in order to conserve moisture, to allow the moisture to go down into the land and stay there as subsoil moisture. That is the object of summer fallow, deep ploughing. I disagree with the statement that the condition there was caused by cultivating the land and letting the water run away.

Since this rehabilitation act was passed the purpose has been to teach the farmers, to show them how they may ensure a crop in the dried out area, how they may seed their land and farm it in such a way that even in the drought area they may be assured of some crop, some return for their efforts. With this object one of the first things the government did in Saskatchewan was to make a soil survey. It was absolutely necessary to know what the land was. In the early days when the land was first taken up the price of wheat was good and people were anxious to get land; the land was offered free and people rushed in and took up any land they found available with the idea of cropping it for a few years, getting a few good crops and then perhaps getting out. Much land was taken up and farmed which never should have been taken, sub-marginal land. Now we find much of that land has been abandoned. This soil survey has been completed in Saskatchewan and at present an economic or agricultural survey is being made to discover the condition of the different farmers. That is being done in order to find out what should be done in the different districts. This survey has already been completed in some of the worst districts, but the whole province has not yet been covered. On a lot of this sub-marginal land the taxes have not been paid; the land has gone back to the municipalities and they have turned it over to the provincial government and the provincial government in turn to the federal government. They are fencing that land and, as the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) said, trying to get it into grass again. In Saskatchewan at present a great deal of land has been fenced and about twelve pasture areas, amounting to about 225,000 acres have been established. In Alberta some 595,000 acres have been fenced and pastured. Some buildings have also been built, dugouts, dams, reservoirs and corrals constructed, and up to date methods of cultivation adopted to produce proper pasture, with the idea of creating community pastures where the people, with the direction and assistance of the government, can raise better stock. We are helping the people to stock these pastures with better stock. This is being done both in Saskatchewan and in Alberta. Besides that, I understand it is the intention of the government to set aside a certain amount of these pastures as reserves, so that in dry years it will not be necessary to ship a lot of cattle out to Manitoba and districts in northern Saskatchewan, but it will be possible to keep them right there in these pastures which have not been pastured down. These are some of the things that are being done with these sub-marginal lands.

Then we come to soil drifting. For years most of us did not know what soil drifting was. I have been farming in western Canada for some thirty years, and for probably twenty-five years of that time we did not know what soil drifting meant. It is only in the last few dry years that it has become a problem. I believe that when we have rain again, as we hope we shall in the near future, we shall not be troubled with soil drifting. In order to combat and prevent soil drifting certain steps have been taken. One method is strip farming. If your farm is, say, half a mile long, you cultivate strips twelve to fifteen rods wide and put in a crop; on the next twelve to fifteen rods you will not have any crop but will let it stay in stubble, and so on alternately. This will prevent the soil from drifting. There is no doubt this has a certain beneficial effect. If you have a whole section in summer fallow, once it begins to drift at one end the drifting will spread over the whole field.

Besides strip farming we also sow grass seed in order to get back to grass. To help in this the government have started experimental substations, to the number of something like forty-seven, demonstrating the way to farm in order to prevent drifting. Also we have organized throughout western Canada what are known as agricultural improvement associations, of which we have some eighty-five. In these associations the people meet together to talk over their difficulties; they agree to follow the directions of the men from the experimental farms and substations as to the best way to farm the land. Also men from these substations are going out and sowing grass seed on the rough land, and broadcasting or sowing it with seeders on prepared land. They are sowing it with and without cover crops, with the idea of determining which is the best way to get the land back into grass. So far they are not sure which is the better way, but they make certain recommendations. The membership in these agricultural improvement associations numbers about 11,000 or 12,000 farmers, and to these farmers a certain amount of grass seed is given free for experimental work. During 1935-36 the government gave out, of crested wheat grass, something like 86,000 pounds; brome grass, 25,000 pounds; western rye grass, 8,000 pounds; sweet clover, 35,000 pounds; alfalfa, 7,000 pounds; alsike clover, 500 pounds; timothy, 1,000 pounds; reed canary grass, 500 pounds; cereal grains, 386,000 pounds, making in all 550,000 pounds of grass seed that they have given out freely to these people to sow.

In addition, certain areas have been taken over entirely by the substations in order to try to bring them back under cultivation. This is done where land has started to drift, continues to drift and has been forsaken and is drifting over good land in the immediate neighbourhood. Last year I had an opportunity of going out and seeing several of these areas and watching the work done, and I feel sure that much of this land will be brought back again in the near future and sown to grass.

Another thing being done relates to trees. Some of our theorists claim that trees bring rain, other people say that rain brings trees. Where we have trees we have rain, they say; others say that where you have rain you have trees. In the United States they are experimenting with tree planting. They are planting trees in rows six rods wide every mile for one hundred miles; that will be, as it were, one hundred patches six rods wide and a mile apart, extending from the Canadian boundary to the gulf of Mexico. I do not know if that will determine the question whether or not trees bring moisture; it is hard to say what will be the result over an area of that size; but if these trees grow, in the next forty or fifty years some of the people living then will be able to come to some conclusion on that point. I have often thought that if we on the plains had moisture we would have trees; that it is the moisture which brings the trees and not the trees which bring the moisture.

Mr. DUNNING: Where we have more moisture in the west we have more trees.

Mr. DONNELLY: That is so. But there is just this I want to say with regard to that matter. Under our tree planting policy in the past, especially on the bald prairies, the short grass country, we have tried to concentrate on putting trees around a man's house. That may be a laudable idea but it has many faults. The place where the trees should be planted is the lowest land belonging to a farm. Invariably a man builds his house on the highest piece of land he has. Then, when he plants trees around his house he plants them on the highest piece of land he has. I believe that is the worst place to grow trees. In the late winter or early spring, as soon as the warm weather begins, you have a chinook; the snow melts; the roots of the trees are more or less exposed, and the sap goes up the trees. Probably the next day a frost comes along and the trees are split open and killed. On the other hand if the trees were planted at the lowest point on a man's farm they would gather snow around them; it would not melt off so quickly; the trees would not be subject to chinooks and to having the sap rise too soon, and then they would not be frost killed, as they have been in the past.

I also believe that we have been getting the wrong kind of trees. We do not want trees with roots which spread out on the ground; we want trees which have tap roots, so that the sap will not rise so soon, and they will not be winter killed as they have been in the past. I am not referring to the park section. I know there you can plant poplars, Manitoba maples and so on, and do well with them. I am referring to the dried out area, the bald prairie. In that section of the country we want trees with tap roots, and we want to concentrate on planting those trees at the lowest points of the farms, in order that enough snow may be collected to furnish sufficient moisture to produce a garden, thus enabling a man to raise his own vegetables more than has been the case in the past.

I want to refer more particularly to water conservation and matters of that kind, rather than to trees. The water we have to conserve, or the water we have in the province of Saskatchewan, is from three principal sources. First, we have the ground water, which comes to us by means of springs or wells. On the farm we may have a spring, an artesian well. We have some shallow wells and we also have some deep wells which go down 125, 200 or 250 feet. In some districts there is some irrigation by means of ground water, but not a very great deal. The next source is our rivers, or water that comes from the mountains, and in the latter case the water is almost continuous. We have our rivers, the South Saskatchewan, the North Saskatchewan and so on. Last of all, we have what we call our surface water, the run-off from the snow or rain, and in many districts that is the only moisture we have. That is practically the case in the district I represent.

With regard to my constituency I may say that practically speaking nine-tenths of the run-off goes into natural reservoirs, while the remaining one-tenth goes across the line into the United States. For example, we have Johnstone lake, Twelve Mile lake, Lake of the Rivers, Fife lake, Willow Bunch lake and others. These lakes have no outlets, or at least their outlets have not been in operation for the last twenty-five years. For all that, however, at the present time these lakes are absolutely dry. Where is our water for irrigation to come from? If you are going to have irrigation the first thing you must have is water. Where are you going to get that water? I have gone about from place to place in my constituency and told the people, "If you can show me any place where we can put in a dam I shall have an engineer come and look it over." Last year and the year before I travelled for about a month and a half, inspecting these various dams and reservoirs in Saskatchewan, and I know whereof I speak. We have had engineers in there to inspect these different locations, but our water is so slow in flowing and our channels are so deep that it is impossible to get the water out of them in order to do any irrigating. If you are going to do any at all, it is a pumping proposition. You must have pumps in order to get the water up so that you may use it.

As far as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is concerned, I welcome an investigation into this matter if it will do anything to help us irrigate our farms and be assured of crops, but in connection with many places in that area I do not know how it is going to help in any shape or form. We have, however, small dugouts, small dams and small irrigation projects. These are small works, but so far as I am concerned in western Canada these are really the big things. These small things are what we should concentrate on, because in my opinion if Saskatchewan is depending for its future upon the land it is going to irrigate, then that province is just about through. We are expecting moisture and better farming conditions to return. Small dams, small reservoirs and dugouts will be of some advantage to the people living on the farms when the moisture returns and when, as in the past, we have a reasonable amount of rain. But if we get rain, as we hope to in the future, and as we have had it in the past, our irrigation projects will not be of much use to us, although at the present time we may think they would be.

It has always been found, in every country, that when there are trying conditions the people yell for irrigation. All of them want irrigation. But the moment the dry time passes and moisture returns they forget about the irrigation project; the country must look after that project and keep it in shape. I am satisfied that the government should go slowly in the matter. Do not rush into it and spend a lot of money. Do not say, "We will spend millions; we will have it all fixed up. Our people will then be all right." We know it will not be so. I do not believe that would be the result.

One hon. member referred to a project in the United States. In the states bordering on western Canada I believe there are thirty-one of those projects, and they cost about $193,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: Is that in Montana?

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes, and Idaho and Washington. Some of those projects are in preferred districts. There are irrigation projects in the state of Washington where they grow fruit, beets and things of that kind. Those are crops which yield high prices. It is not a question of growing grain. On irrigated land one might have six crops of alfalfa, one of beets, one of wheat, one of oats and one of barley. I believe the rotation is something like that. Those irrigation projects in the United States serve about 2,000,000 acres.

Mr. DUNNING: The whole bunch of them?

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes, all of them.

Mr. STIRLING: All the way to California?

Mr. DONNELLY: No, just in the states bordering on western Canada.

Mr. STIRLING: Only in Montana?

Mr. DONNELLY: No; there are some in Montana, some in Idaho, some in Washington and some in Oregon. May I repeat that they irrigate about 2,000,000 acres, but on those projects an amount of $157,000,000 is still owing. The people in those states were supposed to pay back the amount in ten years. They have cut off a certain amount from year to year; they have now reached the point where they find that the people are not able to pay, and there is a grave doubt whether they will ever pay. It has been found that the settlers could not establish themselves and also meet the payment charges.

The projects in the United States involved a long and difficult task. People over there say that not only is it a long and difficult task, but they add that it is a very hard matter to take a man from dry farming, place him on irrigated land and teach him how to irrigate it. It is said that the man who is brought from the dry farm to the irrigated farm is more liable to pray for rain than to pay for irrigation. That has been the experience across the boundary line in connection with some of their projects.

Reference has been made to the Fort Peck dam. That was a wonderful undertaking which took place just across the line from my constituency. That undertaking cost about $250,000,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No; $105,000,000.

Mr. DONNELLY: Well, I was told it was about $250,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not finished yet.

Mr. DONNELLY: As a matter of fact, it is not an irrigation project at all. They irrigate a little, but not very much. The idea behind the project is to control the flood waters running into the Mississippi. It is to hold back the waters of the Missouri river.

Mr. DUNNING: Will it irrigate 500,000 acres?

Mr. DONNELLY: No, it will not; the land is not there to irrigate.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member did not refer to it as an irrigation project.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Yes, he did.

Mr. DONNELLY: The engineers from the Fort Peck dam who come into our district all agree that in Canada we are going along the right line. They advise against large developments or extensive irrigation projects. We have moved slowly in these matters, and in future it may be necessary for us to continue that procedure. They advise us to go slowly in matters of this kind.

I would hope that in the future we shall have rain and shall not have to irrigate. With respect to the small dugouts, dams and small irrigation projects, may I say that at present we have an officer known as the agricultural supervisor. A man may send in his application to build a dam or dugout, and the supervisor will drive around to see the location of the farm. If a dugout has been suggested the supervisor will advise the farmer that the dugout should be about 150 feet long, about sixty feet wide and at least ten feet deep. The officer marks out the planned work, and in turn the farmer goes ahead and does the digging. When he has dug it out, and the drainage from half a section, a section or two sections runs into it, it will probably be filled with water, and he will have a supply sufficient for his stock and his household requirements. He finds this a great help in watering his stock, and in the general care of his farm. If the water is about ten feet deep it will last throughout the year, and he is assured of a good water supply.

I have seen some of these dugouts which have been built by communities. These have been about 250 feet long, about 150 feet wide and about fifteen to twenty feet deep, and are projects well worth while. The government began by paying these people about three cents, and raised the rate to four and a half cents a yard. Last year the rate was raised to eight cents a yard. The farmer, with the use of his horses, cannot work for less than twelve cents a yard, so it would appear that he does not get paid for all his work. If the work is done with a drag-line or done by machinery, the farmer may be able to do the work for eight cents a yard. He may be able to get by at that rate. Then, as soon as the farmer has the dugout he must put a fence around it and must plant trees, in order to draw moisture and to hold the snow, so that the dam, dugout or reservoir may be filled.

Then, there are dams. In connection with these the agricultural expert comes along, looks the ground over and gives his decision. In addition, in Saskatchewan there is an engineer checking on the water rights. A survey is made, and the farmer is advised to go ahead. In turn the farmer proceeds to put in the dam, and ripraps it with stone. He gets a certain price for his stone, and a certain price for constructing the dam. The dam is beneficial in the same way. In many cases, with a small dam the farmer is able to irrigate half an acre, an acre or two or three acres and to raise some alfalfa and garden products. These dams are of great benefit to the people in the dried out areas. There are thousands of these dams; more and more people are building them. The people in western Canada are getting dam conscious.

Mr. DUNNING: D-a-m?

Mr. DONNELLY: We believe these dams would be a great help in carrying them through dry seasons. There are also stock watering dams to be used by communities. For stock watering dams in large communities grants as high as $250 are allowed, and eight cents a yard paid. Two, three or four neighbours can go in together to build these and they may also obtain the assistance of the municipality.

In western Canada there are something like twenty larger projects being considered, all of which have to a certain extent to do with irrigation. For example, the ones at Val Marie, Coderre and Eastend are mainly for irrigation purposes. The main object of most of these irrigation projects is to provide forty or fifty acres to each farmer for grass or alfalfa. The pastures for stock will be up on the high lands and it is expected that in the dry years they will be able to raise enough feed and fodder for their stock.

I should like to give some of the reasons why certain of the larger projects have not been continued. I have before me a collection of the opinions of certain experts with regard to these matters. One man has suggested the possibility of irrigating from the Saskatchewan river. That may be possible, but I should like to quote what Mr. Charlesworth, one of the engineers, has to say. I quote:

> The time may come when the construction of more of these larger projects may be desirable but for the present, however, with experience to date, it would seem doubtful whether the expenditure of a large amount of public funds would be wise and certainly not before some assurance was forthcoming that markets for irrigated products are available.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the date of that?

Mr. DONNELLY: This is the summary of the reports, and it is dated January 25, 1938. This is what Mr. Fairfield, superintendent of the experimental farm at Lethbridge, has to say:

> Western Canada can well spend more time in digesting the raw irrigated lands still available that are in or adjacent to the existing irrigation projects before it embarks on any very large new projects.

I understand that in Alberta there is somewhere in the neighbourhood of a million acres of raw irrigated land, and that only half of that has been taken up. In other words, there is something like 500,000 acres of land still to be taken up.

Mr. DUNNING: There is more than that vacant in the irrigation districts.

Mr. DONNELLY: That is what Mr. Fairfield says. I could quote also from the opinion of Mr. Griffin of the Canadian Pacific railway, but my time is about up. I think the government would be well advised for the time being to pursue the policy it has been pursuing of conserving all run-off moisture and of carrying out small irrigation projects where necessary. If we have a long period without any rain at all, it will then be time enough to go into the larger irrigation projects.

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the burden of the resolution before the house for consideration at the moment touches particularly a part of this dominion and some hon. members may feel that a matter of this kind is peculiarly sectional and therefore to be discussed only by those who come from that part of the country affected. So far those who have spoken have come from western Canada, that part of the dominion which has been primarily affected by the conditions which inspire the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). On the other hand, I feel it is important in connection with a matter which touches a section of the country as vitally as does this touch western Canada, that every hon. member should place on record his full recognition of responsibility. There is no section of Canada which is not a part of Canada. We are here as Canadians and, perforce, if we discharge our duties as we should, we should take a keen interest in those matters which may directly affect only a part of the country but which indirectly affect all parts.

As one who lives in Ontario I rise to speak on this resolution, not in specific terms or with any idea of discussing irrigation but in an attempt to convey to the house the fact that, after all, there are those of us who live in the eastern part of Canada who are vitally concerned with western Canada. For western Canada is as much a part of us as is our own province. One has heard it said repeatedly by those who come from the west that the east understands little about the west. Those of us who live in the east have heard it said altogether too often that we do not understand very much about the west and perhaps do not take enough interest in that part of our country. When such a great section of this dominion faces the problem which Saskatchewan faces at this time, it is incumbent upon us to give to that problem our best as Canadians. Our fellow Canadians are being impinged by circumstances at the moment beyond their control.

In the eighteenth century there lived a great American philosopher who was also a statesman and an erudite gentleman. I refer to Benjamin Franklin, of whom the fourteenth edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica has this to say:

> Other men may have been greater, but very few have been more human.

[Mr. Donnelly.]

He left for us many philosophical gems in which to delight, but perhaps no statement of his is more sententious than this aphorism:

> We must all hang together, or assuredly we shall all hang separately.

There has been no sentence uttered in recent years that sounds a graver warning to us in Canada than do those words given to the world by Benjamin Franklin 160 years ago.

I am a firm believer in the rights of groups, whether they be minorities or majorities. I have the deepest and utmost respect for all considered opinions of men, and I firmly believe, as did the fathers of confederation, that local institutions and local laws of all the various provinces should be guaranteed. I am not parochial in outlook or narrow in viewpoint, and whereas I reside in one province I respect the rights of all provinces, just as I respect as a Canadian the rights of all the other dominions and the colonies of the British Commonwealth of Nations. I am not intolerant, and I dislike intensely bigotry and prejudice. I have at the same time a high regard for broad-mindedness and open-mindedness. In other words, I am a firm believer in the spirit that motivated and made possible the Dominion of Canada. I am, you see, Mr. Speaker, a thorough Canadian in spirit as well as in name.

What has it meant and what does it mean to "hang together" in Canada? On Monday, February 6, 1865, the then attorney general, Sir John A. Macdonald, moved in the House of Commons a resolution which reads as follows:

> That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that she may be graciously pleased to cause a measure to be submitted to the imperial parliament, for the purpose of uniting the colonies of Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, in one government, with provisions based on certain resolutions which were adopted at a conference of delegates from the said colonies, held at the city of Quebec, on October 10, 1864.

As an ultimate result of this resolution the Dominion of Canada was born on July 1, 1867. Subsequently, what are now the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, became part of the dominion, so that to-day there is in the northern part of the north American continent a great British dominion stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the 49th parallel of latitude to the wastes of the arctic.

We are indeed a vast country geographically, though a small country numerically. Our population is concentrated in what is essentially a long, narrow strip of territory, extending from coast to coast, along an international border across which lies one of the great nations of the world. We are British, and throughout Canada proclaim our allegiance, along with hundreds of millions of others throughout the world, to the one who is the quick and living centre of the spirit of empire, the personification of the nobility and tradition that belong to those who call themselves British, and we unitedly honour the crown.

We are a complex nation, not homogeneous in any sense of the word. Native within our borders are those of two great races, and we speak two languages.

We have also absorbed into our midst those who have come to our shores from all over Europe and from other continents as well, new Canadians, who in the main have adopted well and sincerely the customs, manners and modes of Canada. We are engaged in a wide diversity of activities. We are farmers, fishermen, miners, lumbermen, mechanics, and we practise all the trades. We have customs which vary widely across our dominion, stretching as it does across a whole continent, 3,500 miles in width.

The habitant of Quebec and the farmer of Ontario are as different in character and characteristics as the Devonshire yeoman and the Highland Scot. The ranchman in the west and the dairyman in the east have personalities as unlike as their occupations. Even the fisherman of British Columbia is a different sort of fellow from the fisherman of the maritimes, while the professional men of the eastern cities are in many ways unlike the professional men in the western cities. But in spite of all our differences in race, in customs, in religion, in habits and in personal and individual characteristics, in spite of the sectional divisions into which this country may so readily be divided, we are a Dominion of Canada, born in 1867, and we have grown rapidly through the last seventy years to our present position of importance as a nation of the world.

Our growth has been as romantic as it has been steady, a growth possible only as a result of the fact that through those seventy years we have all "hung together."

As we look back through the years to 1867 we come to the instrument which was designed to give to us to-day the dominion in which we live—the British North America Act. Here was an act designed and brought into being by men of all shades of political opinion, an act in the designing and passing of which such notorious political enemies as George Brown and Sir John A. Macdonald joined forces, and hand in hand hurdled what seemed at first to be almost insuperable difficulties on the way to their common goal. In their efforts they were supported fully, whole-heartedly and sincerely by many eminent Canadians, prominent among whom was Sir George Etienne Cartier. Have we justified the faith reposed in us by the fathers of confederation? As Canadians we may well be proud in many ways of the accomplishments of this nation. Under the handicap of great space, under the difficulties of extremes of climate, under the hazards and hardships that beset the path of the pioneer, under the menace of possible incipient and unconscious domination by a mighty nation to the south of us, we have progressed to our present degree of national importance and to the point where we are held in international respect. To-day we are eleven millions of people, actively engaged in agriculture, industry and commerce. At first, in our earlier days, we were an agrarian country, bending our full efforts toward the development of our agriculture and agricultural products. In this century we have added the pursuits of industry and commerce, until to-day we are fifth among the trading nations of the world. Not only are our agricultural and manufactured products widely accepted everywhere, but we are now one of the most important factors in both precious and base metals in the world's metal market.

I have taken the time of the house this afternoon, Mr. Speaker—and the house has listened most patiently—to discuss what I have discussed because it seems to me, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, it is incumbent upon all hon. members, so important is the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, to bend our full and united efforts towards finding a solution for this problem. We are challenged by what has been presented in this chamber to-day to realize anew that we are not east and west or nine separate and independent provinces, to forget our sectional differences, to attempt to overcome misunderstandings, and to make a combined and united effort towards the development of a Dominion of Canada that shall be a dominion in fact as well as in name.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. C. R. EVANS (Maple Creek): When the house rose at six o'clock we were debating the resolution of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) with reference to rehabilitation of the drought area. I wish to continue for a short time the discussion of that resolution.

Coming from the southwest corner of Saskatchewan, from a constituency which has suffered severely from drought at different periods over the past thirty years, I believe that we who live in that southwest part and in the drought area have first hand knowledge of the difficulties and problems experienced by our settlers who settled in that district during the early part of the present century. I wish to speak particularly of the southwest portion of the province and to discuss the way in which the farm rehabilitation act applies to us in that district.

Our part of the province is in the plains area about which we have heard so much and we are peculiarly situated there owing to the fact that we are in a semi-arid district. We find that in our district and in the southeast corner of Alberta the situation is particularly adapted to the development of irrigation projects. Our part of the province was settled from about 1907 to about 1914 and in 1910 we had a severe drought in that area. Again in 1914 there was a very severe drought and a total crop failure.

The dominion government of that day, recognizing the severity of the drought of 1914, came to the assistance of the settlers in that area, particularly in southwestern Saskatchewan and southeastern Alberta, and furnished them with food, fuel, seed grain, and feed and fodder for their live stock. I bring this to the attention of the house for the reason that our district was then in the early stages of settlement, and the governments of that period should have realized that it was unsuited for the growing of cereals and the development of agriculture along that line. Prior to 1910 there had settled in that district many people who came in during the 90's—people who had developed the live stock industry—and when the government of Canada decided upon settlement in that area we destroyed the best ranching country in the world, with the result that we have developed a country which is not adapted to either farming or ranching.

We believe that the responsibility for conditions which now prevail in southwestern Saskatchewan rests at the door of this parliament. As late as 1918 we had petitions signed by settlers throughout the southwest asking the Department of the Interior at Ottawa to cancel leases and open up lease land for settlement. To-day the people who settled on these lands are not able to carry on because they settled on sub-marginal lands that were not fit for cultvation. This brings us to the present climax. We have come through seven years of drought in southwestern Saskatchewan. We are trying to overcome in two or three years what has developed during the past thirty years, which is an impossibility. Many of our people are impatient because of the slow movement of the government in the endeavour to overcome conditions that have developed over thirty years.

As I have said, the southwest part of Saskatchewan and the southeast part of Alberta are adapted to irrigation, for these reasons. Down through the centre of the plains area there is a row of hills known as the Cypress hills, which are partly wooded. These hills are dotted here and there with small lakes and numerous springs which are sources of many streams. The streams running on the north and south slopes of the Cypress hills can easily be developed to irrigate land in small or large quantities as the case may be, but we have an opportunity to irrigate land only in the river valleys. There have been developed over past years in southwestern Saskatchewan many small irrigation projects, some of them dating back to 1892. These projects were developed at that early date on Maple creek, Bear creek and Battle creek, and are still in operation. Many tons of fodder have been cut off the lands irrigated by these private projects.

Since 1935, when the rehabilitation program came into force, there has been developed in southwestern Saskatchewan an irrigation scheme. To-day the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) referred to some of these projects. We find that the irrigation projects are being developed in Saskatchewan as rapidly as possible, and while the rehabilitation program is in its third year it is still to some extent in the formative stage and new measures are being undertaken as conditions warrant. The water development program is progressing more rapidly and we are establishing reservoirs of surplus water for stock watering and irrigation purposes. In many districts we are developing large irrigation projects. Take, for instance, the development of the Frenchman river. This river takes almost the entire run-off on the south slope of the Cypress hills. There have been developed so far in the Frenchman river valley an irrigation project at Val Marie and one at Eastend. Last year the Val Marie project had under cultivation about 1,200 acres, and from some of this land there was produced thirty bushels of No. 1 wheat to the acre. On the rest of it we grew fodder and some garden truck. The Eastend project had some crop on it last year, but it is not quite as well developed as Val Marie. This year we have ready for cultivation on the Val Marie project some 4,000 acres.

The Val Marie and Eastend projects have to be supported by a fresh reservoir that is being developed at Cypress lake, which is the head of Frenchman river. This project is now under development, and when fully developed it will irrigate between 30,000 and 40,000 acres along the Frenchman river valley. We know from experience, from the crops grown and the development at Val Marie, that the soil and climatic conditions are suitable for irrigation farming, and all we need is the full development of the water supply. Further development at Eastend will enable us to irrigate between 6,000 and 7,000 acres. When the Cypress lake reservoir is fully developed it will also furnish additional water to continue irrigation in the Battle creek area of another 6,000 to 8,000 acres of land. In addition to the development of this south run-off of the Cypress hills we have under development the Downey lake project. This is on the north slope of the Cypress hills, and is located about twelve miles southwest of Maple creek. This project when completed, and supplemented by other smaller creeks and dams, will make it possible to irrigate another 6,000 to 8,000 acres along the Maple creek valley and its tributaries. Many other creeks on the north run-off of the Cypress hills are being surveyed and we expect will be developed during the coming summer.

One other outstanding development for which engineers have completed their surveys and supplemented their report is located about forty miles southeast of Swift Current, near the town of Vanguard, and is known as the Vanguard project. This when fully developed has the possibility of irrigating between 15,000 and 16,000 acres of some of the best land in Saskatchewan. We expect that this project may be developed this coming season. The development of this project will solve the feed problem of a large portion of southern and central Saskatchewan. Irrigation goes hand in hand with live stock, so we have in southwestern Saskatchewan the development of irrigation projects to supply winter feed for our live stock.

In addition to these major projects many small schemes have been developed by individual farmers, where it has been made possible to store run-off water which will be used to irrigate from five to twenty acres and in some instances up to eighty or one hundred acres on a farm. This is the best form of assistance, reestablishing and rehabilitating the farmer on his own land.

We have also in southwestern Saskatchewan the problem of sub-marginal lands. This was dealt with to some extent this afternoon by the hon. member for Wood Mountain, but I should like to say a few words concerning it. In the early years of this century during the rush for land in the great west, large areas of sub-marginal land were settled on. These lands to-day are not fit for growing cereals. The areas range in size from a few sections to blocks of thousands of acres. Owing to the type of soil and the lack of precipitation the people who settled on these lands have failed. Many of them failed even before the general drought that we are now experiencing.

The problem of what to do with this land confronts us. It has been decided to withdraw this land from cultivation and turn it into community pastures, assisting the settlers on these lands to reestablish themselves on better land as close to the pasture area as possible, where the development of a pasture will enable them to rehabilitate themselves. The development of community pastures in these areas will return the land to live stock production as a range area. This land is fenced and cross-fenced with suitable stock fences, the cross-fences dividing the pasture into breeding reserves and main pastures. As these areas have for the most part been cultivated we find the land in various stages of grass; part of it has the natural prairie grass; the rest may be bare ground or drifting sand. It is therefore necessary to get the grass cover started as soon as possible. The pastures are operated under definite rules, particular attention being paid to prevent overgrazing. These grazing areas will be used for producing the best grades of beef cattle, using the best sires. By this method we hope to produce a uniform animal suitable for the eastern and overseas market. Sixteen of these pastures, varying in size from 6,000 to 25,000 acres, were completed in 1937.

This afternoon the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) outlined the policy of the agricultural improvement associations. I should like to say a few words concerning them as we have a number of these associations established in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and they are accomplishing a great deal of good work. Their object is to encourage farmers in a community to cooperate in the solution of their own problems arising from drought and soil drifting, by the general adoption of such policies as strip farming, cover crops and cultural methods best suited to local conditions. These associations are supervised from the experimental farm in the district. Free distribution of suitable drought resisting grass seed is made to members of the associations. In the past sweet clover, alfalfa, brome grass and crested wheat grass have been distributed to members. The seed so distributed is to be used for seed production purposes, allowing each member to increase his own seed and also gain experience in producing seeded forage crops. Crested wheat grass has been most in demand through the drought areas, and has given promising results. Such organizations as these are necessary to assist the experimental farms in keeping contact with the farmers and to aid in the distribution of seed.

In conclusion I would say that we are advancing in the rehabilitation of the drought areas slowly but surely, keeping in view permanency in policy and getting full value for the money expended. We find that the development of the smaller irrigation projects is most satisfactory. I visited some of those projects that we heard about this afternoon down in Montana. I found that the project developed at Malta was a series of small irrigation projects taking the water out of one stream. I believe that the policy we are following in Saskatchewan in developing the small individual irrigation project is the thing which will reestablish and rehabilitate the drought area in that province.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): First I wish to place myself behind whatever sound means the government decides upon to rehabilitate the province of Saskatchewan. I have heard the cost mentioned here this afternoon, and while cost is always of importance, still I say whatever means the government decide are necessary to rehabilitate Saskatchewan should, irrespective of the cost, be supported unanimously by this country. The country cannot exist without Saskatchewan.

Now I am going to touch on another phase of this subject that has not been dealt with by any of the previous speakers. In a way I hesitate to do so, because, search as I might, on the one hand I have not found engineers to agree as to the real cause of the trouble, and on the other I have not found engineers to agree on the real source or origin of the moisture required for Saskatchewan. Some say one thing; some say another; but before entering upon that phase of what I have to say I should like to pass a word or two of comment on the remarks of one or two previous speakers. First, I refer to some remarks made by the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly). I thought he gave an exhaustive and clear explanation of what he had in mind, and in the course of his remarks he asked a question in reference to something that had been said earlier by, I believe, the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), in reference to the diversion of water from the North and South Saskatchewan rivers. At that time I believe I asked what was the cubic feet flow per second of water on either or both of these rivers, and the hon. member for Wood Mountain asked where the water was going to come from.

That is a problem, Mr. Speaker. If the two Saskatchewan rivers are diverted, it will mean, of course, that the water from them will be lost as far as the rivers are concerned. The water might do splendid work in irrigation projects, but it would not return to the river. I thought it might be worth while just to say something about the flow per second of these two rivers. They vary very widely in their maximum and minimum. The mean average flow of the united Saskatchewan at The Pas, throughout the year 1934-35, October to September, was 22,700 cubic feet per second. The maximum flow was 55,700 cubic feet per second; but the minimum flow, with the water at its lowest point, was down to 3,960 cubic feet per second. The North Saskatchewan at Edmonton ranges from a maximum of 46,300 cubic feet per second to an average of 8,290 cubic feet per second and as low as 460 cubic feet per second as a minimum. So the question asked by the hon. member for Wood Mountain was a pertinent one, in my judgment, inasmuch as the diversions that were mentioned as being required for the irrigation of Saskatchewan were as follows: The hon. member for Acadia said that from the North Saskatchewan there should be a diversion of 6,800 cubic second feet; from the Clearwater river, 1,180 cubic feet per second; and from the Red Deer river, which I believe is a tributary of the South Saskatchewan, 2,275 cubic feet per second.

As I said a moment ago, the question asked by the hon. member for Wood Mountain was quite pertinent, for the total diversion flow that would be required, according to the bulletin entitled Reclamation Service, which was quoted by the hon. member for Acadia, would be over 10,000 cubic feet per second. So if there were a sustained diversion from the North and South Saskatchewan of anything like that number of cubic second feet, it would necessitate some measures to store up the water at the headwaters of those two rivers, as has been done in the state of Arizona irrigation projects. Large reservoirs would have to be built so that the flow could be maintained in all the seasons for which the water would be required.

Another hon. gentleman said something to the effect that it was not lack of moisture in Saskatchewan which was causing the trouble. If it is not a lack of moisture, then it must be a lack of rain. From time to time we have seen in the press the hopes of the people of Saskatchewan, and I might say of the whole world, for the prosperity of the world depends to a large extent upon the production of wheat. The Saskatchewan newspapers, during the wheat growing season, keep reporting, "If we only have rain, such and such will take place." I made a rather extended survey into what I would call the origin of the rainfall for Saskatchewan, but I have been unable to come to any definite conclusions as to the original source of the moisture which formed the clouds above that province. I remember reading the opinion of a former prominent official of this government, I believe in the meteorological service, a celebrated man and engineer. His impression, in which I found concurrence in Washington, was that the moisture which makes rainfall over Saskatchewan originates in the gulf of Mexico. Lately engineers have said that is not so. Others have said that the origin of that moisture is the Pacific ocean; that currents of air come over the Rocky mountains and meet other currents of air over Saskatchewan, and that thereby rain is formed. The engineer, to whom I referred a moment ago, held the opinion—which was shared by many others—that the warm currents of air coming from the gulf of Mexico up the Mississippi and Missouri valleys met colder currents of air over Saskatchewan, coming from the Arctic ocean and Hudson bay, and formed the rain which falls there. I have heard others say that the origin is Hudson bay.

The point I make, Mr. Speaker, is that apparently there is no definite engineering opinion as to the origin of the rainfall which Saskatchewan should and did have. For a long time I have been pursuing studies in connection with rainfall, precipitation and the water production of the St. Lawrence watershed. During the course of my investigations I have asked engineers if part of the rainfall that should and did fall in the province of Saskatchewan by any chance might originate in the great lakes watershed. There again I found there was no one who had a definite opinion. I venture an opinion—which may be entirely wrong, because every other man who has made a study of this seemingly has a different origin for the rainfall of Saskatchewan—that part of it might still be from the great lakes watershed just as well as from the gulf of Mexico, the Arctic ocean, Hudson bay or the Pacific ocean. It might be that all these might be sources of that rainfall. If the government wishes to make an investigation as to where the origin of moisture is for the supply of Saskatchewan, I assume it will have to send up some balloons capable of ascertaining the currents in the air in the upper stratosphere, and determine what can be done.

Whether or not the St. Lawrence watershed has supplied moisture to Saskatchewan is something which no one may tell. I know that on the earth's surface the current of air is eastward, but where is it when it is five thousand feet high in the air? No one can tell where the moisture originates; but if any part of it was from the watershed of the great lakes I am wondering whether the fact that over ten billion tons of water a year are taken out of the St. Lawrence watershed and poured into the Mississippi watershed could have anything whatever to do with the alteration in the amount of moisture, or could have any effect on the moisture which is said formerly to have come from the gulf of Mexico and part of which may have come from the watershed of the great lakes.

That suggestion may sound a little far-fetched, and perhaps it is a long way from the subject of irrigation. However we do know that irrigation is one way of providing moisture, and that rainfall is the real and proper source of moisture. Apparently for a number of years past Saskatchewan has not had its proper share of rainfall, and I should think any body of engineers appointed by the government should endeavour to find out what has happened to the origin of the rainfall which formerly fell in Saskatchewan.

We know that in the St. Lawrence watershed there has been a gradual reduction in rainfall. Later on that fact may have a serious effect, so far as agriculture in Ontario and adjacent states is concerned. I find that at page 43 of John R. Freeman's book, which deals with the regulation of the great lakes, he states that the Canadian meteorological office has said that over a period of fifty years the reduction in rainfall in Ontario has been 2·3 inches, and that the equivalent weighted average reduction for the whole watershed is three inches. That is a colossal reduction. We know that to-day Saskatchewan is suffering from a lack of water, but it may be that in the course of time, unless some measures are taken to return the waters to their proper levels in their watersheds, the eastern provinces may be in a similar difficulty.

A committee sitting in Washington is now considering a measure to alter the judgment of the United States Supreme Court handed down in 1930, in which the court directed that the diversion at Chicago should not exceed 1,500 second feet. The bill before the house asked that commencing in 1939 the provision for 1,500 second feet be changed to 5,000. In the proceedings before the committee one of the congressmen, Francis D. Culkin, quoted from a speech he made on January 18, 1934, in which he said:

> It is no secret that most of this water has been used by Chicago in generating electricity for commercial purposes. God intended this water to flow east through the great lakes.
>
> Its diversion was a larceny, pure and simple, and was destructive of every shore-front locality along the basin of the great lakes.

Worse than that, it has been one of the causes—there are several major causes—of the reduction equivalent to three inches in rainfall over the entire St. Lawrence watershed area. Whether or not that had any effect on the lack of rainfall in Saskatchewan, I cannot say.

Certainly it is true that water finds its own level, and I suppose clouds, in their flight through the air, are partly affected by the water on the surface. I would say that this whole interference with nature which has been going on for so many years has had a much greater effect throughout Canada and the United States with respect to the amount of rainfall and drought than any person knows. The time has come to make a serious investigation.

Whatever investigation the government may determine to make—and I believe it should make one, in addition to what it is now doing—it should deal with the problem of diversion from the great lakes. I believe the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) and the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) reported that the work which has been done in the west has been beneficial. If the storage of water is beneficial in the west, it would be equally beneficial to make an endeavour to return the great lakes of the east to their former natural water levels.

In Washington a few days ago, in connection with this very matter, namely the gradual lowering of the water level of the great lakes, there was a suggestion to build control works across the Niagara river, in order to raise the level of lake Erie, and control works at the outlet of lake Huron, on the St. Clair river, in order to raise the water levels of lakes Huron and Michigan, which are really one lake. This latter is a lake area of 45,000 square miles which is to-day three feet plus, lower than the average level of those lakes for the forty year period between 1860 and 1900. That is a very serious loss of water to the central portion of this continent.

By such works it is possible that the water levels could be returned to their former point, but it would take a long time to do this. If it were returned, evaporation would be greater and, if evaporation on the great lakes has anything whatever to do with rainfall beyond the great lakes watershed, or if it has anything to do with the rainfall east or west of that watershed, no doubt the increased level would be beneficial to the areas adjacent thereto.

May I point out that in this part of the country we are threatened with further diversions of water from northern Ontario, a matter which may or may not affect the rainfall. I take the same stand as that taken by the congressman a few days ago, when he quoted his own speech of 1934, in which he said that God intended the water to flow in one direction. In my judgment man has not any business to divert a large volume of water from one watershed to another.

In the west the diversion of the waters of the two Saskatchewan rivers would not be a diversion from one watershed to another. If there is any possible way of diverting the water of either the North Saskatchewan or the South Saskatchewan rivers for irrigation to benefit the people of Saskatchewan, I for one would support it. However, in view of what I have heard to the effect that the water level is away below the ground level, it would appear that dams, windmills or something of the kind would be necessary to elevate the water. That is not the old system of irrigation which has been handed down from the earliest days.

Egypt diverts water from the Nile north of the first cataract Between that point and the sea is a distance of some five to six hundred miles, and for all that distance the adjacent land is almost level. The river flows quite gently and all they have to do is to tap the water and let it run all over the land. It would be quite a task to pump water up as high as has been suggested by the hon. member for Wood Mountain. It would be much easier if the water could be allowed just to run down hill.

Some hon. member mentioned Holland. I investigated the irrigation projects in that country this summer.

Mr. DUNNING: Irrigation projects in Holland?

Mr. MacNICOL: It may surprise the minister to know that they have such projects.

I investigated 200 square miles of that country. The rivers running from southeast to Rotterdam flow above the land level, but they explained to me that where the subsidiary canals run alongside the main canals they have pumping outfits. Sometimes the water is pumped from the land and on other days it may be pumped back, depending upon the amount of evaporation. Whether or not this actually happens, I cannot say, but that is how it was explained to me. I can see that where you are able to have the water run down hill, your irrigation problems would be much easier to solve than if you have to pump it up.

I rose merely to say that is a too tremendous problem for Saskatchewan to tackle alone. That province has suffered tremendously during the last few years, far beyond wwhat any province should be called upon to suffer. I know in the judgment of the government, this is a national problem. The services of the best engineers, both in and out of Canada, should be obtained and then parliament should consider what is necessary in order that a sincere effort may be made to rehabilitate that great province. When I was home on Saturday I attended a meeting, the report of which will come out later. I shall not say just what meeting it was, but mention was made of the large number of people returning from Saskatchewan to Ontario. I know that some relations of mine who have been farming in Saskatchewan for twenty-five years and have helped to build up that country have had to return to Ontario after losing all they had. While it is no disgrace for anyone to lose all he has after going through six or seven years of depression, the fact is that these people are back here and will have to be taken care of. In that way this matter becomes an Ontario problem. I shall close with the suggestion that the government obtain the best advice possible, which I believe it will do, and then set out to do all that can be done to rehabilitate Saskatchewan. In that I am sure they will have the support of all parties in the house.

Mr. P. J. ROWE (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, the resolution now under discussion reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should place before parliament at an early date plans, or proposals, for a comprehensive and authoritative survey of water conservation, irrigation possibilities, and other feasible projects for the permanent rehabilitation of the drought stricken area of western Canada and its people.

First, I wish to congratulate the mover of the resolution upon having brought this matter before parliament. I think the remarks made to-day and the diversified opinions expressed only tend to emphasize the necessity for a survey of this problem being made by technically competent experts so that the people of Canada will know once and for all the attainable possibilities of irrigation in western Canada. Western Canada is one of the world's greatest grain growing areas, but recurring drought periods have brought ruin to a multitude of farmers and those dependent upon them. If it is possible to restore this world's granary to its former potential productivity, and it is within the power of parliament to bring about this result, it automatically becomes the unescapable legal and moral duty of parliament to bring about that result.

To a layman—and I am speaking as such—all the factors favourable to the accomplishment of such a purpose appear to be present. There can be no doubt as to the fertility and crop producing qualities of the soil of western Canada. During the recent drought years I had occasion to revisit sections of the prairie country which had been known to me personally in the early days to be capable of producing large crops. I had seen heavy yields in the plain country around Regina and I was shocked when I went there a few years later to discover that those areas had reverted to veritable deserts.

To a layman it appears that nowhere on this planet has nature been so lavish in the provision of abundant water supplies as on the eastern slopes of the Rocky mountains. Springing from great glaciers and melting snows high up among the peaks and valleys of the Rockies there are innumerable streams and great rivers like the Oldman, the Bow, the Red Deer, the North Saskatchewan and the Athabaska. It so happens that rising temperatures and the early summer melting of mountain snows bring down to the plains vast volumes of water just when the growing crops are most in need of moisture. Writing in the Regina Daily Star of January 22, 1938, Mr. H. H. Cleugh, a gentleman who has made a study of this question, suggests that these rivers should be dammed at a sufficient level above the plains to permit of gravity flow. This is a phase of the matter which has not been touched upon extensively during this debate. In view of the fact that Mr. Cleugh appears to have made a study of this matter, I think it is advisable to place upon Hansard one or two of the statements he has made in the Regina Daily Star.

He states that this water could be carried by gravity to the plains surrounding Regina.

Then he suggests tapping the Bow river at Glenbow, which is 1,500 feet above the city of Regina. As that point is 500 miles away, this would mean a fall of three feet to the mile. He stated also that the Saskatchewan people lost over $120,000,000 in 1937 through seed and labour thrown away on crops which failed because of the drought. Mr. Cleugh believes that for less than that amount pipe lines could have been built and sufficient water brought down to turn southern Saskatchewan into a swamp in two years. I am going to quote from his article as he includes in it some of the figures referred to a moment ago by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol).

I have looked into this very carefully and find in June the amount passing Medicine Hat is 26,000 cubic second feet. Now here is power and also a lot of water for irrigation if a suitable dam site can be found and a pumping station established but I have little hope of pumps.

But that is not all and pumping is not in it compared to the natural law of gravity. The Bow river can be harnessed at Glenbow above Calgary and have 1,500 feet fall to Regina and 10,000 cubic second feet of water can be harnessed in a pipe line with an average fall of three feet to a mile, through the 500 miles of distance; 500 to 600 cubic second feet can be delivered through one pipe line and there is enough water to fill 20 pipes of a 12-foot diameter intake; enough water can be had to make Saskatchewan a swamp in two years if the water is held there.

A 12-foot intake with a fall like that would irrigate one inch deep over 60,000 acres a week and there is enough water running to waste at that point to irrigate about three acres one inch deep every second. Then there are the Macleod, the north Saskatchewan and Red Deer rivers high enough above Saskatoon, Regina and Broadview to deliver another 12,000 cubic second feet by gravity alone at a terrific speed. In other words in four rivers you have enough water to irrigate one inch deep, six acres every second, or 21 million acres one inch deep in 40 days and in the Bow river alone enough water to irrigate 21 million acres in 90 days, and all that volume will run down without pumping to where it is needed.

Saskatchewan undoubtedly has the water necessary for irrigation and lots of it, but let us suppose for a few moments we irrigated not 21 million acres but 10 million acres every 15 days and instead of 10 bushels to the acre we got 40 bushels, would we not save time, labour and machinery?

Instead of growing wheat only we could grow corn, sorghum, millet, sugar beets, winter rye, sunflowers and alfalfa for siloes, turning out hogs instead of just wheat. Let us farm and no longer be a band of destructive pirates. Make burning straw piles a crime, and burning over prairie or stubble field, bluff and slough, a penalty of not less than five years of hard labour or a $5,000 fine. Burning the prairie especially in the fall has burned the humus which acted the same as a sponge in holding the precipitation. Not only that but the grass roots in the humus covered the ground from wind, and there were no dust storms until the land became pulverized and the straw and stubble burned and no humus left and no fibre to break the wind or hold the soil together.

[Mr. P. J. Rowe.]

All of that sounds to a mere layman very alluring indeed. I do not know whether it is correct or not; but I suggest there is a way to find out, without costing the government very much, and that is to have an authoritative survey made so that all these differences of opinion and arguments pro and con which we have been hearing can be finally cleared up. If Mr. Cleugh is right and we can irrigate southern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta from the South Saskatchewan and Bow rivers, immediately we think of possibilities in central and northern Alberta and Saskatchewan by using the waters of the Red Deer river and the North Saskatchewan river.

There are also the possibilities of generating electric power. That is one point which has not been touched upon. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in the terms of his resolution suggests "other feasible projects," and I submit the prospect of generating electric power might well be investigated very carefully. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, there is the suggestion that auxiliary power could be generated by steam. We have unlimited quantities of coal in Alberta, over eighty-seven per cent of the coal in Canada, and if the minimum flow of these rivers in the winter time was such that there was not sufficient water power to generate the electricity required, we could switch to steam. I am referring to the possibilities of generating electricity because, after all, if it is possible to bring electric power and electric appliances into domestic use on the prairies, the farmers of western Canada have a right to have them.

How is such a project to be paid for? I am quite aware that we cannot introduce in the house resolutions which involve the expenditure of money, and I want to make it quite clear that I am only trying to suggest something constructive in the event of a survey being made. We have to envisage or forecast the possible means of paying for such a project if the government decides to undertake it.

The other day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) laid on the table the latest returns of the Canadian chartered banks. The total savings reported were $1,580,000,000, held by 4,084,752 people; but, notice, 3,770,000 of these people have an average of only $120 in their savings accounts, while the other 314,740 have $1,127,500,000 in their savings accounts. I notice further that 536 persons have in their savings accounts an average of $287,500 each. It is safe to say that there are not many western farmers, or fishermen, or workers in the last class. If we recall the many references which have been made to the brief submitted by the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) to the royal commission that sat in the maritime provinces, the three prairie provinces in 1931 were forced to pay in increased living costs because of the tariff something like $56,000,000. That was due to the tariff protection enjoyed by eastern manufacturers. It would be interesting to discover if there is any connection between that $56,000,000 of increased living costs and the average of $287,500 held by 536 people in eastern savings accounts, and to ascertain where they got that money. I suppose if their wages were equal to the wages of farmers and office boys, $350 a year as suggested by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) it would take them about eight hundred years to earn that amount, and about eight thousand years to save it, because you cannot lay by very much in the way of savings out of $350 a year.

I have this suggestion to make. While the Minister of Labour does not, I think, agree with the tariff protection idea, he said that if we abolished the tariff, confederation would be endangered. The inference I drew from that was that the western producers are expected to submit to a levy of $56,000,000 every year in order that confederation may live. That is quite a sacrifice to ask them to make. I suggest that no institution, confederation or anything else, can exist very long on a shaky foundation of that kind, and that the greatest danger to confederation to-day is just these very injustices that one group in this country imposes upon another.

One way to correct that, I think, would be this: I am assuming that such an irrigation and electrification scheme would cost $400,000,000. Suppose the dominion government were to offer a bond issue of $400,000,000 at two per cent payable serially in ten years; the annual amount required to retire the principal would be $40,000,000 and the annual interest would be $8,000,000. This $48,000,000 would still be $8,000,000 short of the annual tribute exacted by eastern protected manufacturers against the three prairie provinces. How would it be, to compensate the west in part for the wrongs they have suffered, if the entire amount of such bond issue were recovered through an excess profits tax? I believe that nothing less than a tangible act of this kind, with a complete rearrangement for the future, can heal the wounds which have already been inflicted, and strengthen again ties which at this moment are perilously near the breaking point.

I have no doubt that such a loan would be quickly taken up, as it would earn more than the one and a half per cent which the banks now pay to these people, and with the Dominion of Canada behind it the security would be unquestioned. I need hardly add that I am making this suggestion merely as an interim measure, because I am confident that in ten years from now the interest system will have been discovered to be one of the principal stumbling blocks in the path of social progress, and will either have been replaced by a more scientific and equitable one, or be just about ready for the scrap heap, and this, too, without placing in jeopardy the security of any person.

It occurs to me that there are eight points which might be gained by this proposal. May I outline them:

(1) It would make available an abundant and never-failing water supply to the farmers of the prairie plains, thereby bringing to them permanent security.

(2) It would make possible diversified farming, where, in addition to wheat, sorghum, millet, sugar beets, winter rye, sunflowers, and corn could be grown, and this would make possible hog and chicken raising as well as a vastly greater volume of dairy products, rendering the prairies self-sustaining in all these commodities, with a large export surplus.

(3) A public work of this magnitude would provide for the unemployed in western Canada.

(4) It would make available electric light and power for industrial and domestic appliances, adding greatly to the comfort and convenience of the homes of Canadian western farmers, workers and fishermen.

(5) It would not add to the cost of living of the workers, farmers or fishermen in either eastern or western Canada.

(6) It would effectively level out and check the effect of falling prices in the approaching depression, by increasing work, permanent assets and purchasing power.

(7) It would strengthen confederation and alleviate one of the principal causes of strained relationships between the east and the west at the present time.

(8) It would focus the attention of the Canadian people on a project into which we could direct our energies, now being wasted in the perpetuation of a stupid, archaic competitive system which, unless we check its mad, chaotic course, will soon lead the world into war. And another world war would mean the suicide of civilization.

May I for a moment examine the economic consequences of an irrigation and electrification plan such as I have proposed. One of the anomalies of our present system is that a universally good crop is a calamity, and when the children in our great cities cry for bread we say, "No, you can't have any, because we've got too much." In the United States to-day, after years of earnest but futile endeavour, they have reached the tragic stage where there are more than 12,000,000 unemployed, and the proposed crop restriction and curtailment plans of the government will inevitably aggravate the heart-breaking and impossible prices of food and clothing, prices under which an ill-clad, under-paid and undernourished working class must falter and fall.

The world wheat conference which met in London last month warned the wheat growers of the world that there was imminent danger of an over-supply of wheat, and that this would mean a disastrous fall in price. I have no doubt that some of my hon. friends who pride themselves on being practical and realistic will oppose this plan on the ground that we must keep things scarce in order to keep up the price. Well, if that is being realistic I must define a realist as one who insists upon repeating the errors of his ancestors. Then it may be opportune to ask, Who really is the farmers' friend? The government or the sawfly? The government spends a great deal of money in laboratory research trying to find ways of combating the rust, the boll-weevil, the corn-borer and the sawfly; but, after all, are these humble parasites not really carrying out the policy of the government by restricting production?

I am ready to agree that the establishment of an adequate irrigation system in the prairie provinces would increase the volume of wheat, coarse grains, live stock and dairy products for sale on world markets, but it would at the same time guarantee an unfailing food supply for the hundreds of millions of people in India and China who are constantly on the edge of starvation and never know what it means to eat more than once each day. This, of course, means that we must change our system from one of production for profit to one of production for use.

The present competitive system, in its efforts to keep things scarce in order to keep up the price, results in the astonishing spectacle of individuals, groups and nations actually competing with one another, for things which may be had in abundance without competition. This false scarcity philosophy results in striving, hate, tariffs to keep things scarce, jealousy, envy and murder, finally culminating in mankind's worst collective social crime, war, where the internationally recognized vice of private murder, if multiplied sufficiently until it becomes mass murder and mutual extermination, is elevated to the honour and glory of a virtue.

May I say in closing, Mr. Speaker, that all those things which exalt and embellish our civilized life—art, science, philosophy and religion—had their roots in those ancient civilizations and empires which were cradled in the valleys of the Nile, the Euphrates, the Indus and the Hwang-ho, whose life-giving streams have flowed eternally down from the snow-covered ranges of Africa and Asia. They built their pyramids, conduits, palaces and temples with human hands, unassisted by nature. All too often their sumptuous palaces were built by slaves to gratify the vanity and ambition of thieves and robbers, otherwise known as kings and emperors, and the backs that bore the burdens also bore the marks of the slave-drivers lash. We, in this enlightened age, also have slaves at our command, but not the degredation and humiliation of human slavery. We have countless thousands of wild horses, rushing down the gorges of our mighty mountain rivers, ready to be tamed and harnessed in the service of humanity. Shall we use them? These ancient peoples sometimes spent years or generations in building their public works, but they had more intelligence than we moderns because they did not shackle succeeding generations with debt and interest. When these public works were created they were paid for.

It should be clear by every process of logic and by the proof of historic fact that the wealth of a nation, the character of its people, the quality and permanence of its institutions are all dependent upon a sound and sufficient agricultural foundation. Not armies or navies, or commerce, or diversity of manufacture, or anything other than the farm is the anchor which hold through the storms of time that sweep all else away.

Mr. R. E. FINN (Halifax): I had not intended to make any remarks in reference to the resolution before the house had it not been for the speech of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey). He carried us back to the days of confederation, 1867, and he divided Canada into east and west with the dividing line at the western end of the great province of Ontario. While sitting here I thought of the words, "Lest we forget." I do not know of any occasion on which they are more apt or should be recalled with more seriousness or deeper human sympathy than on this very day, because conditions in the world are such that we need to stop and think, "Lest we forget."

Just thirty-eight years ago to-day I sailed from Halifax on the steamship Milwaukee for South Africa and the Boer war. Arriving at Table bay twenty-eight days out from Halifax we went on board the tender to go ashore, along with Colonel Evans, Major Williams, Lieutenant Van Straubenze, who was a soldier and a man and who was killed in the great war, 1914-1918, and a clergyman from Lunenburg who was chaplain to the First and Second Canadian Mounted Rifles, a minister of the Methodist church who did very much for the boys on board that ship from the day she left the port of Halifax until we were at Ellfontein, sixteen miles northwest of Pretoria. As I was standing on the deck of the tender going ashore a gentleman who held the rank of colonel came up to me. He saw "Canada" on my shoulder and said, "I see you are from Canada." I said, "Yes, sir, I am." He said, "I am Colonel Doctor Conan Doyle." I said, "I have read some of your books." He said, "I am here with the Doctor Langham hospital corps, trying to look after the convalescents who come down from the front."

We went through that great country of Cape Colony up to the Orange river where the bridge had been blown up; that great iron structure looked like a lot of snakes. It was a Canadian who built across that river a transportation bridge over which men and ammunition might be taken into the Orange Free State. That engineer was Colonel Girouard, son of Hon. Mr. Justice Girouard of the Supreme Court of Canada. When the mules were passing over, kicking up like the very old Harry, at least I felt happy to know that the way was made safe, not for democracy, but for us to cross without falling into the water. After crossing the river where President Steyn was fighting up to his middle in the water, we went on to Bloemfontein, and just outside Bloemfontein I met a fellow Haligonian, Captain Harry Stair, who came up and spoke to me. The chaplain of whom I spoke was the Reverend Mr. Lane from Lunenburg. I pay him this tribute, because he was as broad as the sky above us on a clear night, and the work he did had an uplifting and inspiring influence on every man aboard that ship from Captain Webster down to the humblest sailor and the humblest individual going to the war, which was myself.

From there we went into the Transvaal, among the mighty mountains where we did not know at what moment we were going to receive that reward which comes to a soldier or a war correspondent. We arrived at Johannesburg, where doors were barred and windows shuttered; from there we went on to Pretoria, and met Lord Roberts and Lord Kitchener, both now deceased, and saw the home of Oom Paul Kruger, a sentry with fixed bayonets outside, and Mrs. Kruger and some Boers sitting on the verandah. Oom Paul had gone by fast train, blowing the bridges behind him, to Delagoa bay, where he took a ship for Holland, where my good friend (Mr. MacNicol) was last summer, where he found that there were waters flowing and something else that flowed, I am not sure what they call it but I think it is Holland gin.

But, Mr. Speaker, to be serious, I speak of February 21, 1900, because at that time England and the empire were fighting the Boers. To-day some say, "Well, has not England been an aggressor?" I say in that respect, "No." Why? Because on the subjugation of that country it was handed back to them. To-day it is one mighty confederation, and the very men, General Hertzog, Smuts and other generals, who would have shot Queen Victoria on sight, have become the leaders of that confederation and sit in the councils of the empire in London at the imperial conferences of this commonwealth of nations. These changes, Mr. Speaker, are of a kind that make one wonder why conditions are as they are to-day in reference to matters of national and international concern, with which I do not propose to deal for one moment. But I say, "Lest we forget."

Let me say that I am in hearty accord with the aspirations of hon. gentlemen in this house who come from the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. They have had their drought seasons; influences have been brought to bear that have made their country not so happy to live in as the older provinces which entered into confederation in 1867. I am not an engineer; therefore I am not in a position to deal with the question of irrigation or its cost or the portions of the country where it is necessary. But I do say this, that I believe this government is sympathetic to the interests of those provinces which were carved out by the late great leader of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and it will see to it that as far as it can and as far as the treasury will provide, those conditions will be ameliorated, so that the present hardships may be forgotten and happiness may reign again among our people in the west.

That brings me, sir, to the little province of Nova Scotia, that rock-ribbed province which gave to Canada that magnificent maritime frontage on the east without which Canada could not have been a nation. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. gentlemen who sit in the house for the first time, that we were taken into confederation—I was not born then—against our will. To-day we are satisfied to be a part of this great Canada of ours, extending from Halifax to Vancouver; but we are most desirous, yea, insistent, that the promises and pledges which were given to us, not by word of mouth but by statute shall be carried out, perhaps not to the letter, because we are not after our pound of flesh, but we are after that which will bring the prosperity that should be ours as the eastern gateway of this young country.

The British North America Act of 1867 provided in section 145 for the construction of the Intercolonial railway from the city of Halifax to a point on the St. Lawrence river. That railway was built at a cost of millions of dollars, which was contributed by England. That railway was constructed to our disadvantage. Why? Because the British government insisted that it be built so far away from the American border so that if there was another war between England and the United States our line of communication could not be cut. So the road was built down around the bay of Chaleur, and on to Moncton and through to Halifax, making the line about two hundred miles longer than it should have been if it had been built as the Canadian Pacific railway was, though not through the state of Maine, as is the Canadian Pacific, from Megantic and then on through the province of New Brunswick to Saint John. We were sufferers because of that, and the disadvantages were such and the rail haul was so great that the opportunity was given the Canadian Pacific to construct a shorter line. As Sir Charles Tupper said, he bought a summer place at St. Andrews, New Brunswick, because he could come down from Montreal to St. Andrews in twelve hours, whereas it would take him about sixty hours to get there by road, because the Intercolonial railway was not completed to the city of Halifax. Those were the conditions, and it took many years to have the government realize that those conditions could no longer continue; that we should carry Canadian goods over Canadian railways and out through Canadian ports, on both the Atlantic and the Pacific.

Then in 1903 there was placed upon the statute books of Canada the Transcontinental Railway Act which assured to the people of Canada, east, west and in the centre, a line of railway coming through from Vancouver to Edmundston and from Edmundston down to Moncton as a common centre for Halifax and Saint John, reducing our mileage by about 150 miles. Under that contract, sir, it was provided that the Grand Trunk should operate that line of railway; that they should build piers; that they should build or charter ships and that they should carry every bit of freight, unless specifically routed otherwise, through Canadian ports.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know just what bearing this has on an irrigation problem.

Mr. FINN: It has not very much to do with irrigation in the west, but it has to do with living in the east. You want water in the west; we want business in the east. That is the answer to my hon. friend, and when he has an opportunity to express his views he will not find me taking any exception to what he says. I look to the chair; if the ruling is that I am out of order I shall respect that ruling, and I thank the hon. gentleman for giving a hint which no doubt will be taken.

The ACTING DEPUTY SPEAKER: I hesitated to interrupt the hon. member, who is an old member of the house, but I really cannot see any connection between what happened in South Africa in 1900 or what happened in Nova Scotia during the time of confederation and the resolution before the chair, which has to do with the feasibility of irrigating the drought stricken area of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. FINN: Well, sir, I bow to your ruling, but this afternoon when the Speaker himself was in the chair, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) dealt with the very matters to which I am referring, and nobody called him to order. Perhaps it is because he is a "big" fellow and I am a little fellow that I am called down and he was allowed to stand up.

In closing, let me say that if this is not pregnant to the matter under consideration, later there will be an opportunity to deal with it. Then it will be in wholesome form, well nourished and well developed, and I hope that the ears of every hon. member will be open. I shall be within the rules of the house on that occasion. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I accept your ruling and offer my apologies if I have transgressed. I offer apologies too for my hon. friend the good member for Greenwood, because he cannot speak a second time.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the preceding speaker will pardon me if I do not endeavour to follow him in what he has said.

Mr. FINN: I thought you must have got your inspiration from your right.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The discussion this afternoon and evening has been both interesting and instructive, and as seconder of the motion I should like to spend only a few moments in dealing with some of the objections that have been raised by some of those who have spoken to this motion. I think those objections may be classified, roughly, under two headings: First, the objection of those who point out that there is now being carried on under the prairie farm rehabilitation administration all the work necessary and, second, the objection of those who feel that irrigation and water conservation are not feasible.

I want to deal with those two objections, and first with reference to the matter of the prairie farm rehabilitation administration. The hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) —and I need not repeat what he said—outlined ten objectives of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I draw the attention of the house to the fact that those ten objectives have to do with such things as substations for experimental farms, farm improvement associations, reclamation stations and soil survey, all of which are for the purpose of gathering data and securing information.

The prairie farm rehabilitation administration has done excellent work in mapping out the general course that a program of rehabilitation ought to take, but it has not had sufficient funds at any time to put on, on a large scale, the program necessary to meet the problem of drought in the prairie provinces. In the discussion which took place last year on the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, along with other members from the west I commended what had been done under that administration. But I submit that the figures given this afternoon by the hon. member for Swift Current show that the prairie farm rehabilitation administration is, more or less, dealing in a "penny ante" way with the question of drought. The figures in connection with dugouts would seem to indicate this contention. There have been 11,000 applications, 5,500 of which have been approved and only 4,300 completed. The hon. member for Swift Current said—and I take this to be pretty well the general attitude of the government—"It is better to get people to assist themselves than to have large scale expenditures by the government." I took his words down, but he may correct me if in any way I have misquoted him. I believe that would seem to describe the prairie farm rehabilitation program. It is an attitude whereby the people are asked to assist themselves to meet a problem of drought. I would point out, however, that when you ask the people in a drought area to assist themselves you are asking them to try to lift themselves by tugging at their own shoelaces. You ask a man to put in a dugout or a dam for eight cents a cubic yard when, as the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) pointed out, it takes at least twelve cents, if not more. It means that he must have horses —and a lot of farmers have no horses. It means extra feed for those horses, because they have to work. If they use farm machinery it means fuel consumption. The same is true of planting grass seed. The fact that the farmers have not horses or feed for horses, and that they have not fuel for their tractors makes it impossible to carry out many of the excellent schemes suggested in the rehabilitation program.

The prairie farm rehabilitation administration has done excellent work. It has surveyed the field, and as a result of its work I think we shall not make mistakes which would have been made, had they not done the preparatory work. But I feel that the resolution calls for a thorough investigation of the feasibility of water conservation, irrigation and other means of combating drought, and that those matters ought to be considered thoroughly by a competent body.

I come now to the second objection, namely that such a scheme is not feasible. I am not a civil engineer, nor was any hon. member who spoke this afternoon. The hon. member for Swift Current said it had been authoritatively stated that irrigation in Saskatchewan was not feasible. For proof, he quoted Mr. John Vallance the head of the prairie farm rehabilitation administration, and the liaison officer Hon. George Spence, but may I point out that neither of these gentlemen is a civil engineer.

I suppose it would be possible for hon. members on both sides of the house to quote engineers, both pro and con, and still not get anywhere. The motion does suggest, however, that we as laymen shall neither sneer at the projects nor become eulogistic about them, but that we should endeavour to secure the best possible professional advice as to the feasibility of water conservation on the prairies.

With that in mind I should like to deal with my impression of the feasibility of these projects. I am thinking now of what is being carried on just across the international boundary between the United States and the Canadian drought area. In the last two years I have made it my business to make frequent trips into the area south of the border. I have gone into North Dakota, South Dakota and Montana, and have studied what the Americans are doing under their rehabilitation plan. I am cognizant of the fact that they are spending sums of money out of all proportion to the sums we are in a position to spend. Their population is much more dense, and the government has been willing to put large sums of money at the disposal of their engineers. But when one talks about the feasibility of what is being done there one can only speak of what he has seen of what is actually being done. Sometimes I have spent a week at a time with some of their engineers, visiting their different projects, receiving explanations of what they are doing and going into the homes of their people. The engineers explain that they are working on two principles, the first of which is that the drought is a recurring problem. They say that there have been droughts in the past, and that it is reasonable to expect that there will be droughts in the future. They say, further, that now during a period of drought, is the time when it is easiest to persuade governments and people concerned to look into the question of recurring drought.

To that end they are now setting up the necessary means whereby, when the moisture does return, they will be able to conserve it against the needs of future drought periods which they know are bound to come. The second principle on which they are working is one which was not mentioned this afternoon, namely, that the problem cannot be attacked on one front. It must be attacked on a number of fronts. They say quite frankly that there are large areas where irrigation is not feasible. There are some areas in which one procedure will solve the problem, and there are others where that same procedure is not a solution.

With that in mind I wish to outline the three main lines of approach which they have used. The first has to do with water conservation itself. In that connection they have spent money in putting in dams to hold bodies of water in rivers and creeks, and to prevent run-offs. By this means they have succeeded in having creeks backed up into gullies and sloughs, and have succeeded in holding bodies of water in the little hills of northern Montana and in supplying waterholes for the stock. A number of large dams have been built. Some of the engineers state frankly that if they were doing this work over again they would not build some of the very large dams on which huge sums of money have been spent. For instance, they say Fort Peck dam, which is a flood control project rather than an irrigation dam, has cost well over $100,000,000. They state they would have been further ahead if they had built a number of smaller dams. More would have been accomplished with a smaller expenditure of money. But they are learning from the mistakes they have made.

The result is that they are conserving bodies of water. For instance, the engineers estimate that the Fort Peck dam will create a lake with a shore line of 1,600 miles and a body of water which will have an effect on climatic conditions. It will be possible for ranchers to water their stock. It will cause creeks to back up and fill the gullies. They have also gone in for small, individual dams, of which large numbers have been built. This has not been done on the basis of trying "to assist the farmer to assist himself." They have put out gangs of men on a daily wage basis. A gang would be moved on to a farm to build a dam and then move on to another farm, to build another. They have done the same thing in connection with building dugouts. They use drag-line dredges. I saw many cases where they had moved on to a farm and put in a dug-out in a day and a half. Then another gang would come along and plant trees around it, and then move on to the next farm. In the minds of many people water conservation means irrigation and irrigation only. In my opinion, the problem of water conservation is, if anything, more important than the question of irrigation.

The second method they have used is to irrigate. Wherever feasible they have irrigated the land. The hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Evans) and others have mentioned the project around Malta, Montana. I went around the Malta country with Superintendent Lantz and saw where they had taken land that was considered hopeless, paid the farmer $3 an acre for it and then proceeded to irrigate it. Under their housing scheme model homes were built with running water and electric lights. The land was cut up into small farms of from sixty to 120 acres and rented out on a thirty to forty years amortization basis.

Of course the best proof of any pudding is in the eating. I went to the home of a man by the name of Karl Blount, just outside Malta. He had been two years on a sixty-five acre farm and he showed me his books. His sugar beet crop alone had netted him $3,000 that year. His wheat had averaged over forty bushels to the acre. He had corn seven feet high and he thought it would run about sixty bushels to the acre. He had taken off several crops of alfalfa and had more feed than he could use. He claimed he had made more money in both the years he had been on that small farm than he had made in any year he had been on his old farm consisting of one section of land. Of course this is not feasible everywhere, but they are doing it wherever possible.

In other places they have combined dry farming and irrigated farming. They have irrigated a strip of land which has been broken up into plots of up to twenty acres, each with a new house. The farmer grows his feed for his stock and his garden stuff for his family on this irrigated plot, and then back from the irrigated strip he has his huge dry area where he puts in his wheat crop. If his wheat crop should prove a failure he has a guarantee of his garden stuff and feed for his stock. They are trying to meet the problem in the different localities in different ways, depending upon the topography of the country and the economic conditions under which the people live.

I think when we pooh-pooh the idea of irrigation, we perhaps do so too quickly. A famous engineer went through western Canada last year and his reports of conditions were published in the press. One of his statements was that an irrigation project at Riverhurst, Saskatchewan, bringing water down from Moose Jaw to the Weyburn and Souris river would irrigate 7,000,000 acres of the drought lands of southern Saskatchewan at a cost of between $20,000,000 and $25,000,000. I am not in a position to say that that is a correct estimate as I am not a civil engineer like the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) and one or two others.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Who was the engineer?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. R. O. Sweezey. He travelled through western Canada and his reports were published in the Regina Leader-Post, the Winnipeg Free Press and other western newspapers.

Mr. McNIVEN: What was the cost of his program?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): He had a number of other projects, but he estimated the cost of the Riverhurst project as between $20,000,000 and $25,000,000.

Mr. McNIVEN: What was the $400,000,000 project?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The Bow river project to irrigate Alberta and Saskatchewan. I do not intend to go into that, but that was the one.

The third method used in the United States rehabilitation plan was that used in the areas where water conservation and irrigation were not so feasible, and where supplies of water were not available. In those areas they went in for an extensive program of soil drifting prevention. Some hon. members have referred already to the manner in which they tackled this problem by planting crested wheat grass, brome grass and in some cases, soya beans, and also by strip farming. Of course this meant the expenditure of money. I went into one farm just a few miles out of the town of Plentywood, Montana. The soil on this farm had been reduced almost to black sand. The government inspector approved the farmer putting it into crested wheat grass. He put in 300 acres of this, for which the government paid him $7 an acre or a total of $2,100. This meant two things for that man. He was able to finance his operations this year without going on relief and, second, he was rehabilitating his farm.

All though the drought area the United States government has been paying farmers $3 an acre to put in summer fallow in fifteen rod strips. This makes it possible for a farmer to buy feed and carry out some of the suggestions we are always making in circulars, but which we never tell the farmer how to implement.

Before I sit down I should like to say that if such a program of water conservation, of irrigation and of soil erosion prevention could be undertaken, especially during these periods of drought, it would have a twofold beneficial effect. First of all, it would put us in a position to meet the next drought more intelligently and more successfully than we have met the present one. I cannot understand the attitude of some hon. members who keep pooh-poohing the whole idea of trying to deal with this problem from the scientific angle. If the medical men of this country were to inform us that we were to be subjected to the ravages of a certain disease at regular periods, we would organize all the resources of medical science to meet that condition. But when we know perfectly well that periods of drought will come which will upset our economy and cause our people to suffer privation and hardship, we simply sit back and say, "Well some day it will rain." But some day it will stop raining again and unless we are prepared to use the intelligence that we have to meet such a contingency we shall go through these years of suffering again and our children shall go through them after us.

The second beneficial effect would be that money would be spent on wages rather than on relief. The farmers and the unemployed in the small towns and villages could be paid wages. Both in and out of the house we hear mention made of the racketeering that goes on in relief. We hear of the fellow who has a little ten dollar radio to which he dares to listen. There may be some racketeering, but I believe it is quite small. In my opinion the great mass of Canadian people who are compelled to take government assistance would far rather work for anything they get. I believe we could give them work by setting them to the task of building these dams and dugouts.

Late one night I was going to New Glasgow, Montana, with a number of friends in my car. Not being sure of the road, we stopped to inquire of a farmer just how we could get to New Glasgow. After directing us, he found out that we came from Canada and we stopped to chat. We asked him if he had any crop and he told us he had none at all. We then asked him how he lived, and he told us he had these sheep. One of the gentlemen with me said, "You cannot live on the products of a few sheep." He replied, "Oh, I work on the government WPA." We then asked how much it netted him. "Well," he said, "it varies. We get ten days a month, and some months I get more. My cheque last month was $98.80." The gentleman with me asked, "Is that charged up against your property?" He looked as though we had come from another sphere. "No," he said, "that is wages; I work for it."

There are thousands upon thousands of farmers in the drought area to-day who would like to say, "It is wages; I work for it." And such could be done, Mr. Speaker. We talk to-day about spending money for many other purposes which in my opinion would not give us as great a return in terms of human happiness and future prosperity as spending our money to conserve water against future periods of drought.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the discussion this afternoon and evening on this interesting subject has covered a very wide range. It has gone all the way from the Orange Free State to the great American desert, and from the head waters of the Athabaska to the watershed of the St. Lawrence river. That, I suppose, may be taken as an evidence of the importance of the subject and of the general interest it arouses.

If this problem could be solved by theoretical discussions, then I think the speaker who preceded me (Mr. Douglas) could make a useful contribution to its solution. But, Mr. Speaker, it is a practical problem, a very practical problem, and it must be so regarded.

The mover of the resolution (Mr. Coldwell) states in its terms that there should be "a comprehensive and authoritative survey of water conservation, irrigation possibilities, and other feasible projects" looking to a permanent rehabilitation of the drought-stricken area. In that respect it is interesting to review what has been done in the way of meeting the proposals contained in the resolution. My hon. friend in his opening remarks quoted from Palliser's report and from the reports of one or two others as to the conditions which they found almost a century ago when they made their first journey across the prairies. There is no doubt that a very large part of Saskatchewan and Alberta is subject to recurring drought. That has been known for many years.

I would agree also with the criticism which has been made in the discussion this afternoon that it was a mistake to open up all of that country for wheat growing or cereal production. Without question large areas of it should have been reserved for ranching, for which, generally speaking, it was naturally well adapted.

The possibilities of drought received early attention. I can recall, because I have lived in western Canada for a good many years, that the popular conception in the nineties, of last century, was that the great part of southern Saskatchewan was not adapted for grain growing and never would be. That is the view which was held at that time, and it was the view, I think, which was held originally by those who had to do with the building of the first transcontinental railway, because the first survey of that railway, on the engineering reports available, placed the line a great deal further north than the location where the Canadian Pacific railway was finally constructed.

As I have said, droughts have recurred frequently. If we study the rainfall in western Canada we find that, taking Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, probably the heaviest annual rainfall is in the Red river valley, where it amounts to about twenty-one inches per annum. The rainfall gradually lessens as you move westward until in the western part of Saskatchewan and the eastern part of Alberta—I am speaking of their more southern parts, what is now referred to as the drought area—the rainfall runs from twelve to thirteen inches, and in an exceptional year to probably fourteen or fifteen inches. Now, if the rainfall is well distributed and comes at the right time, you get crops; if it is not well distributed as to season, then you have a certain amount of drought, and consequent failure of crops. That was all recognized a great many years ago, when as far back as 1894 the first Irrigation Act was passed by the federal parliament relating to the drought areas of what was then the Northwest Territories. Under that act the ownership and control of the water available in western Canada was reserved for public control, and those rights, I understand, passed to the provinces when the natural resources were transferred some seven or eight years ago.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the water rights did not.

Mr. CRERAR: I always bow with great respect to my right hon. friend's opinion, but I think they have the control of the water.

Mr. BENNETT: There was a dispute about the matter, and I think finally counsel arrived at the conclusion they had been wrong in advising as they did. If you look at the act approved by the imperial parliament, transferring the resources, you will see that it did not mention waters. It had been thought that the word "lands" was broad enough to cover it, but in view of the fact that the restrictions are as they are, I think the opinion of counsel is that the waters have not passed.

Mr. CRERAR: I know there is that difference of opinion, and it is probable that legislation will be before parliament this year to clarify that point. The law officers in certain of the provinces hold that the waters were not included; others held that they were; but at any rate the intention was to include them, and I mention that for a reason I shall give presently.

Following the setting up of the prairie provinces, more effective steps were taken to ascertain the volume of water and the annual flow. There were finally set up in Saskatchewan and Alberta several hundred stations by which the flow of water in each of the streams could be scientifically measured. That work was carried on until the transfer of the natural resources, and all that data is available in the old files of the Department of the Interior at Ottawa, and I believe also in the records transferred to the provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: And in the report of the Minister of the Interior in some cases.

Mr. DUNNING: From year to year.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, in part.

Mr. CRERAR: So all the data as to the volume of water and rate of flow in these streams is to-day available in the department here or in the provincial departments having to do with the matter.

There are three sources of supply for water for the agriculturists in western Canada, or, shall we say, in the drought area. There is first the subsurface water; that is the water which is secured from digging or drilling wells, and the like. The information on that was fragmentary and incomplete. In 1935 my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), when he was in charge of the administration of this country—and I think this was one of the really good things he did—appropriated a very considerable sum of money to have a survey made. As a result, under the geological department of the mines branch, a survey was made of all the municipalities from the international boundary in Saskatchewan as far north as township 33. That was almost two hundred miles. That information has been plotted by the geologists and is available to any farmer in the municipalities surveyed who wishes to obtain it. It gives useful data on the water possibilities, and that data is being taken advantage of to-day in the rehabilitation program which is being carried out in those provinces as far as water supplies are concerned.

The next source of water is the ordinary spring freshet. The snow or rain falls over the vast prairies and eventually the water runs off.

The next source is that which comes from the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains or the foothills of the Rockies. There we find the origin of the great rivers of western Canada. A number of these rivers come down in the province of Alberta almost from the international boundary right to the northern section and they find their way into the two forks of the great Saskatchewan river. Some of these waters are international. That is to say, we have a stream rising in the United States, flowing into Canada and finding its way ultimately into the Saskatchewan. We have other cases where a stream rises in Canada and flows into the United States. We have one case where the river rises in the United States and flows approximately one hundred miles in Alberta, finding its way back again into the United States. So far as these streams are concerned, their use is regulated by international treaty, and Canada cannot take more water from them than she is by treaty entitled to take.

As a result of the conditions obtaining in these western provinces some irrigation projects have been undertaken, but before discussing that phase of the subject perhaps I had better complete the point I was making. These streams have all been measured. Information regarding the total volume of water, the average over a great many years, is available, and consequently with that information in hand it is quite a practicable matter to estimate the extent of land that could be irrigated by means of the water which can be made use of. In that respect the information asked for by my hon. friend in his resolution is, I submit, available for all practical purposes.

In consequence of the drought conditions in some of these areas irrigation projects have been undertaken and I would refer to these very briefly for a moment or two. There is one project known as the Alberta Railways Irrigation Company. That was southeast of Lethbridge and was designed to irrigate 130,000 acres.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the oldest one.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, my right hon. friend is quite correct; that is the first project of this kind undertaken. The capital cost in that case was about $20 an acre. The next one is a project which was undertaken a great many years ago by the Canadian Pacific Railway about fifty miles east of Calgary. That was designed to irrigate 220,000 acres and cost about $5,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: The intake was at Calgary from the Bow river.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. Then further east still, in the Brooks district, another irrigation area was set up which was designed to irrigate 400,000 acres at a cost of $11,000,000. My right hon. friend's residence in Alberta will have furnished him with more information than I possess, but I can recall the complaints which were made many years ago by farmers in the Brooks district about the irrigation facilities provided for them and the prices they had to pay for the water they used.

Mr. BENNETT: It was too expensive, they said.

Mr. CRERAR: It was too expensive, and as a result of that I am correct in saying that the final solution of that scheme was the transference of the whole works to a cooperative group of farmers in the Brooks district. It is now managed and controlled by them. So far as the Canadian Pacific Railway is concerned, I think it made a very considerable contribution to the welfare of the farmers of that district.

Mr. BENNETT: They gave the works in the eastern section to the farmers, together with a sum of money to enable them to make the works operative.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. There was another undertaking started west of Medicine Hat.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not say too much about that.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. CRERAR: This one, from information I have, had rather unfortunate results.

Mr. BENNETT: It had a bad start.

Mr. CRERAR: Perhaps it had a bad start, but at any rate it had a bad ending.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not ended yet; there was a lot of money in it last year.

Mr. CRERAR: There was a company that acquired 500,000 acres. They commenced as far back as 1909, and according to information supplied to me, they have spent $15,000,000. The amount of land that is being irrigated at the present time is 35,000 acres. All this indicates, therefore, that it is necessary to examine with some care before we rush into vast expenditures for purposes of irrigation.

In addition to those I have mentioned, there are a number of smaller undertakings that have been developed, such as the Lethbridge Northern, a small area at Taber, and altogether some half dozen or more. These were small projects that were started more or less on a local basis and financed with some outside assistance.

Mr. BENNETT: In the case of the Lethbridge Northern the province guaranteed the bonds.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; in the case of the Lethbridge Northern the province guaranteed the bonds. Some of these have done very well. It bears out the view that where you select your area carefully, where your water can be put on at a reasonable cost, where there are farmers who will take the trouble to learn how to handle an irrigation project, you can attain a very considerable measure of success. Probably the most successful of these is the one adjacent to Lethbridge. There, as a result of irrigation, they are engaged in a type of quite intensive farming, producing sugar beet and alfalfa, and unquestionably they are getting good results.

During the years I have mentioned other projects were surveyed by the dominion government when it had charge of the lands in western Canada. Preliminary surveys were completed on these. There was one known as the Lethbridge Southeastern. There were in that 315,000 acres and the estimated cost—I would direct the attention of the house to these figures particularly—was over $40 an acre.

There were several others, including finally one known as the North Saskatchewan project. That project contemplates the diversion of the waters of the North Saskatchewan river somewhere west of Prince Albert, bringing them down over the countryside of which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) spoke this afternoon, to irrigate the lands lying beyond. They hoped in that scheme to embrace some 1,410,000 acres but the cost would be about $75 an acre. There is no question that engineering science could solve the problem of irrigation. As an engineering question it is not an impossible thing I suppose to take the waters of lake Superior and put them on the prairies of Saskatchewan. But it has to be regarded also from the practical point of view. I ask the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar or any other hon. member, Is it a practical thing to burden land with $75 capital cost an acre to put water on it and the management expense, on top of that, and then expect farmers to carry it?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Does the minister cite that figure of $75 an acre as a general figure?

Mr. CRERAR: No; this is just in that particular case. The figures run from $35 to $75 an acre. That gives a general picture of these projects. In the surveys made by the water powers branch at that time—and they were very complete surveys—they estimated that if all the water were utilized, probably 7,000,000 acres at the outside might be irrigated. Understand, that is all the water coming from the mountains. But that again is an impossibility. These small projects, where you can get the water on the land cheaply, are practicable propositions; but on the scale spoken of by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar this afternoon, taking the water, say of the South Saskatchewan river and pushing that water down, let us say to Estevan, that, I think, is a wholly impossible proposition. In the first place the banks of the Saskatchewan river are from 100 to 300 feet high, practically all the way from Medicine Hat on. The water would have to be lifted that height from the river before the diversion over the land began. In the second place there are important cities along that river. Lethbridge gets its water supply from a tributary of the Saskatchewan river, and the town of Medicine Hat, with a population of 10,000 or 12,000 people, gets its water supply from the Saskatchewan river. Saskatoon, farther down, with a population of 45,000, gets its whole water supply from the Saskatchewan river, and my information is that they have no other source to depend upon than that. Consequently, if the waters of the river were lifted and sent over the prairies as far as Estevan, you would have the problem of the water supply for these towns and cities.

There is also another aspect of the matter which might bring about complications. The South Saskatchewan is an interprovincial river. It is an important tributary of lake Winnipeg. If we could conceive it possible to divert all the waters of that river west of Prince Albert, Manitoba would be at once interested, because that would have an important effect on lake levels in Manitoba and on works which would be affected thereby. I need not say what effect it would have on areas lying east of Prince Albert.

I think the facts I have given are sufficient to indicate certain conclusions: First, that there is to-day a complete body of information available along the lines suggested in the resolution of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. In the second place extensive surveys have been made as to the possibility of utilizing the water available for irrigation in Saskatchewan and Alberta. May I say in passing that these reports indicate that of the acreage which could possibly be benefited by irrigation over ninety per cent is in Alberta. So that if we look for relief in undertaking vast and costly schemes of irrigation on the prairies I am afraid we are doomed to disappointment. That, however, does not mean that in certain localities irrigation projects cannot be undertaken, but such projects must be on a modest scale such as those being undertaken to-day, which are situated almost entirely in Alberta.

I may then be asked the question, How are you going to deal with this problem? I do not think it can be dealt with in any other way than that which is being followed to-day. We may not have reached perfection by any means in the work carried on under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. But, as I have already stated, under the initiative of my right hon. friend opposite, that survey was undertaken of all the municipalities in southern Saskatchewan. The results of that survey are available. Also under the prairie farm rehabilitation scheme dams are being built to conserve the water as the snow melts in the spring and hold it. That scheme can be extended at but a fraction of the cost which would be involved in diverting the Saskatchewan river to the prairies of Saskatchewan, if that were a physical possibility. With these go the suggestions made by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) who made, I thought, a very practical speech to-day, as well as did the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) in relation to this whole problem. There is no doubt that improved methods of farming can be found that will be of benefit to the agriculturists in these drought stricken areas. We know that progress is being made. There is hardly any limitation to what science can do. Crested wheat grass, a plant which is very strongly drought resistant, has been mentioned this afternoon. With improved knowledge and the application of that knowledge to agricultural practice in these provinces, along with the work being done under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, will be found the best road to the alleviation of the unfortunate conditions of recent years.

One point more and I am finished. I have lived in western Canada practically all my life. It has been my good fortune to be pretty well acquainted with our vast prairie country. There are not many parts of it that I have not visited at one time or another. I know its possibilities. It is true that in the last several years it has been sorely stricken. On top of the misfortune of drought, there was, owing to general world conditions, a time of low prices which further aggravated the situation as far as our farmers were concerned. But I still have faith in western Canada. In 1928, only ten years ago, the wheat fields of the prairie provinces contributed 540,000,000 bushels of wheat to the grain production of Canada, and of that amount over 300,000,000 bushels came from Saskatchewan.

I am convinced that those days will return and that western Canada once more will come into its own. I regret to see the picture painted in the dark, gloomy colours my hon. friends sometimes use in the house. We want to look at facts fairly and squarely, but there is nothing to be gained by giving the impression to the whole of Canada, and indeed to the whole world, that unless we spent hundreds of millions of dollars in irrigation projects, the country is gone and will never come back. I do not believe that. I think it will come back. What is needed to-day is a sane, sensible, practical method of going at the difficulty, and I believe that is what the government is doing in the projects which it is carrying on so well under the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words on this motion, I believe one or two phases of the question which are very important to water conservation in western Canada have not yet been touched upon. Before I go further I should like to say that in western Canada to-day that work is being carried on by various agencies of government, and from what I have learned and seen, I think it is being done intelligently and well. I think the seeding of much land to crested wheat grass, sweet clover seed, non-creeping brome grass and other seeds grown very largely in north-eastern Saskatchewan, which has been done quite freely in the past two or three years, will help a great deal. Better methods of farming, too, will not come amiss; there is no question about that; but, after all is said and done, it is imperative that to produce their best those lands receive more moisture.

There is only one place where that moisture is likely to come from; that is from the clouds above, when they come laden with moisture from the gulf of Mexico, where the scientists tell us they get it. When the warm moisture-laden clouds meet the cold clouds from the north and burst over the prairies; when, in addition to that water, you have medium or moderate temperatures, particularly during the month of July, with winds that are not too high, then again there will be crops in western Canada, as there were in years past. The combination of events that happened last year, and in other years, may or may not occur again. It is not so much a lack of moisture as it is a lack of moisture at the proper time. It is not so much a lack of moisture as the excessive heat, accompanied by high, driving winds which take what little moisture there is out of the soil. I want to say to hon. members from other parts of Canada, who perhaps have not thought of this phase of the problem, that last year, as I happened to see for myself, the fact that any crop at all was harvested in Saskatchewan was indicative of the quality of the soil and the tenacity of nature in making wheat and other grains hold on in spite of the difficult conditions they came through. In some districts a fair crop was produced; in other districts the crop was astonishing in view of the weather conditions that had prevailed.

Let me give an actual example. I happened to be on my way to the city of Regina on the first Sunday in July of last year. It was extremely hot. The following day was still hotter, with a wind from the south blowing, I figured, at least forty to fifty miles an hour, or perhaps more. The temperature rose to 110 degrees in the shade in Regina by the middle of the afternoon. The leaves of the poplar trees were curled. All that day and the following day, which was a little cooler, those leaves remained curled; but in spite of that heat, with little moisture, here and there near Regina there was an occasional quarter section which had been well cultivated, well summer fallowed and well fertilized, that gave a crop ranging from five to ten bushels an acre of wheat of pretty good quality. I say it is one of the most comforting things we have seen in the past few years of unparalleled difficulty, to find that soil, after standing all that punishment, can produce even five to ten bushels of wheat to the acre.

I agree with the object in the minds of the mover and seconder of this resolution, but I cannot agree with some of their diagnoses of the problem with which we are confronted. I have not very much cause for disagreement with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell); but when he advised the house that it was because the short grass was short and did not take much moisture that the early crops of wheat could be grown successfully, I think he was putting the cart before the horse. I think the grass was short because the moisture was limited. Had it been otherwise the grass would have grown tall. That is what happens in northern Saskatchewan, where the grass grows so tall, but unfortunately that grass freezes as soon as the frost comes, and is of no further value for feed. The short grass that grows where there is little moisture matures right as it stands and is useful all winter. In fact, it is useful after two or three years; the crop of two or three years can be cut, harvested and stacked at the one time, and it makes very good feed. So the fact is clear that in the past many years in that short grass country there has been a scarcity of moisture at all times.

It was not for nothing that this country was called part of the great American desert; but under scientific farming, with good summer fallowing methods, which were practised first by Angus MacKay at Indian Head; with a system of chemical fertilization, which many modern farmers are using to-day to enable the wheat plant to get ahead of the normal period of the season and take advantage of the moisture in the soil during the earlier and cooler parts of the season, we may produce wheat on these dry lands better than ever. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, it is being produced more economically. Thirty years or so ago harvesting began at the end of August or early in September, and threshing was finished by New Years, or as soon after as possible. Last year threshing started some time in July; the whole operation was cleaned up by August, and fall ploughing was pretty well through early in September.

My hon. friends who moved and seconded this resolution also drew attention to the fact that none of those who had spoken on it was an engineer; all were laymen, and the suggestion was that their opinions should not be taken too seriously. I wish to thank them for that caution, because sometimes I look across at those who are laymen in this line, though they may be advanced in other kinds of learning, and I should like to draw to their attention the fact that they did not quote any great body of scientific engineering thought in connection with their argument. I want to avoid falling into that error, and in a few moments I should like to point out what the engineers do say and have said after actual surveys of conditions that govern the watershed of western Canada. First, however, may I say that there appeared in the press the other day, a significant dispatch, which I do not think has been referred to in the house. I should like to put it on the record, because in my opinion it is perhaps the most important matter that we have to consider at this moment. This is a dispatch appearing in the Calgary Daily Herald of February 12, 1938:

Give Forest Area Back to Dominion
East Slope Reserve Too Costly for Revenue, says Tanner

(By Herald Staff Reporter)

Edmonton.—The province of Alberta is prepared to surrender its administrative rights to the east slope forest reserve, extending from Waterton Lakes Park north to the Brazeau reserve, to the dominion government, Hon. N. E. Tanner, minister of lands and mines, announced at noon to-day. Mr. Tanner said that negotiations between the province and the federal government had been under way for some time.

Considerable disparity between the expenditure in administering this area against the amount of revenue received, resulted in the decision of the provincial government to give control of this large area back to the dominion, the minister said.

Alberta took over administration when the natural resources were returned to the province in 1930.

"It is costing the province so much more than the returns therefrom, that we feel it will not be possible to continue this expenditure," he said.

"This forest reserve is a watershed which regulates the water flow from the headwaters of the tributaries of the Saskatchewan river and therefore is of great benefit to the other prairie provinces.

"We feel that the fire protection in this reserve is of very great importance, not only to Alberta, but to the other prairie provinces and this view is accepted by the dominion government.

It is hoped that as a result of this they will take over the administration of the reserve. If it is left with the province we will be forced to curtail our protection which we feel will be detrimental to the interests of the three western provinces" Mr. Tanner said.

The minister said he disliked taking this position but was forced to do so on account of the inability of the treasury to keep up the expenditures, which were not in line with the benefits of the province. He expressed himself as pleased with the reception given him at Ottawa.

Apparently the credit that is in a drop of ink at the end of a fountain pen which was going to be used by the present government of Alberta is not enough to give fire protection to the forests on the eastern slope. In that case, they come to the dominion government, and I think it is only sensible to ask that something be done or that some arrangement be made whereby the eastern slope may be protected. That slope is of great importance not only to Alberta but to the three western provinces. It consists of an area about 350 miles long, from southeast to northwest. It is about ten miles wide at the narrowest point, and about seventy-five miles wide at the widest point. On an average it is about thirty miles wide. In that area of 350 miles by thirty miles there is a very great deal of land. The interprovincial area, which forms the head waters or gives rise to the head waters of those rivers which come into Saskatchewan and Manitoba, covers about 9,813 square miles, or 6,280,500 acres.

Perhaps small parts of these forest reserves have been alienated for the development of coal mines, or something of that kind. Some may be included in the parks which are nearby. These forests are covered with timber growth, but as they are largely inaccessible their forest value is quite low. They contain an abundance of cheap timber, which is suitable for mining purposes, and in the course of time this, if it is preserved, will be worth more than it is to-day.

But from the standpoint of recreation this area is valuable. Several national parks are in close proximity to it; in fact some of them constitute part of what was in the original Rocky Mountain forest reserve. Due to the proximity of the parks and the protection of wild animal life in them, there is in this area an abundance of good hunting and fishing. Wild life of all kinds is to be found, and contributes its share to the national well-being. Forest protection, providing an abundance of good clean water, is as important in connection with fishing and hunting as irrigation is in connection with dry farming.

As far back as 1906 it will be remembered by older members in the house and older citizens in Canada that the public press carried news in which it was stated that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the then Prime Minister of Canada, called the first great dominion forestry conservation convention. That meeting was held in the city of Ottawa thirty-two years ago, and before it Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself made an address. Sir Robert Borden, the then leader of the opposition, followed him in speaking. The Hon. Sydney Fisher, the then Minister of Agriculture, delivered a lengthy address in which he dealt with matters respecting the preservation of timber on the east slope, in order to protect the water resources of western Canada.

The Hon. Sydney Fisher, away back in those supposedly early days, was far-sighted enough to put forth as one of his views in connection with the proper preservation of timber and water, that some day it might be necessary to use that water for irrigation purposes in western Canada. That very year a commencement was made by setting aside land and forest reserves. About fifty-four square miles was the first block, a small one of course, which was placed in a forest reserve. By 1911, more than 15,000 square miles had been set aside. This amount was added to at different times. Then, there were some withdrawals, until finally in 1930, when the dominion government turned over the care of and proprietorship in the resources to the provinces, this slope amounted to 13,786 square miles consisting of parks and forest areas on the east slope of the Rocky mountains. But 9,813 square miles are still located outside the parks, in the interprovincial area.

At that time, when the dominion government gave up active charge of the land, the territory was fully equipped with trails, lookout towers, telephone lines and all the facilities used in fighting fires and in the protection of forests from other dangers of which they had knowledge at the time.

That fire fighting was being done so effectively, and protective work so adequately that the actual cost of fighting fires which had commenced was about $5,300 a year, as against a calculated average in the last seven years, under provincial administration, of about six times that much. Probably there is no one to blame in the Alberta administration of lands and forests resources. I know what the situation is in Saskatchewan in connection with fire protection. We had a very unfortunate experience last year, in many places. The provinces simply have not the resources the dominion was able to use, and the result is that sometimes I think they have played the game of being penny wise and pound foolish in not giving adequate care and protection to their resources at proper times. Sometimes I think they do not secure sufficient help to care for them properly all the time.

Although mistakes were made, when the dominion did look after any property of that kind it tried to carry out its work to a successful conclusion. So far as the timber in western Canada is concerned, I think it is most regrettable that the dominion should have been persuaded to give up its control of these reserves and that the provinces were anxious to step in.

During the past few years Alberta has done its best to protect these resources. They have spent about $85,000 annually in the interprovincial area. My information is, however, that they feel to-day that they are not able to spend more than $40,000, or perhaps less than that in the coming year. I put it to hon. members who are concerned with irrigation and with bringing more water into the dry plains of Saskatchewan, to pause and consider what they will do if even less water than is now available should at some future time come down those streams. Certainly, unless the east slope of the Rocky mountains is protected, and unless forest growth is saved through proper scientific forestry and fire protection methods, we are going to be worse off than we are at the present time, bad as that may be.

A very moderate estimate of the cost of maintaining forest and fire protection parties in the territory on something like the scale which prevailed prior to 1930 would be about $125,000 or $150,000. It is said that $125,000 would be the minimum.

Look at the importance of the interprovincial area. We find that it includes the sources of Oldman river, Bow river and Red Deer river. I believe these three rivers unite to form the South Saskatchewan. The North Saskatchewan also finds its source in this territory. Due to fires in past years, much of this area, which was formerly under poplar and spruce, is now under lodge-pole pine. The fires were kind to the cones of the pine trees. The heat burst them open, so that they were able to grow. Those lodge-pole pines increased over the spruce. However, to-day the spruce is coming back, and is increasing in volume over any other variety of coniferous tree.

I believe the timber is going to be valuable in the course of time. The land on which it grows is of no value for any other purpose. However, timber does grow on it, and to conserve moisture I say it should be protected. It is the source of part of that $200,000,000 timber cut which was produced in Canada between 1931 and 1935, three-quarters of which was available for export, and which did so much to maintain our national economy in those years when agriculture was not a profitable venture in many parts of Canada.

If Alberta finds itself unable to finance the project, and cannot make arrangements with the dominion government whereby it would take charge, there will be a great deal of wealth lost in the future value of the timber which will be destroyed, because the woods are growing rapidly, and as the more accessible stands are used up the presently inaccessible stands will become useful. Pulpwood is becoming more valuable. If care is not taken here, conditions would revert to what they were before 1906. It was thirty-two years ago that the first effort was made, at the instance of the dominion government, to protect the forest reserves in that area.

If something is not done, other provinces will suffer. Saskatchewan would suffer probably in a greater degree than Manitoba, although I believe Manitoba would suffer, too. It has been pointed out that Manitoba was interested because of the source of supply of waters running into lake Winnipeg. A great deal of Manitoba would be affected, but not so much as Saskatchewan.

The only place I know of on the North Saskatchewan river where any extensive commercial work has been done in recent years is in northeastern Saskatchewan. Great log drives have taken place in this area for years, and I hope they will take place in the future. I understand that this year there is no logging on that river. They were taking out up to 50,000,000 feet of logs and they had to secure information from Edmonton. I am referring to the time before radios were as common and as accurate as they are now in spreading news. These sources of communication had to be kept open in order to advise them when the flood waters were coming down from the mountains. So many days after the flood waters had passed the city of Edmonton they had to be ready to shove off with their logs in order that the first flood water would take them down as far northeast as the Sipanok channel, down the Sipanok channel to the Carrot river and then down the Carrot and Saskatchewan rivers to the point where they were to be sawn at The Pas, Manitoba. The flow of water in the river would affect that part of Manitoba as well as part of Saskatchewan.

But the flow of water affects the country in other ways. It has an effect on road connections and communications of all kinds. When the water in the South Saskatchewan river gets too low at Fenton Ferry, southeast of Prince Albert, it has an effect on travellers and those using the highway. Going from northeastern Saskatchewan to Prince Albert they have to use the nearest bridge, which adds about twenty miles each way to their journey. The mover of the resolution referred to the potential power developments on some of the rivers. The city of Prince Albert spent from one to two million dollars at Lacolle falls without results to date, and there is considerable additional power that may be developed some time in the future east of that point.

There is a tendency on the part of many people to want the government to do something quickly, even though it be done unwisely. In my opinion, in a case like this it is better to do nothing rather than to do something unintelligently. Fortunately there is no need to move unintelligently in connection with this irrigation area and the conservation of water. I have in my hand certain reports to which the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) has made reference. These extracts are from the annual report of the reclamation service for the year 1922-23, and I should like to deal with what the engineers have said. According to this resolution, the dominion government is being asked to investigate plans or proposals for a comprehensive and authoritative survey of water conservation, irrigation possibilities, and other feasible projects for the permanent rehabilitation of the drought stricken area of western Canada and its people.

The government is asked to make a survey but I want to say that many surveys have been made in past years. I believe that the results of those surveys are just as authoritative to-day as they were when they were made. Many of the physical characteristics of that country have not changed. If a ridge of sand prevented water from being taken through by canal fifteen or sixteen years ago, the same ridge would still prevent that from being done to-day. This report indicates the extent of the work carried on in those years after the war. In connection with the proposed North Saskatchewan river project the report reads:

> This project has been under consideration by the department for a number of years and has been discussed in previous branch reports.
>
> During the past season preliminary surveys were continued, the following parties being employed: One 13-man location party; one 12-man location party; two 13-man levelling parties, and one 4-man reconnaissance party. These were employed during the whole of the field season, and an additional 8-man party for the purpose of making reservoir surveys was employed for about two months at the latter part of the season.

In those spacious days following the war a great deal of work was done. Six parties of sixty-three men were in the field surveying in connection with one project.

Mr. BENNETT: Preliminary surveys.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Preliminary, but a great deal of advanced surveying was done.

Mr. BENNETT: That work was described in the report as preliminary.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Yes; I read those words myself and I thank the right hon. leader of the opposition for emphasizing them.

[Mr. M. McLean.]

For two or three years prior to that time other surveying parties were making preliminary and final surveys in the territory that later was within the constituency of Melfort. They were trying to see how water could be taken off the land so that it could be prepared for cultivation. I am sorry the results in that connection were not so happy, but much surveying work that will be useful in the future was done in the northeastern part of Saskatchewan. The dominion government spent a lot of money on surveys in those days, and I think some attention should be paid to the results. This is what the report has to say about one of the projects:

> The lands comprising this project consist of all lands suitable for irrigation within a tract of 20,000,000 acres, its boundaries extending from a point near Coronation south of the Red Deer river near Duchess, and eastward as far as the South Saskatchewan river near Outlook and Saskatoon. Some investigations have been made to include lands to the south of the South Saskatchewan river adjoining the Empress branch of the Canadian Pacific railway, and also lands to the west of the Red Deer river along Kneehill, Threehills and Ghostpine creeks.

The estimate of the irrigable areas in the various tracts is 1,410,980 acres. I shall not deal with the areas in Alberta as I am not familiar enough with them to comment thereon. However, I should like to give the estimate of the irrigable areas in different tracts in Saskatchewan. They are as follows:

	Acres
Kindersley tracts..	105,630
Elrose tracts..	80,610
Rosetown tract..	436,275
Saskatoon tract..	302,645

The report continues:

> In addition to the above, it is estimated that approximately 135,000 acres to the south of the South Saskatchewan river can be irrigated by crossing the river in section 2, township 24, range 24, west of the 4th meridian, and there would be a considerable area of irrigable lands along Kneehill, Threehills, and Ghostpine creeks. As a result of last season's surveys an area of about 46,592 acres in the Kerrobert tracts previously included in the project has been cut out on account of expense, and other large areas in the tracts have been eliminated for the same reason.

The report shows that 1,410,980 acres were possible of irrigation out of a total of 20,000,000 acres with water to be taken from the North Saskatchewan river. The description of the Rosetown tract reads as follows:

> This tract includes the largest concentrated area of irrigable land in the project. The topographical and soil conditions vary greatly, but generally the lands are from smooth to gently rolling, and the soil generally a light clay loam. Throughout the southern portion in the vicinity of Elrose and Rosetown, from townships 25 to 30, ranges 11 to 15, the conditions for irrigation are excellent. The surface is smooth but with sufficient slope, and the soil is a light clay loam. Good drainage is provided by numerous creeks and water courses running to the northeast, and except in places along the creeks there is very little indication of alkali. To the north of township 30 the lands are generally a little more rolling, becoming distinctly rolling toward the western limit where the Bear hills commence. This area is drained by Eagle Hill creek and its various branches. To the west of Eagle Hill creek there is good slope, but to the east some of the lands are flatter and may require drainage. There are quite a number of sand ridges, which makes classification difficult, the most notable of which is in the vicinity of the town of Harris on the Canadian National railway between Rosetown and Saskatoon. This ridge is very rough and consists of almost pure sand. It is covered with foliage of various kinds, and a lake situated in these hills has become quite a summer resort. To the extreme north the soil is heavier and the surface more rolling, becoming distinctly rolling toward the northwest limit.

That is part of that 1,400,000 acres. The report goes on to show how the water could be distributed, and then comes a significant passage dealing with the water taken from the North Saskatchewan:

The absorption losses are unusually high, amounting to 53·6 per cent of the gross supply. This estimate of losses is based on 6 second-feet per million square feet of wetted area, except in natural channels of Stauffer creek, Raven river, and Sounding and Eyehill creeks, where losses of one-half this amount have been assumed. The losses in Tramping and Sullivan lakes, over and above the run-off to those lakes, have been taken as equivalent to a depth of 3 feet over the total full supply areas. No losses have been allowed for, in transporting water through the channel of the Red Deer river between the mouth of the Raven river and intake in section 4, township 38, range 25. It is estimated that the run-off particularly from the Blindman river will more than balance the absorption losses. An allowance has been made for riparian rights in Red Deer river of 100 second-feet, and in Clearwater river of 50 second-feet.

In estimating the requirements a net duty of 18 inches on 80 per cent of the irrigable area has been assumed and the methods of monthly distribution are as follows: May, 2 inches; June, 6 inches; July, 6 inches; August, 2 inches; September, 2 inches.

It is considered impractical to operate canals from the rivers before the beginning of May and after the end of October, and in preparing the tables an open-water season of six months has been used. Allowing for absorption losses at 53·6 per cent of the gross supply the requirement for 1,410,980 acres is 3,648,157 acre-feet, which is equivalent to a continuous flow during the open-water season of 10,015 second-feet. For the purpose of regulating this flow to provide for peak load requirements the following storage is required.

Then is set out the tremendous amount of storage that would be required. The report goes on to say:

From the following estimates it will be seen, that it is not feasible at present to irrigate the whole 1,410,980 acres, the estimated cost being $74.84 per irrigable acre. The estimated cost to irrigate 427,360 acres is $55 per acre, which is also high.

The lowest figure they quote under any scheme is $48.50 an acre. Now under those conditions, to ask the government at this time to go ahead and irrigate that land would not, I think, be reasonable. The evidence is there to show how much water it would take, and the cost, and I would point out, if fifty-three per cent of the 10,000 cubic feet per second was totally lost in absorption charges, it would affect very, very seriously the rivers further east and north, flowing through the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and even in Alberta itself. I do not know how Edmonton, for example, with a large and growing population, or Calgary, with its large population, or cities like Saskatoon, Lethbridge, Prince Albert, Medicine Hat and other places which depend upon the river for their water, would find themselves situated if 10,000 cubic feet per second were diverted from the upper waters of the North Saskatchewan alone. It is certainly something that must be gone into very carefully before steps are taken to spend money on such a large irrigating project. The smaller works in southern Saskatchewan on the Frenchman's river, where something like 40,000 acres is going to be available for irrigation, if distributed according to the plans which the people of the district are putting into being, would result in eighty acre subdivisions which would be suitable for raising alfalfa and other forms of fodder. When you take into account the higher bench lands, and the dry lands used for grazing purposes, together with the lands down in the valley that can be irrigated from water from Frenchman's river, the irrigation of that tract of 40,000 acres would add a very great deal to the possibilities of that part of the country.

Several speakers have spoken of dugouts, and I know they are exceedingly valuable in northeastern Saskatchewan, and have been for ten years or more. They have been using dugouts, for example, to hold water from the spring run-off, and were it not for that factor many of my neighbours and many people in the constituency I have the honour to represent, would not have had any water for their farm requirements last year. Even up there they were hauling water quite a considerable distance. One contractor near where I live has put in one hundred dugouts a year, and when my hon. friend speaks of high class engineering necessary to dig a dugout and that it takes a day and a half to do so, I might tell him that a man thoroughly familiar with the business and equipped with the proper machinery can put in a dugout in eleven hours. But these dugouts of which I speak have been put in at the expense of the farmers themselves, and some of them are beginning to think that if there is to be a great deal of assistance given in building dams and dugouts and other means of conserving water elsewhere, then some assistance should be given in northern Saskatchewan and Manitoba because they feel that with the low prices they have received, with the high cost of operation and development, and with the high cost of replacements, some assistance should be given them if it is to be given elsewhere.

Valuable as this resolution might prove to be if it succeeded in inducing the government to do something that had never been done before, it is not of very great value, I think, in view of conditions as we know them as far back as sixteen or twenty years ago. But I plead with you, Mr. Speaker, and every member of the house, to give serious thought to preserving the timber on the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains, because if that goes, the control of the water goes too, and then there will be no wild life, no hunting or fishing, no possible source of water for irrigation or any other purpose, and the great cities that have been built on the rivers will find themselves in a most difficult situation. The timber of north and northeastern Saskatchewan, and Manitoba, and probably of Alberta as well, will also be in danger, and the new fur farms which have been developed in northern Saskatchewan and northwest Manitoba will also be in danger because it is no good putting in dams to hold back water if the water does not exist. But, Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that moisture is going to come again from the clouds; that the rain will fall and the sun will shine, and the grass and wheat grow in western Canada, and no man is doing his country a service who weakens confidence in its resources of soil and climate and in the likelihood of Providence again favouring us with rainfall and sunshine in due season, which I myself am satisfied we shall have in the future.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[Mr. M. McLean.]

Tuesday, February 22, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

COMPANIES' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

REPEAL OF CHAPTER 36 OF THE STATUTES OF 1932-33, 23-24 GEORGE V

Mr. ERNEST BERTRAND (Laurier) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 26 to repeal the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1933.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec): Explain.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This is a very short bill. It asks for the repeal of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, which was passed in 1933, was of a temporary nature, and was never completed. Rules were to have been passed by order in council, but this was not done; no machinery is provided for the operation of the act. It has lent itself to a lot of fraud. A petition is made against a company; the company files a petition to fall under the act, and immediately proceedings in bankruptcy are stopped. No liquidator is appointed, no trustee, no inspector. No examination of the books is made; officers of the company cannot be examined under oath, and nobody knows what is what about the company. Public bodies such as the Montreal board of trade have passed resolutions asking for the repeal of this act, and there is a great deal of protest against it. It will be my intention to ask that the bill be referred to the committee on banking and commerce in order that men from Montreal and other cities may be called who want to come and speak in favour of the repeal of the act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

AUTHORIZATION OF PAYMENT OF $100,000 FOR THE YEAR ENDING JULY 1, 1938

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Minister of Public Works on behalf of His Majesty to enter into an agreement to pay to the corporation of the city of Ottawa the sum of $100,000 for the year ending July 1, 1938.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO OPERATION OF CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a select special committee of the house be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Civil Service Act, and all matters pertaining thereto, with power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and to report from time to time;

And that standing order 65 be suspended in relation thereto, and that the select special committee shall consist of twenty-five members and the following be appointed members of the said committee;

Messrs. Beaubien, Betts, Boulanger, Brooks, Clark (York-Sunbury), Cleaver, Deachman, Donnelly, Elliott (Kindersley), Fournier (Hull), Glen, Golding, Green, Jean, Lacroix (Quebec-Montmorency), Lawson, MacInnis, MacNeil, McNiven (Regina City), Mulock, O'Neill, Poole, Pouliot, Stewart, Tomlinson.

He said: Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that at the first session of the present parliament I indicated that the government had the intention of appointing a special select committee to take into consideration the operation of the Civil Service Act. Owing to the many committees appointed at the first session and the number of matters that came before the house for consideration by a new administration and a new parliament, it was not thought advisable or possible to appoint a committee at that session. Last session, as hon. members will recall, owing to the coronation and the imperial conference there was a desire to expedite the business of the house, and it was thought advisable not to appoint a committee at that time. The government is therefore taking an early opportunity in this session of implementing the promise which was made, that a committee would be appointed in the course of the present parliament.

I believe it is a fact that there have been similar reviews of the operation of the Civil Service Act during most of the parliaments of recent years. One reason for periodic reviews is that the needs and conditions of the public service are continually changing; also, the personnel of the house is continually changing. It is important the service should conform to changing needs. It is moreover an advantage to new members as well as old members to have this opportunity of fully appreciating many of the questions which arise in the conduct of the public service, both from the point of view of the civil servants themselves and from the point of view of those who have to do with their appointment. It is in the public interest also that there should be periodical inquiries into such matters as the efficiency of the public administration, as well as the cost of that administration.

The fact that the government is proposing the appointment of this committee at this time does not mean that the government does not hold strong convictions with respect to the public service and the principles which should govern its status and conduct. It does mean, however, that the government believes it will be helpful alike to the government itself and to the service to have the various duties and obligations of the service carefully reviewed by hon. members of this house, so that their experience may be brought to bear upon the act as it now is, with a view to such revisions or modifications as may seem most advisable. I might add the appointment of this committee should expedite the sessional program through the opportunity it will afford of consideration by the committee of proposals with respect to the civil service already before the house, or ready to be brought up by reference to committee.

I might say that the government intends to recommend the appointment of another committee to deal with the Civil Service Superannuation Act. The superannuation act is more concerned with questions which are immediately financial and which are in part technical. It has therefore been thought advisable to have that act dealt with by a smaller committee. It will be general questions and proposals with respect to the public service that will come up for consideration by the committee now proposed.

As to the personnel of the committee, hon. members will realize that the names as set forth are in alphabetical order. There is no significance as to which name comes first or which comes last. The committee will manage its own affairs, in the selection of a chairman as in other matters, but I would say at once that an effort has been made, through the cooperation of the whips, to have the committee as representative as possible not only of the different parties in the house but of considerations of which a committee of the kind would wish to take account. I need not mention what they are. Inevitably there may be a feeling that some persons ought to be on the committee who are not. All have not been accommodated to the extent that the government would wish to accommodate them. However, this committee will be no different from others in the matter of permitting of changes in personnel in the course of its proceedings if that be thought advisable. I just wished at present to inform hon. members that the names here set forth are those that have been given to the government after consultations between the whips of the different parties. I do not think there is anything further I need say at this stage.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure every member of this chamber, as well as the country generally, will be pleased with the next to the last observation made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), that from the setting up of this committee there was nothing to be taken that might imply that the government had any doubt as to the necessity of maintaining the merit system and a civil service commission in this dominion at this time. There is no doubt that there has been much discussion, sometimes public and sometimes not, with respect to the civil service commission and its operations; and it is highly desirable, I personally believe, that at least once in the life of every parliament there should be a review of the operations of the act.

The Prime Minister referred to the fact that the proposed committee was not to deal with the financial side of the matter. I observe that that is so, and the only question I had in mind was whether or not under the terms of the reference, namely "to inquire into the operation of the Civil Service Act," the committee would be competent to inquire into whether or not the departments were under- or over-staffed, or whether public moneys were overexpended in any particular place. As it reads now I doubt whether it would be broad enough for that purpose. The "operation of the act" merely means its administration, how it operates in practice, not the sufficiency or insufficiency of the numbers of employees engaged in the public service. That is a matter which is not settled by the act itself but is determined by the ministers, by what they conceive to be the necessities of the public service and by the appropriation that is made by parliament to defray the cost of such public service. It would therefore seem to me, if it is thought desirable by the government so to do, that the terms of the reference should be modified or expanded; for I submit the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) would say that to inquire into the operation of the Civil Service Act, when the civil service commission itself has nothing to do with the determining of the numbers of people who are to be employed, would be hardly adequate to meet the situation as a whole. I merely mention this because I thought possibly the government was of the opinion that it was not desirable for this committee to consider such questions as the adequacy or inadequacy of the numbers employed in the departments; that that was a matter which more largely concerned perhaps some other branch of the public service and which was to be considered from some other angle.

I can only say it is highly desirable that every section of the country and every party in the house should be represented, as it is here, on the committee, and that an endeavour should be made so far as it may be possible to conduct the inquiry into the operations of the act with only one object in mind, namely, the public good and the extent to which, either by amendment or by new legislation, we may be able to improve the efficiency of the civil service. I thought, and I still think, that the language is not broad enough to go beyond the question of mere administration, and that possibly the Prime Minister and his government were of the opinion that it would be desirable to deal with that from another angle altogether, having regard to the report on professional employees made some years ago, and other matters of the kind that should be dealt with in another way, even as superannuation, which is largely a financial matter, should be considered from another angle than that of the operation of the act itself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, may I say to my right hon. friend that there was no intention on the part of the government in any way to restrict the scope of the committee's activities in this matter. As a matter of fact, in speaking I think I made direct reference to the cost of services, which of course would include the numbers employed, and the amounts paid to them. If during the course of its inquiry the committee should feel that there is undue restriction in its scope, it would have power to ask the house to enlarge its authority. I assure the house at once that that concession would be made.

The intention is to have the scope of the committee's inquiry made as broad as possible, and not to limit it in any particular. The purpose of having the Superannuation Act made the subject of a separate committee was simply to ensure that one particular phase of civil service interest would receive a more detailed and careful examination by a committee appointed with reference thereto than would be possible under the general inquiry.

Motion agreed to.

FISH TRAP LICENCES

READING OF PETITION OF CERTAIN RESIDENTS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA UNDER STANDING ORDER 68

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to ask, under standing order 68, that the petition I presented yesterday be read.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Neill moves, seconded by Mr. Donnelly, that the petition presented yesterday and laid on the table of the house be read. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

(The Clerk Assistant read the petition as follows):

To the honourable the House of Commons in parliament assembled:

The petition of the undersigned residents of the province of British Columbia, humbly showeth:

That since time immemorial large runs of sockeye salmon have passed the southwest coast of Vancouver island thence passing into American waters in Puget sound and then back to Canadian waters to spawn in the Fraser river.

That for many years we have maintained in the neighbourhood of Sooke on the southwest coast of Vancouver island four or five fish traps and the Americans maintained in their waters in Puget sound several hundreds, with result that our percentage of the joint catch of that run would run about thirty per cent while theirs would be seventy per cent.

That, three years ago the Americans took out all their traps in Puget sound numbering 219 while we retained ours, with the result that our proportion of the joint catch jumped from thirty per cent to fifty per cent and even eighty per cent.

That, the fact that we have not taken out our traps has been used and will be used as a very strong argument by the American trap owners for permission to re-introduce traps on the American side.

That, it is very much to our interests that the American traps should not be re-introduced.

That, there is no truth in the allegation that traps are the only means by which salmon can be taken in our waters in that neighbourhood, as it has been demonstrated that it can be fished by seines, gillnets, and trollers, to which the Americans would have no objection as they use the same gear themselves.

That, the above refers to the sockeye run of salmon but traps are as undesirable as regards the spring and cohoe runs. These fish are heavy in spawn making their way to their spawning ground, swimming in shoals, following the coast line, keeping in shallow water and close in shore so that they fall an easy prey to the traps and comparatively few get by.

That, traps are the most destructive form of fishing known, as they are open day and night and catch every species of fish, large or small, that comes along whether they happen to be out of season or not. Nothing escapes them or gets through.

That, the abolition of traps would lead to the revival of fishing and employment of many local fishermen as was formerly the case, but who, finding their livelihood gone, have had to find other work, often on relief.

That, it would encourage the tourist fishermen who spend their money freely provided that they get good fishing and who to-day are too often disappointed at the present poorness of the fishing in those waters. It would make a great difference to the tourist traffic in the vicinity of Victoria.

That, the abolition of the traps would protect the run of fish, would increase employment instead of, as is the case, exploiting one of British Columbia's greatest assets for the sole benefit of a few.

That, the Associated Boards of Trade of Vancouver island at their annual meeting in June last passed a resolution asking for the abolition of fish traps.

Wherefore, your petitioners humbly pray that your honourable house may be pleased to order that no more fish traps licences shall be granted in British Columbia.

And, as in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray.

(Signed by Geo. Harris and 9,594 others.)

SUPPLY

NATIONAL DEFENCE AND FOREIGN POLICY—STATEMENT OF MR. MACNEIL

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, before Your Honour leaves the chair, and as the estimates of the Department of National Defence may be introduced, I desire to direct the attention of the government to certain considerations which arise in respect of any discussion of these estimates at this time.

There is grave concern throughout Canada as to the developing international trends, and the possible implications arising therefrom and which attend upon Canada's position in the League of Nations and the British commonwealth. For this reason, without any desire to add to the difficulties of the situation and with every desire to cooperate in the promotion of peaceful external relations for Canada, it is urged that the government should provide an opportunity for the discussion of the general policy proposed with relation to the defence of Canada.

Preparations for defence are necessarily the outcome of foreign policy. It is therefore desirable that the government should give whatever assurance may be possible, indicating that existing commitments and plans do not contemplate participation in external war. It is hoped that the minister will make a statement, before proceeding to the principal items of his estimates, as to the relationship of the defence program to needs which are solely Canadian. Such a statement might serve to obviate unnecessary inquiries or criticisms from those who do not oppose reasonable measures of defence, but who are uneasy as to the purpose and degree of defence.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I say to the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) that while an item in the estimates of the Department of National Defence will be called to-day, so as to enable the minister of that department to take up its estimates on Thursdays and Fridays, it is not the intention of the government at this time to proceed with the estimates of the Department of National Defence. When the minister does take up the estimates I understand it is his intention to make a full statement on the defence policy, and also to permit the fullest discussion. Meantime may I say to the hon. member and to the house that the defence policy of the government remains to-day exactly as stated by the minister, and also by myself at the last session of parliament.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Surveys and engineering branch—branch administration, $24,890.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): There are five branches of the Department of Mines and Resources and it might be of value to the committee if I took a moment or two to deal with the particular functions performed by this branch. It will be noted there is an item covering the dominion observatory at Ottawa, as well as one covering the dominion astrophysical observatory at Victoria, British Columbia. These observatories have to do with astronomy and the exchange of information with other countries in respect of that science.

There is also the dominion water and power bureau, which has the administration of the Dominion Water Power Act and the Irrigation Act. About ten years ago there was a body set up known as the Lake of the Woods control board, which is included in this branch. Then there is the engineering and construction service which has to do mainly with the work carried on in the national parks of Canada, which are under the administration of this department. It has to do with the building of roads, the preparing of plans for buildings in the parks, and other work of this kind required in the Indian Affairs branch and in one or two other branches of the department. The work of the international boundary commission is under the direction of this branch.

The next item covers the hydrographic and map service. Prior to the formation of the Department of Mines and Resources and the Department of Transport, this branch was a part of the old department of marine. The hydrographic service covers the work carried out in the coastal waters of Canada to determine depths of water, proper charting and proper mapping according to information discovered by day to day testing and exploration. Also included in this service are legal surveys and map service. Provision is made for the printing of the publication of the Canadian Institute of Surveying. A small amount is provided for the payment of fees to examiners of dominion land surveyors. Briefly, this covers the general work of this branch of the department. The first item called, No. 149, has to do with what might be termed the head office expense of the administration of the branch.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister has explained the extent to which the various survey operations of the government have been drawn together; he has referred to the geodetic service, the international boundary work, the legal surveys and map service, and the hydrographic service. But there is still another branch of the department which has to do with geological and topographical surveys. Would the minister explain to what extent there is liaison between these branches and what arrangements have been made for the utilization of these surveys for military purposes? Is there a committee at work to draw together all the surveying work of the department?

Mr. CRERAR: The geological service stands more or less by itself. For instance, there is no intimate relationship between that service and the hydrographic service. Geological surveys consist mainly of the examination of rock formations in order to determine the likelihood of minerals being found. That work is under the mines and geology branch in the department, but legal and hydrographic surveys and the preparation of plans for the building of Indian schools or houses for Indian agents and everything of that kind come under the supervision of this particular branch.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister has stated that of necessity the geological survey must be separate from the survey services for other purposes. Surely the geological information could be published on, say, a topographical map and thus avoid a duplication of services.

Mr. CRERAR: This branch has to do with the printing of maps prepared by the mines and geology branch, and also compiles various maps from existing base maps. Of course, we endeavour to avoid entirely anything in the nature of duplication in the branch. Considerable progress has been made in the reorganization of this work but I do not say for one moment that this reorganization is completed. To get a large department like this functioning efficiently is not a matter of a week or a month or even a year. It is a case of steadily consolidating the work and weeding out any possibility of duplication. We are aiming to reach the greatest degree of perfection and economy that it is possible to reach. I do not know that there is anything further I can add in that regard.

Mr. STIRLING: Is the coordinating committee still in operation? It was set up for the purpose of seeing that there should be no overlapping.

Mr. CRERAR: There is an interdepartmental committee that has to do with aerial surveys, for instance. Several departments, including ours, are represented on that committee. It aims to prevent duplication between departments.

Mr. GREEN: Apparently this is the branch of the department having to do with road construction. Will the minister give us a statement as to the progress that has been made with the trans-Canada highway so that we may have some idea when the different gaps will be finished and what gaps there are at the present time?

Mr. CRERAR: The only part of the trans-Canada highway that this department has anything to do with, in addition to that section in the National parks, is the section being built in British Columbia to which reference was made a year ago, the section between Golden and Revelstoke. The other part of the trans-Canada highway, of course, has no relation whatever to this department. Perhaps the Department of Transport or the Department of Labour could give information in that regard, but so far as this particular section is concerned, between the points I have mentioned, the distance to be completed is about thirty-three and a half miles.

Mr. GREEN: When will that be finished—this year?

Mr. CRERAR: It is very doubtful whether it will be completed this year; it will depend on the amount of money that may be voted for the work in the supplementary estimates—hon. members will recall that in the past the appropriations for this work have been voted in special supplementary estimates. I am informed that the construction remaining is very heavy and it is doubtful whether it will be completed this year. However, it certainly should be completed in the following year.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister give an estimate of what it will cost to complete that gap?

Mr. CRERAR: The amount estimated to complete the thirty-three and a half miles is $875,000.

Mr. GREEN: Will this complete the trans-Canada highway from Vancouver to Fort William?

Mr. CRERAR: I think it will be possible to drive an automobile from Vancouver to Fort William over the trans-Canada highway when this section is completed. My recollection is that the section between Winnipeg and Fort William is passable. I believe you can get from Winnipeg to Calgary and from Revelstoke to Vancouver; I know that you can get from Golden to Calgary. It is a rather winding road in some places, but it is quite good.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister tell us how long the gap is in northern Ontario?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot give that information. The question does not come within the purview of my department, and I have learned by experience to avoid very carefully any intrusion in respect of the affairs of other departments.

Mr. GREEN: I hope it comes within the purview of some department.

Mr. CRERAR: I am quite certain the resources of this government are not so far exhausted that it cannot give my hon. friend the information, but I am sorry I cannot give it to him to-day.

Item agreed to.

Dominion observatory, Ottawa, $116,700.

Mr. CHURCH: On page 118 we find the details with reference to thirty-seven officials. What is being done by these thirty-seven officials in connection with the earthquake situation, of which a survey was promised last session? There was an earthquake in Hamilton the other day. Under this item I asked a similar question last year, and I think the minister might give us a short survey to indicate what is being done.

Mr. CRERAR: The observatory has apparatus for registering earth tremors. I believe they are so sensitive that they will detect tremors almost anywhere in the world, at any rate thousands of miles away. There have been a few earth tremors or slight earthquakes in eastern Canada in the past year, but I really do not know what the observatory can do about them. The officials can register them, through the apparatus, and can give information as to their violence, but I am afraid that is about the limit of their power in the matter.

Mr. HEAPS: I notice in the estimates of this department that there are small items for temporary assistance. Can the minister tell us why there are items for temporary assistance in his estimates when I do not see any in any other part of the estimates?

Mr. CRERAR: It is for temporary employees in the observatory who have not been made permanent.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister be good enough to tell us exactly what the observatory does and has done? I have formed a definite opinion about it myself, but I should be glad to have the minister tell us what the observatory and its employees are doing.

Mr. CRERAR: The work of the observatory is wholly a contribution to science.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the contribution of this observatory?

Mr. CRERAR: I might read from a memorandum I have here. My right hon. friend smiles; well, I can smile back at him.

Mr. BENNETT: I would feel all the better for that.

Mr. CRERAR: So far as the practical work of the observatory is concerned, I do not profess to be a judge, but I quote from this memorandum:

> From a practical point of view one of the most important lines of work of the observatory is the measurement of star-positions and the determination of time. The principal instrument used for this purpose is a telescope of moderate power mounted in the meridian, called a "meridian circle," with which observations are made on the stars every clear night. Other instruments are various clocks and chronographs. An electrical time service is supplied to the parliament buildings and generally to government offices at Ottawa, over 600 electrical dials, all controlled from the observatory, being installed for this purpose. There is also a radio time service for time-comparison with other American and European observatories.

It goes on to speak about the examination of the sun. I read only a short time ago some observations by a very noted astronomer in which he expounded the theory that sunspots and their duration had a definite effect on meteorological conditions, rainfalls, and so on. The observatory at Ottawa makes all these examinations, and exchanges the information with other observatories throughout the world, and thus a body of scientific information is gathered and analysed which leads to conclusions which in future will probably have a practical value, as they have had in the past. The keeping of an accurate record of the time is also probably of some importance.

I confess that my right hon. friend has me backed up against the wall so far as a detailed knowledge of the work of this observatory is concerned. But the observatory has been in existence for a long time; it is making its contribution to science by the exchange of information it gathers with similar institutions elsewhere in the world, and on the whole, I think it is desirable that it should be continued.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): What is the number in the employment of that branch?

Mr. CRERAR: On the staff? There are thirty-seven in Ottawa.

Mr. BENNETT: Is any report published of their work, for the last hundred years or so?

Mr. CRERAR: An annual report is published, as well as, from time to time, bulletins dealing with special investigations they have made.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the report been laid on the table this year? I have not seen it.

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that general survey of the work done is included in the annual report of the department. But there are other special reports which are available; they can be secured and laid on the table. If, for instance, we have violent earth tremors or matters of the kind, special bulletins may be published.

Mr. HEAPS: Like the minister I do not know a great deal about this work, but I have been wondering whether it should not be conducted in collaboration with one of our universities instead of being directly under government control. I know of observatories in other parts of the world which are part and parcel of the university. Is there any direct connection between the Ottawa and Victoria observatories and the universities in different parts of the country?

Mr. CRERAR: Most of the nations have services of this kind. Great Britain has; also, I am informed, Australia and other dominions. It is quite true that some universities also carry on observation work of this kind, but as a rule they are heavily endowed and so have the financial means to acquire all the equipment, some of it very expensive, that is necessary for their observations. But I doubt if there is any university in Canada that could carry on the work which is being done here and in the astrophysical observatory at Victoria, on their own resources, and I question whether parliament would want to vote special sums to any university to do the work which is being carried on by the department.

Mr. HEAPS: I was not suggesting for one moment that we do away with the work which is now being done by our observatories. But I was wondering, in view of what is happening in other countries where universities have their own laboratories for this class of work, whether we could not get better results for the amount of money we are spending if this work were coordinated with that of some of the large universities. I hardly expect the minister to be able to give an immediate answer to a question of this kind, but if there could be some coordination between our universities and the work done by our observatories we might get better results than we do by having the work isolated in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. CRERAR: I understand that none of the Canadian universities carry on work of this kind. McGill university, Montreal, however, carries on work relative to determination of time.

Mr. BENNETT: The university of Toronto, in a rather large way, with the Dunlop telescope.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, but the universities are not equipped for it. For the moment they have not the trained staff which is necessary, and for that reason, at the present time at any rate, I do not regard the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North as really practicable.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I hope the time will never come when the cultural advancement of this country will depend entirely on the universities. From my point of view the government should lead in all these matters, and I cannot understand why we should not accept rightly expended moneys as the proper attitude of this country to its culture.

Mr. BROOKS: I notice that there are twenty astronomers and one assistant. Are all these astronomers employed in Ottawa or are some of them sent to other parts of the dominion? It seems a pretty heavy staff to be working in and around Ottawa alone.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend will notice that there is a reduction this year from the number employed a year ago. Occasionally some of these scientists leave Ottawa to make observations elsewhere, but the headquarters are here and the staff is attached to the observatory here.

Mr. WALSH: These astronomers, I assume, are well trained. With all due deference to the remarks that have been made, for the most part they are university or college trained men. Looking at the salaries attached to the various items, I should say that if these are well trained scientists they are getting exceptionally low salaries. It is almost a crime for a government to establish a precedent of this kind, in view of the training which apparently is required before a person can call himself an astronomer. Would it be possible to decrease the number of so-called astronomers and increase the calibre or the quality of those who are employed? Certainly the salary is not commensurate with the type of work which one assumes to be required of a person who can call himself an astronomer. I do not like to see a budget increase, but I certainly would suggest the possibility of doing something to make the remuneration of these officials more in keeping with the training they are supposed to have. By reference to other branches of the service it will be seen that they are getting no more pay than persons doing clerical work which does not call for exceptional qualifications. Would the minister give some intimation as to the necessary qualifications of an astronomer in the case of a vacancy? I should like to see some connection between the qualifications and the salary offered. If it is not sufficiently large something should be done to improve the remuneration of these particularly qualified men.

Mr. CRERAR: These positions come under the civil service commission. The commission classifies them and in its wisdom fixes the salary range. If a position is to be filled the civil service commission sets the standard of examination to be passed before an appointment is made. Usually appointees are taken from students in universities who have specialized in mathematics; astronomy I believe is in large measure dependent on mathematical science.

As to the observation of the hon. member that the salaries paid are not in keeping with what scientists of this calibre should receive, I am not qualified to pass an opinion. It is greatly to the credit of scientists that the men who engage in the different branches of science are usually more interested in the work than in the remuneration. That of course is not an adequate reason for underpaying them, but I can only repeat that these positions are classified by the civil service commission and the remuneration fixed by their classification.

Lest there might be some impression that the men on the staff of this observatory are not quite up to the standard we should have, I may say that such is not the case. I am happy to say that I believe the standard of knowledge and ability of the men on this staff compares very favourably with that of any similar staff in the world.

Mr. WALSH: I am inclined to agree with the minister in that respect, and I can also join in the applause of my friend to the left when he suggests that these men are doing a good piece of work and making a sacrifice in the positions they hold. It is a very similar attitude to that adopted towards the teaching profession, of which I happen to be a member. But I think that point of view is fast getting into disrepute, where people are working for the love of the work and not altogether for the remuneration involved. It is time we changed that attitude, and a good place to effect the change is in government service. It will be noticed that you have clerks in practically the same category as far as salary is concerned as an astronomer. Surely a person with the qualifications necessary for the work of an ordinary clerk should not receive almost the same salary as a highly trained specialist in the field of astronomy. There is not enough differentiation, not enough emphasis placed on the qualifications required.

I know the minister probably has very little to do with the remuneration for these various positions, but someone should do something about establishing a new scale of remuneration for government officials so that there will be a greater differentiation between highly trained experts and those who do not require the same degree of training and the same qualifications. I am hoping that in another year we may see an increase, not in the total but in the remuneration of those retained in the service. Such a scale of remuneration as now prevails does not give rise to continuity of service but rather to disruption of service. No trained scientist is going to stay with the government at that salary; he will look for a position elsewhere and take it at the earliest opportunity. The result will be constant change in the branch, which is not good for the service. More encouragement should be given to highly trained experts to take government positions and remain with them so that we may get the benefit of their training and experience. I am hoping that by another year we may see some improvement, particularly now that we have a committee appointed to inquire into the civil service. I am firmly convinced that the labourer is worthy of his hire, and I feel that not only these highly trained government servants but others as well are not receiving pay commensurate with the work we expect them to do. I am hoping that this government will take steps to see that there is some amendment in that respect, so that public servants who are required to do such important work will receive adequate remuneration and there will be some inducement for them to stay in the service.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister in his department officials who are drawing two or three or more salaries? I noticed, going through the public accounts, that there are officials who draw salaries from one department and perhaps in one, two, three or four other cases draw another salary for other matters.

Mr. CRERAR: If there are such I have not been able to find them. I do not think there are in effect. If such are found I can assure the hon. member they will not last very long. There are no such cases in this department.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister does know there are cases in other departments?

Mr. CRERAR: That is correct.

Mr. LENNARD: What are the educational requirements for this magnetic observer?

Mr. CRERAR: The qualificaticns? I have no more idea than my hon. friend has.

Mr. LENNARD: Do they have to have university education?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that the magnetic observer does not require to have university standing. His business is to read the instruments and charge them with the rolls of paper on which the graphic record is made. I should think perhaps he would be a sort of general handy man in connection with the observatory work.

Mr. STEWART: Does the work of this observatory require a staff on duty twenty-four hours a day? Is there any part of the day when there is not some of the staff engaged? Is everything suspended for part of the day?

Mr. CRERAR: They have regular hours, much in line with the hours established in the service, but some members of the staff are required to do their work at night. For instance, observations of the stars have to be carried on at night, and observations of the sun in the daytime.

Mr. MASSEY: What correlation is there, if any, between the observatory and that branch of the government service referred to in item 391, meteorological service, under the Department of Transport?

Mr. CRERAR: There is no direct relationship. The meteorological service has agents in various parts of Canada to measure the velocity of wind, the rainfall, the temperature. and such meteorological phenomena as I have just mentioned, but that is rather apart from the kind of work that is done in the observatory.

Mr. MASSEY: Then, Mr. Chairman, there will be no additional burden placed upon the observatory by the institution of the trans-Canada airways, for example, which will require very much more extended meteorological service than we have had in the past?

Mr. CRERAR: No. I am very happy to say, particularly since my colleague the Minister of Finance has just arrived, that there will be no additional burden placed on the observatory as the result of the inauguration of the trans-Canada airway.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister if he will do this: Will he just investigate that department? That is all. I do not want to say anything more; I just want to ask him if he will do that. This department cannot possibly function with the material it has to work with and be of any particular national use. You must have a telescope of power. We have not had a new telescope for I forget how long. We have a telescope which, if my memory serves me aright, is of very medium power, and in these days when large and powerful telescopes have taken the place of the instruments that formerly were in use it follows that the bulletins from a college such as Harvard or from the Victoria observatory, where we have a new telescope, or from the observatory at Mount Wilson, where they have a new telescope, so dwarf our telescope into insignificance, almost, as merely to mean—to make a comparison—that we are keeping up a carriage in the days of the automobile.

If the minister will just investigate that I will be content. I know what he will discover. It is perfectly useless to undertake to keep up an institution unless it is supplied with the necessary material to enable it to function usefully. I think the minister knows how true that is. One of the members was speaking about men working for salaries that are low. Men get into this position; they are in the civil service; it is a case of security. They know that at a given time they will get their superannuation, and if the country does not supply them with material with which to do the work of astronomers, they do the best they can for a little while and then sink into that quiet calm which you sometimes find so prevalent in the public service, the undisturbed calm of waiting for the day; not the final day—

An hon. MEMBER: The senate.

Mr. BENNETT: Very few of them see the senate, unless they are organizers of the Liberal party, and sometimes that involves a reduction in pay. At any rate, be that as it may, I want to point out to the minister that we should either maintain a service that is worth while or we should cease playing with it, making ourselves more or less ridiculous. Astronomy is one of the oldest of sciences. Astronomers made tremendous contributions, not only to science but to practical things, arising out of the application of the principles which they have established by experiment and otherwise. It would take a long time indeed to tell about what the astronomer has contributed to the world, going back to days long before the clan Mackenzie were located in the highlands of Scotland. The result of what we are doing is purely negative. On the question of time they do make a contribution undoubtedly, but I am glad to see that the minister has lopped off four employees this year, because it is perfectly obvious that with the material at their hands we have entirely too great a staff. Either give them something to work with or do not keep them out there doing nothing, waiting for that day that comes to all.

I am not going to discuss the matter in detail, for reasons that are obvious, but I do ask the minister himself to investigate it. There is just as much need for putting in a charge here for temporary help as there is for putting a fifth wheel on a coach. You do not need any temporary help there. It is a convenience, a very great convenience too. I mean it is convenient to many people; almost as convenient, for instance, as that $3,000 for the assistant franchise officer, a post which was not filled for so long until after the last election.

The basis of all success in astronomical work is equipment. I do not care what genius you may have in the science of astronomy; unless you have the equipment you can do nothing. That is why the Dunlop telescope was of such very great value to the university of Toronto. That magnificent equipment now enables them to play a part in the scientific world; but did anyone ever point to any part we played in the scientific world with the equipment we have here? I believe they did detect a tremor about the time of the Shaw report, but as far as any other tremors were concerned I understand there have been no evidences of them.

Mr. DUNNING: That one was a long way off.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes; the distance increased by geometrical progression as the days passed, and the old maxim, "Hang together or hang separately," which was referred to yesterday, became of great value, but that had nothing to do with astronomy except that it had to do with those dimensions which are immeasurable and about which Einstein speaks so learnedly. I dare say the fifth dimension was determined about that time. Probably the symbol for it would be JG raised to the nth power, but that is a matter for further discussion on other occasions.

Will the minister just look into this himself? That is all I ask.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, Mr. Chairman, I may say that I had it in mind to get a little better acquainted with the work of this observatory during the coming year.

Mr. BENNETT: Star gazing.

Mr. CRERAR: No. When I want to acquire proficiency in the art of star gazing I shall take my right hon. friend along with me.

Mr. BENNETT: He will be pleased to accompany you.

Mr. CRERAR: I have no doubt that between us we could make an admirable job of it. It is quite true that the telescope at the observatory here is old, and not a modern one. However, that is only part of the work of the observatory. They have to do with the matter of looking after time; they have to do with the recording of earth tremors, and I understand that their seismographic instruments, if that is the correct term, are fairly modern and complete.

Mr. BENNETT: There are twenty-three astronomers out there, I think.

Mr. CRERAR: I do think that is making some contribution. However, I shall bear my right hon. friend's suggestion in mind, and do the best I can.

Mr. MASSEY: The minister has stated that the most important function of the observatory is the recording of time. I notice that last year there was one time observer who was paid $400, and that this year we have not any.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but he was only an observer.

Mr. CRERAR: He is not connected only with the determination of time. I understand that was a special amount given for other observations. However, I must confess that I do feel like a fish out of water.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: Some of them survive, you know.

Mr. CRERAR: I hope this one will, too. I feel that way when I am asked to discuss the scientific bases upon which time is determined, and all that sort of thing. It is a little bit beyond me. However, the accurate determination of time is a function of the observatory, and it is from its activity that we know that our time is accurate. For instance, it would be most unfortunate, Mr Chairman, if in the course of a day the clock on the wall should run ten minutes slow, and we were to work ten minutes too long. That sort of thing has to be avoided.

Mr. BENNETT: I think you can trust the observatory staff on that point.

Mr. CRERAR: The accurate determination of time is part of the work of the observatory. However, I shall endeavour to act upon my right hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. MASSEY: I notice that in vote 392, under the Department of Transport, there is a grant of $500 to the Kingston observatory. A short time ago we were discussing the functions of the observatory as divorced from the meteorological service of the dominion, yet the grant to the Kingston observatory is bracketed with that of the meteorological service of the Department of Transport. Why is the grant made to Kingston observatory and not to others, and why is it under the Department of Transport?

Mr. CRERAR: I did not know the grant appeared under the Department of Transport. I would assume it has something to do with meteorology.

Mr. MASSEY: Perhaps the Minister of Labour could answer it.

Mr. ROGERS: I am afraid I missed the question.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall have to leave it to either the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Transport.

Mr. BENNETT: As a member of the governing body of Queen's, the Minister of Labour might explain.

Mr. LOCKHART: Do I gather that there is nothing in the estimate for new equipment? I have in mind a student who graduated from McGill, and another who graduated from another university, who would bear out the statements made by the hon. members for Mount Royal and Greenwood and the leader of the opposition. These young men have gone to the United States to follow up their work. They make the very pertinent comment that most of the equipment at Ottawa is obsolete, and they have gone to the United States to complete their further studies. They say that the salaries paid experienced and trained men are not commensurate with the task they must perform. They do not expect to come back to this country, but intend to remain in the United States. I wonder if the equipment is as obsolete as stated by these young men.

Mr. CRERAR: There is a small item of $3,000 for new equipment.

Mr. BENNETT: But that does not cover anything substantial.

Mr. CRERAR: No, it does not cover anything as substantial as is indicated by the hon. member for Lincoln. There is no doubt that the observations of the leader of the opposition with respect to observatory equipment are soundly based, but we did not feel that at the present time we were in a position to ask for an additional vote for equipment.

So far as the other point is concerned, it is quite true that salaries paid in Canada to scientific men do not compare favourably with those paid in the United States. That is true not only of astronomers but along many other lines. If we were to examine the facts concerning United States universities we would find that many of them are staffed by Canadians who are drawing salaries very much greater than they could have secured in Canadian universities. I agree that probably this is a loss to Canada, although in other respects it may have beneficial effects. I do not know what can be done about it.

These positions are classified by the civil service commission. They state the salary range that shall be applicable to the various positions. I believe the observations of the hon. member for Mount Royal must carry considerable weight. He may have presented one of the matters to be considered by the committee which is to inquire into civil service conditions.

Mr. LOCKHART: The point I make is that young men of to-day who are seeking their future in scientific research would find it no advantage to come to Ottawa if, as they say, our equipment is largely obsolete. They admit one or two branches are well equipped, but they say that generally the equipment is such that it is no inducement to young men to follow their careers in Canada, and so they are prone to go out of the country. We might be better off with half a dozen properly equipped than with twenty-four for whom there is old equipment we have had for the last fifteen years.

Mr. CRERAR: In reply to the point that the equipment may not be up to date I would say that the use of a telescope of lesser range would not militate against the young man's training in the science of astronomy. As a matter of fact some of the past and present observatory staff are of a calibre which would compare favourably with the staffs in any similar observatory.

Mr. BENNETT: There are twenty-three astronomers out there.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. LENNARD: Who in the civil service is the authority on astronomy? Who sets the papers? Are they set by the civil service commission or by the department? Are the examiners men within the civil service?

Mr. CRERAR: I understand that it is the practice of the civil service commission, in connection with scientific and professional positions requiring certain degrees of skill, to secure expert advice as to the type of examination which should be set.

Mr. BENNETT: They check their academic training.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. For instance, they have to certify to medical doctors. I do not know that the members of the civil service commission are qualified to pass on the technical knowledge of medical men, but they take the necessary steps to set the examination, as is done in connection with other scientific branches of the federal service.

Mr. LENNARD: Who marks the papers after they have tried the examination?

Mr. CRERAR: As I understand it, the civil service commission do not mark the papers, but they set up an examining board of experts which marks the papers or gives oral marks if the examination is oral. It is on their marking that the civil service commission finally gives its certificate.

Mr. BENNETT: Their report.

Mr. CRERAR: Their report.

Mr. MARSH: I should like to say a word or two in criticism and also in support of the observatory at Ottawa. I know it is true that our observatory at Ottawa cannot compete with the great observatories of the world, but it is doing a worth while work. My only quarrel with this vote is that it is half what it should be, but I also realize that this is not the year in which to increase the item, in view of more pressing problems. I should like to point out that there is a type of astronomical observation which can be done and is being done with the equipment we have. In conjunction with other observatories, the Ottawa observatory is doing a really worth while work which may result at some future date in the forecasting of world weather. Some very valuable research work has been done by this observatory in spectroscopy of the sun. Some humorous comments have been made on the work of astronomers, but I want to say that an astronomer is not a man who goes out, looks aloft, and writes a piece of poetry like "Twinkle, Twinkle Little Star." He is a student of a legitimate science, the forerunner of both chemistry and physics. Quite often the findings of the astronomer are communicated to the physicist and the chemist, and the result is that, for instance, we are able to make a certain type of steel in four days instead of ten. Another result was the discovery of helium by the use of which we are able to travel safely in heavier than air machines inflated by a non-inflammable gas.

Great care has been taken in years gone by to build up this observatory in Ottawa. The question has been raised if there is any collaboration between our observatory and the various astronomical departments of our universities. The answer is, yes. There is a close cohesion in this connection. Since this observatory was built some years ago it has been of real value in education. It has been pointed out that perhaps we do not need twenty-two or twenty-three astronomers, but the science of astronomy necessitates a comprehensive knowledge of mathematics and men to observe, to calculate, to chart and to analyse scientific findings. Our astronomers have been carefully educated. It has taken them years to train, and I definitely know that our astronomers in Ottawa compare favourably with those connected with other observatories in the world. The fact is that they lack the proper equipment. While our fourteen-inch telescope cannot compare with the large instrument at Victoria or the one at Mount Wilson, the fact remains that in the measurement of stellar distances, some types of spectroscopy, and in connection with research work on meteors and in the determination of the consistency of the atmosphere of the earth, valuable work has been done with so-called obsolete equipment.

If we have in mind the establishment of an air route from the Atlantic to the Pacific we must retain in this country whatever we have in the way of astrophysical, astronomical, seismographical and geodetical experts. If the finances of this country permit, I would suggest that next year this vote should be doubled or tripled if people are to travel safely by air from one side of this country to the other.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Marsh.]

Dominion astrophysical observatory, Victoria, B.C., $31,220.

Mr. BENNETT: With the equipment he has at Victoria, the chief astronomer has made a contribution of world-wide importance. I had the pleasure of recommending him for a commandership in the Order of the British Empire. He was able to make that contribution to world knowledge because of the equipment he had with which to carry on his work.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Does this vote include an amount to reimburse the municipality of Saanich for its out-of-pocket expenses in the matter of a fire that occurred on the observatory mountain three years ago? I have made persistent attempts to have some attention paid to this account and I was hoping that it would be provided for in the estimates this year.

Mr. CRERAR: There is no amount included in this item to reimburse the municipality of Saanich for its claim, which has been under investigation for some little time.

Item agreed to.

Dominion water and power bureau, including the administration of the dominion water power and irrigation acts and including grant of $250 to the international executive council, world power conference, $222,050.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to make one or two observations which I hope the minister will answer immediately or refer to when he next rises in his place. I notice that the number of employees in this branch has been reduced by two, while the vote for the branch has been increased by some few thousand dollars. There is also an increase in the general expenses of the branch. The total increase in the vote amounts to approximately $27,000, and there are no details of this increase. I was just wondering if the time has not come when this large staff could be greatly reduced. The work carried on by the branch must have decreased in recent years, since the provinces have large staffs carrying on the same work. In Ontario the hydro-electric commission has a large staff doing exactly the same type of work, and I have no doubt that their staff is considerably overmanned. I came in contact with four parties from the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario some two hundred and fifty miles north of lake Superior. The work being done by those four parties could have been done quite well by one. Since the provinces are themselves doing most of this work, the activities of the branch must be confined largely to the northwest territories and other unorganized districts. These water powers have probably been gone over so often that we must have numerous details and estimates relating to exactly the same water powers. Will the minister tell us precisely what this staff does, and whether it does anything in Ontario? If it does anything in Ontario, does it do exactly the same work as the hydro-electric power commission? If it does anything in other provinces, does it do the same work that similar staffs in those provinces are doing?

I am of the opinion that this country is hugely overstaffed so far as governmental employees are concerned—I am not referring to the dominion, but to the country collectively. As has been said by so many—I have said it myself before—the cost of government to-day is simply terrific in a country of approximately eleven millions. I should like the minister to tell me what this huge staff does.

Mr. CRERAR: The increase is apparent and not real. In previous years, under an arrangement with them, the western provinces made a contribution, which last year amounted to approximately $30,000 to the federal water and power bureau for the work which that bureau did for them. The procedure has been changed this year so that instead of the amount that we get from the provinces coming directly to the department and being available for the work of the department, it is now being paid into the consolidated revenue fund. Consequently we had to increase our estimate this year to make up the deficiency that would exist by reason of that fact. I can assure my hon. friend that so far as my knowledge goes there is no duplication in the work of the various provincial governments and the federal water and power bureau. As a matter of fact the work is carried on with understandings and agreements with the provinces. In the western provinces the federal water and power bureau is still doing the stream measurement work, but the most important part of the work under this vote is that which relates to international waters. For instance, international streams from the Atlantic to the Pacific—

Mr. MacNICOL: All that work has been done many times before.

Mr. CRERAR: But these records with regard to the flowage and division of water have to be kept from year to year. Take the division of water for power purposes at Niagara. That cannot be based on readings or records made fifteen or twenty years ago; it has to be kept up to date.

Mr. MacNICOL: But it is set by the 1909 treaty at 36,000 for Canada and 20,000 for the United States.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, but it has to be measured, and it is the officials of this department, because it relates to international waters, who are responsible for looking after that. I could cite other instances of the same kind.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Do they measure what is taken out in the Chicago diversion?

Mr. CRERAR: No, we cannot measure what is taken out there because we have no men there. We simply have the United States records. Of course, there is the question of water powers in the northwest territories, the determination of power sites, the amount of power that is available not only in the territories but also in the western provinces. We had a discussion yesterday afternoon on the possibilities of irrigation in the prairie provinces. Last night I mentioned the fact that there were streams in Alberta, and also in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, which were really international streams. If we are to utilize water from these streams, only part of it belongs to us and we must know to what extent; consequently all this work that I have tried to describe is carried on by this branch.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the department anything to do with measuring the water power capacity on the Albany river in northern Ontario?

Mr. CRERAR: My officers tell me that, so far as their knowledge goes, we have not. The Ontario government does that and probably passes its records on to us.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): What accounts for the increase of $12,000 in connection with travelling expenses?

Mr. CRERAR: This allocation that we have received in other years from the provincial governments has been split up among various items of the work and the increase that my hon. friend has just referred to arises from that fact. A year ago part of the grant we received from the western provinces was placed against this particular item. We have not received it this year because it was paid into the consolidated revenue fund, and therefore we have increased our expenditure correspondingly.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Is the department sending a representative to the world power conference?

Mr. CRERAR: I was not aware that there was to be a world power conference; perhaps I am a little bit behind the times. At any rate it has not been before me for consideration.

Mr. STIRLING: Is stream measurement being carried on in all the provinces?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, I think I can say it is, in all the principal streams at any rate.

Mr. STIRLING: I believe the minister will remember that a great deal of the information collected in the first twenty years of this century, to which reference was made yesterday, in connection with irrigation possibilities, was based largely on stream measurements carried on in Alberta and Saskatchewan; and at least until a very recent date stream measurement has been carried on under this department in British Columbia as well. I wondered to what extent in other provinces that work was being done.

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that we still carry on these measurements in British Columbia. We receive, of course, some financial assistance from British Columbia to reimburse us for that work, and the same is true of the prairie provinces.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then the government does carry on stream measurements in Ontario, and if it does it must do so in the Albany river. I understood a moment ago that the department did not do that.

Mr. CRERAR: I am afraid I may have misled my hon. friend. My information is that we do not carry on this work in the Albany river. We get records from Ontario, but we carry on work where it relates to international waters and waterways in the province of Ontario; and in the western provinces we carry it on to a large extent—that is, stream measurements, rate of flow, and so on.

Mr. STEWART: I understood the minister to say that this department was carrying on work in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, for which these particular provinces paid the dominion for the information it accumulated and transmitted to them. Is that true of Ontario and Quebec and the maritime provinces?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, it is. We apparently carry on some work in Ontario, but not on the Albany river. In the year 1936-37 we received a total of $32,000, made up of $5,000 from British Columbia, $2,000 from Alberta, $2,000 from Saskatchewan, $2,000 from Manitoba, $8,500 from Ontario, $10,000 from Quebec, nothing from New Brunswick, and $2,500 from Nova Scotia.

[Mr. W. E. Rowe.]

Mr. STEWART: That clears the matter up, because I was at a loss to understand why the policy should be different in different parts of Canada; whether it applied to the whole or not.

Mr. CRERAR: I plead guilty to perhaps misleading my hon. friend though unintentionally.

Mr. LOCKHART: In the details in connection with this item I see only a duplication of what I notice through all the different parts of the estimates of this department. Here we have another item of "temporary assistance"; we also have an item of $18,000 for wages. When you follow "temporary assistance" through the whole of the estimates of this department you find the total runs to nearly half a million dollars for this item, and you run into another item—wages, $18,000. Would the minister give us a few more details about these special items and why all this temporary assistance is so necessary in this department?

Mr. CRERAR: The particular item to which the hon. member takes exception is, I am informed, for a part-time water recorder, and the item of wages is for gauge readers and casual labour employed all over Canada. Gauges must be read at certain definite times, but we do not keep a man sitting on a chair beside the gauge to read it every ten hours; we pay him a remuneration under which he takes the job, keeps the records and gives us the information. I do not think there is anything beyond that to explain in the items to which my hon. friend has alluded.

Mr. LOCKHART: But with regard to this definite increase, how are these men appointed? Are they more civil service appointments? I am following "temporary assistance" all through the details of service of this department, and as I have said it runs into nearly half a million dollars.

Mr. CRERAR: As far as the temporary assistance is concerned, there must be a certificate from the civil service commission. As to the gauge readers, that does not come under the civil service commission because the individual remuneration will run from perhaps fifty to maybe a hundred dollars a year, depending upon the amount of work the gauge reader has to do.

Mr. LENNARD: Does the minister expect to employ nearly double the number of gauge readers this coming year? The item of $18,000 as against $9,610 for last year represents quite an increase.

Mr. CRERAR: I know, but part of it is accounted for by the explanation I gave a moment ago to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe; that is, part of the grant which we received last year from the provinces and which came direct to the department was apportioned to gauge readers. This year, as I have already explained twice to the committee, this grant is paid into consolidated revenue; accordingly we have had to increase our estimate, and the increase is for gauge readers and the other items against which it was apportioned a year ago.

Mr. MASSEY: I notice, in the details of this item on page 119, there is a grant to the international executive council, world power conference, of $250, the same amount as the grant made last year; I assume therefore it is a recurring item. Just a word as to the world power conference. I am sure the Minister of Transport as an engineer will agree that this conference is one of the most important engineering bodies in the world. Canada is one of the most important power countries of the world. The world power conference was held in 1936, and met, I believe, in Washington. Later, the delegates had the privilege of visiting our Chippawa plant at Niagara Falls as well as other plants in Canada. The advertising alone is good for Canada. One should not underestimate from our point of view as a dominion that particular phase of the world power conference. There is also the exchange of ideas at such a meeting which is of extreme value to us. We all recognize that in certain countries of the world particularly Canada, the United States and the Scandinavian nations, water power development has been carried forward with extraordinary efficiency. The Swedes, with their new plant at Krongede, set a very high standard in water power development. The engineers who were responsible for the building of that government-built and government-operated plant at Krongede visited the world power conference and later came to Chippawa. I am sure our engineers received much from them and were able to give much to them in return.

We grant only $250 under this item for so important a body as the world power conference. I am sure that the minister, although he did not know there was to be another meeting of the conference in the near future, will be good enough to explain to the committee why we provide a grant of only $250 to such an important international body, and that he will also let us have his reactions, perhaps not under this grant, on the development of the international relations of Canada as one of the great power producers of the world.

Mr. CRERAR: This grant of $250 is Canada's contribution to the maintenance of a central office for the various countries that are associated with this world power conference. I understand that a conference is held once in every five or six years. The expenses of the conference of course are borne by the various countries in the matter of sending their own delegations, but the maintenance of a central office year by year is provided for by all the countries which are parties to the conference. Canada is a party to it, and our assessment or contribution is $250, or £50—a very small sum.

Mr. MASSEY: That is on a per capita basis?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know what is the basis of working it out, whether it is a per capita arrangement or not.

Mr. MASSEY: We always send a representation, do we?

Mr. CRERAR: I think that usually that has been done, and that when we come to consider the matter we shall probably do so again. But this $250 is simply our annual contribution to the maintenance of a permanent office in London for the countries in this conference. It is the amount that has been paid in past years, and can be regarded as Canada's share in the maintenance of that office. I assume that the United States and all the other countries which are parties to the conference also make contributions. The expense of maintaining the office between conference periods is probably not very heavy. At any rate that is our contribution and I understand that is all we have been asked for.

Mr. MASSEY: Whom did we send as our representative to the world power conference held in Washington in 1936?

Mr. CRERAR: The representative of this department at the conference a year ago was, I think, Mr. Johnston who is chief of the water and power bureau.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Did Mr. Thirpe represent the department at the world conference in 1936?

Mr. CRERAR: The world conference is held only every sixth year, but frequently there are sectional conferences held in intervening years. On an occasion of that kind the gentleman to whom my hon. friend refers was probably present.

Mr. MASSEY: Has there been any attempt on the part of the government to disseminate the findings of these conferences? In other words, do the producers of power throughout Canada receive from the government reports which will add to their store of knowledge and assist them in the development of their plants, or does the government merely send a representative for its own benefit?

Mr. CRERAR: I understand the reports of the conference proceedings are printed and published and are available to people interested. The reports can be supplemented by direct information that the Canadian representative gets at the conference.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): If the world power conference has any influence on the studied policy of the government, it might be well for the government to review the decisions of the conference, or the papers presented, with reference to the exchange of electric power between countries, especially the considered judgment that the exportation of power cannot be stopped without giving rise to serious international difficulty. I think if we were represented at that world conference, and if that is the considered judgment, it might be appropriate for the government during this year at least to take cognizance of the results of the last world conference.

Mr. CRERAR: A matter of that kind is not within the purview of the conference. The conference is held for the purpose of exchanging technical information, enabling representatives of the various countries to exchange views on power engineering science and technical matters. A conference of that kind would scarcely be concerned with questions of public policy such as that of the export of power. According to the information supplied to me, such questions are outside the scope of the conference.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I might point out that at that conference it was indicated that in the near future all the readily available power resources of this country, the most accessible and least costly to develop, would be utilized. It was also pointed out that it is in the best interests of the dominion economically to develop industry in Canada, give employment to our own people, and stop migration to other countries. That was given, I understand, in a paper as representing Canada's views. Even though these conferences may be more or less of a technical nature—and I quite agree with the minister that I would not expect our representative at such a conference to settle or even pass much of an opinion as to the international difficulties which might arise with reference to the exchange of power between countries—I might point out that it was more or less from an engineering standpoint having regard to the amount of power available that the view was expressed that power should not be exported. I think it might be well at this time for the government to review that in view of prospective developments this session.

Mr. LOCKHART: Did I understand the minister to say in regard to this item that there are no special increases in the activities of the department this year? There is so much noise in the chamber that sometimes one can scarcely hear. Have the activities of the department been carried on about the same as previous years?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: Well, I notice the item of travelling expenses is two and one-half times greater than that for the previous year. People back home keep asking why government costs continue to increase and pile up. Can the minister explain that?

Mr. CRERAR: I have already explained that the amounts formerly paid directly to the department from the provinces for services rendered, have now been treated differently; the money received from the provinces now goes directly into the consolidated revenue fund, and consequently we have had to increase our estimates. Assessing that part of the cost against gauge readers, travelling expenses, and in other directions, accounts for the increase not only in this particular item but in several others that have been referred to this afternoon.

Mr. WALSH: As the minister knows, there has been a general increase of a considerable amount in the estimates this year. The people of Canada are making diligent inquiry as to why the government is not seeking ways and means to decrease rather than increase the cost of government. Referring to this particular item the minister will notice that the total on page 119 of the estimates this year is $222,050 as compared with $195,040 the year before. It is such increases as this that increase the aggregate. This money has to be found through increased taxation or increased revenues; in other words, the people of Canada have to pay these increases. When business finds itself going through difficult times a well managed, well organized business usually seeks ways and means to decrease, not increase expenditure, and I think a well managed, well administered government should do likewise. I would urge upon the minister that this is one item representing a very considerable increase, and with all due respect to the minister I do not think this large increase is justified. I cannot see that this department is going to render an additional $27,000 worth of satisfaction or service to Canada under present conditions.

I feel that every item in the estimates this year should have been decreased, and every department should have been instructed by the Minister of Finance to bring in estimates showing a decrease. In that way the Minister of Finance would have been able to report an aggregate decrease which probably would be commensurate with the general deficit that is being produced this year, and would go a very long way towards meeting, say the Canadian National railway deficit or the relief bill which we have to meet from year to year. I know that nothing can be done this year; but it is to be hoped—and I think the people of Canada are hoping—that the ministers of the various departments will give the Minister of Finance an opportunity to balance his budget next year without showing an increase in revenue or in taxation. It is all very well for a government to boast of balancing a budget by means of extracting more revenue from the Canadian people. Far better would it be for the Minister of Finance to be able to report a balanced budget as a result of savings on the part of various departments of government, and a decrease generally in the cost of government.

I do not like this item going through; I want to register my objection to it on the general principle that it seems to show an extra large increase as compared with the increased service that may be anticipated as a result.

Mr. CRERAR: I appreciate the homily that my hon. friend has directed to me, but his alarm is wholly unfounded. I have already explained, I think at least three times, that a sum of approximately $30,000, which prior to this year was received from the provincial governments for services rendered by this branch to those governments, is now paid directly into the consolidated revenue fund, and consequently we have to increase our vote to compensate for that difference. As an actual matter of fact the expenditure under this particular item this year is less than it was last year. It has not grown; it is down; but because of that method of treatment which, as I say, I have already explained to the committee several times, we have had to increase the estimate from about $197,000 to $222,000.

I wholly appreciate the importance of the point raised by the hon. member for Mount Royal. I have had a good deal of experience in the necessity of balancing budgets, others as well as my own, and I quite recognize the importance of that. But without any offence to my hon. friend may I chide him a little bit for inconsistency. Only a short time ago on another item he suggested that we were not paying sufficiently large salaries to certain members of our staff, and that the item should be increased in order to pay larger salaries. Now he is on the other horn of the dilemma, suggesting that we should balance our budget. Well, that is all right; but I wish to say to my hon. friend that in reality there is not an increase. There is actually a decrease.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): How much of a decrease?

Mr. CRERAR: About $3,000 from what it was a year ago; but because of the method of treating the amounts received from the provinces for the services we render, as compared with the treatment in other years, the item has had to be increased.

Mr. WALSH: I quite appreciate the remarks of the minister. If he would take the trouble to read Hansard to-morrow he would notice that I did advocate increasing certain salaries; but I urged that the item itself should not be increased; that probably fewer could be engaged in the work, so that those retained could be paid a greater and more beneficial remuneration for their services.

Mr. HEAPS: What would the hon. member do with the others who were laid off?

Mr. WALSH: The others would find employment as they do now. The minister will tell the hon. member for Winnipeg North that his is a changing staff, due to the low salaries paid. These people seek employment elsewhere and take advantage of the increased remuneration that is paid in other fields. They are using the department as a place to gain experience; after that experience is obtained they go elsewhere to apply it.

I quite appreciate the fact that the minister is experiencing the difficulty of having thrown back on his department a certain decrease in revenues that formerly were obtained from the provinces; but he has had this experience, as I have, in budgeting. I have been administering and looking after a budget for the past twenty years or more, and whenever it has been found necessary to increase a budget in some respects, rather than increase the budget as a whole we have had to take away from other items in order to compensate for that greater expenditure or that loss in revenue. I think when the minister realized that the provinces were no longer going to bear this share of the cost, amounting to twenty odd thousand dollars—

Mr. CRERAR: May I interrupt my hon. friend? They do bear that share, but now they pay it directly into the consolidated revenue fund and not into the department.

Mr. WALSH: The minister's department is not credited with it at the present time. Therefore his budget, in reference to this item, shows a noticeable increase. Rather than having to bear the responsibility for any increase, I would have taken steps to see to it that there was an appreciable decrease elsewhere to make up for that loss of revenue under this item. I am rather earnest in putting forward this plea. I am not doing it for political purposes; I do not think in my constituency it appeals one iota, because I am not interested in public works or anything of that nature. I feel, however, that to-day in Canada there is a definite sentiment—and I think the government appreciates this fact as well as I do in opposition—that government is costing us too much, not only in the dominion field but in the provincial and municipal fields as well. Sooner or later—and it might just as well be sooner—there has to be a decrease in the cost of government.

Mr. HANSON: We have too many governments.

Mr. WALSH: We have too many, and those we have are too expensive. I hope next year, when these estimates are being prepared, the Minister of Finance will issue instructions to every department of government that their estimates have to come in ten per cent lower than those of the present year. Let the ministers worry as to how they are going to effect that reduction, but let him not accept any estimates which do not show that decrease. We have had to do this in other walks of life. Businesses have had to do it. Municipalities have had to do it. School boards have had to do it. We have worked under those instructions. I have had to do it. I received instructions to do it. I did not like it; but it had to be done and it was done without impairing the efficiency of the service rendered.

I want to urge that upon the minister and upon the government. It has to be done sooner or later, and I am hoping that the Minister of Finance and his colleagues who prepare these estimates will take the necessary steps to decrease the cost of government in Canada. They can decrease their own costs; they can set an example, so that other taxing bodies may do likewise.

Mr. DUNNING: I suppose I would really be out of order in discussing on one item the general financing of the country, but I must point out that the matter is really not quite as easy as the hon. member for Mount Royal puts it. To start with, let us consider the large items of expenditure to which he would apply the ten per cent axe to which he has referred. For instance, let us take one of the biggest items, namely, war pensions. Obviously the reduction would not work out there. Let us consider another one, interest on debt. I am glad to be able to say, as the hon. member will find in the estimates, that there is a reduction in that item. But he would be the first to agree that that cannot be dealt with in an arbitrary manner; it is a matter of the money market, and the control of currency and credit.

Then, let us consider another large item—and it is in connection with the big items that the difficulty arises. We have an expenditure of $30,000,000 for old age pensions. Are we going to cut that by ten per cent? So you go through the list of uncontrollable expenditures of the government, those items which are statutory, and you will find that applying a reduction is not the same thing as applying it in an operating organization, such as a school board, a municipal organization or even a business.

There is very much less within the control of government, as such, in the Dominion of Canada than there is in any comparable organization within the country. While I appreciate the assistance of the hon. member, it would seem that so far he appears to be practically alone in his suggestions of general economy. If it was the disposition of this parliament to hold its own hand in asking for increased expenditures, that would be the most effective assistance which could be rendered to a minister of finance, in holding down the estimates, generally. For every hon. member who objects to the size of expenditure there are at least ten—often including the one who objects—who rise in their places and ask for increased expenditures along one line or another.

I am not complaining; but I say that this is a fact in parliament as it is constituted to-day, and as it has been constituted since I have had any acquaintance with it. Perhaps we could all agree that we would each take the kind of self-denying ordinance which the hon. member for Mount Royal would have me impose. It would be a great deal easier to accomplish, if all would invite it, rather than all object to its being imposed on any particular item in which they are personally or generally interested.

Mr. HEAPS: What percentage of national expenditures are controllable, and what percentage uncontrollable?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot answer offhand.

Mr. HEAPS: Approximately.

Mr. DUNNING: I would not attempt to state it even approximately. We might differ as to definitions. If we take as uncontrollable only that which is statutory, then of course we would reach a conclusion different from that which we must reach if we examined each expenditure, and decided for ourselves as to whether it was or was not controllable. However, I shall have that information later in the session. I have not an answer at the present time, and I do not wish to make a guess.

Mr. WALSH: I do not want the minister to feel that I am not fully cognizant of the difficulties a minister of finance or a minister of natural resources must face. I quite appreciate what has been said. I am sorry if I am wandering away from the item under discussion; but let me point out that last year under the item of conversions we saved $6,000,000. What was done with it? That $6,000,000 was gobbled up, along with about $20,000,000 more.

Mr. HEAPS: The military estimates.

Mr. WALSH: That money is gone. If we could only have held the estimates at what they were last year we would have accomplished something. That is the point I am trying to make. Hold them; keep them fixed. On the same page on which appears the item we are discussing, there is another one which involves a tremendous increase.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. WALSH: Oh, I know that supposedly there is a decrease.

Mr. CRERAR: It is an actual decrease.

Mr. WALSH: But if you show it to the ordinary citizen he will say there is an increase, because the figures are there. I know the reason for it; but if you take the aggregate of the figures to be presented by the Minister of Mines and Resources, I dare say those estimates will show an increase, not a decrease. Surely to goodness we can draw the line and say, "They are fixed; they cannot go higher than that." Then when we make conversions and save $6,000,000; when the pensions decrease as, over a period of years, they will, and as other fixed items show a decrease, we can gradually bring the estimates down to a more reasonable basis. That is the point I make.

I am not unappreciative of the difficulties of this or any other department of government, but I feel it is time to call a halt to government expenditures, particularly if they seem to be excessive.

Mr. DUNNING: If the hon. member will take the estimates on his desk and look at page 2, he will find a summary of the totals of all departments, showing the increase or decrease as compared with the main estimates for the current year. At the bottom of the page he will see that the aggregate amount of the main estimates now under consideration is $2,900,471.65 less than the aggregate of the main estimates for the current year. Of course that does not tell the whole story. Everything depends upon what will be added, in due course, as a result of supplementary estimates. But I must repeat that the comparison between the main estimates now presented and the main estimates presented last session is favourable to the amount I have indicated. I believe this is a reasonably fair comparison of departmental and running expenses of government in one year as compared with those in another. On that page the decreases or increases are shown, department by department, and the result, as I have indicated, is an aggregate decrease of $2,900,-471.65.

Mr. WALSH: That is not the general impression in the country.

Mr. DUNNING: But that is the truth.

Mr. WALSH: The impression conveyed through the editorial columns of newspapers is that there is an actual increase in the estimates before us to-day as compared with the estimates brought down on a similar occasion last year. It is indicated that there is an increase of between $20,000,000 and $30,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know where the hon. member gets that information.

Mr. WALSH: Well, I have the information. I would like to look it up and bring it to the chamber later.

Mr. DUNNING: I am giving only the facts.

Mr. LENNARD: In connection with the items respecting the dominion water and power bureau, with which we are now dealing, I say that the new system of accounting is not satisfactory. If, for instance, Ontario owed an amount for work done by the bureau, the latter should get credit for it. In the same way, that credit should be shown so that hon. members may know what is going on. We should know about the work done for the different provinces. For instance, how do I know how much has been done in Saskatchewan in the past year? I should know that, and I should know what work is done by the department in every part of Canada. We should know about departmental affairs. If we are at all interested, we should gain a more general knowledge.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member's problem is that of knowing where to look for the information. I shall be very glad to tell him. The principle upon which the revenues of Canada have been operated for many years is laid down in the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act. The basic principle is that all moneys shall go into one consolidated fund. There was the odd departure, such as occurred in this particular department, where the moneys were collected and disbursed by the branch. I think the hon. member will agree that that would not be a good business principle to adopt in running the affairs of the country.

The fact that moneys are collected by the department for services rendered is of record. There should be no difficulty about the matter as the auditor general's report which I tabled a week or two ago contains not only the particulars of the expenditures of each department but the particulars of the revenues received. The point raised by the minister in connection with this matter is that we have recently applied the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act to the revenues collected by this branch. Formerly this was not the case. On every occasion on which the auditor general learns that there is any revenue collected by a department and retained and expended by that department, my attention is called to the procedure and it is stopped. Such money goes into the consolidated revenue fund and the expenditures of each department must be voted by this house out of the consolidated revenue fund of the country.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Will there be anything in the supplementary estimates for this item?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot say definitely, but I think it is unlikely.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister has said that there is a reduction in these items, and in order to see whether that is the case it would be necessary to know whether anything will be included in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not anticipate that there will be any increase in this particular vote.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Lennard.]

Lake of the Woods control board, $7,576.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do the United States pay an amount equal to this vote?

Mr. CRERAR: They pay an amount based upon their particular interest in this lake. The larger part of the Lake of the Woods lies within Canada, a small area being in the United States.

Mr. MacNICOL: The northwest angle and all the water immediately south would be in United States territory.

Mr. CRERAR: I think there is one bay at the end of the lake which is in the United States, but I cannot give its relative proportion to the whole lake. I should say that perhaps three-quarters of the lake is in Canadian territory.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the purpose of this control?

Mr. CRERAR: The purpose is to regulate the flow of water from the lake into the Winnipeg river by maintaining the lake level between certain datum points, I think between 1059 and 1064. It is essential that the flow of water into the Winnipeg river should be controlled in order that the power plants located on the river may operate at the proper capacity.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the total cost of this control paid by the federal government, or does Manitoba contribute?

Mr. CRERAR: An agreement has been entered into by Manitoba and Ontario with the federal government covering the division of expenses. The two provinces contribute to these expenses.

Mr. HEAPS: Has this control board given satisfaction since its establishment in the control of the waters of the Winnipeg river?

Mr. CRERAR: I think it has given general satisfaction. At any rate, since I have had anything to do with this department no complaints have been received.

Mr. STIRLING: How many outlets are there to the lake?

Mr. CRERAR: I think there is only one, the Winnipeg river at the north.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the expenses incurred under the agreement between the dominion, Ontario and Manitoba confirmed by the Lac Seul Conservation Act, 1928, money expended to be reimbursed, $20,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Just what does this control consist of, and does it cover control over the waters between lake St. Joseph and Lac Seul?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think lake St. Joseph is involved in this particular control. Lac Seul lies wholly within the province of Ontario and it drains into the Winnipeg river. The regulation of the flow of water from Lac Seul to the Winnipeg river is an important factor in the maintenance of sufficient water in the river to enable the power plants to operate at the proper capacity. There is also a power site, on the English river, that drains Lac Seul into the Winnipeg river, and the control of these waters will also be important when that power site is developed, as it probably will be at some future date. The expenditure in connection with the regulation of the flow of water from the lake is actually borne by the provincial governments.

Item agreed to.

Engineering and construction service, $136,190.

Mr. MASSEY: Is this the item under which I should discuss the possible development of iron mining in the northwest territories and within the arctic circle? I desire to be in order as I do not want to mislead again the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Finn).

Mr. CRERAR: That discussion would come properly under item No. 125, or any of the other items under the mines and geology branch.

Mr. MASSEY: The minister would rather that I did not discuss it under this item?

Mr. CRERAR: I think it is advisable to keep within the item before the committee.

Mr. STIRLING: What is covered by this item?

Mr. CRERAR: That covers the expenses of this branch in connection with engineering services for the whole department. The national parks, which are administered by the Department of Mines and Resources, contain about 900 miles of roads and in addition to that the department is constructing the highway from Banff to Jasper. It is also constructing the section of the trans-Canada highway between Golden and Revelstoke. That was an obligation first undertaken by the government of the present Prime Minister when he was formerly at the head of the government, and was later added to by the present leader of the opposition in 1933 or 1934. Then there are a few architects in connection with designing buildings in the parks, and Indian schools and Indian office buildings that have to be erected here and there for administrative purposes. That and the clerks and draftsmen comprise the greater part of the expense. Of this amount of $136,000 odd, approximately $119,000 or $120,000 is for salaries. There is $6,000 for printing and stationery, provision for drafting blue-prints and plans, and so on, travelling expenses and sundry items.

Mr. STIRLING: This is what one might call the design and supervision—to take one instance—of the Banff-Jasper highway?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Where is the vote for the actual work that is being carried out?

Mr. CRERAR: Part of the expenditures in connection with the Banff-Jasper and the Revelstoke-Golden roads is included in this; that is, the supervision of the staff that is doing the work.

Mr. STIRLING: What about wages, dynamite and tools?

Mr. CRERAR: That is not in this.

Mr. STIRLING: Where is it?

Mr. CRERAR: That will be in the supplementary vote when brought down. It is hoped to carry on the work this year.

Mr. STIRLING: Is it still looked upon as a relief measure?

Mr. CRERAR: I think it will probably be voted in the supplementary estimates this year. Since 1931 or 1932 that work has been more or less classed as relief work. It has been carried on under the former Public Works Construction Act, and later special supplementary estimates were introduced. In the public mind it is related to relief. The likelihood is that when the votes for these works are brought down this year they will be brought down as straight supplementary estimates.

Item agreed to.

Geodetic service, $160,500.

Mr. STEWART: What is the reason for the increase in this item?

Mr. CRERAR: It is all accounted for by the five per cent salary deduction that was restored a year ago. The estimates brought down at that time did not include the five per cent increase; it is included in the present estimates. I believe that actually, if we put it on a proper comparative basis, there would be a slight decline in the vote.

Mr. STIRLING: Why does an item sometimes refer to temporary assistance, whereas this one speaks of wages? Is there any relation between the two? The wages item is up $4,000.

Mr. CRERAR: The wages here are for the field parties that go out on geodetic surveys. This item of wages is to cover the help that is required, I suppose, such as canoe men, cooks, labourers and the like.

Mr. STIRLING: Will there be a greater number of parties out this year to account for the fifty per cent increase in wages?

Mr. CRERAR: No. There will be no more parties out this year than last year: probably not so many.

Mr. STIRLING: Then why is the item up $4,000?

Mr. CRERAR: The increase is partly accounted for by the restoration of the five per cent cut.

Mr. STIRLING: Oh, no. It was $9,700 and it is now $13,600.

Mr. STEWART: It is a separate item.

Mr. CRERAR: There has been a decrease in certain other items that go to make up the total vote, and that decrease has been used up, so to speak, in an endeavour to increase the field work, which has fallen behind to some extent.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): There is an increase in travelling expenses. Does this mean that there are more people travelling, or are we to assume that they pay more and have better accommodation?

Mr. CRERAR: There is an increase from $950 to $1,350, or an increase of $400. That is put there because in the program of work this year the engineers will probably have to go a little further from Ottawa than they did a year ago. The work will be in the lower St. Lawrence, and some part of it in British Columbia.

Item agreed to.

International boundary commission, $30,800.

Mr. MacNICOL: What relation has the work performed by the engineers referred to in this particular item to the work which, the minister said, engineers had to do in relation to international waters under item No. 152? Further, Canada votes $30,800 this year for the international boundary commission; do the United States vote an equal amount, and do the United States estimates call for the same number of engineers, namely five?

Mr. CRERAR: As a matter of fact the United States spend a very considerable amount more on this work than Canada does. The international boundary commission have the responsibility of maintaining the boundary markings between Canada and the United States. That work, of course, has to be carefully and accurately done. I understand that periodically they cover the boundary, see that the markings are maintained, that is, that the posts are in place, and if the line runs through an area where there is timber it is cut out for a certain distance on either side. For the past few years they have been working accurately to define the boundary in the mountain section in British Columbia between that province and the states on the south. That is substantially the routine work of the commission.

Mr. STIRLING: Here again we have this division of items into a thing called "wages," which is $1,200 up, and then total salaries and wages, which is $2,000 up. What is this item of "wages" which is continually appearing?

Mr. CRERAR: That, again, covers the labourers and help of that kind which is necessary on these survey parties. For instance they send out a party to mark these boundaries; they require equipment and labourers if a boundary line passes through timber which has grown up and has to be cut out and cleared up. The item covers expenses incidental to that class of work.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): The minister stated that the five per cent was applicable to the last item. I see from the details that the salaries of the engineer, surveys engineers, etc., to the international boundary commission are exactly the same as they were a year ago. Would that five per cent increase not apply to them?

Mr. CRERAR: If the hon. member will look at page 121 he will see that the vote was precisely the same a year ago as it is this year, but the $978 which was the salary deduction of five per cent was taken off last year; it is not taken off this year.

Mr. STEWART: Is the work of this commission about completed? From year to year we have heard it was almost done and that we might hope to have it finished at any time, except for maintenance.

Mr. CRERAR: The work is now, I believe, very largely maintenance work. I am informed that there are still a few sections of boundary, practically all in the more northern regions between Alaska and Canada, to be definitely determined. But the vote is practically all a maintenance work vote. It is necessary to have the boundary markings properly placed and maintained.

Item agreed to.

Hydrographic and map service—hydrographic service, $418,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: In connection with this item the same point again arises; we have $75,000 for wages and another amount for temporary help, bringing the total for wages and temporary help up to $109,000. How are these temporary employees engaged and how is the help recruited which is classed under the item "wages"? Approximately one-fourth of the whole item is either temporary help under its own classification or under the classification of "wages." There are many unemployed in my riding, and if the department would take temporary employees on a basis of so many from each riding, there are a number of men in my district who might qualify for this temporary employment. How are they engaged and from where do they come?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that to carry on this work four or five boats are in use during the period that the survey work is proceeding. It is necessary to have officers and crews, and according to the information given me, the item in the explanatory notes for temporary assistance covers ship's officers and temporary staff. If the hon. member will refer to page 122 of the estimates he will see that the item of $34,000 odd compares with $29,000 odd a year ago. Probably—I do not know—it is planned in the department to carry the work on for a little longer than it was carried on a year ago. The same explanation would apply to wages.

Mr. MacNICOL: But how are these temporary employees and wage earners engaged?

Mr. CRERAR: Temporary employees are certified by the civil service commission. The ordinary labourers, as I believe always has been the case, are not.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

LANGUAGE QUALIFICATION OF PERSONS APPOINTED OR TRANSFERRED

On the order:

House in committee on Bill No. 3, an act to amend the Civil Service Act—Mr. Lacroix (Quebec-Montmorency).

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That this bill be not referred to the committee of the whole house but that it be referred to the special select committee on the operation of the Civil Service Act.

Motion agreed to.

COPYRIGHT AMENDMENT ACT, 1931

FURNISHING OF LIST OF DRAMATICO-MUSICAL OR MUSICAL WORKS OWNED OR CONTROLLED—PUBLIC RADIO RECEPTION OR GRAMOPHONE REPRODUCTION

The house resumed from Thursday, February 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Esling for the second reading of Bill No. 12, to amend the Copyright Amendment Act, 1931.

Mr. D. A. McNIVEN (Regina City): I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) upon his initiative in introducing this bill, and upon his tenacity of purpose in pursuing the object of this bill session after session. This bill, as I understand it, merely requires the Canadian Performing Right Society to publish a list of the musical compositions which they purport to control, under the provisions of the Copyright Act; and, second, to exempt from payment of the fee provided under the terms of the act small business establishments which use the radio in a limited way. The Canadian Performing Right Society is a monopoly, a monopoly which in the exercise of its rights has incurred the antipathy and antagonism of countless people all the way across this country. This monopoly claims to have and to control the performing rights in the repertoires of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, the Performing Right Society, Limited, of England, and the societies of France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Spain, Sweden, Norway, Finland, Denmark, Hungary, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Roumania, Portugal, Switzerland, Brazil, Belgium and Holland, and it maintains that included in its repertoire are some two million pieces of music. In order to impress upon its prospective customers the necessity of taking out a licence and complying with its requirements, and paying the fees which it exacts, it sends out a circular letter which contains this paragraph:

In order that the society's legal rights in the performance of the copyright music which it controls may be appreciated, we beg to draw your attention to the recent actions in court taken by the society against (1) La Paloma Restaurant Limited of 386 Yonge street, Toronto, Ontario, and (2) Champs Hotel & Cafe Limited of 1905 South Railway street, Regina, Saskatchewan.

The society gives those two illustrations to show the extent of its influence and that it intends to enforce the rights which it claims from one end of the country to the other.

I am fully in accord with the generally accepted legal principle that a vendor must establish a good title to that which he proposes to sell. This society carries on its activities by means of spotters and agents who are located in the principal cities of the dominion and who travel from place to place. People who have radios in their places of business have no knowledge that these spotters or agents are among their customers. These spotters and agents visit fraternal societies where concert performances are put on, and should any musical number be included in the performance that fraternal society receives a demand either from the Performing Right Society itself or from its solicitors.

There is in progress at the present time in Regina a lawsuit in which this society seeks an injunction to restrain a small restaurant from receiving through the medium of its radio, for which it has paid the regular licence fee, a certain piece of music. Not long ago a restaurant proprietor received a demand from this society setting out that during a certain hour at his place of business there was received over the radio certain pieces of music, including "Mr. Ghost Goes to Town." The proprietor of that restaurant did not know that the Canadian Performing Right Society was included among his customers. The next piece was entitled, "You are all I Need." I assume they meant by that that his custom was what the society required. Should he comply with their requirement, sign an application for a licence, give the details which they require from time to time and pay the fee, the next number received in his place of business would be entirely applicable, being entitled "You're an Angel." And if he continued paying these fees and filing the returns required by the society from time to time, the title of the next piece of music would be most appropriate: "When I grow too old to Dream." He and his customers having listened to these selections of music, he was required to take out a licence, to send in the details which they require from time to time and to pay a minimum licence fee of $10. Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that the proprietor of this and proprietors of hundreds of other establishments have paid the regular licence fee required by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, for the use of a radio receiving set, and having paid that fee and made his investment in the radio he feels he is entitled to receive over the air the broadcast programs.

Hon. members will recall, for example, the Imperial Oil broadcasts of the hockey matches on Saturday evenings, in which there are interludes of musical numbers. The Canadian Performing Right Society does not claim a monopoly of the hockey broadcasts; but while you are listening to them certain musical numbers are played in the intermissions, which numbers this society invariably claims to control, and if its demands are not met, legal action is threatened.

Mr. Speaker, I propose to support the second reading of this bill.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): I desire to add a word in support of the second reading of this bill. I heartily endorse the remarks made by the last speaker. I also have had some experience with this Canadian Performing Right Society through the manager of an hotel in my home city. This hotel is managed as well as any hotel in the province of Saskatchewan. For the convenience of the public the proprietor set up a radio in the rotunda in order that the patrons of the hotel and those around town who had no other opportunity to listen to hockey broadcasts might hear them. Shortly after the radio was installed in the rotunda, he was called on by a representative of this organization who was described to me as both ignorant and insolent. He demanded a licence fee of either $22.50 or $27.50; I have forgotten the exact amount. The proprietor said, "Rather than pay that I will take the radio out of the rotunda. I do not use it anyway." It was really a nuisance to him, but was benefiting the people who could listen in. There was no music broadcast except such as would come in before the hockey broadcasts, or perhaps for a few minutes afterwards or between the periods.

No one seems to be able to find out just what selections this organization holds the copyright of, and the bill is framed to require this information to be published and given those who pay fees. Not only do owners of radios have to pay for the radio itself; they must pay, or it is expected that they will have to pay, a $2.50 fee in order to enjoy that radio. Surely if this society is simply going to compel every person in the country who puts on a little entertainment to take out a licence, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should boycott this organization altogether and have nothing that belongs to this outfit go out over the broadcast chain, until the society is willing to publish that list and furnish it to those who hold licences.

That is not unreasonable at all. Other organizations, such as churches, service clubs, etc., put on numbers without knowing that this society holds any copyright on them, and then they are called upon and required to pay a fee. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is the finest racket there is, and from the description which has been given of some of the inspectors or agents or spotters, as the last speaker called them, who come around on behalf of this society, they are racketeering in proper form.

The Saskatchewan Hotels Association, at a recent meeting, passed a resolution authorizing the president to write a letter in this regard, and I assume that letter has been received by many hon. members. In any case, a day or so ago I received such a letter, dated Regina, February 10, 1938. It reads as follows:

Mr. Wm. K. Esling, member for Kootenay West, is, we understand, presenting to parliament at this session a bill to amend the Copyright Amendment Act of 1931.

We, as hotel people in the province of Saskatchewan, believe that the tariffs charged hotels by the Canadian Performing Right Society are entirely unreasonable—that it is an unfair practice to make a charge for something, without establishing the right to make such a charge. No one seems to know the copyright works which are controlled by this society and those which are not. For that reason, they should be compelled to list all works under their control and supply such list yearly to each licensee.

Then, there is the matter of charging for dances. In the province of Saskatchewan there are perhaps only two large hotels that might be considered in a different class. One is situated in Saskatoon and the other in Regina. Other than possibly those two hotels, dances are permitted after a banquet at a very modest cost. At a great many of these functions, a price of fifty cents provides a meal and the room for dancing purposes, as well as other facilities attendant upon such occasions.

However, we then have to pay a fee to the Canadian Performing Right Society because of some numbers which the orchestra might play and over which the society is supposed to have control. We believe that orchestrations were written by the composers to be used by orchestras, and when they are purchased by these orchestras, the royalty is paid at that time. Therefore, we think it is wrong to collect another fee when such orchestrations are made use of as originally intended by the composers.

There is also the matter of radios and gramophones in hotels. There is not justifiable reason, after radio broadcasting companies pay a large sum to the Canadian Performing Right Society for the privilege of broadcasting numbers which they are supposed to have under their control, and then because we are on the receiving end of the broadcast, and are in the hotel business, we must pay a further fee for the right to use the radio, because at any moment, and without notice, a number supposedly controlled by the said society, might be presented. Certainly the matter of choice plays a most insignificant part in this society's reasoning.

We do not wish to make this letter too long and tiresome. Except for that, however, we could advance many other reasons for asking you to very earnestly consider and support the bill presented by Mr. Esling.

Thanking you,

Yours very sincerely,
Saskatchewan Hotels Association,
Geo. G. Grant,
President.

In addition to that, even Rotary clubs throughout the country which put on entertainment features for the purpose of raising money purely for relief purposes are charged licence fees by this same society. It seems impossible for any organization such as that to select music without getting into trouble with this organization, because no one seems to know upon what orchestrations or other musical numbers they hold the copyright. I do heartily support the motion for second reading of this bill.

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques-Cartier) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, during the session of 1937, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) introduced in this house a bill similar to that which we are now discussing, and I believe, the same one which he had presented in 1936. The sponsor of this bill is no doubt very familiar with the question which he is propounding. He is unquestionably in good faith, and I do not know what we should most admire in him, either his convictions or the insistence with which he expresses his views before this house.

We all remember that the bill which was presented to this house last year was well received, and that it was not passed just because we were asked to test for another year the act in force. It did not get through because the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) asked us to leave the question in abeyance for another twelve months. Now that the year has elapsed, and since the hon. member for Kootenay West brings up the question again, the time has come to ask the hon. Secretary of State whether circumstances now permit to grant the hon. member's request and to agree to the amendments which he is proposing. After all these amendments should appear reasonable to all those who read the bill. This bill contains only two sections, and the proposed amendment to section 10 of the Copyright Amendment Act, 1931, reads as follows; from the 20th line down:

. . . and with each application for a licence or for the renewal thereof, the society shall furnish to those from whom fees are to be collected in compensation for the use of music on which the society controls copyright, a list of all titles of dramatico-musical or musical works so owned or controlled. Such list shall give the title, the name of the author and the date on which and country in which the work was copyrighted and the date on which the society registered in the Copyright Office at Ottawa its ownership or control of such work, and such list shall be certified to by the Secretary of State as a correct list of the works so registered.

It seems to me that it is quite reasonable to ask that anyone who has to pay the Canadian Performing Right Society any fees should know what works are covered by such fees, as well as the rights of those who claim it, in order not to be liable to pay for certain copyrights to no purpose at all.

What answer did the company make to the amendment proposed by the honourable member for Kootenay West? We have all received letters of propaganda on behalf of the Canadian Performing Right Society Limited. I have here a circular letter addressed to me by that company. This is what these gentlemen say on page 2 of their letter about bill No. 12 which we are now discussing:

(Text) (c) aims, by sec. 1, to force the printing and free distribution of a list of 2,000,000 works to about 10,000 persons or companies, the cost of which would be prohibitive and would in any case be out of date in a week's time.

What does that mean? Does it mean that they would take so much time to prepare the list that it would be out of date in a week, or that the changes would be so numerous that the list would become valueless in a week's time?

A hotelkeeper of Jacques Cartier constituency, which I have the honour to represent, brought to my attention a case which is typical of the procedure of this company's employees. Two customers entered his hotel and ordered a drink. After listening to the music provided by a special instrument installed in the hotel, they requested that a certain composition be played. When the hotelkeeper placed the record in the instrument and set it in motion, they informed him that he would have to pay a licence fee of $30 to the Canadian Performing Right Society Limited. As he refused to pay this sum immediately he received a series of letters demanding, first $30, then $20 and finally $10. Following my advice, I believe, he settled the matter for $10, the sum finally claimed from him.

[Mr. Mallette.]

Apart from the Canadian Performing Right Society Limited, Mr. Speaker, other societies are taking an interest in this bill. I was glad to hear, a moment ago, the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) read to the house a memorandum from the Saskatchewan Hotelkeepers Association. I have myself received a letter from the Quebec Rural Hotelkeepers Association. May I, for the information of this hon. house, place on Hansard some of the observations made by this fine association:

We understand that the bill submitted by Mr. Esling to the House of Commons of Canada aims at putting an end to the existing difficulties and preventing the said Canadian Performing Right Society from claiming every year additional fees which are always considered too high and are most harmful to the hotel and tourist industry, not only in the province of Quebec but in every part of Canada.

In its memorandum, the rural hotelkeepers association of the province of Quebec approve of the bill we are now considering, not only because the measure is in their own interest, but also because the association fears that the interests of the tourist industry in Canada may be jeopardized.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that the bill brought down by the hon. member for Kootenay West is not harmful to the authors themselves. On the contrary, the hon. member has shown in his statement that they have his full sympathy. But he is anxious that our Canadian fellow-citizens should not be exploited by one or more societies doing business in Canada, be it under the name of Canadian Performing Right Society or any other name. This bill aims solely at protecting the public. The house will no doubt give it this year as much consideration as last year. From the speeches which we have just heard, it would seem that all are desirous of supporting this bill and I am sure we can ask the honourable the Secretary of State if circumstances have changed since last year, and if the general conditions connected with this matter have shown any improvement. Last year, most of us voted against the bill introduced by the hon. member for Kootenay West for the sole reason that the hon. the Secretary of State had requested us to leave the matter in abeyance for another year, so that it might be possible to see how the law would work out.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I am supporting the bill introduced by the hon. member for Kootenay West, and should there be a division, I may assure him that I will vote for the measure.

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help feeling that the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) is in the right vibration when in this bill he attempts to contest the position of the Canadian Performing Right Society. It is absolutely necessary that we in Canada benefit by the cultural heritage and achievements of the world in general, and it is not unjust that when these things lie outside the public domain we should be prepared to pay for the use of them.

I am disposed to believe that the performing right society, in dispensing their wares to the people of Canada, are assuming all the prerogatives of a complete monopoly, and they are doing this in the not unnatural assurance that time will tend to confirm them in their position, and to eliminate contending elements. I am disposed to believe that they are quite unable to produce a list of the works which they assume to control. I have in mind the facility with which such a society can procure the services of hacks in order to make arrangements of certain works which lie in the public domain, or of which they would not be able to avail themselves in their original presentation.

Having said this, I reach the matter of broadcasting. I contend that the Canadian Performing Right Society has no right to assert itself beyond the original broadcasting studio. The government licenses radios through its own company, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and pays for the programs it broadcasts. In such a transaction with the society there should begin and end the expression of the society's position. To-day the society collects at the point of broadcast, and then it follows the waves along to collect again at the point of dissemination. In my opinion, in so doing it invades a territory to which it has no title, and usurps a function to which it has no right. Further, I believe its activity in any country, and especially in Canada under present conditions, will tend to destroy the development of cultural initiative upon the part of our people. If it is left secure in its monopolistic arrogance, small inducement will be presented to Canadian artists to produce Canadian works. The more I think of the matter the more I am satisfied that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is the one company representing this cultural arm of the government and the people of Canada, and that it should deal with all users of radio, and with broadcasting media.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should contract with the performing right society, and with any other group of cultural disseminators—there is no reason to believe there will not be others—in arranging reasonable tax rates which may be recovered through small added taxes on restaurants, hotels or other disseminating users. Such taxes should also provide an excess which would be applied to recompense purely Canadian talent in Canada, and so bring us to the honoured place where we might receive and rejoice in a greatly increased Canadian cultural expression, while still paying reasonable tribute for what the world has to give us.

For these reasons I have much pleasure in supporting the bill.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling), has expressed the hope that in considering this bill hon. members will look upon it not as a party matter but simply as a means of serving their constituents. I believe the hon. member will admit that that hope has been largely fulfilled inasmuch as the expressions of opinion have not been along party lines. Hon. members have expressed their individual opinions when speaking to this bill. As a general rule this is how copyright matters have been treated when brought before the house. Before I became a member of the government I remember that hon. members on both sides treated this involved and complex matter of copyright as one of individual concern.

Before I discuss the bill itself I should like to enunciate one or two principles which, it seems to me, must be considered in a discussion of this bill. Whether or not the bill is adopted, I do not think its meaning should be misconstrued. Copyright is by no means a tax or a permit or a levy; it is a property right. If a man has written a book or composed a piece of music, not only is he entitled to be considered the author or composer; not only is he entitled to the profits from the sales of such book or music, but he has the right to control over the performance thereof. In my opinion we should not tamper with this sacred principle.

I might add that in considering this bill we are dealing not with the principle of copyright, but with the Canadian Performing Right Society which claims to have acquired the performing rights to not only one, to not only a hundred, but to a million pieces of music. We have to face not just the exercise of a right by an author or composer, but the exercise of rights by a monopoly covering the performance of practically all music subject to copyright. I am sure that the introducer of this bill will not object to this distinction, as I think it gives to his bill the strength he is seeking.

Different governments that have had to do with copyright have taken the stand that there should be sections in the bill dealing with societies such as the one we are discussing. Following the international conference which took place in Rome in 1928, the Secretary of State of that time introduced a bill in 1931. While that bill followed fairly closely what had been adopted in Rome, the then Secretary of State felt that there should be a special section dealing with societies such as the Canadian Performing Right Society and section 10 of the amending bill of 1931 deals with that situation.

Subsection 2 of that section states that whenever in the opinion of the minister a society controlling a large number of pieces files rates that seem to be excessive, it shall be within the power of the minister to institute an inquiry into such rates. After representations had been made to the then government, the then Secretary of State took the stand that the rates of the Canadian Performing Right Society were disputable. Under an order in council dated March 22, 1935, the then government appointed Judge Parker as a commissioner to inquire into the Canadian Performing Right Society. This inquiry has been alluded to in former debates, and time will not permit me to go into any detail. The commissioner went into the situation very thoroughly and filed a report dated October 29, 1935.

It then became the duty of the succeeding government, through myself as Secretary of State, to give consequence to that report. I think the amending bill of 1935 implemented all the recommendations contained in the report, the main one being the appointment of an appeal board before which the rates of societies such as the one we are discussing could be considered by both sides. The decision of the board was to be final. When my hon. friend introduced his bill last year, I pointed out that this appeal board had been in existence for only a couple of months and it did not seem fair to amend the act further without waiting to see how the board worked out.

I pointed out also that it was the hope of the government that an international conference might be held in Brussels at which copyright matters would be considered. For these reasons it did not seem to me advisable to further amend the act. The house rejected that bill; but, as has been stated to-night, this rejection was not because of the principle of the bill but because the house was willing to agree with my argument for delay.

This appeal board has now sat on two different occasions, once in December, 1936, and again in December, 1937. I have come to the conclusion that as regards the first section of this bill, it is not within the competence of the board at all and it is not likely that we shall get any enlightenment from that source. In connection with the matter dealt with by the second section, that is, the rates charged by the performing right society to hotels, restaurants and other places where music is reproduced by a mechanical process, the board apparently has taken the stand that it must maintain some rates as long as the act acknowledges the right to charge a certain rate for a certain purpose. I agree that the house must now deal with this bill on its merits. The reasons that actuated me in asking the house last year not to hurry into a pronouncement on the bill do not exist at the present time.

As for the international conference, I regret to say that it seems to have been indefinitely postponed. By that, I do not mean that it may be years before a meeting of the kind is held, but the fact is that no positive date is actually foreseen. That may be due perhaps to the grave international difficulties which exist abroad. I think, however, that it would be a mistake, if an adjustment must be made, to delay the matter further merely in the hope that perhaps within a certain space of time we may have more definite pronouncements on these very questions.

Of course, the main difficulty that parliament cannot escape is the question whether we can adopt a bill of this kind without contravening the agreement which we have entered into with the other nations. That, I must admit, is a most embarrassing question, and I must say that, so far as authorities are concerned. I have not been able to secure any agreement in that respect. It would not be fair to the house if I did not say that there may be a doubt as to whether, according to the Rome agreement of 1928, we can do exactly what my hon. friend proposes to-night. But the doubt is just as grave in the other direction. It can be contended, though, that the meeting of 1928, as regards a monopolistic society such as the one we are now discussing, made no definite pronouncement. I know that in several countries since that conference there has been adopted some method of control, either state control or control through an appeal board such as we have in Canada, or control by means of legislation of some kind.

I do not think I am misleading the house when I say that the question of control over a very large number of copyright pieces, such as is claimed by the performing right society, could not fail to be one of the main features of a future international conference and agreement; but I cannot say that we have any definite pronouncement to the effect that that would preclude parliament from adopting measures of control in face of a situation of that kind.

That would apply especially to the first section wherein it is proposed that the company shall furnish to those to whom they sell licences, lists of works for which they claim copyright and performing right. I must say in all frankness that I consider the section rather futile; I do not think it is very useful. If you consider it carefully you will find that this society in selling licences allows the use of everything it has in stock. There is no reason, therefore, why anybody buying a licence should desire to have a list of all the works controlled by the society, because he knows when he buys a licence that he is free to use any. The section will be more useful when in the future several societies control different lists and appear on the market; but at the present time I do not think the section can be very useful, and I know it would be burdensome to the society and might have the effect in the long run of forcing them with a certain degree of reasonableness, to increase the price of their licence. But as we have provided in previous legislation to exact from the society a list to be filed with the Secretary of State, I fail to see, although the argument has been presented to us from outside quarters, how there can be more of a contravention of any international agreement to provide that, such a list having been filed with us, it should also be supplied to the public. For that reason I shall not take exception to the section, although, as I have said, I do not think it will serve any great purpose.

The second section is in my opinion much more important. It deals with the reproduction of music, by radio or gramophone. This was one of the principal subjects discussed at the last conference in Rome, and it was dealt with in two articles which I shall put on Hansard:

Article 11 bis.

(1) The authors of literary and artistic works enjoy the exclusive right to authorize the communication of their works to the public by radio diffusion.

(2) It belongs to the national legislatures of the countries of the union to regulate the conditions for the exercise of the right declared in the preceding paragraph, but such conditions shall have an effect strictly limited to the country which establishes them. They cannot in any case adversely affect the moral right of the author, nor the right which belongs to the author of obtaining an equitable remuneration fixed, in default of an amicable agreement, by competent authority.

Article 13.

(1) Authors of musical works have the exclusive right to authorize: (1) the adaptation of these works to instruments serving to reproduce them mechanically; (2) the public performance of the same works by means of these instruments.

(2) The limitations and conditions relative to the application of this article shall be determined by the domestic legislation of each country in its own case; but all limitations and conditions of this nature shall have an effect strictly limited to the country which shall have adopted them.

If you interpret these two articles in the only way in which they can be interpreted, there is no doubt in the first place that the composer of music is entitled to performing right when his music is reproduced by any mechanical process. But there is no doubt, either, that the convention has left to the individual countries which are parties to the agreement the right to legislate upon the matter in the way they think best suited to their own requirements. In 1931—and I must hasten, because I should like to get through before nine o'clock—the Secretary of State of the time in dealing with these articles added to his act a paragraph in the definitions reading:

(q) "performance" means any acoustic representation of a work or any visual representation of any dramatic action in a work, including a representation made by means of any mechanical instrument or by radio communication.

I submit that by the articles which I have read and also by this definition, which is included in our act, it is clearly stipulated that something should be paid for the performance by mechanical process of any piece of music. But it stops there. There has been no further provision preventing the government from legislating as to the price of the performance being paid one way or the other.

Let me now deal with the radio situation—and I think I can do so in very few words. The broadcasting stations are already paying to the Canadian Performing Right Society a very considerable price for the broadcasting of music. I am quite willing to take the stand personally that this is the proper way to meet the situation, because the broadcasting station chooses the piece of music that it wants to broadcast; it picks one piece of music rather than another. That is the very spirit of copyright; if you want to play my music you must pay me for it; if not, then do not play it. But what about the poor fellow in the small restaurant who has a radio and turns it on to get a hockey match or, it may be, a speech by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). It may be a dramatic representation. And if, perchance, after one has listened to those different broadcasts for fifteen minutes—

Mr. BENNETT: Turn off the radio.

Mr. RINFRET: —there should come to the radio a piece of music controlled by the performing right society, this society claims payment for that particular broadcast. According to our act as it stands, I think the society has a right to do so; but that is what my hon. friend wants to have amended, and I am quite willing to take the stand, personally and also as Secretary of State, that inasmuch as the performance of music is paid for, it does not matter very much either from the point of view of copyright or of any international convention whether it is paid for by the broadcasting company or by the people who, having bought radios, have that music thrust upon them whether they have chosen to hear it or not.

I wish just to add that the total sum which may be collected by the society this year from radio broadcasting amounts to $83,081.22. That is computed on the number of radios in this country. Inasmuch as these broadcasting stations pay according to the number of radio receiving sets there are in the country, to a certain extent they are already paying for any receiver who gets that music through the receiving set.

Therefore, after pondering over the situation carefully, and after hearing representations made not only by many correspondents but by the hon. members who have taken a stand to-night on this matter—

Mr. BENNETT: Part of the time you were at the St. Henry election, you know.

Mr. RINFRET: I am sorry that, desiring to conclude before nine o'clock, I cannot be driven out of my line of argument—I do not feel that the government should delay in any further way the second reading of this bill. Two years ago the hon. member introduced his bill, and he was asked to make way for the government. Last year he also introduced the same bill; but on account of circumstances to which I alluded at the beginning of my remarks, I asked the house not to pass it. Now the whole business is before parliament; it is well known, and it can well be decided on its merits. I say, in conclusion, that the government will be guided in this matter by the vote of the house.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Surveys and engineering branch—hydrographic service, $418,000.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Before we proceed with the consideration of this item, I wish to correct an answer that I made this afternoon to the hon. member for Davenport, who inquired if there are any employees in the Department of Mines and Resources who draw salaries from two departments. I overlooked the fact that there are in the immigration branch certain employees who are really employees of the Department of National Revenue, and who are stationed principally at customs ports of entry. Across the Canadian international boundary, as my hon. friend knows, are a great many ports of entry. Many of these are light ports where there may not be more than half a dozen or even one or two in a day seeking to cross. Purely as a matter of economy arrangements have been made with the Department of National Revenue that their officers at such ports act as our immigration inspectors. For the service they render in that respect a small salary is allowed them. I think in most cases it is $10 or $12 a month. Only to that extent does the condition prevail to which my hon. friend referred this afternoon.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give some information in regard to the progress made in the hydrographic survey of the Pacific coast? I take it this item covers the surveys that have been in operation up the coast of the Queen Charlotte islands.

Mr. CRERAR: That is in charting waters?

Mr. STIRLING: That is what this vote covers, is it not?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. I am informed that the work was completed last year in the water adjacent to the Queen Charlotte islands. This year it is proposed to carry on the work between Vancouver island and the mainland, chiefly at the south part of the island.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister mean that the charting of the waters adjacent to the Queen Charlotte islands has been completed, or just that part of the work arranged for 1937?

Mr. CRERAR: There is further work yet to be done in that district. The survey of the part of the coastal waters of the Queen Charlotte islands under way last year has been completed. I cannot say at the moment the precise area covered, but this season the work is to be done between Vancouver island and the mainland chiefly at the south part of the island.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the department own the surveying vessels and equipment?

Mr. CRERAR: There are two vessels, one called the William J. Stewart and the other the Pender, that have been engaged in this survey work in the coastal waters of British Columbia.

Mr. STIRLING: They are hired vessels?

Mr. CRERAR: No; they are owned by the department.

Mr. BENNETT: One is new, built two or three years ago?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, I understand the William J. Stewart is a comparatively new boat, only a few years old.

Mr. LENNARD: In the details on page 122 of the estimates, there is an item, wages, $75,302. What does that cover?

Mr. CRERAR: That is wages for ships' crews and shore parties as well as for board while on shore, for hydrographic officers, ships' officers and crews. That will be expended approximately as follows: On the steamship Acadia operating in the gulf of St. Lawrence and Quebec region, $17,100; the Cartier operating also in the gulf of St. Lawrence and Cape Breton, $15,750; the Boulton operating on the upper St. Lawrence river, the Ontario-Quebec section, $2,430; the Henry Hudson operating on the north shore of the lower St. Lawrence, $2,430. Then there is the Georgian Bay, Ontario survey, $2,250; the William J. Stewart on the Pacific coast, $28,350; the Pender on the Pacific coast, $5,400, and the Lillooet, laid up, also on the Pacific coast, $1,467. There is a small item for precise water levels on the St. Lawrence and great lakes, $25; and tidal and current surveys, $100. These are wages for the crews operating these vessels.

Mr. LENNARD: Are they permanent employees or temporary?

Mr. CRERAR: They are largely seasonal employees. These ships do not work in the winter.

Mr. LENNARD: But are the same men employed from year to year?

Mr. CRERAR: Sometimes. It varies.

Mr. LENNARD: This would not come under temporary assistance?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. NEILL: Was the Lillooet in commission last year?

Mr. CRERAR: No; she is laid up and will not be used this year, I am told.

Mr. NEILL: Is there not ample need for both boats operating on the Pacific coast?

Mr. CRERAR: There are two; there is the Pender and the William J. Stewart.

Mr. NEILL: The Pender is only a houseboat, is it not?

Mr. CRERAR: No; it is a little bigger than a houseboat; it does good work. The William J. Stewart of course, is the large boat of the service.

Item agreed to.

Legal surveys and map service, including grant of $350 to assist in printing the publication of the Canadian Institute of Surveying, $171,510.

Mr. BENNETT: How many people in the public service are engaged in making maps?

Mr. CRERAR: I am afraid I cannot at the moment give information as to the total number. In this particular subdivision of the department there are sixty-four permanent employees.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister will say what other departments are engaged in making maps.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Department of National Defence for one.

Mr. CRERAR: That and the Department of Mines and Resources I think are the only two.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister will find that there is another. Who makes the maps connected with the franchise act?

Mr. CRERAR: That is done under this particular vote.

Mr. BENNETT: They are doing that now?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; that is part of the work which comes under this vote. I might give the functions of the staff engaged under this vote. They are: To undertake all legal surveys required by the Department of Mines and Resources, including the Northwest and Yukon territories, National parks, ordnance lands and Indian reserves, and the legal surveys required by other government departments; to maintain the central office for indexing, filing and recording survey returns and plans of the surveys and engineering branch and supplying information from them; to compile and prepare from existing base maps or from published maps, electoral maps and general maps for use of the various government departments, air navigation maps, natural resource and railway maps, general maps of Canada and all types of maps except topographic made from original field surveys; and to print maps and charts, to distribute all departmental maps except those relating to mines and geology. Roughly those are the functions which are carried on by the subdivision covered by this vote.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the minister why there is such a large increase, amounting to approximately $10,000, in the provision for temporary service in this branch of his department?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed by the director that certain maps had to be prepared in connection with the trans-Canada air service and that there are temporary employees engaged for that work, which, I take it, largely accounts for the increase in temporary assistance from $1,980 to $12,010.

Mr. BENNETT: But these estimates become effective only on the first day of April next.

Mr. CRERAR: That is what it is for.

Mr. BENNETT: It cannot be for past expenditure.

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that they have started the work already. I do not know how they are being paid at the moment.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a prohibition against it in the statute.

Mr. CRERAR: I certainly hope we are not violating any statute.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister knows that the statement made to him a moment ago by the director could not be possible within the law; that is, this could not be for work which has already commenced. These estimates have no applicability to anything until the first day of April, 1938, unless we vote money for governor general's warrants or matters of that kind. If this work is undertaken to be paid for out of a vote to be made, it is against the statute in that case made and provided, under which there must be an appropriation before the work can be undertaken unless there is a governor general's warrant for it.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. CRERAR: From the information I get from the director I think perhaps the Department of Transport advanced a certain amount of money.

Mr. BENNETT: Out of unforeseen expenses, probably.

Mr. CRERAR: Probably; I do not know out of what vote it comes, but it is from that money that the staff presently engaged are being paid.

Mr. BENNETT: The trans-Canada airways is a separate entity, and there was provision with respect to its capital being advanced to pay for services rendered by the government. That might be the position.

Mr. CRERAR: That may be the position.

Mr. MacNICOL: In connection with all these items which refer to temporary assistance and wages the hon. member for Lincoln made the statement earlier in the day that the total was approximately half a million dollars. I have not made the total to be much over $100,000, but that is a good deal of money. In reference to what the minister said earlier in the afternoon, namely that the civil service commission selects those who are to perform the temporary service, I should like to ask a further question. If that is the case, there must have been a tremendous number of jobs advertised by the civil service commission. I have seen some jobs advertised, but nothing like the number that this provision for temporary service would call for. So I ask the minister: Are jobs which come under the heading of temporary assistance advertised and the successful applicants selected by the civil service commission?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; but I might point out to my hon. friend that the temporary assistance referred to here might refer to civil servants who have been temporary for eight or ten years. That is, the employees have been in the service under a temporary classification and not in the permanent service.

Mr. BENNETT: That avoids superannuation difficulties.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. As a matter of fact, I think there is a margin maintained in all the departments.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe there is a regulation covering the permanent and temporary employees in all the departments.

Mr. CRERAR: It is eighty to twenty, I believe.

Mr. STIRLING: To what extent has the public supported this mapmaking service? To what extent does the public purchase the maps, either by single copies, by the hundred or by the thousand, for use of societies and so on?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that we get about eighty or ninety orders a day for maps, and a small charge is made. Personally I think a charge should be made for every map which goes out, and, for that matter, for most reports which go out from government departments as well. Probably it would curb a little the demand that comes from certain quarters for maps and government reports of one kind and another. I think the principle is sound, and I may say here that it is one the application of which we hope to extend in this department.

Mr. STIRLING: Has the minister any figures as to the revenue over the last few years? Is it increasing?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that from the distribution of maps we receive between $8,000 and $9,000 a year.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

General—Book of Remembrance, $10,000.

Mr. LENNARD: Would the minister tell us just what progress has been made with the book of remembrance?

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): The agreement, approved by order in council, P.C. 865, of April 23, 1937, entered into with James Purves, heraldic artist, illuminator and designer, for the executing and completion of the book of remembrance expires on March 31, 1939. On that date the committee confidently expect the book to be complete in every detail, and ready for dedication in the memorial chamber.

On May 15, 1938, a total of 66,900 names will have been inscribed by hand on the vellum pages of the book. This will represent the total number of names to be inscribed.

The committee are satisfied with the illumination which is being done on the written pages; and with the progress which the artist is making in connection with the illumination being done on the dedicatory and other pages.

The boards for the cover of the book are prepared and the leather is on order.

The chief binder, public archives of Canada, who has given much time and thought to the question of binding the book, assures the committee that the book can be properly and permanently bound at public archives.

The final recommendation of the committee with respect to reproducing the book will be submitted for approval within ten days' time.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman said 1937.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. That is, the first agreement entered into in 1932 was for a period of five years.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought so. We made an agreement for five years. The work was not completed in five years, and last year a further agreement was made to carry it forward until 1939.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is quite correct.

Mr. BROOKS: Will copies of this book be made for distribution or sale to the public?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think the hope is that copies will be available for public institutions throughout the provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: Those will be photographic copies, as I understand it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, and a reproduction copy will be available.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Departmental administration, $190,670.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, this covers the administration of the offices of the Minister of Public Works, the deputy minister, the purchasing agent, and the secretary of the department. The increase of $12,000 is mostly accounted for by the restoration of the five per cent cut, and statutory increases and promotions in the department. There are just a few new appointments.

Mr. BENNETT: Just a few?

Mr. CARDIN: Not very many

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask a question, but if this is not the proper time I shall not go ahead with it. I should like to learn from the minister the routine between the Department of Public Works and the Post Office Department with reference to the moving of a post office from one situation to another. I have in mind something about which I wired the minister just before leaving for the coronation, namely the removal of a post office on St. Clair avenue west, Toronto, from ward 6 to ward 5. The information I got at that time was that it was on recommendation from the Post Office Department to the Department of Public Works that the work was being done. Is this the proper time to ask the question? Is this the item under which an order for the removal of a post office from one position to another may be discussed?

Mr. BENNETT: The patronage committee, I would think.

Mr. CARDIN: Generally speaking, we follow the recommendation of the Post Office Department when they contend that the space allotted to them is not sufficient, or the building is not a proper one. Of course that is a general statement, but we must remember that the case mentioned by the hon. member is also very general. If he would give me further detail, I should be only too happy to give him all the information he wishes when we are considering the estimates at a later date. Probably he will indicate to me the special case he has in mind.

Mr. PELLETIER: Would the minister explain the provision of $3,000 for travelling expenses?

Mr. CARDIN: That amount covers the travelling expenses of the officers of the main office in Ottawa, including the deputy minister, the assistant to the deputy minister, and other officers of the branch headed by the minister. As I said a minute ago, the item covers the minister's office, and those of the deputy minister, the assistant deputy minister, the purchasing agent and the secretary of the department. It happens that the officers of these different branches have to travel, and that item covers it. I regret I have not the full particulars, but I shall have them later on. My idea was simply to call an item in the department.

Mr. PELLETIER: So we may take it to mean that in addition to this amount, there are other travelling expenses in the department.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes; for example, there are travelling expenses in the architects' branch, the chief engineer's branch, the telegraph branch, and others. These travelling expenses are enumerated under the different items, and when we reach them we will give the details. As I pointed out earlier, these travelling expenses relate more particularly to the offices of the minister and the deputy minister.

Mr. STEWART: In the item I notice what would appear to be a departure from or innovation in the practice of the department. So far as I know, for the first time there appears in the estimates an item of $3,300, for a clerk of tenders. I had not known of any such official in that department in the past, and I should like to know if this is a new departure. If so, what reasons have prompted the change? I know the minister appreciates the importance of this matter. A great many tenders are invited by the Department of Public Works, through advertising. The tenders come in sealed. In the past they have been left in the custody of the secretary, the deputy minister or some other official of the department. When the time arrived for the opening of tenders, those who had tendered were invited, and had a right to be present when the tenders were opened. I know that was true in the last few years, and I assume it is a practice which has continued under the present ministry.

Formerly there was no clerk of tenders, and I am wondering why it is thought necessary at this time to make the appointment, and to set up a new office. To cover the whole matter, and to save time when he is answering, the minister might tell us whether the clerk of tenders is a new appointee, whether he is appointed by the civil service commission, whether he was in the employ of the department before, and who he is.

Mr. CARDIN: I regret that at this time, for the reasons I have set out, I am not in a position to give the hon. member all these details. The position is new, but the man occupying it is a former employee of the department. He was in the service, and this is just a change of title which has been given to a man already in the service. If my memory serves me correctly, his name is Rivard. At all events I shall not insist upon passing the item at this time because I realize that it is important to have the information.

As regards the practice mentioned by the hon. member, of permitting contractors to be present when tenders are opened, may I reply that the practice still prevails in the department. All contractors are always welcome. In fact, either the contractors or their representatives are always present when tenders are opened. The practice followed in the time of the hon. member is still pursued.

Mr. STEWART: I am glad to hear that, because there is nothing more necessary than to establish in the public mind a confidence in the reception and disposition of tenders in a department such as the Department of Public Works. I am sure the minister appreciates the importance of what I say.

Mr. CARDIN: In many instances it is a protection for the minister.

Mr. STEWART: I am going to ask the minister to permit the item to stand, and when it comes up again I should like to have full information on the points upon which I have asked for information, and in relation to this whole innovation. As I said, I should like to have the reasons for it, the effect of it, why it is thought necessary and how it is thought it will improve the practice which has heretofore existed. It seemed to me that all precautions were taken and everything done to satisfy the public in connection with tendering, and I should like to have full information as to why it is thought necessary to have a clerk of tenders.

Mr. CARDIN: I quite agree with that.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister might also give us such information as he has regarding the appointment of a purchasing agent. The previous government had in mind the establishment of a central purchasing authority, such as we had a long time ago and which saved us hundreds of thousands of dollars. The sale of material was another matter that gave all of us a good deal of difficulty. Perhaps the minister will inform us whether any effort has been made, and if so to what extent, to unify and simplify the matter of purchases by the various departments, because there will be a great deal said as we proceed, especially in connection with one department.

Mr. CARDIN: The item might stand.

Item stands.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Departmental administration, including amount required to pay allowances to typists, grade 1, employed cutting stencils, in accordance with regulations approved by order in council, $553,020.

Mr. BENNETT: I take it that the minister does not expect to pass this item but just wants to discuss it.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Acting Postmaster General): I would be quite willing to pass the item if the committee has no objection.

Mr. BENNETT: We would hesitate to deprive the minister of an opportunity to talk about his own item.

Mr. STEWART: Could we have some information as to the large increase in the number of employees?

Mr. POWER: The committee will notice that there is a decrease in the total item. There is an increase in the staff from 132 in 1937-38 to 150 this year. This is the report:

Additional positions provided in 1938-39 estimates:

Departmental administration—18.

2 stenographers, grade 3 (office of deputy postmaster general).

Additional assistance being required, two positions of stenographer, grade 3 were approved by the civil service commission, and authorized by order in council. The commission then issued promotion certificates on behalf of two permanent employees.

3 stenographers, grade 2 (administrative services).

2 stenographers, grade 1 (1 in administrative services; 1 in equipment and supply branch).

1 clerk, grade 2 (administrative services).

4 clerks, grade 1 (administrative services).

4 typists, grade 1 (administrative services).

1 packer and helper (equipment and supply branch).

1 office boy (administrative services).

These positions were approved by the civil service commission and authorized by order in council to provide for the permanent appointment through the commission of temporary employees of the same class in the branches named when the restriction on permanent appointments were removed by order in council.

Mr. STEWART: Has there been any reorganization of the service?

Mr. POWER: Some temporaries were made permanent.

Mr. STEWART: I mean an internal reorganization of the department.

Mr. POWER: I do not think so.

Mr. STEWART: Has there been an increase in the service through air mail or anything of that kind?

Mr. BENNETT: I was just going to direct the attention of the Minister of Mines and Resources to page 165 of the estimates where he will find a map draughtsman at $1,800. I told him before that I thought there was another draughtsman somewhere but I could not give it to him at the time. This map draughtsman in the Post Office Department would seem to be a duplication of his heroic effort to minimize duplication.

Mr. POWER: The explanation I have just received is that that draughtsman does not draw geographical maps.

Mr. BENNETT: I am told that there are political maps.

Mr. POWER: My information is that he draws maps of machinery, but perhaps that may have some connection with politics.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know whether the minister cares to proceed beyond this one item to-night, but there is some information I should like to obtain and I was wondering if I should wait until the Postmaster General returns.

Mr. POWER: If my hon. friend would ask the questions, they would be on Hansard.

Mr. HEAPS: I would prefer to wait until his return.

Mr. THOMPSON: I notice there is an amount of $4,080 for a private secretary and then an additional allowance of $600 for the same purpose.

Mr. POWER: For many years the arrangement has been that when a private secretary has been in the permanent civil service he retains whatever salary he received and receives an additional allowance of $600 for acting as private secretary. These items do not mean that he receives $600 in addition to the $4,080; it means simply that he receives the $600 in addition to his regular salary in the department.

Mr. THOMPSON: Are these private secretaries still taken care of when the government changes after they have served for three years?

Mr. POWER: So far as I remember, the Civil Service Act was amended in 1934 or 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: It was amended before the late government came into office.

Mr. POWER: I was referring to the last amendment. Prior to 1930 a private secretary who had acted as such for a year was privileged to obtain a position in the permanent service of the government at a salary not less than that paid to a principal clerk, or chief clerk, I just forget which. In 1934 the Civil Service Act was amended to provide that before a private secretary could obtain that privilege he would be obliged to serve three years in that capacity. I believe that is the situation at the present time.

Mr. LENNARD: Will the minister tell us why this department has to have an "artist, lantern slides?" I was always under the impression that this was all handled by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. POWER: That is for publicity purposes. I imagine that a good part of his work would be in connection with the campaign which is put on during the Christmas season, "Post your mail early" and matters of that kind. One frequently sees sketches made by men who are in the habit of putting on lantern slides in the moving pictures.

Mr. BETTS: Who does the necessary repairs to the various post offices?

Mr. POWER: That is done by the Public Works department.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. BETTS: That being the case, what is the necessity for a mechanical engineer, a senior engineer and an assistant mechanical engineer?

Mr. POWER: That would be in connection with machines used in post office work.

Mr. BROOKS: Will the minister explain the item for supervisor for rest room; where is this rest room, and for whom is it in operation? Is it for employees or visitors?

Mr. POWER: There are between four and five hundred women employees in the department at Ottawa, and a rest room has been placed at their disposal just as there are rest rooms in every building in which there are a number of departmental employees. The position of supervisor of rest room was created to look after that.

Mr. BROOKS: Has the minister a rest room in his department?

Mr. POWER: So far as the minister is concerned, he works all the time. I do not know what the staffs do, but I shall inquire.

Mr. WALSH: This is another item showing in a certain part a very substantial increase—

Mr. POWER: A decrease.

Mr. WALSH: No; an increase. In administration there is an increase from $278,060 to $298,520, represented by increase in staff. I assume the volume of business going through the Post Office Department has considerably increased during the past year, necessitating that increase in staff.

Mr. POWER: That can be accounted for in two ways. First, there is $11,012 which covers the five per cent deduction. As will be remembered, when other departments have been in supply it has been explained that the comparison with last year's estimates is not quite accurate in that last year, when the main estimates were brought down no provision was made for the five per cent deduction. The estimates came down with the five per cent deduction off all salaries, and later on, during the course of the session, a supplementary estimate was brought down whereby the five per cent was restored. But it was restored in a lump sum and not attributed to the particular departments to which it applied. Therefore, in comparing the $253,000 with the $273,000 one must take account of the salary deduction of $11,000 odd. In other words, there is a difference of approximately $9,000, which is accounted for by the eighteen extra employees whom I mentioned a moment ago; and the fact that the revenue of the post office has increased by $1,300,000, as compared with last year, would account for the increase.

Mr. HEAPS: I ought to voice a protest against this method of bringing down the post office estimates. Two years ago, when the estimates of this department were brought before us, there was a lengthy discussion in the committee regarding the manner in which the department submitted its estimates. I am not disputing the accuracy of the estimates, but the idea was that anyone examining the estimates as they have been submitted and are now being submitted cannot tell what they mean. One does not know what the estimates in themselves indicate; no one can get from them anything definite except that the expenditures estimated for the coming year are so many millions of dollars. Possibly there is a little more business than there was last year, but in the discussion we had in this chamber in the session of 1936 the Postmaster General gave an undertaking to the committee that in submitting future estimates he would bring down a statement of the sort which is submitted by any business executive to the shareholders of a company. In these estimates as we have them we can get no idea of what the business of the post office was for the past year or what it is likely to be for the coming year. We cannot tell from the estimates whether the department has made a profit or has been running at a loss. All we are asked to do is to vote the estimates in the absence of any substantial information. I should like to know why the the undertaking given by the Postmaster General two years ago has not been carried out, namely, that in subsequent years we should have a proper statement from which we might get a better understanding of the operations of the department.

Mr. POWER: The hon. member will find a great improvement in the manner in which the estimates are presented this year as compared with last year. Last year there were two items for the whole business of the post office; this year there will be found at least seven or eight. This year, under the item which we are now considering, departmental administration, there are given complete details of the persons employed in departmental administration. Last year that was all bulked, and it was impossible for members of the committee to ascertain exactly what was being done. I am familiar with the hon. gentleman's criticism. He would like the Post Office Department to give a profit and loss statement as any business would do. After all, this is one of the largest departments of public business, and he would like to have a statement of profit and loss showing rentals, cost of carrying mails, newspapers and so on. Do I understand that to be what the hon. gentleman has in mind?

Mr. HEAPS: More or less.

Mr. POWER: I can give that to some extent. A condensed comparative summary of the revenue of the Post Office Department and expenditure for the year ended March 31, 1937, and that estimated for the year 1938 will show: Revenue, postage stamps, cards, etc., sold for 1936-37: $28,179,322.60; estimated for 1937-38: $28,720,000. Postage paid in cash, 1936-37: $10,203,389.06; estimated for 1937-38: $10,882,000. All other revenue, 1936-37, $2,798,854.69; estimated 1937-38, $2,978,500. The gross revenue for 1936-37 is $41,181,566.35, and the estimated revenue for 1937-38 is $42,580,500. Deductions from revenue, 1936-37, postmasters' commissions and allowances, $6,384,055.93; discount to stamp vendors, special deliveries, transit charges and so forth, $522,958.42; making a total for 1936-37 of $6,907,014.35. 1937-38 estimates: Deductions from revenue, postmasters' commissions and allowances, $6,738,700; discounts to stamp vendors, special deliveries, transit charges, etc., $561,300; making an estimated total for 1937-38 of $7,300,000. Expenditures: 1936-37: Salaries, $16,187,668.62; mail service $13,526,697.60; miscellaneous, $830,-209.05; total of $30,538,575.27; 1937-38: Salaries, $7,448,936; mail service, $13,944,415; miscellaneous, $850,000; total, $32,243,378. 1936-37: Excess of revenue over outside services, $3,735,973; for 1937-38, $3,037,122.

Mr. HEAPS: Is that the net post office estimated profit for the ensuing year?

Mr. POWER: No. Next are the Public Works department charges. Although this is only a bookkeeping entry it is about $2,700,000. Rental value of post office space, including char service, fuel and light, amounts to $2,750,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the net result?

Mr. POWER: I wish to give just a few other items if my right hon. friend will permit me. We make an estimate of some credit items which should be given to us: Credit for franking privilege, $1,122,676; credit for the operation of the savings bank, $80,000. So that the surplus as given is $3,037,122.

Mr. BARBER: Does that include repairs to buildings?

Mr. POWER: Repairs to buildings are all done by the Public Works department. I should imagine that the public works charge is all-inclusive, because I see here it includes char service, fuel and light; it also includes charges for repairs, furniture and all that kind of thing which goes into the work of the post office.

Mr. HEAPS: That does not answer the question I asked at first. Although the minister has given us the figures as the department has them, I do not see any good reason why a properly prepared statement in the form of an actual balance sheet of the utility as such, could not be submitted to the committee. I do not believe any hon. member, by cursorily listening to the figures just submitted by the acting Postmaster General, can make out what these figures really mean. He tells us there is a profit of something over a million dollars.

Mr. POWER: A surplus of $3,037,122.

Mr. HEAPS: Is that after deducting the amount which the Department of Public Works charges for the use of buildings?

Mr. POWER: No.

Mr. HEAPS: Well, then, the profit is not quite as large as is suggested by the acting Postmaster General. He has given us the credit side of the balance sheet; but he has forgotten to put down some of the debit items, one of which I shall mention at once. The Post Office Department obtains each year an enormous revenue from stamps which really should not be credited to that department.

Mr. POWERS: On cheques.

Mr. HEAPS: On cheques, yes. All stamps used for excise purposes which go to the revenue of the post office should be credited to the revenue of some other department. It is almost impossible to ascertain the value of the stamps which are used each year in Canada for excise purposes. If that were put against the credit items enumerated by the minister this evening, it would be extremely difficult to say whether the post office is operating at a profit or at a loss. Even with the opportunity of examining the figures as submitted by the post office we are unable to say whether it is making a profit. I am anxious that the post office, which is perhaps the largest utility operating in the dominion, should be carried on in the same manner as any well conducted enterprise would be; and it seems to me that the minister, instead of submitting the series of figures which have been presented this evening, should present a proper balance sheet each year showing the exact amount of the revenues, from what sources they have been derived, the expenditures, what they are for, and a comparison with previous years. I had expected that, as this matter was discussed in this chamber at considerable length a couple of years ago and the Postmaster General gave an undertaking that such a course would be followed, within a period of two years the post office would be able to adjust itself to that new form of bookkeeping which we were led to believe they would give to the committee, and I do not understand why after this lapse of time it is not forthcoming. Could the minister inform us what stands in the way of the presentation of a proper statement in the form of a balance sheet, whereby at a moment's glance hon. members would know how the post office had been operating during the past twelve months and what would be the estimated expenditures and revenues for the ensuing year? Can the minister give us any assurance that next year something of the sort can be submitted to us, we having waited already for two years?

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. member will turn to the auditor general's report, Post Office Department, part P 2, and read the thirty pages between pages 2 and 32, he will find the information he seeks. But what I cannot understand is why we could not in these estimates detail the revenues and expenditures with as much particularity as they are in the auditor general's report. The report of the auditor general gives a complete statement of the revenues of the Post Office Department for the year ended March 31, 1937. In volume I there is a broad statement of it; but in volume II, which I hold in my hand, are the details. According to the auditor general, the Post Office Department for the year ended March 31, 1937, had a gross revenue of $41,181,566.35. To earn that gross revenue it was necessary to make expenditures out of the revenue as received, and those expenditures which are also stated at page 2 covered rent allowances, commissions, discounts, postage on parcels to other countries, indemnities, etc., showing a total of $6,907,014.35. The difference between that sum and the gross revenue to which I have just referred amounts to $34,274,552, being the total of net postal revenue for the year. Then follow the particulars of the expenditures made. And at page 32 of the auditor general's report there is the complete detail—that is complete under large headings—of what is on the thirty pages before that, showing that the total expenditures of the department were $31,906,272.05. Now the difference between that sum and $34,274,552, it will be observed, is something like $2,300,000. That is the auditor general's report. Why the Post Office Department should show a different statement here this evening I do not know.

Mr. POWER: It is $2,394,220.73.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; that is the correct figure according to the auditor general's report, but that is not the figure the minister gave this evening. I assume that was through error, because he was dealing with the sum he has just mentioned together with another sum which should not have been included.

Mr. POWER: I might recapitulate: Excess of revenue, $3,735,976.73—and here perhaps is where the difference comes in—headquarters administration and contingencies, $1,341,756, leaving a net surplus of $2,394,220.73. I am informed that the dominion government does not take into consideration the overhead, which would be represented by headquarters administration and contingencies. That would perhaps be the explanation, although I do not think it will satisfy my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: The auditor general's report we know to be accurate, because it is vouched for by the production of documents. What the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) said, and what I desire to support him in, is that we were to have before us not a statement such as we have now but a statement in connection with the post office estimates which would show the contemplated revenue from all sources, and the contemplated expenses broken up in much the same form as they are broken up here. In the estimates presented to us they are broken up, but not broken up under headings such as you find on page 32 of the auditor general's report. For instance, civil government, at Ottawa and outside; then travelling expenses amounting to $70,000; general expenses, materials, supplies, repairs, etc., $357,000; printing and stationery, $454,000. Then there is other outlay, that is payments to the rail companies for handling mail and to the air lines and steamship companies, and finally you have the total under the words "total expenditure," amounting to $31,906,272.05.

What the hon. member for Winnipeg North is seeking is that there should be in these estimates, as I believe it was understood there would be for the year 1938, a record indicating the contemplated revenues, not in detail of course but under the broad headings used in the auditor general's report. It is necessary to have that before one can arrive at any idea as to what the net revenue will be, because from the gross revenue derived from sale of stamps, etc., one has to deduct the amount which has to be spent immediately for the purpose of earning that money, namely, transport and matters of that kind. That leaves a balance. Then there was some additional casual revenue represented by $3,470.76 and fines and forfeitures, $171. The broad general statement will be found in volume I of the auditor general's report, Post Office Department. I say that because it has always been thus under all governments. Do not for a moment think that I am charging this administration with having done anything that was not done by previous governments. I am not suggesting that for a moment.

Mr. POWER: I have not suggested that as an alibi, either.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but that would come presently—

Mr. POWER: No, I thought of it a long time ago.

Mr. BENNETT: —in fact immediately if I resumed my seat. But I desire to point out that all that is sought is something which is not new in this house. When the present acting minister was sitting on this side I can recall the unpleasant hours that the then Postmaster General spent waiting anxiously for a Friday night on which the call went out, "Night or Blucher." Very often it used to be both "night" and "Blucher." Under those circumstances it is nothing new when I say that successive governments have been grappling with that question. The hon. member for Winnipeg North put it up to the minister whether we could not make a statement something similar to this, perhaps not with so much detail, indicating our contemplated or expected revenues, the expenditures that we are appropriating, because the auditor general is bound to take the credits item by item and show what has happened to the money thus voted by parliament. The minister is quite right when he says that great objection was taken to that large item amounting to many millions in which everything was included, in other words, a basket item. That item was objectionable to this house, and that was the grievance urged by the hon. member for Winnipeg North upon the government I think two years ago, this government with a new mandate from the people to lower the tariff and increase the taxes. In that glorious day they were to give us all the information we sought and indicate so large a surplus that we might increase the salaries of the rural mail carriers and provide satisfactory jobs for all those who desire to displace Conservatives. My hon. friend the surveyor (Mr. Fafard) laughs, because I can see that he knows perfectly well, having mapped out the rural mail routes in his district, how great the difficulty is to provide for all these things in the manner that we anticipate before we get into office.

Mr. POWER: The manner to which our people are accustomed.

Mr. BENNETT: To which your people are accustomed; that may be. I suggest that it would not be difficult to show the relation of the contemplated expenditure to this contemplated revenue in the manner indicated. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North says, this is a utility. It stands on an entirely different basis from any other department.

Mr. POWER: On that point, without at all wishing to draw a red herring across the trail, but by way of digression, may I make this statement, that in my own department I found that against certain items we could place a revenue item. For instance, for the vetcraft shops I am obliged to ask parliament for something like $72,000, whereas really there is income of something like $50,000 to set off against it. The net loss would be about $25,000. Something similar occurs with reference to the sick mariners' fund, as my right hon. friend knows. I tried to make some arrangement with the treasury board to show in the estimates that there is a revenue coming in. I suppose the principle would apply to some extent in connection with the matter we are now discussing. It would be an estimated income. But I was informed that though this is done in Great Britain—

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. POWER: —that against the appropriation there is an estimated revenue, this has never been the practice in Canada; and for some reason, which frankly I have not been able to understand, we are not permitted to enter in our estimates proposed or estimated revenue.

Mr. BENNETT: The reason is that the money is paid direct to the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. POWER: And it does not come into the department; but if my right hon. friend would permit me to say so, I know of a case where it is not done.

Mr. BENNETT: So do I.

Mr. POWER: Where it would not be done.

Mr. BENNETT: We might exchange confidences.

Mr. POWER: It is not a confidence. In the case of vetcraft, at the end of the year, or at a certain period of the year, when large sums of moneys are expended on poppies and the returns from the poppy sales have not come in, the department runs very short of money, and in order to pay the salaries of the men employed in the vetcraft shops it would be necessary to obtain a governor general's warrant unless substantial sums were voted in the estimates prior to that time. But the money returns to the department. When the cheques come in from sales of poppies the money returns to the department. Perhaps that is a confidence, but I do not think so.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not going to take up too much time on this matter, but I might point out to the minister that the auditor general's report shows the total of the postal revenue for the year and indicates the heads under which that revenue is received. Then he gives the total gross revenue and the disbursements that are made from revenue, in other words the money that is spent from day to day for the purpose of earning that revenue, and this is given under half a dozen heads. That, it seems to me, would be possible in our estimates without difficulty; it is just what the minister has in his estimates now, plus half a page, for instance, merely indicating the estimated revenue during the year, just as has been done by the auditor general in his report. In the one instance we have the exact revenue and in the other we would have merely the contemplated revenue.

There might be one difficulty about that, and it might be a very considerable difficulty. If it should be contemplated that the postal rate should be reduced from three to two cents, and it should appear in the estimates in that form, it would anticipate the budget and therefore might lead to some difficulty. The minister has succeeded in breaking the estimate up partly in comparison with what it has been in the past, but it seems to me there would not be much difficulty in breaking it up into those items into which the auditor general has divided it.

Mr. POWER: It is broken up to some extent, as my right hon. friend knows, in the main estimates, and in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North I have given further details. I could go still further and give him an estimate of the revenue for the year 1938 under each heading, such as postage stamps, second-class matter, third-class matter, metered mail and so on.

Mr. BENNETT: That is just what the hon. member says we were to have printed, rather than depend upon the statement of the minister.

Mr. POWER: My right hon. friend has been of this much assistance to me—and possibly he has put his finger on the real reason why this is not stated in the estimates—that at some time or another it may be proposed by the Minister of Finance either to reduce or to increase the rate on mail, and it would be impossible for the Postmaster General to make any estimate without divulging that fact.

Mr. BENNETT: He gave up $800,000 on United States magazines without consulting us.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I am generally in accord with this desire to have a proper business accounting in the Post Office Department, but I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North refer to rents as one of the expenditures made in carrying on the business of the post office. I should like to hear whether the hon. gentleman desires the rents on all post offices to be assessed and recorded, because, if so, I cannot see how that can be done on a purely utilitarian basis, which is the only basis on which it could possibly enter into the post office account.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact, it does not enter into it at all in the auditor general's report.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I am raising the question.

Mr. STEWART: The hon. member for Winnipeg North on several occasions has brought forward this same query. Evidently he desires, as I know other hon. members also desire, to know how far the Post Office Department pays its way, whether there is a surplus or a deficit.

There are two or three factors which must be taken into consideration in addition to those mentioned by the minister. For instance, a post office building is required. It is constructed by the Department of Public Works, out of moneys voted for that purpose. It is maintained by the Public Works department, no charge being made to the Post Office Department and no details of expenditure appearing in the accounts of that department. Then the building is heated, and the cost of heating is paid out of a vote under the Public Works department for the maintenance of public buildings. There is also furniture, which to a considerable extent is supplied in the same way, from a vote for furnishings and supplies for public buildings. So if the hon. member for Winnipeg North were to get all this information, which I think it would be impossible to obtain, I fancy he would find that the Post Office Department does not carry itself, does not pay its way. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. POWER: I am inclined to agree with my hon. friend. In those circumstances the Post Office Department could not carry itself. Then very probably there would be some contra accounts. Very often in a post office building there are offices occupied by the customs department or half a dozen other departments. I know in my own city the Department of National Defence has offices in the post office; the department of health, the Department of Public Works and the Department of Justice also have offices in that building. There are half a dozen departments with offices in the post office in Quebec city, and I should imagine that the same condition obtains in a great many other localities. So I think the accounting would be difficult; I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North would admit that.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes; but I was under the impression that two years ago, when this matter was raised in the house, the Postmaster General undertook to obtain a proper accounting from the Public Works department, to find out what would be the rental value of all these buildings.

Mr. POWER: I should imagine that the figures I gave in response to the request of my hon. friend are those which the Postmaster General of the day agreed to obtain.

Mr. HEAPS: I think the minister is quite correct: I believe those figures which have been submitted to us to-night, amounting to about $2,750,000, were probably obtained as a result of negotiations between the Post Office Department and the Department of Public Works. I have always had a strenuous objection to the way in which our post office buildings have been built. The Department of Public Works builds post offices, and then says to the Post Office Department, "Here are some buildings for you whether you want them or whether you do not."

Mr. POWER: Oh, no.

Mr. HEAPS: Oh, yes. I make that definite statement, knowing the facts in one particular case, where a post office was erected for the Post Office Department, which post office that department did not want. I believe that is not the only case of that kind, because in the past post offices have been erected without any request on the part of the postal authorities, and I believe we had the promise last year or the year before that that state of affairs would be rectified. I hope it has been, and I hope that in the future no post office will be erected in any part of the Dominion of Canada unless it is at the request of the postal authorities themselves. It is quite possible that if the Post Office Department were to have the say in the erection of these post offices this item of $2,750,000 might be considerably less. I do not know whether there has been any experience during the past twelve months, but perhaps the minister might say whether during that time the Post Office Department have been asked to take over buildings, for which no requests have come in from that department itself.

Mr. POWER: I am informed that there have not been, so far as we know. In any case, I shall be very glad to transmit the hon. member's observations to the Post Office Department. Meanwhile I would ask that the item stand.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask a question with respect to practice in the department. Last summer postal station L on St. Clair avenue, at the corner of Appleton and St. Clair, was moved from that location to a point about 500 feet east, on the opposite side of the street, from one ward to another. Through what means was that move made?

Mr. POWER: I am informed that this discussion might more properly come under another item, namely the item respecting salaries and other expenses, staff and so on.

Mr. STEWART: What number was the last one?

Mr. POWER: We are now on item No. 257. I would suggest that the discussion of the matter would come under item No. 258.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is satisfactory.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Lands, parks and forests branch—branch administration, $23,460.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Chairman, this branch of the Department of Mines and Resources comes under the head of lands, parks and forests branch, and I believe I might briefly outline to the committee the functions of this particular branch. In the first place, it has to do with the government of the northwest territories.

Mr. BENNETT: Is this the only item respecting the northwest territories?

Mr. CRERAR: The item called is not. I am just giving a brief survey of the work of the branch. It has to do with the government of the northwest territories, and that is again subdivided into the eastern arctic and western arctic divisions. It has also to do with the government of the Yukon territory. Likewise, the branch is engaged in what is known as the dominion forest service. It is true that the forest lands are all owned by the provinces; but as hon. members will recall, the federal government has several forest experimental stations, and the administration of these come under this branch.

Then, there are forest products laboratories, one of which is in British Columbia, another in Ottawa and another, more definitely related to the pulp and paper industry, in the city of Montreal. Then, there is the matter of land registry. All the ordnance lands, admiralty lands and public lands, indeed, all the lands of the federal government which are not directly administered by other departments, such as the Department of National Defence, are administered by the Department of Mines and Resources, and come under the direction of this branch.

Mr. MacNICOL: Under this item?

Mr. CRERAR: No; I am just giving a general survey. We shall come back to particulars in a minute. In addition, there is the administration of national parks in Canada. I believe at the present time there are about twenty of them. Likewise, there is the administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act. This briefly summarizes the work of the particular branch whose estimate we are about to consider.

Item No. 135 has to do with branch administration, including such matters as the salary of the director, and his immediate assistants. Indeed, it might be described as a sort of head office item for this branch of the department.

Item agreed to.

Government of the northwest territories—general administration, operation, maintenance and improvement of services, including Wood buffalo park, $245,320.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give an account of the reindeer experiment?

Mr. CRERAR: The reindeer experiment appears to be working out satisfactorily. The herd is now more than 4,000 in number, and each fall a certain number are being slaughtered. The meat is distributed to some of the schools and hospitals at Aklavik, and also to the natives. I understand the skins are also utilized by the natives for clothing. From the information we have received so far, I believe that as the years go by the experiment will prove a very useful contribution to the natives of that region.

Some consideration is being given to getting the Eskimos interested in small reindeer herds of their own, so that they may be used, as in Lapland, as beasts of burden. The economy of Lapland I am told is largely dependent upon the reindeer, and I think it is possible that this might be repeated among our Eskimos in the north. To the extent that we succeed, we are making them more self-reliant and able to fend for themselves. At the present time the experiments look promising. A few Eskimo boys are being trained as herdsmen, and are being taught how to look after these animals.

Mr. STIRLING: Are the reindeers being protected? Is the Eskimo permitted to hunt them?

Mr. CRERAR: No; at the present time the reindeer are herded, and they are under supervision.

Mr. BENNETT: The journey has been completed, has it not?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: How many are there now?

Mr. CRERAR: I stated a moment ago there were something over 4,000.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Could the minister give us a report on the buffalo that were returned to the range around Fort Vermilion? I believe they were taken from the buffalo park at Wainwright some years ago.

Mr. CRERAR: They appear to be doing quite well. Those buffalo are partly in the northwest territories and partially in the extreme northern part of Alberta. It is very difficult to get an accurate census of the buffalo, but as nearly as the park wardens can estimate there are upwards of 8,000.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Are they drifting south at all?

Mr. CRERAR: I suppose they overrun the boundaries of the park at times, but the park is very large and contains suitable pasturage. It is really the natural habitat of these animals. There are some wood buffalo there and as a matter of fact they do not tend to migrate to the south. I suppose if the herd were to increase to 100,000 or so, they would overrun the greater part of Alberta.

Mr. BARBER: I notice there is an increase from $32,000 to $49,000 in supplies and materials; could the minister explain this increase?

Mr. CRERAR: There would be medical supplies, additional food and fuel and equipment for the medical officers and provisions for the destitute. I notice that that particular item is $10,000.

Mr. BARBER: That would make up the increase?

Mr. CRERAR: Not altogether. There are years when the fur catch is quite light and the authorities say that at the present time we are in a low fur cycle. Under these circumstances the Indians, the Eskimos and the half-breeds have to be assisted and the requirements are greater. Only a week or so ago I had a telegram from a party who had just returned from Aklavik who painted a rather dark picture of conditions there. I do not think they are quite as bad as reported, but there is no doubt that the shortage of fur has a bearing upon the amount of supplies and relief necessary to be sent into the north country.

Mr. BARBER: That explanation would also cover the increase in the amount for hospitalization?

Mr. CRERAR: It would have a bearing upon that. When the natives are poorly nourished they are more susceptible to disease and there are more calls on our hospital accommodation.

Mr. BROOKS: I notice the hotels and shops in different parts of Canada have been selling buffalo meat, and I should like to know if there is any revenue from this sale.

Mr. CRERAR: There would be none in connection with the Wood Buffalo park in northern Alberta. Over 2,000 buffalo were slaughtered this year at Wainwright and Elk island. I think there were something like 5,000 or 6,000 in the Wainwright park alone. The park was overstocked, and it was a question of either extending the area and spending a good deal of money on fences, or reducing the herd by slaughter. It was considered that about 4,000 buffalo were sufficient for the purposes for which the park was created, and the surplus animals were slaughtered and the meat sold. The hides from this slaughter have been sold. The revenue derived from these sales will go into the consolidated revenue fund. While I am on this point I might direct the attention of hon. members to page 10 of the report of the Department of Mines and Resources where will be found a statement of the revenue turned into the consolidated revenue fund by the department for the fiscal year ended March 31 last.

Mr. BENNETT: It is set out in the auditor general's report.

Mr. BROOKS: Have any buffalo been sold to parks in the United States or in other parts of the world?

Mr. CRERAR: A couple of years ago a small shipment of half a dozen was sent to Germany, but there are no sales made.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the question of whether the Eskimo is an Eskimo or an Indian been decided yet?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That question is before the supreme court.

Mr. CRERAR: I have been urging my colleague, the Minister of Justice, to secure a decision on that matter as quickly as possible as we are a little at controversy with the province of Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the case been argued?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No.

Mr. FAIR: Is the buffalo meat sold by tender or by other negotiations?

Mr. CRERAR: By advertised tender.

Mr. GREEN: What is the population of the northwest territories?

Mr. CRERAR: Approximately 1,500 white people, 4,000 Indians and 5,000 Eskimos.

Mr. GREEN: How is that population divided between the two districts?

Mr. CRERAR: The greater number is in the Mackenzie river country. There are very few Indians in the eastern arctic, the population being principally Eskimos.

Mr. PERLEY: Who was the successful tenderer this year for the buffalo meat? This meat was on sale in nearly all the towns in Saskatchewan.

Mr. CRERAR: Burns and Company, I am informed, were the highest tenderers and got the meat and the hides also.

Mr. FAIR: How many tenders were received for the buffalo meat?

Mr. CRERAR: I believe there were two, but I cannot recall at the moment the other tenderer. Both, however, were from packing companies.

Mr. BROOKS: Are the Eskimos of Canada self-supporting, or are they quite a burden on the Canadian government?

Mr. BENNETT: We have given them relief steadily during the last few years.

Mr. CRERAR: In the western arctic, broadly speaking west of Hudson bay, in the Mackenzie river country, they are pretty well self-supporting; they do not require a great deal of assistance from the government. Unfortunately, that is not the case to the same degree in the eastern arctic, and it is the eastern arctic that constitutes the main burden of relief so far as the Eskimos are concerned.

Mr. STEWART: There is an item of $54,810 for hospitalization, professional and other services, grants to schools, assistance to industrial homes; and for the year 1937-38 the amount was $51,460. Could the minister give the detailed expenditures under this item last year?

Mr. CRERAR: There has been some increase in pupils in the schools, and that involves additional grants for educational work. There was an increase in the number of pupils in the school at Aklavik and there have been a few additional nurses who have been sent in for hospital work.

Mr. STEWART: I did not make myself quite clear. What I wanted was not so much an explanation of the way in which the money was to be expended as a detailed statement of the actual expenditures made—the amounts to various institutions and organizations, and so on.

Mr. CRERAR: The total amount estimated for this year for hospitals is $19,500, which is an increase of $2,500 over the previous year.

Mr. STEWART: What I am more interested in is a statement giving the details of the expenditure in the past year—to what organizations the money was paid and how it was expended.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think I have that information in detail. There are hospitals, for instance, in the western arctic at Fort Smith, Hay river and Fort Simpson. There are two at Aklavik, and in the eastern arctic, one at Chesterfield and one at Pangnirtung. The expenditures for these I gave a moment ago. The figure is $19,500, which is an increase as compared with last year. Then, there is maintenance of patients in provincial sanatoria and maintenance of those in provincial asylums. Individuals who become insane or become mental cases have to be sent out of the territory to institutions where they can be cared for. In this case they go to a provincial institution and their maintenance has to be taken care of. There is transportation of patients and there are other transportation charges, besides freight, cartage and express. At a score of points there are schools which have to be maintained. The supplies for these schools and transportation of these supplies make up the item.

Mr. STEWART: Can the minister give any further details of the expenditure for the past year showing those to whom the amounts were paid?

Mr. CRERAR: I have not that information under my hand, but a note will be taken of the question and the information can be supplied.

Mr. MARTIN: What proportion of the population of the northwest territories is white, and is there any demand on the part of that population for representation in this chamber?

Mr. CRERAR: There are 1,500 whites, it is estimated.

Mr. BENNETT: That is in the whole of the northwest territories?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; and so far I have not heard of any suggestion that they should be represented in parliament.

Mr. MARTIN: A bill was introduced into this house. These people are virtually disfranchised, and while the population is not large in comparison with the Yukon, it is not very small.

Mr. CRERAR: It is smaller than in the Yukon. At any rate, so far as I am aware, during my period of office here no request of the kind has come. Since this question has been raised, it may be interesting to observe there is a probability of there being a substantial increase in the white population in the western arctic during the next few years. One of the most promising fields potentially for gold mining has been discovered north of Great Slave lake, eight hundred miles north of Edmonton. I visited that area last September. One mine is going into operation shortly, and another is in process of construction. From present indications it would appear that there is a possibility of a considerable mining development in that country. That, of course, will increase the population and create problems in administration. I may say for the information of the committee that this is now receiving the consideration of the officers in the department. We desire if possible to see ahead the problems that may arise and prepare as far as we can for them. While so far there has not been, to my knowledge, any request from that area for representation in this parliament, I should not be surprised if it did arrive within a few years.

Mr. STIRLING: How will supplies go in to that new field?

Mr. CRERAR: North of Slave lake? Down the Athabaska river. It will go by railway from Edmonton to Waterways, which is the terminus of what I think is called the Northern Alberta railway.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the old Alberta and Great Waterways.

Mr. CRERAR: The old Alberta and Great Waterways, now operated by the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. From Waterways by boat down to Fitzgerald; from Fitzgerald by portage for sixteen miles to Fort Smith; that is over the rapids on the Slave river.

Mr. STIRLING: No; but the minister is now describing the way in. I thought he spoke of a new field to the north, again, of this one.

Mr. CRERAR: No; I am coming to that. From Fitzgerald to Smith on the Slave river; down the Slave river to Slave lake, and across Slave lake to these mining areas on the northern side.

Mr. PELLETIER: Does the minister mean the Peace river instead of the Slave river?

Mr. CRERAR: No; I am speaking about the Athabaska and Slave rivers. It may be of interest to the committee to have this information about the development which has taken place in that country. I should suppose that five years ago the total amount of freight moved from Waterways down the Athabaska river probably did not exceed 350 or 400 tons. Last year 22,000 tons of freight moved down this river.

Mr. PELLETIER: I did not think it was under this item that transportation facilities to the north country would be discussed.

Mr. CRERAR: No. My hon. friend is quite right. It will come up under another item. I am merely giving the information in response to a question.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I see that "sundries" have risen considerably, from $2,733 to $4,030. "Sundries" seem to be a place where considerable increases can be put in without exposing anything. Can the minister give details of how this larger amount has been made up?

Mr. CRERAR: That is an unallotted vote; it is a sort of general blanket vote put in for contingencies. I stated a moment ago that a considerable development had taken place in this territory. It is not possible to foresee every item of expense that may be required, and consequently we thought it wise to increase this sundries vote rather more than a thousand dollars so that we would have something to fall back upon in case there arose the need for expenditures that at the present moment cannot be foreseen. It is difficult to tell what may arise in a district which is eight hundred miles north of Edmonton, to say nothing of the distance it is from the capital of the dominion.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): That is quite all right, but the item considered as a percentage seems to be a large amount. Here we have an increase from $2,733 to $4,030, or nearly fifty per cent added to the amount expended last year under sundries. I think this item deserves more attention, and I should like to have a little more information about it.

Mr. CRERAR: I suggest to the committee that an increase of $1,300 is not an unreasonable amount. Of course, $1,300 is $1,300.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): That is right. When one is talking in millions it does not mean much. I quite understand that.

Mr. CRERAR: But when one is talking of the development of a vast area of country it does not, I think, mean very much. I repeat that it is quite impossible to foresee every item or kind of expense that may arise in the next year; and we thought it wise—and I trust the committee will approve our judgment—to increase the item by the amount that my hon. friend has mentioned. After all, $1,300 is not very much when one considers the responsibilities that may arise there.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I ask again, Can we be given any idea of the principal items of which this vote will be made up? That is all. It is $1,300.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is referring to the sundries item?

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: No; I cannot at the moment. We may have an epidemic of smallpox, or measles, or something of the kind which will have to be looked after. It might be that a number of people will go crazy in that country and will have to be brought out to a mental institution. Any one of half a dozen things of that general sort might happen.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): It is too bad that the minister did not think of that last year when he brought down his estimates.

Mr. CRERAR: We may have erred last year.

Mr. GREEN: In the last few months there have been various statements by the premier of British Columbia to the effect that he was going to extend that province to include the Mackenzie river basin. Would the minister tell the committee whether there have been any negotiations with this end in view or negotiations of any kind dealing with the matter of that province taking over the Mackenzie river basin?

Mr. CRERAR: That is, the extension of the boundaries to the arctic?

Mr. GREEN: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: No. I understand the premier of British Columbia recently gave out a statement at some future date he was going to make that request to the federal government, but so far as I am aware he has made no official request to the government.

Mr. GREEN: There has been no request made to date?

Mr. CRERAR: In respect to the extension of the boundaries of eastern British Columbia to the arctic?

Mr. GREEN: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: There was, of course, in respect to the Yukon.

Mr. GREEN: But there has been no request made in regard to the Mackenzie river district?

Mr. CRERAR: No. It might have been mentioned in a letter to the Prime Minister —I am not sure about that—but it has not been to me. I know that Mr. Pattullo made a statement the other day in Vancouver or somewhere else in British Columbia to the effect that he intended to request that the boundaries of the province should be extended to the arctic.

Mr. GREEN: There are no negotiations under way at the present time?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 23, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the clerk of the house has received from the chief electoral officer certificate of the election and return of the following member, viz:

Of Allan G. McAvity, Esquire, for the electoral district of Saint John-Albert.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

Allan G. McAvity, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Saint John-Albert, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. J. E. Michaud.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO STATUTORY GRADES OF WESTERN GRAIN

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 27, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BURLINGTON CHANNEL SOUTH PIER

Mr. LENNARD:

1. Who was the inspector for the government on the reconstruction of south pier, Burlington channel, during the year 1937?

2. What was the amount of his remuneration for the said year?

3. Is he paid by the month, week or day?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. William H. Caldwell.

2. $1,356 (from January 1, 1937, to completion of contract, Septemper 22, 1937).

3. Paid at the rate of 75 cents per hour.

POINTE DU CHENE, N.B., WHARF

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Was Mr. Thomas G. Gallant, of Barachois, parish of Shediac, Westmorland county, New Brunswick, construction foreman on public wharf at Pointe du Chene, Westmorland county, in the year 1937?

2. If so, on what dates was Mr. Gallant employed as such foreman, and what amount did he receive for his services?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes.

2. (a) April 20 to 28 (8 days); May 1 to 21 (16½ days); June 11 to 30 (16 days); July 1 to 15, and 19 to 31 (21½ days); August 2, 3, 11 to 18, and 25 to 31 (15 days); September 1 to 17, and 20 to 29 (24 days); October 1 to 15 (12½ days); November 4 to 13, 16, 17, 19 to 23, 25 and 29 (16 days). (b) $647.50.

TWEED, ONT., POST OFFICE

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. Has the government acquired a site for a post office at Tweed, Ontario?

2. If so, what is the location of such site, when was it acquired, from whom, and for what price?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, under the authority of an order in council passed on January 5, 1938, a site located at the southeast corner of Victoria and Bridge streets was acquired from Mrs. James Quinn in exchange for another property which had been purchased for $2,500.

NATIONAL PORTS COMMISSION ENGINEER

Mr. GARIEPY:

1. During the last year, what were the living and travelling expenses of Mr. Yuill, engineer of the national ports commission?

2. How much of same were charged to the port of Three Rivers during the same period?

3. What, if any, of his salary was charged to the port of Three Rivers during the same period?

Mr. HOWE: The following information is furnished by the National Harbours Board:

1. $805.75—total.

2. $354.15.

3. None direct. Head office expenses are assessed proportionately against the several harbours under the jurisdiction of the board in accordance with the provisions of the National Harbours Board Act.

THREE RIVERS, QUE., PUBLIC WORKS ENGINEER

Mr. GARIEPY:

1. Is it the intention of the government to reopen in the city of Three Rivers the office of engineer of the Department of Public Works which was closed in 1937?

2. Upon whose recommendation was said office closed?

3. To what point was the personnel of said office transferred?

4. What became of the archives and records of this office after it was closed?

5. Since said office was closed, under the jurisdiction of which public works engineer do the city of Three Rivers and surrounding district now fall?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. This office will be reopened if such action becomes necessary in the public interest.

2. The chief engineer and deputy minister of the Department of Public Works.

3. To the district offices at Quebec and Montreal.

4. Transferred to the district offices at Quebec and Montreal.

5. The counties of Champlain and Lotbiniere and easterly thereof to the district office at Quebec, and westerly thereof to the district office at Montreal.

STE. ANGELE-DE-LAVAL-THREE RIVERS BRIDGE

Mr. GARIEPY:

Has the government obtained a report on the advisability and advantages of constructing a bridge over the St. Lawrence river, linking Ste. Angele-de-Laval with the city of Three Rivers?

Mr. CARDIN:

No.

CANADIAN GOLD PRODUCTION, HOLDINGS AND EXPORT

Mr. POOLE:

1. How much gold was mined in Canada in 1936 and 1937?
2. Does the Central Bank possess the total gold of Canada?
3. What is the note issue at present time on the basis of gold holdings?
4. How much gold was exported?
5. To where?
6. For what purpose?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. 1936, 3,748,028 fine ounces; 1937, 4,054,799 fine ounces (preliminary figure).

2. No.

3. The Bank of Canada Act requires that the Bank of Canada maintain a reserve in gold coin and bullion of not less than 25 per cent of its note and deposit liabilities. As at February 9, 1938, the Bank of Canada held gold coin and bullion to the amount of $179,742,151.83, valued at the then world market price, against a note liability of $150,798,900.03 and a deposit liability of $223,080,806.18.

4.	1936	1937
Gold bullion other than monetary.. .. .. oz.	2,039,237	3,030,042
Gold-bearing quartz, dust and nuggets (gold content).. .. .. oz.	172,176	211,359
Gold coin.. .. .. oz.	Nil	Nil
Gold bullion, monetary.. .. .. oz.	Nil	Nil
5.
Gold bullion other than monetary—
United Kingdom.. .. .. oz.	126,845	71,592
United States.. .. .. oz.	1,912,392	2,958,450
Gold-bearing quartz, dust and nuggets (gold content)
United Kingdom.. .. .. oz.	87	818
United States.. .. .. oz.	167,622	206,944
Belgium.. .. .. oz.	3,557	1,808
Germany.. .. .. oz.	910	241
Japan.. .. .. oz.	....	1,548

6. For sale.

HEAVY DUTY SCALES

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott):

1. How many heavy duty scales have been inspected in each province of Canada during the calendar year of 1937?
2. How many of these scales were used for weighing grain in Canada?
3. How many of such scales were used for weighing other heavy commodities in Canada?
4. How many of each type of these scales have been rejected?
5. How many of each type of these scales were repaired or adjusted and then passed as correct?
6. How many of each type were discarded and replaced by new ones?
7. How many of each type are still under lock?

[Mr. Gariepy.]

Mr. EULER:

1. Prior to April 1, 1937, statistics for heavy duty scales (6,000 lbs. up) were not segregated.

The figures for the first ten months of the present fiscal year, namely, April 1, 1937 to January 31, 1938, are as follows:—

	Total number of scales
Ontario	3,233
Quebec	1,220
New Brunswick	170
Nova Scotia	257
Prince Edward Island	52
Manitoba	1,837
Saskatchewan	6,041
Alberta	4,111
British Columbia	316
Total	17,237

2. Grain—9,857.

3. Others—7,380.

4. Grain—1,487.
Others—2,798.

5. Grain—1,162.
Others—2,025.

6. No accurate information.

7. Grain—5.
Others—127.

*PENSIONS ADVOCATES—PENSIONS TO EX-SERVICE MEN

Mr. POOLE:

1. How many pensions advocates in the veterans bureau of the Department of Pensions and National Health were engaged in service in the actual theatre of war?

2. How many ex-service men are drawing 100 per cent or less pension who never served in the war?

3. How many ex-service men are employed in the civil service of Canada, who are drawing a pension; what is the amount paid to each; what salaries are they receiving, and what position do they occupy?

Mr. POWER:

1. Pensions advocates who served in France, 23; in England, 4; in Canada, 1; with no war service, 1.

2. The answer to No. 2, as put, would be, nil. However, if the question means, as is indicated in No. 1, the number who served in the actual theatre of war, the distribution is as follows:

France	69,917
England	6,660
Canada	2,750
Other theatres of war	462
Total	79,789

If the hon. member will look at the annual report of the Department of Pensions and National Health for the year ended March 31, 1937, page 59, tables 8 and 9, he will see a more complete distribution indicated, with the percentage of disability.

3. In the past several years this question has arisen on several occasions, and the reply of the minister has invariably been in the sense of that given by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), when he was Secretary of State. In 1934 the hon. member made this statement, referring to a similar question:

> A year ago the hon. member made a similar inquiry and an order for return was made. It has been impossible during the year to obtain anything like a satisfactory return to that order, although to-day I have laid on the table of the house the best information we could obtain. During the present session I have laid on the table of the house sixteen portfolios containing the names of between 99,000 and 100,000 persons receiving pensions. To ascertain who of all those in the public service of Canada are receiving such pensions is impossible by mere comparison of names. It means that each department must send to every employee in the public service, permanent or temporary, to ascertain whether that person is one of those 99,000 or 100,00 persons whose names are mentioned.

These figures cover dependent as well as disability pensioners. I would suggest, in view of this statement, and of similar statements made since that time, that this part of the question be dropped.

EXPERIMENTAL FARMS—ENTERTAINMENT ALLOWANCE

Mr. MacRAE:

1. Is an entertainment allowance given to the superintendents of the various experimental farms and stations?

2. If so, how much?

3. What amount was paid to the respective superintendents of each station in the year 1937?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. No, but entertainment for official visitors on the basis of 75 cents per meal may be authorized.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

BRAMPTON, ONT., ARMOURIES

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. What was the original cost of the armouries at Brampton, Ontario?

2. What year was it built?

3. Upon what dates was additional money spent on the said armouries?

4. How much was spent on each of such dates?

5. Is the government considering any addition or extension of the said armouries this year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. $17,765.

2. 1913-1914.

3 and 4.

1914	$1,593
1915	1,146
1920-21	564
1921-22	1,219
1922-23	49
1925-26	160
1926-27	147
1927-28	82
1934-35	365
1936	320

5. Yes. An addition is contemplated.

GRADING OF HOGS

Mr. THOMPSON:

1. How many hog graders did the government employ in each of the years 1935, 1936, 1937?

2. What salaries were paid to these hog graders?

3. What was the total cost of hog grading in each year, 1935, 1936, 1937?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. 39 in 1935; 41 in 1936; 41 in 1937.

2. Senior swine grader, $2,520 to $2,760 per annum; Swine grader, $2,040 to $2,520 per annum; Junior swine grader, $1,620 to $2,160 per annum.

3. $106,144.85 in 1935; $113,709.65 in 1936; $118,752.06 in 1937.

CHARTERS ISSUED TO MERGERS AND COMBINES

Mr. THOMPSON:

How many charters did the government issue to mergers and combines in each year from 1921 to 1937 inclusive?

Mr. RINFRET: No charters have been issued under The Companies Act except for the purposes or objects and within the limits prescribed by the act. Every company incorporated under the Companies Act is subject, in the operation of its business, to the provisions of the criminal code relating to the restraint of trade, to the Combines Investigation Act, and to other statutes of Canada having general application. No letters patent have been issued to any company or corporation purporting to except it from the operation of laws relating to restraint of trade and combines.

GOVERNMENT LIGHTHOUSE TENDER "ALBERNI"

Mr NEILL:

1. When did the government lighthouse tender, Alberni, arrive on the British Columbia coast?

[Mr. Graydon.]

2. Since that date, how many times has she been in drydock?

3. On what dates, what work was necessary on each occasion, and what did it cost?

4. How many knots is its ordinary rate of travel?

5. At such rate, what is its coal consumption in 24 hours of consecutive travel?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Victoria, B.C., January 18, 1937.

2. Once.

3. Dates: October 27, 1937, to November 2, 1937.

Docking, scraping, wire-brushing, hull painting, sea valves and cocks examined	$ 550 00
Deck repairs and renewals	3,227 00
Machinery repairs and renewals	1,681 77
	$ 5,458 77

4. Speed 6½ knots before docking; speed 7½ knots since docking.

5. 13½ tons.

*CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. LAWSON:

As of January 31, 1938, how many employees has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation serving in: (a) Ottawa; (b) Toronto; (c) Montreal?

Mr. LAWSON:

1. What are the names and addresses of all persons employed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation who are paid salaries of $3,600 per annum or more?

2. What are the salaries received by each of such above persons?

Mr. LAWSON:

1. How many employees: (a) full time; (b) part time, had the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on March 31, 1936?

2. What was the aggregate salary of such employees?

3. How many employees: (a) full time; (b) part time, had the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on March 31, 1937?

4. What was the aggregate of their salaries?

5. How many employees: (a) full time; (b) part time, had the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on January 31, 1938?

6. What was the aggregate of their salaries for the period April 1, 1937, to January 31, 1938, inclusive?

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, these three questions refer to matters connected with the internal management of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Corporation, and cannot be answered for reasons I stated a few days ago. May I add, however, that within a few days a committee of the house dealing with radio broadcasting will be functioning, and at that time these and any other questions will be answered by the management.

Mr. SPEAKER: Questions 25, 26 and 27 dropped.

Mr. BENNETT: It is only fair to point out that some of those employees are appointed by governor in council; that is what it amounts to.

VICTORIAVILLE, QUE., SEWER

Mr. GIROUARD:

1. Has the government or any of its departments contributed to the construction of a main sewer in the city of Victoriaville, province of Quebec?

2. If so, what respective portion is to be paid by the federal government, the provincial government and the municipality?

3. How many persons worked on such construction, what are their names and addresses, and how much did each receive per day?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes.

2. Under the provisions of The Unemployment Relief Act, 1930, the dominion contributed $3,750 towards the construction of "aqueduct, sewers and bridge" in Victoriaville, the province of Quebec contributing a like amount, the municipality contributing $7,500.

Under the provisions of The Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936, the dominion contributed $8,000 towards the "construction of sewers on Notre Dame, Albert and Saint Joseph Streets," the province of Quebec contributing a like amount.

3. The works referred to in 2 above having been carried out under the jurisdiction of the municipal authorities, the names and addresses of the persons employed thereon and their earnings are not matters of record with the dominion government.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

NIAGARA RIVER BRIDGE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the government received any correspondence from the government of Ontario, or any other persons in reference to the construction or reconstruction of new bridges across the Niagara river, or in reference to the observation bridge that was destroyed?

2. If so, will the government lay all the papers on the table of the house?

3. In future, will consideration be given to the idea of having all bridges across international streams like the Niagara or St. Lawrence in Ontario, erected, controlled and owned by the joint governments of Ontario and New York, under public ownership, so as to prevent a monopoly and excessive charges to the public, as set out in the debates of the house, in past years, on private bills for bridges across the St. Lawrence and Niagara rivers, and one at Sarnia?

4. Has any correspondence been received from the government of Ontario, or from others in reference to parts of the bridges which were destroyed floating down the river, and will the same be removed in view of their becoming a menace to navigation between Queenston and Niagara where large lake steamers navigate?

5. If so, will the correspondence be tabled?

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. Under immediate, direct and exclusive control of the civil service commission and as an integral part of its organization, is there an independent body of examiners whose exclusive duties consist of determining merits of candidates to civil service positions?

2. If so, what are the names and salaries of the members of such independent body of examiners?

3. How long has the civil service commission been operating?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

RELIEF ADMINISTRATION—FEED, FODDER AND FOOD PURCHASES

Mr. PERLEY:

For a return showing,—

1. The quantities of cheese, beans, fish, fruit, vegetables, hay, fodder, feed and seed grains and other products, purchased directly or indirectly and shipped by the government into Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba for relief purposes, between the first of July, 1937, and the present date.

2. The names, addresses, occupations or business of persons, firms and corporations from whom such goods were purchased, with the quantities and value of such purchases from each person, persons, firm or corporation, showing prices paid and the points of delivery to the government and points of distribution in the said provinces.

3. The total purchase price of such material.

4. The amount paid for freight on each class of goods.

5. The total cost of storage and handling at points of shipment.

6. The total cost of handling and storage at destination.

7. Cost of reshipment, including handling and freight from first destination in Saskatchewan to final destination.

8. Names, addresses and amounts paid to all persons engaged in: (a) dividing up and reparcelling each class of said goods; (b) distributing such goods; (c) warehousing.

9. Total amount paid for demurrage, and to whom.

10. The final points of shipment from which such goods were distributed.

11. The area described by municipalities or otherwise, within which such goods were distributed.

12. If such goods were distributed to those on relief only, or to the population in general.

13. The total cost of such shipment.

14. From what vote this money was paid.

15. The amount obtained by governor general's warrants for the purpose of providing for the costs of this distribution.

16. What amount of each class of such goods was produced in Saskatchewan in the year 1937.

17. What amount of each class of such goods was imported into Saskatchewan from other provinces of the dominion, and from outside Canada, in the year 1937.

18. The part the government played in the distribution of free goods contributed by persons, firms and corporations, to Saskatchewan, and the quantities of such goods handled or distributed by the government or any official thereof.

19. The points in Saskatchewan where final distribution of such contributed goods was made.

20. The instructions given officials of the dominion government in Saskatchewan with respect to the distribution of: (a) goods purchased and supplied by the dominion government; (b) goods supplied by voluntary contribution.

Mr. GARDINER: I notice that this motion came up when I was absent from the house a few days ago, and that the Prime Minister asked to have it stand until my return. I wish to say only that much of the information asked for would have to be secured from another government, namely the government of Saskatchewan. I could undertake to provide all the information for which my own department is responsible, and to obtain all other information that possibly can be secured, within the period of the session. If there is any carried over until after that time, I shall have to bring it down another year.

Mr. BENNETT: It covers only the government shipments.

Mr. GARDINER: It covers much more than that.

Mr. BENNETT: No—"shipped by the government into Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba." That is the essential part of it.

Mr. GARDINER: But that information has to be secured from the other provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: No. This question covers direct purchases to which the minister referred the other night, made by the dominion government, and shipped to the province of Saskatchewan, payments for which will appear in the auditor general's report for next year.

Mr. GARDINER: If it does refer only to that, then it is much simpler to answer. But the wording is, "the quantities of cheese, beans, fish, fruit, vegetables, hay, fodder, feed and seed grains and other products purchased directly or indirectly"—

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: —"and shipped by the government into Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba for relief purposes, between the 1st of July, 1937 and the present date." If the term "indirectly" does not mean what was paid for by this government, but ordered by other governments, then it can be answered simply.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL REVENUE—REFUNDS OF TAXES

Mr. MASSEY (for Mr. Betts):

For a return showing, all refunds, rebates or remissions, on account of direct or indirect taxation of any kind, made by the Department of National Revenue since November 1, 1935, and in each case the amount involved, the person to whom such amount was paid, and the agent acting on his behalf.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, the other day I asked that the motion stand so that I could look into the matter more fully. I find that from time to time similar motions have been made in the house, and that the information has always been refused, on the ground that it was disclosing the business of individual concerns. I have before me the record of twenty-five motions involving the same principle as the present one, and the same answer has been given by the ministers of various governments.

But in this particular instance there is another reason why it would be undesirable to pass the motion, and that is the volume of work. I should like to say a word on that point. The volume of work, the great expense involved and the length of time required in compiling and tabulating the information requested, will be apparent when it is pointed out that the return would include approximately 80,000 individual payments of drawbacks and refunds annually, the vast majority of which were paid under statutory authority, the amounts and authority for payment being verified in each case by the auditor general's office.

For example, during the fiscal year 1936-37, 60,861 customs refund claims, 11,241 excise tax refund claims, 505 excise duty refund claims, 5,516 customs-excise drawback claims, and 520 refunds or remissions by order in council were dealt with, to say nothing of the many hundreds of refunds of deposits, etc., made direct by collectors at the ports, details of which could be obtained only by circularizing the collectors from coast to coast. It would obviously take several months to search each claim and obtain from it and compile the special details requested, and, as this work could not be done without seriously disrupting regular work, additional assistance would have to be obtained. If such a return could be completed, the voluminous compilation would consist of more than 2,500 pages.

I would ask that the motion be dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it may be said to be answered, rather than dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is answered.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

OLD AGE PENSIONS—DRUMMOND-ARTHABASKA

Mr. GIROUARD:

For a return showing the names, addresses, occupations of all persons residing in the electoral district of Drummond-Arthabaska who are receiving a pension under the Old Age Pension Act, and showing the amount of the pension received by each such person.

Mr. DUNNING: I must ask the hon. member to consent to allow this motion to be dropped, in view of what is involved in it. The lists of old age pensioners are the property of each province. Under the arrangements between the federal government and the government of each province, the province, in pursuance of its constitutional authority in that regard, first awards the pension, pays it and then submits to the federal government for audit purposes the necessary documentary proofs of having paid it in accordance with the agreement. I shall not labour the point as to whether we have the right to table in this house information which is the property of a province and which is submitted to us purely for audit purposes. Aside from that, I would point out that at the present time there are approximately 175,000 old age pensioners in Canada and if we were to accept a motion such as is now before the house it would involve the possibility, nay I might say the probability, of having to reproduce a list of 175,000 names, addresses and occupations, and thus make public for the first time the names of those who are in receipt of old age pensions. Until now that information has been regarded by the provinces and by the dominion as private and of a character which should not be made public in the manner suggested.

I would urge also the amount of work involved. It would be easier to meet my hon. friend's request if the information came to us by constituencies, but unfortunately it does not. The provincial lists are made up in numerical order by order of application, so that in order to extract the names requested by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Girouard) it would be necessary to go through a list of some 45,000 old age pensioners in Quebec to obtain the addresses in order to find out what individuals lived in Drummond-Arthabaska. I am quite sure my hon. friend would not desire that this amount of work should be done in order to produce such a list.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Just to correct the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), in Ontario, where the county councils paid a portion of the money, lists of those who received money in the county were available.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not sure that it is so to-day. Certainly not in Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand that they still pay ten per cent. You will remember the question came up at one time for consideration and it was contended that where anything involved the payment out of moneys, we were entitled to have the evidence of it here.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

BRITISH COLUMBIA FISHING INDUSTRY

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF JAPANESE FISHING LICENCES TO IMPLEMENT RECOMMENDATION OF COMMISSION OF 1922

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved:

Whereas a commission was appointed in 1922 to examine and report on all matters connected with the fishing industry of British Columbia;

And whereas amongst other findings they recommended that steps be taken to eliminate the Japanese fishermen so as to safeguard the fishing industry for white Canadian fishermen;

And whereas steps were taken in 1923 by the dominion government to implement this recommendation by the reduction of fishing licences issued annually to Japanese fishermen.

And whereas this curtailment of fishing licences to Japanese fishermen was only carried out until 1927 when no further steps were taken to safeguard the industry for white Canadian fishermen,

Therefore be it resolved,—that, in the opinion of this house, as the fishing industry in British Columbia is still to-day largely in the hands of Japanese fishermen, and particularly in the Fraser river area, all fishing licences issued to Japanese, or those of Japanese origin, be reduced by not less than 40 per cent during the present year and by 15 per cent in each year following, and continued until such time as the recommendation made by the royal commission is carried out and the fishing industry of British Columbia in the hands of white Canadian fishermen.

He said: Mr. Speaker, most of the remarks that might be made in connection with this resolution and with particular reference to the orientals in British Columbia were made the other evening by myself and other hon. members who spoke on the bill introduced by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), hence it will not be necessary for me to cover again the same ground.

The purpose of the resolution is stated briefly in the last clause which reads:

Therefore be it resolved,—that, in the opinion of this house, as the fishing industry in British Columbia is still to-day largely in the hands of Japanese fishermen, and particularly in the Fraser river area, all fishing licences issued to Japanese, or those of Japanese origin, be reduced by not less than 40 per cent during the present year and by 15 per cent in each year following, and continued until such time as the recommendation made by the royal commission is carried out and the fishing industry of British Columbia in the hands of white Canadian fishermen.

This resolution does not suggest the adoption of a new policy. Back in 1919 the Department of Fisheries inaugurated a policy for the reduction of fishing licences to those of oriental origin. I should like to quote a statement by Mr. Found, the deputy minister of fisheries, made before the fisheries committee of 1926, and explaining this policy. He stated this policy very succinctly when he was asked to do so by the fisheries committee of 1926. He said:

Speaking subject to correction, the situation is easily understood. For a good many years the feeling on the Pacific coast as to those who are engaged in the industry was a growing one, in one direction; after the war it became quite concrete. In 1919 it was decided that the time had come when a definite policy looking to the time when only white British subjects and Indians engaged in the industry could be brought about.

The orientals entered the fishing industry of British Columbia during the war years and have remained there ever since. In 1920-21 a total of 4,143 fishing licences were issued to persons of oriental origin. Because of pressure brought to bear by the people of British Columbia it was felt that something had to be done about the matter, and the department attempted to do something, according to the statement of Mr. Found which I have just quoted. It was felt that it would not do to disrupt the industry by eliminating them all at one time; hence a policy of gradual elimination was adopted.

In 1922 parliament appointed a royal commission composed of members of this house who were instructed to go to the Pacific coast to investigate all matters connected with the fishing industry. One of the matters investigated when they were there on the coast was that of fishing licences issued to persons of oriental origin. So serious did they consider this matter that when they returned they reported, not a fifteen per cent reduction in any year but an initial reduction of forty per cent. That the commission had in mind the policy adopted in 1919 by the Department of Fisheries is evidenced by words uttered in the house by one of the members of that commission. Mr. Martell, the then member for Hants, is reported on page 1555 of Hansard of March 27, 1923, as follows:

I do not believe that I am giving away any secret of the commission when I say that the idea of the majority was not only a reduction of 40 per cent but that there should be such a 40 per cent reduction at the outset, and a sufficient reduction from year to year looking to the total exclusion of Asiatics from the British Columbia fisheries within a period of five years.

The suggested reduction of forty per cent was adopted by the Department of Fisheries. From year to year the department looked for guidance to the fisheries committee, but as the committee did not meet in 1924 no reduction was made that year. In 1925 a fifteen per cent reduction was put into effect. In 1926 the members of the fisheries committee again investigated this matter, because the department wanted guidance as to what percentage of reduction should be put into effect each year. I should like to read to the house the motion moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni before the committee in 1926. It reads:

That the committee confirm the policy adopted by the department some years ago looking to the restriction of salmon and cod fishing licences on the Pacific coast to white men and native Indians and recommend that the licences issued in 1927 to others than white men and native Indians be reduced by ten per cent of the number issued in 1926; and in each future year the number of such licences be reduced by ten per cent of the number issued in 1926, until these licences will be issued entirely to white men and native Indians within ten years.

The committee of 1926, sitting here in Ottawa, not only endorsed the department's policy of 1919 but recommended a ten per cent reduction in the number of fishing licences issued to orientals each year until such time as the industry would once again be in the hands of white Canadians. In 1927 a further reduction of ten per cent took place, but at that time the Japanese in British Columbia contested the right of the department to discriminate and refuse them licences, and they took the question to the courts. It went through the courts until finally it reached the privy council, the privy council deciding in favour of the Japanese. But I want the house to note the reasons given by the privy council for deciding in favour of the Japanese. On looking into the question the privy council found that this parliament had not given to the Minister of Fisheries the right to discriminate. It was not that the privy council disputed at all the right of parliament so to do, but they found that parliament had not given that right to the Minister of Fisheries, and so he was prohibited until 1929 when the Fisheries Act was amended and that right given to the minister. I hold a copy of the act in my hand, and I shall read that particular clause:

> The minister may, in his absolute discretion wherever the exclusive right of fishing does not already exist by law, issue or authorize to be issued fishery leases and licences for fisheries and fishing wheresoever situate or carried on.

That, it was expected, would enable the department to carry out their policy and continue with the reduction of fishing licences issued to those of oriental origin. However, no further reductions were made in the number of fishing licences issued to orientals in 1929, but that by the way is rather a long story which I shall not take time to go into now. But I want the house to note this, that if the policy of the department had been carried out, as was intended, right through all those years, there would not be to-day one oriental in the fishing industry in British Columbia, and consequently we would not now be facing this trouble.

The house might be interested in a few statistics dealing with licences before I proceed to some of the salient points I have to place before it. In 1927 the total number of fishing licences issued in British Columbia to those of oriental origin was 1,990. In 1937, although the policy of reduction had then been in effect for many years, there were issued 2,608 licences, or 618 more than were issued ten years earlier, in 1927.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, some may argue that the Japanese are in this country, that many of them were born here, and it may be asked, What are you going to do with them? At this point let me say that this licensing question is a more serious problem than the closing of our gates to the Japanese. I am in favour of closing our gates to the Japanese, but the most serious problem arising out of the question I am discussing is, What are we going to do with the orientals who are already in Canada? If I have time I shall develop that a little later. It was contended during many years, and still is by some people, that if the Japanese are forced out of the fishing industry they will go into farming and other industries. That is an old argument. When it was used a number of years ago, it was thought that if the Japanese were forced out of fishing they would go into farming, and that that industry would become overcrowded; but although we have continued to issue fishing licences to Japanese to the numbers I have mentioned, that has not prevented them from going into farming and many other industries. It is well known to the Fraser Valley, for example, that the Japanese control many lines of agriculture there, and that they are invading timbering and other industries as well.

I want particularly, however, to deal with the Fraser river district, which I have the honour to represent in this house. First of all let me explain that on the Fraser river all commercial fishing is done by means of the gill net, unlike other fishing on the open waters of the Pacific, which is done by trawling or by seines. But on the Fraser river, as I say, commercial fishing is done almost entirely by gill net.

In 1922 the department issued a total of 870 gill net fishing licences to those of oriental origin, and in the same year only 390 to white Canadians. When the reduction of forty per cent was put into effect in 1923, that number of 870 was reduced to 522 licences to Japanese fishermen, and the fifteen per cent reduction in 1925 brought the number down to 470. The ten per cent reduction in 1927, the last year of the reductions, reduced the number of gill net licences issued to orientals to 425, and since that time the Department of Fisheries has endeavoured to keep the number running between 410 and 450. But the number of 425, of gill net licences issued, does not by any means begin to paint a true picture of what is actually taking place on the Fraser river to-day. Let me at this point explain, because I am now going to deal with another form of licence that is issued, namely, "assistant gill net" fishing licence. Licences to assistants were issued years ago when fishing was done by rowboat and sailboat because it was very difficult then for one man to set the net and handle the oars or the sail at the same time; but since then the gas boat has superseded the rowboat and sailboat, gill net fishing has been carried on by means of the gas boat, operated generally by one man. It can be successfully carried on by one man operating a gas boat. The Japanese, however, and others of oriental origin, were very soon able to see what could be done by the added use of assistant gill net licences, and so year by year they have been obtaining not only gill net licences, but assistant gill net licences as well. Last year they obtained not only 425 gill net licences, but in addition 376 assistant gill net licences, making a total of 801 licences issued to them.

The question may be asked, Why does the white fisherman not take out an assistant gill net licence and compete with these orientals? There are many reasons why he does not. First of all, the white man can operate the boat himself; and so could the Jap if he wanted to. Second, with the meagre returns he receives—the white man, with his standard of living, cannot afford to compete with the Japanese if he has to split any returns in two and pay an assistant. For the information of the house I might point out that most of the Japanese fishermen at the mouth of the Fraser river are living in shacks at a place called Steveston, and if any members were to pass along there they would wonder whether they were in Canada or Japan. When we come to the point of asking our Canadian fishermen to get down to the standard of living exhibited around these shacks on the waterfront at Steveston, it will be a very sorry day indeed for our people. Our white Canadian fishermen mostly own their own homes and have taxes to pay, etc. There is also this, that with only one man in the boat, the white fisherman cannot operate twenty-four hours a day, like the Japanese who, with two men on each boat, are operating their boats night and day. The fishery guardian comes along and sees a Jap aboard his boat. The Japanese all look alike to him. He is not sure whether that man has a gill net licence or only an assistant licence, and you would need a hundred official guardians to check this up; but a white man could be spotted if he tried any of these tricks and he would be punished very soon.

In 1923 the total of all types of fishing licences issued in British Columbia was 2,486. That was the year when the forty per cent reduction was put into effect. In 1937 there was a total of 2,608. Instead of a policy of reduction being carried out, these licences have increased by 122 during the past few years. On the Fraser in 1923 there were 522 gill-net fishing licences issued to Japanese, whereas in 1937 they have, with the assistants' licences, a total of 841. This number includes a few other types of licences but a total of 319 more licences were issued in the year 1937 than were issued in 1923, or an increase of exactly seventy per cent. So that if the resolution before the house were adopted and carried out, it would still leave them 505 fishing licences in the Fraser river area as against 522 in 1923; and, if the reduction were extended to every kind of fishing licence in the province, the total would be 1,304 as against 1,990 ten years ago. Surely no great cry of "injustice" could arise, because, as has been already pointed out, had the policy of reduction been carried into effect there would now be none of these people in the fishing industry in British Columbia, whereas last year their total numbers were 2,608. The assistant gill-net fishing licences have been of tremendous value to those of oriental origin, and they have taken advantage of these licences to increase their returns; not only that, but their boats are so numerous and in such constant use around the mouth of the Fraser river that it is a miracle that any salmon or other fish ever pass the great numbers of nets in operation there.

This resolution has not been introduced in any spirit of hatred or animosity. The same cannot be said of the Japanese attitude, since, because I took a strong part in opposing giving them the vote, last year they announced through their newspapers in Japan that I was number one bad man in Canada against them. The fact that they did this has no bearing on the resolution now before the house; I want to make that plain. My concern is for our own people, and I offer an apology to no one for putting up a fight on behalf of the white Canadian.

I shall now proceed to describe very briefly the Fraser river, so that the situation there will be more clearly understood. There are two areas in the Fraser, one above the New Westminster bridge, the other below it. The licences issued to those above the bridge are given principally only to persons who own property. Generally speaking, about 186 licences are issued to those above the bridge and 1,250 to those below. Hence it is with the lower reaches of the Fraser, the mouth of the river that I am particularly concerned, for it is there that I see grave danger to our fishing industry as a whole. These people are all at the mouth of the river; they are operating their boats from the town of Steveston to the mouth, and the house will realize just how serious this matter is when I point out that to-day it is almost as much as a white Canadian's life is worth to attempt to fish in the area between Steveston and the mouth of the river. Let me cite one incident which occurred last year when a white Canadian endeavoured to do so. Those of Japanese origin jumped on his boat, put his engine out of commission, cut his net, and assaulted him greviously. Are we in this country going to stand for that kind of thing?

Mr. BENNETT: Were they punished?

Mr. REID: No, unfortunately they were not.

Mr. BENNETT: Why?

Mr. REID: They should have been, but the difficulty was that they all look more or less alike and it proved impossible to identify them. Moreover, there are so many hide-outs in that neighbourhood that it is almost impossible to find one of these men when he is fleeing from justice.

As I have said, this is not an international question. But when we attempt to fish in one of our own Canadian rivers and must do so in peril of our lives because persons of another nationality have appropriated it to themselves and say that none but their own nationality shall fish there, it is high time that something was done about it. That is my chief reason for bringing this matter before the house at this time. Those of Japanese origin have themselves to blame if there is any ill feeling against them in British Columbia. They have not shown by their methods that they are truly Canadians; my own view is that they are truly Japanese first, hence my great opposition to allowing them the franchise. It is strange, if they really are British subjects as they claim to be, that when they get into trouble they do not make any appeal for help to Canadian governments, provincial or federal. Oh, no; their application or appeal is made immediately to Japan, as was evidenced a few years ago when trouble arose at Rivers Inlet between Japanese and white fishermen. The Japanese threatened then to make it an international question, and appealed, not to the dominion or provincial government, but to their own Japanese government. As a matter of fact, according to my information, Japan to-day counts these fishermen in her numbers. It is not generally known that Japan has close to one and a half million men engaged in the fishing industry, and that she counts in that number fishermen operating in British Columbia and other territories outside the Japanese empire. It is my personal belief that this is in conformity with a studied policy, because the Japanese, as is well known, have fished out their own waters and are appropriating where they can, waters and areas belonging to others.

I now draw to the attention of the house, because I think it very serious and pertinent to my resolution, the number of captains' licences issued on the Pacific coast to those of oriental origin. Last year these people obtained 110 seine boat captains' licences as against seventy granted to white Canadians. As regards masters' certificates, sixty-one were issued to them out of a total of 191. I commend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) for writing across the certificates issued to those of oriental origin that their boats were to be used only for the conveyance of fish; but when the shipping act was changed there was an immediate rush of those of Japanese origin to obtain these masters' certificates as captains of boats. My view is that this also is in accordance with a studied policy. It is also well known that many of these men are ex-naval men; and, as was pointed out the other evening by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), one has only to see the great numbers of boats used by them on the Pacific coast to realize how serious the whole matter really is, and that it may become more serious in the very near future.

May I now briefly sum up the chief reasons for bringing this resolution before the house at this time and for desiring to see a reduction in the number of fishing licences issued to those of oriental origin. In the first place, these people absolutely control the cod industry of British Columbia. No wholesaler or retail merchant in that province can buy codfish to-day except through the Japanese, and if they say, "No," that is all there is about it. The merchants simply cannot procure codfish if the Japanese refuse. If I had time to go into the figures with regard to the codfish industry I could discuss a few other matters, but there are other things which I wish to take up now. In the second place, the Japanese control ninety per cent of the export of salt fish from British Columbia, and I would point out that a very serious international question might have been raised when Japan first went into Manchukuo, because the Chinese were so incensed at Japanese activities that they refused to buy salt fish exported from British Columbia because it was put up and shipped by the Japanese. We lost our trade in salt fish during those years owing to that fact, and when a Chinaman starts out to boycott he really does boycott; for he certainly has no love for the Japanese. In the third place, the Japanese are now in a position to dictate and actually do dictate to many of the canners, telling them what quantity of fish they will get each morning. A canner may be all set with his crew of men to can ten or fifteen or twenty thousand fish for the day; but the Japanese boss comes along and says, "I am sorry but we are going to let you have only so much fish."

This is Canada, Mr. Speaker; this is not the orient; and yet in the Fraser river we find a man who is in charge of the Japanese association going around and telling the canners the quantity of fish they will get each day. But most serious of all, of course, is the control of the mouth of the Fraser river by the Japanese or those of Japanese origin, and when there is any trouble they appeal immediately, not to Canada, but to Japan. When there is any case of assault in this country are we going to be obliged to appeal to Japan and say, "Would you mind telling your nationals in Canada to leave our nationals alone when they are in our own Canadian waters?" Is that to be the situation here? Surely not. It is bad enough now, and something more will have to be done about it than has been done. During the past few years, as I have pointed out, the Japanese in British Columbia are themselves making it most difficult for us to believe that they are truly Canadian. I wonder what would happen to Canadians if they were in Japan and attempted to do what is actually being done by Japanese in British Columbia. After listening to the remarks made the other evening, particularly by the leader of the opposition and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), one cannot but realize the gravity of the international situation to-day, and how careful one must be in any remarks to see that they may not be interpreted as an insult to any one nation. I have tried, therefore, in what I have said to follow that advice. In fact, I could have said a great deal more than I have. For the information of hon. members, I may say that since coming to Ottawa and since my resolution has appeared on the order paper I have conferred with the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) and his officials in connection with this trouble, and I understand that the entire situation will be investigated and the conditions which I have just outlined looked into seriously, and I believe that there is power in the Fisheries Act to enable the minister to do something.

With the assurance that something is going to be done or that the matter is going to be seriously looked into, it will not be necessary for me at this time to press the motion to a vote of the house. However, in closing, I urge upon the government and all hon. members the gravity of the fishery situation in British Columbia, and I trust that some action will be taken along the lines suggested in the resolution. If nothing is done now, the matter may well get out of hand, and that before very long.

On motion of Mr. Pottier the debate was adjourned.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

PROPOSAL FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER REVISION

Mr. R. W. GLADSTONE (Wellington South) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to consider with Mr. Speaker the advisability of revising the rules of the house.

He said: I would wish at the outset of my brief remarks to make clear that whatever I may have to say of criticism is a criticism of methods and procedure in this house and is not a reflection on the present or the previous government; it is rather a criticism of government practice, and of goverments as they come and go.

There is widespread criticism of the cost of government, but so far as the sessions of parliament are concerned the electors do not complain so much about the cost of sessions as they do of the machinery of government operating wastefully throughout the years. For those outside the house who may not know, let me say that all speeches in parliament are taken down in shorthand and printed in two languages every day in a volume known as Hansard. It has come to be considered that to some extent a member's representation of his riding is measured by the amount of printed space recorded to his credit in Hansard; and so, to show his electors that he is here, it sometimes becomes necessary for a member to speak when the business of the country would be facilitated by his remaining silent. As a matter of fact many members choose to speak but little, and to work in committee and in many ways behind the scenes.

There is a similar recording of speeches at Washington in the Congressional Record. There they have the practice also of inserting in the Congressional Record speeches not actually delivered on the floor. This is done within limitations to afford members of congress an opportunity of expressing their attitude on public questions without unnecessarily taking up the time of the house.

During recent weeks I have been endeavouring to analyse our procedure in this House of Commons with a view to seeing whether some changes in the rules might not make us more businesslike in our routine methods. I have been searching to see if somehow it might be possible to get away from frustrations, to come to grips in this house with problems, barely touched, that affect the life and prosperity and happiness of the people of Canada. My research work in the first two sessions prompted me to speak last session on "estimates and cost of government." I congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) on the more understandable form in which the estimates are presented this year. I appreciate his generosity in saying that I might take some of the credit. There is much to be done yet before we shall have a clear picture of the need for and total cost of many expenditures. I defy the minister or any hon. member on behalf of any former minister of finance to work out from the records ordinarily available to parliament a profit and loss statement for the Rideau canal or similarly to give us the cost of Hansard. The committee I am to-day suggesting ought to follow through on this matter of consideration of estimates. Efforts should be made to effect economies in building and construction projects.

The sessions of committee of supply are most tedious. One wonders whether a better way of checking expenditures cannot be devised. The resolution I have proposed asks for a special committee to consider with Mr. Speaker the advisability of revising the rules of the house. Since the rules were first drafted, on December 20, 1867, they have been amended on two occasions, namely July 10, 1906, and March 22, 1927. There is a widespread feeling to-day amongst the members that the time is overdue for another revision. Members are irked by the restraining handicaps in the conduct of public business as compared to modern methods followed in competitive private business. For instance during recent years the method of handling groceries has undergone a tremendous change, affecting corner stores as well as larger centrally located stores. It surely is reasonable for parliament to ask that an opportunity be given to study methods of making its procedure more businesslike and more efficient. It is not my intention to go extensively into details or to make definite recommendations; I am asking only that the study be made. The need is generally admitted. Most hon. members could give several reasons; I shall enumerate only a few.

One is that the acoustics of the chamber render it difficult for hon. members from their assigned places to hear the debates. I am not suggesting a shuffle of sittings, but to show that this problem is relevant let me quote from the rules of the British House of Commons:

81. No member's name shall be affixed to any seat in the house for the hour of prayers; and Mr. Speaker shall give directions to the doorkeepers accordingly.

82. Any member having secured a seat at prayers shall be entitled to retain the same until the rising of the house.

And from the legislative assembly in Victoria, Australia:

27. A member may be permitted to secure a place in the assembly chamber by leaving a book, hat or glove upon it, before motions are called.

I may say in passing that there are 615 members in the British parliament and seating for 450. Here we have 245 members and seating for 297. I think some consideration should be given to the oft-repeated requests of hon. members for the improvement of the acoustics of this chamber.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Second, the length of speeches is a matter that some wish to have considered with a view to curtailment. Earlier in my remarks I referred to the mistaken belief on the part of some electors that their member is not doing effective work here unless occasionally he can send out copies of Hansard containing a speech he has made. Such speeches must have length in order to be impressive. The time limit in any debate for private members is forty minutes. In the British parliament I believe there is no time limit, neither is there a compulsory attendance rule, and many members of the British parliament seldom attend unless on an urgent call for an important vote, such as want of confidence. The permissible time length of speeches varies throughout other parts of the empire and in the United States from no limit to five minutes on specified matters.

Standing orders of the parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia indicate that Australia has adopted a graduated scale governing length of speeches. I shall read Australian rule No. 257A, adopted July 17, 1912, and amendment 257B adopted April 23, 1931, as recorded on pages 70, 71 and 72 of their standing orders:

257A. No member shall speak for more than one hour and five minutes at a time in any debate in the house, except in the debate on the address in reply, or in a debate on a motion of "no confidence," or in moving the second reading of a bill, or on the debate on the appropriation bill or on the financial statement in committee when a member shall be at liberty to speak for one hour and thirty-five minutes. In committee of the house no member shall speak for more than thirty minutes at any one time, or more than twice on any one question before the committee: Provided that this rule shall not apply in committee to a member in charge of a bill, or to a minister when delivering the financial statement, or to any member during the proceedings in the committee on the tariff, or, in regard to the number of his speeches, to a minister in charge of a class of estimates in committee of supply.

257B. Notwithstanding anything contained in these standing orders—

(a) the maximum period for which a member may speak on any subject indicated in this standing order, and the maximum period for any debate, shall not, unless otherwise ordered, exceed the period specified opposite to that subject in the following schedule:

Subject	Time
IN THE HOUSE:
Address in reply—
Each member..	35 minutes
Motion for adjournment to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance (under standing order No. 38)—
Mover..	20 minutes
Minister first speaking..	20 minutes
Any other member..	10 minutes

Subject	Time
IN THE HOUSES—Concluded
Motion for adjournment of house to close the business of the day—
Each member	15 minutes
Want of confidence motion—
Mover	60 minutes
Minister first speaking	60 minutes
Any other member	35 minutes
Limitation of debate—motion for allotment of time (under standing order No. 262A)—
Whole debate	30 minutes
Each member	5 minutes
Second reading of a bill—
Mover	60 minutes
Leader of opposition or member deputed by him speaking first to such motion	60 minutes
Any other member	45 minutes
Debates not otherwise provided for—
Mover of a motion	45 minutes
Any other member	35 minutes
IN COMMITTEE:
Member in charge of a bill	(periods not specified)
Limitation of debate—motion for allotment of time (under standing order No. 262A)—
Whole debate	30 minutes
Each member	5 minutes
Financial statement or tariff—
General debate—
Minister in charge	(periods not specified)
Leader of opposition or member deputed by him speaking first	60 minutes
Any other member	45 minutes
Each question before the chair on the estimates or on a tariff—
Minister in charge	(periods not specified)
Each member other than a minister in charge—two periods each not exceeding	30 minutes
Debates not otherwise provided for—
Each member — two periods each not exceeding	15 minutes
IN THE HOUSE OR IN COMMITTEE:
Extension of time—with the consent of a majority of the house or of the committee, to be determined without debate, a member may be allowed to continue his speech for periods each not exceeding	15 minutes

(b) a debate on a motion under standing order No. 38, to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance may be continued for a period of two hours.

Third: Another matter to be kept in mind is the health of the members, particularly ministers, leaders, and others who must carry a very heavy load of responsibility throughout the session. Suggestions have been made to limit speeches to thirty minutes or to twenty minutes, to abolish debate on the address in reply to the speech of His Excellency the Governor General, to abolish Hansard when the house is in committee of the whole, to adjourn at 10 p.m. instead of 11 p.m., to sit only in the afternoon, and so on. Ministers and many hon. members are in their offices and the house fourteen hours daily for five days in the week, with the exception of Wednesday, when the house adjourns at 6 p.m. instead of 11 p.m. If that is carried on for four or five months, with a few breaks for social affairs or recreation, efficiency must be undermined.

Fourth: This point has to do with the rights of private members. Here let me repeat my earlier assurance that my comments are intended to apply to parliamentary practice based on present rules, as last revised on March 22, 1927, and which have since governed all parliaments. It cannot be denied that private members weary under the restraints and frustrations imposed by the rules. It is not surprising that we sometimes wonder just where we stand with respect to responsible government and parliamentary control. Looking over any years where there may have been autocracy in cabinets, we may be fearsome at times of a swing of the pendulum, even in Canada, from "government of the people, by the people, for the people" towards dictatorship in the interests of the preservation of class privileges against mass welfare.

To come back more definitely to the rights of private members under existing rules, may I point out that during the first four weeks of parliament private members are allotted about eighteen hours weekly. Following that they are allotted about ten hours weekly, until later in the session when private members must practically stand aside for government legislation. It should be noted also that in the present session there could be no discussion of private motions during the first two weeks, because during that period the debate on the address in reply to the governor general's speech held precedence. The net result to date, after four weeks of the session, is that the motions of six private members have been reached; nineteen are still on the list, and more to be added. Where motions are far down the list it is almost certain that the sponsors will achieve nothing this session. It may be observed, too, that frequently, when a resolution is in line to be voted upon, the privilege of the forty minute speech is resorted to by one or several members to block a conclusion, so that the measure may die or go to the foot of the list, and beyond hope of resurrection. At least it can be said there is something here to justify study by a committee.

It will not be my purpose here to prescribe a remedy. However, as something to think about, let me suggest that resolutions not yet reached might very well be extended the courtesy of a recorded presentation of argument in Hansard, as is provided at Washington in the Congressional Record. Provision should be made for recorded support or rebuttal in the same Hansard by a minister and the leaders of opposition groups, or their delegates. Doubtless this privilege could be employed considerably to much resultant good in recording views and facts bearing on situations across the country.

Fifth: Failure to provide something of this nature presumes that the cabinet has said the last word, and that government measures meet fully the legislative needs of the year. There is no provision for systematic contacts throughout the year, whereby private members may advance proposals and have them reviewed and organized for reference to the cabinet. With our cabinet, small in numbers, there may be place for some form of advisory council of members, who will be an inquisitive, organizing body, going into matters which otherwise might be untouched. I am certain it is not the intention of our cabinet to be a finality in the origination of measures, although at times some of us who are impatient may be inclined to be critical.

Of course there must be cabinet responsibility and control in harmonizing views to policy. Nevertheless, when the volume of government business cuts off the opportunity of offering suggestions with explanations, or discourages the private members in so doing, the ministers are but closing the door through which something worth while occasionally may emerge. In much chaff there usually is a little wheat.

I am asking that a committee of the house be set up so that a study may be made looking to amendments in the rules or improvements of our methods and procedure in parliament. Doubtless every hon. member in the house has in mind one or more changes which if adopted tend towards betterment of conditions.

I submit that, without taking time to mention others, I have given sufficient reasons to justify a committee. In fact, any prolonged discussion, even though favourable to the motion, may bring about its defeat through application of existing rules. May I point out, however, that it being Wednesday, a member rising to speak at six o'clock may, by asking Mr. Speaker to call it six o'clock, assure the continuance of the debate on Monday.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am quite in accord with the motion to have a committee of the house appointed to consider the rules. As has been pointed out by the previous speaker (Mr. Gladstone) there was a revision of the rules eleven years ago. At that time it was thought by hon. members who were in favour of the appointment of such a committee that by the creation of a committee to consider the rules of procedure in this chamber the work of the house might be shortened. One step that they took at that time to bring about this objective was the introduction of what is commonly known as the forty minute rule. That rule has been in effect for the past eleven years, but it has in no way shortened the length of the sessions. It requires more than a change in our rules of procedure to shorten the length of a session. Personally I am not concerned whether a session is a few weeks longer or a few weeks shorter; my concern is that the business of the house should be done in an efficient and businesslike manner. If our present rules do not permit this, I am in favour of having them revised so that hon. members may have an opportunity of transacting the business of the house as it should be done.

One suggestion I would make is that more work be given to the committees. There is a long list of committees, I do not know how many. Some of them do not sit at all during a session, while others may sit only once or twice. I am sure there are many hon. members outside of the cabinet who have had many years of public service and who could give valuable assistance to the committees. At present most of our work is done in this chamber, and having as many members as we do, it is sometimes impossible for all of us to give the result of our experience by way of an address before the house. The hon. member referred to what is done in the congress of the United States. I think we will find that much of the work of congress is done in committees.

Mr. BENNETT: They meet at twelve o'clock.

Mr. HEAPS: The fact is that much of the important work of congress is done by the committees. The foreign policy of the United States is debated before a committee and many important measures originate in or are sent to committees for consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: Did the hon. member ever look at the Congressional Record and see the number of speeches that are extended therein without being delivered?

Mr. HEAPS: Since that has been brought up, I may say that I am opposed entirely to any record being made of the speeches that are not delivered in the house.

Mr. BENNETT: The whole of Henry George's book was put on the Record.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think anything should go on the record of this or the other chamber unless it has been delivered on the floor where members can hear and discuss it.

The mover of this resolution has suggested that speeches could be printed as part of the record and then the reply of the government or of the leader of the opposition or the leader of any other party could be made and appear on the record. If that were done it seems to me that we would be carrying on a sort of correspondence through sub-agencies which is no part of parliamentary procedure. The hon. member has suggested a reduction in Hansard and then he states that he is in favour of extending Hansard to the extent to which he has referred.

If more work were given to our committees it should not be necessary for us to sit in this chamber the long hours we do at present. We legislate for shorter working days for labour and yet we sit here ourselves until eleven o'clock at night. I suggested to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) last year that perhaps we might follow the procedure of the British House of Commons and start our sessions at a certain time and sit right through without any adjournment for dinner. That is what is done in Great Britain, and sometimes they sit until eleven o'clock at night. I understand they open at four o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They open at a quarter to three.

Mr. HEAPS: The first part of the session is utilized for the answering of questions, so the actual session does not commence until four o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: Congress sits right through.

Mr. HEAPS: We do not have the work to do that the British house and the United States congress have. We have our provincial legislatures while in Great Britain all legislation is centred in the hands of parliament. Our provincial legislatures have tremendous powers and vested interests, and personally I do not see why it is necessary that the House of Commons should have to sit from three o'clock until eleven o'clock at night, with a two hour adjournment. Last year I suggested that we should sit from two o'clock until seven and thus do away with the evening session. Even a five-hour day might be considered long enough for this house to sit. I suggest that for four days in the week we sit from two o'clock until seven, and on Fridays from two o'clock until six. Many hon. members leave Ottawa on Friday evening and perhaps it would be better if the house adjourned at six o'clock.

That would make a twenty-four hour week. At the present time we sit twenty-seven hours a week, but I am satisfied the house would accomplish more in the shorter week.

Another objection I have to our present method of conducting business is the fact that in the second half of the session there are so many committees sitting and so many members have to devote their time to committee work that it is often difficult to get a large attendance in this chamber.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend has just complained that there are too many committees.

Mr. HEAPS: I am not complaining that there are too many committees. I pointed out that we had a large number of committees appointed, but I did not make any complaint. I stated that many of the committees were not doing anything.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And they are doing too much later on.

Mr. HEAPS: I am not even saying that. I have not come to the point I wished to make. I wanted to point out that these committees sit quite often when the house is in session and I submit that no member should be asked to sit in committee when the house is in session. If the house did not meet in the mornings and evenings then the committees could sit at either time and make it unnecessary to hold sessions when the house is in session.

I believe some of our estimates could be sent to a committee rather than having them all considered here. There are many hon. members who have given close attention to public matters and many of these things could be threshed out in committee. When the estimates were returned to the house I am sure they would pass in half the time that it takes to pass them at present. By giving more work to the committees we could shorten the hours that this chamber has to sit. If this matter was considered by a committee and full consideration given to all the points that have been raised, I am sure some good would result and a more efficient method arrived at of doing the business of this country.

I am in accord with the motion, and I hope that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), when he comes to giving the government's viewpoint, will also be in favour of appointing such a committee. I remember that when, eleven years ago, we adopted the eleven o'clock closing rule there was a good deal of objection. The government thought they would not be able to get through the business of the house if we adjourned each night at eleven o'clock; but we have got through with the business just the same, and I am sure that with shorter hours and more work placed on the committees we shall get through the business exactly as we have done in past years.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that a younger member should think twice before he expresses himself in regard to rules which have been long established for the government of the house; but I feel that the occasion is opportune for private members to express their views, not only in regard to the rules, but more particularly in regard to the utilization of their own services in this chamber.

I think the member for Wellington South (Mr. Gladstone) is open to congratulations upon bringing this resolution forward. I have known him for some time now, and I know that his interest not only in national questions generally, but in the machinery of the house is such as to give him a deserving place in this chamber's membership. He spoke of some of the characteristics of the United Kingdom parliament, and mentioned that the members there sat on long benches, with no desks in front of them. I am not so sure that he advocated our adopting that practice, but I think it is as well to note that there is keen controversy not only in the United Kingdom but in many of the parliaments of Europe as to the method of the seating arrangement employed in Great Britain. I have sat on similar long benches, not in the British parliament but in debating societies and at Hart House, with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in Toronto, and while those bodies in no wise aid us in considering this general problem, I think we may conclude that the British method, while it has advantages, has also certain great disadvantages.

One thing that favourably characterizes debate in the British House of Commons is, I think, this, that while there is no time limit on any private member, indeed on any member of the house, whether he sits on the ministerial benches or under the gangway, tradition precludes a member from speaking too long. A private member of the British house speaking for more than fifteen minutes generally meets with instant disapproval from not only his political enemies but his friends too.

My main reason in rising to-day, Mr. Speaker, is that I feel as a private member if the machinery of the house were otherwise, it might be possible for the members of this House of Commons to do better work and assist with greater ability and thoroughness in the consideration of legislation.

I am afraid that the relations between the executive, on the one hand, and private members, on the other, are not exactly what they might be. I know the difficulties of ministers who are overworked, who have to sit in the house as well as attend to their administrative duties. I should like to give an experience I had a year ago when I was in Europe and visited the Hungarian parliament. An old friend of mine in that country has the post of Director of Parliamentary Activity. His job is to see that the members of the government party and the ministers are kept in constant contact. Each minister in the Hungarian parliament is assigned five members whose duty it is to interest themselves in the problems of his department, with the result that when the minister has specific problems to consider, problems which are probably more a matter of routine than anything else, problems with which he cannot very well deal because of pressure of time, he calls in these men who have seats in the house and assigns them various tasks. That has been the practice there since 1920, and I am told, although I have not had an opportunity of examining it personally beyond observing it in this casual way, that on the whole it works very well.

While on this point, and speaking as a member of this chamber, I believe that the relationships between private members and the permanent civil service of this country are wholly inadequate. Of course, a member has an opportunity of going to any civil servant or to the heads of departments and getting information, and I have always found them very obliging; but unless there is some rule, some tradition, we shall continue to have this gap between the members and the civil service. No one who has sat in the house listening to the discussion of the estimates as I have done since I have been a member can help feeling that even with our inadequate method a great deal of information can be obtained by members listening to the questions put and the answers given by ministers, but certainly the method could be improved upon by a closer relationship between the members of the house and the permanent civil service.

Now, how to bring that about? I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that no member of the house, on the government side or on the opposition benches, will deny the inadequacy, insufficiency and incompleteness of the present system of presenting estimates. We listened yesterday afternoon to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), and I think the discussion of his estimates was of practical benefit. We were discussing a problem arising out of the vote for the dominion observatory. Without being unfair to anyone who took part in that debate, I believe I may say there were questions put by members obviously——I was going to say with good political motives in mind, but I do not mean that exactly—but members apparently wanted to know more about the particular vote in question than the item itself revealed. How much better it would be if there was a committee of this house, as has already been suggested, whose job it would be to scrutinize the estimates, call in civil servants and examine them face to face, with the idea not of criticizing them but of finding out the nature of their job and trying to see if we cannot improve upon it, and more effectively deal with the problem. I feel with the hon. member for Wellington South that if parliament is to continue as an institution we must realize where it is inefficient, and I believe that no part of the work of the house is done more inefficiently than in our dealing with the estimates.

I have felt the same as the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) in respect to the committees of the house. They are not overworked. I belong, as most members do, to two committees, and I can speak only of those two. There is, first of all, the committee on international and industrial relations. In my judgment that committee could do a great work on problems such as unemployment; it might perhaps deal with the proposed unemployment insurance scheme and other problems of that kind, which require for their full consideration, the committee manner of attention. If the committees of the house were utilized in this way, many of us would not be listening day after day in the house to speeches, many of them no doubt worth while and reflecting public opinion in many parts of Canada, but perhaps not really relative to the immediate job. I feel that unless something is done in that respect, parliament will become more and more the target of criticism from those groups that would do away with it.

[Mr. Martin.]

One final thought: I mentioned it last year and I do so again, although with some timidity, because I am not as close to the problem as are the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), who have had the conduct of the external affairs of this country. Having in mind the intensity of the present international situation and the absence of a proper direction or a unified policy so far as public opinion in Canada is concerned, there is much to be said for the need, not of dogmatizing in international affairs but of disseminating information. After having made the observations in this connection that I made last year, I went to watch the foreign relations committee of the senate of the United States in operation. Any hon. member who has that opportunity will, I think, profit greatly by it. What happens? That committee has the power of calling officials of the state department, putting to them questions in respect of foreign affairs generally, and eliciting information which it might be politically inadvisable or otherwise impossible to divulge in the larger chamber. Not only has it the right to call officials, but it can summon the secretary of state, who, incidentally, is the only cabinet officer who can be summoned by a committee of the senate or of the house of representatives. Of course, from its very nature in so far as its prosecution is concerned, foreign affairs is a matter not for parliament but for executive action. Parliament nevertheless has some responsibility and certainly should have some interest in the matter. I recollect that one day, when Mr. Cordell Hull was before the committee, he refused three or four times on grounds of policy to answer questions put to him by various members. The committee understood that in the nature of things the full policy of the government in respect to foreign affairs could not be disclosed. But there is an important fringe of foreign policy which could be made known to parliament not only for the sake of parliament but for the guidance of public opinion generally.

I have spoken primarily because I share the opinion of many members, including many on this side of the house, that our machinery might be brought up to date and made efficient to the extent of using in greater measure the abilities of the rank and file of this chamber. I should like to think that something will result from the timely motion of the hon. member who proposed it.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I agree with the hon. member (Mr. Gladstone) who introduced this resolution on one point at least, and that is in his protest against the acoustics of this chamber. I might say I did not clearly or fully hear what he said. I might point out to him and to the house generally, especially to the newer members, that if they would reconcile themselves to the carrying out of the purpose to which these curtains are intended to be put it would enormously increase the acoustics of this chamber. They were put up for that express reason, and if they are kept closed it makes a tremendous difference. When the heat of summer comes, and they are drawn back, the difference is very marked; if they are kept closed it will very greatly improve the acoustics—and I understand that that is about the only thing that can be done.

I was not clear whether the hon. member was quoting someone else or was speaking for himself when he suggested or the suggestion was made that we should do away with the record of Hansard in whole or in part; I think the reference was, in committee of the whole, but the principle is the same. Speaking from a very considerable experience, I should like to warn the newer members not to agree to any proposal of that kind, because it would be, I will not say their damnation, but their sorrow in days to come. Hansard is the only protection that the private member has. An hon. member who is a front bencher gets on to the front page of the newspapers, more or less correctly or incorrectly quoted; but if he is a back bencher, and the page happens to be occupied by somebody else, he does not get any notice at all, or he may get a couple of lines and he is lucky if it does not misrepresent his attitude. The first duty of a member—and I speak in the interests of the man who has just come to the house—is to represent his constituents. On some matter of more or less local or perhaps provincial importance he prepares to the best of his ability a statement of what his constituents want him to do and say, and if it does not go into Hansard he is simply "out of luck" to prove to his people that he did what they wanted him to do. On one whole campaign I was followed by a whispering campaign, to the effect that on a certain occasion, on one of the first votes in which I took part in this house, I had, in order to curry favour with the government of the day, voted with them against a resolution—which, it may interest the house to know, was one brought forward in 1922 for the exclusion of orientals—and in favour of an amendment. I had, of course, Hansard to show not only that I had voted against the amendment but that I succeeded in dissuading two Liberal members from British Columbia from doing what I was charged with doing. I never fully overtook that falsehood, and if it had not been for Hansard it would have been utterly impossible to show what my attitude had been. That point, I think, will come home to all new members.

I am a little doubtful whether to vote for this resolution, because, while I am of opinion that there is room for great improvement in the rules, I have a little doubt if they will be improved for the benefit of the man with whom I am concerned, namely the small member, the "back bencher," so to speak. I am just a little afraid it may be another step towards success in the effort which is ever being made by the government of the day—and it does not matter what government it is, it is the same with one government as with the other; they are always endeavouring to curtail the individuality and liberty and rights of the private member. They are forced by necessity to get on with the business; they are anxious to get on; they have far more important business of their own to transact; and the tendency always is to curtail private members' rights.

The last time the rules were revised the private member's right of speaking ad libitum was abolished and his time reduced to forty minutes. I protested against that, not that I wanted to speak so much longer but that I thought that if a man did have a message, and he might be the only member from his province on one or the other side of the house, it might be a matter of urgent importance, and to limit him to forty minutes did not seem to me to be fair. The rule has worked out fairly well, although, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) pointed out, it has not reduced the debating time of the house. Apart from that, I should be glad to see some improvement made in the rules, and I would suggest one that comes right home to us.

Standing order 15 describes the procedure in the house for each day. It provides Thursday as private member's day for the first four weeks of the session, and then it states that after the expiration of four weeks Thursday shall be government day. By the way the rule is carried out private members are simply deprived of these four days. That is the only day in the week in which what is called "public bills and orders" comes at the top of the order paper, so that it is the only day the member who has a private bill—it is called private, but it means a public bill introduced by a private member—can hope for it to be brought up, with the exception of the odd few minutes on Tuesday and Friday evenings. Those who drew up this rule intended that private members should have the first four Thursdays. They never have the first Thursday, because the house meets on that day; there is no order paper prepared, and we do not have before us any public bill, so it is hardly fair to count that day; but it is counted. Parliament met this year on January 27. A week from then was February 3; then came the tenth and the seventeenth, and to-morrow marks the end of the month, when we are cut off from the use of Thursday for public bills because of the effluxion of time, which is four weeks. To begin with, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), quite properly in accordance with the sanction of custom if not by the rules of the house, moved that the address in reply should take precedence over all other business. That cut us out of two weeks. In the third week we did have one day, but we shall be deprived of to-morrow because technically the period of four weeks lapses at three o'clock to-morrow afternoon. We are supposed to have four weeks but we have not had it, and very often we do not have it. If the debate on the address lasts longer than ten or twelve days it may well be that we have no Thursdays at all. I suggest that if we think it wise to have Thursday we should have it. But do not let us draw up rules which in practice mean something different from what they appear to be in print.

There is another thing to which I would call attention. These rules, or at any rate most of them, were drawn up primarily in the days when there were only two parties in the house and when members were much fewer in number than at the present time. Now, however, groups have come into the house and evidently they have come to stay, and naturally they wish to express the views of their organizations or their affinity. And why not? That is what they are sent here for. That leads to an extension of the number of resolutions put forward for debate, and we have made no provision at all for that situation.

It is customary now for members to send in resolutions months before the house meets if they want to have anything like a chance of a place in the sun. I sent forward a resolution two months before the house met and it is away down on the order paper, so it is doubtful whether it will now be reached. This is not a desirable condition if we are to carry out what we have always been supposed to have agreed to, namely, the right of private members to bring forward resolutions for debate. If you say that we have not that right then we shall know exactly where we stand. Presumably, however, we are allowed to bring forward such resolutions, and therefore I suggest that we should give more time to the discussion of them. Every resolution should be heard at least once; that is only reasonable. I would go further than that and make a suggestion which, if adopted, would lead to a curtailment, which we should like to see, of the number of these resolutions. I would force every resolution put on the order paper to come to a vote, and those who had brought forward resolutions merely to demonstrate their own eloquence or to give vent to some local grievance would be confronted with the necessity of voting for their own motions. They would have to see their resolutions voted either for or against, unless, of course, the resolutions were withdrawn. But I would not have any resolution withdrawn except by unanimous consent.

Twice this session, and we have sat only four weeks, we have seen resolutions dealing with matters which the people in the particular province concerned—British Columbia—regard as of considerable importance, sidetracked by means of motions for the adjournment of debate. And that, under the rules of the house as they stand, means practically killing a resolution for the session. Would it not be better to have a resolution discussed at least once or twice? I would be heartily in favour of providing that if a member puts a resolution on the order paper he shall be presumed to know what he is doing and to be willing to support that resolution and see it through. If he is sincere he will be willing to do so; otherwise he should not put a resolution on the order paper, and he will be embarrassed if he finds an insincere expression of his carried to a vote and recorded.

I do not know what the attitude of the government is towards this question but I hope that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will consider what I have said in regard to Thursday, because it is not yet too late. It is only a matter of his telling the house whether we shall have to-morrow or not. In this session we have had only one Thursday—one Thursday out of the whole session—on which private members could bring forward bills of public importance, and I suggest that the government might very well give us to-morrow at least. It could be done by way of resolution.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): The motion proposed by the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Gladstone) proposes, Mr. Speaker, that a special committee be appointed to consider with your honour the advisability of revising the rules of the house. In my opinion members of parliament to-day have fewer rights and privileges than were enjoyed in the days of Burke in 1774. Parliament's powers are continually being curtailed.

We have two houses of parliament but the work is not evenly divided. There is no reason why the session should last six months if there were a more workable and more even division of the activities of parliament. For example, we have 245 members considering estimates in committee of the whole in this chamber. That committee is too unwieldy, and I suggest that we might very well set up various committees on estimates as in France and the United States, and, to some extent, in England. There might be one, two, three or four of these committees and they would relieve the minister and the leader of the opposition as well of some of the heavy work entailed in the consideration of supply. I think the system should be changed and we should set up an estimates committee. If a motion is made to strike off a dollar from any item in supply, we are confronted with the possibility of the government resigning if the amount of the item is reduced. This is necessary in consequence of constitutional tradition and practice; for no matter what sort of rules the house may agree upon we are bound to find read into them many precedents, rights, privileges, customs and usages of two or three hundred years' standing. For this reason I suggest that the establishment of an estimates committee system would be a great step forward. Heads of departments could appear before that committee, and items could be either added to or subtracted from without incurring the resignation of the government. Moreover, it would be a more economical and efficient way of doing business. That is the sort of system which has been followed in the municipalities. The heads of departments appear before them and go into all matters, and information can be obtained more satisfactorily than in a large committee where all sorts of questions are asked, some of them irrelevant, and a cut made in all estimates.

I suggest that our rules are not elastic enough. In the British house yesterday and the day before certain matters of very great importance were brought up and also supplementary questions put in connection with them on the orders of the day, and the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister were heard in regard thereto. In this house, under our rules, such questions are generally ruled out. That is not through any fault of his honour, because I am free to admit that he has given me and other hon. members considerable latitude, and the fact of the matter is that some of our rules are more honoured in the breach than in the observance. Take, for instance, the forty minute rule. I was opposed to that rule, and I will tell the house why. On one occasion in one year there were four or five bills before the house, all relating to important public matters. One had to do with what was known as the Georgian bay and Ottawa canal, that vast heritage which was handed over to the Siftons. Another bill concerned the Sun Life, where powers were sought beyond those conferred by their charter or by the decision of the privy council in the Beauharnois matter. A third bill during that session had to do with the Bell telephone system to cut up a melon of seventy-five millions. I offer no apology for my small part in their defeat then. All these bills were talked out, and quite properly so; but had we had a forty minute rule then they would have gone through in the twinkling of an eye, although against public rights and policy.

There is no use appointing a committee to revise the rules unless we have what was proposed last session, what I say is one of the most important problems facing this parliament, namely parliamentary reform, constitutional reform, law reform and cabinet reform. Unless we have those, our rules are not on a sure foundation. In 1774, Edmund Burke was addressing his constituents of Bristol City and speaking about the rules and regulations, and our rules are not much different to-day from what they were in the time of Burke. His electors wanted to instruct him what he was to do in regard to foreign affairs, and he told them that a member could not be instructed; that when he became a member of parliament he was a member not for the city of Bristol but for the whole United Kingdom; he had to express his views not as an individual member from the sectional point of view of his constituents, but for the good of the country generally. He said in part:

> You choose a member, indeed; but when you have chosen him, he is not a member of Bristol, but he is a member of parliament. As to a member's sincere consideration, his mature judgment, his choice of decision, these he does not derive from his constituents, no nor from the constitution or the law of the land. They are a trust from Providence to whom some day he will have to give an account.

Our rules are published in an admirable book, Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, by the learned clerk of this house. It gives succinctly the decisions for over two hundred years and is a valuable treatise. It was read the other day in the British house and it is used in the provincial legislatures. It is most useful, saving the need to go to the library in order to look up the rules and precedents of voluminous text-books. True, in my opinion some mistakes have been made in the way we conduct our business. I referred to foreign policy. In my opinion this is not a free parliament unless, for example, the question raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) relating to Japanese immigration and that raised by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) relating to fisheries could be fully dealt with. Just to-day the hon. member, speaking on fishing licences in the Pacific, could not deal with the question properly and force it to a vote. Unless one can do so, this is not a free parliament. A member should have the right to bring forward a motion and have it voted on intelligently by the house. The subject matter of those two motions was more or less controlled by treaties, agreements and understandings which have been made in other places.

In my opinion there should be some way of dividing this work with the senate. The senate at Washington shares the work of congress. A few years ago they had a certain constitutional matter to deal with. What happened? They found it was not necessary to appoint all these roving royal commissions. Take income tax, the high cost of living, the textile, oil, prison, and many other problems, the most important facing us to-day; they were dealt with by a committee of the senate at Washington. But our senate would not work at this and do the same. They should. We have the railway problem. Who is proposing in this house or the other a solution of that problem? It could be solved in a proper way for the benefit of the taxpayers and the employees as well. In Washington they have adopted what you might call a modern system, and brought it up to date to meet changed conditions. They have an estimates committee go over the estimates and arrive at a practical solution of many of their key problems. Take unemployment; look at the senate committee presided over by the late Senator Cousens of Detroit, and see what it accomplished. They summoned the leading minds all over the country and issued an admirable report in 1927, which was the basis of some of the recommendations of the Purvis commission. Instead of enjoying a holiday as our senate does, in Washington they worked during the heat of the summer. If the senate here would sit steadily from the start of the session, certain problems could be dealt with by them and the length of the session curtailed.

I have no objection to the appointment of this committee, although I fail to see what they are going to accomplish, unless they go further and adopt parliamentary, constitutional, cabinet and law reform. Take the present constitutional commission going around Canada; that would be unnecessary had we had this new division of work which I propose. There is nothing they will collect that we do not know now; they may get some additional information; but it is only an advisory commission, and I fail to see that the advice we shall get from this commission and many others will do any good. There are five or six of these commissions now and they prevent parliament from taking immediate action. That is one of the weaknesses of our rules, preventing immediate action on these problems. We are beset in this country by people who are seeking to bring about conditions that they found in the countries of their origin, trying to plant them in our soil. They are foreign to our population, to our soil, and to what we have always had since we have been a country. Canada's foes are of two classes, those within and those without. Against those from without we can depend on the motherland and others for protection, but against the foes within we should be up and doing. We should see to it that complaints and wrongs which prevail in this country to-day, some of them worse than war, social problems, which are a cause of as much suffering among the labouring and poorer people as when the enemy is at the gate, are dealt with.

We need some quicker method of finding a remedy for all these under our parliamentary system and a quick solution. I mentioned one matter the other day, about the housewives and the high cost of living. Nothing has been done. Before a committee in Washington they would have an investigation. We had the price spreads commission which did admirable work; every dollar they spent was for the benefit and good of the citizens, but nothing has been done to cure the ills revealed by it. For the setting up of that commission the present opposition deserves some credit. In committee of supply we hardly dare ask questions. In Burke's speech he said that every shilling of expenditure could be challenged when the matter is before the house as the house had the control of every dollar of the budget. But we have such a circuitous way of getting these things before the house; we have a notice of resolution, the resolution itself in committee; then the bill is brought in; there is first and second reading, committee and third reading, and then it goes to the other house where the same procedure is followed. If municipal affairs were conducted in the way business is done here the sittings would last the whole year around.

I do not see much use appointing this committee for this purpose, I believe the committee should have added to its scope constitutional, parliamentary, cabinet and law reform as well as new rules.

Mr. R. J. DEACHMAN (Huron North): Mr. Speaker, I venture to suggest that we need not alone a revision of the rules; we need a revision of the minds of the members.

This morning I was turning over the pages of Hansard and by chance came across a paragraph of one of my own speeches. I did not recognize it at first, the language seemed so strange. So I went over it and revised it and cut out half the words and then I rewrote it and eliminated a great deal more. And when I was through with it, it was fairly passable but I confess I was profoundly ashamed of what I had done before.

Mr. BENNETT: Shall we have opportunity to read that in Hansard?

Mr. DEACHMAN: I would have been still more ashamed had I not gone over the speeches of other hon. members afterwards and found that about two-thirds of them, including those of some of the leaders, were almost as bad as mine.

Not long ago an editor wired me for a note of criticism on an article which had appeared. His request was for not more than two hundred and fifty words. I dictated the article, and it came out as six hundred words. I then revised it, cut it down and polished it. When I had finished I must confess it was not too bad at all. Even the most distinguished men in literature find the same thing when they come to examine their own work. I believe it was Dryden who said:

> Polish, repolish,
> Every colour lay;
> And sometimes add,
> But oftenest take away.

If hon. members would do that with their own speeches; if they would prepare them with a little more care and do a little more work on them, there would be no suggestion of shortening the time-limit or of making many other regulations which could be suggested.

If we want examples of fine work in the art of public utterance, we will find them all around us. Could anything be more sweepingly sympathetic than the shortest verse in the bible, "Jesus wept"? Was there ever a more powerful speech delivered, measured by results, than that of Joshua when he commanded the sun to stand still? And yet that speech was couched in fourteen words.

Mr. BENNETT: I read it in the paper the other day.

Mr. DEACHMAN: "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon; and thou, moon, in the valley of Ajalon." The right hon. gentleman says he saw it in the paper. I am glad to hear him say that, because I suggested it to the editor, and no doubt it did appear there.

Then we have another splendid illustration of effective speech. May I add, in passing, that it is sometimes difficult to continue speaking and at the same time catch the subvocal statements of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). To continue: We have the magnificent example of Lincoln's Gettysburg speech. It came as a simple but dramatic expression of a perfectly elemental mind approaching a great problem by the implications of which he was profoundly moved. I believe that is true of almost any of the really great speeches that have been made.

If hon. members want examples—and magnificent ones—they will find them in the utterances of Asquith. Asquith gave many models of condensation which might well be followed by hon. members in this or any other house. I ask you to consider, as you watch a show, whether it be a moving picture or a presentation on the legitimate stage, to consider the amount of work which must have been done by the artists before the finished product was exhibited. Then consider the easy-going, lackadaisical sort of life we live here in the House of Commons, in which we say a lot and move around a great deal but accomplish very little.

I think a striking example of this is found in the questions asked in the house. Time after time we see questions on the order paper, the answers to which could have been obtained simply by calling the bureau of statistics by telephone. I have no doubt the bureau could provide the answers before the receiver was placed back on the hook. This happens frequently. Then, notices of motion are sometimes written in such a way that one could take five or six meanings from them. If we were to discuss them in the House of Commons in their original form we would waste half our time, because the opposing minds could never get together and could not agree on what they were discussing.

I believe, too, that sometimes much time is wasted in interruptions, which at times make it difficult for others to hear. Another disturbing factor is that there is an inclination towards giving a sharp retort to an observation which may come from the other side of the house. I am never so ashamed of myself as when I fall into that little trap. Sharp retorts, devoid of humour, in a place of this kind, are the result of an adolescent mind. They come from a mind which has never developed. They come from one who feels that he must exhibit his own sharpness rather than the depths of his comprehension. Of course when there is a touch of humour in them they become delightful.

I shall give the house an illustration of the humour exhibited in this chamber on one occasion from a no less distinguished gentleman than my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). He was discussing a tariff item and, rather rare for him, mentioned the fact that he thought the tariff rate was too high. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) and I simultaneously and together—a redundant phrase by the way —said "Hear, hear," whereupon my right hon. friend dropped into his seat and, with a sad look on his face, said "Now I know I am wrong." I venture to suggest that that was one of the brightest remarks I have heard. It was an instantaneous response filled with humour, and yet without pain.

Mr. DUNNING: And covering the subject adequately.

Mr. DEACHMAN: If hon. members want a perfect example of that kind of humour in one of Canada's great statesmen they will find it in the senator from Brockville, who has made some of the brightest remarks which have ever appeared in the Canadian press. Yet I venture to suggest that not once in all his many years has he hurt anybody in the remarks he has made.

I have just one suggestion to make. I should like to see the form and spirit of debate changed to the point where we should conceive of debate simply as a search for truth. If we were carrying on debate with that in mind, and I should happen to make a statement which causes someone to rise and to correct me, and if in doing so he has the proof that he is right and can show that I am wrong, I am not losing in the debate because I am coming nearer the truth.

And so I should like to see the practice in the house change to that extent. I should like to see debate carried on not for the purpose of beating down someone on the opposing side, or attempting to put something over them by sharp remarks. I want to see debate aim at nothing but the search for truth. When we are on a search for truth we shall get our reward, not only from our own side in politics but from the other side as well.

[Mr. Deachman.]

Upon one occasion in the house I discussed the agricultural situation. Following my remarks I went over and discussed it with the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn). Why should I not do that? He is a farmer who has had more experience in practical agriculture than I have had. I want to cover everything I possibly can which will help me in presenting my arguments, in the hope that through our combined efforts we may do something to improve conditions throughout the country.

I think it was Montaigne who said, when accused of plagiarism, "I gather the flowers by the wayside, by the brooks and in the meadows, and only the string with which I bind them together is my own." If every hon. member can contribute some little argument or some small effort or thought, and if by our combined efforts we can gather them together into one bouquet, then perhaps we shall have something which will help us in solving the problems of the dominion.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to compliment the mover of the resolution upon affording this opportunity of discussion. Hon. members have indicated that they want to improve the methods of functioning of the House of Commons. There seems to be agreement, too, on the point that we should spend less time in verbose discussion. I have been in the house a number of years, and I say that it is unfair time and time again to spread throughout the country the fact that it costs so much per day or so much per column of Hansard, in an effort to try to make people believe that it is all wasted money. There is more than the expenditure necessary for the mechanical running of parliament; there is a human side which must be considered. Employment is given to quite a number of people who have no employment between sessions. I see some hon. members on the other side smiling at that, but I think that is something which should be considered. I do not think I have taken more than my share of the time of this house in speaking, and I make no excuse for what I have said in the past or what I am saying at the present time.

We are 245 members duly elected by the electors of the country. We all have our own problems which taken together become national in scope. This is the only way in which we can discuss these problems. I remember quite vividly when I sat in the far corner of the house nearly twelve years ago. For the first few days I was puzzled as to why there should be so many members. To me the machinery of parliament seemed to be top heavy and very slow moving. But after listening religiously for months to the speeches made, without making a single one myself, I began to hear the voice of British Columbia, the voices of the maritime provinces, of central Canada and of the three western provinces; I began to hear the national voice of Canada. If we took the time we should to discuss the regional and national and international questions that we should, we would be here for fourteen months in the year. I do not believe we waste any time in conducting the business of the house. Again I repeat that we should not forget that employment is given to many people who will be out of employment immediately parliament prorogues.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) has suggested that we should sit until seven o'clock. I am in favour of anything that will shorten the length of the session without decreasing the amount of work done. Every member, no matter from where he comes, is entitled to express his opinion upon any subject. It will be remembered that last year we had an exceptionally short session. That was not very pleasant for the so-called back benchers. We were told time and again that if it was not possible to prorogue parliament before the coronation, we would have to come back in the middle of the summer or early in the fall. Regardless of what legislation is introduced at this session, I believe it will be much longer because of one reason. Our constituents expect us not only to work in the committees but to express our sentiments in the house on some of the problems which the country has to face.

I believe that this resolution should be sent to a committee to be studied. I listened most attentively to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North when he suggested that the estimates should be considered by a special committee. I am absolutely against the setting up of such a committee, unless it is composed of all the members of the house. Of necessity the committee would have to be limited in number, perhaps to not more than twenty-four members. Does the hon. member expect that other members who are not on the committee will be satisfied with the reports brought in? Any hon. member would have the right to discuss each item regardless of how much time had been spent in the committee and every member of this house would have the right to scrutinize every one of these items.

I remember when it was suggested eleven years ago that speeches should be limited to forty minutes. Some members thought that would not work out; but taking myself as an example, I believe that if I were allowed to speak only twenty minutes instead of forty, my speeches would be much better than they are at the present time. Perhaps the same thing could be said of many other hon. members. An attempt to save time is not a good thing as far as this parliament is concerned. It should not be an end but a way to good legislation. Each one of us has certain responsibilities, not only towards this parliament but towards our constituents. It is our duty to see that the questions which are dealt with are dealt with properly regardless of time.

I do not know if I am in order, but there is one matter I should like to mention. I have never liked the idea of having to take an oath to get my indemnity cheque. I submit I have a right to that regardless of how many days I have been absent from the House of Commons but I must state that I have lost very little time, however. In my time I have paid several payrolls and I have never had one of my men put his hand on the bible to swear that he had worked so many days. I believe that is my responsibility to my constituents. If they do not believe I am fulfilling my duties; if they do not think I have been in the house enough, then it is up to them to penalize me the next time I ask them for their support. I believe it is degrading to ask members of parliament to go down to the office and take an oath that they have sat so many days in the House of Commons. As far as I am concerned, I have taken that oath for the last six years, and it is not my intention to do it in the future, although I have done it for the first three years.

Mention has been made of the time taken up in recording a vote. We should adopt a system similar to that used in Great Britain. I shall not say we waste half an hour, but we lose that much time in taking a vote, whereas it should be possible to take it in ten minutes. I appreciate the opportunity given to me this afternoon to make these remarks on the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Gladstone). This is a private members' day. I have no doubt that on previous occasions it has been said that the time of the house has been wasted in discussing private members' resolutions. I believe that private members' days represent one of the most important principles of democracy. Speaker after speaker has stated that the number of private members' days should be increased, and I am entirely in favour of that suggestion. The government is represented by the members of the cabinet, but the individual members also have a responsibility. There is no doubt that some great benefits to the people as a whole have resulted from private members' resolutions. Time and time again we see it stated in the press that parliament is a great waster of public funds; that parliament is a great waster of time; but I repeat that I consider it miraculous that we are able to complete the work of parliament in the time that we do. I must re-state here again that here in this parliament we have 245 members duly elected by their constituents and in their mandate the electors have the implicit right to expect that their representatives will discuss diligently and if necessary extensively regional and national questions.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I have enjoyed the speeches of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), and the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman). I should like to express my approval of virtually everything that has been said by these gentlemen. As I am a new member representing a new movement, perhaps it may interest other hon. members to know how we in this corner feel about the rules of the house. One of the most confusing things to a new member is the "order" chorus. This chorus seems to be consistently put in operation when a new member tries to talk. He may be out of order, but we find it exceedingly difficult to know when we are in order and to present our ideas without being interrupted and interfered with and disconcerted and generally prevented from telling in a straightforward way the things we came to tell. In the light of that situation I think the observations of the hon. member for Cochrane were exceedingly pertinent and appropriate. If there is one thing that is truer than another it is this, that what seems the radical, extreme idea of one day is looked upon as the sane, solid orthodoxy of another.

Mr. DUNNING: Some of them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: True, and who knows which of the ideas considered radical to-day will be orthodox to-morrow? That is the important thing. Nearly always the ideas which look most unorthodox to one generation are regarded as manifest platitudes to another. The history of our people so abounds in cases of that kind that it is simply a platitude for me to state it.

With respect to the resolution before us, I appreciate its having been introduced because it gives us a chance to express our ideas. Without intending any offence to the hon. member who introduced it (Mr. Gladstone), my impression is that the resolution is too vague. I felt very sympathetic with the words of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. Perhaps I may be wrong, but I have the feeling, and it is abroad throughout the land, all over the west and in many parts of the east, that there is a deliberate, secret, calculated movement aiming to suppress the popular expression of opinion, and to suppress new and popular movements, the assumption being that whatsoever is new must be wrong. Consequently in a resolution of this kind I find some ground for anxiety, and just in order to remove such anxiety it would have been better I think had the member specified in the resolution, so that we could consider them, one or two reforms which he believes desirable. If we study the history of parliamentary government among British peoples, we shall find that many attacks have been made on the rights of parliament, and some of them have succeeded in a way from which we are suffering even to-day. So I think the resolution is too vague.

We should be told, for example, to whom this committee is to report and who is to take action on its proposals. Are the proposals to be presented to this house before they are drafted in a bill?

Since we have sat here, Mr. Speaker, I have peen positively astounded at the way some things are railroaded through. Last night we had a good example of the kind of thing which under our rules may be done and what an appalling thing it is that it can be done in a great democracy like Canada. Just think of this: If one more member had chosen to speak or the discussion had continued five minutes longer, hon. members would not have been able to express an opinion in the form of a vote on a bill that every single member of this house enthusiastically supported; the result would have been that this country would have continued to suffer from one of the most disgusting and outrageous abuses that I believe ever began to develop in a British country, and there would have been absolutely no way of our resisting it. I refer to the bill dealing with the Performing Right Society. The feeling which was made manifest here last night so enthusiastically on that bill, has prevailed for three years, during which the people have been clamouring for a change, and for three years a bill has been brought into the house to correct this abuse, but has been killed. There is a state of affairs which manifestly is not working for democracy.

If the findings of the committee which this resolution proposes should be presented to some body not reporting directly to this house, and then if the committee's recommendations are put into the form of a government measure—I do not wish to imply anything against the government, but suppose that should be done—if such measure should then come into the house with the whole strength of the party machine in operation behind it, some of the liberties at least which the minor groups in the house now enjoy could be taken away from us, and we could do absolutely nothing about it. This is too bad but it is true, so far as I have been able to judge during the short time I have been in the house.

I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to prolong my remarks. I wish to see reforms in parliament in so far as they will really reform, but as members of this house we cannot realize too fully that the liberties and happiness not only of this generation but of generations yet unborn are in our keeping. Before, therefore, we modify anything which has been discovered and perfected and handed down to us by our fathers as safe and sane we should be very, very careful. Consequently I must oppose the resolution on the ground that it is too vague—not that I am not in favour of reform, but that I wish to be very sure that there is nothing to come out of this resolution which will do us harm instead of good.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, after all, I believe the rules of the house are not so bad as some people sometimes represent them to be, and the discussion in the house this afternoon rather confirms my view.

I share to a large extent the view of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Blackmore) that it would be better if some practical suggestions were made in the resolution so that the house would know what is really involved in the proposal now before us. While no man is more favourable than I am to changes, provided they are reforms and real improvements, I do not want to change something that is good to make it less good. Our rules have come down to us as the result of the working out of parliamentary institutions in Great Britain and Canada for many, many years. Indeed, one of the sections of the British North America Act says that the privileges and powers of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada shall be those enacted by the parliament of Canada, provided they do not exceed the privileges and immunities and powers of the House of Commons and the House of Lords of Great Britain.

The rules have been changed occasionally in minor respects. There have been only two full revisions of the rules. I do not agree with the hon. member who said that every time the rules have been changed it has been for the purpose of curtailing the rights of private members. I think, on the contrary, that the rights of private members have not been curtailed but rather extended when a revision has been made. I had the privilege of being a member of the Speaker's committee in 1927, when the last revision was made, and the main changes made at that time were the eleven o'clock adjournment rule and the forty minute rule for speeches. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) says that the forty minute rule has not shortened the sessions of parliament. It is possible that it has not shortened the sessions of parliament; but I think it has prolonged the life of some of us, and it has given an opportunity to more members to express their views on any subject which comes before the house. Years ago there was no limit to either the length of the speech or the length of the session.

Mr. DUNNING: Or the length of the day.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Or the length of the day. In 1913 we sat in the House of Commons for two weeks night and day, with the exception of Sunday; at twelve o'clock on Saturday night, we being all good Christians, the house adjourned to three o'clock on Monday. There we were, divided into squads to keep the fire burning; and it was this incident that showed the necessity of the rule of closure, to which I objected strenuously and of which I complained bitterly when it was imposed. But I am free to confess that in the hectic days of 1926 I myself had to move closure, and I found it was a very good instrument to use when the circumstances justified.

Let me say that I have pondered the British parliamentary rules. I have taken my political education in the British system of parliament, and I do not agree to any extent with those who praise the United States way as regards committees and other devices. Of course it is quite different; the system is not at all the same. Ministers have no seat in congress; necessarily they must appear before committees and explain the policies of the government which have to be decided afterwards by congress. But I do not believe that anybody in this country would favour a change under which our ministers would not occupy seats in parliament. As far as I am concerned I would rather not be a minister if I had to relinquish my seat in the house.

Now, with regard to private members' rights. Mention has been made of the practice in the House of Commons in England. Perhaps hon. members know that there the government is the absolute master of parliamentary proceedings, such as the length of debates, allocation of days for a certain debate, and when the vote shall be taken; so far as private members' resolutions are concerned, there is a ballot, and the members who will have the floor on the day which is fixed for discussion are those whose names come out of the basket.

Mr. DUNNING: And no more than one in twenty-five ever comes out.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): So that our system is certainly not more restrictive than the one which is used in the British House of Commons.

I have been a private member twice as long as I have been a member of a government, and I do not recall that at any time I have been deprived of a chance to say something when I had something to say. My good friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North, who is one of those who complained most, might find it difficult to recall an occasion when he has been prevented from saying something in the house.

Mr. HEAPS: I did not complain.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No? That is fine. Because, apart from the resolutions and the public bills, an hon. member can always speak when the house is moved into committee of supply, except on Thursdays and Fridays; he can say anything under the sun. There is the debate on the address, and there is the chance of speaking on other members' proposals and on government measures and of saying anything that would be of practicability and of use to the country.

Mr. DUNNING: And on the budget.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And, of course, in the debate on the budget. After all, the business has to be done. The government is a committee of the House of Commons; it is an executive which is supposed to represent the House of Commons in parliament in the administration of affairs, in the carrying on of public business, and it would be impossible to go on with the business of the country if there were not some rules which at least give the government the right of way on certain days. Perhaps those days are more numerous than some hon. members would like them to be, but it is essential to make such provision; otherwise the session would be never-ending. Business could not be done properly if the rules were not substantially in the form in which they are to-day.

The hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) says that the work of parliament must be one of search for truth. I quite agree with him, but I think the rules as they stand have been framed for that purpose. When he referred to the niceties of debates and the witty repartees of my right hon. friend, I may remind him that all that has been done under the rules as they are to-day.

I am grateful and I think the house is grateful to the hon. member who moved this resolution. It has been the occasion of many suggestions which will be considered, but I believe the subject is one which needs to be studied by each hon. member individually. We were not expecting this to be a session for the revision of the rules, and I may assure the house that the work of this session will be heavy. I do not see that it would be possible to have a Speaker's committee to alter the rules of the house at the present session. However, my hon. friend's resolution has certainly served a good purpose; he has gone some way towards the end he had in view, and perhaps he will not force a division on the resolution.

Hon. J. E. LAWSON (York South): As there is hardly time left to take up effectively the succeeding notice of motion on the order paper, I should like, with respect to this discussion, to express a thought which probably was barely touched upon by some hon. gentlemen who preceded me this afternoon. It has seemed to me, in the ten or eleven sessions that I have been in this house, that one respect in which our rules are defective, at least from the public standpoint, as serving the interests of democracy, if not from the standpoint of actual debate in this chamber, is that from time to time we close the session without disposing of the business which is already on the order paper. I ask seriously whether it is not a mistake in the interests of maintaining a democratic system of government and a democratic parliament, to have the session close without private bills in some instances having had an opportunity of being dealt with. The same is true of private members' resolutions. The answer to all that is obviously that the session would run on forever and never be closed. I suggest that it might be better if we had a time limit placed upon the date, after the commencement of the session, when these matters might be put on the order paper for discussion. But I think, in the interests of the country, we ought to dispose of matters which are already on the order paper.

Let me give another illustration of what I consider an evil, if I may use that word for want of a better, of the present situation. During this session I felt compelled to divide the house, and the vote took up probably half an hour. Why did I do that? For this reason. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe), rightly or wrongly, took a position which I considered in error. Under the rules

I could not discuss that notice of motion for the production of papers in the house without its going to notices of motion, and if under the rules it went to notices of motion it had little or no chance of ever being reached. It so happens—I say this with deference to hon. gentlemen who took a different view—I am thoroughly satisfied, which I suppose is not unusual, that I was right in this particular instance, and that those who voted against me on that occasion were wrong. I am satisfied that, having regard to the legal knowledge and the judicial mind of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), I could present a case to him and have him decide in my favour in view of the British precedents which I took the trouble to look up.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course, under the rules, my hon. friend will have another opportunity on that subject.

Mr. LAWSON: Possibly.

Mr. DUNNING: Definitely.

Mr. LAWSON: Possibly, but it is doubtful unless I wish to take advantage of the opportunity on going into supply some day—

Mr. DUNNING: There will be another one.

Mr. LAWSON: —and then I might be met with a difficulty which I shall not suggest for fear it might be raised against me.

Mr. DUNNING: I could suggest another opportunity apart from that.

Mr. LAWSON: I think the house should seriously consider whether we ought to amend the rules so as to provide that before the close of any particular session we shall dispose of all business which is on the order paper, even if we have to limit the date after which no matter may go upon the order paper.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Mr. Speaker, I wish to dispel the fears of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) with regard to the wording of the resolution. Referring to the Journals of the House of Commons for 1926-27, I find a similar resolution in these words:

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King (Prince Albert), it was resolved that,—A special committee consisting of Messrs. Lemieux, Elliott, Euler, Lapointe, Marcil, Johnston (Long Lake), Kellner, Bird, Hanson, Boys, Perley (Sir George), Black (Yukon), and MacDonald (Cape Breton South), be appointed to consider with Mr. Speaker the advisability of revising the rules of the house and to report to the house at the present session.

In the same Journals, I find fifty pages devoted to the report of this committee, which gave us the rules of the house as they stand to-day.

As the sponsor of the resolution I should like to express my appreciation of the many hon. members who have contributed to the discussion, which I am confident will result in profit. I am sure it has brought to the notice of members of the government many points, particularly points in which private members are interested. There is no desire on the part of private members at any time to embarrass or impede the progress of the government, and I am sure that at all times it is their wish to facilitate government in every way and to do all those things which are in the interests of the people. Under the circumstances I am quite content that the motion should be withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 24, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT SWEEPSTAKES ORGANIZED BY PROVINCES FOR BENEFIT OF UNIVERSITIES OR HOSPITALS

Mr. ERNEST BERTRAND (Laurier) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 28, to amend the criminal code.

He said: Mr. Speaker, subsection 6 of section 236 of the criminal code has to do with the exceptions in favour of lotteries. One of these exceptions is found in paragraph (e), as follows:

(e) the Art Union of London, Great Britain, or the Art Union of Ireland.

This exception is now obsolete. However, all hon. members know that a number of sweepstakes are now being held throughout Canada. It is the intention of the bill to repeal paragraph (e) and replace it by another which would permit the recognition of sweepstakes by the governments of the provinces, the benefits to go to universities and hospitals. The bill speaks for itself.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

INCOME TAX FRAUDS

Mr. CHURCH:

Will any investigation be made here into whether a similar state exists in Canada as in United States about huge income tax frauds, as requested on page 3355 of Hansard, 1936?

Mr. ILSLEY: Continuous investigations to prevent fraud are carried on by the income tax division.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—A. M. SHAW

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. For what period, if any, was A. M. Shaw a member of the Canadian wheat board, (a) in 1936; (b) in 1937?
2. What salary, expenses or emoluments did A. M. Shaw receive for his services with the Canadian wheat board, (a) in 1936; (b) in 1937?
3. For what period, if any, was A. M. Shaw employed by the Department of Agriculture in 1937?
4. What salary, expenses or emoluments did he receive for his services with the Department of Agriculture in 1937?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. (a) All the year; (b) All the year.
2. (a) Salary $15,000 travelling expenses $696.13; (b) Salary $4,309.25; travelling expenses $657.42.
3. From January 22, 1937, to December 31, 1937.
4. Salary for above period $7,937.86; Travelling expenses during same period $2,741.50.

TORONTO POST OFFICE

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale):

What revenue was derived by the government at Toronto central post office on Christmas day, December 25, 1937?

Mr. EULER: Incidental to other necessary work, employees on duty gave a restricted service at the general delivery wicket between 7 a.m. and 12 noon.

The revenue collected was $22.69.

The employees on duty were also engaged on box sortation, etc.

Complete deliveries were given in all sections of the city. Had this service not been given, the mails which were sorted Friday evening would have been delayed until Monday morning.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale):

What was the additional cost of the operation of the holiday postal delivery in Toronto for the year 1937?

Mr. EULER: Estimated cost, $14,266.01.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale):

1. What were the number of additional temporary employees in the Toronto post office during the Christmas rush of 1937?
2. What number of these employees were returned men?

Mr. EULER:

1. 2,723.
2. 933.

MAPLE SUGAR AND SYRUP PRODUCTION

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. What quantities of maple sugar and of maple syrup were produced in Canada during the years 1932, 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, and 1937?
2. During the same years, what were the exports from Canada of maple products: (a) to the several dominions and to the British Empire; (b) to the United States?

Mr. EULER:

1. Production—

Years	Maple Sugar Pounds	Maple Syrup Gallons
1932	7,260,000	1,709,990
1933	5,785,130	1,262,315
1934	4,940,690	1,838,400
1935	6,538,960	2,250,769
1936	9,231,803	2,022,719
1937	4,413,147	1,232,069

2. Domestic Exports from Canada of Maple Sugar and Maple Syrup (calendar years, 1932 to 1937).

Maple Sugar	Years ended December 31
Empire countries	1932	1933	1934	1935	1936	1937
To United Kingdom Lb.	30,639	36,111	24,718	34,981	24,843	28,179
$	5,333	5,312	4,079	5,513	3,623	5,056
Irish Free State Lb.	....	....	....	....	581	....
$	....	....	....	....	80	....
British East Africa Lb.	....	....	....	....	50	....
$	....	....	....	....	14	....
British South Africa Lb.	....	1,162	....	378	371	939
$	....	289	....	57	56	115
British India Lb.	....	....	....	....	20	....
$	....	....	....	....	4	....
Bermuda Lb.	....	....	40	28	....	285
$	....	....	16	8	....	48
Newfoundland Lb.	....	48	....	3,173	8,095	15,072
$	....	10	....	366	937	1,827
Australia Lb.	....	....	....	30	120	571
$	....	....	....	5	18	86
New Zealand Lb.	....	....	....	....	10	152
$	....	....	....	....	2	28
Total Empire countries Lb.	30,639	37,321	24,758	38,590	34,090	45,198
$	5,333	5,611	4,095	5,949	4,734	7,160

	Years ended December 31
Maple sugar—
Foreign countries	1932	1933	1934	1935	1936	1937
To United States.. .. ..Lb.	3,363,180	2,323,570	3,607,198	1,710,850	8,207,523	3,456,148
$	600,067	382,600	557,170	217,976	1,289,776	508,408
Other foreign countries..Lb.	5,357	9,911	7,849	22,647	28,087	44,834
$	860	1,264	781	4,048	5,303	6,360
Total foreign countries..Lb.	3,368,537	2,333,481	3,615,047	1,733,497	8,235,610	3,500,982
$	600,927	383,864	557,951	222,024	1,295,079	514,768
Grand total exports (maple sugar).. .. ..Lb.	3,399,176	2,370,802	3,639,805	1,772,087	8,269,700	3,546,180
$	606,260	389,475	562,046	227,973	1,299,813	521,928
Maple syrup—
Empire countries
To United Kingdom.. .. ..Gal.	4,083	2,351	1,747	2,454	2,667	2,554
$	11,244	4,860	3,842	5,889	6,503	5,980
Irish Free State. .. ..Gal.	....	....	....	....	2	....
$	....	....	....	....	4	....
British South Africa..Gal.	....	14	....	155	78	87
$	....	30	....	282	96	200
Bermuda.. .. ..Gal.	118	178	86	222	469	433
$	318	420	200	438	1,093	1,018
British India.. .. .. ..Gal.	....	9	....	8	5	....
$	....	14	....	16	17	....
British Guiana.. .. ..Gal.	....	....	....	....	9	3
$	....	....	....	....	12	6
British Honduras. .. ..Gal.	....	....	3	....	....	....
$	....	....	7	....	....	....
Barbados.. .. ..Gal.	....	....	1	5	5	1
$	....	....	2	8	10	2
Jamaica.. .. ..Gal.	....	....	11	26	20	43
$	....	....	27	54	49	101
Trinidad and Tobago..Gal.	....	2	10	....	13	5
$	....	3	17	....	27	11
Other Br. West Indies..Gal.	....	....	4	....	....	7
$	....	....	8	....	....	15
Newfoundland.. .. ..Gal.	27	93	47	121	156	89
$	70	203	101	200	278	176
Australia.. .. ..Gal.	....	....	....	15	30	....
$	....	....	....	25	38	....
Fiji.. .. ..Gal.	....	....	....	6	....	....
$	....	....	....	12	....	....
New Zealand.. .. .. ..Gal.	....	....	52	156	84	433
$	....	....	76	378	172	1,061
Total Empire countries.Gal.	4,228	2,647	1,961	3,168	3,538	3,655
$	11,632	5,530	4,280	7,302	8,299	8,570
Maple syrup—
Foreign countries
To United States .. .. ..Gal.	4,896	30,277	105,137	204,918	10,703	4,035
$	6,014	26,396	112,933	210,083	20,461	12,239
Other foreign countries.Gal.	79	70	36	83	64	126
$	154	147	52	151	153	304
Total foreign countries.Gal.	4,975	30,347	105,173	205,001	10,767	4,161
$	6,168	26,543	112,985	210,234	20,614	12,543
Grand total exports (maple syrup).. .. ..Gal.	9,203	32,994	107,134	208,169	14,305	7,816
$	17,800	32,073	117,265	217,536	28,913	21,113

PREFERENCE ON IMPORTATIONS THROUGH CANADIAN PORTS

Mr. ISNOR:

Has the present government taken any action which would result in our ports losing the ten per cent preference on goods entering Canada by being conveyed directly into a Canadian seaport, as stated by the right hon. leader of the opposition in this house on the 31st day of January of this year?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. The customs tariff (sections 3 and 5) still provides that all goods, to be entitled to the benefits of the British preferential tariff, must be conveyed without trans-shipment from a British country into a sea, lake or river port of Canada, and that on such goods, with certain specified exceptions, the duties computed at British preferential tariff rates shall be subject to a discount of ten per cent.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

EXPENSES OF CANADIAN ATHLETES AND OF REPRESENTATIVES OF CANADIAN CHAMBER OF AGRICULTURE TO AUSTRALIA

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Was the government approached to assist in financing the trip of Canadian athletes to Australia?
2. If so, what contribution, if any, was made?
3. Was the dominion government approached to finance representatives of the Canadian chamber of agriculture to the producers empire conference in Australia?
4. If so, what contribution, if any, was or will be made?

Mr. RINFRET: In order to reply properly to this question it is desirable that a copy of some of the correspondence be tabled. I suggest that it be made an order for return.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. CAHAN:

In the matter of the trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America, which came into force on January 1, 1936:

1. If the exports from Canada during the calendar year 1936 on which reductions of United States customs duty were made by the said agreement be described as class A, and those exports from Canada on which no reduction of United States customs duty was made be described as class B; what was the value of exports in class A as compared with the value of exports in class B in each of the three calendar years 1935, 1936 and 1937?
2. If the imports from the United States into Canada during the calendar year 1936, on which reductions of Canadian customs duty were made by the said agreement, be described as class C, and those imports from the United States into Canada on which no reductions of Canadian customs duty was made be described as class D; what was the value of imports in class C as compared with the value of imports in class D in each of the three calendar years 1935, 1936 and 1937?

DUTIABLE IMPORTS

Mr. McDONALD (Souris):

1. What is the total amount of goods which entered Canada during the fiscal year 1936-37, upon which duty was paid?
2. What amount of duty was collected?
3. What is the total amount of goods upon which the sales tax was levied in the fiscal year of 1936-37?
4. What amount was paid?
5. What is the basis of valuation of goods which are imported for manufacturing purposes?

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT—EXPENDITURES

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. What is the total amount of money spent under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, in each of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

2. How much of this money was spent, in each of the above mentioned provinces, in actual assistance to farmers for dams and irrigation projects?
3. How much was spent in administration in each of the above mentioned provinces?

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

Mr. WARD:

1. What number of civil servants now in the service are over 65 years of age, and how many are over 70 years of age?
2. How many civil servants now in the service have completed their payments to the superannuation fund, by virtue of the thirty-five year contributing clause in the act?
3. How many civil servants have received promotion, the promotion giving increased salary, since they ceased making contributions to the superannuation fund?

RADIO BROADCASTING

PROVISION FOR COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER ANNUAL REPORT AND REVIEW POLICIES OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved:

That a select committee be appointed on radio broadcasting to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to review the policies of the corporation with special reference to revenues, expenditures and development, with all the powers vested in the standing committees under standing orders and the resolution passed by this house on the 7th February, 1938.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Might it not be desirable to indicate in the motion the number of members that will comprise the committee? Otherwise it seems to me that a further motion of a different kind will have to be made.

Mr. HOWE: I understood that a second motion naming the members of the committee would be required.

Mr. BENNETT: So it is.

Mr. HOWE: I thought the number could be specified then.

Mr. BENNETT: The usual custom is to designate the number at this stage.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not necessarily.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is necessary, otherwise how are you going to deal with it? How will you know how many to appoint? It is quite all right for the clerk to make the statement I heard him make just now, but that is not an accurate statement. The rule of this house has been to name a committee consisting of seven, nine, eleven or so many members, so that we shall know how many to appoint when the committee is set up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The rule is that if there are to be more than fifteen the number must be mentioned.

Mr. BENNETT: The number has to be settled by some action of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There will be another motion naming the members of the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: That will have to appear on the order paper. Otherwise it would not be necessary to have it on the order paper at all. That is the point.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

APPOINTMENT OF STANDING COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER ACCOUNTS AND ESTIMATES

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved:

That standing order 63 of the House of Commons, relating to the appointment of standing committees of the house, be amended by adding to the standing committees of the house for the present session a standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, to which will be referred accounts and estimates and bills relating thereto of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for the present session, for consideration and report to the house; provided however that nothing in the resolution shall be construed to curtail in any way the full right of discussion in committee of supply; and that the said committee consist of Messrs. Barber, Beaubier, Bothwell, Deachman, Elliott (Kindersley), Emmerson, Ferland, Fiset (Sir Eugène), Fraser, Hanson, Heaps, Howard, Howden, Howe, Kinley, McKinnon (Kenora-Rainy River), McLarty, Maybank, Parent (Quebec West and South), Stewart, Vien, Walsh and Young.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): There is one question that arises out of this motion. Would it not be desirable to refer the accounts of the trans-Canada airlines to this committee, in view of their relationship to the Canadian National undertaking?

Mr. HOWE: It is a subsidiary company of the Canadian National Railways and automatically the accounts would be referred to this committee.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of the statute passed at the last session it could hardly be described as a subsidiary in the sense in which that term is used in respect to the other companies included in the Canadian National set-up. The trans-Canada airlines is a separate organization and in that sense is not a subsidiary. For instance, some lines of railways are subsidiaries, the capital stock being all owned by the company, but this company is covered by a separate statute of this parliament. If the minister says that this motion is intended to cover it, that answers my question.

Mr. HOWE: It is certainly the intention to submit the accounts of the trans-Canada airlines to this committee.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN POLICY

ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT RESPECTING BRITISH POLICY IN RESIGNATION OF ANTHONY EDEN

On the orders of the day.

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): Would the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) state if it is the intention of the Canadian government to support the pro-fascist policy of the British national government, as clearly shown by the forced resignation of Mr. Anthony Eden?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon friend that to my mind his question is highly improper and is one that should not be answered.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REFUNDS OF TAXES—DISPOSITION OF MOTION FOR PAPERS ON FEBRUARY 23 IN NAME OF MR. BETTS

On the orders of the day.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): I should like to direct attention to page 107 of the votes and proceedings of yesterday. A motion by Mr. Massey for Mr. Betts is recorded there as having been passed. As a matter of fact it was not passed by the house and I ask that it be so considered. If any correction is necessary, I ask that it be made.

VALIDITY OF QUEBEC STATUTE

QUESTION OF DISALLOWANCE OF "ACT RESPECTING COMMUNISTIC PROPAGANDA"

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): On February 8 I asked the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) whether or not the government would hear counsel when the matter of considering the disallowance of the so-called padlock law of Quebec was before it, and he indicated that he would give me an answer at an early date. Since then I have looked into the matter a little and I find that in many cases the minister of justice sitting alone has heard counsel; in one or two cases the prime minister sat with him, and in another case, a committee of the cabinet sat to hear argument. Apparently there is a long line of precedents to indicate that counsel has been heard on such applications, and I was wondering if the minister has arrived at a conclusion.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I am sorry I have not answered my right hon. friend earlier. I have found that on two occasions a committee of the council heard interested parties in connection with the disallowance of provincial legislation, but in both cases private companies were interested and had asked to be heard. The legislation did not concern the citizens at large; in both instances it had to do entirely with the rights of private corporations.

Mr. BENNETT: One case was the Commercial Travellers of British Columbia in 1905.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That was one of them. I have no objection at all to receiving any counsel who wants to present argument in the matter, but as far as delegations are concerned, I shall not receive any.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT

POSTPONEMENT OF REVISION OF EXISTING LISTS FOR ONE YEAR

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Dominion Franchise Act.

He said: This bill is similar to the ones we have passed at the two preceding sessions. While the Dominion Elections Act of 1934 is still on the statute book, it has been inoperative as far as by-elections are concerned because in the past two sessions we have passed special bills dealing with this matter. There would be no purpose in revising annually the permanent lists; it would cost a large amount of money. This bill is in exactly the same terms as those of similar bills approved by the house at previous sessions, except for the year.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Can the minister tell us when we may expect to have before us the Dominion Elections Act, which has been before a committee of the house for the last two years?

Mr. RINFRET: I am not in position to give the exact date, but I can assure my hon. friend that it is the intention of the government to introduce as soon as possible a new act based on the work done by the committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Bennett.]

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

AUTHORITY FOR EXTENSION BEYOND THE CONFINES OF CANADA

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend The Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937, to empower the governor in council to authorize the minister to enter into a contract for the extension of the Trans-Canada Lines of aircraft beyond the confines of Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister explain the resolution, please?

Mr. HOWE: The amendments are very simple. They are to correct two omissions in the original bill. By agreement made some two years ago with Great Britain, Ireland and Newfoundland, Canada is obligated to take a proportion of stock in the Transatlantic Air Service. The agreement provided that each government should nominate an aviation company which would assume the government obligation in that regard, and the amendment provides that authority shall be given to Trans-Canada Air Lines to purchase the government's share of stock in that company. When we were discussing the bill itself last year I mentioned that this would be the company entrusted with that service, and in setting up the capital of the company, funds were provided to carry out this obligation, but we omitted to provide in the bill that the company should have the right to purchase the government share of stock in the transatlantic company.

The second amendment is also to correct an omission. It will be recalled by hon. members that the route of Trans-Canada Air Lines was originally laid out across the state of Maine between Montreal and Moncton, New Brunswick. A strict reading of the act that was passed last year would prohibit Trans-Canada Air Lines from operating outside Canada, and the amendment makes a very minor alteration to permit the company to operate outside of Canada, either on the main transcontinental route or with such international connections as the government may designate in the operation of the service.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose the approval of other countries is given as a matter of course.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, with respect to international routes. We have had one conference with the United States already.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Howe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 29, to amend the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INSPECTION AND SALE

PROPOSED REGULATIONS RESPECTING BINDER TWINE, SALT AND OTHER COMMODITIES

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to regulate the inspection and sale of binder twine and salt, to establish weight of bushel for certain commodities commonly sold by the bushel and to authorize the appointment of inspectors and analysts.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister make a statement on the resolution?

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, there has been a statute on the books for many years—an act respecting the inspection and sale of certain staple commodities. The purpose of the proposed bill is to repeal that act and to renew where necessary the provisions, with respect to inspection and sale, of the act that was previously on the statute book.

For a number of years the act has been administered by the Department of Agriculture, since 1924, I think, although in the terms of the act itself it is stated that the minister is the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Many sections of the act have been reenacted by different pieces of legislation which are also now administered by the Department of Agriculture. Such parts of the act as have been reenacted will be completely repealed by this bill, and where it is necessary to continue sections they will be continued in the legislation to be based on this resolution. It will also provide for more appropriate regulatory measures for the sale and salvage of binder twine, for the establishment of legal weights per bushel of commodities commonly sold by measure, and for the repeal of provisions duplicated by more recent legislation or rendered obsolete by changed conditions.

Mr. SENN: Where did the request for this change regarding binder twine originate?

Mr. GARDINER: The provision with respect to binder twine modifies slightly the present legislation with regard to binder twine that is being salvaged following fires. There is, I might say, a proposed amendment to the section as in the bill dealing with binder twine. This has been proposed by the firm of Harold and Thompson, binder twine distributors of the city of Regina. They have gone over the legislation that is proposed and have made certain suggestions as to changes, which will be brought before the house when that section is under consideration. But I am told that the legislation itself has been considered by concerns that are handling binder twine across the country.

Mr. BAKER: Does this mean the appointment of government inspectors to inspect the sale of binder twine?

Mr. GARDINER: There are inspectors under the original act, and inspectors will be continued under this legislation.

Mr. BAKER: Will any more inspectors be appointed?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think there will be any in addition to what we have.

Mr. BAKER: Will the minister state that definitely?

Mr. GARDINER: I shall be able to make a definite statement when we come to that section.

Mr. BAKER: I am thinking of the "machine" there is in Saskatchewan, you know.

Mr. SENN: Will this bill go before the agriculture committee?

Mr. GARDINER: If the house considers it advisable, I have no objection to its going to committee. I do not think there is anything in it that requires such action.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gardiner thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 30, to regulate the inspection and sale of binder twine and salt, and to establish weight of bushel for certain commodities commonly sold by the bushel.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SHOP CARDS REGISTRATION

PROVISION FOR REGISTRATION OF DISTINCTIVE CARDS OF LABOUR UNIONS AND PREVENTING UNAUTHORIZED USE

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 22, respecting the registration of shop cards by labour unions.

He said: This is a bill to enable the registration of shop cards by labour unions with the Department of the Secretary of State. This is not a new matter. As far back as the session of 1927, on March 25, the then minister of labour, Hon. Peter Heenan, introduced a bill to amend the Trade Mark and Design Act to permit the very same object we have in view in the present bill. But in 1932 the former secretary of state had the house adopt, under the title of the Unfair Competition Act, an act defining the wares that may be registered by trade marks, and although that measure did not positively so state, it excluded by its very operation the registration of shop cards and union labels that were not actually attached to wares.

The bill introduced by the former secretary of state and passed was the sequel to an international conference which took place at the Hague in 1925, and the bill was passed pursuant to the conclusions arrived at at that conference, where it had been expressly desired that the trade mark should apply to goods and to wares and not to any quality of work irrespective of the object or ware. The definition given in the Unfair Competition Act, 1932, of a trade mark was as follows:

"Trade mark" means a symbol which has become adapted to distinguish particular wares falling within a general category from other wares falling within the same category, and is used by any person in association with wares entering into trade or commerce for the purpose of indicating to dealers in, and/or users of such wares that they have been manufactured, sold, leased or hired by him, or that they are of a defined standard or have been produced under defined working conditions, by a defined class of persons, or in a defined territorial area, and includes any distinguishing guise capable of constituting a trade mark.

By the act of 1932, therefore, the registration of a trade mark was confined solely to wares or goods, and it made impossible any further registration of shop cards or union labels such as had been provided for by the amending bill of 1927.

Mr. BENNETT: Is not that the definition given by the international conference?

Mr. RINFRET: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, how can we depart from it?

Mr. RINFRET: That is the reason why the bill as introduced now is a different bill altogether. It provides for similar procedure, but distinct, and has nothing to do with the Unfair Competition Act, which deals strictly with trade marks as provided for at the conference to which I have just alluded.

Between 1927 and 1932, when the new act was introduced and passed, a certain number of registrations of shop cards and union labels were made. There were not a great number of them, but it may be of interest to the house to know that in 1928 eleven such registrations took place; in 1929, five more; two in 1930, and two in 1931, a total of twenty registrations of shop cards or labels made during that period. Inasmuch as the registration is made for fifteen years, those still exist with the department. It was provided in the act of 1932 that no further registration should take place except within the meaning of the act, but it maintained the registrations that had already been entered. Section 23, subsection 1 of that act is as follows:

The register now existing under the Trade Mark and Design Act shall form part of the register maintained pursuant to this act, and, subject as hereinafter provided, all entries therein shall hereafter be governed by the provisions of this act, but shall not, if properly made under the law in force at the time they were made, be subject to be expunged or amended only because they might not properly have been made hereunder.

It will therefore be seen that the registrations entered before 1932 are still in force.

The object of introducing this bill is to meet wishes repeatedly expressed by labour unions and labour associations when they have come before the government. I shall not quote them all, but I may perhaps allude to the memorandum of legislative program presented to the cabinet by the executive council of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada on Friday, December 18, 1936. The paragraph relating to this bill reads as follows:

Further Protection for Union Services:—At present the Unfair Competition Act protects the use of the union label, but only as far as wares are concerned. We ask extension to cover registration of shop cards, emblems and union services of whatever nature.

This request was repeated year after year by the same council when it appeared before members of the government. I quote also from a memorandum submitted to us by the All-Canadian Congress of Labour on January, 17, 1936. As regards this particular question it states:

Union Labels. While the union labels of organizations with headquarters in the United States are accepted by the customs authorities as evidence of the country of origin of merchandise imported into Canada, the amendment to the Trade Mark & Design Act in 1927 to permit the registration of union labels in Canada was virtually repealed by the Unfair Competition Act of 1932.

The new regulations under the act—both those directly prescribed by the law and those arbitrarily imposed by administrative order—make registration futile, and they consequently operate to the detriment of Canadian unions. It is therefore requested that the right to make effective registration of union labels be restored by an amendment to the Unfair Competition Act.

I may say for the sake of correction that in the memorandum the Unfair Competition Act is not mentioned; it is the Copyright Act. That, however, is evidently a mistake. It has not seemed desirable nor even possible to amend the Unfair Competition Act to meet the wishes of these labour associations, but a separate bill altogether seems preferable.

I need not say any more than that the procedure which we have foreseen is similar in every respect to the one that obtained for the registration of trade marks proper. For the reasons I have indicated it will have to be distinct, but it will be similar, and registration will take place with the Department of the Secretary of State, although it is provided in the act that that may be changed by order in council if that branch of the service should be later displaced.

When we are in committee and are considering these points one by one it will be possible to explain the bill further. Our only purpose is to meet the wishes of the labour unions and associations and to restore a condition that existed until 1932 and I believe was not done away with for any purpose except to have our trade mark act perfectly in accordance with the wishes expressed at the international conference at the Hague in 1925. Looking over the discussions which took place at the time I fail to see that there was the least desire to do away with the registration of shop cards, and I hope that this bill will meet with the approval of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the minister sure that that right was taken away?

Mr. RINFRET: I know that no sustained effort has been made by any union since 1932 to register, and it is the opinion of the department that registration cannot take place at the present time. At any rate, there will be no room for doubt if we pass the bill.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The principle of the bill does not admit of great controversy. The statute of 1932 was one dealing with unfair competition, its purpose being to give effect to the terms of an international arrangement. I had not thought, until the minister said so, that the effect of the passing of that statute was to lessen the right to register under the Trade Mark and Design Act. If the minister says he is advised that the effect of the passage of that act, based upon the international arrangement, was to repeal the right that had theretofore existed, obviously it is the duty of this parliament to reinstate that right. Frankly, however, I should like to have had some more striking authority than that which the minister has indicated as to the right having been destroyed by the passage of the Unfair Competition Act. That is the only point I have to make at the moment.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): This bill appears properly in the name of my colleague the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret), but it is concerned with a matter of particular interest to labour organizations in Canada. I should like to emphasize again what he has said, namely, that the purpose of the bill is not to create any innovation but rather to restore a privilege which was enjoyed by labour organizations under the Trade Mark and Design Act of 1927, but of which they were deprived apparently under the Unfair Competition Act of 1932.

Mr. BENNETT: How does that become apparent, may I ask?

Mr. ROGERS: The officials of the Department of Labour are advised by labour organizations that since the Unfair Competition Act of 1932 it has been possible to register union labels but not to register shop cards with reference to service unions as distinguished from unions engaged in the production of goods and wares. That is the distinction that has been made, and labour organizations have approached the government on various occasions asking that legislation of this kind be brought forward in order to remove the anomaly which apparently exists. It seemed to us that the request was a reasonable one in the circumstances and I hope that the proposals made by the Secretary of State will receive the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. BENNETT: Now that the matter can be discussed and answers given more freely with the bill in committee, I should like to know what the authority is for the statement that the passing of the Unfair Competition Act repealed the antecedent right of registration. This matter came up on a previous occasion, I remember, the question being raised whether the complaint that the right did not exist was well founded, and I know of no refusal by any department of the public service to register as theretofore. It may be that the officials have taken the view that under the act they cannot do it. If so, that makes it quite clear. But if the right exists, the passing of this bill into a statute is merely placing upon the statute book something that is already there. I am not expressing an opinion, because I have not looked into the matter recently, but I do recall the point being made by delegations that came down and read from their brief certain grievances which they alleged they had and thought should be remedied by legislative action. My memory is that the secretary of state at the time, who was responsible for the passing through this house of the Unfair Competition Act, based upon the international convention of 1925, did not wholly agree with that view. Whether or not his view extends to the point of indicating that the statute is broad enough to cover it, I cannot say; but I am always reluctant to see a bill placed upon the statute book if there is already ample provision to meet the situation.

If the minister says that the law officers advise that this bill is necessary, then there should be no difficulty in dealing with the matter promptly.

Mr. RINFRET: The authority, in the first place, is the Unfair Competition Act of 1932 itself. The definition of trade mark in paragraph (m) of section 2 says very clearly—I read it a moment ago, but perhaps I read it too fast—

Mr. BENNETT: I followed it.

Mr. RINFRET: It defines trade mark as follows:

> (m) "Trade mark" means a symbol which has become adapted to distinguish particular wares falling within a general category from other wares falling within the same category, and is used by any person in association with wares entering into trade or commerce—

And so on. I think it is quite plain that it has always been so interpreted in the department, that that definition means an object. For example, we will register a union label of a printing office because it is printed on paper, and therefore there is an object which can come within the definition of this act. Section 23, which I have also quoted, plainly states that from that time a certain category of trade marks may still be registered but others cannot. The intention evidently was to exclude from further registration, marks of a certain category, and these in my opinion were shop cards and labels which did not fall within the definition of section 2. That is what the act says.

As regards further authority, it is the experience of the department that ever since 1932 not one registration has taken place. It has been the constant interpretation of the act by my predecessor who put through the act in 1932, up to 1935, and by my officers since I resumed office in the Department of the Secretary of State, that we could not register any trade mark or sign which is not in the form of an object or a piece of goods.

I may assure my right hon. friend that this bill has been recommended by the law officers of the departments interested, both of labour and of the secretary of state, because it was found absolutely necessary, if registration of shop cards was desired, that legislation of this kind be enacted. But I am willing to admit without discussion that it may not have been at all the intention of the former government to bring about any such condition of affairs as now exists. We are not trying in the least to do anything but provide for registration of shop cards, which as I say has not taken place since 1932.

Mr. FACTOR: Several representations were made to me by labour unions in Toronto in reference to this matter. As I understand the situation, under the present Unfair Competition Act, with respect to goods manufactured, trade marks can be registered, but trade marks with respect to services rendered by labour unions which have their own particular design for an individual union would not be accepted by the department. I was told that under the former trade mark and design act—I have not been able to verify it—a union could register a trade mark or shop card designating its services rendered, but under the present act that right was taken away. This bill, as I read it, merely restores the right which formerly existed, giving to every union which has a specific design for work performed by it the right to register that design.

The only criticism I have, if it can be called a criticism, is that under the section of the Unfair Competition Act it says in respect of goods that they have been manufactured under a definite standard and definite working conditions. I would ask the minister whether on an application for registration of a shop card the department will inquire as to working conditions prevailing in that union before registration, or will mere application by a labour union as defined in section 2 entitle the union to register its shop card? A trade mark in the usual sense of the term denotes registration of a specific article which is manufactured under certain working conditions and to a certain standard. Under this bill, will any group of men organizing themselves into a union to deal with their employers be entitled to registration of their shop card without the department being satisfied that the working and labour conditions in that trade are satisfactory? It may be of course that the constitutional element again comes into play, that the federal department has no jurisdiction to inquire into labour conditions; but perhaps the minister will clear this point up for me.

Mr. RINFRET: I think I can reply at once that there is no doubt that a labour union, merely by observing the conditions of the bill, could obtain registration of their shop card. We should have to be satisfied in the first place that they are a labour union, and that of course would come under the Labour department.

Mr. WALSH: Does the minister anticipate any difficulty in the case of a shop where two or more labour unions might be concerned, each desiring to register its own particular design or card?

Mr. ROGERS: A shop card will not be exhibited except with the consent of the proprietor; therefore it would be a matter for the proprietor to determine whether or not in the situation mentioned by the hon. member it was desirable that the shop cards of both unions should be exhibited, or none. There is nothing of a coercive nature in the bill.

Mr. WALSH: The proprietor might, if he so desired, refuse to accept any?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. WALSH: He might also be put in a position of being prejudiced in favour of one union or another.

Mr. ROGERS: If it caused him inconvenience undoubtedly he would change the practice.

Mr. BENNETT: It might be well to observe that in the Unfair Competition Act there was a definition also of design mark. There were three definitions; first, of design mark, second, of word mark, and third, of trade mark. The word "trade mark" is defined by the statute as was read by the minister. "Design mark" is defined as follows:

(c) "Design mark" means a trade mark consisting of an arbitrary and in itself meaningless mark or design, or of a representation of some object or objects, or of letters or numerals in series or otherwise, or of a combination of two or more of the foregoing elements, and depending for its distinctiveness upon its form and colour, or upon the form, arrangement or colour of its several parts, independently of any idea or sound capable of being suggested by the particular sequence of the letters and/or numerals, if any, forming part thereof, or by their separation into groups, and includes any distinguishing guise capable of constituting a trade mark;

That is, capable of constituting it, of being made into a trade mark. Then there is a definition of "distinguishing guise", and lastly there is a definition of "word mark":

(o) "Word mark" means a trade mark consisting only of a series of letters and/or numerals and depending for its distinctiveness upon the idea or sound suggested by the sequence of the letters and/or numerals and their separation into groups, independently of the form of the letters or numerals severally or as a series.

The language of the new bill limits this shop card very greatly. If the minister will be good enough to observe, the word "shop card" means:

. . . any design, emblem, figure, sign, seal, stamp, ticket, device or other form of advertisement adopted by a labour union.

This is not a question of trade mark; it is a question of advertisement. I think the clause of the statute is broad enough, so far as the statute of 1932 is concerned, to permit of the registration of a design mark, but it is quite clear that this is not dealing with a trade mark, or design mark, or word mark. A shop card deals with only one thing—advertisement.

Paragraph (e) of subsection 2, which I am reading in connection with the definition, says that a shop card means any other form of advertising adopted by a labour union. This is the definition of an advertisement.

Mr. ROGERS: Or identification.

Mr. BENNETT: It does not say that.

Mr. ROGERS: An emblem.

Mr. BENNETT: It does not say anything about identification here. It talks about it purely as an advertisement. That is the reason I read the two definitions. It says:

"Shop card" means any design, emblem, figure, sign, seal, stamp, ticket, device or other form of advertisement adopted by a labour union.

And that is registerable. As what is it registerable?—A trade mark, design mark or word mark. The definition refers to a stamp, ticket, or device. This does not cover a combination of words, unless they are worked into a sign or symbol of some sort. Obviously the governing words are "form of advertisement." I repeat that my difficulty is how to show that this is not covered by the language of the statute—because this never was a trade mark. We must remember that we have an international convention on the word "trade mark" by which we are bound. The first conference took place in 1883. Then there was a revision in 1900, followed by the Washington conference of 1914 and the Hague conference of 1925.

The word "trade mark" as used in international law and as used by us now is defined by international agreement or understanding. This is not a trade mark.

Mr. ROGERS: It is restricted to wares, as well.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, because the very essence of it implies that it should be. Let us not confuse the terms; I entreat the minister not to confuse a shop card with a trade mark.

Mr. FACTOR: It was so interpreted.

Mr. BENNETT: They have no relation, one to the other.

Mr. FACTOR: It was so interpreted in the former act.

Mr. BENNETT: No; if the hon. member will take the trouble to look it up he will find that is not so. They were registered under it. The question of a union label is something attached to wares. The Minister of Labour has properly pointed out the underlying principle. It is attached to a commodity; the word "wares" is used in the statute. When those words are attached to the commodity it then, by international agreement, may be designated a trade mark. But a shop card, which is defined in this measure as an advertisement, could never be, under any form, made into a trade mark.

Mr. RINFRET: I agree with my right hon. friend to a certain extent. That is the reason we have a distinct bill to deal with shop cards—because they are not trade marks.

Mr. BENNETT: I am making another point, altogether.

Mr. ROGERS: I think I may be able to satisfy the right hon. leader of the opposition on the point he raised a moment ago. Actually in the legislation of 1927 there is specific reference to a union label.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and that is preserved in the Unfair Competition Act.

Mr. ROGERS: I doubt if it is.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, here is the section—

Mr. ROGERS: May I continue: Union label is so defined:

> Any mark, term, design, emblem, figure, sign, seal, stamp, diagram, ticket, device or form of advertisement, adopted by a labour union.

Mr. DUNNING: That is in the old law.

Mr. ROGERS: It is in the legislation of 1927. It so happens that the Unfair Competition Act, in addition to defining "trade mark" as applying exclusively to wares, goes farther than that and repeals certain sections of the previous legislation, including the section which gives the definition to which I have referred. Therefore we were in this position, that under the Unfair Competition Act one could register union labels as applied to wares, but one could not register a shop card which had relation solely to a service union.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 61 of the Unfair Competition Act, which is the repealing section, reads:

> (1) Any application for the registration of a trade mark received by the registrar at any time before the expiration of a month from the day upon which this act comes into force shall be dealt with in accordance with the provisions of the Trade Mark and Design Act, and registrations made pursuant to such applications shall for the purposes of this act be deemed to have been on the register at the date upon which this act comes in force.

Mr. ROGERS: New registrations.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. But subsection 2 says:

> (2) Subject as aforesaid, sections three, four to twenty-one inclusive, twenty-three and fifty-three of the said act are repealed and sections forty-two to fifty-two inclusive are amended—

Not struck out.

> —by striking therefrom the words "trade mark" and "trade marks" and any other words exclusively relating to the said words.
>
> (3) For the purpose of sections twenty-two, twenty-four and twenty-five of the said act the expression "union label" shall mean a registered trade mark adopted for the purpose of indicating that the wares bearing it have been produced under defined working conditions or by a defined class of persons.

And then, section 62:

> 62. This act shall come into force on the first day of September, 1932.

I think the significance of that makes it quite clear what the purport of the act is. The word "trade mark" in some cases is used in the sense of an adjective, if I may use the term, as describing a mark of a trade. The union label is preserved by subsection 3 of section 60 of the Unfair Competition Act. But the words "design mark" and "word mark" are given a definition in this statute, which was arrived at after conference with all the nations of the world.

The minister makes it perfectly clear that the explanatory note is, I submit with deference, based upon an entire misconception of the situation, for the word "trade mark" is a word which is defined by international arrangement, and has the meaning given to it in the statute which we passed based on international agreement. I think no hon. member will suggest that the word "trade mark" can be applied to an advertisement. One might copyright an advertisement, but it is obvious that he cannot trade mark it, for the reason given by the minister a moment ago. The essence of trade marks is something else, as the statute makes clear.

Needless to say I am wholly in accord with the provision of the statute with respect to the question of registration, but it does not touch trade marks at all. To introduce a section of the act of 1932 defining a trade mark for the purpose of saying that it excluded something else is an entirely false argument. It leads to a wrong conclusion.

Mr. DUNNING: In practice, that is what happened.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. DUNNING: Ever since 1932.

Mr. BENNETT: The word "trade mark" never applied to shop cards.

Mr. ROGERS: The act of 1932 repealed the definition section of the act of 1927 which gave a wider scope to the term "union label."

Mr. BENNETT: Following the last preceding meeting at Washington the view with respect to many matters was modified. As far as I remember, that was done in 1925, before I came back to this house. I cannot for a moment permit myself to give adhesion to the view that you can by any flight of fancy designate an advertisement as a trade mark.

Mr. DUNNING: The bill does not do that.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but the explanation upon which it is based is founded on that misconception. That is the point exactly.

Mr. FACTOR: Subsection 2 of section 5 of the act of 1927 reads as follows:

> Any union label heretofore or hereafter adopted by any labour union to designate, make known, or distinguish any goods, wares, merchandise, or product of labour, wholly or partly manufactured, produced, or prepared by the labour of such union, or of any member or members thereof, may be registered for the exclusive use of such labour union in the manner herein provided; and the said union shall, for the purpose of this act, be considered the proprietor of such union label.

The definition of union label is as mentioned by the Minister of Labour. The Unfair Competition Act repealed that section 5.

Mr. BENNETT: The Unfair Competition Act preserves the rights of the holders of union labels in terms.

Mr. FACTOR: Quite so.

Mr. BENNETT: Is not that the language?

Mr. FACTOR: But it does repeal the section.

Mr. BENNETT: It repeals the section in every other respect but it preserves the right of the holders of labels in terms.

Mr. ROGERS: Trade marks only. I really think that is the explanation. Under the Unfair Competition Act one could not do otherwise than define a trade mark as something applying exclusively to wares, as the right hon. gentleman has just said. Some time after this legislation came into effect it was realized by the labour organizations that it was restrictive in character, consequently applications were made for the registration of shop cards as distinguished from union labels. The whole purpose of the legislation now before the committee is to correct that inadvertent omission.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a question of inadvertence; the question goes deeper than that. The question is whether the basis upon which this is predicated has any foundation. There never was a time when a shop card was a trade mark.

Mr. ROGERS: It came under the provisions of the act of 1927.

Mr. BENNETT: Which was predicated upon the treaty of Washington and not upon the findings of the Hague tribunal which gave a new definition to the word "trade mark."

Mr. ROGERS: There is no reference in the act of 1927 to the treaty of Washington.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. ROGERS: The Unfair Competition Act of 1932 refers to the international convention.

Mr. RINFRET: The leader of the opposition has just read the repealed section of the 1932 act. Subsection 3 reads:

> For the purpose of sections twenty-two, twenty-four and twenty-five of the said act the expression "union label" shall mean a registered trade mark adopted for the purpose of indicating that the wares bearing it have been produced under defined working conditions or by a defined class of persons.

If you turn to sections 22, 24 and 25 you will find that they deal with registration. There is no doubt in my mind that the act of 1932 rendered inoperative any registration of union labels which did not apply to wares, but I want to make it plain that I do not consider for one moment that it was done for that purpose. Experience has shown us from year to year that unless a bill such as this is adopted it will not be possible to register shop cards.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Are not shop cards symbols of identification rather than forms of advertising?

Mr. ROGERS: I should say they are symbols of identification used for purposes of advertising.

Mr. STEWART: Under the section of the former act which the hon. member for Spadina read it would seem to be quite clear that a union label was attached to goods or wares and as such perhaps might be considered to be a trade mark. However, a shop card is not attached to wares.

Mr. ROGERS: They were registered under the provisions of the previous act.

Mr. STEWART: I do not care about the registration. The hon. member for Spadina was referring to a label attached to wares.

Mr. FACTOR: This act does not make a shop card a trade mark.

Mr. STEWART: It would not be a trade mark. It seems to me that this is new legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: It distinguishes them.

Mr. STEWART: It is not attached to wares and merchandise at all, so it cannot be a trade mark within the definition of trade mark.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot go into the legal niceties of the matter, but from the standpoint of practical administration, it is a fact that the department and the unions concerned have considered, doubtless on sound legal advice, that since 1932 they could not obtain registration of their shop cards.

Mr. BENNETT: As what?

Mr. RINFRET: As such.

Mr. DUNNING: As such. Repeated requests have reached the government to permit some form of registration of shop cards. This bill does not attempt to define a shop card as anything but a shop card.

Mr. BENNETT: As an advertisement.

Mr. DUNNING: It provides the machinery for the registration of what are definitely known as shop cards that will be used for the purposes that shop cards are used for in the general acceptation of the term, for advertising if you like.

Mr. BENNETT: It says advertisement in the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: That is mentioned in the bill. I do not think any harm can be done by passing this bill. It will clear up what those concerned have deemed to be a disadvantage under which they have been labouring since 1932.

Mr. HEAPS: In a sense they may be advertisements, but quite often they are more than that. A union label cannot always be attached to union wares. For instance, you could not attach a union label to a union hair-cut or a union shave.

Mr. STEWART: Hair is not wares.

Mr. HEAPS: When you go into a union barber shop you do so in the expectation of getting a union hair-cut or a union shave, but there have been instances where fake cards have been displayed in shops. People have gone into these shops and have thought they were getting union wares or union services. If this bill is allowed to pass, practices of that kind will be obviated. Under the present legislation there is no way of getting after people who display these fake advertisements or fake union cards. This legislation was asked for, I believe, in the last submission of the Trades and Labor Congress.

Mr. ROGERS: In 1936.

Mr. HEAPS: And in 1937.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, it was repeated in 1937.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think there is much danger in legislation of this kind going on the statute book.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Application for registration.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister give us some assurance that this will not necessitate the appointment of a new official, but that the same registrar will discharge the duties?

Mr. RINFRET: I would say that the duties can well be carried out by the present staff.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Grounds for refusing registration.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister has stated repeatedly that no registration has taken place since 1932. Can he say that no application has been made and refused since then?

Mr. RINFRET: I could not at the moment give a positive answer to that. I know that applications have been made to the department seeking information and otherwise.

Mr. FACTOR: Personally I do not like paragraph (e), which says:

> If, in the opinion of the minister, the registration of the shop card is otherwise on public grounds objectionable.

That leaves it entirely open to the minister—he knows I am not speaking in any personal way—to discriminate between one applicant and another. It does not specify the public grounds on which it might be objectionable, but just says "on public grounds." Now "public grounds" is a very elastic term. As the minister knows, there are at the present time and under present conditions rival unions in almost every municipality, and under this section the minister may grant the application of one union and say that he considers the granting of an application from another union objectionable on public grounds. Will he enlighten me on paragraph (e)?

Mr. BENNETT: Before the minister answers, I was going to draw the attention of the committee to the provisions of the Unfair Competition Act to meet the point the hon. member for Spadina has mentioned. I regard that as being unsound legislation, and I agree with what the hon. member for Spadina has said. In the Unfair Competition Act it is provided:

(1) Upon the refusal of the registrar to grant, wholly or in part, any application authorized by this act to be made to him, the applicant may appeal from such refusal to the Exchequer Court of Canada within sixty days from the date upon which notice of the decision was despatched to him by the registrar or within such further time as the court may allow, either before or after the expiry of the sixty days aforesaid.

(2) Notice of such appeal shall within the time limited as aforesaid be filed with the registrar and with the registrar of the Exchequer Court of Canada and a like notice shall within such time be given by registered mail to such persons as may appear from the register to be the owners of any trade marks which have been referred to by the registrar in the decision complained of.

Then subsection 3 deals with public notice by advertisement of the hearing of the appeal, and subsection 4 with abandonment of the appeal.

I wholly agree with the hon. member for Spadina that it is not fair to the minister himself to be placed in the position where he has to decide that a particular application is unsound on public grounds. There should be the right, as there is with respect to trade marks, of appeal to the exchequer court, and I suggest that an amendment be prepared to give a similar right of appeal in matters that arise under this act, to that given in like matters that arise under the Unfair Competition Act. I do not think the suggestion is an unfair one.

Mr. DUNNING: A case came to my attention last year which would be covered by paragraph (e), if it is allowed to remain; but if it does not remain some form of words would be required other than those suggested by the right hon. leader of the opposition to deal with the matter. It was the case of a union publishing a card which contained material reflecting on another union. I suggest that such an application could not very well be refused by the minister under paragraphs (a), (b), (c), or (d) but could be under (e), as being objectionable on public grounds. I think members of the committee are aware of instances in which that sort of thing has been done. While I sympathize with the removal of this responsibility from the minister—and perhaps the bill may be left in committee for consideration of that point—I think there should be some means of avoiding registration of cards which contain material critical or misrepresentative of another union.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister not the right to refuse in such cases now?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know of its being covered by anything else.

Mr. BENNETT: It is covered by paragraph (e).

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, you would leave that in?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I certainly think that should be there. The Minister of Finance did not follow me.

Mr. DUNNING: The right hon. gentleman was supporting the hon. member for Spadina, who wanted that paragraph left out.

Mr. BENNETT: I say that paragraph (e) should remain, but with the right of appeal, because there are many cases in which it might be very desirable to have it.

Mr. RINFRET: Perhaps we might pass section 5 and agree to let the bill stand in committee to consider that point. An appeal is provided for in another part of the bill dealing with cancellation, and the two might be considered together.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact that part was taken from the Unfair Competition Act, but the sections that give the right of appeal against the minister's exercise of his discretion do not appear here. It might be well to combine the two so that there would be the right of appeal not only in the case of the minister's refusal to grant the application but with respect to cancellation as well.

Mr. RINFRET: I might say that my experience in the administration of other acts makes that suggestion quite welcome.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

On section 11—Certificate to be received as prima facie evidence.

Mr. BENNETT: Would it not be better, Mr. Chairman, to read the headings of the subsections instead of taking the whole section at once? The rules require the sections to be read. No one wishes to put the chairman to that inconvenience, but I think it might be well to call the headings of the subsections.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I have been doing that fairly well throughout.

Section agreed to.

Section 12 agreed to.

Mr. RINFRET: I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. BENNETT: The motion is not debatable, of course, but just before it is put, may I point out that section 12 so grievously contravenes Liberal doctrine that it is hardly thinkable it should be here. It confers upon the executive the power to make rules and regulations and to determine what fees shall be paid. It goes so far as to deal with questions of finance and revenue. I expected to hear the minister who sits for a Vancouver riding raise his voice in humble entreaty against such abuse of executive power.

Mr. DUNNING: The motion is not debatable; we cannot reply.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Progress reported.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT, 1934

SICK MARINERS AND MARINE HOSPITALS—LEVY, COLLECTION AND REMISSION OF SHIP DUES

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of Bill No. 23, to amend part V of the Canada Shipping Act, 1934.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the Chair.

On section 1—Duty on all vessels unless exempted.

Mr. POWER: This section provides a clarification of existing legislation. The clause amended has been rewritten because it gives rise to certain confusion in the minds of the officers who are administering it.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no change, as I understand, in the amount of money to be collected?

Mr. POWER: No.

Mr. BENNETT: It is only a question of clarifying the conditions under which the payments shall be made?

Mr. POWER: Exactly. Perhaps I had better explain paragraph (c). There is less money to be collected; I do not want to lead my right hon. friend into error. Under the former act, under the definition of "vessel," a scow was included, but under this bill a scow which carries no crew will not have to pay sick mariners' fees.

Mr. KINLEY: With regard to clause (b), will the minister explain wherein the amending clause changes the existing law?

Mr. POWER: It really exempts certain ships. Owing to the definition of the word "voyage" which was contained in the old act, a vessel coming to Canada and unloading its cargo at, let us say, Three Rivers, finishing its voyage at that place and then going on to Montreal to take on a new cargo and start a new voyage, would have been obliged to pay dues twice. Now it will be considered that the term "voyage" will cover not only the discharging of the cargo at Three Rivers, but the taking on of a new cargo at Montreal.

Mr. BENNETT: A ship pays once with respect to each arrival in Canada?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. KINLEY: That is all very well with regard to a ship that is on schedule. But if the minister will look at the amendment he will find it imposes this obligation, that the ship "is returning or proceeding immediately to a place out of Canada." The old act reads that "the ship is a ship which came from a place out of Canada and has paid dues on the same voyage in a previous port of call in Canada." Suppose a ship returns to Canada and comes to Halifax. She unloads part of her cargo and goes to Lunenburg. She is not on schedule, but is laid up, looking for cargo; that vessel must pay a second time according to the amendment, although under the old law she would not have to pay.

Mr. POWER: She would not pay a second time unless she started a new voyage. She would not pay again if she went to Lunenburg to lay up.

Mr. KINLEY: I think so. "A ship which came from and is returning or proceeding immediately to a place out of Canada." A ship is not returning to a place out of Canada unless she has a charter party or is on schedule. The example I have suggested is that of a ship which returns to Canada, comes to a home port, and may be laid up in port, and for that reason is obliged to pay dues the second time.

Mr. POWER: I do not think the hon. member's interpretation is correct. If the ship came to Lunenburg and from there proceeded to engage in the coasting trade, mariners' dues would be exacted. That, I believe, has been the custom; perhaps it will be clearer under the present legislation. If a vessel comes from a transatlantic port to Canada, and, finishing its voyage in Canada, discharging its cargo, undertakes to engage in the coasting trade, even though it remains in the same province and goes from Halifax to Lunenburg, Lunenburg to Sydney, etc., it will pay duty three times during the one season. But that is the present custom; there is no change so far as that is concerned. The object of this amendment is to exempt certain vessels from this duty, not to increase its application.

Mr. KINLEY: I am glad to hear the minister's explanation; that is what I am really interested in. But I am bound to say that this underlined portion which states "a ship which came from and is returning or proceeding immediately to a place out of Canada" does, it seems to me, impose a responsibility on the ship of proceeding on another foreign voyage immediately, and if the vessel is out of charter or is not on schedule it seems to me she is obligated to pay dues a second time.

Mr. POWER: Unless the ship was engaged in trading in the second port she would not be obliged to.

Mr. KINLEY: It is all right, if you say that.

Mr. BENNETT: The difficulty of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg is with the word "immediately." The case as put is this. A ship comes from Liverpool to Lunenburg, and if she returns from Lunenburg to Southampton, she has paid dues once and that is the end of it. If, leaving Lunenburg, she goes down to Shelburne and proceeds abroad from there, it is understood she pays dues only once, and this is to protect her against having to pay them twice. I apprehend that the difficulty—and I think there is some force in the point made by the hon. member—is in the word "immediately," because it is said that the ship has now come from Liverpool to Lunenburg and she returns to Southampton, a port out of Canada, or she proceeds "immediately" to a place out of Canada: the proceeding "immediately" to a place out of Canada does make it a little difficult.

Mr. POWER: But no vessels pay duty when they proceed from one port within a province to another port within a province unless they are engaged in the coasting trade.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite. There is no doubt about that. I was thinking of some form of words other than "immediately."

Mr. DUNNING: The following words qualify it.

Mr. STEWART: Supposing the ship to which the leader of the opposition has referred were to be laid up in Halifax for six months and then go out to Southampton, would she have to pay twice?

Mr. DUNNING: No; she has paid duty "since arrival in a previous port of call in Canada."

Mr. KINLEY: Read the previous clause with it.

Mr. DUNNING: The previous section deals entirely with coasting trade.

Mr. POWER: Perhaps I may make it clear if I explain to the committee just what vessels do pay and when they pay.

1. Compulsory payment by vessels from foreign ports entering maritime ports of Canada and ports in Manitoba and Ontario on Hudson and James bay.

2. All vessels engaged in the coasting trade of Canada which ply between maritime provinces.

3. All vessels engaged in the coasting trade of Canada which have made one payment. A vessel must complete the three payments at the next two succeeding ports if it is engaged in the coasting trade.

Of course, all hon. members who have any knowledge of the maritime provinces know that fishing vessels may pay prior to undertaking the first fishing voyage of the calendar year, provided they are registered.

Mr. KINLEY: And get the benefit.

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. KINLEY: If a vessel, coming from outside Canada, calls at Yarmouth, say, for the purpose of discharging cargo or in order to get away from the weather, and then goes to Lunenburg, payment is made at Yarmouth and she is exempt when she goes to Lunenburg. Under the new law, if she goes to Lunenburg and proceeds immediately to a place outside Canada she does not have to pay, but if that condition does not exist she does have to pay.

Mr. DUNNING: The qualifying words follow. She has paid a duty since arrival in a previous port of call.

Mr. KINLEY: Yes, she paid when she came to Yarmouth; but when she goes to Lunenburg the customs officer demands payment again. If the ship is leaving Canada immediately the ship is exempt; otherwise it must pay.

Mr. POWER: No, because she would not be engaged in the coasting trade of Canada. Under subsection 12 of section 2 of the act, the coasting trade of Canada includes carriage by water of goods or passengers from one port or place in Canada to another. In the instance the hon. gentleman has mentioned by way of illustration, the vessel is not carrying goods or passengers from one port or place to another, but is simply calling at a port for the purpose of laying up.

Mr. HEAPS: How much money is collected under the present act?

Mr. POWER: During the calendar year 1936 the following fees were paid: total vessels paying dues, 3,295; total crews, 82,803; total dues collected, $208,449.88; total expenditure, $160,279.66.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of Bill No. 24, to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1929.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 1—Licences.

Mr. MacNICOL: This section refers to production, and I suppose that means of opium or any other narcotic drug or any weed, for instance, which may be grown in Canada. I have heard a rumour that some such weed is being grown in this country and is being used in the form of cigarettes which have a more or less harmful effect. I have been told also that the experimental farm is engaged in some production along that line. I do not know whether it is so, but the minister will no doubt be able to inform us. If a weed of this kind is being grown in Canada there must be some source from which the seeds are obtained and a record of the extent of land under cultivation. Can the minister give us any information as to how much of this weed is being produced and what it is being used for?

Mr. POWER: This particular section refers to the production of any drug; but since the proposed amendments deal to a considerable extent with the attempt which is being made by the department to control what, though it cannot be called a new drug, is a new menace to the youth of the country, perhaps I had better make some observations with respect to the weed that is known as marihuana. This is by no means a new drug; it was known as far back as the days of Homer.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that the reason Homer nodded?

Mr. POWER: No; on the contrary, the effect is not to make people nod; it is exceedingly stimulating. It is probably the reason why there was an attack on Troy.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is its production a new thing in Canada?

Mr. POWER: Perhaps it might be well to give an idea what it is. In the old days it was known as hashish, and it has a dozen different names throughout the East. Our modern word "assassin" comes from the name given to the people who were first known to have used it, the assassins, in the early days of Christianity, and the use of the drug has spread throughout the world, the eastern world particularly. It came to us through the United States from Mexico, where it is known as marihuana. It is known scientifically under the name of cannabis sativa. It grows wild in certain countries, generally speaking in temperate climates. It is used in windbreaks in western Canada, the leaves being the portion which, when made into something resembling tobacco, is extremely dangerous if smoked. It is made into cigarettes that resemble tobacco cigarettes and is peddled around largely to the youth of the country. The United States government has taken an extremely serious view of it, and is now endeavouring by federal legislation to control its cultivation, manufacture and sale.

In these amendments we are asking that the production and also the cultivation be prohibited. My hon. friend asked if there had been any cultivation in Canada. I find there has been no cultivation for commercial purposes, although it is grown at Emerson, Manitoba, and was found on a vacant lot in Calgary. Certain of our European immigrants have been using it for extracting an oil to be used as a substitute for fat. There was a certain area cropped at the central experimental farm in Ottawa, and another area at a substation near Montreal.

Mr. PELLETIER: Will the minister tell us to what extent it has been used in Canada to the knowledge of the department, as an illicit drug?

Mr. POWER: My information is that since 1932 we have had twenty-eight convictions for the possession of this drug. But the importance of endeavouring to control it is that it is about the only habit forming drug which is produced in Canada. In any other case our efforts are confined to keeping the drug out of Canada; but here is something growing right in our own country, and it is extremely difficult to control unless authority is given to the department to control the production and cultivation also.

Mr. PELLETIER: The word "production" necessarily conveys the idea that it is being produced in Canada. I was wondering to what extent.

Mr. POWER: Up to the present time that used in the traffic has. as far as we know, been imported. It usually crosses the border through Windsor. But there is nothing to prevent anybody from going into the business here.

Mr. PELLETIER: This is a sort of preventive measure.

Mr. McCANN: The purpose of the legislation is, I understand. to control the production of this extremely deleterious drug. While control of production may have far-reaching effects and do a great deal of good, I should like to ask the minister whether any attempt is being made or contemplated to eradicate the plant as a weed. It appears to me we shall not achieve the purpose for which this legislation is intended if we control only the production, while at the same time the plant from which the drug is made grows wild as a weed and may be gathered by those who recognize it and make it into tobacco form.

Mr. POWER: Under section 3 of the bill we are taking power to control the cultivation and also the gathering and production. We are endeavouring to find out where it grows. So far we have located it in certain parts of Canada, and I suppose by education we shall try to impress on the people of Canada the evil results from its use. Once we have this authority, whenever we find it we shall be able to prevent the cultivation of it.

Mr. McCANN: Does the bill make provision for a penalty for those having it in their possession?

Mr. POWER: That is already in the act.

Mr. BROOKS: Are there any good purposes to which this weed can be put? I am very much interested in the minister's remarks. I happened to read the other day a report of H. F. Anslinger, United States Commissioner of Narcotics; he calls this drug the assassin of youth, and states that it is one of the greatest menaces which has ever struck that country. It seems to me that very severe penalties should be imposed for the production or sale of this drug. The eradication of it is certainly necessary. If there are no good purposes to which it can be put, I do not see why licences should be granted; rather steps should be taken to eradicate it entirely, because it is something that could undermine the youth of the country.

Mr. POWER: The penalty is fairly severe, seven years' imprisonment and the lash. With respect to uses to which it can be put, I have before me extracts from the evidence given at the sittings of the committee of the house of representatives at Washington. It says:

> Hemp is cultivated for three purposes, (1) for the fibre, out of which rope, twine, cloth and hats are made, (2) for the seed, from which a rapidly drying oil is obtained as a commercial substitute for linseed oil, and (3) for the narcotic contained in the resin of the dried flowering tops of the pistillate plant. The seed is also sold as a constituent of commercial bird seed.
>
> I want to make a distinction between these two, the hemp plant and the plant that provides the fibre for rope making. There is no connection whatever. All our ropes are made from hard fibres and have been ever since the sixties. These fibres are produced only in the tropics, while the hemp plant that produces soft fibre or the marihuana occurs only in temperate climates for fibre production. Marihuana hemp is used for commercial twines, such as bookbinders twine, hatters twine for sewing hats, and it was formerly used for what was called express twine or heavy twine.

Mr. BENNETT: I hoped that the minister would say that he would prohibit the production for commercial purposes, not issue a licence. To issue a licence involves recognition of the production. In view of the very serious situation to which attention has been directed, I think the proper course would be that the minister be authorized to take steps to prohibit production in commercial quantities. I do not think we could contemplate its production at all if it is half as bad as has been stated. I do not believe the situation is very bad yet in this country but certainly the reports indicate that it is very serious in the United States. If that report of the investigation is to be taken as a correct statement, should we not face the problem at once and say that we shall eradicate its production for commercial purposes?

Mr. POWER: There is some difficulty. Since the bill was introduced I have been informed that in certain sections of the country some farmers had gone in for the cultivation of this plant, and in fact, as my right hon. friend knows, during the war the Canadian government at the instance of the British government actually encouraged the growing of hemp, and though I understand it was not successfully grown in this country, whatever was grown was not used in the making of rope or twine. I am informed that far the greater part went into upholstery, and a great deal was wasted. But the fact remains that we have in this country, I am informed, a number of farmers who have gone into the cultivation of this and have bought machinery to gather it, and perhaps some hardship would be caused to them if growing it were prohibited. But it is the intention of the department, unless very strong reason is shown, not to issue any licences.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the minister would say that it was not proposed to issue licences. But with great respect I say that begs the question of the destruction of the plant and the prohibition of its production for commercial purposes.

Mr. BROOKS: How is the United States handling the situation? In the report I have before me I note that in New York state, for instance, 200 acres of growing plants were destroyed by the authorities. In Louisiana the officials made a raid in which 500,000 plants were destroyed. It seems to me that evidently they are trying to eradicate the plant altogether.

Mr. POWER: In the United States they have a provision similar to this one. They found that it was impossible to enforce total prohibition at once, but they are administering by means of licences. I may say the bill came into force only on October 1, 1937. The latest reports I have from the United States are to the effect that total seizures of marihuana in that country during 1937 amounted to 98,000 pounds of growing plants and 667 pounds of bulk marihuana. This was taken from 1,909 acres. Between October 1, 1937, when the United States federal law came into effect, and December 31 of that year, seizures by federal officials involved 1,000 pounds of growing plants and 452 pounds of bulk marihuana.

Mr. BENNETT: Of growing plants?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: A thousand pounds?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: It must have been a hundred tons.

Mr. BENNETT: No; there are only forty-nine tons altogether.

Mr. POWER: That is in the three months since October 1.

Mr. BENNETT: The plants are being seized?

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. POWER: Yes, they are seizing the plants.

Mr. BENNETT: We could not seize them.

Mr. POWER: But we will, under the section.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the same drug extracted from hemp? It seems to me that the experimental farm officials have announced that that is so.

Mr. POWER: The experimental farm has been growing the plant for the stalk. The stalk is innocuous, but the flowering tops and the leaves are dangerous. In that state they sell for as much as $20 per pound. I have no doubt it would be possible to control cultivation, even under another government.

Mr. MacNICOL: But is not this weed or drug extracted from hemp?

Mr. POWER: The plant itself is known as hemp. As I understand it, the process is not complicated. The leaves are simply chopped and made into a kind of tobacco, which is dried. That is all there is to it, unless there is some process of extraction, with which I am not familiar, to make it still stronger. But it can be used as a habit forming drug by simply drying and powdering the leaves.

Mr. MacNICOL: What does the experimental farm do with the leaves it produces?

Mr. POWER: This year they were left on the ground and ploughed in. The marihuana menace has been drawn to the attention of the people in Canada and the United States only within the last three or four years, so that I would not be at all surprised if large numbers of people were unwittingly growing the plant —and in that I would include perhaps some government departments.

Mr. McIVOR: Is it the purpose of the government not only to curtail but to eradicate altogether the production of the drug? I am convinced that anything which can be misused to break down our manhood should be investigated. The farmer producing the plant should be compensated, and the plant eliminated.

Mr. POWER: I can give the committee the undertaking that no licence will be issued until we have a complete survey of the localities in which the plant is grown, and to what use it would be put. Our hope is that within a short time it will be possible absolutely to prohibit cultivation and production, as well as sale and manufacture.

Mr. MASSEY: What steps have been taken in the United States to eradicate the plant as a weed?

Mr. POWER: The United States have passed a bill, in somewhat similar terms, which came into effect on October 1, 1937.

Mr. MASSEY: What practical steps have been taken?

Mr. POWER: Within the last two or three months, and during the course of 1937, certain seizures in plant and bulk form have been made.

Mr. MASSEY: Probably I have not made myself clear. Apparently the plant grows as a weed. The minister has told us that it was found in a vacant lot in Calgary, and in other parts of western Canada. What steps have been taken by the government to locate it, where it is grown innocently? Have the United States government taken steps to locate where it is grown in that way?

Mr. POWER: I am informed that on account of the difficulty of running this thing down in the United States, that has not been done completely. The act has been in force only since last October. They have not yet reached the point where they can say just where the plant is grown, in what quantities it is grown or how they are going to proceed to eradicate it. I may add, however, that I believe over forty states of the union have passed legislation with respect to marihuana. It was found advisable, nevertheless, to have some measure of federal control.

Mr. McCANN: Because the weed is not generally known or recognized, and because its use is so harmful, I would suggest that the government, through its publicity branch and educational features, should bring to the attention of the people of Canada the fact that the weed has far-reaching, poisonous and demoralizing effects. I believe along that line something could be done which would be of greater value than any attempt to stop production.

While I am in favour of stopping production and the use of the weed as a drug, or in the form of cigarettes, before too many lives are endangered, before the morals of the people are contaminated and before the drug comes into general use, however unwittingly on the part of the public, I say the department might well take into consideration the issuance of educational circulars dealing with its deleterious effects.

Mr. POWER: I should be glad to take that into consideration. The only thing which prevents me from saying at once that we shall proceed with an educational campaign is the fear that it might advertise the use of the drug. If it is at all possible to proceed educationally without, at the same time, telling the people where they can get it and how they can use it, I should be very glad to follow the hon. member's suggestion.

Mr. McNEVIN: It seems to me that the harships endured by any farmers who may have equipped themselves to produce this plant are of very slight importance as compared with the evil effects that the continuance of the growing of the plant would have. The results of the use of it have been proved to be serious. Many municipalities are equipped with inexpensive spraying equipment which could be used in the eradication of the plant wherever it is found growing as a weed. I suggest that the department consult with the municipalities regarding the spraying of this weed wherever it is found.

Mr. POWER: I am informed that we are pretty well ahead of the problem in Canada. In the United States the problem overtook them before they were ready, in that the use of this drug grew up with amazing rapidity So far in Canada we have not had that to contend with. Our trouble at the present time is the imported drug. So far as we know there has been no use for drug addiction purposes of any of the plants grown in Canada. I think I can give assurance that there is no intention to issue licences; but before we take any drastic steps I think we should know just where the plant is being cultivated, the extent of its cultivation and whether any interest will be injuriously affected by an immediate prohibition. It may be that someone, unknowingly and without malice, has invested a fairly substantial amount of money in preparing for the cultivation of this plant. If so, he will be advised that we shall not permit this cultivation. I think that is all we can do for the moment.

Mr. HAYHURST: In many parts of western Canada this weed is grown as a windbreak around the gardens, but most of the English speaking people do not realize to what grave uses it could be put. If this matter is advertised they will realize to what uses people put this plant. I think it would be wiser for the government to cooperate with the municipalities and the provinces in eradication work. You can go for 800 miles or so through the west and in probably every other garden you will find this weed. I do not think its use should be advertised. The government should work in secret with the provinces and the municipalities to eradicate this weed. As I say, it is used as a windbreak and in some cases as tobacco.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2, 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Burden of proof.

Mr. PELLETIER: At first glance this section would seem to be unfair. The minister has stated that this marihuana grows wild as a weed in many places, but I notice that the section reads:

> Without limiting the generality of paragraph (d) of section four of this act, any person who occupies, controls, or is in possession of any building, room, vessel, vehicle, enclosure or place, in or upon which any drug or article mentioned in section 11 is found, shall, if charged with having such drug or article in possession without lawful authority, be deemed to have been so in possession unless he prove that the drug or article was there without his authority, knowledge or consent, or that he was lawfully entitled to the possession thereof.

It is quite possible that an individual might not know that this weed was growing wild on his land and under this section he might be put to an expense which he should not have to incur. I think the minister will agree with me that it might not be the fault of an individual if a weed was growing wild on his land.

Mr. POWER: Section 17 does not refer only to marihuana; it refers to all drugs. There is a section in the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act which places the burden of proof that he is not unlawfully in possession upon the person who has the drug. The only purpose of the amendment is to add the words "or article mentioned in section eleven." That would refer to articles such as opium pipes, utensils for cooking opium or things of that kind. It has no direct reference to marihuana; and even if this amended section did not pass, the act with respect to other drugs would remain the same.

Mr. PELLETIER: It would have no particular reference to a weed growing on a person's land?

Mr. POWER: No.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Subsection 5 states that a person charged with having such drug or article in his possession without lawful authority, shall "be deemed to have been so in possession unless he prove that the drug or article was there without his authority, knowledge or consent, or that he was lawfully entitled to the possession thereof." I submit that the narcotic drug control exercised by the government in past years has fallen far short of what it should be. Reference has been made to marihuana, but we should not forget that this act covers all narcotic drugs. Wholesale drug houses throughout Canada are permitted to keep large stocks of opium and other narcotic drugs on hand, and I should like to know what control is exercised by the government over these supplies. I could take up considerable time in discussing this question, but I shall not. A word to the wise should be sufficient. Mention has been made of the great number of motor accidents these days, and when one's attention is called to this one invariably thinks of the narcotic addicts who might be at the steering wheels of motor cars. These wholesale drug houses have branches in many of the provinces, and quite often the branches are in charge of people who have not the pharmaceutical knowledge to see that the drugs in their care are distributed in the proper manner. These branches may have in their custody just as large supplies of these drugs as the head office may desire them to have. There does not seem to be any supervision by the government in this connection.

One could not help being struck by the words of the Prime Minister of Great Britain when, speaking with reference to the resignation of Mr. Anthony Eden, he referred to the sham of the League of Nations at Geneva. The very same thing has been evidenced here year after year. I mentioned it the year before last, and to-day it is more apparent than ever. We have been sending men from the narcotic drugs branch over to Geneva on joy rides, at the expense of the Canadian people, and what ever came of it? Was codeine banned? They discussed it for years at Geneva, and yet to-day codeine is sold in Canada holus-bolus over the counter to every man, woman or child who wants to purchase it. The purchasers take it, get in their cars and drive over the highways, and lives are lost. Codeine has never been counted as a narcotic by Canada, but it was banned as a narcotic by the United States government unhesitatingly, without regard to the League of Nations. Yet Canada cannot see her way to stopping the sale of codeine to our people. This act contemplates putting it under control; I am well aware of that; but if there is no more control than there has been in the past of codeine and other narcotic drugs, if there is no better administration of the act, we are wasting our time here and deluding the people of the country into the belief that we are protecting them from the effects of narcotics.

Mr. POWER: With respect to the observations of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Hartigan), the importation of narcotics generally—and the question really resolves itself into a question of importation—is perhaps more rigidly controlled than he would seem to indicate. No one can bring into this country any such drug as opium or morphine or heroin without first obtaining a licence. Then the drug has to be brought in through the customs ports, where all drug importations are carefully checked. Then it goes to the wholesalers, whose supplies are constantly checked by the inspectors of the department. The wholesalers, if they open a branch, must obtain a licence also for the branch. When the drug goes from the wholesaler or distributor or branch into individual drug stores or into the hands of private practitioners, a register must be kept and a check is made even of the supplies which have been delivered to the physician, and if it is found that there has been an excessive or abnormal delivery to any physician the department gets into touch with him and endeavours to ascertain just why this abnormal condition exists.

With respect to codeine, my hon. friend has on a number of occasions drawn to my attention his views regarding this drug. The League of Nations, at their meetings, have decided that codeine is not the kind of drug which must be subjected within the country where it is sold to the same restrictions as some other drugs; but internationally it is subject to some control of movement between countries. Within our own country we have arrived at this arrangement: In four provinces codeine is subject to the same or somewhat similar regulation as other drugs, under provincial legislation; and in all the provinces, by arrangement between the federal government and the pharmaceutical associations with the assistance of the narcotic drug wholesalers, we have put into effect a plan which limits drug store purchases to actual medical needs. A maximum purchase of one ounce monthly was put into effect in 1935.

Mr. YOUNG: May I ask which are the four provinces?

Mr. POWER: British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Does the minister mean one ounce monthly per patient or per drug store?

Mr. POWER: Per drug store.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Does the department consider that that arrangement has been kept by the wholesalers in their deliveries of codeine? You will find more than an ounce of codeine in a bottle of 222's or in any other form of codeine tablets. There is an eighth of a grain of codeine in each tablet.

Mr. POWER: My information is that under this voluntary arrangement the drug stores are not able to get more than one ounce monthly, and of course their sales are registered, so they cannot sell more than the one ounce.

Mr. YOUNG: I think that the handling of the narcotic drug trade in Canada is very well done. Speaking from personal observation I have always considered that the officials were doing good work, but I am inclined to agree that codeine is not handled in Canada as it should be. It should not be allowed to enter or to be sold in this country. The minister has just told me that Saskatchewan is one of the four provinces which have certain regulations regarding the sale of codeine. I know for a fact that you can purchase 222's, containing codeine, the drug mentioned by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Hartigan), without any restrictions whatever on the sale. I am firmly convinced, in spite of what many men who should know a good deal about it say, that codeine is a habit forming drug; I am satisfied of that. If that is true, I am equally satisfied that something more should be done in Canada than has been done to prevent any habit forming drug from being distributed in the way codeine is allowed to be at present.

Mr. BLAIR: I should like to congratulate the minister on this bill. I think it is very necessary for us to curtail the sale of codeine. It is possible that orientals bootleg this stuff into Canada more than we realize. In regard to hemp, I believe they are in the habit of using the leaves of the hemp on the sly, and it is very much to the advantage of this country that we should have an act such as this in force. I believe that a good many accidents on the highway, more than we would think from the reports, are due to liquor. In the old country they report that fifty per cent of their highway accidents are due to liquor. Personally I believe that many of our highway accidents are due to people smoking cigarettes with dope in them. After the driver has smoked a few he becomes addicted to them, and soon he is not watching his car as he should be doing. I think it will mean much to have this act in force.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Additions to schedule.

Mr. BENNETT: This section is one giving very wide powers to the governor in council. It authorizes the transfer of preparations from one category to another at the instance of the government, which in times past would have been regarded by the minister as so terrible a thing to do as almost to invite an earthquake. It seems to me an extensive grant of power to one man.

Mr. POWER: I am inclined to agree with my right hon. friend, but the situation which arises would be this. Let us suppose that at the League of Nations meeting at Geneva it is decided that codeine should be in a certain category; in order to enable the minister to carry out the arrangements at Geneva a whole year must elapse. The purpose of the amendment is really to cover that situation.

Mr. BENNETT: So far as that phase of the matter is concerned I think that is desirable, but there should be added to it that it be published in the Canada Gazette immediately thereafter. It might be put in three or four years afterwards.

Mr. POWER: The amendment provides that "every order in council made in that behalf shall be published in the Canada Gazette"—

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I see that, but it does not say when.

Mr. POWER: —"and shall take effect at the expiration of thirty days from the date of such publication." It will not be in effect until thirty days after it is published.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite. But the order in council might be passed and publication might not take place for two or three months.

Mr. POWER: But it would not be of any use to the minister or administration—

Mr. BENNETT: I agree with that, but it is desirable it should be. That is the point I was making. If it is desirable to pass it at all, it should become effective without delay. Perhaps Mr. O'Connor will deal with that.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Application of certain sections of the act.

Mr. HARTIGAN: In regard to this section there is a point that the department would be well advised to bear in mind, and that is with regard to the present administrators of the act. While the wording is all right and the intention of the government is no doubt good, it can be readily understood that difficulty arises when it is left to a body of mounted policemen to go into the drug stores and check the receipts and outgoings of any narcotic. You cannot take haphazard a body of that kind and entrust it with such work. I have seen some of these men go into a drug store and try to check it over; I am not casting any reflection on the mounted police as a body or, as far as that goes, on any particular individual in it, but I say that they are not the right body to be entrusted with the checking of sales of drugs in the drug stores of the dominion. It is almost like a bull in a china cabinet; it is just antagonizing the people who are in the drug business, because it leaves the impression that they may be guilty of some offence. If any customer happens to be in the store when the officer comes in, the first thought in that customer's mind will be, "This drug store must be in bad repute with the department when they have to send a policeman down here and take the manager into an inside office to check over his books and accounts." That has happened on more than one occasion. On other occasions the findings on the check-up have been far different from those reported to the heads of the department at Ottawa; of this I have very definite proof, and I am prepared to put it forward at any time it is requested. The check-up system in respect of narcotics should be changed.

Mr. KINLEY: In my opinion, as one who has had some experience in the drug business, the sale of narcotic drugs is very carefully supervised by the department. In order to buy a narcotic the druggist must send an order certifying the amount; that amount is supplied to the store upon that order; if the druggist has two or three stores he may not transfer narcotics from one to the other; each store must stand on its own order in that regard. The druggist must keep a register, and in it he must keep the amount balanced as between his sales and his purchases; a mounted police officer comes in, usually once a month, and checks that record. I do not know of any more efficient control or any better type of inspector that could be obtained within the community for the purpose of the inspection of these books than the mounted police officer. He does it well; he does it without offence, and he does it with a certain prestige behind him which is derived from the organization he represents. I realize that the sale of narcotics is a serious matter, but they may be sold only upon the prescription of a doctor. It seems to me that, at least in the part of the country from which I come, there is no great trouble with regard to the act; it is not being violated, and everybody is trying to observe it in the best way possible.

Section agreed to.

Sections 8 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: May I suggest to the minister that it might be desirable to consider whether this act should come into force at a date to be named? If it were to come into force at once upon receiving the royal assent, it might cause some difficulties with respect to those who are not informed as to its terms; I refer to the early part of the act. Would it not be desirable that it shall come into force by proclamation or upon a date to be fixed? I recall that in 1932 when we were passing a certain act we thought it desirable to do this, for the reasons I have indicated. I do not know whether they apply with equal force to this measure; but it occurred to me that they might, having regard to some of the provisions we have dealt with this afternoon.

Mr. POWER: In 1932, as I am informed, the reason the difficulty arose was that there was an international convention—

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. POWER: —and the endeavour was to bring the act into effect at the same time as the convention. As a matter of fact there is a convention covering quite a number of the amendments submitted, and so far it has not been ratified by the house.

Mr. BENNETT: The fact that the bill has been introduced led me to assume that that was not necessary, because I recall vividly that many of the matters we have dealt with were discussed at the international convention at Geneva. I think it well to say that most Canadians are proud of the part taken at these international conventions by Colonel Sharman, who is here this afternoon; he has made a real contribution to the work of the conventions; I think that is admitted by all who have had to do with them.

I should like to identify myself with what has been said by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) as to the method of enforcement of the act. What that hon. member has said is wholly in accordance with what I have observed, at any rate in western Canada, that the police usually go in after hours or at a time convenient to the druggist, look at the ledger and take particulars of the sales he has made to make sure that they balance with the receipts of narcotics during the previous month. Some druggists complain that it is difficult to get supplies, because of the severity with which the audit is carried on.

Mr. POWER: I shall be glad to accept the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman and allow this bill to stand in order to consider adding such a clause.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister can look into the matter. I do not know that it is necessary.

Mr. POWER: I do not know whether it is necessary or not.

Mr. BENNETT: The reason it may be necessary is that the house has not yet ratified certain conventions upon which uniform action was predicated by various countries of the world.

Mr. POWER: But there is no urgency as to that.

Mr. HAYHURST: I should like to call the minister's attention to section 9, although it has been passed. I was wondering why the words "except the seed" were put in. In western Canada poppy seeds are used to a considerable extent, being ground up and used in bread by eastern Europeans. In my opinion the control of the poppy should be brought to the attention of the minister particularly at this time, because the use of it in the way I have described is harmful to young and growing people. The older people use it in bread, for what purpose I do not know.

Mr. POWER: My hon. friend will note that the seed is excepted from the terms of the act and he will also observe that we describe a certain kind of poppy.

Mr. BENNETT: We do not grow the opium poppy in Canada.

Mr. POWER: I think we do, in some of the western states.

Mr. BENNETT: Not western "states" yet.

Mr. POWER: It is grown in British Columbia. I am informed that the oriental population grow it for the sake of a sort of narcotic beverage which is obtained by boiling down the heads. They get a kind of tea which has certain narcotic qualities.

Progress reported.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO STATUTORY GRADES OF WESTERN GRAIN

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 27, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

He said: While it is my intention to request that the bill be referred to the committee on agriculture after it has received the second reading, perhaps I might make a few comments upon what is proposed in it.

Briefly, it provides for the exclusion of garnet wheat from grades 3 and 4 Manitoba northern. As hon. members know, it is already excluded from the higher grade. The bill also provides for the establishing of three grades of garnet; we shall have three grades of garnet. It provides further that there shall be no mixing in grades 1 and 2 of garnet wheat, and that anything which does not qualify for the three grades of garnet shall be put into the commercial grades of red spring wheat. One other provision is that in these garnet grades 1 and 2 any overages exceeding one-quarter of one per cent shall belong to the crown.

That, briefly, is all that is contained in the bill. I do not know whether the house would care to discuss the matter now, but it seemed to me that inasmuch as there are very many members who have no particular interest in wheat, it would be well to refer the bill to the standing committee on agriculture.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I submit that this bill should not be introduced until after the Turgeon report is presented.

Mr. EULER: It was introduced yesterday.

Mr. BENNETT: But it should not be proceeded with until after that report is presented. If that report is of the importance indicated; if it deals with garnet wheat as it is said it does, surely the house is entitled to the benefit of that knowledge before it gives second reading to the bill.

Mr. EULER: I might say in reply to my right hon. friend something which perhaps will satisfy him. Before the bill was introduced; before it was framed—and it was framed by the board of grain commissioners with the support of most of the interested parties—I took advantage of an opportunity to discuss it with the commissioner, Judge Turgeon.

Mr. BENNETT: That makes it just that much worse.

Mr. EULER: I was afraid it would not satisfy my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: But the hon. gentleman must realize that not only is an ex parte conversation with a commissioner bad, but to come into the house and say that he has had that conversation, and based legislation upon it, is worse still.

Mr. EULER: I did not even tell my right hon. friend what the result of my conversation was.

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. BENNETT: You did not have to, because you should not be talking to him at all about it.

Mr. EULER: I shall have to take issue with my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: You can take issue.

Mr. EULER: However, the matter stands just as I have stated it. If the house does not choose to give the bill its second reading, that is, of course, the privilege of the house. I think that the public interest would be properly served if the bill were given second reading and then referred to the committee on agriculture, where all those in favour of or opposed to it can make representations and arrive at some decision which will be acceptable to the house.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): From what the minister has said, I am in agreement with the principle of the bill as he has outlined it, and it may be all right for it to go to the committee. As regards what the Turgeon commission may report, that is another matter altogether. I wonder whether it would be out of order for me to ask the minister at this stage when we may expect the report from the Turgeon commission. Shall we get it during the present session, and if so, how soon?

Mr. EULER: Possibly I should mention another matter, one of the reasons why the bill is introduced now. It is important, I believe, that the grain growers of western Canada should have knowledge as to what it is proposed to do with garnet. It may affect their seeding of garnet wheat. The complete report of Judge Turgeon will be presented before the session is over, though I am not in a position at the moment to say how soon. I do not think the report will be unduly delayed, but before it is received it is well that the grain growers of western Canada should know exactly what we propose to do with respect to garnet, and that is a reason why this bill precedes the general amending of the grain act which will follow after the Turgeon report is received. That, I believe, is a sufficient reason why the house should enact the present amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: Before we see the report.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Marine service—administration of floating equipment, $28,835.

Hon. C. D. HOWE: Minister of Transport): When this item was last discussed, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) asked me to give a statement of the boats under the jurisdiction of this department. The department is responsible for refitting and repairs of all floating equipment operated by the Department of Transport, namely, the marine service steamers, including ice-breakers, lightships, River St. Lawrence ship channel fleet, pilotage service vessels, canal service vessels and national harbour board vessels. That is, it has jurisdiction as to maintenance and repairs, supervision of design and construction of new equipment, and also, under the direction of the director of marine services, is responsible for the operation of marine service steamers and ice-breakers engaged in ice-breaking and ice patrol service in the river and gulf of St. Lawrence, Hudson bay and strait, and the maintenance of aids to navigation and distribution of supplies to lighthouses and materials for the construction of lights, fog alarms, breakwaters and other services. In other words, it has charge of the maintenance and repair of all our fleet and operation of four ice-breakers and twenty service vessels, two derrick scows, two barges, one scow and two motor launches in the marine service, and the aids to navigation, serves ten lightships. The statement follows:

Department of Transport
Statement of Floating Equipment

Aids to Navigation Service—10 Lightships

St. Lawrence Ship Channel—

5	Inspection and survey vessels
2	Stone lifters
1	Winch scow
3	Sounding scows
1	Boring scow
2	Barrel floats
2	Catamarans
4	Motor launches
20

Pilotage Service—2 Pilot service boats

Canals Service—

5	Dredges
13	Tugs
1	Inspection and service boat
10	Gate lifters
1	Drill boat
1	Stone crusher
13	Derrick scows
7	Motor launches
69	Scows of various types
120

National Harbours Board—

1	Dredge
5	Tugs
1	Fire tug
1	Drilling and blasting boat
2	Floating cranes
1	Floating pile driver
4	Floating derricks
1	Steam derrick scow
2	Motor launches
2	Work boats (motor)
1	Diving scow tender
30	Scows of various types
51

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister say whether this equipment has been increased since the administration of the harbours has been placed under the Department of Transport, whether any equipment has been sold, or the quantity increased, and whether the amount of equipment and number of vessels used now are greater or less than when the administration was taken over from the commissions?

Mr. HOWE: As far as the harbour commissions are concerned, the equipment is less. The principal change is in Montreal harbour, where we had quite a number of units that had been more or less laid up for several years. We had two small tugs there, used intermittently, but a number of units at Montreal harbour were sold when the St. Lawrence dredging fleet was sold. In addition we have sold two small buoy service vessels and one old icebreaker on the St. Lawrence. We refitted one of the coal barges to do buoy work on the Pacific and one on the Pacific coast has been sold. We are reducing our fleet and trying to operate the service with fewer boats and with more efficient equipment.

Mr. STEWART: My next question is, Which ones have been sold, how sold, whether by tender or how, and who were the purchasers?

Mr. HOWE: The Mikula, an ice-breaker, the Loos, which was a service boat, the Gulnare, which is a service boat, and the Newington, a buoy service boat working out of Prince Rupert, were sold through the salvage board. The remainder, that is the dredging fleet on the St. Lawrence and the surplus equipment in Montreal harbour, were sold in one lot by negotiated agreement.

Mr. STEWART: Sold through the salvage commission, or is it just one officer, the salvage officer?

Mr. HOWE: We call it the salvage board. There was a salvage officer who died a few months ago, but I think Mr. Watson Sellar, Comptroller of the Treasury, is really the officer of the government who represents the salvage board.

Mr. STEWART: Can the minister give particulars as to proceeds of the sales of these vessels, and who were the purchasers?

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend does not object, we might discuss this when we discuss the fleets from which these were sold. I can have the particulars here at eight o'clock.

Mr. STEWART: All right.

Mr. BAKER: The minister says that the floating equipment is much less than it was, but I notice that the administration cost is higher.

Mr. HOWE: This item for administration is a new item in the estimates. The amount it is being compared with is the amount paid to these people when assigned to different duties. That was in two different votes last year. We have reorganized the method of operating our floating equipment, brought some of it directly under this branch, which is a new branch. The man in charge of this branch was formerly the superintendent of the Sorel shipyard. We placed the operation, maintenance and repairs of all our fleet under this man and transferred certain staff from other services to assist him. But this branch is a new branch, so the comparison is not very accurate as far as this particular vote goes.

Mr. BENNETT: Where does he make his headquarters?

Mr. HOWE: At Montreal, spending two days each week at Ottawa.

Mr. PELLETIER: Under what item does the minister propose to discuss the disposal of the St. Lawrence dredging fleet and things of that kind?

Mr. HOWE: That would come under item No. 405, but I have no objection to discussing it under this item if the hon. member wishes.

Mr. PELLETIER: If we have an opportunity of discussing it under No. 405, I am quite satisfied.

Mr. NEILL: The other day I had a question on the order paper, which was answered, but I should like to get some further information. Apparently the government lighthouse tender named the Alberni is a new boat built at Collingwood. I may be wrong in saying it is a new boat, but I understood it was. It was brought to the Pacific coast in January last. It has been in drydock since then, at a cost of $5,458. Does that not seem rather extensive repairs to so new a boat? What is its history?

Mr. HOWE: The Alberni was not a new boat; it was a coal barge, repaired at Sorel for that service. It was surplus equipment on the St. Lawrence, a good hull, the type of boat required for that service and the equipment more or less suitable, so it was sent around to the Pacific. I think we spent some $60,000 fitting it up to replace the Newington, which, as my hon. friend knows, was too old to be of further service. Repairs were getting out of hand. I think the Alberni is a satisfactory boat, but unfortunately it was not overhauled after arrival. Its speed was handicapped by a coat of barnacles; we should have docked it sooner. It was in drydock recently for the first time, having been in service some fifteen months.

Mr. BENNETT: The Collingwood boat went on hydrographic survey, I think?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. NEILL: I asked the speed and the consumption of coal. I was told that the speed was between six and a half and seven and a half knots an hour and the coal consumption thirteen and a half tons for twenty-four hours. That is not thirteen and a half tons per hour, is it?

Mr. HOWE: No, for twenty-four hours.

Mr. NEILL: A rather low fuel consumption. What is the size of the boat?

Mr. HOWE: About 150 feet. The slow speed helps the fuel consumption, of course. We are putting new propellers on it this spring, which will bring the speed up to about eight and a half knots, which we think is enough.

Mr. BAKER: How much did the minister say was spent on repairs at Sorel on a 130 foot boat ?

Mr. HOWE: The amount was $60,000; we had to put in buoy-lifting equipment and fit it for the particular service for which it is used. It has charge of the servicing of buoys and aids to navigation on the northern part of the British Columbia coast.

Mr. BAKER: It seems rather a large amount for a 130 foot boat.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HOWE: I should like to place on record a reply to the question asked me about the sales of the Mikula, the Newington, the Loos and the Gulnare. I have a report signed by J. C. Kelly acting salvage officer, which states that the Mikula was sold by tender for $50,000, the Newington was sold by tender for $4,800, and the Loos and the Gulnare were sold to the Manseau Shipyards Limited for $6,000 by negotiation.

Item agreed to.

Nautical services—nautical service administration, $24,775.

Item agreed to.

Air service — Air service administration, $10,665.

Mr. HOWE: In fairness to the hon. member for Leeds, who has just taken his seat, may I say that a vote was passed before he arrived in the chamber. We would be pleased to reopen it, if he wishes.

Mr. STEWART: What number is the vote?

Mr. HOWE: Votes Nos. 403 and 404. I have put the information on record.

Mr. STEWART: Very well. Would the minister give the particulars with respect to vote No. 385, which we are now considering.

Mr. HOWE: This item covers expenditures of the office of the chief of air services. It is a small vote, providing for the salary of the chief of air services; his clerk, grade 4; a stenographer and office boy. There is an increase of $491, made up of $446 by way of restoration of salary deduction, and $45 through an increase in the salary of the office boy.

Mr. STEWART: Is this a new branch?

Mr. HOWE: No. It was a branch established at the time of the departmental reorganization. There are three branches, namely, civil aviation, radio telegraph and meteorological services. These are grouped together under the officer known as the chief of air services. This particular vote is a break-down of the items of last year, the expenditure by the chief of air services being shown as a separate item.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Can the minister explain the duties of this official?

Mr. HOWE: He has charge of everything connected with radio telegraph. He has the administration of the Radiotelegraph Act, the ship-to-shore radiotelegraph communication, everything connected with aviation and the meteorological service. This latter function includes the preparation of weather reports, and the meteorological service for the Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—Control of civil aviation including the administration of the Aeronautics Act and regulations issued thereunder, $317,500.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give the committee information with regard to the feeder services to the Trans-Canada service. I had the pleasure of taking some part in the opening of the airport last summer at Oliver which, as the minister knows, is an admirably developed airport. It is the point on the Trans-Canada service where it crosses the Okanagan valley which runs north from the centre of the state of Washington, up to the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway. What possibility is there in the near future of developing a feeder service in that valley. There are several other localities in southern British Columbia which require facilities for moving freight, passengers and perhaps mail.

Mr. HOWE: The Trans-Canada Air Lines are confining themselves to through services, from Vancouver to the maritime provinces, the only deviation from that being the line from Lethbridge to Edmonton, the capital city of Alberta, and such international services as may later be decided upon as a logical part of that operation.

It is intended that the feeder services will be left to private enterprise, under arrangement with the Post Office Department. The post office requirement will largely determine the number of feeder services to be inaugurated. At this time tenders are being called for a service connecting the principal cities in Saskatchewan with the Trans-Canada at Regina. I am sure that later on other services will be developed westerly from that point. Of course the Post Office Department's requirements are something outside the province of the Department of Transport, and I should have to take the matter up with the Post Office Department before I could answer the hon. member with respect to the possibility of a route in the Okanagan valley. I believe I can say that it is the intention to extend as rapidly as possible aviation to the principal centres in Canada, wherever postal traffic will warrant.

Mr. MARTIN: The minister was good enough this summer to visit Windsor. His assurances in connection with the place the city of Windsor would occupy in the province of aerial navigation in Canada were indeed encouraging. I am wondering if he would care to make a statement with regard to the position of Windsor, not as a point on the main line, but largely because of its accessibility to the United States in a direct line from Toronto to Windsor and Chicago.

Mr. HOWE: It is rather early to speak definitely about the route from Toronto, west. It is the intention, of course, to establish a connection west from Toronto with either Chicago or Detroit. So far as I know, the department has plans for Windsor, but unfortunately we have not had very much co-operation from that city. We look for some help from the cities by way of furnishing air fields. At this time the whole situation in so far as Windsor is concerned is a little indefinite. We hope to make some progress this year in that particular direction.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What plans has the department in mind for Calgary?

Mr. HOWE: The situation in Calgary is still being explored. The field previously used is not adequate for high speed equipment. It can be used in favourable weather. We hope to obtain a better field there shortly. We are prepared to cooperate with the city, but unfortunately the city is not in a position at this time to cooperate with us. So there again it is a little premature to say what eventually the solution of the Calgary situation will be. It is one of two or three spots in Canada the plans for which have not yet been completely worked out.

Mr. BROOKS: What is the situation with reference to the extension of service to the maritime provinces? What will be the terminus there and what feeder lines are contemplated?

Mr. HOWE: The situation in the maritime provinces has not been worked out in detail. As the hon. member knows, the route has been developed from the westerly end and we have completed it as far east as Winnipeg. By the middle of this summer we hope to have it completed to Montreal and Toronto, and we are going to press on to the maritime provinces as soon as the weather permits this spring. The situation in eastern Canada will also be developed, but it will take the remainder of this year to work things out in the maritime provinces. Until they are worked out, it is difficult to speak definitely.

Mr. BROOKS: What will be the main centre in the maritime provinces?

Mr. HOWE: At the present time we are exploring the possibilities at Moncton, but no decision has been arrived at in the matter. We are considering the establishment of a terminus at Moncton with feeder services to other maritime cities.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the present position of the airport on Toronto island, and what means are being provided for the rapid transport of passengers to the airport? The minister will remember that the previous government planned to build a tunnel under the western gap, but after a lot of money had been spent the present government decided to discontinue this work. I believe a lot of the lumber that was there was shipped up to the Muncey Indian reserve, thus wasting a good deal of money.

Mr. HOWE: We may have wasted a lot of money, but I think we saved a lot at the same time in connection with that tunnel. The present plan is to use a chain ferry. I understand the distance to the mainland is only 300 yards, and it is expected that the elapsed time for a trip will not be more than five minutes.

Mr. MARTIN: May I come back to the question I asked the minister with reference to Windsor? The minister may not be able to answer my question now, but when the minister said that the city of Windsor had not cooperated fully with the department I believe he had something else in mind. I should like to state that interested parties in that city are now negotiating in connection with a proposed site for an airport. The negotiations so far have been very satisfactory as far as the department is concerned, but the matter has not reached the stage where the city could be expected to commit itself one way or another. I can assure the minister that the city of Windsor and the other agencies involved are interested and are cooperating to the full.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister did not answer my question with regard to the airport to take care of the Toronto situation.

Mr. HOWE: Our cooperation was asked in the development of two airports, one at Malton and the other on the island. Our surveys disclosed that the Malton field had possibilities of being developed into perhaps the finest airport on the north American continent; it is almost ideal for all weather conditions. The island airport is unexcelled because of its accessibility to the business district, but it does not comply with the standard specifications in being too close to the high buildings along the water front. Our department has ascertained that for about eighty-five per cent of the time the island airport will be quite suitable, and when weather conditions do not permit its use—this is when first-class facilities are needed—the Malton field will be available.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the Malton airport be affected by fog?

Mr. HOWE: Not so far as our observations indicate.

Mr. MASSEY: Are we discussing item No. 386 or Item No. 387?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Item No. 386.

Mr. MASSEY: Are we not out of order in discussing airports under this item?

Mr. HOWE: Probably we are.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The city of Calgary has spent considerable money on an airport and responsible officials of the city have indicated that they are prepared to cooperate. The minister has said that the city has failed to cooperate up to date.

Mr. HOWE: No, I did not.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What cooperation has the minister in mind as being necessary?

Mr. HOWE: I think my hon. friend misunderstands me when he says that I said that Calgary had failed to cooperate. As a matter of fact we had excellent cooperation there and we had advanced the proposal to the point where the relative liability of each side had been discovered. It was at that point that Calgary decided that the amount required from them was more than they could afford at the time, so the matter was temporarily dropped. The city officials have shown every disposition to cooperate with us as far as they can. There are rigid provisions governing the help which the dominion gives in the development of municipal airports. We are permitted to contribute one-third of what money has been spent on an airport, or one-quarter of what new money is required. In other words, we are prepared to spend on a new airport one-third of what Calgary spent on the old airport, and contribute toward any additional money required in the proportion of one-quarter to three-quarters.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The point raised by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) is well taken. The discussion for the last few moments has been all in connection with airports, and that would come more properly under item No. 387. If we could pass this item, we could proceed to the next.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Is the department bending its energies towards taking adventure out of flying in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: This particular item is solely for that purpose as it covers the regulation of flying. This vote is to ensure that aircraft are in proper condition before they leave the ground; that the rules of flying are observed, and that planes are not overloaded or are not flown in a dangerous condition.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Is some effort being made to reduce the present high landing speeds? The fact that a plane carrying passengers must land at a speed of eighty-five miles an hour may not sound dangerous, but the fact is that is a very fast speed at which to land. I am told that some of the newer machines land at speeds of 100 to 120 miles an hour. That seems still to leave adventure in flying, and I do not think you will get the people of Canada or of any other country to travel consistently by air until that factor is removed.

Mr. HOWE: Very few planes have a landing speed as high as eighty-five miles per hour; the average landing speed is forty to sixty-five miles an hour. The question here is whether the runways, or, in the case of a hydroplane, whether the lake or water area is large enough to provide for landing at that speed. If the proper runway is there and fitted to the speed, there is probably no more hazard in landing at sixty-five miles an hour than at a lower speed.

Mr. MASSEY: Would the minister be good enough to inform the committee of the procedure followed in laying down regulations as to the airworthiness of our aircraft, the qualifications of pilots, and matters of that sort? I think it would be of great interest to know how these regulations are arrived at and determined.

Mr. HOWE: An international convention upon airworthiness and navigation governs both those points reasonably closely. We are just now completing our new regulations as to airworthiness and requirements for pilots. They will be out very shortly, and rather than give an amateurish explanation of what is in them, I shall be very glad to send a copy of them to my hon. friend.

Mr. MASSEY: I was interested in asking the question because within the year we hope that large transport planes in the hands of Canadian pilots will be passing through Canadian air. We fully realize that the Canadian pilot has distinguished himself in both commercial flying and wartime flying as has no other pilot in the world, and we may justly be proud of our achievements in that field. On the other hand, we have had a limited experience with the beam method of flying in this country. It will be readily recognized that straight instrument flying and directional flying under radio control are quite different from flying by map and compass or taking one's position from the ground, and in view of that difference I understand that Trans-Canada Air Lines have brought several pilots from the United States into Canada to instruct our pilots in the art of beam flying. I am not for a moment suggesting any criticism of the capabilities of these gentlemen, particularly because of the extended and happy experience the United States have had in their transport and passenger flying. On the other hand, we fully realize that Imperial Airways has achieved ends which are second to none in the world; while there may be some differences between the method of flying on the European continent and other parts of the world and what we plan over here, nevertheless Imperial Airways pilots have had the experience and the training, and I would ask the minister why it is that United States pilots are being brought to Canada, rather than pilots of Imperial Airways, for the purpose of giving instruction to our own pilots.

Mr. HOWE: On this continent beam flying is used. Imperial Airways uses a direction finder. They carry a spare officer, a navigator, who works out his position from the stars, and when he gets within range of homing devices he works out his position by radio direction finding. We believe that for the conditions we will encounter in the Trans-Canada service it is decidedly preferable to follow the beam type of flying. We think a plane flying at three miles a minute over mountains does not give the navigator sufficient time to plot his course as he goes along, and it would mean carrying a navigator in the plane in any event. Beam flying has been very successful in this country, and we think we are wise in choosing a proven method of transport for this continent under conditions paralleled by existing competing lines.

Mr. MASSEY: In addition to what the minister has just said, those of us who have flown in transport planes in both the United States and Europe, particularly on Imperial Airways and some of the German lines, or the Dutch, Swedish or Danish lines, realize that their method of flying is quite different from that which is practised in the United States. In the United States a plane sets out from an airport for another airport, and every effort is exerted to have that plane land on time. They tend to stick to the beam in spite of weather, and maintain a predetermined altitude of, say 3,500 or 4,000 feet, following the beam into the airport. Flying in Europe is done rather differently. I remember flying from Copenhagen to Stockholm a year ago. We climbed to 16,000 feet to get above bad weather; and on another occasion flying from Malmo, Sweden, to Amsterdam, Holland, we went seventy miles to the south to avoid a storm. In such flying as I have done in the United States I cannot recall instances where we have gone as far out of our way or climbed to 15,000 feet except to get over a mountain. I think we all realize that Imperial Airways pilots have built up for themselves an enviable record. We all realize too that the experience of the United States airlines on some occasions, particularly on the west coast where fog is encountered, has not been too happy. Would the minister be good enough to inform the committee of the method that will be followed in Canada, whether we shall follow the example of various European lines and detour or climb in an attempt to avoid bad weather, or will our planes go straight through on the beam in spite of bad weather?

Mr. HOWE: We are in a very happy position in Canada. We have our own pilots with wide experience in the type of flying that is done in Europe, where the pilot uses his own judgment to a great extent. We have, too, the facilities for beam flying, which is not at all restrictive as to the height the plane may go. The pilot can go up to ten or twelve or fifteen thousand feet if he likes, but if he leaves the beam he loses all benefit from it and must rely on homing devices. He has the further advantage, if he can stay on the beam, of getting his definite location and of having instructions over the beam to duplicate his radio direction finding instructions. So we believe he is in a better and safer position than the pilot in the Imperial Airways plane. Of course, the Imperial Airways plane travels under quite different circumstances. It would be almost impossible to have the beam on many of the routes they fly. The planes leave England and go out over the ocean, and the carrying power of the beam is not very great. The maximum distance for which the beam can be relied upon is two hundred miles. I think we are very well safeguarded. Our pilots have been examined by several experienced aviators, and I have been told on all sides that we have to-day twenty-one pilots who are the equal of any that can be produced in any country in the world. They are well trained in our type of bush flying; that is, flying without aids to navigation, and we have taken the best of them and have given them a thorough training in beam flying with capable instructors brought here for the purpose.

Mr. MASSEY: Our pilots are indeed, the best in the world. It is generally understood that within the next few months, or perhaps a year or two, Imperial Airways will have a round-the-world service. There are few places now where they have not a service, one of the few gaps left to complete, to make that service an actuality, being across Canada, and another over the Atlantic ocean where experiments were so successfully conducted last summer. For this round-the-world service of Imperial Airways, will Canadian pilots fly Canadian planes across Canada, or will the British pilots take the Imperial Airways planes from Australia, or whatever point they take off from, and use our facilities here, flying their own ships across our dominion?

Mr. HOWE: Canadian planes and Canadian pilots will always do the flying over Canada.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister give the committee some information regarding the service to the Yukon? A considerable volume of support came forward to the work which the Vancouver board of trade did in endeavouring to persuade the minister that the route which would serve the Yukon most successfully was from Vancouver. Their plea largely was that for thirty years the principal service of supplies to the Yukon had been carried on via Vancouver, and they were naturally anxious to keep that connection. I believe the minister was of opinion that, at the present time at least, it would not be possible to carry on that service via Vancouver. Will the minister state how far have negotiations to that end been carried on, and whether he considers that the time will shortly come when the arrangements for commercial flying Vancouver to Ashcroft to Prince George will be made use of as a feeder to the Canada Air Lines?

Mr. HOWE: At the moment, Edmonton is linked with the Yukon by a private service, with a mail contract from the post office. Test flights are being made for a route from Vancouver to Ashcroft to Prince George, and also, I understand, by the Pacific coast, but to date I believe no mail contracts have been awarded. The matter of lines of this sort is really outside our jurisdiction as far as initiating them goes. The lines must show that they have sufficient traffic to develop an air mail contract substantial enough to justify the service.

Mr. GREEN: Has the Department of Transport anything whatever to say as to the routes that are to be opened up across different parts of Canada? Surely some department of the government should be able to give a lead in these matters or should have some control over what routes are flown. Can a man set up an air route and carry passengers anywhere he wishes in Canada without any check by the government as to what route he is to fly?

Mr. HOWE: Our act prescribes the conditions under which he must fly. If necessity is shown for a route; if the post office department can be interested or even if they cannot if a route is to be flown, our inspectors pass on the equipment and on the landing facilities, they investigate whether the lakes are sufficiently large to permit planes to land in safety, and the whole route is inspected before it is licensed. We are adopting now a licensing system. If a plane is flying a route with any regularity—once a day or a week or a month—the route is licensed to that party after our inspectors have determined that conditions along the route make for safety of operation.

Mr. GREEN: The reason I raise the question is that the development of the Yukon air mail route has been most unfair. It may be that the government did not intend to be unfair in acting as they have done; but they have given this air mail subsidy to a line flying from Edmonton to the Yukon, whereas practically all the passenger, the express and the freight business to the Yukon has come for many years from Vancouver and other coast points. The result of subsidizing this air mail service from Edmonton to the Yukon will be to deprive the coast cities of that business, and the government should have power to prevent or stop that sort of thing; it should not have been allowed in the first place. Flying is going on from Vancouver to the Yukon, I believe that route can be flown in a shorter time than the other, and surely that is the way by which this service should operate. I would ask the minister to have the matter looked into and see if these conditions cannot be righted, because the effect is to take business away from the coast cities and give it to Edmonton, and that in my opinion is not at all fair.

Mr. PELLETIER: The hon. member who has just taken his seat apparently overlooks the fact that there are a great many intermediate points between Edmonton and the destination to be served. I feel sure that the present move is the right one, simply because it provides the only means of communication available to the people of the interior. So far as the time required is concerned, I doubt if that has a great deal to do with the matter, because after all the object of the service should be to do as much good as possible, and in that connection time is a secondary factor. In my opinion the post office, in doing what they did, have done a very good job.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton): Surely the hon. member for Vancouver South spoke without a knowledge of the actual conditions in connection with proper communication by air from all parts of Canada and from the United States, and prospectively, the round-the-world mail service which will be inaugurated. The very arguments that he gave are, I should say, in favour of the route as established. The route from Edmonton to the Yukon has been opened up by private capital to satisfy an imperative demand not only for passenger but for mail service. I doubt whether this is the proper time to develop the argument, but surely the route has been selected after careful inspection and investigation by technical advisers of the Department of Transport. Surely no route should be used except and until it has been fully investigated by the proper technical officials.

Mr. HOWE: It is a misnomer to speak of a mail "subsidy." The carriage of mails is remunerated not as a subsidy but as a payment for a service, and I understand that the post office has found that on the whole it is a profitable enterprise. The reason the route was flown north from Edmonton was, of course, that it was demonstrated that sufficient mail offered to justify the service, which is weekly. It has proved profitable to the post office I am sure that if it can be demonstrated that any other route is similarly profitable to the post office, there will not be any difficulty about arranging a payment for the service.

Mr. GREEN: Why should this matter be left to the post office? Should not the Department of Transport decide what routes shall be flown? The hon. member for Edmonton West led the committee to believe that the department inspected the route from Edmonton to the Yukon. If they did that, they should at the same time have inspected the route from Vancouver to the Yukon. I do not know whether they inspected either route. Perhaps they just did not pay attention to anything that was happening, with the result that the Pacific coast has been put in a very unfavourable position. As to mail coming from the United States, that is just what we are afraid of, that the larger American centres in the east have been favouring this route from Edmonton to the Yukon and that this service has been inaugurated for their benefit, which we think is not fair to the Pacific coast.

As regards the service to the orient, Australia and New Zealand, we have always been led to believe that it would go direct from Vancouver, but now we hear about this route via Alaska. It seems to me these are matters in which the Department of Transport should take some interest; it should not be just a dog fight to see who gets in first. Plans should be carefully thought out ahead, and the best route for all parties concerned selected.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton): We who have lived in western Canada for some considerable time know that, in the past, attempts have been made to make water run up-hill. I do not think the Department of Transport should for a moment allow petty jealousies, one city or one part of a province against another, to enter into the matter at all. In my opinion the traffic should find the easiest route and should be encouraged along that line.

Mr. McNIVEN: By the same token, I have no doubt that the minister will be glad to hear of that route which is closest, safest and most advantageous from the standpoint of aerial development. Much has been said by hon. members who have spoken previously in regard to aerial connection with the great republic to the south, and I am informed that the most direct route from the south, from the western states of the south, is by way of San Francisco or Los Angeles over the Rocky mountains, crossing the great American desert to Glendive, North Dakota; from there to the queen city of the west, Regina; from Regina north to Saskatoon and Prince Albert; from Prince Albert north to Goldfields; from there up to Yellow Knife; thence to Aklavik, and on to the Yukon.

That is the safest and shortest route, and it avoids the perils of the Pacific ocean and the hazards of the Rocky mountains. Airmen themselves would very much prefer to have that chosen as the route leading into the great north, and there is another reason why that route should be very carefully considered, It may not be generally known to hon. members, but in the province of Saskatchewan in the great hinterland there are about 80,000 square miles of the pre-Cambrian shield. The pre-Cambrian shield houses all the resources that are responsible for the mineral wealth of Ontario and Quebec, and in Saskatchewan there are 80,000 square miles of it. It has been developed on the east at Flinflon and on the west at Goldfields, and between these two points there is a great natural wealth that would arouse the envy of the Incas of Peru. We know that wealth is there and we are seeking the cooperation of all the departments of government and in particular the Department of Transport in the development of that territory. It is Saskatchewan's one hope for a well balanced and better economy.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to get a word of support from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie).

Mr. HOWE: Speak to him.

Mr. GREEN: I will speak to him all right. Seriously, I believe there is now a regular air service in operation between Vancouver and the Yukon, and I understood from what the minister said that his department could examine routes and license them if they were satisfactory. Is there any reason why that route should not be examined in the near future and a licence issued if the route were found satisfactory? We would then be in a position to have the air mail which is going from Vancouver to the Yukon flown up the coast or through the interior up to Prince George and from there to the Yukon. We do object, and rightly so, to having the business taken from under our nose.

Mr. MASSEY: Apparently we were out of order in discussing airports and we are out of order now in discussing airways. I wish to say something about this matter; but I hesitate to be out of order because the hon. member for Halifax is in his place, and I am afraid that we might have a speech to-night on the Crimean war if any irrelevant discussion were allowed. Am I in order in discussing airways?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: When the committee passes item No. 386, the hon. gentleman will be in order.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the minister for an answer to my question?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: That comes properly under item No. 387. Shall item No. 386 carry?

Mr. BENNETT: This item is for the control of civil aviation, and it is in regard to that subject that we wish to ask a few questions. The other evening the minister did me the high honour of indicating to a gathering in the city of Ottawa that it was probable that I would oppose a certain proposal which he was going to make to the House of Commons. It is not usual to discuss these matters at banquets before they are heard of in the house, but to other days and other manners these things were different. First of all, I would ask this question: Under this item are the gentlemen to whom the minister alluded on that festive occasion being paid?

Mr. HOWE: No; this is purely the administration of the department's control of civil aviation.

Mr. BENNETT: It has nothing at all to do with the operations of the plants?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. BENNETT: That settles that question for the moment; it will come up under the next item. Might I ask my second question, which arises out of what has been said. It is this: To whom did the department award the contract for the carriage of mails from Edmonton to the Yukon?

Mr. HOWE: That is a matter for the Post Office Department, but I happen to know that it is Grant McConnachie of United Airways.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister know how he came into possession of the contract?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. BENNETT: The Post Office Department will enlighten us on that?

Mr. HOWE: Quite so.

Mr. BENNETT: Then this item does not bear in any way upon the matters to which the minister alluded the other evening, or yet upon the circumstances under which this young man became possessed of this contract, having come without one and left here with it? There is nothing here that will assist us in dealing with that question. This is departmental control?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Thank you. We will discuss the matter when we come to it.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton): The leader of the opposition made a slighting remark in reference to a young man of the city I have the honour to represent in this house. The young man is Grant McConnachie, and he is merely an official of a substantial, reliable, aggressive company which has made a contract with the Post Office Department.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not making any slighting observations with reference to him. On the contrary I would compliment him upon his ability to secure a contract by an act almost of legerdemain in pulling the rabbit out. He pulled, and out it came. That is what I had reference to. Do not worry about any slighting observations about one who is thus able to pull the trick he pulled under the circumstances under which it was done. You put your hand in, shut your eyes and pull out a mail contract to carry mails from Vancouver to the Yukon with the high approval of the order in council for which the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) must be partly responsible. That is not a matter of importance at the moment. The minister does not know anything about it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought not. That would be nothing unusual. I think you are entitled to that. So the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon) is entirely wrong in suggesting that I am in any sense indicating that any slighting observations should be made about one who is able to do this legerdemain trick, about which we shall receive particulars when we come to the Post Office Department, and the wonders that such a distinguished and shall I say courageous and active young man can accomplish. So I leave it at that. The Post Office Department is to enlighten our ignorance, I understand, and if the Minister of National Defence is to help us with his knowledge it will be received with great pleasure and satisfaction when that vote is reached.

Item agreed to.

Airways and airports—construction and improvements including lighting and radio facilities (capital), $1,722,400.

Mr. GREEN: May I get an answer to my question?

Mr. HOWE: What was the question? I did not hear a question.

Mr. GREEN: The question was whether or not it would be possible for the department to check this new route that is being flown from Vancouver to the Yukon, and license it if it is found to be in order.

Mr. HOWE: There is no direct route from Vancouver to the Yukon up the coast. It is too foggy for safe flying at the moment. There is a route being developed from Vancouver to Ashcroft and Fort George and Fort St. John, where it ties in with the operation from Edmonton to the Yukon. I understand there is also a route being developed direct from Vancouver to Prince George via Hazelton. As I say, the speed with which these routes are developed will depend entirely on the amount of traffic. These are private enterprises and private capital is very anxious to explore every possibility of making a profit. If it can be demonstrated that either of these routes has the necessary traffic, I am sure that the Post Office Department will make the necessary arrangements to carry the mail and the route will be developed. If it is reported that anyone desires to fly the route, our inspectors will go in and if the route complies with the requirements we will license it. We are not retarding development but on the other hand the establishment of a route will depend on the traffic that offers. Traffic is the criterion.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

Mr. GREEN: The department is in a position to check a route at any time?

Mr. HOWE: Quite.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Can the minister tell us what improvements are being made under this vote in the airports in western Canada?

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon. friend want a detailed report on each one?

Mr. BENNETT: I think it would be well to put on Hansard a short statement regarding each one.

Mr. MASSEY: Will the minister permit me to interrupt? I think it would be of great assistance to the committee and to all concerned if he would give a general picture as to the position of Trans-Canada Air Lines with an estimate as to when we may expect the inauguration of passenger and freight service.

Mr. HOWE: Starting from the western end we have at Vancouver one of the finest airports on the continent. It is well located and well developed, has concrete runways and is in first-class condition. Then we have an auxiliary airport at Langley Prairie. The grading of three landing strips is completed, and seeding is taking place there. I think by midsummer Langley will be in condition for use; it is an emergency landing field. Then at Hope the field is usable; there is a little more work to be done this summer; this is also an emergency landing field. At Princeton the field is usable, and there is very little to be done there; the radio beam is in, power installed. The radio beam is in at Vancouver as well. Then at Oliver the lighting is finished and the runways serviced; that landing field is complete. At Midway the field is usable, that is only an emergency field. At Grand Forks the radio range is in and consideration is being given there to an alternative field, as the municipal field is not capable of being developed up to standard. At Trail there is a municipal airport sufficient for emergency landings. At Salmo the field is completed, but the lighting is not installed. At Cranbrook municipal airport the lighting is now being installed, and the department is installing two-way radio equipment. At Lethbridge the old municipal airport was found to be unsuitable and a new airport has been selected; lighting is installed; the beam is ready and the field is now in fair condition for use. Trans-Canada Air Lines is building a hangar there. The next principal field is Medicine Hat; there again the field is usable; the lighting equipment is ready for service; the power line for the radio range is completed and I believe the radio range is on the air now. Then Swift Current—

Mr. BENNETT: What about Calgary?

Mr. HOWE: We have a difficult problem there. The old field is not capable of being developed to modern standards, but at the same time it is usable in ordinary weather.

Mr. BENNETT: You have a lighthouse there, and power?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, but if the weather is too unfavourable we cannot stop at Calgary; we will have to fly on to Edmonton. We are hoping, possibly this season, to work out a new field there. I have tried to induce my colleague the Minister of National Defence to let us use his very fine field, but so far without success.

Mr. BENNETT: We will remember that!

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps from there on a general statement would do. The Trans-Canada airways from Winnipeg west is to all intents and purposes completed, and regular flights will take place from about March 1. For a time, while the flights will be on regular schedule, only mail will be carried; but after the weather improves and we are sure that all arrangements are working well we will take passengers as far east as Winnipeg.

Coming east from Winnipeg on the ordinary route, flying will be done at night, and we are putting in lighting fixtures and complete radio beams. The fields are all well developed right through to Toronto.

Mr. BENNETT: At what points?

Mr. HOWE: Winnipeg, Kenora, Sioux Lookout, Wagaming, Nakina, Pagwa, Kapuskasing, Porquis Junction, North Bay, Reay and Toronto, and then Ottawa and Montreal. We expect that that route will be in the same position as the western end by the first of July. We expect to be able to run planes from Montreal to Winnipeg and Vancouver on July 1.

Mr. BENNETT: You do not fly over the lakes?

Mr. HOWE: No; the route is around the north.

Mr. McNEVIN (Victoria, Ont.): What points will the route touch between Toronto and Ottawa?

Mr. HOWE: I do not know whether the hon. member knows the names of the places I have mentioned. Some of them are very small places. The route, however, is Montreal, Ottawa, Killaloe, Bracebridge, Reay and Toronto.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): When will there be a regular schedule from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, and when will the operation take place? Would it run once a week, once a month, or how often? When can we expect a regular trans-Canada air line service to be operating on regular schedule?

Mr. HOWE: If the hon. member will accept the St. Lawrence river as the Atlantic, then I would say that we can expect a regular daily schedule beginning July 1 of this year, operating between Montreal and Vancouver.

Mr. ISNOR: But we do not accept that.

Mr. HOWE: It is expected that planes will leave Montreal about eight in the evening and arrive in Vancouver at noon the next day.

Mr. BROOKS: We in the maritime provinces have too long accepted the St. Lawrence river as the eastern terminus of Canada. If this were a railway I could understand why we might have to start at one point and complete the work, section by section; but as it is to be an airway service, I do not see why ports in the east could not be developed at the same time as ports in central or western Canada. We in the maritime provinces have been on the tail end of many things for a long time, and I should like to see something done to give us the service we deserve. The suggestion that the St. Lawrence river might be considered the Atlantic ocean is a little too far-fetched for us from that end of Canada to swallow.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member will see a great deal of activity in the maritimes this year. Our main expenditures in the coming year will be in the development of the service in the maritime provinces. The difficulty, of course, is that we can ask parliament only for limited funds to apply on the work in any one year. We hope that the end of this year we may have a trans-Canada service from coast to coast, and that by this time next year the planes will be flying the entire distance.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): The route the minister set out was from Montreal to Ottawa and, as I followed him, to North Bay. I was wondering if he had anticipated going from Ottawa to Toronto and then to North Bay. What is the direct route we may expect? If Toronto is on a branch line, I should like to hear what the minister has to say about it.

Mr. HOWE: The first planes will fly over the route, as I suggested, from Montreal to Ottawa, to Reay and to Toronto and then back to Reay and on to North Bay, and west. As traffic develops, it is quite probable that we shall be able to run separate planes from Montreal and from Toronto.

Mr. BENNETT: The same as the trains?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would like the minister to tell us how we are to get to and from the island at Toronto. We have been listening to information about the fine ports at Regina, Vancouver, Edmonton and elsewhere, and realizing that the taxes collected in Toronto are a large per cent of those collected throughout Canada, I think it is about time that Toronto had some of those fine ports.

The minister said something about a chain ferry. I must confess I do not know anything about that.

Mr. BENNETT: Maybe it is like a chain letter.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not know about chain ferries running across the bay, but would the minister tell us about the chain ferry?

Mr. STEWART: You pull yourself over.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister said it would be a lot faster than that. When the tunnel was first planned by the late government, it was stated that passengers could go from the Royal York, the King Edward or any other downtown points in Toronto to the air port within five or ten minutes. But I can picture them taking about an hour by a chain ferry, particularly if it is stormy weather. The minister will have to give the Queen city of all Canada a much better entry to the island than would be afforded by a chain ferry.

Mr. LOCKHART: While there have been several things said—

Mr. FINN: Mr. Chairman—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Halifax has the floor.

Mr. FINN: I thank you, Mr. Chairman, that I have the floor. I am able to stand on both feet. "There is no wooden leg about this," as in the pensions debate.

I have followed very closely the remarks of the Minister of Transport in connection with the development of the airways. So far as the route from Montreal to the east is concerned, it seems to me everything is in the air, but there is nothing up there to travel in. I was very much surprised when he said that the second emergency station would be "Hope." I remember once coming up from Bermuda in the old "Alpha", and while in a fog getting off our course. We got in touch with a little schooner to find out where we were, and learned that we were off Little Hope light. The name of the schooner was "Our Only Joy." So I guess the schooner is our only joy, so far as the aeroplane service is concerned.

Mr. MacNICOL: What was in the schooner?

Mr. FINN: You will have to ask the "Admiral." Then we come to another stop which bears a great name; it sounds something like "Grand Fox." One has to be pretty foxy to follow some of these things. Then we come down to Swift Current; things are so swift that, so far as the east is concerned, we are swept off our feet.

In all sincerity I must say that I have no desire to be too critical, but it does seem to me that in the east we have been forgotten. If we did not remember that we existed and did not sometimes get to our feet—as seldom we do—we would not be known at all.

Halifax is the eastern gateway of Canada as Vancouver is the western, but there is no intimation by the minister that he hopes at some future time to extend this service eastwards. Is the eastern terminus of this air line to be in the adjoining province of New Brunswick? What will be the route from Montreal east, and where will be the point of departure on the Atlantic? I am not referring to the St. Lawrence as that is an inland waterway. Millions have been spent on that in order to permit ships with slightly greater draught than the Empress of Britain to follow that waterway to Montreal. Would the minister give us an outline of what is proposed in airways east of Montreal? Can he tell us what is to be done for the maritimes and for that part of Quebec east of Montreal? I should like to know where the ships are to take off for overseas and the Mediterranean.

Mr. HOWE: The line runs from Montreal to within a few miles of Sherbrooke, across the state of Maine to about half way between St. John and Fredericton, and then to Moncton. The intention is to operate non-stop from Montreal to Moncton. This route has been chosen in an effort to avoid fog, the great enemy of flying. Almost anything else can be overcome except fog. We believe we have a route almost entirely free of that menace. From Moncton east it is intended to ask private enterprise to join with us in setting up routes. There is already a private route from Moncton to Charlottetown—and we hope to have routes to Halifax, Saint John and Sydney.

Mr. FINN: I do not think the statement of the minister is quite satisfactory. We have one illustration of transportation going through the state of Maine. On the Canadian Pacific railway it is a case of closed doors after you leave Megantic until you cross the state. It is now proposed to run this air line across the state of Maine instead of through Canadian territory. We are a long way from Montreal, and there is no indication that any service is to be given beyond Moncton, except that provided by private companies. We are not to be part of a trans-Canada scheme of air lines to be paid for by the people of this country for the good of the people in the east as well as in the west. As one of the representatives for Halifax I am not satisfied with this proposed service. We have just as much right to the security of the best planes as have the people between Vancouver and Montreal and Saint John and Moncton. There is a dead stop when you get to Moncton; from then on you take your choice between "give me liberty or give me death" by private planes.

Mr. LOCKHART: In the discussion concerning this air line no mention seems to be made of connections with the United States lines. Surely some consideration has been given to linking up with the United States lines south of the Niagara peninsula. Could the minister give us some idea of what connections are contemplated?

Mr. HOWE: There are two obvious connections. One is from Toronto to Buffalo, to connect with the United States lines to New York and the east. The other is from Toronto to Windsor, to connect with the lines to Detroit, Chicago and the west. We have had preliminary discussions; but nothing definite has been developed, although we expect that a decision will be reached shortly. My hon. friend knows that at the present time there are connections between Montreal and New York, between Winnipeg and Minneapolis and St. Paul, and between Vancouver and Seattle.

Mr. McLARTY: I did not have the advantage of hearing the earlier discussion on this matter, but in answering the last question the minister referred to Windsor. I should like to know the situation with respect to that city. I realize that Windsor is not on the main line of the trans-Canada airways, but I should like to know just what the minister has in mind in connection with that city.

Mr. HOWE: I gave that information earlier in the discussion. We have been in constant touch with Windsor, and at the present time the obvious site is being used in a small way.

Mr. LENNARD: When matters of this kind are up for discussion, we hear much about Toronto, Vancouver, Windsor and Halifax—perhaps I should have put Halifax first—but there are many people who consider Hamilton to be of more importance. Could the minister tell me how Hamilton will be tied up with the route from Toronto to Chicago and the trans-Canada route?

Mr. HOWE: Hamilton is in the centre of traffic on the route west. Planes will pass there each day, and I am sure they will stop if traffic offers.

Mr. McNEVIN: Is the present route between Toronto and Ottawa the most direct? I have in mind that the railway systems follow a more southern course. What were the determining factors in deciding on this route?

Mr. HOWE: In deciding a route for this type of transportation the density of population is not important as planes do not stop very often. In this case the only stops will be at Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto; anything in between will be handled by another service. On this route the minimum of new fields are required. When planes travel at the rate of three miles per minute, the fact that they must go a few miles further is not very serious in the matter of time.

Mr. ISNOR: It has been interesting for the members from the maritimes to listen to the Minister of Transport outline the various actions taken to provide services for the western portion of Canada. On looking at the report I find that there are already six districts in operation, each with a superintendent. There is one at each of these cities: Vancouver, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa. From the report and the statement made by the Minister of Transport, it seems that the service is to stop at the St. Lawrence. I am in hearty accord with the view expressed by my colleague from Halifax (Mr. Finn), and I would impress upon the minister that we in the east feel that we are entitled to the same consideration as those in the extreme west. We are not envious of western members, but we ask for similar treatment for the east, and I think that is only a fair request to make. We do not think it is fair to have only one station for the whole three maritime provinces on the Trans-Canada Air Lines, and from there to have to depend on commercial lines. I understand the commercial companies have on more than one occasion applied for a licence in the maritimes to give us an air service while we are waiting for the Trans-Canada service to be inaugurated, and that the licence has always been refused. I should like to know from the minister whether he has in the past received applications for a licence in the maritime provinces and whether they have been refused; whether he has similar applications before him at the present time, and what likelihood there is of a licence being granted so that we may get a service at once pending the extension of the Trans-Canada Air Lines service. I should also like to ask when the service from Halifax to Vancouver will be in operation.

Mr. HOWE: The situation in the maritimes has received most careful study from those competent to decide how that section of the country can best be served. We have a route from Montreal to Moncton which can be flown, as far as we can see, pretty close to 365 days in the year; but when we fly from Moncton to the coast in any direction we have fog, and the service is likely to be interrupted. It was thought, therefore, that in the interests of the service the route from Montreal to Moncton should be established, so that deliveries could be made at least to Moncton every day in the year. We have one of the oldest services in Canada flying between Moncton and Charlottetown. It is licensed by our department and has been operating for a good many years with a good deal of success. I think I am safe in saying before another sixteen months is past, I can guarantee my friends from the maritimes that we shall have an entirely adequate service connecting Moncton with the principal cities of the maritime provinces, and with equipment entirely adequate for that service.

In reply to my hon. friend's other question, we have had applications for a licence for the maritime provinces; but we have refused to grant them for the very reason I gave on the previous vote, that before granting a licence we required the ground facilities to be adequate. The ground facilities in the maritimes were not adequate, and therefore we refused to grant the licences. But the planes insisted on flying, and of a fleet of five planes I think two are still intact. Fortunately there was no great loss of life. Until we get these facilities, which we shall endeavour to complete this year, we are not going to grant licences to fly in the maritime provinces.

[Mr. Isnor.]

Mr. FINN: I do not think the minister was quite fair to the maritimes in his statement. He talks about accidents and death. Did they take place in the air or at the landing fields?

Mr. HOWE: Landing fields.

Mr. FINN: Not at the landing field in Halifax. The sum of $65,000 has to be spent in connection with the air field there, and nothing has been done. I think we are entitled to something a little more definite than the minister's statement that we shall have a service within sixteen months or two years.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): The minister, in replying to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) in reference to transportation from Toronto island to the mainland said that he would put on a chain ferry. Now a chain ferry, as I have known them, is a kind of scow with a chain fastened on both sides of the opening and drawn through the scow, bringing the scow across from one side to the other. It is a very slow means of transportation, and certainly it would not fit in with the wonderful service the minister is anticipating giving to the people of Canada. I know Toronto bay very well, having had boats on the bay for a number of years, and I understand there is a great number of speed boats in Toronto bay which would be available and could transport airplane passengers from the island to the city very much better than any chain ferry. I think it would be possible for the minister to have these speed boats transport passengers from the point where the airplanes will land to the foot of York street, which is within four hundred yards of the union station, within a little more than five minutes, and I do not think the cost would be very great. I would suggest, therefore, that the minister give consideration, as a temporary means of transportation at all events, to using speed boats for transporting airplane passengers from the island to the city.

Mr. HOWE: So far as the service between the island and the city is concerned, that is entirely a matter for the city of Toronto. The airports are both owned by the city of Toronto. We contribute part of the cost. Toronto will operate the airports, and we will lease from that city certain facilities which we require.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Then so far as the government is concerned, the island being the airport, that will be the place to dump off passengers for Toronto! Just dump them off at the island! Never mind about how they get to Toronto! Dump them off at the island —as if that was their destination! Is that what the minister means?

Mr. HOWE: We shall certainly demand that transportation be provided from the island or we shall not go there.

Mr. McIVOR: I have two things to commend the minister for, first for his efficient staff, a representative of which visited the head of the lakes this summer. I was appalled at the amount of work that had to be done before a landing field could be brought into existence. It is necessary for cities themselves to be air-minded, as this committee seems to be to-night, and it is necessary for the city to cooperate in providing landing facilities. We shall have at the head of the lakes a landing field that will not be surpassed even by the one at Vancouver, and anybody from the east who wants to visit the great wheat fields of Saskatchewan will find a nice cool spot at the head of the lakes to land, because Fort William passed their by-law yesterday.

Another thing for which I would commend the minister is that not even a cabinet minister will get a free ride in these planes. That means that there will not be any passes even for members of parliament. We should commend the minister for this unselfish act.

Mr. HARTIGAN: I was quite disappointed when I heard the minister outline the air service as regards the maritime provinces. It is almost enough to make persons coming from the maritime provinces feel that they were ostracized as far as airport services were concerned.

Mr. SPENCE: You ostracize yourself by living there.

Mr. HARTIGAN: We feel that we are still a part of Canada; we have supported every move for the benefit of Canada; our people are spread over every part of the dominion; our ancestors were pioneers in most of the services that originated since Canada was Canada. It comes down to this, that the maritime provinces have been left out in the cold to a very great extent, since the Canadian National railways took over the Intercolonial railway. I do not blame the minister at all for this; but it is just one more instance of the fact that our civil service appointees, men who have probably been long in the service, and "know it all," cast their eyes over Canada and say, "This is for this, and that is for that." Is there any person who has the least inkling of what is going on in Canada to-day who will contend that the dominion can, on the one hand, get rid of government responsibility in the transportation of passengers from Moncton to Halifax and Sydney and, on the other, assume full responsibility for transportation, machines and equipment, airport facilities and everything else from Moncton west?

As regards the provision of facilities from Moncton east we know that even under to-day's conditions fog is practically no impediment, because the beam ray will take planes in. We know that it took planes in from the Pacific coast in the height of fog, because, listening over the radio, we were told of the arrival of Miss Earhart's plane when she landed in San Francisco, and there was a severe fog at the time. That, in spite of all the improvements which have been made, all the equipment which has been provided, and the vast amount of money which the dominion is asked to vote for air services, one of the oldest provinces of Canada is to be left without proper facilities, redounds to the discredit of the aviation branch of the dominion government.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know much about air services; but I observe that the government is about to spend approximately one and three-quarter million dollars, and I see that the minister is being pestered on all sides by hon. members from every part of the country suggesting that their particular locality is the best place to spend this money on. My suggestion to the minister is to take very little notice of appeals of this kind. He should be guided solely by what he considers is the best advice obtainable from the most competent officials. That being done, I do not care what part of the country gets the service. Sometimes we regard Canada as the centre of the universe, and Winnipeg may be the centre of Canada, but I am not asking particularly for any service in Winnipeg if the requirements are not there to justify it. I do say this, that one hon. member after another in this chamber should not rise in his place and demand from the minister certain facilities if the services are not required. If they are required in the maritimes, I am satisfied to leave it to the minister and his officials to provide the necessary facilities.

Mr. FINN: You do not represent the maritimes.

Mr. HOWE: I may say with reference to the maritimes that $300,000 have been spent. We have fields under way at Upper Brockway, Blissville, Cambridge, Havelock, Moncton, West Brook and Stanley, and we have fairly adequate municipal fields at Moncton, Saint John, Halifax, New Glasgow and Sydney. We have good municipal fields at Charlottetown and Summerside. With the work we expect to do there this year we believe that the maritime provinces will be as well equipped as any other part of Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: In view of the statement the minister has made as to the amount of money already spent, can he give the committee some idea as to what the revenues are likely to be after all the fields have been equipped and the services are in operation?

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member means, the revenue for the use of the fields?

Mr. HEAPS: All told.

Mr. HOWE: It is very hard to estimate that. There is no service now. We are starting from zero to build a service. We anticipate that it will be self-supporting from the start. Just how long it will take to make the fields themselves self-supporting I cannot say.

Mr. HAMILTON: Having listened to those who are getting the cream of the service, and not wishing to speak for my own constituency in particular, I believe quite a number of members will be interested in knowing whether there is any general policy with reference to feeder lines, if at a later date the minister can say what policy will be adopted in so far as the Canadian airways are concerned as to feeders into the main trans-Canada system. Many cities and areas of considerable settlement are off the main air line, and I believe that a large part of the country would be interested in knowing if there is any policy or any anticipated policy as to how that situation will be dealt with.

Mr. HOWE: As I said before, it altogether depends on the traffic that will originate on a route of that kind. If there is a real advantage in moving mail by aeroplane rather than by train, there will probably be a reason for the route and revenues to warrant its establishment. It all depends on that. Anywhere that private enterprise can find a profitable operation, they will undoubtedly apply to the post office for payment for a mail service, which is the back-bone of all operations.

Mr. HAMILTON: That will be by private enterprise?

Mr. HOWE: Private enterprise.

Mr. POTTIER: May I remind the hon. member for Winnipeg North, dealing with the statement that we from the maritimes should leave all these matters of policy to the minister, that we are quite willing to do that if the west will follow the same policy.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HEAPS: So far as I am concerned, I am quite willing.

Mr. POTTIER: As I understood from the minister, the policy of the department is to have a centre station at Moncton and then connect with other cities. Did the minister mean only cities in the maritimes, or towns, or districts? Are we to take it literally that the orders are to connect only with the cities?

Mr. HOWE: I should perhaps have said, large centres of traffic.

Mr. LENNARD: I also am rather in disagreement with some of the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North. In referring a few minutes ago to Hamilton, I am sure the minister knows I did not ask him to spend one cent there. I would, however, ask him what his findings were when he visited that city last summer, as to whether the city is cooperating, and just what the conditions were as he found them.

Mr. HOWE: The situation at Hamilton was very fully explored. A tentative agreement was drawn up by our department, and we are waiting for the city of Hamilton to execute it. Then we shall be ready to proceed.

Mr. McINTOSH: I was not in the chamber when the discussion started this evening on the main transcontinental air line. From the standpoint of the province of Saskatchewan and the constituency of North Battleford there are some aspects of this transportation problem by air that are interesting and important. I wish to stress a few of these. For instance, there is the trans-Canada air line passing through the southern part of the province from Winnipeg to Lethbridge. I understand that the main port of call, in fact the only one, is Regina, and that will develop air business east and west; but it does not touch the northern nor the central part of the province at all.

The whole trend of business and population now is northward and this will continue, not only during the next ten years but decades after that. Consequently, from the standpoint of air development there are other angles of the question that are of great importance. Take, for instance, trade into the north. I understand that the minister is dealing largely with the main air line and the development of business on that line and, therefore, I shall not go into the question of northern development by air to-night. I shall do that again. It is, however, becoming more important every year, and places from which that northern air business will be developed—and is developing—will be the leading points across the northern part of the province, North Battleford, Prince Albert, Melfort and so on.

Next, there is the feeder air line service. I understand that this service into Regina will be a five city tie-up which will include Regina, Moose Jaw, North Battleford, Saskatoon and Prince Albert. If the minister has not made a complete statement with reference to this feeder air service, I should like to have a few words from him in that regard if he has anything important to mention.

Mr. HOWE: I understand that the Post Office Department is now calling for tenders for the service to serve these cities. The schedule has been prepared by that department to suit their requirements, and it is expected that the contract will be awarded shortly.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I appreciate the fact that money is necessary for the development of trans-Canada airways, and for Canada what is contemplated is a large expenditure. Can the minister tell us whether the department has made any estimates of the approximate deficits which will be incurred in connection with airways for the next five or six years?

Mr. HOWE: The airways divide themselves into two parts, one being simply operation, the other the maintenance of airports. Trans-Canada Air Lines will handle the operation and it is thought that this will be self-supporting from the start; but as regards revenue from the air fields, it is hopeless to expect any return until there is a greater density of traffic than exists at the initial stage. One plane landing per day at a field will not pay the operating expenses of that field. It is difficult to say how many years it will be before the fields themselves pay their operating expenses.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister says it is hard to tell us how long it will be before they pay their way. We should like to know what the cost will be. Is it going to be $5, or $500, or $50,000,000 or what?

Mr. HOWE: The cost of operating the department's fields—radio and weather service—is a little short of a million dollars a year. We shall recover a little of that but, in the initial stages, very little. There will be some revenue from the use of the fields.

Mr. McINTOSH: Can the minister tell us approximately when the five city daily air feeder service from Regina, through Moose Jaw, Saskatoon, North Battleford, to Prince Albert and back to Regina will likely commence?

Mr. HOWE: That matter is not within the jurisdiction of this department, but I assume, from the developments which are taking place, that it will be around June or July.

Mr. PERLEY: The hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) has taken us back to Saskatchewan, and I would ask one or two questions relative to that province. Can the minister give us some details with regard to the airport now in course of construction south of the town of Broadview, Saskatchewan, and why the landing field that had been established near the town of Broadview was abandoned? That was a port on which there had been a considerable expenditure for improvements and it was a nice level field taking in nearly a quarter section. I should like to know why it was abandoned and a field some eight or ten miles further south taken instead. At the same time, would the minister give us some details with respect to the amount that will be expended on improving the airport at Regina. I have asked all these questions at once because it is difficult to get the floor.

Mr. HOWE: The Broadview airport was leased by the government. The field was about fifteen miles off the straight line; we straightened the line and put the beams on, and we found it desirable to purchase another piece of property at Broadview. The land cost $1,486.50.

Mr. BENNETT: How many acres?

Mr. HOWE: Roughly, a square mile. Answering the question with regard to Regina, the department contributed $48,000 to the Regina field this year, which is the amount the city is entitled to, having regard to the amount the city itself spent. The Broadview field is 585½ acres.

Mr. PERLEY: In a return tabled it was given as thirty acres.

Mr. HOWE: That thirty acres is the site for the beacon, the radio beam station. That is away from the main airport; I was referring to the main airport at Broadview. Two miles away from that, thirty acres of land were taken over for the radio beam, but that is another transaction.

Mr. STEWART: Reading this item, I notice in brackets after it the word "capital." I take it that this is a capital expenditure and I shall be glad if the minister will explain it; that is, the capital set-up, how much has been invested in this way, and whether in that is included the cost of fields which were established some years ago under a relief program. What is the capital investment, how is it set up and how is this to be paid? Is it to be paid by borrowing? In the public works department, where we had a capital expenditure it was not paid out of revenue at all. The expenditure on the airway to date is about $9,000,000, including the money spent under relief votes. About $5,000,000 has been expended by the civil aviation branch directly. This, I understand, has all been charged to revenue.

Mr. ESLING: In view of the fact that federal engineers have been running lines on Kootenay flats in the vicinity of Creston, is the minister in a position to say whether the construction of a landing field at that point is being considered?

Mr. HOWE: A field is being considered there. It is a wide valley; we would like to have a field that is capable of being approached as a blind landing, but we have not finally decided yet to establish a field at Creston.

Mr. ESLING: In view of the fact that the industry at Trail is credited with having the largest export mail of any industry in the dominion, is the minister in a position to suggest what means of reaching the main lines of service will be followed?

Mr. HOWE: I am not able to do that at the moment. The matter of stops and subsidiary services is largely one for the Post Office Department to work out. We operate this service largely to meet the requirements of the Post Office Department. As far as our own operation goes, of course the fewer stops we have the better it suits us.

Mr. MASSEY: What arrangements are being made or what are the plans in connection with taking mail from incoming ships either at Halifax or in the gulf of St. Lawrence? At present there is, I believe, a service that runs from Montreal and Quebec to Rimouski—or is it Father Point—and mail is taken from the transatlantic ships there and flown to those ports. Is it the intention to continue that service and also to extend the service to and from Halifax in the winter?

Mr. HOWE: We have a service in summer from Father Point to Montreal. That service will be continued this year, and when the transatlantic service starts both services will be combined. Naturally we shall move all the mail we can by air.

Mr. ISNOR: That would apply only to the summer months?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. ISNOR: What about the winter?

Mr. EVANS: What is the position as to the radio beam station at Maple Creek? Is it the intention to move that station from that town north?

[Mr. Stewart.]

Mr. HOWE: Yes, that is the intention; the field will be moved north.

Mr. EVANS: Both the station and the field?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MASSEY: What type of ship is it planned to fly on the trans-Canada route, and what designating insignia does the minister plan to place upon them?

Mr. HOWE: Standard equipment will be the Lockheed 14; the designation will be TCA with a maple leaf.

Mr. MASSEY: How many passengers do they carry? Are they over-night planes?

Mr. HOWE: The planes have fourteen seats; that would be twelve passengers. There is no sleeping accommodation; but they are very comfortable planes, widely used in the western section of the United States for overnight work.

Mr. MASSEY: Is it the plan of the Trans-Canada Air Lines to fly bigger ships later, depending on how much traffic there is; and, if so, will they be sleeper planes? The minister I believe, mentioned it is an over-night flight from Winnipeg to Montreal.

Mr. HOWE: The size of the planes of course will depend entirely on the density of traffic. I hope the traffic will soon warrant larger planes, and, if so, we shall certainly provide sleeping accommodation.

Mr. MASSEY: I notice the amount to be spent under this item this year is approximately the same as last; therefore one can assume that there will be steady development of the airways. I think I mentioned last year when the estimates were before the committee that we are not naturally an air-minded people in Canada yet, as far as passengers are concerned. That is strange in view of the fact that we are the nation which has flown more freight than any other two nations together in the world, and as I have already mentioned, has been most successful as far as pilots are concerned. The success of this system will depend entirely on the amount of traffic carried. Bearing in mind that we, as a people, are not particularly air-minded, has the minister anything to tell the committee in regard to projected advertising to bring to the attention of the people of this dominion the fact that they will have available an air transport system which is efficient, rapid and safe?

Mr. HOWE: Plans are being laid for a publicity campaign. The advertising for the line is in the hands of the Canadian National Railways now and will continue to be under their guidance. But it is the intention to do a suitable amount of advertising for this line. At the moment, of course, all energies are being devoted to placing the line in operation and no great consideration has been given to the details of traffic arrangements.

Mr. MASSEY: What has been done in regard to the tying-in of the present northern Ontario routes for flying freight? As the minister well knows, and as I have just stated, we are flying more freight in northern Ontario and the northern parts of the prairie provinces as well, than any other two nations in the world. Is there any tie-in of the Trans-Canada lines planned with these present private lines? Is it the intention that they remain as private lines, functioning as they have in the past?

Mr. HOWE: The private lines of course are functioning now, and the Trans-Canada is not. But the Trans-Canada will have stops at the main air bases from which these private lines fly, and there will be traffic arrangements with them. We are not interfering in any way with the private flying that is now being done, and will not do so except to cooperate in exchange of traffic. But our line is very favourably based to tie in with these operations.

Mr. MASSEY: Last year the minister stated that it was the intention of Trans-Canada Air Lines to have no service between Toronto and Montreal, the two largest population centres in the dominion. It seemed strange to some at that time that that was to be the case. To-night the minister mentioned that the route from Montreal would pass through Toronto. Does he mean that Trans-Canada planes will fly to Ottawa, to Reay, to Toronto and to Winnipeg, or is it the intention to fly direct from Montreal to Winnipeg and run a feeder line to and from Toronto as was suggested last year? And is it suggested that there will be a direct line from Toronto to Montreal without going roundabout?

Mr. HOWE: I covered that earlier; planes will leave Montreal for Ottawa, Killaloe, Reay, Toronto, and then from Toronto back to Reay and on to North Bay and the west. As the traffic develops, we hope there will be sufficient for a plane from Montreal to Vancouver and another from Toronto to Vancouver, in which event there will undoubtedly be a short service between Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal. But the air fields that I have mentioned will be those used for that service, being expensive fields and fully equipped. No purpose would be served by trying a shorter route; with the high speed equipment we are using the saving of distance would be fully offset by the slower type of plane that would have to be used on the shorter route.

Mr. MASSEY: Has the minister any idea of the flying schedule that will be planned between, say Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg, or Toronto and Winnipeg?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The present plan which I think would suit the Post Office Department is to leave Montreal at eight o'clock, be in Ottawa about eighty-thirty, Toronto about nine-thirty, leave for the west about ten o'clock, arriving at Vancouver the next day at noon.

Mr. GREEN: What is the situation with respect to the transatlantic service. What are the plans for that service?

Mr. HOWE: Test flights were carried out last summer with equipment which happened to be available, and those flights proved to be very successful. From the data collected, the planes which will actually be used in the routes are now being developed, and it is expected that further flights will take place as soon as spring arrives. I think it is quite within the range of possibility that mail will be carried on that route before the end of this season, although I cannot say that definitely. We have had information from England and the United States indicating that there is a possibility of that being carried out. I may say that everything which has been found out to date with respect to that route is entirely favourable, and we think it is only a matter of a year or two before the service will be in steady operation.

Mr. GREEN: What service is to be given, and what length of time will be required to fly the route?

Mr. HOWE: Something less than twenty-four hours from Montreal to Southampton. I believe the service will be twice a week, each way.

Mr. GREEN: What plans are being made for a route from British Columbia to Australia, New Zealand and the orient? Has that been under consideration?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. McCANN: What amount has been expended to date on the airport at Killaloe? Is the work completed, and, if not, what is the contemplated expenditure this year?

Mr. HOWE: The cost of land at Killaloe was $8,488; the expenditure to date in the development of land was $86,364, and the estimated expenditure to complete, which will be carried out this year is $11,720.

Mr. GRAYDON: As the minister is aware, the auxiliary municipal airport for Toronto is situated at Malton, in the county I represent. We are very proud of the airport, and have been told on many occasions that it is perhaps one of the greatest airports on the continent. I have heard with much interest and satisfaction statements which have been made by some hon. members concerning other airports in Canada. I should like the minister to assure me that the Malton airport ranks with high favour among the various ports of Canada. Perhaps he would be good enough to say whether or not the Malton airport is at present highest in standing of all those in the dominion.

Mr. SPENCE: The city of Toronto pays for it.

Mr. HOWE: There is no airport at Malton yet; but it is well spoken of, and I think when it is completed it will be a very fine airport.

Mr. PURDY: I am sure other hon. members from Nova Scotia were disappointed this evening when we heard that the trans-Canada air line would end at Moncton, instead of Halifax. I have before me a map published a short time ago by one of the departments, in which the Trans-Canada Air Lines are shown as going to Halifax. I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be disappointed to get word to-night that that is not so, because in the publication "Canada, 1938" the map appears, and in a statement signed by the minister I find:

> The hand book is designed to serve two purposes. To those outside of Canada it will give a well rounded picture of the Canadian situation from Atlantic to Pacific. In Canada itself it will help to provide a better basis of information for dealing with current problems.

My first question is this: Is it now proposed to change the name of the Trans-Canada Air Lines to conform to the actual situation of the proposed route? My second question is, coming down to serious matters: What has been the experience as to fog conditions at Stanley, in Hants county, where intermediate landing fields are being developed?

Mr. HOWE: All I can say is that it is a trifle better than Halifax, but not as good as Moncton.

Mr. BROOKS: I do not wish to say much concerning the eastern terminus of the Trans-Canada Air Lines. I believe, however, that the minister and his department might well be commended at least by some hon. members from New Brunswick for selecting Moncton as the terminus. It is well known that Moncton and its vicinity are free from fog, and it is known, too, that when a few years ago the Italian airmen were selecting a port to land their ships on the Atlantic coast, they selected Shediac, because it was more free from fog than any other part of the Atlantic coast in the vicinity.

Mr. FINN: Just then.

Mr. BROOKS: I do not think the minister is to be condemned for having selected Moncton as an airport. I am inclined to think he should be commended.

Mr. FINN: The hon. member who has just taken his seat has made a statement which I believe is absolutely correct. It appears to me that there is a lack of candidness, not on the part of the minister, but on the part of those who are supplying him with information. The crux of the situation is that, so far as the east is concerned, the trans-Canada airways will go from Shediac, in crossing the Atlantic. No transatlantic liners make Shediac a terminus. The Minister of Transport is responsible for the Canadian National Railways, the largest single transcontinental system in Canada or the United States. When the St. Lawrence is closed by ice, Halifax is the natural port; I do not say that in a spirit of rancour or to cause discord.

I will say that all Canadian Pacific ships going to Saint John, carrying passengers, land first at Halifax to drop passengers and mail. Are the passengers on Atlantic liners landing at Halifax to be told that they will be taken care of by some fantastic private company, and probably sent off into eternity before they reach their destination at Moncton or Montreal? I believe we are entitled to this information from the minister, or the officers of his department. Those officers are highly paid; therefore they must be highly efficient, and he must have all the information necessary to give each hon. member a full knowledge of what he is going to do with the trans-Canada airway system.

The Minister of Transport stated that the airways were to be taken care of by the Canadian National Railways, and that Mr. Hungerford, the head of the railways, is to be head of the airways. At first we were going to have fifty-one per cent of the stock; and the balance was going to be given to the public. However, so far not one dollar's worth has been sold to the public. It all remains with the Canadian National Railways. These gentlemen—President Hungerford, his officers and board of directors—have padlocked the whole Canadian National railway system, and it would take all the tons of dynamite used in the late war to get satisfactory information from that president and board of directors. They simply tell us it is none of our business. They are a corporation within themselves—and a corporation is not supposed to have any soul. But we have souls. We are responsible to the people who have sent us here. We are entitled to the information, and we should get it. We are not living in Russia. We are not living in Italy. We are not living in Germany. We are here, in a young and great democratic country, with infinite possibilities ahead of us. The democracy of this country is demonstrated by the fact that there are so many different groups outside the "two great parties" that have always been the leaders of the people.

A short time ago the Minister of Transport made a damaging statement with reference to air travel from Moncton to Halifax. He stated that there was too much fog and that too many people had been killed. When I asked him for detailed information, his answer was a smile. That information has not yet been given. I do not expect this information to-night, but I think the minister should assure me and other members of the committee that he will have the officers of his department tabulate all accidents which have happened since he has been head of the department. This tabulation should show the number of accidents that happened in the air, the number that happened when planes were approaching the landing ports, and the number that happened after the planes had landed. With that information before us we shall then know whether the statement should be retracted. I am quite sure that when the minister has that information he will be only too willing to retract his statement. It is a black eye, and we get too many of them down in the maritimes and particularly at the port of Halifax.

I do not want to say anything further about the port of Saint John, other than to say to my hon. friend that there is ten times as much fog in Saint John as ever comes into Halifax. The fog is off Halifax harbour; it does not come into the harbour. Flying would be perfectly safe if you had a radio beam. I can remember the first trip the minister took. He started off in thunder and lightning and had to come back when the beam was not working. They got it working and he took another try, landed in Winnipeg and finally arrived safely in Vancouver.

I should like him to reverse that trip. I want him to start, not in thunder and lightning, but on a starry night. I want him to fly east and I know he will find that the conditions he spoke of to-night do not exist. This trans-Canada system should extend from Vancouver to Halifax. That was my understanding of the undertaking when it was first mooted. It may be all right for the flyers if they are going to stop at Moncton or go down to Shediac. The Italian flyers flew there and they considered it the best place possible. They did not know anything about Canada and they had better get Mussolini to let them come back again. I am reminded of the famous flyer who landed at Toronto and then said he would never come back again. That was a damaging statement to be made by a pilot of outstanding ability.

I do not want to prolong this discussion, but I want to remind the minister that Nova Scotia is not being considered as part of this trans-Canada airway scheme. We do not want to be sectional, but we feel we are entitled to the same consideration as has been given to other parts of Canada. My hon. friend said to me in conversation that this year Halifax has had the greatest tonnage in shipping in her history. That may be so, but that does not mean that employment is given to our men. Many of the liners anchor back of "George island," and the tenders go out to meet them; the only money paid out is to the pilots and by way of port dues. The stevedores and dockworkers still remain at home and many of them, as well as their families, I sadly fear, are hungry to-night in their homes.

These conditions must be ameliorated. I think I speak for other hon. members from Nova Scotia as they spoke for themselves to-night, when I say that we are not going to put up with this treatment. We are not speaking in any narrow sense, but we feel that we should start right on this matter. We started wrong on the railways, so let us keep the airways out of the Canadian National Railways. The only information we can get about the railways as to money expended is the capital expenditures. If the bookkeeping for this system is to be the same as that used in the Canadian National Railways under President Hungerford and his board of directors, then there will be a fog all over Canada. We shall know less about the airways than we do about the railways, and about the railways we know practically nothing, apart from capital expenditures to better the system.

I do not make these remarks in a personal way; but in view of what has happened in the past, considering the present and looking down the vista of the future, I think we should start this thing right. I believe this has been exemplified by the action taken by the governments of the various provinces in connection with the amendments to the British North America Act and the righting of the wrongs that have been done under that act. Now is the time to deal with this matter and get it on a solid foundation. Then, with the expert knowledge which the minister has at his disposal, we shall be able to deal intelligently with the voting of these vast sums of money. The government seems to be disinterested as far as Nova Scotia is concerned, but I think we are entitled to get the information when, where and how—I mean "h-o-w", not the hon. minister, "H-o-w-e".

Mr. SPENCE: We have had a long discussion on a subject with which few of us are familiar. I congratulate the hon. member who has just sat down upon the pertinent remarks he has made. Attention should be given to what he has said. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North who said that he thought it would be a good thing to leave this matter to the minister. If I were in the place of the minister I believe I would select the best possible advice and operate these flying boats or flying ships from the places where the most business could be obtained. I would want to lose as little money as possible and make air travel as safe as I could, and I would pay very little attention to hon. members who wanted to give advice, such as has been given to-night. We know that every hon. member would like to have a flying ship landed in his own back yard.

Mr. FINN: I have no back yard. I live in the eastern gateway of Canada. We all know what is carved in the stone on the front of this house of parliament:

> The wholesome sea is at her gates,
> Her gates both east and west.

Mr. SPENCE: Hon. members from the maritimes are taking exception to the fact that this route is not being extended to the maritimes. I do not think the maritimes have been neglected, at least not since I entered the house in 1921. When our party was in power we looked after their ports; we took days to discuss the coal question and weeks to talk about fisheries and fishing. I do not think the government should be criticized for not bringing an airship to every one of their towns and villages.

Reference has been made to the accessibility of the island airport at Toronto. We had some difficulty in getting put through the house a vote of something under a million dollars with which to build a tunnel under the western channel. The tender was awarded and $150,000 was spent on the job. When this government came into power they cancelled the whole thing and wasted $150,000. You will never have proper access until you have a tunnel under the western channel. As regards transporting passengers from airplanes by chain ferry, that is just a piece of nonsense. To use the motor launches owned by the harbour board would be impossible. You will be forced to build a tunnel under the harbour, and the city will be forced to build a road to the tunnel, which they kicked about doing before. The mayor of Toronto opposed the tunnel; he was the only one in the city who did, and that gave the new Minister of Public Works in this government the chance to back out and cancel the contract altogether.

The hon. member for Peel mentioned the Malton airport in Peel county as one of the greatest airports in the world. The city of Toronto paid well for it. The government should never have bought a landing field in Peel county, but should have bought it in York county where the city of Toronto is situated. However, that is gone by the board now, and we cannot cancel it. But I hope the minister will operate his flying service from the ports where he can get the best business, where he can travel the safest route and lose the least money. There is bound to be a deficit on the service for the first few years, but I hope he will not make the railways lose any more money.

Mr. MacNICOL: Change the government and all the services will be paying.

Mr. SPENCE: I would not promise that; I am not giving to making promises, and if I were the minister I would be making very few. He has been asked many questions to-night to which no man can give an intelligent answer. I am not blaming him, because people are asking him questions that no man can answer. The minister is telling the committee what he thinks might happen, but it is purely conjecture, to be taken for what it is worth.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would it not be possible for the trans-Canada air route to be wholly across Canada, without going over any part of the United States? My second question is: What proportion of the cost of airports is borne by the municipalities and what by the dominion government?

Mr. HOWE: It would be possible, of course, to fly to the maritime provinces without crossing over any part of the United States, but it would increase the distance. It is not the intention to stop at any point in the United States. The present route is chosen because it is shorter, just as the planes flying from New York to Chicago cross over a part of Ontario. We have a reciprocal arrangement with the United States. We reserved the right to cross over Maine when we gave the right to United States planes to cross over Ontario. If there was any particular reason why we should not fly over the United States, we could still get to the maritimes, but it would increase the distance by 210 miles, and there seems to be no purpose in doing that.

In reply to my hon. friend's second question, the municipalities build airports with their own funds. The government started a policy about a year and a half ago of helping the municipal airports so that they could be brought up to the trans-Canada standard, and under that policy the government will ultimately contribute one-quarter of the total cost of the airport. It means that if the city has already spent $300,000 on an airport, it qualifies for a government grant of $100,000 to spend on additional development; after the $400,000 is spent, if another $100,000 is needed, the city is required to pay seventy-five per cent and the government twenty-five per cent.

Mr. McCANN: Has the company established a schedule of passenger rates yet, and, if so, what approximately will be the rate from Montreal to Vancouver?

Mr. HOWE: Airplane travel costs, roughly, six cents a mile. The matter of rates has not been brought to my attention, but I dare say some people are studying it. I could not answer the question.

Mr. BARBER: I would like to take the minister and the committee back to the coast again, as we have now spent considerable time in the east. I think it was the policy of the department, when the idea of the trans-Canada service was first considered, to establish emergency landing fields about thirty miles apart. In the fall of 1934 officers of the department made a survey by plane, and selected landing fields particularly in the southern part of British Columbia. The minister mentioned two of them to-night. One of them was the emergency landing field at Hope, and the other was the emergency landing field at Langley. In that survey there was an emergency landing field at Hope, another one thirty miles west at Chilliwack, and thirty miles further west took them to Langley airport. A number of people, including those who own private airplanes and do considerable flying, are of the opinion that the department has made a mistake in abandoning Chilliwack landing field and taking up Langley. I am sure if the minister personally visited the two places—I know he went over that district one day, but he was too high up in the clouds to see the location of the two fields—he would realize the superiority of Chilliwack. First, let me point out that the Chilliwack landing field is used to-day, and has been for some time, by eight planes. It consists of 160 acres; does not require drainage, but it might require a little finishing and the putting in of runways. In 1935 the government secured an option on it for $16,000, or $100 an acre, and that item appeared in the estimates for two sessions; but immediately on civil aviation being transferred to the new department over which the minister presides, that item was eliminated from the estimates.

I find now that work is being proceeded with at the Langley airport, where ninety acres of land have been purchased at a cost of $24,411.60; I do not know how they get those odd figures. This figures out at $272 an acre, and they have expended on the field to date $48,437. In other words, the port so far has cost $72,848, and the estimated amount required to complete the field is $15,925, making a total cost of $88,773. That is the picture we have of the Langley field, and it would not be too bad if it was a field that airplanes could land on; but airmen who are passing up and down tell me that it certainly would be some great emergency before they would ever undertake to land there. The field is located at the foot of a hill, and is right in the fog belt, as bad if not a worse fog belt than Vancouver, and the field subject to flood. I have an extract from an independent paper published in the district, which I think I had better read to show the committee what the people there think of this field:

If the latter amount—

That is the $72,848 already spent:

—has been spent to get the field into its present condition, most observers will doubt the statement that $16,000 will complete it. The condition of the field was well expressed the other day by a strong Liberal when he said that there was too much water on it for land planes and not enough for sea planes. From the field's appearance during recent weeks it would require a rotary drill to find any plane that might be forced to land anywhere in the 90-acre block. Then there is the matter of fog which so frequently envelopes the field. Experts in these matters may know what they are about but to the layman the demonstration so far lacks much of what might be expressed in terms of practicability.

As regards fog conditions, I repeat that I believe, if the minister himself had seen those two fields and inquired personally about them, he would not have hesitated one minute to choose the Chilliwack field. Why has the Langley field been chosen? First, political pressure on the minister.

Mr. HOWE: Bought in 1934, was it not?

Mr. BARBER: That does not make any difference. Options were taken on all these fields in 1935.

Mr. HOWE: 1934, I think.

Mr. BARBER: The reply to the question is 1935. The first was 1935. An option was taken at Chilliwack at the same time on one hundred and sixty acres. I am not blaming the minister personally. I would not accuse him of doing this. I believe there was considerable pressure brought to bear on him from the minister for British Columbia and from the hon. member for New Westminster, and I believe he has been misinformed by the officers of his department. I have asked for correspondence, which has not been brought down here yet, although the order for return passed the house on the fourteenth instant.

Before I left Chilliwack for the east, a letter was read to the executive of the board of trade, which reached there through Liberal channels, stating that the reason the development there was not proceeded with was that conditions in the Chilliwack district are the same as in Vancouver and Langley. That is absolutely false. Eight machines have been taking off and flying from that field during last year. One has kept a careful log which shows that there was not one day during 1937 when they could not land and take off from that field. What do we know about the Vancouver field? And Langley? Any one who travels by automobile knows that he can leave Vancouver in sunshine, get in the fog belt at Langley and break out again within ten or fifteen miles of Chilliwack field. I am advised the United air lines could not land in Vancouver from December 3 to December 23; that was but one period among others when they could not land. I say to the minister that the log which was kept last year shows that this Chilliwack field is not in the fog belt, and there is not an air man who travels that country, not a man who drives a car up and down to Vancouver, but will tell him that the fog reaches to within ten or fifteen miles west of the Chilliwack airport. That fog is like a wall. These men have taken off in their machines, gone over that wall, over that ceiling and back again. I wish the minister would look personally into this.

The department is going to spend $90,000 on a field in the Langley district. The expenditure of the money will do considerable good as far as employment is concerned, but it is the opinion of a number of air men in both Chilliwack and district that they will never be able to use that field, whereas the other one is being used to-day. That option can be renewed at $16,000, and if it were necessary to spend another $10,000 the cost would not be within a third of what the Langley field is costing. I say without hesitation that there has been political pressure to have this field established at Langley. Some Liberals in my riding have not hesitated to say, "The reason you have not got the field is because you elected a Conservative member." I do not blame the minister personally; I do not believe he would consider the political angle in connection with a policy of establishing an air line across Canada. I do not think he would say, "Here is a Conservative constituency; we cannot put our line through that, we will dodge down through the United States and back again to miss it." I believe that if the matter had been left to the minister personally; if he had gone in and looked over the situation, there would have been no doubt about his decision. I believe the department will have to come to the Chilliwack field. It was mentioned at a meeting in Vancouver the other day, that if they arrived at Vancouver in a fog, they would likely have to return to Lethbridge. I believe they fly at a height of 16,000 feet. I have done a little travelling by air, and I understand that what they do, in case of fog, is to land as closely as they can to the terminus and from there take other transportation. We were in hopes that the Chilliwack field would serve for that purpose, a field of 160 acres which has been used for a number of years.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Does the vote carry?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. HOWE: If we have made a mistake in choosing a field out there we shall very soon realize it. Once the planes are operating daily, if we need additional facilities the fact will become quite obvious and we shall have to look about for them. But I think at the moment we are so close to having an actual demonstration of the situation there, through every day flying, that we should wait and get that information.

Mr. BARBER: I am sure the local air men would be pleased to permit the minister to land on that field some day when he finds he cannot reach Vancouver.

Mr. HOWE: Thank you very much.

Mr. BARBER: Because they tell me the largest plane that reaches the coast could land on that field to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the minister must regard the statement which has just been made as one of great seriousness. Are we to throw away eighty or ninety thousand dollars of this country's money? It is not a question of finding out a mistake and remedying it; the question is, Shall we throw away the money now that the facts have been stated? I have been at the coast several times this last year, and undoubtedly the view prevails that that place is entirely too wet to make a decent airport, at least for a land plane, and there is not enough water for a sea plane. The hon. member has brought that to the attention of the minister and has said to him: This merits investigation before further public money is expended. A man who certainly never mixes in politics, talking about business and business administration and the capacity of the minister as a business man, said he was surprised that the minister would permit this thing to be done. I wonder if the minister realizes just what is meant by it? It means we are going to throw away eighty or ninety thousand dollars on a place which cannot be made into an airport, and it cannot be made into an airport for two good reasons: One is fog, and the other is damp; one is water, the other is the condition of the air. I submit to the minister that if ever there was a case brought to the attention of the head of the department that merited the closest investigation before a single additional dollar is spent, this is that case. The minister knows perfectly well that when we had to acquire these sites away back in 1934 and 1935, some in the early part of 1935, and some in connection with relief works, what was done was not to content ourselves with taking one option; options were taken on more than one site, and then investigations were made in several cases for the purpose of ascertaining which was the better or the best, as the case might be.

I put this to the minister as a business man. In the conduct of his business, if it were represented to him by reputable people that conditions were such that it would be impossible to utilize a particular property for the purpose for which it was acquired, would he proceed without making further investigation? From what I know of him as a business executive he would not do so. To-day he is a minister, and all the pressure in the world, from all the friends in the world, should not permit him to go forward with an expenditure of public moneys without satisfying himself that that is the better site. Any other action on his part would, under our system of government, certainly place him in a most difficult position. It would not, of course, if a very large number of supporters stated that his conclusions were sound, whatever they might be. That is the essence of party government, but it is not the essence of government if the minister is to utilize the vast experience and wide knowledge he has as a business man in determining what is the best thing that can be done for the state in the expenditure of public moneys.

One word more to my friends from the maritime provinces. However difficult it may be, I never forget that I was born there; and when I realize that all the members from the lower provinces, except one, support the government in power, I realize how difficult their position is with respect to this matter. But I put this to the minister and ask him to balance it up on this basis: If you are warranted in providing a subsidy for the operation of an air service between Edmonton and the Yukon, having a population to be served with mail as limited as it is, do you think for a single moment that the maritimes should be treated in this manner? Apply that test, just that simple, single test. Later I am going to direct attention to something that came to my own notice, which would not be tolerated in western Canada. Do you realize that passengers, in order to board a train going to Saint John from Moncton—and this applies to aged people as well as the young—have to climb over a platform on a standing train? How long would that be tolerated in western Canada? And yet that is the condition which exists in the maritimes. That is the reason the maritimes complain, and properly so, about the treatment they receive.

I wrote to both the general manager and the president with respect to this treatment. The answer was, "Oh well, it has been going on a long time." Of course it has, and the people there have suffered and have endured it. But we would not tolerate it. Take the old station at Toronto. Everyone knows that the minute the train came in, it was cut in two in order that passengers might cross on level tracks. I saw an old lady down in the maritimes lifting herself up slowly, without assistance, over a platform on a standing car of the maritime express and then going down the other side in order to get on the train that would take her to Saint John. I asked, "Don't you split these trains?" I was told that they never do.

Surely it is no political consideration that urges me to make these observations, for we have no supporters from that part of the country. I would point out, however, that that sort of thing should not be tolerated. Here we find the oldest part of confederation treated in this manner, and we are told that there is plenty of money provided for a new line, a private enterprise, from Edmonton to the Yukon, a mail subsidy being given, when we know what the population in that part of the country is. We know what the population is in the Yukon and between the Yukon and Edmonton, and we know also that there are hundreds of thousands of people in the maritime provinces. We know that the largest steel industry in Canada is situated in Nova Scotia; and the people of that province, the people of Saint John and all the community that lies around it will be told, "Oh well, some day somebody will come along and give you a service and we will help them along with some assistance." That is not fair; it is not equitable, having regard to what I have said about the expenditure of public moneys and in view of statements made in this chamber by a member of this house. If it rested on that alone it might be said to be political, but consult any business man you please. That is the situation. Let us try to see if we cannot lift this thing up a little at least out of the fog of politics into the purer air of business transactions.

Mr. HOWE: As regards the Langley Prairie airport, I inherited that. When it came to my attention, the land had been bought and the contract let to develop it. We let no new contract there and I know nothing about it personally. My officers tell me that it is the best piece of land in that vicinity. Since definite statements are made that it is not a suitable place, on the next occasion on which I go to Vancouver I shall personally examine it, and no new contract will be placed there in the meantime.

Let us understand the maritime situation. I am giving the maritime provinces the best system I know how to give them. I am not giving them a second-rate system. What is the alternative? Suppose we ran a high speed plane from Montreal to Halifax. You could hardly pass by Saint John if you went to Halifax. Well, suppose we stopped at Saint John. It is estimated by my department that such a route would have an operating efficiency of sixty per cent; we would complete about sixty per cent of the scheduled trips. With the route we have we can complete at least ninety per cent. Ninety days out of every hundred we have delivered our mail in Moncton. We have it in Moncton, anyway. If it is impossible to fly to Halifax any particular day, we can put it on the train and get it in within a few hours.

Mr. BENNETT: But there is no assurance of a movement to Halifax or to Saint John either. That is the whole trouble.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. HOWE: What nonsense that is.

Mr. BENNETT: Thank you.

Mr. HOWE: Coming to the city of Regina, what do we do? We call for a specification for a route to serve the five prairie cities. We specify the type of equipment and the speed of the planes. We specify the number of stops to be made, and we require a guarantee of at least ninety-two per cent efficiency. We have said to the aviators of the world, "This is the equipment we must have; this is the schedule; this is the efficiency required. Bid us a price on mail at which you will perform that service."

Mr. BENNETT: Has that been done at Halifax?

Mr. HOWE: Not yet.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point.

Mr. HOWE: When we are prepared for a service from Moncton we shall then similarly call for tenders from Moncton to Charlottetown, from Moncton to Sydney, from Moncton to Halifax and from Moncton to Saint John; and we shall specify the equipment. It will not be cheap equipment any more than it is in Saskatchewan; it will be just as good equipment, as comfortable from the passenger standpoint. However, the distances are short and the equipment will not be speedy, because such equipment is not required there. It will be equipment of the type that will land on the sort of field which can be built in Halifax and Saint John, the type of equipment that can be manoeuvred in difficult weather conditions; and we shall have a beam into each of these cities, so that flying will be done on just as good a beam as there is in the mainland operation. We shall have suitable facilities to handle passengers and mail at these points. We find, however, that with a small operation it is better to have private enterprise than public.

Mr. FINN: It should be all one enterprise from Vancouver to Halifax.

Mr. HOWE: If the maritimes feel that we should have government operation there, we shall have government operation. Personally I think they would be better served the other way. However, I do not suppose the expense to the dominion government would be very much different, and I would be prepared to discuss with the maritime delegation having Trans-Canada Air Lines operate those auxiliary services from the centre at Moncton. But it is perfect nonsense for any member to say here that we are not giving the maritime provinces the best. The reason we are stopping at Moncton is that it is the best thing for the maritime provinces. If it were better to stop at Halifax we would stop at Halifax; if Saint John were better we would stop at Saint John. But what nonsense it is to say that we are not giving the maritime provinces the best it is possible to give, consistent with the service we are giving any other part of Canada. I want to make it clear that nothing of the kind is intended and nothing of the kind will be done.

Mr. BENNETT: A United States line offered to run and did run from Boston to Halifax.

Mr. HOWE: Why doesn't it still?

Mr. BENNETT: Because in the days of the old government we did not want to make ourselves dependent on a United States company.

Mr. HOWE: Quite right, and we are not going to either. However, we have a line pushing up as far as Bangor and anxious to go further. There will be ways to get to Boston from Halifax, because they fly from Boston to Montreal in two hours.

Mr. BENNETT: It was suggested they could fly from Montreal to Saint John and across the bay of Fundy straight to Halifax.

Mr. HOWE: That could be done, but it is fog operation; it would not be good.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, there is difference of opinion as to that.

Mr. HOWE: However, we are going to see that the maritime provinces are properly served just as soon as it is possible to provide that service. But we are taking the things as we found them; when we took the department over we found the fields further advanced in the west and capable of being completed in a shorter time. We believed that the way to get the line in operation was to start operation, and we found that the quickest way to start operating was to concentrate on the completion of the fields from Winnipeg west. Now we are at the point that we can start operating that section. We are going to work east just as rapidly as we can. By midsummer we shall be in Montreal. It is possible we shall be at Moncton and on to Halifax at the end of this season; but I doubt it; I think it is more likely to be the beginning of next season.

Mr. BENNETT: I am obliged to the minister for talking about nonsense. I am not directing his attention to the fact that it is not a parliamentary expression; I am content that he should make the statement. But I think he should realize this, that they were running an air line from Moncton to Charlottetown four years ago—

Mr. HOWE: And they are running it to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly. And the west that he talks about—and I live there—had not developed these lines. What is more, they have been running to Halifax during the last four years. And what is more, they have been running from Montreal to Moncton during the last four years.

Mr. HOWE: An occasional trip.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; I am only indicating that the feasibility of it is established; that is the point. There is no question about its not being easy to do, or anything of that sort. And we have reached the point that we have made no arrangement whatever that contemplates air mail service being made available in the provinces of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick except as the mail arrives at Moncton for distribution.

Mr. HOWE: Quite right.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the story, and I say that is not in keeping with the other plans which have been placed before this country. While I owe only the allegiance that a man has by reason of birth in a particular locality, I do not think it is quite fair that we should spend all our effort in endeavouring to establish what they call feeder lines and other lines. Calgary is to be in the position of being on a feeder line. Large sums of money have been expended there, power and lighthouses established, routes surveyed, and now they say, "Well, the old field is not satisfactory for modern planes." And they need something else. The Department of National Defence, on which we have spent a large sum to provide an air field, is not going to cooperate with the Department of Transport for the purpose of using that piece of ground, bought by the crown, for the purpose of an air field. It is not going to be used because the Department of National Defence say it is not consonant with their dignity. I say that is wrong. I think the minister realizes that there is something wrong about that, when he says, "I asked the Minister of National Defence to do so and so but he does not want to let me have it." Have we reached that stage in this country when in regard to a field bought and equipped with the taxpayers' money, used for national defence, and with room enough to enable it to be used for civil aviation as well, they say, "Oh no, we cannot do that." Cooperation certainly means something better than that.

The minister knows this committee, this house would support him if he took the position that he must have the use of that field.

Why have two fields in one community? Why have one airport in Calgary for civil aviation and another for military aviation? It is there on top of the hill; atmospheric conditions are excellent; all that is necessary to do is to start a machine down the runway and get it off or to land there. I admit that there are certain strategic considerations which have to do with military airports, but they do not arise in connection with this matter. I say the minister would be warranted in taking a much stronger stand than to say, "The Minister of National Defence does not want me to go there." Well, the people want it; they paid for it and they have a right to it. Is it thus to remain idle—that is what it would mean practically—not be utilized for commercial purposes and the carrying of mail? After all we have done in connection with the expenditures for airports and lighting, I think that is wrong.

I am sure if the minister were similarly situated with respect to Port Arthur he would expect that some such arrangement would be made to permit this splendid airport to be used by both branches of our air service, civil aviation on the one hand and military on the other. I am sure the minister would not regard that as nonsense in business, from what I know of his capacity as a business man. In his business before he came into this house or since, he would not; or in the development of any work he has had to do, whether it were the preparation of a site for an elevator or the construction of an elevator, he would expect to coordinate every bit of facilities to attain the end he has in mind. All we want to do is to coordinate the airport facilities for the double purpose of civil aviation on the one hand and military on the other.

Mr. BETTS: Would the minister let us know how far the officers of his department will go in cooperating with civic authorities who are trying to choose a site for an airport? Will they advise and help and give the benefit of their experience and skill?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, we shall be very glad to cooperate with any city that cares to have our cooperation. Whether we can assist them financially depends on how it works in with the general scheme.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it under this item that the employment of the gentlemen whom the minister mentioned the other evening at the Chateau Laurier would come?

Mr. HOWE: No.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: I think this item had better remain over until the next day. There are some things to be said.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, February 25, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING COMMITTEES

INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS—MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Taylor (Nanaimo) be substituted for that of Miss Macphail on the select standing committee on industrial and international relations.

That the name of Mr. MacNeil be substituted for that of Mr. Taylor (Nanaimo) on the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

That the name of Mr. Heaps be substituted for that of Mr. Douglas on the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

That the name of Mr. Damude be substituted for that of Mr. Mayhew on the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Motions agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. REID

On the order for motions:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege in connection with certain remarks made last evening by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber). Speaking in connection with the landing fields at Chilliwack and Langley Prairie, the hon. member made personal references to myself which I desire to correct.

The hon. member is reported on page 804 as follows:

I know there was considerable pressure brought to bear on him from the minister for British Columbia and from the hon. member for New Westminister, and I believe he has been misinformed by the officers of his department.

The hon. member was here referring to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). Never at any time, Mr. Speaker, have I used pressure of any kind upon any minister or anyone else in regard to either Chilliwack or Langley Prairie airport sites.

The only representations I made were in 1936 just after this government came into office. At that time I found that the late Conservative government had taken options on property owned by two of the most notorious Conservatives in Langley Prairie.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: This is not an explanation. The hon. member had the right to be in his place to listen to what was said and correct it at once.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should not make a speech.

Mr. REID: I have every right to defend my honour and I am going to do so. The statement is utterly false. I was not in my place because I was attending to business in my room in connection with my freight rates bill. This statement is not true; it is false.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): As far as the "minister for British Columbia" is concerned, it is false.

Mr. BENNETT: "False" is not the correct word to use.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is neither accurate nor correct.

BONE CREEK, SASK., FARMERS

LACK OF FEED FOR LIVE STOCK AND NEED OF RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Before the orders of the day are called I should like to direct the attention of the government to a certain matter. I would have informed the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) of my intention to bring it up, but I was advised of it just before I came into the chamber. It is alleged that some seventy farmers of Bone Creek municipality have received only from fifty to sixty-five per cent of their winter hay. It is claimed that the last delivery was made on February 2, and that their live stock is starving. They have interviewed the council without result and have wired Mr. Taggart and Mr. Kember at Regina. They have asked me to bring this matter to the attention of the house. I do not expect that the minister will be able to deal with it at the moment, but I give him this information in order that he may have the opportunity of taking such action as the necessities of the case demand.

FEEDING OF WESTERN CATTLE COMPLAINT OF ONTARIO FARMERS AS TO MARKETING OF STOCK OBTAINED FROM WESTERN DROUGHT AREA AND LARGE RANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): Before the orders of the day are called I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to several complaints I had received from farmers in my riding who purchased cattle in the dry areas last fall, brought them to Ontario and fed them through the winter. These cattle are now ready for market but they find they are unable to sell them. Their complaint is that 100,000 of these cattle were brought into Ontario last year and the local market has not been able to absorb them. They find also that there is a shortage of space in ocean going vessels for export purposes. I have a letter here from a farmers' club signed by the president and secretary, in which they say:

> If we sold our cattle at present prices we stand to lose from $15 to $20 a head. But this is not the worst of it. We have large numbers of cattle now, for which we can find no buyers at all.

They have asked me in this letter to call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the situation because the department induced the farmers to buy these cattle and bring them to Ontario, and they feel that they ought to be given some assistance in marketing them.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the position respecting the shipping space for cattle which are now being fed in the province of Ontario is pretty much this. The demand for ocean space for cattle exports to the United Kingdom markets is developing beyond the capacity of the boats now plying between Canadian and British ports, with all boats fitted for the trade and in service now preparing to carry capacity loads. In view of this situation, which has developed during recent weeks, the possibilities of securing additional space for the cattle industry have been thoroughly explored by the dominion government, and it is fully expected that further accommodation for export cattle will be made available.

The chief difficulty is a shortage of hold and package freights, without which boats with accommodation suitable for cattle transportation would incur heavy financial losses on every eastbound crossing. That is to say, there is very little wheat for shipment this year due to the small crop of last year, and for that reason there is very little freight to go into the holds of boats, which would make possible a carriage of cattle at the usual rates. Under these circumstances, even guarantees given steamship companies for capacity cattle loads are not in themselves sufficient inducement to bring additional boats into the service. It is quite clear that additional space for cattle is contingent upon the securing of a minimum volume of hold and package freights. The Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce have this matter clearly in mind and are actively engaged in attempting to find a solution.

The steamship companies are anxious to cooperate and have indicated their desire to assist in every way possible. In other words, the steamship companies are quite willing to carry additional cattle, but realize that the carrying of cattle is directly dependent upon securing other cargoes. The opening of navigation on the St. Lawrence will improve all freight movements. An indication of the steamship companies' desire to cooperate is shown in the fact that they have already effected changes whereby additional space has been made available in the boats now in the service.

At present no cattle boats are unloading at the port of London and the possibilities of the receiving of cattle at that port are being thoroughly canvassed. The position is somewhat complicated by the fact that boats unloading at that port are carrying for the most part bacon that is being shipped from Canada to Great Britain, and the placing of cattle upon those boats would necessitate holding the boats over for from twelve to twenty-four hours in the port of London before unloading. It is not considered advisable, therefore, to put cattle on these boats, and thus hold up the unloading of the bacon.

During 1937 exports of cattle to the United Kingdom totalled 9,610 head. The capacity of the boats now in service to United Kingdom ports will accommodate 46,000 head during 1938. That space has all been booked up for the year. Only 46,000 head can be shipped with the space now available.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that members of the house will realize something of the difficulties when I say that in the previous year, that is two years ago, there were some 6,000 head shipped; in the following year somewhere between 36,000 and 40,000 head, and last year 9,610 head were shipped. This year there is a demand immediately for the shipment of probably some 20,000 head of cattle in addition to what there is space for. The fact that there are such variations in the demands made on shipping space between Canada and Great Britain has considerable to do with the present situation.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

As to the figures quoted with regard to the number of cattle brought down from the west, I think it will be found on close examination that only about 20,000 head of these being fed in the section of the country immediately concerned were actually shipped under the assisted passage scheme. Others were brought down partly because of encouragement given to shippers to go west. I am told, and we have had investigation made in the countries concerned, that the great majority of the cattle that are creating difficulties because of the prices paid are not cattle that came out of the immediate drought area but are cattle that came off the large ranges, and for which farmers paid a considerable price. Their agents who went west purchased the cattle and brought them down. Most of the cattle that passed through the Carberry pasturage were purchased at prices that make it still possible for the farmer probably to break even, even if he cannot do any better at the moment, and of course any future advance in prices would be to his advantage.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the matter with the American market?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to give details with regard to that, but I know that there was a considerable number of cattle moved out of western Canada and out of the western states into the feeding areas of the United States where corn was plentiful, and those cattle would be coming on to the American market about this time.

SHOP CARDS REGISTRATION

REQUEST THAT BILL NO. 22 STAND FOR OPINION OF DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), in relation to Bill No. 22 respecting the registration of shop cards by labour unions, which was introduced by the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) and is, I understand, a government measure, whether it would not be possible to have the opinion of the Department of Justice before the bill is further proceeded with, as to whether, if passed, it is intra vires of this parliament. I had considerable experience with a similar proposal at the time the Unfair Competition Act, 1932, was passed. It was then proposed that a similar provision should be inserted in that bill, and when the bill was before the banking and commerce committee all the lawyers who appeared before it were, I think, unanimous in their opinion that the provision was ultra vires of the parliament of Canada. I think it would be expedient that we should have an opinion from the Department of Justice as to whether it is intra vires of this parliament, before we proceed with the bill or report it out of committee of the whole. If the Minister of Justice could deem it possible to accede to that suggestion, I think it would be very helpful to us.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to do what my hon. friend has just asked.

FOREIGN POLICY

ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT AS TO BRITISH POLICY AFFECTING LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND RELATIONS WITH ITALY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the recent statements made by the Prime Minister of Great Britain expressing non-confidence in the League of Nations and foreshadowing a concordat with fascist Italy, has the government of Canada been consulted regarding changes in policy; and, if so, has approval been given by the government?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend was kind enough to advise me of his intention to ask this question, and I am therefore in a position to give him an answer immediately, but before doing so I should like to bring his attention and that of other hon. members to the rule of this house with respect to how questions are to be put and answered. Standing order 44 reads:

> Questions may be placed on the order paper seeking information from ministers of the crown relating to public affairs; and to other members, relating to any bill, motion, or other public matter connected with the business of the house, in which such members may be concerned; but in putting any such question or in replying to the same no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain the same. And in answering any such question the matter to which the same refers shall not be debated.

I would direct attention also to the citation from May, which appears in paragraph 349 on page 113 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms:

> The purpose of a question is to obtain information and not to supply it to the house. A question may not contain statements of facts unless they be necessary to make the question intelligible and can be authenticated; nor should a question contain arguments, inferences, imputations, epithets or controversial or ironical expressions.

Now may I read my hon. friend's question:

> In view of the recent statements made by the Prime Minister of Great Britain expressing non-confidence in the League of Nations and foreshadowing a concordat with fascist Italy, has the government of Canada been consulted regarding changes in policy, and if so, has approval been given by the government?

It was I think unnecessary for my hon. friend in asking his question to say that the statements recently made by the Prime Minister of Great Britain expressed "non-confidence in the League of Nations and foreshadowed a concordat with fascist Italy." It was not necessary to have inserted those words, and according to the rule of the house I have quoted, those words should not have been included. Also:

> Has the government of Canada been consulted regarding changes in policy?

Those words "changes in policy" also raise a controversial question and are not necessary for the information which the hon. member seeks.

Yesterday I was reluctantly obliged to draw attention to a question asked by another hon. member and to point out that it was not a proper question to ask. While the government is most anxious to give the house all the information possible on matters of public interest, it should I think, be recognized that we have to be particularly careful at this time not to ask in this house questions, with respect to what happens in the parliaments of other parts of the British empire or parliaments of any country anywhere, in a form which will be misunderstood and will occasion embarrassment or resentment there or elsewhere. The question should be put in a form which will permit of a direct answer being given thereto. If my hon. friends' question is, "in view of recent statements by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, has the government been consulted regarding policy with reference thereto, and if so has approval been given by the government?"—I believe that covers what he wishes to know—my answer would be, no, the government has not been consulted with regard to the policies referred to, nor has the government expressed any opinion with reference thereto.

DIVERSION OF WATER

PROPOSED RAISING OF GREAT LAKES WATER LEVEL—INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): On February 17 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a question with reference to a letter—I shall now have to be careful in referring to another government—which had been read the day before in Washington to the United States congress, and which was written by the premier of Ontario, with reference to diversion of waters from the great lakes. I am sure that if the Prime Minister of Canada read the letter of the premier of Ontario he would be astonished at its contents. In replying to my question the Prime Minister said he would this week give the house a white paper containing full particulars of all the correspondence between this government and the Ontario government with regard to the matter which was brought up at Washington. It has not come down yet. May I ask when it will be tabled?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am glad that the hon. member has asked me that question, because at the time I answered the question to which he has referred I fully expected that the white paper would be ready to lay on the table this week. It is possible that it will be ready to lay on the table on Monday; I think I can promise my hon. friend that it will be ready at that time. It is a larger document than was anticipated, and it is being translated and printed in French as well as English; I should like if possible to table it in both languages at the same time.

While we are referring to this matter, may I inform the house that I have delayed going on with the second reading of the export of power bill until the house had before it these various communications, as I believe the house will wish to have that material available for reference in the course of debate. If the correspondence is tabled on Monday I shall hope to proceed with the second reading of the power export bill on Tuesday, unless there is some objection. If there should be desire for a longer delay I would take it up a little later on.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would it be possible to include in the white paper the remarkable letter that the premier of Ontario sent to Washington?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The white paper —I think it ought to be called the white book—is being presented in book form, and I fear that to do what the hon. member asks would involve the opening of the forms and repaging. But what I shall do, if it will meet the hon. member's wishes, is to table with the white book a copy of that particular correspondence.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. MacNICOL: A copy of the letter of the premier of Ontario written to Congressman W. G. Andrews.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All I can do is to reproduce, in photostat form if the hon. member so wishes, the communication that was placed on the Congressional Record at Washington.

Mr. BENNETT: I understood the Prime Minister to say that he has not received a copy of the letter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I have not.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

Direct payments to veterans and dependents—European war pensions, $40,900,000.

Mr. POWER: I find that on February 18 last, in reply to a question put by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) I unwittingly made an incorrect reply with respect to the number of decisions given in favour of the applicant on first hearing. Perhaps I may be permitted to place more accurate figures on the pages of Hansard.

Dealing with the year 1936-37 and from April 1, 1937, up to January 31, 1938, I find: First hearings granted 1,374, not granted 3,049, total 4,423; second hearings: granted 14, not granted 211, total 225; quorums: granted 732, not granted 3,694, total 4,426; pension appeal court: granted 53, not granted 2,423. There were remitted for hearing, 46; without jurisdiction, 5; pending, 37; not heard, 1,174. The percentages are worked out for 1937-38 up to January 31, 1938. On the first hearing there were granted for 1937-38, 1,375 and not granted 2,472, or a total of 3,847. That is to say, 35 per cent of the total cases brought up on first hearing were given entitlement.

Mr. BENNETT: Without appeal being taken afterwards.

Mr. POWER: Without any appeal whatever. There is no right of appeal by the crown from the first hearing. On the second hearing there were granted, for 1937-38, 162, and not granted 1,737, a total of 1,899, or 9 per cent. As regards the quorums, for the same period, there were 233 granted and 1,256 not granted, a total of 1,489; in other words, 15 per cent were granted by the quorums. With respect to the Pension Appeal Court there were granted 52—not granted, 2,021—or two and a half per cent of the total. To recapitulate, on the first hearing 35 per cent are awarded in favour of the applicant; on the second hearing 9 per cent in favour of the applicant; before the quorum 15 per cent, and before the Pension Appeal Court two and a half per cent.

Perhaps I had better go on to the discussion of this item. It is obvious why there is a reduction of some $600,000.

Mr. GREEN: Is there an appeal by the crown from the pension commission to the quorum?

Mr. POWER: There is no appeal except from decisions of the quorum.

Mr. GREEN: Would it be possible to have the appeal by the crown from the decisions of the quorum done away with?

Mr. POWER: That is a matter for consideration; it is being considered. The whole difficulty would be whether or not some other system could be found to substitute for it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the position of the war widows of Canada. No doubt hon. members have received a great many letters from these women, and I may say that I attended, at their request, a meeting held in Toronto by one of their associations. I thought it would be better for them to put in writing their individual cases so that they could be submitted to the department. We must not forget that in the early days when we were recruiting Canada promised that none of the dependents of her soldiers who went overseas would be left uncared for. Canada, I believe, has done her job to a great extent, but we have partly fallen down so far as war widows are concerned.

There are two or three reasons why, under the legislation as it stands, they are not properly looked after. There is the difficulty of building up the case for these widows so as to associate with war service the deaths of their husbands. When they cannot prove that death is attributable to a pensionable disease they are usually out of luck. I do not think that anyone can prove that the immediate cause of death is the real cause; very often death is probably attributable to the pensionable disability. In very many instances men have died of arterio sclerosis or cancer, or an ulcer, or something of that kind, some complaint which is not the pensionable disability, while there is no doubt that the pensionable disability has a direct bearing upon the immediate cause of death.

Another thing is this. Is there any particular reason why a war widow should have her pension cut off when the pensioner dies? I do not see any reason why she should. We must remember that a great many soldiers after the war wanted to get out of the service as quickly as possible, and consequently they were discharged perhaps rather prematurely. There is no doubt that many of them at that time were suffering from some disease attributable to the war, but owing to the circumstances under which they were discharged they find themselves to-day out of luck. And for the same reason war widows are out of luck at the present time. It would be better, in my opinion, if the pensionable disability were taken into consideration and given more weight in awarding pensions to war widows. Some change should be made in the legislation, for the plight of these war widows is terrible.

In the gathering which I attended in Toronto I do not believe that every one of those women thought they should have pensions. In any event they were mostly women whose husbands had received pensions, the pensions having been cut off at the death, and now the widows find themselves destitute. They gave great service to these soldiers who had been receiving pensions and they did not get very much out of it themselves. The least we can do is to have the legislation take care of the present situation so far as war widows are concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: There has been organized in the city of Calgary a substantial body of women whose husbands, having served overseas, are now dead. These women are in a desperate condition. The contention—and I think it is one which it is difficult to overcome—is that their husbands died, and I am putting it mildly, as they request me to do, earlier in life than they would have but for the service they gave the country. That is putting it on a low basis. Their contention is that being deprived of the ability of their husbands to earn a living for either themselves or their children they are now in almost necessitous circumstances; and they seek from the government a recognition of their position, just as the government has recognized the condition of the soldier who receives assistance through the relief organization that has been set up by the department.

At first I thought that the case was much simpler than it is. Looking into the matter in detail I find many cases that are known to me personally. I have a list of them beside me and it is quite clear that the husbands of these women served in some instances with great distinction, but in every instance at the risk of their lives, in France and elsewhere, mostly in a theatre of war. I do not say that all of them did, but for the most part they were in a theatre of war. The husbands of these women were not pensioned at the time of their death; some of them had received some slight recognition which was cut off, but the major number that I am speaking of now are cases in which the husband was not receiving a pension at the time of his death. The efforts that they have made to secure recognition by the department have failed because it was determined by the appropriate persons that the deaths could not be attributable to service. The same matter was discussed the other evening. In the case of many of these widows—I did not wish to go into it then, for obvious reasons, because you do not want to make it more difficult to deal with the simple problem by mixing it with others—this problem in one aspect is a simple one. We do care for necessitous cases of disabled soldiers who are unable to take care of themselves and whose condition is attributable to the war. If they have left behind them widows and children, I suggest to the minister, when he is framing his legislation, that if an annuity cannot be provided, the widow and children should at least be given the same treatment as that which would be given to the soldier if he were living and found himself in a similar condition of necessity.

