Mr. MacNICOL: Before the minister answers I should like to say something about this matter. I was invited to a soldiers' widows meeting in the soldiers' club rooms on Isabella street in Toronto, at which about two hundred were present. Apparently they are organizing and propose to have the organization extend all over Canada, and I have no doubt that in due course unless some redress is given they will come down in a large delegation to present their case, as has been said. On that occasion I took a list of a number of cases and the particulars. I have in mind one or two which are perhaps representative. One was a returned soldier who was in the habit of having fainting spells; apparently his heart was weak. One morning he had a fainting spell. His widow says that on the same day while having lunch he had another spell, and apparently some food became lodged in his throat. The doctor who performed the post mortem reported to the department that the man had choked to death swallowing his food. No one would believe that he deliberately choked himself to death. I do not want to pass any comment on what the doctor did, but the fact is that his widow did not receive any compensation, although before his death the man was receiving pension.

Recently a returned soldier trying to make ends meet had gone to northern Ontario and taken a position I believe at Collins, northwest of Port Arthur. Being unable to carry on, on account of weakness, he decided to walk to the station some twenty or more miles away, and it appears that he fell on the road and was frozen to death in sight of the station. The post mortem report was that he died from natural causes, having been frozen to death. I have nothing but the very kindest words to say of the department; I have found the officials at all times considerate and anxious to help, and they are no doubt doing the best they can, but apparently the law does not permit them to deal with a case such as I have just mentioned, in which the coroner finds that the returned soldier died from this or that cause unattributable to war service. I am convinced from the number of cases I have looked into that while the department has done splendidly, if the officials were given a chance to exercise their discretion as to the cause of death, a large number of these war widows would be receiving consideration. I want to give my support to what was said by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross), who also attended one of these meetings of the war widows of Toronto.

Mr. MASSEY: Before the minister replies I should like to add a word to what has been said by the hon. member for St. Paul's, the leader of the opposition, and the hon. member for Davenport. I am sure that the sentiments expressed by them found echo in the heart of every hon. member of this committee. We all must realize that as the days lengthen into years the situation to which reference has been made this afternoon becomes more and more acute. Recently I met a deputation which desired to present this problem, a deputation of ladies, widows of war veterans from the eastern part of Toronto, where they are attempting to set up an organization in their mutual interest, and they asked me to present their case to the minister and his colleagues. Accordingly I should like to endorse most heartily what has been said on this matter by those who have preceded me.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I present briefly a slightly different angle of this question? Without repetition of what has already been said I might put it in this way: that inadequate records were kept overseas, as has been referred to many times in this house. Men in their anxiety to get home did not take the necessary care to have disabilities noted which might have been recorded had they taken time. They came back and went through the necessary procedure to gain some consideration at the hands of the department, but as a result of inadequate records and for other reasons that might be mentioned, no pension was granted. The department in its wisdom proceeded to give war veterans' allowances, a very necessary thing and something which has kept many men and women off relief. In instances of which I could give details small homes had been acquired prior to enlistment, and upon his return from overseas the soldier, with his family, lived in these homes. The children probably grew up and moved away, and the soldier and his wife continued their residence, the soldier receiving a war veteran's allowance. I could give the minister instances in which, following the death of the soldier who received the allowance, those homes have been lost. Within my own knowledge only this week two war veterans' allowance widows are going on relief in my city, one of them in a pitiful condition of arthritis. She is told that nothing can be done to give her a war veteran's allowance, because her year had expired. If we have to keep these widows on relief surely some consideration could be given by the minister and his department to continuing in some form, even if only partially, the war veteran's allowance which she and her husband enjoyed, even though he could not establish a pensionable condition. I could give the minister more instances, but I suppose hundreds of them have come to his attention. Surely these people could be better cared for in a reasonable way, preserving their independence, rather than being compelled to go on relief in municipalities which are threatened with further costs in connection with relief.

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): I want to add my support to the speakers who have called attention to the fact that war widows should be allowed a pension. I am not a returned man but I should like to say a word in regard to returned men who are physically fit, who receive no pension and are to-day earning their own livelihood. I have talked with a number of these men. One of them said to me: "The country should do something for us; we paid the price." They think they should have a refund of taxes. I know that for some considerable time the Manitoba government did that. I am not sure whether or not they are doing it to-day. The fact is that these men did pay the price. It took men and money to win the war. We continue to pay the interest on the war loans, and we may have to continue to do it for all time. Are the men who risked their lives less worthy of help, when to-day many of them find themselves in need of it? I cannot see where the money took any risk, but certainly the men did. We know that many of them throughout Canada to-day are suffering because of war disability. In fact, I do not know a single man who went to war who is physically fit to-day. There may be some, but I do not know of them.

I cannot understand why the government should give such large pensions to officers, when the men in the ranks, who may be more in need than many of the officers, and who could earn more money than some of the officers ever knew how to earn, cannot get anything at all. I never thought that was fair; I never could understand it, and it is my opinion something ought to be done about it.

I believe pensioned men who have good government jobs are not entitled to the same pension, although I would not like to cut them off without the assurance that if they lost their jobs they would get their pensions back. Surely it is up to the government to do the fair thing for the men who fought our battles.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I should like to join with the other hon. members who have requested the minister to do something for widows of ex-service men. We know that many of them have found great difficulty in establishing the fact that the deaths of their husbands could be attributed to pensionable diseases. A number of these widows are indeed suffering great hardship. Since the government has stated from time to time that it intended to issue money and credit to meet the needs of the people, surely the problem of providing sufficient money to take care of the needs of the widows of ex-service men should not present a difficult task. I feel sure that the minister will have the support of the majority of hon. members if he takes action immediately to alleviate the suffering of those widows.

Mr. POWER: Perhaps I had better begin by stating the provisions of the Pension Act dealing with widows. Under the provisions of the Pension Act the disability pension automatically ceases at death. If the assessment at death is fifty per cent or more, an immediate grant of one month's pension is paid the widow and children, provided the additional pension was payable on their account.

If the deceased pensioner's estate is insufficient to pay last illness and burial expenses the commission may make a grant not exceeding $150, provided the payment in respect of burial shall not exceed $100. If the soldier dies of a pensionable disability, or where his death is ruled attributable to war service, the widow and children are eligible provided (1) that the marriage was contracted before January 1, 1930, or before the soldier was granted a pension; (2) that the children were born prior to May 1, 1933, and are within the age limit and (3) that they were supported or entitled to be supported by the soldier.

In cases where disability pension was payable at the rate of eighty per cent or more at the time of death, irrespective of the cause of death the widows and children are eligible, provided (1) that the marriage was contracted before January 1, 1930; (2) that the children were born prior to May 1, 1933, and are within the age limit and (3) that they were supported or entitled to be supported by the soldier.

If the soldier dies under conditions which do not entitle his dependents to pension, any surviving eligible children are paid a bonus of one year's additional pension at the rate being paid on their account at the time of death.

With respect to the agitation which has spread throughout the country, and which has been organized by an association which, I believe, is known as the Non-Pensioned War Widows' Association, new legislation would have to be enacted by the house to cover nearly all the cases which have been submitted this afternoon. We would have to adopt an entirely new principle. It must not be forgotten that for many years in the house there was a great deal of agitation to enable any widows who married soldiers after the appearance of disabilities to get pensions. The fear then was that if we opened the door too wide to pensions for widows we would get this country into the position in which the United States finds itself with respect to war widows' pensions.

Mr. BENNETT: Be careful.

Mr. POWER: Then we would have these so called deathbed marriages, and so on. The agitation was to extend the provisions of the Pension Act to cover cases wherein there had been, let us say, a promise of marriage by the soldier prior to his leaving for overseas. It was urged on governments in those days that it was far nobler and far more proper for the person who did not marry the soldier, but who was now claiming something by way of recognition, than for the person who went through a hasty war wedding.

[Mr. Power.]

Very sympathetic cases were presented to the consideration of the house, and after more than ten years of struggle it was finally decided that persons married prior to January 1, 1930, or prior to the time when the soldier was awarded a pension, would be eligible, provided always that the soldier had died of his pensionable disability. But, as I said at the outset, the present agitation introduces an entirely new principle. Up to the present time I have no means of knowing just what the objective of the association may be. But I take it for granted that these so called war widows would like to get at least a maintenance pension, or an allowance which would amount to perhaps $40 per month. A great many of those soldiers—some mentioned by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition—were not drawing pension at all. Under these circumstances we would find a widow getting far more than the amount to which the soldier was entitled on account of his war services. Many more are drawing pensions—

Mr. BENNETT: He would be getting something under the provisions of the last statute—the allowance?

Mr. POWER: Yes, the war veterans' allowance.

Mr. BENNETT: Those are the cases to which I referred.

Mr. POWER: Yes, but perhaps that would not be so. I do not know just what persons are eligible for membership to this association, but as I understand it any person who is the widow of a soldier would be eligible.

Mr. BENNETT: A non-pensioner.

Mr. POWER: Yes, a widow who has no pension. But that would take in the widow of any person who happened to have been a soldier or to have served in the war. We have been fighting against service pensions for the soldiers themselves, and now we are asked to give pension to the widows of soldiers who were never entitled to pensions in their lifetime.

Mr. BENNETT: By the means test.

Mr. POWER: Yes, I am coming to that.

Mr. MacNICOL: But what about the widows of soldiers who did receive a pension before they died?

Mr. POWER: I am taking the general question as it is presented, in so far as I know it.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Just the widows of soldiers who have served in a theatre of war.

Mr. POWER: Well, once we start in on that, I do not know where we will go.

Mr. BENNETT: The means test was put to me.

Mr. POWER: I have not before me any complete or definite proposal, and I do not know that anybody else has. The agitation that is going on does not appear to me to have any definite objective either in money or in any clear indication of just what persons are to be eligible.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How many widows of pensioners are there in Canada? How many widows of ex-service men are there?

Mr. POWER: I have not the faintest idea. Unless a man is a pensioner we have no trace of him. There were 600,000 soldiers who enlisted and I should say that probably three or four hundred thousand of them were married. Most of these men will leave widows when they die.

To continue my argument: If this means that the widows of men who were not pensioned during their lifetime are to be looked after, then it is asking parliament to take a long step in the setting up of a new class of state pensioner. If it means that it shall apply only to the widows of those who received pensions, then perhaps there is more logic in the position. I believe Australia grants to the widow the same pension as that enjoyed by her husband during his lifetime.

Mr. BENNETT: In some cases it is half.

Mr. POWER: In some cases it is half. Does any hon. member believe that if we granted to the widow of a man who had been in receipt of a pension of $3.50 or $7.50 or $10 just the amount her husband received, she would not ask us to bring her allowance up to a reasonable maintenance rate? I do not think any hon. member will suggest that we should continue a pension if it is lower than a decent living rate.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did the minister not say, and is it not a fact, that the widows of soldiers who received less than an eighty per cent pension receive nothing?

Mr. POWER: Not at all. I do not think my hon. friend has understood the principles of the Pension Act. I believe the house will agree that it is not reasonable to award to the widow of a pensioner more than the man received himself during his lifetime. After all, he is the one who suffered, he is the one who went overseas and he is the one who put up with life in the trenches.

Mr. BROOKS: Does he not receive a pension for the protection of his family? Is that not the idea?

Mr. POWER: No, and I shall come to that in a moment. A pension is granted on the basis of disability incurred on service and not on the basis of need. We would be changing the whole principle if we awarded pensions on the basis of need. My right hon. friend recognizes that fact when he states quite positively that this is a pension on the basis of means test. Am I right in making that statement?

Mr. BENNETT: That was the view I was putting forward. It has been submitted to me that some of these unfortunates find themselves in absolute want. Because of their want they ask that they should be treated in the same way as soldiers are treated in connection with the veterans' allowance. Have I made myself clear?

Mr. POWER: I will not go as far as my right hon. friend and say that the veterans' allowance is awarded entirely on the basis of need; it is awarded on the assumption that a man's service hastened his unemployability.

I do not know of any proposal that has come before this department or parliament in the last few years that appeals more to the ordinary man on the street or to anyone connected with the whole soldier problem. However, I think we should understand just where we are going with a proposal such as this. My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition is the only one who has referred to the means test. If this proposal is accepted it will mean that no matter what is the cause of death, whether due to a pensionable disability or otherwise, irrespective of the financial circumstances of the widow, irrespective of the date of marriage, irrespective of the financial condition of the person who died, we will be granting a pension and making a ward of the state of the widow of every man who served overseas.

It has never been suggested in any special committee of the house that has sat in the last few years that we should carry out such a principle, but it has been suggested that the widows of men who were in receipt of pensions of fifty per cent and over should receive a pension. It was contended that it was sometimes difficult to prove that a man had died as a result of his war disability and that the presumption should be that if he died, it was as a result of his disability. Our legislation provides that the widow of a man in receipt of eighty per cent pension shall receive a pension, no matter from what cause the man died. The principle there is that the man was so badly disabled that there was a possibility that his physical condition must have been a very important factor in his decease, even though he might have died as a result of an accident. It was not considered right to place the widow in the position of having to prove that death was due to his disability. I cannot recall any representations having been made until this year that the widow of every pensioner should be pensioned.

I have no doubt that there are many widows, in the soldier group as well as in the civilian group, who are left without adequate means of support. However, when it is considered seriously, I doubt if anyone will lay down the proposition that the widow of a war veteran should be pensioned simply because he served in the army. This is going far beyond any suggestion of a service pension for those who served overseas. There are many pathetic cases, and I think I could recite just as many, if not more than any hon. member of the house. A widow will write to me and say that her husband has died recently, that he was a soldier with good service overseas. She says she is sixty years of age, too young for an old age pension and too old to take a job. She wants to know what we are going to do. There is no answer I can give her except that her case should be looked after in the same way as that of any ordinary civilian. Much as I sympathize with her, that is the only answer I can make.

I shall be glad to get an expression of opinion from hon. members after they have been fully seized of all the implications of this proposal. If parliament decides that these widows should be placed on the pension roll of the state, then I think we will have great difficulty in refusing any demand whatsoever made by soldiers who served overseas. I do not see how we could refuse the man who served overseas anything at all in the way of a living wage, maintenance allowance, revenue, pension or bonus, whatever you want to call it. We have been asked to allow the rate laid down in the Labour Gazette, while other suggestions have been that we should pay a bonus of $2,000 or $4,000. We could not refuse anything to the man who served overseas once we carry out the recommendations of this association of widows.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Does the minister suggest that we should refuse to meet the legitimate needs of people who are suffering?

Mr. POWER: I am not talking about legitimate needs. I am saying you cannot refuse him anything he asks for, because he will always be able to show some need for it, if you begin to give it to those who have less claim than he has. I have every sympathy for the widows, but I consider it my first duty to look after the soldiers who went overseas, and their dependents. After that is done I have no objection to looking into any further questions. I repeat, the department and the pension commission can do nothing to meet this claim, but if parliament in its wisdom decides that there must be legislation, parliament should say so, and then we shall know just what it means.

Mr. BENNETT: I think parliament has, time after time, declared against the awarding of a mere service pension, and I have not suggested that a service pension should be awarded to the widow and dependents of any soldier merely because he did see service. That was not the point as I understood it. But these widows and children, the one class desiring sustenance and the other education, have submitted that rather than take relief from communities, many of which cannot provide it for them, there is a duty resting upon the state to provide for them at least sustenance and support for themselves and their children because it was the war that deprived them not only of the company and consort of a husband but also of the earning power of the head of the house. That is the position as I understand it, as it was put to me.

Mr. POWER: Of course my right hon. friend understands that if that were so, if it were the war that deprived them of the sustenance provided by the person upon whom they depended, they would be entitled to pension.

Mr. BENNETT: Then I must add this rider: They are unable to establish that death was the direct result of service in the war. Otherwise the husband would have been pensionable in his lifetime and they would be entitled in any event to receive a pension. But it is because they are satisfied, as the community is, in common with all others, that what the soldier went through brought about premature death, which premature death imposed upon them a responsibility with respect to the support of themselves and the sustenance and education of their children which they cannot discharge, that they now make this claim. If they had any means with which to discharge their responsibilities I certainly would not make the claim that I suggest, but inasmuch as we have taken steps to provide, through the war veterans' allowance, sustenance for the soldier who is burnt out and unable to care for himself, the contention is that as the soldier is no longer here and is unable to provide for his wife and family, a similar principle should be applied with respect to them rather than that they should be compelled to go upon relief, which they think is not consonant with the ideas put forward at the time their husbands enlisted. That is the story, as I understand it.

Mr. POWER: I think my right hon. friend has stated the case absolutely fairly. That is the story, but as I said a moment ago I am not sure just how far it goes or just what the demands are because I have not as yet received officially any demand. I hope that will not be considered an invitation to send me any. I have not, at all events, received any definite request.

Perhaps these figures may be of some value to the committee. As of September 30, 1937, there are disability pensioners to the number of 79,882; disability pensioners' wives, who receive some assistance, 57,316, and these, of course, would all be eligible under any legislation which might be passed to look after war widows because they would be such if the husband died a pensioner.

Mr. LOCKHART: Does that figure of 79,000 represent eighty per cent?

Mr. POWER: No, all of them. Then there are disability pensioners' children to the number of 83,061, and these also would be entitled to something, I presume, under the suggestions which have been made this afternoon. There are disability pensioners' other relatives to the number of 1,382; and widowers' allowances, 513. Those make up a total of 222,154 people who are being looked after in one form or another at the present time. There are also dependent pensioners' widows, parents and orphan children to the number of 18,076; dependent pensioners' children, 3,275; and other relatives in addition to the main dependents, 1,461; making a total of 22,812, or a grand total of 244,966 people being looked after at the present time; and with supplementary British and allied pensions the number would be 245,309. I would say that that number would be almost doubled if the suggestions that have been made were carried out in a way to meet the wishes of those who are at present urging them upon the government.

Mr. MacNEIL: I think it would be a great pity if the impression got abroad from the remarks of the minister that the sentiments expressed this afternoon were entirely due to agitation by any particular organization. It is true that representations have been made by different organizations, but I think every hon. gentleman has been faced with the distressing experience in his own community of attempting to explain to the widow of an ex-service man why she cannot secure any form of further assistance from the federal government. The pathetic need in this regard has been apparent on every hand, and in my opinion it is a problem for which we cannot disclaim responsibility.

I am sorry that the minister brought up the old bogey of deathbed marriages because, as far as I am aware, no hon. member has proposed any change in the deadline from January 1, 1930.

Mr. POWER: Would not this proposal do it?

Mr. MacNEIL: I have not heard of any proposal that would suggest—

Mr. POWER: That is the worst of it.

Mr. MacNEIL: I have not heard of any concrete proposals that would suggest anything opening the way to deathbed marriages. I think in countless instances the widow of the ex-service man has very good grounds upon which to claim some further assistance from the state. The principle of responsibility in this problem has been accepted to some extent in section 38 of the Pension Act, to which the minister referred, providing for the payment of one month's pension not at the rate effective at the time of death but at the widow's rate and pending consideration of the claim. That recognized responsibility in the case of need, partially at all events. That of course is qualified by the fact that the pension is paid only in cases where the claim is pending consideration.

Mr. POWER: In every case, I believe.

Mr. MacNEIL: Also under section 22(a), a bonus may be paid in respect of the child at the discretion of the commission, but only at the effective rate at the time of death, which might possibly be only fifty cents a month. There is also a precedent for it in the continuation of the war veterans' allowance to the widow after the death of the recipient of war veterans' allowance. Not merely on the basis of disability but very largely on the basis of need all these provisions have been made in the past, I contend, because there was a recognition of the needs confronting the widow under these circumstances.

May I point out to the minister that never at any time has it been the intention of parliament to deprive the ex-service man of the opportunity to marry and provide himself with the comforts of home. But in doing so the man has not been the only sufferer. In countless instances the wife has ministered to the need of the disabled ex-service man; she has nursed him and comforted him during his distress; in many cases she has suffered with him the consequences of reduced earning capacity, and they have jointly been unable to establish a reserve to tide her over the difficult period of adjustment following the husband's death. An actual proposal has been made to the minister—I hope he will take it into consideration—

Mr. POWER: What is it?

Mr. MacNEIL: The proposal made by the dominion convention of the Canadian Legion is the one to which I am referring.

Mr. POWER: As my hon. friend knows, there are quite a number.

Mr. MacNEIL:

That this convention re-affirms that the Pension Act be amended permitting pensions paid at the time of death to be continued to the widow for at least one year, and where the amount is less than that allowed under war veterans' allowance, that it be increased to that amount.

Mr. POWER: Was that passed?

Mr. MacNEIL: I have reason to believe that that is the resolution of the dominion convention.

Mr. POWER: I will check.

Mr. MacNEIL: They are urging that discretionary power be exercised under such circumstances to continue the allowance one year to tide the widow over a difficult period of adjustment.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would that recommendation apply retroactively?

Mr. MacNEIL: There is no reference to that, nor do I believe it is their intention to deal with retroactive complication. I would point out also that in the commonwealth of Australia a similar provision is made; the pension is continued, I believe, in such instances. It boils down to this, that the minister might safely introduce, I think, an amendment to the act, and it would receive the general support of the house, to provide that where a pensioner dies and the widow is not held to be eligible for pension, death not being due to disability attributable to service, or where the pensioner is not receiving a pension of over eighty per cent, and the widow is in necessitous circumstances, she should get an allowance; the pension should be continued, and if it is less than the amount paid under the terms of the war veterans' allowance, it should be made up to that rate. In other words, this provision should be made consonant with the provisions of the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

[Mr. MacNeil.]

Mr. POWER: Would that apply to the widow of any soldier even though he was a small pensioner?

Mr. MacNEIL: Even though he was a small pensioner.

Mr. DUPUIS: What about the children?

Mr. MacNEIL: I am referring only to the widow. If the rate were made up to the extent of the war veterans' allowance, there would not be the same need to consider the children.

Mr. POWER: Would not the hon. member see some objection to giving the widow of a pensioner who was receiving ten dollars a month more than is given to her neighbour whose husband himself was a pensioner receiving ten dollars and had two or three children to support? Would there not be some difficulty there, some anomaly?

Mr. MacNEIL: I see the point made by the minister. But if a pensioner was receiving pension at the rate of only ten per cent, for example, he would be able no doubt to supplement his earnings or would receive unemployment assistance from the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. POWER: Does the hon. member think the answer would be, "Why, bring them all up to forty per cent?" I rather expected my hon. friend to make that answer.

Mr. MacNEIL: In the majority of cases the existence of this disability is a contributing factor to death. By reason of these disabilities and other handicaps imposed by service, veterans are dying off now at an alarming rate, and the widows who are thus bereaved find it most difficult to adjust themselves or to secure the benefits of any other social legislation in the province in which they reside.

Mr. POWER: Why is it more difficult for them to secure the benefit of social legislation than for anyone else?

Mr. MacNEIL: May I point out to the minister, after some experience of these problems, that if it becomes known in the community that a woman is the widow of an ex-service man the general tendency of the local authorities is to say, "This must be dealt with by the federal authority"; and considerable delay results. There is difficulty in getting across the understanding of the widow's position under existing federal legislation, and that delay has serious consequences for her. I suggest it is extremely important that we should recognize what I believe to be a very definite claim on this parliament, and assist the widow to tide herself over that very harrowing period.

Mr. BETTS: May I bring to the attention of the minister and the committee the case of a widow's claim, slightly different from the ones we have been discussing. This case is not one in which the soldier was getting nothing and the widow wants something; it is a case in which the soldier was getting something, and the widow now gets nothing. This soldier was pensioned to the extent of twenty-five per cent of his disability, and drew $19 a month. He died. His pension had been awarded for aggravation of heart disability and bronchitis incurred on service, and the cause of death was myocardial failure, auricular fibrillation, and chronic valvular disease—symptoms which, members of the committee will realize, bear a very close relationship to those in respect of which the soldier was pensioned.

In giving the details of this case, I realize that this committee is not a court of appeal from the pensions court of appeal, and I am mentioning them because my submission is that they illustrate a principle.

In the course of the hearing one of the principal witnesses was a doctor. In his evidence—I purposely omit proper names from my story—he attributed death to a stroke. Subsequently he realized that by reason of the fact that he had a large number of cases to deal with he had mistaken the identity of the man whose case was under hearing, and he made this statutory declaration:

> With reference to my evidence when I appeared before the quorum of the Canadian Pension Commission, I have read the transcript of evidence taken and it is quite apparent that in my answer to question 7 I was in error in that I stated "a man was taken home from work with a stroke and died two or three days afterwards."
> From my personal knowledge that the late William Blank died in Westminster hospital, London, on August 1st, 1935, after being confined in that institution for a period of about 17 weeks, I am able to state that the man referred to in my answer to question 7 was not Mr. Blank. I apparently had him confused with a man who, while employed by the Blank company in London, took a stroke at work and was taken home and died a few days afterwards. The latter man was seen by Doctor Blank and myself.

As a result of that very apparent mistake, the widow applied on three occasions to the court of appeal for a rehearing of her case. I may say that her case is a very grievous one. She is a woman with two children. She had her life arranged so that she could carry on upon the small pension her husband received when he was alive; now he is gone and the pension is gone too. The point I am trying to make is that any court of law which has as wide powers of rehearing cases as those vested in the pensions court of appeal, and receives evidence similar to that statutory declaration from a reputable doctor, would rehear the case. Yet there has been not one refusal from the pensions court of appeal, but three, to deal with this case. My contention therefore is that, in view of this disposition of the court of appeal to deal with cases that come before them not only with an entire lack of humanity, but with an entire lack of the ordinary principles of equity, unless a different outlook can be injected into the mentality of these judges of appeal by the minister or by this house, or by somebody, in the interests of proper dealing with this pensions question, so that the returned man and his dependents can get justice, then the court should be abolished.

Mr. DUPUIS: I wish to say a word on the point that has been raised. Very often a pensioner dies and his widow and children are deprived altogether of any assistance. If the widow cannot prove that the cause of death is due to her husband's participation in the war she does not succeed. According to equity, as I understand that term, I cannot see the reason for this. In the first place the department decides in the lifetime of the returned soldier that he is entitled to a pension because of his participation in the war and the consequence thereof in sickness or in diminution of health, and he is given a pension, whatever the amount may be. At any rate, the principle is there. Now, if he has a right to a pension for himself and his family while he is living, why should the country discontinue the pension at a time when it is needed more than ever, when the head of the family has gone?

I have quite a number of cases in mind. I know one returned soldier who died leaving a widow and seven children, and a few months after his death the pension was cut off so that his dependents were left to starve. If there is any equity, if there is any sense of justice in the legislature of the country in granting a pension to a man because of his participation in the war, I think there is more reason why a pension should be granted to his widow and children; there is all the more reason for a pension when the head of the family has disappeared. I do not think that we should put upon the shoulders of the widow the burden of proving that the cause of death is the result of her husband's participation in the war. I submit to the committee that if a change can be made in the law to make provision for widows and children, it should be made as soon as possible, because the present state of things is extremely unjust to both the war widow and the children that are left.

Mr. GREEN: It seems quite clear that the time has come when we should review the general principles upon which pensions are paid to a soldier's widow, and I suggest that it be done at this session. If however the minister does not see fit to do this, he could at least do something at this session—which would not be contrary to the general principles of soldier legislation now in force—by giving to the pension commission some discretion in order that they might help the pensioner's widow who is not entitled to a widow's pension. This help might be given for a period of say one year, as suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver North.

I believe that the pension commission has the confidence of the soldier body right across Canada and might be relied upon to exercise in a fair way any discretion given it. I would point out that in the War Veterans' Allowance Act such discretion is given now to the War Veterans' Allowance Board in section 9, which reads:

> After the death of any recipient an amount not exceeding the sum of twelve monthly instalments of the allowance which the recipient was receiving at the time of his death may at the discretion of the committee be paid to his widow or for the benefit of any child.

In section 22, subsection 8 of the Pension Act there is a similar provision, which has existed since 1919:

> When a member of the forces in receipt of an additional pension on account of his child or children dies under conditions which do not entitle his dependents to a pension, a bonus equivalent to such additional pension for one year at the rate being paid at the time of death shall be paid by the commission for the benefit of the child or children to such person as the commissioners may direct.

I suggest earnestly that the government bring in some amendment to the Pension Act which will give the pension commission discretion in the matter. That discretion need not be exercised in every case; if the widow did not need assistance she would not get it. But the commission should be given some discretion in order that help might be given to a needy widow and her family for a period of at least twelve months after the death of her husband.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I sympathise with the minister in his problems and I greatly appreciate the earnestness with which he attacks them. I would bring to the attention of the committee two considerations that greatly influence us. In the first place it must be borne in mind that the dependents in question are trying to carry on under conditions where jobs are not to be found. That is something so widely different from anything with which we were familiar as boys or with which our parents, who passed on to us our attitudes, were familiar that it is likely to be difficult for us to think quite dispassionately and without bias about their problem.

The great question is: If the widow with, say, three children is left without the small pension that she has been receiving, and neither she nor any of her children can find employment, what is going to become of them? One needs only to think seriously for a moment or two to see how desperate such a situation is immediately after the death of the bread-winner.

There is another serious matter which I think we are prone to forget. Let me say that we do not wish to advance our ideas to the point where they become obnoxious to the house, but I do submit that we should all bear in mind that the things which these widows need, which they want, are all here in Canada in abundance. Only tea and perhaps citrous fruits and a few other things need to be brought in from outside. The coal is here, the milk, cream, butter, eggs, cheese, meat, wool; everything they need is here. Are we to confess then that as intelligent members of parliament in this remarkably intelligent age we cannot devise means whereby, of the abundance with which providence has amply blessed us, we cannot give sufficient to support those who are suffering in consequence of the self-sacrifice of heroic men who went to the defence of this country?

Mr. QUELCH: In view of the interest in this question of pensions for widows of ex-soldiers, would it not be possible for the minister to put the matter before a committee of returned men at this session so that they may bring in an amendment to the Pension Act making pensions available to widows of pensioners who have died? It has always seemed to me a strange thing that we make allowance for the wife of a pensioner while the pensioner is alive, and that as soon as he dies, when the widow is in far greater need, we cut that pension off. It is not very much to the credit of Canada that we have ex-soldiers' widows all over the country being forced on relief because the country has not recognized their claim.

Miss MacPHAIL: This morning I received a letter from the Durham District Veterans' Club setting out in detail the case of the widow of a returned soldier who died in the late summer. He had been getting a pension for himself and family of $87.75 and at his death this terminated. That widow and her two children—a boy and a girl aged nine and eight—are left without any income. The ex-soldiers in the town and district of Durham wrote me on behalf of this woman, and advanced the arguments which have already been presented to the committee.

There is one other thing which as a woman I feel like saying for these women who cannot be here to speak for themselves; that is that they have had in many cases a particularly difficult life, caring for men who were ill. In this case the man had a leg amputated; he was in hospital twenty-five months afterwards and was never able to work. These women have a trying life taking care of perhaps ill and in many cases irritable patients. They have not the same chance of providing for their children, because so often the income is small. It is hard on a mother to see her children not getting all the advantages that she feels that under other circumstances they might have had. I have talked to so many women—or putting it the other way, so many have talked to me—about this particular problem of the strain on the nervous system of always living with a person whose nerves were shattered by an inhuman experience, the experience of war. The wives of these soldiers have themselves served their country in a way that is not easy, not in the field it is true but by being the person who provides the tenderness and understanding and home life for men who did serve in the theatre of war and have come back wrecks from that experience. And many who look well are still nervous wrecks. When the husband goes, these women face the new problem of not having anything with which to provide for their families. At least I think the department should have discretionary power, and where a mother is left with children and no way to provide for them she ought not to be asked to go on relief. We are not fair in asking that. Eventually I believe something will have to be done; so if eventually, why not begin now?

Mr. BETTS: The remarks of the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) lead me to make a suggestion. Obviously it is a very cruel thing that when an ex-soldier who has been receiving pension dies, his widow, if his pension has been less than fifty per cent, is obliged to go to the pension authorities and ask that the pension be continued. My submission is that it would be far better if that procedure were reversed and the onus placed upon the crown; in other words, that where a soldier in receipt of pension dies, the pension be continued, and if the crown feels that death was not attributable to war service it should rest with the crown, not with the widow, to approach the court.

Mr. YOUNG: The other night I brought before this committee a particular case. It was not my desire on that occasion to bring in extraneous matter. I wanted to confine myself to the discussion of the case itself. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) said he had been approached by many persons in western Canada who had not been able to get the pension they desired. I may say that if any hon. member of this house thinks that this is the only case on which I have been approached, I would say that I have had many others—very many. That case, however, seemed so very definite, and there was such feeling about it, that I thought it right to bring that particular case before the committee. I was a little disappointed that the leader of the opposition brought his great ability as a lawyer to bear to show the committee that the appeal court was quite right in its decision in that case.

Mr. BENNETT: Under the decisions, it was.

Mr. YOUNG: I am prompted by the remarks a moment ago of the hon. member for London (Mr. Betts) to say that I think his experience would be borne out by that of a great many others, certainly by those who have to deal with the pension appeal court. During the discussion of that case the leader of the opposition said there was no evidence on which any other finding could be based.

Mr. BENNETT: No, that is not what I said; I said there was no evidence establishing the cause of death.

Mr. YOUNG: Well, if there is any doubt I had better read what was said. The report will be found at page 619 of Hansard:

> When this poor unfortunate man was killed as a result of an automobile collision, it was the duty of those who claimed a pension to prove that that death resulted because of some defect in the appliance provided or for some reason connected with the appliance which he was using and which prevented him from escaping something about which no one knew anything. That is, the hazard that he faced was not known.

Then he went on to say at page 621.

> If, for instance, there had been evidence that there was negligence on the part of the unfortunate deceased, and on the part also of the driver of the car, then the benefit of the doubt would have to go to the man; but when there is no evidence one way or the other, nothing except the bare fact that the man lies dead with a cracked skull, that does not create any presumption one way or the other.

I had not time that evening to read into the record the evidence—it would have taken me an hour or more—therefore it was not presented to this committee except in a fragmentary way. Let me say that the only positive proof which existed that the man's artificial leg failed to work properly at that particular moment went out of existence when he was killed on that street. There was no other positive evidence on that point. But there is abundant evidence to show that he walked with great difficulty, that he walked with a sort of circular motion of that leg, that when he walked backward he found it very difficult to walk at all. There is some suggestion that the leg was a little longer than it should have been. And there is a great deal of evidence that he had great difficulty with the leg. His wife stated positively at the inquiry that on more than one occasion this leg had failed to function. But I did not have time, and up to the present have not had time, to present all the evidence which was given at the coroner's inquiry, and also before the quorum. I am bound to say that this case was heard by one or two quorums and refused. It was heard by another quorum, one member of which decided that there was not sufficient evidence and another member of which decided there was sufficient evidence. They had the evidence before them. Knowing that there was that difference of opinion, what took place? A third member was called in. Who was that third member? As I said the other night, it was Mr. Justice Taylor of the court of king's bench of Manitoba. Am I to understand that the leader of the opposition would suggest to this committee, or to anyone, that Mr. Justice Taylor gave a verdict without there being in his opinion anything in the evidence to justify it? I am quite sure that neither the leader of the opposition nor any other hon. member would take such a view. Certainly that was not the case. But I was very much interested in the fact that the defence which was offered that night was a defence of the president of the court of appeal, Mr. Justice Hyndman, who, the right hon. gentleman said, had been his friend of long standing.

I was just wondering why there was not the same defence of Mr. Justice Taylor's decision. I should have been extremely glad if I could have had the support of an hon. member skilled in the law, to the extent to which the right hon. leader of the opposition is skilled, in favour of trying to get justice for persons who came before that court of appeal. Yes, I would have been very glad of that. But I regret to say that the only thing I heard from the leader of the opposition was a defence of this particular gentleman, Mr. Justice Hyndman, who is the president of the court of appeal. The right hon. gentleman says that the appeal court was set up to determine questions of law. I shall quote from the discussion which took place on the evening of February 18, as it is recorded at page 620 of Hansard.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course this is all out of order.

Mr. YOUNG: It is the same debate.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is not.

Mr. YOUNG: Perhaps my right hon. friend does not like it, but it is the same debate.

Mr. BENNETT: Anything the hon. member said would not be of the least concern to me, or anybody else I have ever heard of.

Mr. YOUNG: Perhaps I did not get the remark quite correctly, but I might say this, that if my right hon. friend thinks his remarks are taken seriously by the people of Canada, all he has to do is to look around this house, and many other houses in Canada, and he will see they do not pay very much attention to them.

Mr. BENNETT: They seem to be by one person.

Mr. YOUNG: The right hon. gentleman said:

I am satisfied, knowing Mr. Justice Hyndman as I have for thirty years and knowing that very few of my acquaintance are more sympathetic than he—

And then upon being interrupted he said:

It is not a question of guessing at it; I know he is sympathetic. But one of the reasons that an appeal court was constituted as it was, was for the purpose of preventing what may be called the play on sympathy in determining ultimate responsibility.

Then I asked:

Would the right hon. gentleman not say the same thing about Mr. Justice Taylor?

Later on in my remarks I said that perhaps the right hon. gentleman meant to say that Mr. Justice Taylor's heart had got a little in advance of his head. Then the right hon. gentleman said:

I did not express any opinion about Mr. Justice Taylor.

Again at page 620 the right hon. gentleman said:

Yes, but Mr. Justice Taylor approaches the problem with a warmer sympathy than would be possible when you have to determine a pure question of law.

I wish to point out that in this particular case we had two judges. I believe both were well qualified. They passed on the case.

Surely if the benefit of the doubt clause means anything there is abundant evidence even now before this committee to show that that clause was not followed by the pension appeal court. We had a quorum, on which an eminent judge sat as one member, which granted the pension. As I said the other night, and wish now to repeat, any time a quorum grants a pension, that pension should be allowed and be given to the applicant, whether to a soldier or the dependent of a soldier. We should not have persons referring these cases to the court of appeal.

What happened? Of all the pensions which had been granted by the quorum but which went to appeal, which the reviewing officer had asked that they be sent to appeal, more than one-third were taken away by the pension appeal court. Surely there is something hard and cold about all that. I stated the other day that in 1936 and 1937 out of the 4,781 cases which went before the court of appeal, only 43 were granted on appeal. As I have just stated, in respect of those appeals by the crown from decisions of the quorum in favour of the applicants, more than one-third were taken away.

A few minutes ago the hon. member for London gave his experience when he said that he believed the court was not functioning in a manner which was in the interests of the soldiers. He said that the court was hard-hearted, or used words to that effect. I suggest that the figures I gave to-day and the other evening would indicate that this pension court of appeal is of no use at all so far as the soldiers are concerned. I suggest to the minister that if we are satisfied the court of appeal is not functioning in the interests of the country, the soldiers or their dependents—and I want to include all three—then it is our duty to abolish it.

During my experience in the house, which began in 1925 or 1926, I have never known, in connection with any of the legislation, of a case in which politics was mixed up. But when the pension appeal court was set up when the leader of the opposition was in office I noticed that every member happened to be of one political stripe. I know, too, that when the present minister appointed the chairman of the pension commission he was not looking at political stripes. In fact, he chose a man as chairman who does not happen to be of the same political stripe as himself, and in doing that I take it he was trying to get the best man available.

When men are retired from the bench I do not believe in putting them to work in other positions. I say that, whether it applies to the pension appeal court, the tariff board or anything else. I am obliged to say that I do not believe in giving any man in that position two salaries. Mr. Justice Hyndman receives $8,000 a year as president of the pension appeal court. He receives $1,000 more than the other members of the pension appeal court, and in addition he receives a retiring allowance of $6,000 a year because of his having been a judge of the Alberta court. That makes a total of $14,000 a year. I say here and now that when a man is retired—I do not care who he is—and is receiving a pension of $6,000 a year, he is not entitled to be re-hired in some other capacity or to another position carrying a salary of $8,000 a year.

I do not bring up this matter with the idea of casting reflection upon anyone; I am simply presenting the facts as I see them. I am convinced beyond any doubt, certainly beyond any reasonable doubt, that the present pension appeal court is not viewing the soldiers' problems in a light which can be considered to be even reasonable. The benefit of the doubt clause states that the pension appeal court shall draw from all the circumstances of the case, the evidence adduced and the medical information, all reasonable inferences in favour of the applicant. I ask myself, Was that done in the particular case which I laid before this committee? The act does not say positive evidence; it says all the circumstances of the case. I have not the time or the desire to outline all the circumstances of that case. I ask, Were reasonable inferences drawn in favour of the applicant? I do not think any hon. member of the committee who was present on that night or who is present this afternoon, would say that that was done.

Since that time I have received communications from many people, including eminent legal gentlemen, who have stated that from the fragmentary evidence which I gave they feel sure that if the benefit of the doubt clause had been properly interpreted there was no doubt as to what should have been done in that case. Hon. members who were in the chamber that night have spoken to me about it and with one exception they have all said that in their opinion the benefit of the doubt clause was not invoked in favour of the applicant. They told me that had that been done they felt sure the pension would have been granted.

I am going to appeal to the minister to give all these matters his serious consideration. In my opinion this court is not functioning in the manner in which this parliament expected and intended it should function. Consequently it is our duty to see that this state of affairs shall not continue any longer. Sometimes I ask myself just why we are here. We have a responsibility to those whom we represent. We all represent a great many of these unfortunate persons who were wounded during the war and I submit that we must rise in our places and make our position definite and clear no matter whom we may offend. Again I ask the minister to consider all the facts of this case. He is a sensible man, one of the best friends the soldiers of this country have ever had, and I am sure he will realize that this court of appeal is not functioning as it should.

Mr. GREEN: I asked the minister the other night if he had any figures to show whether the number of first applications was diminishing or increasing.

Mr. POWER: I have not the definite figures before me, but just before coming into the chamber I inquired of the pension commission and was told that for a while during the summer the number had increased, but it was becoming almost normal. There will be a slight decrease for the year.

Mr. GREEN: Two years ago this parliament put a dead-line on first applications. The dead-line for those who served in England or Canada only was July 1, 1936, but for those who served in France it was extended to January 1, 1940. I suggest that that dead-line should be extended for another two years. The new amendments are working satisfactorily, and there are still many men who received gunshot wounds but have not applied for pension. I suggest the minister give serious consideration to granting this extension.

Mr. POWER: It is receiving consideration.

Mr. HAYHURST: From what has been said this afternoon it would seem that members on all sides are in favour of granting some kind of pension to those who served in some capacity in the war or to their dependents. It has also been brought up by other hon. members that those who remained behind should receive some recompense. We have with us this afternoon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Pensions and National Health, and it seems to me that these ministers should work together to solve this problem.

This afternoon the Minister of Agriculture said that he could not find a market for the cattle referred to by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson). The minister stated that there was a shortage of space in vessels going to Great Britain. We all know that the tremendous surplus of wheat accumulated by the board of which Mr. McFarland was the head was sold at a loss to this country of over $2,000,000. Is that correct? We sell our wheat abroad at a loss; we find it impossible to find a market for our cattle, and yet we have all these people starving.

While I do not think the platitude about poverty in the midst of plenty should be referred to too often by members on this side of the chamber, at the same time there seems to be something anomalous in a situation which does not provide sufficient purchasing power to those who served with honour in the great war and their dependents. We feel that the different departments of the government should be able to solve this situation so that all people, including the returned soldiers—I have been a soldier but I did not serve in the great war—should have sufficient purchasing power. Why should we just worry about the widows and the orphans? We should consider all the people in Canada.

The Minister of Pensions and National Health says that these pensions cannot be granted because the Minister of Finance will not let him have the necessary money. He admits that the problem is practically unsolved. It seems to me that we should get together to consider the situation. We have this food and these cattle in abundance—I have a large number of cattle myself that I cannot get rid of at a profit if they are sold under the orthodox system of finance—and yet many people cannot purchase the necessities of life.

I trust that my remarks will not be considered as irrelevant. I simply state the situation as I see it. We hope that the government will do their best to solve this problem.

Mr. POWER: I thank my hon. friend for his suggestion. If only I could come to believe, or better still, if only I could get my colleague the Minister of Finance to believe, in the social credit theories, then all my difficulties would be washed away. All I would have to do would be to call upon the benighted treasury board and tell them to pay this or pay that and they would do it. Unfortunately I have to make arrangements to pay in real money. My hon. friends in the far corner may not have to do that, but I do. I must pay in the kind of money that everyone expects. I have not proceeded far enough in my financial studies to know whether or not it is good money; but I do know that the people to whom the Department of Pensions and National Health have to make payments want the kind of money the treasury board will issue, and not the kind of money my hon. friends would give us. If they can settle that for me, I am quite willing to issue all the cheques necessary, or ask the treasury board to give me all the cheques that are requested.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am very glad that the minister has made that remark, because our suggestion was that he pay in goods, and I am wagering that these widows would just as thankfully accept coal, flour, butter, eggs, cheese or a great many other things.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Where would you get the goods?

Mr. BLACKMORE: From the abundance in Canada.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Who has it? I would suggest that if my hon. friends possess such an abundance of goods as they so often speak of, they might give some of it to the people in their own province or anywhere else they happen to be who are in need.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: This discussion is entirely out of order.

Mr. MacNEIL: I wish to support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) that the deadline for applications for those who served in a theatre of war be extended to 1942. Formerly there was incorporated in the act a provision that if there was on record in the documents an injury, wound or disease due to service, it should be considered as an application; but that section has been deleted from the act. There is a large number of men who have not yet made application for various reasons, possibly because of an independence of spirit or because they are residing at some remote point. I know the minister will take every step necessary to protect their interests.

Perhaps I did not make myself clear to the minister the other evening in requesting information in regard to what extent the medical men under the jurisdiction of the Canadian pension commission have sanction to authorize treatment. May I ask this simple question: What authority, if any, has the pension commission to authorize treatment for pensions?

Mr. POWER: I do not know just what my hon. friend means. The pension authorities have their own medical men who are primarily pension medical officers, and they examine for pension. There are no longer any water-tight compartments. The two branches of the department were at one time, as my hon. friend knows, absolutely distinct and separate, and there was perhaps some confusion, but at the present time they are not separate. Perhaps the best instance I know of to give as an illustration is that in Regina where, owing to the retirement of the district administrator there, Doctor Wickwire, on account of age, the position of administrator was opened, and the pension doctor, a man formerly under the control of the pension commission, took his place, and so the two positions are now one. The man is at one and the same time a pension medical examiner and district administrator and chief medical officer. I think similiar conditions obtain pretty generally throughout the service.

I made some inquiries following my hon. friend's question the other evening, and I think I can state on the authority of both branches that there is no case of strife or dissension between the commission medical men proper and those engaged in treatment. There are occasionally matters of administrative detail which have to be worked out, but there is no conflict. I doubt very much whether we could ever go back to the system which existed prior to 1927 before the Scott report was made, when indiscriminately pension medical men and treatment doctors had the right to order men in or out of hospital, whereby almost endless confusion resulted, because it was impossible to make a proper check under those circumstances. Now that their work has been coordinated to the extent to which I believe it is I do not think there is any necessity of following any other procedure than that followed at the present time.

Mr. MacNEIL: I am not suggesting that there is any conflict. What I am suggesting is that perhaps the treatment branch has no definite responsibility with regard to the treatment required for pensioners, and perhaps I can best illustrate that by giving a type case: Regimental No. 103431, private X; Canadian pension commission, No. 54107. This man enlisted on March 1, 1916, and served in France.

Mr POWER: Is it the Regina case?

Mr. MacNEIL: No; he is resident in Seattle. He was discharged on January 14, 1918, as medically unfit. On enlistment he had operative scars resulting from varicose veins, both legs, which were not considered to be causing any disability at the time of enlistment. During service he was treated for dental caries, I.C.T. right foot, and neurasthenia. The medical board on February 1, 1917, reports the condition of shell shock, also hallux valgus. Pension is in effect for disability resulting from (1) neurasthenia, (2) varicose veins and (3) hallux valgus. The condition of neurasthenia is considered to have been incurred during service. The conditions of varicose veins and hallux valgus are considered to be pre-enlistment conditions, obvious on enlistment, and aggravated one-fifth of the entire condition by service in France. Entire disability, forty per cent. Pensionable disability, sixteen per cent. That describes the condition of this pensioner.

On November 26, 1937, the United States Veterans' Administration in Seattle, Washington, reports that the pensioner has very marked varicose veins, left lower extremities, with a moderate amount of hallux valgus, and that surgical treatment is very necessary, and it is recommended.

On December 17, 1937, Doctor F. W. Blakeman, Department of Pensions and National Health, who, I understand, deals with all cases outside Canada, advised the United States Veterans' Administration as follows:

> We have received the medical report of November 26, recommending operation for varicose veins. As this condition ante-dated enlistment, and as it was only aggravated to a very slight degree as a result of service, it is not considered that the extent of this aggravation is sufficient to warrant this department in undertaking any major treatment expenses. If, however, the condition can be treated by injection method at the out-patient clinic, we are prepared to authorize this form of treatment as a special consideration.

On January 5, 1938, the United States Veterans' Administration advises the Department of Pensions and National Health:

> We have no facilities in this office for this type of treatment for such a severe degree of disability.

The point in this case is incorporated in this statement, and I wish to refer to one aspect of it, again in discussing the care of patients:

> Following the refusal by the department to provide surgical treatment for the pensionable condition of the above named, the Canadian pension commission increased his pension on the grounds that his disability had increased.

I submit that that is a clear-cut case where it would be in the public interest as well as in the interest of the pensioner himself to grant treatment. As I understand the situation, the pension medical authorities have no power to do anything more than refer this case to the treatment branch, and they cannot recommend or authorize treatment.

Mr. POWER: My hon. friend is not complaining that the man's pension was increased, is he?

Mr. MacNEIL: No.

Mr. POWER: That is what his complaint amounts to.

Mr. MacNEIL: May I point out that the man required treatment, and that the men are more interested in having their disability treated than in getting an increased award of pension.

Mr. POWER: He gets an increased pension, which would probably permit him to get another doctor to treat him.

Mr. MacNEIL: I bring up this type of case to show the necessity for some regulation to cover the point. I have another case here.

Mr. POWER: I shall be glad to have the particulars.

Mr. MacNEIL: It is a case requiring dental treatment. I am referring, not to cases requiring dental treatment because of injuries to the jaw, but to cases where the condition of the mouth is a menace to health with a bearing on the pensionable disability, and where it would be in the interests of the pension commission as well as of the pensioner himself to have treatment extended.

This is the case of regimental No. 40686; private X; resident in Elgin, Ontario. He is in receipt of a pension at the rate of fifty per cent for pulmonary tuberculosis. The departmental medical representative at Elgin recommended dental treatment, which he considered to be vitally necessary in this case to prevent a relapse. I mentioned this case in passing the other evening. The medical representative considered dental treatment vitally necessary to prevent a relapse, and pointed out that examination of the man's chest revealed very suspicious signs of a possibly active tuberculosis. Under the revised regulations effective in June last, dental treatment was refused by the department, presumably on the grounds that this pensioner was not under treatment by the department in hospital.

Mr. POWER: The regulations in regard to dental treatment, to which my hon. friend refers, are more generous than the former ones.

Mr. MacNEIL: I said the dental regulations effective in June last. The department will not extend dental treatment to a class 2 patient unless he actually goes into an institution to receive such treatment. I think the minister well knows that a case of tuberculosis requires the very best in the way of nourishing food, and therefore the condition of the mouth is extremely important. If there is anything that interferes with proper mastication of food, the man does not get proper nourishment and is unable to keep his tuberculous condition in an arrested state.

Under the previous regulations this man would have received the necessary dental treatment on the authority of the department; but under the new regulations it is refused although recommended by the department's medical representative, and this may result in a definite physical break-down. As the minister knows, we spend vast sums of money treating tuberculous pensioners in sanatoria, to arrest the progress of the disease. The present policy of the treatment branch, if persisted in, may ultimately lead to a break-down of a large number of these tuberculous cases, necessitating further sanatorium treatment, increasing the cost to the state, as well as increasing the man's disabling pensionable condition. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction. The criticism is not directed against the minister; the dissatisfaction is with the treatment branch, because of what may be termed petty, chiselling tactics. I ask the minister to give an assurance that the pension commission shall have the absolute right to authorize treatment when it is indicated in the interests of the pensioner as well as in the interests of—

Mr. POWER: I will not do that. I will give the hon. member the assurance that I will not, because it would be very bad administration; that is the principal reason. But in so far as telling every officer in the department, wherever he is, from the highest to the lowest, that there is to be "no chiselling on the soldiers," that was done the first time I came in. There is not going to be too much petting of them, nor will there be any chiselling anywhere.

The hon. member will recollect, if his memory takes him over the years as mine does, that all the way through it has been the habit to blame some one person or some one branch. At one time no member of parliament dare mention the pension commission in this chamber; if he did, immediately there was a storm. The pension commissioners, and particularly the chairman of the commission, were persons to be avoided. The chairman's name was not even respectable, and the very idea of that commission, or anyone having anything to do with pensions, looking after the treatment of the poor soldiers, would have raised a revolution in this house. That was only because for some reason or another the soldiers had taken an aversion to the personality of the man who was then in charge of pensions. At another time it was some other official. But in spite of the particular antipathy, rightly or wrongly, of certain hon. members or of certain soldier associations, the administration of the department must go on, and I cannot give the assurance to any hon. member that because he does not happen to like the colour of the hair of some of the doctors in my department I am going to change the whole system. That would be neither fair nor reasonable.

As I have said, in years gone by we got ourselves into endless difficulties by having two authorities having equal jurisdiction over the persons who were to be treated in our hospitals. It was found after the fullest investigation by an outside body, a firm of accountants and experts, that this system could not work, and the result was that we arrived at what we are doing now. I did not create what now exists; but I certainly would not like to bring about a kind of earthquake in the whole administration of the department, particularly when by good will and coordination we can get far better results, and I think that is what we are now getting.

As to the cases cited by the hon. member, let me say something which perhaps will not please some people. There has been a tendency, which I am trying to make disappear as far as the department is concerned, on the part of both the soldiers and the department to argue a case purely from the technical standpoint. They are chasing one another around by the tail. The house passes some piece of legislation with the laudable intention of bringing under the benefits of pension law or of treatment a particular class of people. Immediately others who are no more entitled to it than the man in the moon come in under it. The result is that in the minds of some of the officers there may be a hardening against people who take technical advantage of the act to obtain certain things.

One of the worst cases with reference to treatment, one that has given me the most trouble, is that of a man who, after having been discharged from the United States army because of tuberculosis, was three days in the Canadian army before he went to hospital, where he remained. We have spent $35,000 on him, and never a day passed but there were complaints from that man that he was not getting enough pay and allowances. He received pay and allowances from 1917 on. Very recently, unfortunately, he died. But that man continually bothered us and had half the returned soldier organizations in this country bothering us, trying to take advantage of some technical point that his disability was aggravated during the three days' service he had in the Canadian forces prior to being hospitalized.

Sometimes the soldiers go too far. If there has been any tendency in the department to resort to technicalities—a tendency which I hope and believe I have been able to check by constantly repeating that such is not the policy of the department—it has been to some extent the fault of those who endeavoured to take advantage of the legislation to obtain for themselves benefits to which they were not entitled. If there are complaints from all over the country—and I receive them, as no doubt every hon. member does—that certain people are drawing one hundred per cent pension to which they are not entitled, it is because of this very tendency; they have taken advantage, perhaps properly, of the act because possibly we have not given sufficient consideration to all the implications of the legislation we introduced.

Mr. MacNEIL: I wish to make it clear that I am not animated by personal antagonism to any particular official of the department, nor am I directing this criticism to the minister. I see no reason why the minister should have entered into such an elaborate defence of his department. But in the last two years, from constant contact with a number of cases, I am convinced there have been definite indications of some tightening up in the application of regulations—

Mr. POWER: I deny that.

Mr. MacNEIL: —by certain officials in the treatment branch. That is evident as you meet the men, not "lead swingers," who have been deprived of various attentions that they formerly received. I think I am competent to judge of a "lead swinger." I am here citing the cases of two men who gave evidence of making an effort to reestablish themselves; they desired treatment in order that they might carry on in their occupations rather than be wholly dependent on a pension.

Mr. POWER: I absolutely deny there has been any tightening up of the treatment regulations since I came into office. On the contrary, the hon. member will find that the system is as wide open as it can be; that instructions have been given everywhere, "The regulations are not there to keep people from getting treatment; they are there to enable them to get it." That is the theory on which the officers of my department are instructed to act.

Mr. MacNEIL: I accept the minister's assurance and I believe every hon. member knows that his attitude towards the problem has been as he has stated.

Mr. POWER: I resent the implication that since I came in we have tightened up. It is not true.

Mr. MacNEIL: I withdraw any remark of mine which leaves the inference that the minister has been in any way responsible. The minister must be aware, however, that at certain times officials in endeavouring to draw up regulations may lop off here and there, perhaps unjustly, men who should receive pension or treatment. When I mentioned that period I was not referring specifically to the time during which the department has been under the present minister. I am not developing an attack against the department.

Mr. POWER: I wish you were; there would be something to answer.

Mr. MacNEIL: I am merely suggesting that there should be a regulation whereby, when the pensions medical authority passes in favour of the pensioner, that judgment shall be acted upon without hesitation by the treatment branch. If the minister can give some assurance that this can be done—and I believe that he has the power to do so—the trouble in this regard will disappear immediately.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): Is there any possibility of a pension being increased in a case of this kind? A man was given a pension of $17.25 a month, being then able to work. Subsequently he was unable to work and was advised that if it could be shown that he had a defective heart condition, further consideration would be given him. He was examined and was advised by the pension commission that there was no change in his pensionable condition since his previous examination, and under these circumstances no consideration could be given him. This man was unable to work; he is still not able to do anything. Is there any possibility of an increase in a case of that kind?

Mr. POWER: I assume it was decision of the pension commission, which alone has authority to assess and award or to refuse pensions.

Mr. GREEN: We have had complaints about quorums of the commission taking the opinion of medical men who live in a different city from the applicant. For example, a man may appear before a quorum in Calgary and have medical evidence given there, but then his file is sent to a doctor in Toronto or Montreal for an opinion.

Mr. POWER: I never thought that medical science was confined to one locality. If a man is a good doctor he is as capable of diagnosing diseases in Calgary as in Toronto. Perhaps, however, I misunderstand the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. GREEN: The point is this, that the man is actually seen in person by the doctor in Calgary and not by the doctor in Montreal or Toronto as the case may be. I understand the departmental hospitals are all in large centres. Would it not be possible to have experts in the different cities pass upon these cases only after actually seeing the applicants, instead of the quorums simply referring a man's file to a doctor in another city who has never seen the applicant? There is a good deal of complaint in that regard, and I am wondering whether it is not possible to alter the present method.

Mr. POWER: It is a little difficult to bring every applicant who claims that he has a disability, from Calgary to Montreal or Toronto for examination by specialists there. It would be costly.

Mr. GREEN: Could he not be examined by an expert in Calgary?

Mr. LENNARD: I wish to draw to the attention of the committee a certain case, not as an indvidual complaint but as representing the position of a considerable body of imperial war veterans in Canada. For the purpose I might read part of a letter I wrote to the chairman of the pension commission on October 30, 1937. I shall not mention the name. The letter refers to No. 510250 and reads:

> I have had drawn to my attention the case of the above mentioned man, who is confined to the Mountain Sanatorium, Hamilton, Ontario, suffering from T.B.
> He was an acting sergeant in the Army Service Corps, 3rd Divisional train for several years when through a shortage of officers in the artillery of the Imperial army, he joined that force and served in same for several years until gassed at the front. He served in the Imperial Army in the 168th Siege Battery 68th Brigade.
> As you know, during the war, there was a certain amount of encouragement offered capable men in the Canadian ranks to join and take out a commission in the Imperials. This encouragement being of course on solely patriotic grounds. I feel, however, that there is some weight to my argument that while this man was gassed while in the Imperial forces, he left Canada in the Canadian ranks and is, in my opinion, a responsibility of the Canadian government.

Two days later I received from General McDonald a letter in reply in which he said that under the Pension Act nothing could be done. He suggested, however, that this man might apply under the War Veterans' Allowance Act. Unfortunately the man died four days after, though that is not the point. What I want to emphasize is this. If a man leaves Canada in the Canadian forces and is allowed to transfer to another unit, our responsibility to him as Canadians does not cease.

Mr. MacNEIL: I wish to direct the attention of the minister to the neurological cases. The situation that existed and was discussed in 1936 has not improved; in fact it is getting worse. I would ask that these men receive the protection originally intended by parliament under section 11, subsection 1 (b) of the Pension Act, which reads:

> No deduction shall be made from the degree of actual disability of any member of the forces who has served in a theatre of actual war on account of any disability or disabling condition which existed in him at the time at which he became a member of the forces; but no pension shall be paid for a disability or disabling condition which at such time was wilfully concealed, was obvious, was not of a nature to cause rejection from service, or was a congenital defect.

The amendment, for which I hope to get the approval of the minister, is that after the words "congenital defect," there be added the words "of a nature other than mental, psychopathic or neuropathic." The interpretation placed upon the words "congenital defect" results in great injustice to those who suffer from certain types of mental or nervous disease. The problem has appreciable proportions; there are 4,500 suffering from nervous diseases, and possibly a large percentage of these would come under this particular section.

I shall not attempt to argue with the doctors. I know that many eminent members of the medical profession have expressed opinions on this matter, but it is far more important to look at it from a common sense point of view and particularly in the light of the original intention of parliament. When you consider the history of the Pension Act, it was clearly the intention of parliament to pension for the entire disability apparent in a man at the time of his discharge, provided that any pre-enlistment condition was not obvious or wilfully concealed. The words " or was a congenital defect" were added subsequently to 1918 or 1919, but clearly for the purpose of dealing with such defects as a bodily deformity which perhaps was not apparent at first. It was never the intention of parliament to deprive those suffering from nervous or mental disease of the protection which this section affords. I might refer to some important statements made in days gone by with respect to the intention of this section. The Hon. Mr. Rowell, chairman of the parliamentary committee in 1919, made a statement in the house. The statement is reported in Hansard of 1919 at page 4174 and is as follows:

> If a man reached France, then he gets a pension, regardless of any pre-existing disability. That is the law as it stands in the pension regulations.

Again, discussing the report of the committee he said, as reported at page 4176 of Hansard of the same year:

> But the committee thought, if the army medical service passed a man through and he actually got to the front, we should ignore any question of pre-existing disability and grant him a pension.

Mr. Archibald, then legal adviser of the board, made this statement:

Those who got to France are pensionable for any disability which exists in them at the time of discharge unless the disability was obvious or concealed on enlistment.

And he goes on at length to present the argument, concluding with these words:

The parliamentary committee of 1918 came to the conclusion that if any man reached a theatre of actual war it must be definitely presumed that he was absolutely fit upon enlistment unless it could be proved that there was a pre-enlistment disability which was concealed or was obvious, or was of so minor a nature as not to cause rejection from service.

In 1922 the pension board gave effect to a memorandum which became famous at that time. Paragraph B stated:

That in any case previously fully pensionably under section 25 (3)—

Now referred to as section 11 (b).

—and in which it is decided that aggravation on service has ceased, further pension cannot be awarded after the aggravation is deemed to have disappeared.

That was dealt with by the Ralston commission, which reported as follows:

(b) The commission is further of the opinion that, in view of the circumstances hereinbefore set out as to the application of section B of the minute of September 29, 1921, all cases within the provisions of section 25 (3) in which pension has been discontinued on the ground that aggravation or increase of disability on service has ceased or disappeared, should be reviewed and adjusted on the basis of the ruling contained in the general instruction of June 26, 1922.

Appropriate action was taken subsequently by parliament and we have the present section 11 of the Pension Act.

Now the chief neuropsychiatrist of the department prior to the parliamentary committee of 1936 reviewed a number of these cases. I shall not go into the evidence taken on that occasion except to say that any change of diagnosis in any of these cases affected the decision of the pension commission. Apparently he made an attempt to review and analyse the files a little more closely, for the purpose, he said, of constructive treatment. Here, again, I am not questioning the professional status of this medical gentleman; but he does say with reference to men incapacitated to-day as a result of mental or nervous disorders, designated neurological or psychoneurotic cases or whatever the term may be, that in the majority of these cases the disabilities were of constitutional origin. He claimed that a man had a psychopathic personality of constitutional origin; that a neurosis, probably anxiety neurosis, was superimposed on that mental defect during service, and that subsequent to service this had subsided, or if still in existence was due to economic conditions or worry. Therefore entitlement would be admitted only in respect of the neurosis or what might remain in consequence of neurosis, but no consideration could be given under the Pension Act to the pre-existing psychopathic condition or mental defect which he contended was of constitutional origin. That results in depriving all these men of the protection designed for them by parliament as far back as 1918 and 1919.

To all intents and purposes this man was fit on enlistment, if any mental defect existed in him at that time, even though of constitutional origin, it did not deprive him of ability to carry on in his occupation or to serve effectively in France, nor was it apparent to anyone. As far as evidence goes in the majority of these cases, the man carried on in normal fashion, discharged the ordinary duties of life and the duties required of him in the army effectively until the break-down. The neurosis, or mental or nervous break-down, or whatever term may be used, was the last straw, was the disturbing factor which resulted in a break-down. The very fact that they admit the presence of that neurosis is in my opinion admission of a very definite aggravation. As a layman I cannot see how it is possible to draw the line between the pre-existing psychopathic condition, if it did exist prior to enlistment, and the neurosis. Certainly, in combining the two, the result is almost disastrous to such a man. We have them in large numbers of cases to-day wholly incapacitated as a result of that experience in service. I consider that attempting to delve into the pre-enlistment history is grossly unfair and unjust. In the cases I have had opportunity to examine there is no evidence of pre-enlistment condition. The opinion ventured by the chief neuropsychiatrist of the department is based on medical theory; and, as they admit themselves, the science is not exact by any means. These decisions are hair-splitting and based on fine-spun medical theory alone.

As I see it, there is only one way now of extending to these men the protection originally intended by parliament, that is by a definite amendment to the act such as I have suggested. I think the minister is right in suggesting that no good purpose could be served by attacking the medical officer in question, though I disagree with him on his findings. I am well aware that a board of consultants brought down an opinion more or less upholding his views; but I point out that the doctor himself went on the stand and said he was approaching the problem from the point of view of constructive treatment, and I have not yet discovered that it has taken fully into consideration the consequences of that change of diagnosis when that opinion is passed on to the pension commission.

It may be said to the credit of the chairman of the pension commission that he has carried on attempting to administer justice in the majority of these cases with very little change of policy; nevertheless the situation of many of these men at the present time is precarious. I am well aware that the chief neuropsychiatrist is an official of the treatment branch and that the pension commission is under no obligation to accept his opinion; nevertheless when a man of his professional status does place on file a finding or diagnosis as I have described, and uses the term "of constitutional origin," that must of necessity influence the opinion of the medical men on the pension commission. It is held as being synonymous with the term "congenital defect". That interpretation of this section, in the light of the medical evidence and medical opinion expressed, is as I say depriving several thousand ex-service men of the protection originally intended under the section which I have quoted. I hope the minister will take the earliest opportunity to open this subject up by way of amendment to the act and make very clear that pre-enlistment conditions of this nature are not considered in regard to pensions in connection with those who served in a theatre of actual war.

Mr. QUELCH: I understood the minister to say a little while ago that he would like to give the committee a decision on the question of widows' pensions.

Mr. POWER: No, I did not. I am giving an opinion.

Mr. QUELCH: Well, would it not be possible to place that opinion before this committee at this session?

Mr. POWER: I hardly think so.

Mr. LENNARD: Would it be possible for further negotiation to take place between the governments regarding the problems of ex-service imperials at present in Canada?

Mr. POWER: I have no objection to taking part in any negotiations. I would not mind a trip to Europe if the government is willing to send me to negotiate, but I do not know what I could say to them more than I have already said.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain the decrease in this vote this year?

Mr. POWER: Based on the figures covering the operations of the Canadian pension commission over a period of nine months, I anticipate that the total amounts paid out in respect of European war pensions which, for the fiscal year 1936-37 amounted to $41,424,432.74, will, during the current fiscal year, show a reduction in the vicinity of $600,000. In that year $40,330,000 comprised the regular monthly payments made to pensioners. This amount will show during the current year a net decrease of about $130,000.

There are many factors and activities which produce variations both up and down in these amounts, but by far the major influences leading to decreases are the deaths of pensioners and the discontinuation of additional allowances to children on their reaching the age limit for pension—sixteen in the case of boys and seventeen in the case of girls. On the other hand, the amounts are increased by new awards of pension; by the extension of additional allowances to children beyond the age limit, who are continuing at school and whose parents are in necessitous circumstances, and by the increase in the rate of pension to existing pensioners whose disabilities are causing them greater handicap as the years go by. Other factors of a minor nature enter into the financial picture, but are not of any considerable moment in the aggregate.

Deaths of pensioners are providing a reduction of approximately $750,000, and the discontinuance of children's allowances, less the amount allowed for extension beyond the age limit, will account for about $480,000. These are the major factors on the decrease side.

On the other hand, new awards of pension, both to ex-soldiers themselves, who receive entitlement, and to widows and dependents of those who die, will amount to about $535,000, and the increased pension due to higher percentages being paid will add another $540,000. Other major factors which will have the effect of reducing the amount are the sums involved in what are described as first payments and retroactive payments. These are non-recurring payments which cover back periods for which pensioners are entitled to payments under the provisions of the act. In 1936-37 these payments accounted for $938,000. Largely due to the limitations on such payments provided for in the amending legislation of the session of 1936, during the present year these sums will show a very considerable reduction, and will not amount to more than $450,000, making a reduction under these items alone of nearly half a million dollars.

In regard to actual numbers, new awards to disability pensioners have been slightly greater than the numbers of deaths and discontinuations. As at December 31 last there was a total of 79,881 disability pensions and 18,122 dependent pensions, a total of 98,003, involving an annual liability of $40,589,757.

Mr. GREEN: Is it expected there will be a decrease each year?

Mr. POWER: I cannot say; I do not know. It is likely, but probably not so substantial.

Mr. GREEN: In view of the different points which have been raised throughout the discussion of the item, would it be possible to have amendments made to the Pension Act at this session?

Mr. POWER: I do not think the hon. member would expect me to tell him about any legislation at this time. For the moment I am considering whether I shall bring in legislation dealing with the Pension Act. So far no decision has been reached. That is the best answer I can give.

Mr. MacNEIL: I do not wish to weary the minister and members of the committee; but as the minister has said, this is our one opportunity of advancing suggestions with respect to amendments to the act. I would suggest that if the minister is considering amendments he might consider the deletion of section 77. This section reads:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in this or any other act, no pension, or additional pension, awardable or payable under the provisions of this act, shall be awarded or paid,
> (a) under schedule A or schedule B of this act, to or in respect of any child of a member of the forces or pensioner, if such child shall have been born on or after the first day of May, 1933;
> (b) under schedule A of this act, to or in respect of the wife of a member of the forces or pensioner, if she shall have been married to him on or after the date aforementioned—

And so on. I think all hon. members clearly understand that this section was introduced as a measure of economy and at a time when national revenues were at a low ebb. According to statements by the government, that condition no longer persists. They say we are well on the way to economic recovery, and I think we may well do as has been done in Australia, namely, restore benefits formerly taken away because of economic pressure.

Under subsection (a) of this section a very curious situation arises. Two of the children of a pensioner may be receiving a pension, but two of them born subsequent to May, 1933, may not receive a pension. This is a difficult situation to explain. Furthermore, with regard to wives who marry subsequently —say in 1932—it is becoming extremely difficult to explain to them why, even if a husband dies from disability held to be attributable to war service, a pension is not awarded. Many rather unfair anomalies exist, and I would ask the minister to take the matter into consideration when he has in mind amendments to the Pension Act, or if he decides to bring the act under review this session.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Carried?

Mr. MacNEIL: As the item is not carried, there are a number of other suggestions. The item is not carried, is it? I have other suggestions to make.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The debate on it is closed, if it is carried.

Mr. POWER: I have no objection to permitting it to stand. We shall have to have another two hour sitting at some other time, with respect to the same item. If the item were passed, I should be very grateful to the hon. member; but if he does not wish it to pass, there is nothing I can say.

The CHAIRMAN: I asked if it carried, and no one said anything. I assumed that it had.

Mr. MacNEIL: Two members were on their feet.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister permit discussion of one or two points on another vote? If he would do that, we could pass it this evening.

Mr. POWER: I should be very glad to do that. I endeavoured the first night to limit discussion to the single item. Since then the freest discussion has been carried on, but I confess I was not very successful in my attempts to control the committee. It can run as wild as it likes now.

Mr. GREEN: We would like to help the minister, if he would agree to the discussion of pensions on another item.

Mr. POWER: There will be an item under the administration of the whole department, and there will be nothing to prevent an hon. member from making any suggestion he wishes at that time.

Item agreed to.

NIAGARA FALLS OBSERVATION BRIDGE COMPANY

Mr. A. B. DAMUDE (Welland) moved the second reading of Bill No. 15, to incorporate Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it will be necessary for me to make any extended remarks at this time in connection with this bill. This is a bill to incorporate the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company which is to erect a bridge between Niagara Falls, Ontario, and Niagara Falls, New York. It is felt that this bridge will be very much in the interests of the public at this particular time.

Mr. HEAPS: I notice by the newspapers that it is the intention of the Ontario government also to erect a bridge. May I ask the hon. member if the Ontario government have expressed any wishes in regard to the present bill?

Mr. DAMUDE: To the best of my knowledge this bill is in accordance with the wishes of the Ontario government and the Niagara Falls park commission.

Mr. MacNICOL: I may not be in order in asking this question, but I notice from the papers that one of the promoters of this company is related to one of the commissioners of the Niagara Falls park commission and another is related to the Minister of Highways of Ontario. If this report in the papers is correct, it does not seem quite right to me that this bill should go through.

Mr. DAMUDE: I think the statement with respect to the first gentleman is correct.

Mr. MacNICOL: Which one is that?

Mr. DAMUDE: The brother of a park commissioner, Mr. Kaumeyer, is named in the bill. There appears in the bill no blood relation of the Minister of Highways of Ontario, but his law partner is mentioned.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

LORD'S DAY ACT

PENALTY FOR DIRECTORS AND OFFICERS PERMITTING VIOLATION OF THE ACT

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain) moved the second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the Lord's Day Act.

He said: This amendment to the Lord's Day Act is intended to bring about a better observance of one of the ten commandments, namely, the one that says, "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy." I do not think I need say very much about this bill to hon. members as I have often noticed the atmosphere of piety that falls over the house when you, Mr. Speaker, lead us in prayer at the opening of our daily sittings. I am sure that this bill will meet with the approval of the house.

It has often been said that corporations have no heart. Two centuries ago Sir Edward Coke, who had much to do with the development of the law concerning joint stock companies, said that a corporation cannot commit treason, nor can it be excommunicated; for it has no soul. Hence the behaviour of corporations must be regulated by law. Certain works of necessity or of mercy are permitted to be done on Sunday, and it is not my intention to restrict the list of exceptions now given in the act.

Regretful as it may be, the fact is that certain corporations in the province of Quebec have been violating the provisions of the Lord's Day Act. Before saying anything further, let me comment on the fact that the directorates of these corporations are made up of all nationalities. There are French Canadians, English Canadians and American Canadians, probably in greater number, on these directorates. Our clergy have conducted a most strenuous campaign against these violations and complaints have been made by all classes in all communities without avail.

Our failure to put an end to these violations of the Lord's Day Act is evidently due in part to the fact that the penalties now provided are not severe enough and also to the fact that our working men or labourers are not sufficiently organized to resist the unlawful commands of their employers. Be it as it may, one must come to the conclusion that the penalties provided by the act have not been a sufficient deterrent. Section 14 of the act reads as follows:

> Every corporation which authorizes, directs or permits its employees to carry on any part of the business of such corporation in violation of any of the provisions of this act, shall be liable, on summary conviction before two justices of the peace, for the first offence, to a penalty not exceeding two hundred and fifty dollars and not less than fifty dollars, and, for each subsequent offence, to a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars and not less than one hundred dollars, in addition to any other penalty prescribed by law for the same offence.

The amended section will read as follows:

> Any person, being a director, an officer, a superintendent or an employee of a corporation, to whose direction or orders any employee is by the terms or conditions of his employment bound to conform, who authorizes, directs or permits any such last mentioned employee of that corporation to carry on any part of the business of the corporation in violation of any of the provisions of this act, shall be liable, on summary conviction before two justices of the peace, to the same penalties as those to which a corporation is liable under subsection one of this section or, for a first offence, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months and not less than one month, with or without hard labour, and for each subsequent offence, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months and not less than two months, with or without hard labour.

It will not be necessary to impose the gaol sentence as this will be discretionary. Many corporations have been prosecuted repeatedly; but when that happens, there is always delay in the proceedings. They have the money to go to appeal or even to pay a fine if necessary; but quite often, during and after the proceedings, the same violations are carried on. Much repair work is done on Sundays that could well be carried on during the week. It is manifest that these corporations find it profitable to pay a fine and then continue to violate the law.

Who would object to this amendment? Corporations which are observing the law will not object. I take this opportunity to congratulate the directors of such corporations upon showing the same Christian spirit in the conduct of their business as they show in their personal and private affairs. On the other hand, can it be said that the intended amendment is too drastic? In that case the objectors would be either those who are violating the law or those who intend to violate it. In neither case, I submit, are they entitled to sympathy or consideration.

Now, let us view this matter in the light of the sanctions imposed by our laws against those who violate the commandments of the decalogue, from which our law for the observance of Sunday is derived. Most of the sections of our criminal code having their source in a moral obligation to do or not to do certain things provide for the imprisonment of those who violate the code. Here are a few examples.

"Thou shalt not kill." The violation of the section of our criminal code which is based on this commandment makes the offender liable to hanging, and, in the case of manslaughter, to imprisonment for life, and very few find fault with that penalty as being too extreme.

"Thou shalt not steal." The section of our criminal code which is based on this commandment makes the offender liable to imprisonment for a maximum of fourteen years, and I do not think the penalty is considered excessive, except perhaps by the offenders themselves.

[Mr. Brunelle.]

"Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife." It might be well for me not to make any comment on this commandment, particularly in the presence of bachelor members of the house, knowing not the tree of knowledge of good and evil, and who upon hearing some suggestion of matrimonial miseries might be forever scared away from the state of marriage; so I will pass on.

Now the commandment upon which the Lord's Day Act is based reads thus: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." Here is a message from the Holy Book in reference to the penalty to be imposed upon those who do not observe the Sabbath day:

> Six days shall work be done, but on the seventh day there shall be to you an holy day, a sabbath of rest to the Lord.

And, sir, note this:

> Whosoever shall do work therein shall be put to death.

My amendment to the Lord's Day Act does not go as far as that. I want the directors of corporations to live, but should they not let others live up to their religious convictions?

I have shown, Mr. Speaker, that the Lord's Day Act is ineffective in many cases inasmuch as certain corporations find it profitable and advantageous to pay the fine and keep on violating the law. I have also shown that, relying on the unquestionable authority and wisdom of the Holy Scriptures, this house will be amply justified in making the penalty for violation of the Lord's Day Act more severe in order to give the offenders the precious advantage of repenting at leisure in gaol for a short time at least.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I make a confident appeal to the good will of every member of the house, and particularly to the high moral and Christian character of the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to accept this amendment, and by so doing the house will have taken a most salutary step towards the enforcement of a law which is based upon the well-known and accepted precept not only of Christianity but of all known religions of the world, that one day of the week must be a day of rest.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, listening to my hon. friend (Mr. Brunelle) I could not help remembering the circumstances under which this act was placed on the statute book. At that time members from my own province were not very keen on the enactment of the Lord's Day Act, and quite an agitation was carried on against it. I remember Mr. Bourassa and my friend Mr. Lavergne holding meetings of protest in the province of Quebec against this encroachment on the liberty of the subject, and there were quite a number of members on our own side of the house who spoke against the measure, but finally it was enacted. It is interesting to observe that to-day it is a member from the province of Quebec who proposes that the law shall be made stricter at least in one particular.

When my hon. friend introduced a similar bill last year I gave consideration to it, and had the bill come up for second reading I would have supported it. I have no reason to-day to change my attitude. There is no doubt that in the province of Quebec—I do not know whether it is the same in the other provinces—this law has not been observed by certain big corporations as well as it should have been, and labour unions have been protesting strongly against violations of the law and asking that some amendment should be made. When proceedings are taken in the courts against offenders—and it is the attorney general of the province who has to authorize the issuing of proceedings before the courts—a corporation, when it is fined, pays the fine, and that is all there is to it. My hon. friend seeks to make the managers, the men who are in charge of the concern, responsible as well and to subject them to fine and imprisonment, to which the corporation is not subject.

There is one change I would suggest in the wording of the amendment. My hon. friend uses the words "the same" penalties. I think that would be equivocal, because it might mean one penalty payable either by the corporation or by the directors or the managers, and when the bill is in committee I shall suggest that the word "similar" be substituted for the words "the same," so that there will be no doubt that it will hit both the corporation and the directors or managers.

I congratulate my hon. friend upon having taken the initiative in this matter. I may say that the government was to move some amendments in order to meet the wishes especially of the labour unions, and of all citizens who desire that the Lord's Day be observed as it should be.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 1—Penalty for directors and officers permitting violation of the act.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East) moved:

That the words "the same" in line 16 be struck out and the word "similar" inserted in lieu thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder whether the Minister of Justice has considered the question of the use of the word "permits" in the proposed amendment.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Where?

Mr. BENNETT: In the twelfth line. It would seem obvious that it is quite unfair to endeavour to convict a person of permitting something when he may know nothing about it. It is "a director, an officer, a superintendent or an employee. . . . . who authorizes, directs or permits any such last mentioned employee. . . . . " I think the hon. gentleman who has charge of the bill will have his object met if he limits it to "authorizes or directs", because I can see great difficulties about using that word "permits." It might become a matter of serious moment if it were put forward for prosecution purposes by some person who had ill will or ill feeling, because the directors might be said to "permit" something.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Some under-foreman or similar employee might be responsible.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If the hon. member has no objection to the amendment suggested by the right hon. leader of the opposition—

Mr. BRUNELLE: I have no objection.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): —I move:

That the words "or permits" in the twelfth line be struck out and the word "or" inserted after the word "authorizes" in the eleventh line.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISION AGAINST REFUSAL TO EMPLOY OR DISMISSAL FOR MEMBERSHIP IN TRADE UNIONS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Woodsworth for the second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the criminal code.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Since the house is in such an agreeable mood to-night, I hope that it will give favourable consideration to this bill, which seeks to guarantee labour the right to organize. When I was interrupted by the "nine o'clock" the other evening, I was pointing out that the trades unions have been urging legislation along this line. The following resolution is rather typical of a number that have come to me. The chairman of the Toronto and district joint board of A.A. lodges, after certain of their officials had been dismissed because of their having joined a labour union, passed this resolution:

That the Toronto and district joint board of A.A. lodges, representing 2,500 steelworkers in the city of Toronto, most strongly urge upon the federal government the enactment of Bill 62—

That was the number by which the bill was known last year.

—thereby safeguarding our democratic rights as Canadian citizens and providing penalties for employers who would violate these rights.

This right to organize is being claimed not only by industrial workers but by members of professional organizations. I will read certain excerpts from a letter which I have received from the president of the Newspaper Guild of Montreal.

The Montreal Newspaper Guild was chartered in April, 1937, as a local of the American Newspaper Guild, an international union chartered by the American Federation of Labor. The American Newspaper Guild last June at its convention voted to affiliate with the Committee for Industrial Organization, and this decision of the convention was subsequently sustained by a referendum vote of the international membership. The other Canadian local of the guild was chartered in Toronto in the fall of 1936.

A little later:

On June 23, a number of members of the editorial staff of the Gazette were warned by the managing editor that they were jeopardizing their jobs by joining or retaining membership in the guild. Later that day I was discharged by the managing editor, who told me he had not been empowered to give me a reason for my dismissal. . . . I had been employed by the Gazette for nine and a half years, and at the time of my discharge was assistant telegraph editor. I was then and still am president of the guild and represented the organization at the A.N.G.'s convention in June at St. Louis, Missouri.

It seems to me intolerable that men who attempt to join a labour organization or a professional organization should be intimidated and dismissed for no other reason than that they are members of those organizations. That is the reason for the introduction of the bill.

While it is true that matters of property and civil rights in the provinces—and I emphasize that phrase—come under provincial jurisdiction, I would point out that this is not a matter of a merely local or private nature. It is much wider than that, and hence it seems to me it might very well come under federal jurisdiction. I might point out, for example, that the solemnization of marriage in the province is provincial but marriage and divorce are federal—British North America Act, section 91, item 26. The criminal law is federal, and there would seem to be no real reason why the refusal of an employer to grant what seems to us to be the legitimate rights of the workers should not be made a crime. Within the last few minutes we have undertaken to prevent employers from forcing men to work on the Lord's day. Why should not this much more important question be given favourable consideration?

The criminal code has a number of sections dealing with restraint of trade, the breaking of contracts, and so on. Trade unions were once considered illegal. Now they are especially exempted under section 498, subsection 2. Well, it would seem to me as a layman that if it is proper to put this sort of thing in the criminal code at one time, and later to make special exemptions, the whole subject is one which naturally might come within federal jurisdiction under the criminal code. I suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that it is quite proper that my amendment should find a place in the criminal code.

As one looks over the legislation of Canada and of most countries, one finds that there is one law for the employer and another law for the employee. The minister shakes his head.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Surely it is not a crime for an employee to refuse to work for a certain employer?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is a very great difference, as I shall proceed to point out. In many respects the employers are protected. This is the parallel: The employers have the right to organize and they are protected by charters; we ask simply that the employees should be given the right to organize—the right already enjoyed by the employers.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They have it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh, no. As we go back over British history we find that the nobles once ruled, and the laws in those days reflected very largely the interests of the nobles. The commons gradually gained power, and we find changes taking place in the law. Gradually there was the extension of the franchise. In the old days the franchise was very much limited, limited to employers, to men of substance, men of a certain class. Later on the franchise was extended so that the employees, the poor people and finally all people obtained it. It was only within comparatively recent years that labour had distinct representation in the House of Commons in Great Britain. Then certain more liberal or progressive laws were brought into force. Even the criminal code began to be altered not only because of the pressure of labour members in the House of Commons but because of enfranchised labour people throughout the country.

We in Canada have inherited to a very considerable extent the laws of Great Britain, many of them drawn up years and years ago, and our Canadian laws in many respects are those of Great Britain in the days before they had been modified, as they have been in England, under pressure of the growing labour forces. In Canada labour has had comparatively little political power, or, for that matter, economic power; otherwise we might have had more political power.

I would suggest that the laws on our statute books to-day are largely laws based upon an outgrown type of industry. In the old days there was the individual employer on one side and on the other the individual employee. As I illustrated the other evening, we sometimes still see the old arrangement in a simple shoemaker's shop—the employer on one side of the bench and the employee on the other side. Practically the two men are of equal bargaining power. But in the typical workshop to-day, behind the employer or the manager, stands a strong corporation, possibly a great group of corporations. What chance has the individual workman in bargaining with a corporation financed by millions? The situation is an impossible one. This condition made necessary the formation of trade unions. Originally, these were regarded as illegal in that they interfered with freedom of trade. To-day, however, trade unions are recognized; they are no longer illegal. But legislation has not gone so far as to make it possible for men to join trade unions without being discriminated against or dismissed.

Let me point out that to-day property is well protected, as it has always been. It is illegal for a man to break a piece of machinery, but there is no law against an employer dismissing a man or taking other action that might lead to the breaking up of a home. I hope the Minister of Justice can see the close parallel that prevails there. A man can be dismissed and his dismissal may mean that he is permanently out of a job. It may be that he has no other economic resources and that may easily involve the breaking up of his home. There is absolutely nothing to protect the workman in these cases. But let a man injure in the slightest way a piece of machinery and immediately he is haled before the courts. He is guilty. There is no equal protection. There is one law distinctly for the employer in the protection of his property and an altogether different law or no law when it comes to the protection of the worker in his job, which often is the only thing he has.

I urge that whoever controls a man's job under modern conditions controls his very life. I wonder whether those of us who work in this comfortable house, in these comfortable surroundings, for some months on end quite realize what it is to be out of a job and without the chance of getting another. Under modern conditions, the man who controls my job controls my very life, yet it would appear, according to our laws, that a man has no rights whatever to his job. He may be dismissed in the most arbitrary manner.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Would you make it criminal for your electors to take away your job?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; that is another matter. I would make it criminal for them to take it away by some of the means used to-day, that is, bribery and intimidation; and that is what I want to prevent in this case.

To get back to this bill, I would suggest that organized employers to-day, incorporated and so on, are many of them denying to employees the rights which they themselves claim. Employers come here for charters, receive incorporation which gives them great power which they often exercise arbitrarily and without regard to the welfare of the employees. They are well protected; all this bill is designed to accomplish is that the employees, the labour people, are also protected. It is a different type of protection they need, but it is protection just the same, and protection which ought to be given.

I would make my appeal for the passage of this measure really on two grounds: first, there is the inherent right of freedom, freedom of speech, freedom of the press and freedom of organization.

Mr. BENNETT: Of association.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Of association, if you will. We who come of British stock and have been nurtured in British traditions have always thought that Britishers ought to enjoy that freedom, but in practice we are very far from enjoying it. It is not sufficient to have what is called political freedom, the right to vote. It is not sufficient to have the right to travel up and down the king's highway. In order to enjoy complete freedom a man must have economic freedom. There is no use in saying. "I have the right to travel on the railroad," unless I have something in the way of money in my pocket to enable me to travel. That is the important thing, and it is dependent on a measure of economic independence. To-day, if a man is to have freedom of association with his fellow workmen, he has to have some sort of economic security. That economic security can be swept away by the ukase of his employers.

This bill relates to the refusal of employers to recognize a trade union, or the intimidation of workers. I recall a rather celebrated case in the west in which one of the judges made a very strong statement with regard to the dangers of intimidation. This statement is taken from the charge to the jury of Judge Metcalfe in the King v. R. B. Russell. The judge said:

> There is no right in this country under our laws so sacred as the right of personal liberty. No right of labour or capital, about which there has been so much declamation, is so sacred or so carefully guarded by the law of the land as is that of personal liberty. But personal liberty is not liberty of the body only. It is also liberty of the mind and will; and the liberty of a man's mind and will to say how he will bestow himself and his means, his talents and his industry. This is as much a subject of the law's protection as is that of his body. . . .
> Take it from me, in strikes you can incite terror without hitting a man over the head. You can incite terror of starvation; you can incite terror of thirst. Is that not quite as effective as inciting by bodily violence? Your stomach will bring you quicker than a crack on the head sometimes. . . .

In this instance I quite agree with what Judge Metcalfe said. He made this charge to the jury with the idea of pointing out how dangerous it was for strikers to practise intimidation, but surely the principle is the same, precisely the same in the case of the employer. If employers intimidate, threaten to dismiss a man, that intimidation, according to Judge Metcalfe, is just as much an invasion of his liberty as if the man were hit over the head. I am inclined to think that we have minimized altogether too much this aspect of the matter, and have allowed men in authority, such as employers, to threaten. As I said a few minutes ago, if an employee breaks a piece of machinery he is under the penalty of the law. An employer who dismisses or threatens to dismiss a man for no other reason than that he belongs to a trade union is guilty of intimidation, which ought not to be permitted. If the intimidation were on the other foot, as it were, it would be prevented by the law.

I come back to the explanatory note appended to the bill. I would ask hon. members to give consideration to this, because it seems to me eminently fair:

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

> The purpose of this bill is to prevent employers from refusing to employ, or from dismissing employees, or conspiring with others therefor, for the reason that they are members of a trade union.
> As it is lawful for workmen or employees to form themselves into trade unions and to bargain collectively, it should, as a matter of public policy, be unlawful for employers to seek by overt acts or intimidation, threats or conspiracy to prevent them from belonging to such trade unions.

I hope that in considering this bill hon. members will recall that we are not living under conditions which prevailed one hundred years ago; we are living under modern industrial conditions. We are not living in an age when labour was considered to have very few rights, as then labour had very little power either economically or politically. More than that, I would ask the members to consider that it is definitely in the public interest that we should not allow reactionaries in our midst to indulge in practices which almost inevitably lead to strife and bitterness and often to riots. Some blame the men who in desperation go on strike; blame rather the employers who refuse to recognize the unions which, for their protection and interests, the men are seeking to form.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): With part of the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) I am heartily in accord, and I am sure that all hon. members of the house are.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We are all in favour of unions, I am strongly in favour, we all are, of recognizing the right of labour people to organize into unions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have said so on different occasions. I have said more than that; I have said that, at this stage of the history of the world, for employers to deny that right is—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Criminal.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): —stupid. But my hon. friend wants to go further than that. He wants to make a crime of something which in pith and substance relates to contract and comes under property and civil rights, and under our constitution is within the jurisdiction of the provinces. My hon. friend shakes his head, but the provinces have almost all of them enacted legislation like that which he wants us to enact by means of the criminal code. More than that, my hon.

friend refers to the Trades and Labour Congress. I have in my hand a circular sent to all the provincial legislatures by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada just last year, asking those legislatures which have not yet enacted some legislation to do it. This is what they said, when they sent to the legislatures a draft, almost similar to the bill presented by the hon. member.

(2) It is submitted that the provisions of the proposed bill fall within the exclusive—

I am not talking; it is the Trades and Labour Congress that is talking.

—legislative competence of the provincial legislatures. In support of this submission, it will be convenient to indicate briefly—

Then they give all the reasons for it. The provinces have acted in that field. There is the Alberta Freedom of Trade Union Association Act. I am pleased to refer to this statute of Alberta, assented to in 1937. It follows the lines of the draft bill proposed by the Trades and Labour Congress, and makes it unlawful for employers to dismiss employees because they are members of or want to remain members of a trade union. It makes the employers liable to a penalty fixed by the act.

The Nova Scotia Trade Union Act, 1937, declares it lawful for employees to form or to join a trade union, and makes it unlawful for employers to prevent them from doing so. In this instance a penalty is fixed by the statute. It is in their field of jurisdiction.

The Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Act of British Columbia, 1937, recognizes the right of employers and employees to organize for any lawful purposes. There again they make it unlawful to prevent employees from joining a trade union or association, and a penalty is fixed.

The Strikes and Lockouts Prevention Act, 1937, of Manitoba is again, I am sure, the result of the work of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, which has asked those legislatures to act in that way. Manitoba has acted.

Even the province of Quebec has acted, through the Fair Wage Act, 1937, of Quebec. There again we find a penalty for those who try to restrict the freedom of the working man.

In Saskatchewan there is a bill respecting the right of employees to organize. That bill received its first reading on January 28, 1938, and it is still before the legislature. Following the decisions of the court in relation to the power of the dominion to enact insurance legislation, it was sought to effect the same result by inserting a section in the criminal code, as the hon. member wants to do in this instance, by which it was to be made an indictable offence for any person to solicit or accept any insurance risk, except on behalf of a company or association licensed under the Insurance Act of 1917. That was challenged before the courts by the reciprocal insurers. I shall read to the hon. member the words of Mr. Justice Duff, who sat as a member of the board in the hearing of that case.

Mr. BENNETT: It is somewhat cut down since that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes possibly, but I am reading it.

. . . their lordships think it is no longer open to dispute that the parliament of Canada cannot, by purporting to create penal sanctions under section 91, head 27, appropriate to itself exclusively a field of jurisdiction in which, apart from such a procedure, it could exert no legal authority, and that if, when examined as a whole, legislation in form criminal is found, in aspects and for purposes exclusively within the provincial sphere, to deal with matters committed to the provinces, it cannot be upheld as valid.

In the recent reference to the privy council with respect to section 498A of the criminal code, their lordships said:

The only limitation on the plenary power of the dominion to determine what shall or shall not be criminal is the condition that parliament shall not, in the guise of enacting criminal legislation in truth and in substance, encroach on any of the classes of subjects enumerated in section 92. It is no objection that it does in fact affect them. In a genuine attempt to amend the criminal law it may obviously affect previous existing civil rights.

And further:

In the present case there seems to be no reason for supposing that the dominion are using the criminal law as a pretence or pretext or that the legislation is in pith and substance in any way interfering with civil rights in the province.

They declare the section valid. A similar view in every respect has been expressed by the privy council in other cases. For instance, we have only to refer to the Proprietary Articles Trade Association v. The Attorney General of Canada, reported at 1931 appeal cases, page 324.

In the present bill I think it is obvious from the section, together with the explanatory note, that the proposed legislation is in the guise of criminal legislation for the purpose, in truth and substance, of encroaching upon property and civil rights. The hon. member says there is a law for the employees and another for the employers. That is not so. There is nothing which prevents employees from refusing to work for any man, company or corporation. It is their freedom.

Mr. CAHAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There would be a different law if the other party would commit a crime by refusing to employ.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The alternative is starvation.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes; but that is why the provinces have intervened and have enacted legislation, which they have a right to enact, but which we cannot do, just by attempting to use the criminal code for that purpose.

I have every sympathy for labour people who join in trade unions. I think no employer should try to prevent them from doing so. But to make it a crime under the criminal code, on a question of contract—because it is a question of contract—is not proper. I cannot follow my hon. friend when he asks me to make it a crime to hire or engage labour to work. I do not think I have the right to do that.

Mr. DUNNING: Nine o'clock.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Conspiracy in restraint of trade originally applied to trade unions. Then exemptions were made for trade unions. Does not this suggest that such matters were within the scope of criminal law.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The hon. member has said there were exceptions made for trade unions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not originally.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No; it was conspiracy to do something which was a disturbance of peace and order. Surely, if the hon. member reads that section of the criminal code, he will find that it was to prevent a disturbance of order, and there was an exception made for trade unions which exercised the right of picketing in an orderly way.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not at first.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It was done to protect labour against prosecution. Surely it was not in any way to do something against labour.

Mr. DUNNING: It is nine o'clock.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, it is nine o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Departmental administration, including amount required to pay allowances to typists, grade 1, employed cutting stencils, in accordance with regulations approved by order in council, $553,020.

Mr. STIRLING: In this vote there is a reduction of approximately $38,000, but offset against that or perhaps in explanation is a decrease of $80,000 in the cost of mail bags.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Acting Postmaster General): There is a reduction of $80,000 in connection with mail bags, and the net decrease on the total vote is $37,928.

Mr. STIRLING: Did the mail bags not wear out last year?

Mr. EULER: There was a larger supply than usual on hand.

Mr. PELLETIER: There is an item of $17,450 for travelling expenses. Is that the total amount for the department, or does that cover only the expenses of certain officers?

Mr. EULER: There are six other votes for travelling expenses.

Mr. PELLETIER: What is this one for?

Mr. EULER: These are headquarters' expenses. One item is to cover the cost of representation at the Postal Union Congress in Buenos Aires in March, 1939. The additional allowance for this item is $6,700.

Mr. PELLETIER: Who were the representatives at that conference?

Mr. EULER: It is to be held in March, 1939, before the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. HEAPS: When we were discussing estimates the other evening we had the other acting Postmaster General (Mr. Power) with us. We were then dealing with the possibility of having a proper balance sheet submitted to the committee so that we would be able to get a better idea of the actual workings of the Post Office Department from a financial standpoint. Mention was made of the fact that when a similar item was before the committee two years ago, we were promised by the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott), who unfortunately is absent to-night, that something would be done in the way of submitting a more complete statement so that members would have a proper idea of the financial results of the year's operation of the department. That is hardly possible with the estimates as they are now submitted.

Two years have elapsed and not as much progress has been made in that direction as I anticipated would have been made. I think that in two years the departmental officials should have been able to submit a complete financial statement to the committee. The Post Office Department is a public utility and it should stand entirely on its own feet. I should like to be able to get hold of a statement of the Post Office Department just the same as I am able to get a statement of other financial institutions. I want to see a profit and loss account. It may be difficult at first to prepare a statement of this kind, but I had hopes that by this time it would have been available. Could the acting minister give us some idea of what progress has been made along these lines?

Mr. EULER: I do not know what commitments were made by the Postmaster General in connection with the matter raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. However, I would say to him that the estimates are prepared in the form in which the treasury board says they shall be presented. So long as no change is made, the estimates of the Post Office Department or of any other department will be presented in the way which is ordered. I am inclined to agree with what my hon. friend says about every department standing on its own feet. I think he is quite right when he says that there are certain charges which might be made against the department and which might affect the surplus. I believe he mentioned the matter of interest on buildings occupied as post offices and matters of that sort.

Mr. HEAPS: The question is more involved than that. I would point out that a charge is made by the Department of Public Works to the Post Office Department for the use of buildings. The question of interest on buildings would hardly be a factor in the estimates of the department.

Mr. EULER: I thought my hon. friend had suggested that a rental should be paid to the Department of Public Works for the buildings occupied by the Post Office Department, but apparently that was not in his mind. I should think that would be a perfectly fair charge from a strictly business standpoint. As hon. members know, the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce contain certain subsidies to cover the cost of the transportation of mails. I have suggested to my colleague that he should pay over to the Department of Trade and Commerce the cost of this mail transportation, but that has never been done. On the other hand, the Post Office Department claim that they should be allowed something for the franking privilege exercised by the different departments and by the members of the House of Commons and the Senate. I think that is a reasonable reply to make. In order to give the committee some idea of what is represented by that franking privilege, I may say that it represents a possible credit of $1,122,676. There is also another possible credit for the operation of the savings bank amounting to $80,000. If those two amounts were credited, and a number of the charges such as those to which my hon. friend has referred to were made, the surplus would come down to $40,298.

Mr. HEAPS: This matter was not discussed at any great length, but it was claimed that if those charges were made there might be a deficit in the annual operations of the Post Office Department. There might be other charges made against that department which really should not be made. For example, the stamps used on cheques must amount to an enormous sum each year, and there are other charges which, at the moment, I cannot recall. I would say that all these should appear in proper form, and I do not see why this cannot be done. For the minister merely to say that the treasury board wish the statement to appear the way it does is not a proper answer to the question which has been submitted. Is there any reason why, when accounts are submitted showing the revenue for the year, they should not show on the opposite side the expenditures for the same year? That would give us something approximating a financial statement.

I know I can get some of the expenditures for myself by going through the auditor general's report, but I do not think we should have to look through that voluminous report before we can get anything approaching a correct statement of the department's affairs. I would prefer—and I still press the point—that the Post Office Department should, so far as it possibly can, give us next year a proper statement showing its income and its expenditures. If it is providing, as the minister says, free services to other departments or to members of the house, those services should be charged up somewhere, or at all events credit should be given to the department for the service it renders. The amount of $1,000,000 odd seems to me fairly high, although it may be approximately correct. I would still like to know if there is any reason why we cannot have submitted to the house and the country a correct statement showing exactly what the position of the Post Office Department is at the end of the year's operations.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I am quite disposed to agree to a certain extent with the last member who spoke (Mr. Heaps); but suppose he got all he wanted, I am still afraid we should not get a proper presentation of the department's affairs. The Post Office Department has so many invisible revenues, invisible in their relationship to the country generally, and so many invisible commitments, that from my point of view, from an auditing and accounting point of view, I cannot for the life of me see how the hon. member would be very much benefited by getting all he asks for. Rentals, for example, could never be reduced to something utilitarian in a business statement. A federal building in any city is not merely a post office; it is a federal building; it is a part of the national assets, and is built in a manner to represent Canada. Its use for post office purposes could never be percentaged off in such a manner as to show the financial standing of the Post Office Department. So it seems to me that more considerations and more details should be advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North before we can arrive at what he really requires.

Mr. EULER: While in theory the suggestion is quite all right, I do not think it would be possible to make an accurate estimate each year of what the Post Office Department should pay for the rental of a certain public building, for example, in my own city, or in Winnipeg or any other city. I question, further, whether it would be worth while to go to all that trouble because, after all, it is simply taking money from one pocket and putting it into another.

There is one item on which one could not approach accuracy at all, and that is postage stamps used for excise purposes. If we knew the amount involved in postage stamps used for excise purposes upon cheques, that amount ought to be credited to the Department of National Revenue and charged against the Post Office Department, but there is no means of telling. Yet it is a great convenience to people, especially in the outlying districts, to be able to use postage stamps instead of the regular excise stamps.

Mr. HEAPS: I still think it would be quite easy to prepare a proper balance sheet for submission to the house. I do not expect that any public utility such as the post office, with all the demands that members make on the Postmaster General, should submit its accounts in exact detail. I know that at times the Post Office Department and the Department of Public Works are pestered by members of the house for postal buildings and other federal buildings, and indeed sometimes buildings are thrown at the post office which they do not want. I have known instances of that kind to happen. I know a place not very far from my own constituency where a building was put up, and I did not know what it was for, until I was finally told it was to be a post office. When it was finished the Post Office Department did not want the building. It did not pay them to open the building for a post office. That is something which should not happen in any well conducted utility. I think the Post Office Department should be responsible for all the post offices they require, and the buildings should not be erected by the Department of Public Works unless requested by the Post Office Department. I do not think any member should be permitted to tell the Department of Public Works that he wants a post office in his own particular riding, as a sort of perpetual monument to himself. But post offices are put up all over the country from which very little revenue is derived, where it does not pay to operate them, and in instances such as I have given, where the post office is bound to be operated at a loss. Does the minister himself, who I know is anxious to conduct his department in a businesslike way, not think that when a postal building is required, the only persons who should have a say in the matter are the Postmaster General and the officials of his department, and not any other department of the government?

Mr. EULER: I am not, as my hon. friend realizes, very familiar with the Post Office Department; but I think it is the practice that a post office building is not erected until after the Post Office Department asks for it, and it should not ask for it unless there is a real necessity for it. There also comes into the picture the fact that in the larger centres these public buildings are used not only for a post office but for other government purposes, customs, income tax and so on. But as the Acting Postmaster General I shall be very glad indeed to bring the representations made by the hon. gentleman to the attention of the Postmaster General himself.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister, who I know is opposed to patronage in the public service, tell me that patronage is pretty well eliminated from the postal service in this country?

Mr. EULER: Oh, I am quite sure of it.

Mr. HANSON: Does the minister not think it is necessary, in order to provide postal facilities, to establish a post office sometimes in a place where it is not remunerative?

Mr. SPENCE: Louder.

Mr. HANSON: Does the minister not think that the government is justified in providing postal services in places where it might not be immediately remunerative? In a pioneer country like Canada one cannot expect to get a profit on the operations of the post office for the first few years in an outlying district which is only sparsely settled, but in a few years that post office, instead of serving half a dozen or a dozen families may be accommodating quite a settlement. In a country like Canada we are entitled, I think, to get such facilities from the government.

Mr. HEAPS: The question of postal facilities is one entirely apart from the erection of huge buildings where they are not required. There is no hon. member in this chamber who does or will object to the provision of adequate postal facilities in every part of Canada.

Mr. HANSON: Speak up. The hon. member said that to me.

Mr. HEAPS: I heard the hon. member quite well; I never asked him to speak louder. Probably some of my neighbours did, but he must not accuse me of their sins; I have enough of my own to carry. I repeat that I have never objected to adequate postal facilities for any part of the country. What I have tried to do, and with no great amount of success in previous years, is to ensure that when buildings are to be erected for the use of the Post Office Department, that department is responsible for the requests which come in, and that there shall be, in the places where it is proposed to erect new buildings sufficient business, I shall not say to pay for their construction and upkeep, but to warrant their construction. In many places buildings are erected solely for postal purposes. In some cases, as is shown by the figures submitted to this chamber in past years, the revenue has been hardly more than sufficient to pay for the help. That is not running the postal business in a business-like way. I venture to assert that of the two millions and several hundred thousand dollars which are charged against the Post Office Department for the use of buildings, an enormous amount could be saved if the officials of the department had the sole right to decide as to the erection of the buildings and could put them up as any business concern should do. The amount charged against the department is, I think, $2,600,000.

Mr. EULER: Two and three-quarter million dollars.

Mr. HEAPS: The Post Office Department should have the say as to what kind of buildings should be erected and where they should be located. But that has not been the situation in the past. I am not blaming solely the present government for what is happening; the same kind of thing has gone on right down through the years. One department erects the buildings and then asks another department to use them. I am aware that in some respects the Department of Public Works, with its special facilities, may be in a better position to call for contracts, but I do not agree that it is better able to decide where post office buildings should go. Personally I have never asked any of the ministers for the erection of any buildings, and I do not intend to do so; I am quite satisfied to leave these matters in the hands of the Post Office Department and its expert staff. When I find that they are not doing things in the right way, then will be the time for me to complain.

In my opinion hon. members themselves are as much to blame as anyone else for existing conditions. We hear them one day crying for economy, and the next day they are rushing around the various departments asking for huge expenditures. I want to see the Post Office Department conducted as any efficient business should be. I do not think the habit of some members of seeking concessions for their own particular constituencies is at all a desirable form of activity, nor do I approve one department erecting buildings without the consent or knowledge of the other department concerned; under such circumstances we cannot expect business to be efficiently conducted.

The running of post offices as a separate utility should be concentrated in the Post Office Department. That is not asking too much. I remember an instance in my own constituency where, when one government went out and another party came into power, they changed some postmasters in the small post offices in the district. I was very much opposed to this proceeding. They put in charge of one office a man with a criminal record, to handle his majesty's mails, and although I protested as vigorously as I could to the then Postmaster General I could obtain no satisfaction. People were afraid to go to that office with registered mail; but all that was done was that the office was transferred from the father to the daughter, so that they would be able to say, "It is not in the same hands now." Is that an efficient way of running a postal service which has so many ramifications so far as the public are concerned? The member for the constituency, who went to the Postmaster General several times to protest against the appointment, could do nothing, but the local patronage committee could successfully insist upon that particular individual retaining his position. It is of such matters that I complain; yet somehow or another we seem to go on in the same rut, unable to make any progress, and when it is suggested that we should run the Post Office Department as any competent business concern would do we are told, "Well, the treasury department have control, and they instruct the department how to make out the accounts." Yet to-day the accounts are not in much better position than they were two years ago.

Mr. DUPUIS: Although I tried as best I could to follow the trend of thought of the hon. member for Winnipeg North, I find myself unable to appreciate the logic of his remarks. The hon. member is very severe on the government. Of course he does not mean Liberal or Conservative, but he claims that the Canadian government as constituted is administering the country in the wrong way.

An hon. MEMBER: The post office.

Mr. DUPUIS: Especially the post office. But if we apply the same logic to other departments, what do we find with reference to the Department of the Secretary of State? If I am not mistaken, this parliament building is under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State; and if the reasoning of my hon. friend is sound, he should be rendered an account for his seat in the house and pay rent for it and for his private office in this building, the account being rendered in the name of the riding of Winnipeg North. How can a government divide administration department by department? All the public buildings in Ottawa are in the same situation. Take, for instance, the confederation building, where space is occupied by several departments. I do not believe we shall get very far ahead with that sort of discussion; it is more academic than practical. What astonishes me most is to hear such remarks coming from a member who is committed to the doctrines of socialism. Socialism means, not the kind of centralization he seems to want, but a policy where everything is governed and controlled on behalf of the common cause, where everything is together. I suppose that if his party took control of this country, everything would be governed by the same head. They would not act as my hon. friend tries to induce the minister to do. Everything would be combined for the common good, irrespective of the department which might administer the post office. I submit it is impossible for a government to handle administration in the way he suggests.

Mr. BETTS: I notice under this vote very substantial increases in the staff of the department. For instance, this year there are three chief clerks as compared with two last year; twenty clerks grade 2, last year nineteen; six clerks grade 1, last year two; eight stenographers grade 3, last year six; twenty stenographers grade 2, last year seventeen; two stenographers grade 1, last year none; seven typists grade 1, last year three; six packers and helpers, last year five. There is a total of 150 this year as compared with 132 last year. Will the minister tell the committee, either in the medium of pounds of mail or letters carried or by some standard that we can understand, what accounts for the increase in staff?

Mr. EULER: The reason for the increase in staff is chiefly this, that whereas temporaries ordinarily are not counted in the list of civil service employees, when the restrictions on permanent appointments were removed by order in council a great many temporaries were made permanent, with the result that this list has been increased.

Mr. BETTS: Nevertheless the vote for temporary assistance is the same as last year's, $25,000.

Mr. EULER: The reason for the increase in the number is that many temporaries were appointed as permanents, and the other temporaries, to whom the hon. gentlemen refers, are for purposes of emergency and so on during the coming year.

Mr. BENNETT: But there is a total increase of eighteen.

Mr. EULER: I suppose one could justify increases on the ground that the business of the post office is increasing. Times have been a bit better, and that is reflected in post office activities the same as in any other business.

Mr. BETTS: I hope that is the case; but would it not be reasonable for an acute business man like the acting Postmaster General to tell us to what extent the business has increased to justify eighteen additional helpers.

Mr. EULER: The business has increased $1,300,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That was not at head office.

Mr. EULER: It is not only head office that constitutes the Post Office Department.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is only the departmental administration item that we are dealing with.

Mr. EULER: Of course, if business has increased throughout the country, it will result in an increase in business at head office.

Mr. BETTS: Can the minister tell us the increase in terms of pounds of mail carried?

Mr. EULER: No, I have not that information.

Mr. BETTS: Can it be dug up for the information of the committee?

Mr. EULER: I am told that it can be obtained for the air mail routes and the rural routes fairly quickly, and perhaps for the rest of it, but that would take some time.

Mr. HANSON: When hon. gentlemen base their criticism of the Post Office Department on the results shown by some other post office establishments, they must realize that Canada is a young country which is trying to develop its resources, and that it is still in the pioneering stage. To criticize the Post Office Department for not making money is wrong. Having lived in a pioneering country myself, I realize that the people are trying to establish themselves, and they need all the facilities which can be placed at their disposal in order that they may be able to get in touch with the outside world. The only agency through which they can do this is the Post Office Department. They are asking for post offices and for postal facilities to enable them to get in touch with the outside world, and I suggest that Canada is a bit too young to be classed with some of the European countries so far as the postal service is concerned. It is unreasonable to expect the department here to show a profit.

I congratulate the Post Office Department upon the efforts it is making to help this Canadian nation to develop its resources, and even if the department shows a loss at the present time it should still be encouraged in the work it is doing, because I believe that eventually there will be a revenue from it. I am not able to say exactly what should be done; but I am sure the department is doing everything in its power to assist pioneers in Canada, and I have no doubt that eventually the department will be in the same category as the post office departments in some of the older and more developed countries and will show a profit. It is to the credit of the Canadian government that it is doing what it can to help the pioneers in this way and I support it.

Mr. SPENCE: I regret very much that the Postmaster General is not here. I am sorry to hear that he is sick; I was not aware of the fact until to-day. There is not much satisfaction in criticizing the acting Postmaster General, because he has just taken the job in hand. A couple of years ago when the estimates came down they did not appear to be in good shape and there was more or less criticism, from myself and others, about the administration. I accused it then of being antiquated, and I did not blame the Postmaster General any more than I blame any other Postmaster General, because no matter who originated it, it is antiquated. Last year the method of presentation of the estimates had been improved considerably and the Postmaster General promised that this year he would try to make it perfect. I think it has slipped back into the same old rut. We have heard only about the total revenue taken in, and no wonder, because they have no accounting system. Now they come to the conclusion that they have $3,037,000 of a surplus. Goodness knows where they got it! They will never know how much the post office makes or how many millions it loses until there is a proper check-up on the services rendered by the Public Works department.

I have made a close study of what happens in Toronto. When we were in power I took particular notice. Hundreds of dollars worth of material and time are spent in the different post offices tearing down walls and building them at the instigation of the postmaster in that or other cities. For instance, the old post office on Adelaide street in Toronto was all changed about inside four or five times during our term of office. None of that was charged up to the Post Office Department. When they moved the administration to the present quarters the postmaster—he is not called postmaster now but has some high-falutin title—had the walls pulled down in the building at the corner of Yonge and Front streets and other walls put in, and so on; many thousands of dollars were—I would not say wasted, but used there in making the place to suit him. That was done under this government; but I am not criticizing any government in particular, the whole system is so absolutely—I would not like to say what I was going to say—antiquated.

Mr. EULER: That is a much longer word than the one the hon. member was going to use.

Mr. SPENCE: I made this suggestion to the Minister of Public Works in the former government, and I suggest again that a proper accounting system should be established in the Department of Public Works to keep track of the money they spend all over Canada in connection with the post office. At the present time they have a staff making racks for mail bags for sorting purposes. They are delivered to all parts of Canada, and the Public Works department pays those men, men who earn at the rate of eighty-five cents to one dollar an hour. The Public Works department have a staff working all the time for the post office. If the figures were gone into, it would be found that instead of a surplus of $3,000,000, you would have a loss.

In regard to the amount of money the Post Office Department gets for carrying newspapers and magazines, particularly from the United States, all over Canada, perhaps that should not be discussed under this item, but we are losing a large sum on that, because we carry them at less than they can be carried by express or by the railways. We are carrying them to-day from Halifax to Vancouver at one-third of the rate at which they are carried from New York to San Francisco. Why should we carry United States magazines in this country at such a low rate?

Mr. BENNETT: They have a zone system.

Mr. SPENCE: I say there should be a proper accounting system. A special committee should be appointed to examine the Post Office Department and straighten it out. I do not mean a select committee of the house, but there should be from the government service itself, someone who knows something about setting up an organization to curtail expenses, some actuary or accountant, at no large cost. Anyone who is accustomed to doing business in the usual way and can take off a statement at the end of each month could look after this without bringing an expensive set-up from the United States. I do not believe in that at all, we have men in this country just as capable of setting up the proper bookkeeping system for the Public Works department as anyone. I blame the Public Works department just as much as I do the post office. I am sorry the Postmaster General is not here to-night; I should like to say a few kind words to him; but I am not going to abuse him in his absence, and to abuse the acting Postmaster General would be unfair. Something, however, must be done or you will be in a terrible position in a few years; it is getting worse. Instead of a surplus this year, I am sure there is a deficit.

Mr. HANSON: The outlying districts of Canada, where the development of the future is to take place, have not had the consideration they deserve. The post office is for the most part the only means of communication those districts have. Montreal, Toronto and other large cities have every facility, but the outlying districts have been neglected. It is only in the last six or seven years that they have had any consideration. I am not saying that is true of this government alone; it is true of the former government as well. I would ask the Postmaster General to give more consideration to developing these pioneer districts which in time will be an asset to the Canadian nation if they are given some encouragement.

Mr. BETTS: What is the basis on which the railways are paid for carrying mail?

Mr. EULER: Perhaps my hon. friend would wait until we come to the item which relates to that.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is item No. 260.

What are those words that appear in the item, "allowances to typists, grade 1, cutting stencils." Why are they necessary?

Mr. EULER: I am informed that there are certain duties performed by some of the girls employed which are particularly onerous, trying and fatiguing, so small bonuses are allowed to those employees. I could give the particulars.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is not that, but are they not taken care of in the item itself?

Mr. EULER: No, this is for extra pay, for bonuses.

Mr. BENNETT: In addition to that mentioned in the details?

Mr. EULER: In addition to their salaries. I am not sure that it is a very good system, but that is the reason for it.

Mr. BENNETT: Does that mean that an order in council is passed in respect to each, or is it covered by a general order?

Mr. EULER: Covered by a general order. The amount involved I think is only some $370.

Mr. BENNETT: Now will the minister be good enough to turn to page 165 of the estimates and give some explanation of the item of mail bags? Last year they bought $245,000 worth. Were tenders called for? Who was the successful tenderer, and for how many did the contract provide?

Mr. EULER: The department buys the duck by tender in the open market, and the bags are made in the penitentiaries.

Mr. BENNETT: I wanted to be sure about that. Why is it that the amount is $80,000 less this year than last?

Mr. EULER: I think I explained that there was an unusually large stock on hand, so it was not thought necessary to buy so many this year.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the stock on hand now about the average or less than the average?

Mr. EULER: I am told that there is usually a margin or reserve supply kept on hand, and this year apparently they did not need so many. I would judge that there may have been more bought last year than were found to be necessary; at any rate they think they have a sufficient supply, so there is no need for spending this $80,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a lot of money. I was going to ask the minister whether the government has under consideration the question of returning to the penny rate of postage. That, of course, is a matter of policy, but this is a good place to discover what the policy may be. It is not often we have a chance.

Mr. EULER: It occurs to me we have had all the arguments in the world to-night from the hon. member for Winnipeg North and other hon. members who are trying to show that there is a deficit in the department. I would hardly think that under those circumstances, if that be true—and perhaps it is—that would be the time for a reduction in postal rates and an increase in deficits. As my right hon. friend says, it is a matter of policy—and I am not able to make a pronouncement upon it.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister will agree that it is a desperate thing that we should have such sudden changes in the acting Postmaster General; for he said a minute ago that the hon. member for Winnipeg North had been suggesting that there is a deficit and then added "perhaps he is right." If that is right, the Postmaster General was very wrong in what he was saying to us the evening he happened to be handling the estimates. I do not like to see such a conflict between the acting Postmaster General and the Postmaster General with respect to so critical a matter. One talked about a surplus of about $3,000,000, and now the acting minister says that it may be that the hon. member for Winnipeg North is right in suggesting that there was a deficit.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But the other one was an acting minister, too.

Mr. BENNETT: We had the real one at first.

Mr. HEAPS: I said there might be one, if there was a proper accounting of post office accounts. I can well understand the enthusiasm of the hon. member for Skeena in connection with these estimates, because, upon looking through the accounts, I find an item of $170,000 for a public building at Prince Rupert. I can see that there is good reason why he should express delight.

May I state one reason for taking this stand in connection with the estimates. I have always contended that the post office is in a different category from other government departments. A post office building is in a category different from buildings such as these parliament buildings, for instance. The Post Office Department is a utility, receiving revenues for services rendered.

Mr. DUPUIS: Does the hon. member mean that the House of Commons is not a utility?

Mr. HEAPS: Sometimes; but sometimes it is otherwise. I say that if we are not a utility, at least we are not a department which charges anything for services rendered, as is the case with respect to the Post Office Department. For instance, the hydro enterprise in Ontario provides a statement at the end of the year with respect to profits made or losses suffered. I do not wish to say anything further, except to add the hope that when another year comes around and the Post Office estimates are submitted to the house, they may be placed before us in such a manner that we may have some idea of the result of the year's operation of that utility.

Mr. BETTS: Last year the vote for travelling expenses was $10,750; this year it is $17,450. Would the minister tell us what those expenses include and why this fairly substantial increase of more than $6,000 is made?

Mr. BENNETT: Air travel is six cents a mile.

Mr. EULER: I gave that information some time ago. However, I may state again that the additional amount of $6,700 is required for representation at the Postal Union Congress to be held at Buenos Aires in March, 1939.

Mr. BENNETT: A trip to Buenos Aires? I hope it has better results than some trips I know of.

Mr. BROOKS: I notice an item for Magdalen islands news service, the same amount as last year. What constitutes that service?

Mr. EULER: Does the hon. member want the cost of it?

Mr. BROOKS: No; what is the service?

Mr. EULER: A daily letter of approximately five hundred words of news of special interest to Canadians, prepared at Ottawa and transmitted by mail to North Sydney, and by wireless telegraph to Grindstone. The cost is one-half cent per word. The Grindstone operator gives a copy of the daily letter to the superintendent of government telephones, who telephones it to telephone centrals at a stated hour each day. Residents may telephone or call in person and receive the news. A weekly air mail service between Charlottetown and the Magdalen islands is maintained during the closed season of navigation. This is paid out of the vote for mail service by air.

In addition to the service by the Post Office Department, the news contained in the daily letter is broadcast over wireless telephone service between Grindstone and the lighthouse at Bird Rock. Residents with radios may pick up the messages. The service is given by the marine department without cost to the Post Office Department. There is also daily radio news broadcast in French from the New Carlisle, Quebec, radio station, supplied by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The winter season, or the period of closed navigation, begins at the latter part of December and ends about April, varying according to weather conditions. I can give the expenditures and votes for the last five years, if hon. members wish to have them.

Mr. BETTS: No.

Mr. EULER: Last year, 1937-38, the vote was $600, and the estimated expenditure was the same amount.

Mr. BETTS: Could not this service be given by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? The corporation broadcasts news every day, and it seems to me the people of the Magdalen islands could avail themselves of that service, as well as a service of this kind.

Mr. EULER: I believe the broadcasting corporation does give a service there.

Mr. BETTS: Then this would be a duplication.

Mr. EULER: This is in French.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the item covering equipment and maintenance refer only to equipment and maintenance at head office? What about the cancellation of stamp machines, rural mail boxes and locks? Are they included in this or some other item?

Mr. EULER: I am informed that that does not come under this item.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. BENNETT: I see an item for mail bags; that is why I asked the question.

Mr. ISNOR: I do not know whether it would be possible to make up a statement such as is suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, but I believe that if at all possible we should have a clearer financial statement regarding the affairs of the Post Office Department. That statement should show the revenues and expenditures from year to year, the difference between the net revenue and the net expenditure giving the surplus or deficit, as the case may be. It is interesting to note that while there is an increase of only $438,474 in expenditures, the revenue is increased $1,766,664. From a business standpoint one would say that the Post Office Department is being run in a satisfactory manner.

But do these figures tell the real, true story? Are all the items charged up to expenditures that should be charged? I am fearful that if all the expenditures were charged that should be charged we would have a deficit instead of a large surplus.

I would suggest that it is feasible to charge rental of the various post offices to the department. That point has been questioned by certain hon. members. It is done in every commercial line. The various departments in large department stores are charged up with overhead, and made to stand on their own feet. I believe the same principle applies to the Post Office Department. It is a revenue producer, and there are certain expenditures chargeable directly against the operations of that department. For that reason I believe the Postmaster General would be well advised to consider the feasibility of bringing in a fairer financial statement, as he promised to do last year, showing the actual revenues and disbursements, so that we could arrive at a conclusion as to whether or not the Post Office Department is carrying itself. I do not think the people of Canada are greatly concerned about whether or not there is a surplus; what they want is service. For these reasons I think the Post Office Department should show the picture as it really is. On page 9 of the report of the Postmaster General a revenue of $41,181,566.35 is shown, but on page 10 the net revenue is shown at $34,274,552, a difference of about $7,000,000. In one case the expenditures or disbursements are shown and in the other, the revenue is shown and then deductions are made to bring it down from forty-one millions to thirty-four millions.

Mr. EULER: I do not quite understand my hon. friend's question.

Mr. ISNOR: On page 10 a revenue of $34,274,552 is shown and on page 9 a gross revenue of $41,181,566.35 is shown. Then you make certain deductions. Why do you not show the six million and some odd dollars as expenditures?

Mr. EULER: I am informed that the revenue shown on page 10 is that from the outside offices, whereas that shown on page 9 is the total revenue of the department.

Mr. ISNOR: What appears on page 10 is not correct in so far as the total revenue is concerned?

Mr. EULER: That applies only to the outside service.

Mr. ISNOR: Then I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North when he says that it does not reflect the true condition of the revenue of our Post Office Department. I think that should be set out more clearly.

Mr. BETTS: I want to say "amen" to the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax as to the desirability of having a more accurate picture. A few moments ago the minister said it would be a matter of great difficulty to tell how much more mail had been carried this year than last year. I cannot understand that as it seems to me inevitable that the contracts with the railways would be made on a tonnage or poundage basis. Surely it would be a simple matter for the minister, with his two capable assistants, to tell the committee at once what has been the increase in the weights.

Mr. EULER: I can assure my hon. friend it is not so easy as he seems to think. I am informed by the officials that it is not possible to give that information so readily, and I shall have to ask him to accept my word for that. It is not possible to give it completely without a great deal of work. I do not think that is an unreasonable reply to make.

Mr. BETTS: If that is the case, then I think it adds a great deal of weight to what the hon. member for Halifax and other hon. members have said with regard to the accounting system of this department needing revamping.

Mr. EULER: If one wishes to make comparisons, the really important thing is the amount of money involved, not the weight of the mail carried. I think that is a relatively small matter.

Mr. BETTS: If the minister were running this business as his own, I think he would want to know how much money was spent, what he was paying for carrying this mail and how much mail was carried. He would not be satisfied with just a gross amount.

Mr. EULER: The information can be given, but not to-night. If my hon. friend insists on having that information, we shall try to dig it up for him and let him have it later on.

Mr. BETTS: It is not a matter of my wanting it; it is a question of its being information that the country should have. I am not asking for it to-night, but I still contend that if there was a proper system of accounting in the department it would be a matter of no difficulty to get this information.

Mr. LENNARD: Does the Post Office Department make the actual sale of government annuities?

Mr. EULER: I am informed that the Post Office Department sells them for the Department of Labour.

Mr. LENNARD: But does the Post Office Department make the actual sale?

Mr. EULER: In some post offices the deposits for annuities are received, while in other post offices the Department of Labour has its own agents.

Mr. LENNARD: This matter has come in for considerable criticism because it is felt that the postmaster, who may be doing the advertising and spade work and in many cases the selling of the idea to the people who take out these annuities, should make the actual sale and receive any commission or benefit which accrues from the sale.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps that would be a matter for the consideration of the Department of Labour.

Mr. LENNARD: I brought it up so that it would receive consideration.

Mr. BETTS: How many people are going to Buenos Aires to attend this conference, and who are they?

Mr. EULER: That has not been decided as yet.

Item agreed to.

Post offices, including salaries and other expenses of headquarters and staff post offices and supplies and equipment for revenue post offices, $14,624,470.

Mr. GREEN: Does the department still deliver mail on Saturday afternoons and holidays? This service was inaugurated in December, 1936, and many complaints have been made about it.

Mr. EULER: That service is still being given. Are the complaints about the fact that we have the service, or about the nature of the service?

Mr. GREEN: The complaints I have had are about the fact that the men are being forced to work on Saturday afternoons and holidays such as Dominion Day, Good Friday and Labour Day. The government is setting a poor example to other employers of labour. Why is it necessary to give a service of this type?

Mr. EULER: The government felt that it would be a great convenience to the citizens of this country to have that service on holidays and Saturday afternoons, and that is why it was done. That is the only answer I can give.

Mr. GREEN: Letters are delivered in the cities on Saturday afternoons, and left at offices after they are closed. Quite often it is very inconvenient. It is difficult to understand why it should be considered necessary to have mail deliveries on Saturday afternoons in the cities. Is there any special reason why that service should be given?

Mr. EULER: I can only suggest that if the mail is not delivered on Saturday afternoon, the people will not get it until Monday, as there are no deliveries on Sundays. Without this service, mail might arrive at the post office on Saturday morning and not be delivered until the following Monday. It has been thought that this is a service well worth giving to the people of this country.

Mr. GREEN: What compensation is given to the postal employees for working on holidays and Saturday afternoons? Do they get overtime?

Mr. EULER: These employees work a forty-four hour week, and any additional time that they are asked to give for this purpose is allowed to accumulate and they are given holidays accordingly.

Mr. GREEN: They get no overtime pay for that?

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. BENNETT: The time is added to their holidays, is it not?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: What has been the increased cost during the last calendar year as a result of this change in the service?

Mr. EULER: I am sorry I have not that information before me.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps the minister could tell us what increase there has been in the staff as a result of the change.

Mr. EULER: There has been no increase.

Mr. GREEN: The minister surely does not mean that no new men have been taken on, because last session we were told that one of the reasons why this change was being inaugurated was to help solve the unemployment problem.

Mr. EULER: My answer was incorrect. There have been some increases in the staff, but I have not the information under my hand at the moment. I shall be glad to give it later.

Mr. GREEN: The minister will give that information to the committee later?

Mr. EULER: Yes; I think I can get that information for the committee.

Mr. GREEN: Were these men who were taken on the staff taken on through the civil service commission or appointed through the local Liberal associations?

Mr. EULER: Through the civil service commission—not the Liberal association.

Mr. GREEN: They were all engaged through the civil service commission?

Mr. EULER: That was my answer.

Mr. GREEN: That was not the case, I believe, in Vancouver.

Mr. EULER: Did my hon. friend say that was not the case there?

Mr. GREEN: I believe it was not the case in Vancouver. Can the minister say whether it was?

Mr. EULER: I cannot alter my answer. I said the appointments were made by the civil service commission, and I assumed I was giving an answer for the whole of Canada. I did not think there would be any exception in Vancouver or any other city, except that at Christmas time the extra help taken on is not engaged through the commission.

Mr. GREEN: I understand that part of the Christmas help were kept on and given permanent positions, and if that was the case they certainly were not engaged by the civil service commission. Surely the department can give us information on that point.

Mr. EULER: Some of them were kept on a little longer in order to liquidate the extra time they put in because of deliveries on Saturday afternoons and holidays.

Mr. GREEN: Were they taken on the permanent staff or were other men put on?

Mr. EULER: They would be taken on the permanent staff only if they were on the eligible list and appointed by the civil service commission.

Mr. O'NEILL: There are a great many places in British Columbia where the post office used to be closed on Wednesday afternoon, now under this new arrangement the men are working on both Saturday afternoon and Wednesday afternoon. A lot of people would be quite agreeable to having the post office closed on Wednesday afternoon. As a matter of fact the stores are all closed; there is nobody around the town except in the post office, and only one or two people call during the entire afternoon to get their mail. The people as a whole are quite prepared to have the post office closed on Wednesday afternoon, and they have asked me to intercede with the Post Office Department to have that done.

Mr. EULER: The district inspectors have been given power to use their own judgment in cases such as those to which my hon. friend has referred, and if his people would make application to the district inspector, the post office may be closed.

Mr. O'NEILL: Thank you.

Mr. GREEN: Have the postmasters in the cities the power to say there shall be no mail delivery on Saturday afternoon or on any particular statutory holiday?

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. LENNARD: There has certainly been an increase in employment due to the delivery of mails on the holidays, but I understood the minister to say no.

Mr. EULER: I corrected my first answer.

Mr. LENNARD: Then, as to the increase in cost, I know that in Hamilton the increased cost for the twelve months ended December 31, 1937, was some $2,700.

Mr. EULER: Was it worth it?

Mr. LENNARD: No. I am speaking of Hamilton in particular because I know conditions there. Not one of the business places that have been polled—that have been canvassed—is in favour of the holiday delivery of mail. In fact a great many business houses have instructed the postmaster in Hamilton not to have any mail delivered to their places of business on Saturday afternoon or holidays. The employees are also very much against it, because they have now to work on all statutory holidays throughout the year. They do not complain so much about working at Christmastime, and perhaps it is not unreasonable that there should be one delivery on Christmas morning. But the men complain of having to work on the first of July, Labour Day, Civic Holiday and other statutory holidays throughout the year, when they used to be free to go out with their families and enjoy themselves. While the extra time they thus put in on holidays accumulates, it is given to them in January or February of the following year, which they claim is a time of year when they cannot go anywhere or do anything with their families, and a few free days then are a poor substitute for the annual statutory holidays.

The holiday mail delivery is also very unfair to the one man post office, the country post office, which is obliged to keep open the greater part of Christmas Day. As regards the larger post offices, in Hamilton, for instance, where the post office is open on Christmas Day, they took in at the wicket on Christmas Day, 1936, forty-seven cents, and on Christmas Day, 1937, fifty-five cents. They give a half-day service there, with two men at the wickets, and all they took in on Christmas Day was forty-seven cents in 1936, and fifty-five cents in 1937. I think the change is a failure all around so far as my part of the country is concerned.

Mr. MacNICOL: I perhaps should not worry the acting Postmaster General about the matter I am going to bring up. I wish the Postmaster General himself were in his seat so that I could speak a little more freely.

Mr. EULER: Go as far as you like.

Mr. DUNNING: Do not muzzle yourself.

Mr. MacNICOL: All right, because I know that if the acting Postmaster General can answer in a reasonable way, he will do so.

During the former term of the present government, under the direction, I assume, of the then Minister of Public Works, a very fine post office was erected at the corner of Appleton and St. Clair avenue west.

Mr. DUNNING: What city are these streets in?

Mr. MacNICOL: In Toronto. Perhaps it is because this is in Toronto that what I am going to relate took place, last spring. The former administration selected the site of the post office at the corner of Appleton avenue and St. Clair avenue known as station "L," because of its fine location. Many mail men, the ordinary "posties" who deliver mail, work from that post office; they take care of the whole north end of ward six and a large portion of South York adjacent to Toronto. Its situation is also satisfactory from the point of view of the safety of children or young people sent by their parents to buy stamps or obtain mail or for any of the purposes for which they go to a post office, and for the last ten years it had been very largely used by all the residents thereabout. I might mention that it was where I got my mail; I used it a great deal, bought large quantities of stamps there and used it for any other postal business I had to transact. The building was specially constructed for post office purposes, I assume in accordance with plans prepared under the former Liberal government. It has three outside walls, one on St. Clair avenue, one on Appleton avenue, and another on a lane running parallel with St. Clair avenue. Presumably upon instructions of the former Liberal administration, it was furnished with very large windows on both avenues and the lane so as to admit all the light possible.

Last spring, towards the end of April, and just before I sailed for the coronation, a rumour came to me that the site was about to be changed, and immediately afterwards the owners of the building and the land came to see me about the matter; but as I was sailing in a day or two I could do nothing more than write, wire or telephone—perhaps I did all three—to the Minister of Public Works. I did not receive a reply to the letter I assume I wrote until after I came home. In any event I called up the Minister of Public Works and apparently wired him on or about April 29. At that time no contract had been entered into for the moving of the post office. Upon my return I found that it had been moved out of ward six into ward five, some five hundred feet or more or less east of the former location and on the opposite side of the street. I also learned that on May 7 a letter was sent to the Postmaster General, which was signed by, I believe, Mr. J. L. Shannon—that appears to be the name—and from which I wish to read some statements:

Hon. J. C. Elliott,
Postmaster General,
Parliament Buildings, Ottawa.

Dear Sir:

In connection with the proposed removal of postal station "L" from the corner of St. Clair and Appleton avenues to a point on the south side of St. Clair avenue approximately one hundred yards east of Oakwood avenue, I am enclosing herewith a petition signed by approximately three hundred residents, store owners and business men in the community who are strenuously objecting to the removal of the post office from its present location. The present building is situate on a corner and is accessible and convenient to the business section of the community. The proposed new site is located in a less advantageous position, will be cramped for parking space, is inaccessible, and persons seeking to use the post office will have to cross a dangerous intersection, as four car lines—

Mr. KIRK: Mr. Chairman, what item are we on now?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: No. 258.

Mr. KIRK: I wondered whether the hon. member's remarks are relevant to this item.

Mr. MacNICOL: They are relevant, Mr. Chairman, and I am going to proceed until I am through.

—as four car lines and one bus service pass this spot.

Note that in the former location of the post office erected for the Liberal government when it was in power before, they made an admirable selection for a public building of this kind. but the present building is located adjacent to several car lines and a bus route.

Mr. EULER: Does my hon. friend say that the former building was erected by the government?

Mr. MacNICOL: Erected on plans prepared, or at least suitable, I am told, for the former Liberal government. I have learned a good deal about what occurred at that time, but I am not going to refer to it; perhaps the less said about it the better.

Mr. EULER: I am trying to get information. I understood my hon. friend to say that the building was erected by the government.

Mr. MacNICOL: Erected for the government and, I am told, in accordance with plans suitable for the government. I assume that the government, when arranging to occupy a new building, would be interested in the plans. I will continue from where I left off:

It seems hard to understand why a bright, airy building, specially built for a post office, and ideally located to serve the needs of the district, should be abandoned, and a post office put in the proposed location, and in a building which, at best, must be a make-shift.

It is not I who am passing these comments about the present post office building; I am just reading this letter:

In your letter notifying Mr. Calderone of the proposed change, you state that the premises are too small. What I would like to know is why he was not given an opportunity of remedying this condition, if it existed, as he owns the store next door and the entire upstairs, and any additional space would have been immediately available. This whole matter was put through without giving Mr. Calderone an opportunity of making any necessary alterations to the building for increased space, and the people in the district are putting their own construction on the matter.

I am not making these statements; they are made by the writer of this letter to the Postmaster General. But what I would like to find out is the origin of the removal of that post office. It had been there for ten years, had been placed there by a former Liberal government; when the lease expired during our term of office it was renewed because all the people in the community wanted it to remain there, and therefore I, as representative of that part of the city of Toronto, would under no circumstances have asked for its removal. I should like to be informed how this removal came about which has caused so much annoyance in that whole community. West on St. Clair avenue are a great number of stores; in fact the whole street on both sides west of Oakwood avenue, apart from school yards, consists of business premises, and all these people have to go some five hundred feet or more further to the east and across the intersecting car lines which are referred to in the letter from which I have read.

When I came back, I received this letter, which had been sent to me on May 27 by the Minister of Public Works:

> I have yours of the 29th ultimo, relative to the surrender of premises leased from Mr. Calderone at the corner of Saint Clair and Appleton avenues, Toronto, and, in reply, may say that the request for larger accommodation for postal station "L" came from the Post Office Department as early as February of this year, when representations were made that, in view of the growth of that portion of the city of Toronto which this postal station serves, additional accommodation is necessary and that property known as 937, 937A and 939 St. Clair avenue west, just east of Oakwood, had been looked over by the district director of postal services, who reported that the proposal would mean a total increase over all of approximately 1,200 square feet and an increase on the main working floor of approximately 1,500 square feet.

When the former lease was renewed during our term of office, the owners of the building wrote to the Minister of Public Works at that time intimating that if more space were required they would be happy to let the Post Office Department have a store in the same building facing on St. Clair avenue, which apparently the department did not require when it was under the direction of the former Liberal administration.

In view of the splendid location of the former post office, its admirable lighting facilities, with three outside walls, the fact that it had been specially built to suit the Post Office Department and that there was more space available in the store, forty feet by eighteen, in the same building, immediately in front of the former post office, I cannot for the life of me understand why the change was made, and I should like to have some information from the minister. Certainly there are few in that community who believe that the purpose was to obtain more space, because, while I have no comment to make upon the new building, I am bound to say that if it has any more space it has but little in excess of the old building, and it has only two outside walls, besides being east of Oakwood avenue. Moreover, it is more difficult to reach than was the former building, not being quite so accessible to a large number of people who use that post office.

As a representative of part of that whole district, I feel that I should have been consulted, although I am on the opposite side of politics. I would not for a moment believe that there was any politics in it, and if there were no politics I suggest that I should have been asked something about the matter when the change was made, as to whether it was satisfactory or not. Maybe that is not the custom of the Post Office Department, but it certainly should be. The representative of the riding should be asked something about such changes. It was during the former government's term of office that postal branches were up for renewal in my community, and I never inquired in those days whether a man was Liberal or Conservative, because the post office serves the whole community irrespective of politics and it should be beyond anything like that.

That is about all I have to say with respect to that point, and if the acting Postmaster General cannot give me information as to the real story behind the change that was made, when the Postmaster General comes in I may have something further to say to him which will be of interest. At the moment, however, I shall leave the matter where it stands.

Mr. EULER: Does my hon. friend wish me to give a reply now or does he prefer to wait until the Postmaster General is here?

Mr. MacNICOL: Can the acting Postmaster General give the reply?

Mr. EULER: I have information which I hope will be satisfactory.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall be glad to have it.

Mr. EULER: I do not wish to read all the correspondence unless it is asked for. Apparently the first incident in connection with the matter is a letter written on February 23 by the chief superintendent of post office service addressed to the chief architect of the Department of Public Works, Ottawa. He makes reference to these quarters, but the thing that is most relevant is a statement that these quarters are crowded and that in view of the growth in that portion of the city of Toronto which this postal station serves, additional accommodation is necessary. He asks the chief architect to have his officers go into the matter so that increased postal accommodation will be available for the department—

Mr. MacNICOL: In the same building?

Mr. EULER: —not later than the date of expiration of the "present lease." He makes reference to the site which has now been secured.

Mr. MacNICOL: In that letter of the 23rd?

Mr. EULER: This was February 23, yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: He refers to the new site?

Mr. EULER: Yes. The letter was written by the chief superintendent of post office service to the chief architect. The supervising architect, whom possibly my hon. friend knows—he is located in that district—wrote a letter stating that he had visited the property referred to, and he encloses—

Mr. MacNICOL: The former property or the new?

Mr. EULER: The new property, I take it, because he describes it as follows:

The property is situated approximately one block east of the present postal station "L" but on the south side of St. Clair avenue, instead of the north.

Then he gives the areas.

Mr. MacNICOL: By whom is that written?

Mr. EULER: By Mr. Winter.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is more than two blocks east.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps I had better read the whole letter:

As requested by yours of the 26th ultimo, I visited the property referred to in the Post Office Department's letter, copy of which accompanied your letter to me, and now enclose Form "B" in duplicate offering these premises for rental, together with plans.

The property is situated approximately one block east of the present postal station "L", but on the south side of St. Clair avenue, instead of the north. The areas of existing premises and proposed new premises are as follows:

Existing premises:	Square feet
Ground floor	3,775
Basement	1,880
Total	5,655

New premises:

Ground floor	4,746
Basement	3,925
Total	8,671

The owner agrees to alter existing front of the building to suit post office requirements, install a new entrance, outside drops, etc., a new entrance and staircase at the rear, and an addition to the building as shown on plan, together with a freight elevator serving the ground floor and basement.

The rent being paid for the existing postal station "L" is $5,400 per annum. The rate being asked for proposed new postal station, is $6,840. With so much additional space, the rental asked is in my opinion a reasonable one.

At the rear of the property is a public lane twenty feet wide connecting to Oakwood avenue, immediately to the west of the building.

The present postal station "L" is very crowded, and with increasing business, additional accommodation is necessary.

The above is recommended for your consideration.

It is signed R. Winter, supervising architect, and addressed to the chief architect, Mr. C. D. Sutherland, Public Works Department, Ottawa.

Mr. MacNICOL: The ground floor of the former building was 3,775 square feet?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: In a part of that building at the front there is a store, forty feet by eighteen, which the owner offered to the Post Office Department, which would give an additional 720 feet.

Mr. EULER: I might complete the statement I have here. Summarizing it, it appears that the old premises had a total area of 5,655 square feet, and the new or present premises an area of 8,671 square feet. In the old premises the cost per square foot was ninety-five cents; in the new premises the cost per square foot is seventy-eight cents. So, according to this, which I assume is correct, the change was made because more space was required, and in the new premises the space was secured at less cost than we were paying for the old place.

Mr. MacNICOL: I cannot see that, as Mr. Winter's letter says the ground floor space of the former post office was 3,775 feet. Adding to that the store in the front of the building which was offered to the government, forty by eighteen feet, or 720 square feet, makes 4,495 square feet in the old building, and then half that amount in the basement, or about 6,735 square feet in all in the old building.

Mr. EULER: Does my hon. friend question these figures, that in the old building the ground floor had 3,775 square feet?

Mr. MacNICOL: Frankly, I cannot see where he gets those figures, because the figures given to me for the old building are 51½ feet wide by 89 feet, which would make the ground floor area about 4,590 feet, I believe, less the 720 feet, or net 3,870 feet, without basement.

Mr. EULER: These figures are given by the supervising architect. I think it is fair to assume that they are correct.

Mr. MacNICOL: If they are on the same basis they are incorrect. Should we add the store in front—

Mr. EULER: No, to that he adds the basement.

Mr. MacNICOL: The old building did not take in all the front of the premises, or all the basement.

Mr. EULER: There is no store spoken of here.

Mr. MacNICOL: No; the store is not in the former post office. I tried to make that clear, but the minister could not understand it.

Mr. EULER: I am afraid all I understand is the figures given here, and they do not seem to correspond with my hon. friend's remarks. They are given by the responsible officials of the department, and with all due regard to what my hon. friend says I am inclined to think they should be accurate. The actual result, if you sum it up, is that the department now has 8,671 square feet at seventy-eight cents a square foot, whereas for the previous premises they paid ninety-five cents a square foot for 5,655 square feet, or they saved seventeen cents a square foot. And they needed more space.

Mr. MacNICOL: The resident architect's statement is that the ground floor area of the former building was 3,775 feet?

Mr. EULER: That is what he says.

Mr. MacNICOL: Admitting that is correct, then add the store in the front of the building—

Mr. EULER: Why add that?

Mr. MacNICOL: Because the owner offered it to the present government just as he did to the former government. The former government said they did not require it.

Mr. EULER: At the same price, ninety-five cents?

Mr. MacNICOL: At the same price as his rent was.

Mr. EULER: But the cost of the new premises was only seventy-eight cents a foot.

Mr. MacNICOL: Can I make the minister understand this, that the frontage of the building on St. Clair avenue, as I remember it and according to the figures given to me, is 51½ feet? But off that there is a store eighteen feet wide. The rear of the building, where the Post Office Department had the whole width, is 51½ feet wide. The owner of the premises offered to the present government, as he did to the former government, that store in front eighteen feet wide. That is 720 square feet, and adding that to the 3,775 feet which Mr. Winter says was the area of the floor space of the former building would make 4,495 feet. The basement is approximately, say half the size, making another 2,245 feet.

Mr. EULER: If those figures are accurate, at the price of ninety-five cents the amount to be paid would be considerably more than they are paying for the present premises. It is just a matter of arithmetic; if you divide the total number of square feet into the rental, it figures out at ninety-five cents under the old lease. Under the present lease it is seventy-eight cents.

Mr. MacNICOL: If Mr. Winter's figures are correct, that the floor space of the former building was 3,775 feet—I will accept those figures as correct although I doubt they are—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacNICOL: As a matter of fact I do not think the old building was that large. His figures may be just as correct as the statement that the new post office is one block east, whereas it is more than two blocks east and on the opposite side of the street.

Mr. EULER: We admit the opposite side of the street.

Mr. MacNICOL: If his statement is correct, that the former floor space was 3,775 feet, then adding to that the store, 720 feet, would make the ground floor space that the government could have had at the same rental as they were formerly paying, I am told—

Mr. EULER: Does my hon. friend mean that they were going to make a present of the additional space?

Mr. MacNICOL: That is what I am told. The department has a letter from the owner, I am told, making an offer, that the rent was to remain the same. That would have made a floor space of 4,495 feet, larger apparently than the new building. But my opinion is that the old space would not be quite as large as the new space. That, however, is not what was behind it at all. I should like to get behind the letter written on February 23. How did the inspector happen to come up there? What went on before that? What were all the negotiations beforehand that induced the inspector to report that, "We had better move east five or six hundred feet, get a larger space," and so on. I know the present acting minister is not familiar with the particulars I have and consequently could not answer that question. But that is what I want to get, and if I do not get it at this time I shall get it on another occasion. I am going to bring that out if I can. With the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) trying to save every dollar he can and to cut down the tax rate as much as he can, why was the Post Office Department so prodigal that it would leave a building specially built for post office work and go away to the east at more money? Perhaps the minister can tell me who paid all the expense. Did the owner of the present building pay for the expense, or did the Post Office Department or the Department of Public Works spend the money on the renovated building? If that were added, it would come to quite a large sum over what the former building would have cost.

Mr. PELLETIER: There is a matter I should like to bring to the attention of the acting Postmaster General, concerning a public building owned by the Department of Public Works in the town of Falher. In that town there is at present an immigration building occupied by the government telegraph office.

Mr. EULER: What is the place?

Mr. PELLETIER: Falher. This building was formerly used as an immigration building, but since there has been no immigration to the district for some time it has been empty, with the exception of its use as an office by the Canadian government telegraphs. At the same time, in that town the Post Office Department is renting a building for post office purposes. I believe that if the acting minister would look into the matter he would find no objection from the postmaster or others concerned to moving into the immigration building, thereby saving the department a considerable sum each year in rentals.

The building now leased by the Post Office Department is a private building owned by the postmaster. He has told me that he requires the building for his own use, and would be only too glad to use the government building for post office purposes. If the acting minister would bring the matter to the attention of the department, I believe he would find that he could effect quite a saving each year by using the government building instead of renting a private building. If what I suggest cannot be done, I should like to be advised as to the reason.

There might also be the objection that the building is somewhat removed from the present post office, but I can assure the acting Postmaster General that it would require only a move of about three or four hundred yards, and would in no way inconvenience anyone receiving mail at that point. It was my wish to bring the matter up under this vote, so that it might come to the attention of the department. I am sure they will find that they can effect a saving.

Mr. EULER: I am glad the hon. member has brought the matter to my attention. If it is possible to use the building, without interference with the lease, his suggestion certainly will be acted upon. I shall be glad to have the matter investigated.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the acting minister bring down all the correspondence in connection with the change of postal station L from ward six to ward five? Would he bring down figures showing the costs in connection with the change, and the correspondence, or will it be necessary for me to put the question on the order paper?

Mr. EULER: I assure the hon. member that if there is any other correspondence, I shall be glad to bring it down when the committee sits again. I have no knowledge that there is any, but I shall make inquiries.

Mr. BENNETT: It is eleven o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the item agreed to?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE—ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY 1932, NIAGARA CONVENTION 1929, OGOKI RIVER AND KENOGAMI RIVER (LONG LAKE) PROJECTS, AND EXPORT OF ELECTRICAL POWER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I desire to lay on the table a copy of a white paper containing correspondence and documents relating to the St. Lawrence deep waterway treaty, 1932; Niagara convention, 1929, Ogoki river and Kenogami river (Long lake) projects; and export of electrical power. The French translation has been completed, but there has been a slight delay in the printing. I hope to be able to lay it on the table to-morrow.

I received this morning from the Premier of Ontario a communication stating that he is forwarding to me to-day a reply to my letter to him of February 22. My letter is included in the white paper, which was printed and bound for distribution before I received this telegram. If the letter from the Premier of Ontario is received by to-morrow I shall table it in order that the correspondence may be complete. I imagine that would be the wish of the Premier of Ontario.

I desire also to table a photostatic copy of an extract from the Congressional Record of February 16, 1938, containing a letter of February 12, 1938, from the Premier of Ontario to Congressman W. G. Andrews referring to the St. Lawrence waterway, the great lakes and related problems. Seeing that this correspondence has just been brought down, I do not think it will be possible to proceed to-morrow with the second reading of the bill respecting the export of power.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PORT COLBORNE, ONT., ELEVATOR EARNINGS

Mr. DAMUDE:

1. What were the net earnings of the Port Colborne grain elevator for the years 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, and 1937?

CORONATION OATH

Mr. CAHAN:

By whom, and under what statutory or other authority, was the coronation oath, which was prescribed in 1689 by The Coronation Oath Act (1 Will. and Mary c. 6), and which had been administered at every coronation thereafter, changed in its terms and a new form of oath administered to His Majesty George VI, upon his coronation on May 12, 1937?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

The coronation oath provided for in 1689 by The Coronation Oath Act (1 Wm. and Mary c. 6) had not been administered at every coronation thereafter in the terms prescribed in the Act. While the form of coronation oath was laid down by statute and could not be altered without statutory authority, it had always been recognized that if a statute was passed altering the constitutional position in such a way as to render words of the original oath no longer applicable, that statute might be treated as impliedly authorizing and indeed requiring a corresponding alteration in the wording of the oath. This procedure was followed in the case of the act of union with Scotland and the act of union with Ireland. The position in Ireland and the enactment of the statute of Westminster altered the constitutional position of the United Kingdom in relation to the dominions, in such a way as to render the existing words of the coronation oath inapplicable. Accordingly, it was necessary that an alteration should be made, and the present form of oath was administered upon the statutory authority of The Coronation Oath Act and the intervening statutes affecting the constitutional position up to and including the statute of Westminster.

The alteration was made by the coronation commission, after consultation with and the concurrence and approval of all the governments of the British commonwealth of nations.

*PUBLIC UTTERANCES OF GOVERNOR GENERAL

Mr. CAHAN:

Has the constitutional rule ever been abrogated, which was expressed in 1879 by the prime minister of that day, to the effect that the governor general of Canada in his public utterances shall preserve absolute silence on matters of policy or of a public nature?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This question I believe is out of order. It would appear to be asked not so much to obtain information, as to supply it. I am not aware that a statement was made in 1879 by the Prime Minister of that day in the terms set forth in the question and I should appreciate information as to where it is to be found.

[Mr. Euler.]

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES—CIVIL AVIATION

Mr. BLANCHETTE:

1. Will the Trans-Canada air lines be completed by the end of the present year?

2. What is the government doing towards the training of youths for civil aviation?

Mr. HOWE:

1. West of Montreal to the Pacific coast—yes.

2. The government has supported the flying club movement for the past ten years, so as to make available facilities for flying instruction in all parts of the dominion.

CONSULTATION BETWEEN BRITISH FOREIGN SECRETARY AND DOMINION REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. Is there held in London a weekly conference at which the foreign secretary meets the representatives of the various dominions?

2. Does the High Commissioner for Canada attend this conference?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

ATHENS, ONT., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. STEWART:

1. When did the last postmaster at Athens, Ontario, tender his resignation?

2. On what date was his resignation accepted?

3. Who was appointed in his place?

4. How many returned soldiers, of Athens or vicinity, applied for appointment?

5. Did the present postmaster reside and carry on business at Morton, about twelve miles from Athens, before his appointment?

6. Were there applications for this position from residents of Athens, Ontario?

7. If so, why were they all rejected?

8. Was this appointment under the control of the civil service commission?

9. When did the present postmaster first receive his personal mail at Athens?

10. On whose recommendation was the present postmaster at Athens appointed?

Mr. EULER:

1. 12th December, 1935, to take effect on 1st September, 1936.

2. Postmaster was advised on the 28th August, 1936, that the transfer of the office would be effected on the 1st September, 1936.

3. Harry Wykes, returned soldier.

4. Three, including Mr. Wykes.

5. Information on file indicates Mr. Wykes had transacted postal business at Athens since 1933. Information subsequent to transfer indicates that Mr. Wykes previously resided at Morton.

6. Yes.

7. Person selected stated he was a patron of the Athens Post Office.

8. Departmental appointment, residential qualifications not required.

9. See answer to no. 5.

10. D. E. Lewis of Brockville.

MONT-LAURIER-SENNETERRE HIGHWAY

Mr. LALONDE:

1. Has the federal government contributed to the construction of the Mont-Laurier-Senneterre highway, known as project No. 17-36? If so, for what amounts, and on what date or dates were the payments made?

2. Has the federal government also contributed to the work of project No. 58 (Villemaire creek bridge to Mont-Laurier), and, if so, for what amounts, upon what dates were payments made for said work, and what were the amounts?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Project No. 17 of schedule "C" to the agreement entered into between the dominion and the province of Quebec under the provisions of the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936, provided for a dominion contribution of $70,350, being 50 per cent of the total estimated cost of clearing, preliminary works and gravelling on the Mont-Laurier-Senneterre highway, it being provided that the province contribute an amount equal to that contributed by the dominion. Payment of accounts rendered by the province with respect to this project were made on the dates and in the amounts hereunder mentioned.

Date of payment	Amount of dominion contribution
April 20/37	$11,391 37
September 3/37	33,910 53
September 28/37	46,200 96
	$91,502 86
October 2/37 Credit	22,505 99
	$68,996 87

2. Project No. 58 of schedule "C" to the agreement referred to in No. 1 above provided for a dominion contribution of $5,000, being 50 per cent of the total estimated cost of bridging Villemaire brook, including approaches, at Mont-Laurier, it being provided that the province contribute an amount equal to that contributed by the dominion. Payment of accounts rendered by the province with respect to this project were made as follows:

Date of payment	Amount of dominion contribution
April 30/37	$ 995 34
August 18/37	3,486 94
December 11/37	12 68
	$ 4,494 96
August 19/37 Credit	327 52
December 7/37 Credit	30 00
	$ 4,137 44

Project No. 36-58 of schedule "C" to the agreement entered into between the dominion and the province of Quebec under the provisions of the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act, 1937, provides for a dominion contribution of $3,000, being 50 per cent of the estimated total cost of completing the works authorized by above referred to project No. 58 of the agreement with the province under the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936, it being provided that an equal amount be contributed by the province. Payment of accounts rendered by the province to date with respect to project No. 36-58 have been made as follows:

Date of payment	Amount of dominion contribution
January 25/38	$ 839 07
February 9/38	1,116 47
	$ 1,955 54

BOULEVARD PIE IX BRIDGE, ST. VINCENT DE PAUL

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Has the federal government contributed to the construction of the Boulevard Pie IX bridge at St. Vincent de Paul?

2. If so, what amounts were so contributed?

3. Is the work of construction on this bridge completed, and is the bridge now open for traffic?

4. Has the construction work on the bridge been definitely approved and accepted by the federal government?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes.

2. Provision was made in the agreement entered into between the dominion and the province of Quebec pursuant to the provisions of the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936, for a dominion contribution of $300,000 toward the cost of construction of a bridge on Pie IX boulevard at St. Vincent de Paul, costs of expropriation and building of approaches excluded, it being provided that an equal amount be contributed by the province. Payments aggregating $275,969.92 have been made to the province with respect to accounts rendered to the dominion in connection with this project.

Provision is made in the agreement entered into with the province of Quebec pursuant to the provisions of the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act, 1937, for a dominion contribution of $6,500 with a like contribution from the province for the completion of the works commenced under the 1936 agreement.

Provision is also made in the agreement with the province under the 1937 act for a dominion contribution of $200,000 with a like contribution from the province, for new construction on the Pie IX boulevard bridge including viaduct for M. T. Railway but excluding expropriation costs and cost of building approaches. No accounts have at this date been received from the province with respect to construction of the Pie IX bridge carried out during the current fiscal year.

3. Construction of the bridge proper has been completed and opened for traffic but is understood to be closed at the present time due to damage created by snow plough.

4. Not being a federal bridge, the construction is not subject to approval or acceptance by the Federal Government.

ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN RELIEF LOANS

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. How much money has been loaned to each of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan for relief purposes?

2. How much money was loaned to each of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan for agricultural relief, including transportation of feed and live stock, and purchase of feed?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. The amounts outstanding as of February 25, 1938, of loans made under various relief acts to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan are as follows:

	Alberta	Saskatchewan
Loans specifically for agricultural relief including seed grain	$ 3,152,748	$14,550,633
Loans specifically to meet maturing obligations and interest	8,577,000	3,934,341
Loans for provincial purposes generally including drought area relief, public works and direct relief	14,156,450	41,363,168
	$25,886,198	$59,848,142

Note: The above total of loans outstanding is, in the case of Saskatchewan, inclusive of $17,682,158 written down to non-active assets as of March 31, 1937, pursuant to Vote 393 of the further supplementary estimates for 1936-37. The third main classification cannot be further broken down to show the exact amount used by the provinces for agricultural relief.

2. Answered by No. 1.

SUSSEX, N.B., CUSTOMS OFFICE

Mr. BROOKS:

What was the amount of: (a) yearly revenue collected; (b) yearly expenses, of Sussex, New Brunswick, customs office for the past ten years?

Mr. ILSLEY:

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—DIRECTORS

Mr. MASSEY:

1. Who are the directors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?
2. What are their several occupations?
3. When were they appointed, and for how long?

Mr. HOWE:

Order in council, P.C. 2369, of September 10, 1936, authorized the appointment of Messrs. Leonard W. Brockington, of the city of Winnipeg, barrister at law; Rene Morin, of Montreal, general manager; and Mrs. Nellie McClung, of Victoria, as members of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for a term of three years from the date of the coming into force of the Canadian Broadcasting Act, November 2, 1936.

Mr. J. Wilfrid Godfrey of the city of Halifax, barrister at law, Captain (Reverend) Alexander Vachon, of Quebec, director of chemical research; and Colonel Wilfrid Bovey, of Montreal, barrister at law and educationalist, were appointed for the two-year term; and Nathan Louis Nathanson, of Toronto, president of Famous Players Canadian Corporation, Limited; Alan Butterworth Plaunt, of Ottawa, journalist; and Brigadier-General Victor W. Odlum, of Vancouver, were appointed for the one-year term.

By order in council, P.C. 1157, of May 29, 1937, the resignation of Colonel Wilfrid Bovey was accepted and Reverend Eastland Fuller, of Campbellton, New Brunswick, a canon of the Church of England, was appointed for the unexpired portion of the two-year term for which Colonel Bovey had been appointed.

On the expiration of the one-year term for which Nathan L. Nathanson, Alan Butterworth Plaunt, and Brigadier-General Odlum were appointed, these three gentlemen were, by order in council, P.C. 2641, of October 27, 1937, re-appointed for the term of three years from the 2nd day of November, 1937.

*FOREIGN INVESTMENTS IN CANADA—EXCHANGE OPERATIONS—FOREIGN INDEBTEDNESS

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley):

1. What are the total foreign investments in Canada?
2. What are Canada's total payments to foreign investors in: (a) interest; (b) dividends?
3. What portion of Canada's balance of trade went to pay foreign credits?
4. Is there any control over foreign investments in Canada for: (a) purposes of restriction, and (b) control of exchange operations?
5. Through what agencies is exchange operated (explaining the operations)?
6. Are there any preferential exchange rates to certain importing countries, or is preference given solely by tariffs?
7. How do tariffs, quotas and restrictions effect and/or interfere with purely local trade?
8. Has Canada liquidated any of its foreign indebtedness during the last year or two? If so, how much? Has it increased, and, if so, how much?
9. What is the controlling factor, making necessary, the floating of foreign loans?
10. On whose authority was the last London loan floated?
11. Was it not possible to borrow this money in Canada for the purpose intended?

Mr. DUNNING: In asking that this question stand, I should like the hon member who asks it to review certain portions of it in order to avoid the compiling of what amounts to a textbook by way of an answer. The questions to which I particularly refer are no. 5, "Through what agencies is exchange operated (explaining the operations)?", and no. 7, "How do tariffs, quotas and restrictions effect and/or interfere with purely local trade?" I suggest that one might write volumes on these two subjects and that they are scarcely proper in their present form as questions on the order paper. Perhaps, if they are allowed to stand, the hon. member will reconsider them.

Question stands.

SILVER CURRENCY AND POLICY RESPECTING PURCHASE OF SILVER

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley):

1. How much silver, in coins, has been returned to the Canadian Mint during the years 1930 to 1937 inclusive, from all sources?

2. What amount of silver coin has been issued in denominations of 5, 10, 25, 50 and $1 pieces, to chartered banks or other agencies during these same years?

3. What are the various reasons for the return of coins to the mint?

4. What is the government's present policy with regard to the purchase of silver?

5. Is there a set price, and what is the set price?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Worn and mutilated silver coin returned to the Mint:

1930	$401,865 05
1931	377,380 60
1932	393,327 30
1933	331,544 20
1934	924,809 80
1935	896,492 15
1936	394,031 40
1937	376,416 50
	$4,095,867 00

2. Silver coin issued by the Mint:

	$1.00	50c	25c	10c	Totals
1930	....	18,000	164,000	144,000	326,000
1931	....	34,000	212,000	229,400	475,400
1932	....	18,400	134,000	134,600	287,000
1933	....	....	97,000	58,000	155,000
1934	....	19,200	105,100	48,000	172,300
1935	428,120	....	134,400	38,500	601,020
1936	306,100	19,300	242,000	241,800	809,200
1937	240,900	96,000	711,900	273,400	1,322,200
	975,120	204,900	1,800,400	1,167,700	4,148,120

There was no issue of silver five-cent pieces during these years.

3. Mutilation and excessive wear.

4. Other than silver contained in worn and mutilated coins redeemed by the Royal Canadian Mint, the only silver that the government is currently buying is the silver recovered from the refining of gold bullion deposited at the Mint.

5. There is no set price. Under the Mint regulations, the rate to be paid for silver in excess of 1 per cent of the weight of the bullion deposited shall be one cent below the average for the week in which the deposit is made of the daily London quotation for standard silver from Monday to Friday, inclusive, converted into the equivalent for fine silver in Canadian funds at the average of the daily rate of exchange between Montreal and London calculated to the nearest one-eighth of a cent.

[Mr. Dunning.]

OLD AGE PENSIONS

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF PENSIONABLE AGE LIMIT FROM SEVENTY TO SIXTY-FIVE

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North) moved:

Whereas it is becoming more and more difficult for older persons to be absorbed into the useful productive life of the dominion thereby being unable to maintain themselves in decency and comfort,

And whereas, Canada is a country richly endowed with natural resources, capable of maintaining our whole population in a reasonably high standard of living,

Therefore be it resolved,—That this house would welcome a government declaration of policy that would bring about an immediate lowering of the present pensionable age limit of seventy years, the effect of such being that the older generation would retire from industrial activity, thereby creating opportunities for the younger generation to be usefully and gainfully employed.

He said: It is just about two years since I introduced a resolution similar to this, and after a discussion which proceeded for the best part of two days, it was discovered that the motion was out of order. This time, however, I have worded my resolution in a different manner, and I hope that it will receive from the government a little more support than was accorded the previous one.

I do not intend to repeat the arguments I used two years ago in attempting to convince the house of the reasonableness of the proposal which I then made. I wish, however, to refer briefly to what I then said. In the first place I contended that if we had a properly planned economic system it would be possible to retire people at the age of sixty and give them a comfortable existence in their old age. I urged that in this country we had an abundance of everything which is required to make life worth while, but that on account of our chaotic system of distribution many of our people, particularly the older ones, were denied the means of a decent existence in their declining years.

At the outset I might give a concrete example of the possibility of having a large part of the population engaged at tremendous cost in activities which are not of a constructive or productive nature. Between 1914 and 1918 there were taken out of productive and useful employment in Canada approximately half a million of the flower of our manhood and our womanhood. They were engaged in destroying wealth; yet in spite of the fact that wealth was destroyed at a rate never known before in history, the rest of the population were able to keep these half million men in a state of efficiency for warfare in Europe. As a result we built up a huge financial debt which to-day is a heavy burden to the country, but I point to the example of the years 1914-18 to show that under certain circumstances we can maintain a relatively large proportion of the population in a fairly high state of military efficiency and still allow for the rest of the population a reasonably high standard of living.

I wish now to deal with some of the objections raised at that time by the Minister of Finance. His main objection was the one which naturally related to finance; he wondered where the money was to come from. That is the cry of every minister of finance, but as I have said in this house on many occasions, under certain conditions there is no difficulty about governments providing funds; if a war should break out or if we required increased armaments there would be no difficulty in providing the required funds for such purposes. It so happens that since the time I last spoke on this question the government has increased the expenditures on armaments somewhere in the neighbourhood of $15,000,000, and there was no question as to where the money was going to come from. I submit that when we raise questions with reference to social advancement we should not be met with that cry about where the money is to come from, for the moment we require money for increased armaments it can be found.

May I make a suggestion to the Minister of Finance. If he is anxious to provide funds for the financing of a scheme of old age pensions at a lower age than at the present time, it might not be a bad idea for him to nationalize two of the outstanding industries of the country—nothing new in the realm of politics so far as other countries are concerned. If he would nationalize the tobacco and the liquor industries the profits from both these sources would go a long way towards providing old age pensions to people who are now under seventy years of age. At the present time the liquor business in Canada is to a large extent under public ownership and control, and it would not be a wide step for the government to make it a complete federal public monopoly and to utilize the profits for the purpose of financing old age pensions at a lower age.

Let me deal with some of the figures submitted by the Minister of Finance two years ago. He stated that the number of persons of the age of seventy and over in receipt of pensions was 28·5 per cent. That figure, I believe, is accurate; but in fairness to the minister himself I suggest that it does not give a perfectly true picture of the exact percentage of persons of seventy and over who would have been entitled at that time to pensions had everybody been under the old age pensions scheme. When those figures were submitted to the house two years ago the province of Quebec had not yet come under the scheme. Since that province has come under it the figure has been increased, so that the percentage of persons over seventy in receipt of pensions from the government is now 37 instead of 28·5 as the minister informed us two years ago.

Mr. DUNNING: It is higher than that now; it is constantly going up.

Mr. HEAPS: It may be; the figures I gave were for one year ago. The minister also stated that the average income of persons of the age of sixty and over was $1,072 per annum. If that was the case, if our older people of sixty and over were in receipt of approximately $1,072 on the average, then I would point out that there would be no need for an old age pension to people of sixty and over. The problem would automatically solve itself. The fact is, and the statistics will prove it, that a very large percentage of the people of the age of sixty and over are not in a position to maintain themselves at that age and it is because of that fact that I am to-day asking the government to consider very seriously and favourably a reduction in the present pensionable age.

I might be permitted to give a few figures. In 1931 there were 870,428 persons between the ages of sixty and sixty-five, and in 1937 that number had increased to approximately 989,000, an increase of 118,572, according to the latest figures from the bureau of statistics.

In 1931 there were 344,697 persons of the age of seventy and over, and in 1937 there were approximately 397,000, or an increase of 52,303.

Our population in 1931 was 10,376,786, and in 1937 it was estimated to be 11,130,000 or an increase of 743,214.

By an odd coincidence the increase in the number of persons of the age of sixty and over works out approximately to 14 per cent, and the increase in population in the same period works out approximately to the same figure. To-day I am going to argue more in favour of reducing the pensionable age to sixty-five than to sixty, because in doing so I have more hope of a favourable reply. The proportion between the ages of sixty-five and seventy who would require pensions would be considerably less than those who require pensions after the age of seventy, in view of the figures which the minister submitted two years ago with regard to average income, and also for the reason that people of the age of sixty-five and over may have certain resources of their own which a person of seventy has not, and in many cases they are able to maintain themselves by their own exertions. For those three reasons I believe the percentage which to-day is about thirty-seven—

Mr. DUNNING: To-day it is over fifty per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: Well, even if it is over fifty per cent we can work it out on the same basis. Taking that basis, the percentage of those between the ages of sixty-five and seventy requiring pension would be considerably less than for those aged seventy and over.

Mr. DUNNING: I wish I could agree with that.

Mr. HEAPS: My logic leads me to that deduction. I wish now to deal for a moment with the question of pensions in other countries. I think practically all countries have systems of old age pensions in one form or another. First I shall deal with the newer scheme inaugurated in the United States; for I want to compare what is being done in other countries with what we are doing in Canada. I think that is a fair test in a question of this kind.

Under the recent social security legislation of the United States some 37,000,000 persons become subject to the old age pension provisions. But the act in the United States is not on the same basis as we have it here; it is entirely on a contributory basis. The employer pays so much, the employee so much, and contributions are made by the state government and the federal government. The federal government contributes half of what the state government provides.

Mr. DUNNING: Half of what the individual state provides.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the reverse of our situation.

Mr. HEAPS: I shall deal with that, but first I want to show the systems in force in other countries. From the fund established by the governments in the United States the pensioner receives in proportion to the amount he pays in. The more a man pays into the fund the more he takes out when he reaches the pensionable age. But there is a minimum as well as a maximum pension. No man receives less than $10 a month by way of pension, and none receives more than $85 a month, no matter how long he has paid into the fund. There is this difference in favour of our system. Twenty dollars a month may look small compared with what they pay even to-day in the individual states of the union, but theirs is now in part on a contributory basis and ours is on a non-contributory basis and is a charge on the taxpayers as a whole. So I find this important distinction, that whereas in the case of a married couple we pay a maximum of $20 a month both to the husband and to the wife, in the United States only one receives a pension; that is, if the wife has not paid into the fund, the only pension receivable by a couple is the amount the husband receives, be it $10 a month or $80. I think that is to the advantage of our system. The system in the United States is a complicated one. I could go into it at some length, but the one fact I want to emphasize is that pensions there are payable at the age of sixty-five. In fact to-day sixty-five has become recognized as pensionable age in practically all parts of the world.

I turn now to the old country, where they have had old age pensions for about thirty years. They started there to pay pensions at age seventy, on a non-contributory basis. Some years ago the basis was changed and made contributory in the case of persons who wish to receive pension between the ages of sixty-five and seventy. But pensions are payable to-day in the old country at the age of sixty-five.

Mr. DUNNING: Provided the pensioner has contributed.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes, between sixty-five and seventy it is on a contributory basis, but over seventy all pensions are a charge on the imperial exchequer. What I point out is that they have accepted sixty-five as the pensionable age.

I now turn to some of the other British dominions. South Africa, which established a system of old age pensions at about the same time as we did, inaugurated their system on a non-contributory basis, and pensions are payable at the age of sixty-five. There seems to be a tendency toward unanimity as to sixty-five being the age at which people should retire from industry. In addition, in some of the schemes to which I have referred, as well as one or two others, the regulations are not as stringent as those which prevail in Canada. I do not intend, however, to deal with that aspect. Australia also pays pensions from the age of sixty-five, and in case of incapacity the pensionable age is reduced to sixty. There also it is on a non-contributory basis. The age has been sixty-five almost from the inception of the system. In New Zealand the situation is somewhat the same. The pensionable age is sixty-five—I believe it is sixty for females—and pension is granted there without the application of nearly as many regulations as apply here.

Mr. BENNETT: They have no provinces.

Mr. HEAPS: I am not thinking of the provinces. I am thinking of the amount of income outside of the pension that is allowed, the amount of property a person is allowed to possess without being asked to sign it over to the government as collateral for the pension received. These regulations are less stringent in most of the countries I have referred to than they are here in Canada. But what I want to stress again is that in all these countries sixty-five is accepted as a pensionable age, and in many cases even a lower age is accepted for persons suffering from permanent incapacity.

If it is possible in the sister dominions to have non-contributory old age pensions granted to people at sixty-five years of age, there is no reason in the world why we cannot do the same in Canada. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) pointed out, they have no provinces.

Mr. DUNNING: Can the hon. member tell us the proportion paid by the individual states in Australia?

Mr. HEAPS: I think in Australia it is now entirely a federal responsibility. For some years, until recently, it was partly a state responsibility, but while I am subject to correction I believe that to-day it is a federal responsibility in Australia.

In another part of my motion I say that if people between sixty-five and seventy were pensioned, it would release quite a number who to-day are working but who if they were in receipt of some form of economic security would be glad to retire and allow others to take their places in industrial life. I know it might be said with a good deal of force that with a pension of only $20 a month it would be difficult to induce men to retire, but in the case of two people—

Mr. DUNNING: It is hard to get them to retire where the pension is two or three hundred dollars a month.

Mr. HEAPS: That may be so in the civil service.

Mr. DUNNING: In every service of which I know.

Mr. HEAPS: As a rule the people who hold those fairly well paid positions are not very anxious to retire, but if you offer a greater inducement to a carpenter or bricklayer—

Mr. DUNNING: Or an engine driver or a fireman.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes; you offer those people a reasonable pension and you will find that there will be no difficulty in getting them to retire at a reasonable age.

Mr. DUNNING: That has not been the experience with pension schemes in industry.

Mr. HEAPS: But what I am saying, Mr. Speaker, and the argument I think was placed before the government by the trades congress, is that if $20 a month, or $40 for a couple, should not be sufficient to induce people to retire, I would have no objection and in fact would welcome it if the Minister of Finance would increase that pension to an amount which would be sufficient to induce people to retire.

Now we come to our youth problem, which is bound up with this question to a certain extent. The youth question cannot be ignored; for to-day we have the youth of our country walking the streets or with very little to do. To me it seems illogical and absurd to have young men in their late teens and their twenties walking the streets while our older people are engaged in industry, or are unable to perform the duties of the positions they hold. The question of incapacity, which I have raised, is a very important one and cannot be ignored. When the minister considers the cost of any pension scheme he cannot figure it entirely on the basis of mere dollars and cents. There is also a credit side of the picture. At the present time, persons of sixty-five to seventy years of age who probably would come under a pension scheme, if they are not in a position to earn their own livelihood, are being maintained by someone else. If their own relatives or friends are not in a position to do so then these people become the recipients of public relief. It does occur to me that when a man or a woman who has lived in this dominion for twenty, thirty or forty years, and has given the best years of his or her life in developing and building up the country, reaches old age, he or she should be entitled to some form of recognition from the country for the services that have been rendered. I believe that when the average person, be he a mechanic in any sphere of activity or be he a man who works in a store or a warehouse, has given thirty or forty years of his life in devoted service to his country he is just as much entitled to a pension as is the soldier in the army or the judge who sits on the bench. I think there should be recognition of the services that have been rendered, though they may have been rendered in very different capacities.

Mr. BAKER: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but the act does not read that way. A man need be in Canada only twenty years, and on reaching the age of seventy he can get a pension. In my opinion that is the one weak point in the act.

Mr. HEAPS: When a person reaches the age of sixty-five or seventy he has probably worked very hard for perhaps thirty or forty years.

Mr. BAKER: According to the act as it stands now, a man could have come from Germany at the age of forty-nine years and eleven months and upon reaching seventy he is eligible for an old age pension, although he gave the best of his life to Germany. I took exception to that when the act was introduced.

Mr. HEAPS: I think there are similar provisions in every old age pension act in the world, including those of this country and of Great Britain. It is the case, so far as I know, wherever you have an old age pension act in force.

The problem of old age is becoming an extremely serious one, because I think it is recognized that through advances in medical science and scientific research people to-day have a greater life expectancy than they had a few generations ago. The average expectancy of life is now approximately fifty-eight years, which is about twenty years more than it was a few generations ago. I have figures which show that at the present time there are in Canada more than two million persons of the age of sixty and over, which means that approximately twenty per cent of our total population come within that category. That means that the problem of old age is becoming even more important than the question of unemployment. A man who reaches the age of sixty and becomes unemployed finds it extremely difficult to obtain employment. In fact men are sometimes laid off when they have reached the age of fifty, because it is considered that even then they are too old. A man of sixty or sixty-five has absolutely no opportunity of obtaining employment.

Mr. DUNNING: I think my hon. friend's figure of two million must be wrong. I do not want to interrupt him, but I do not want him to base his argument upon a false premise.

Mr. HEAPS: I may say that I obtained my figures very recently from the bureau of statistics. I accepted them over the phone. I may have got them incorrectly.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend permit me to interrupt for a moment? I have here the figures by provinces of the number of persons over sixty but under seventy. The aggregate of those in the whole dominion is 591,600. Then I have the number of persons seventy years of age and over, which is 396,900. Adding those figures it will be seen that at the present time in the Dominion of Canada there are less than one million persons over sixty years of age.

Mr. HEAPS: Over sixty and under seventy?

Mr. DUNNING: No, taking those over sixty and under seventy and adding the number of those over seventy.

Mr. HEAPS: The information I have clearly indicates that in those categories we had the number of people I mentioned, but I stand of course subject to correction.

Mr. DUNNING: Over two million?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes, 2,039,000. I am sorry if the figures are not correct, but I have them here exactly as I received them. Possibly I got the wrong set of figures.

Mr. DUNNING: I have two sets of figures by provinces, those between sixty and seventy and those over seventy, and in all there are just short of one million of these people.

Mr. HEAPS: I should think it would be strange if there were only a million in all those categories, because we have nearly four hundred thousand over seventy. My figures, from the bureau of statistics, show 397,000 people over the age of seventy. Surely if that is so, there must be a very much larger number between sixty and seventy.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, 591,600.

Mr. HEAPS: That hardly sounds reasonable to me.

Mr. DUNNING: I have all the provinces separately.

Mr. HEAPS: Perhaps we can adjust this matter later on. Time is getting short, and I do not wish to dwell upon that aspect of the question; besides, if the minister is correct in his figure as to those between sixty and seventy it becomes so much easier for him to be a little more sympathetic this afternoon then otherwise he might have been.

Mr. DUNNING: I knew I was taking the risk that my hon. friend would make that reply, but I could not be more sympathetic than I am.

Mr. HEAPS: May I now deal with one aspect of the question concerning which I have received a large number of communications. Some people believe that if we reduce the pensionable age we may weaken what we commonly describe as filial responsibility. I have strong convictions on that point. I feel that when a mother or a father has reached old age, the child capable of maintaining or assisting in maintaining his aged parents in a state of decency and comfort, should do so without compulsion. I should not like to see anything done here by way of legislation which would weaken the responsibility of the child towards the parents. Children are better able to maintain parents who are between the ages of sixty-five and seventy than they are when they, as well as the parents, reach an older age. In any measure brought before the house I should be quite prepared to support some provision by which proper attention would be given to the question of filial responsibility.

One of the tasks of the house should be to lighten the load of the older people. I think the time of the government would be well spent if it took into consideration more seriously than it did two years ago the question of reducing the pensionable age. I recall the words of the Prime Minister at the time the government was about to take office. On October 14, immediately after the election results were known, he made the following statement:

> The struggle for the rights of the people, will, in the realms of economic liberty and security, be carried on as never before. Poverty and adversity, want and misery are enemies which Liberalism will seek to banish from our land.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEAPS: I am glad to hear some hon. members say "Hear, hear." I should like to have that expression of concurrence in the sentiments of the Prime Minister, as he stated them immediately after the election, put into concrete action. This is the third session of the present parliament. If this parliament runs the usual length there will be one more session. Up to this time, in these three sessions, with one exception—pensions for the blind—no action which would give the people a greater sense of economic security than they had at the time the statement of the Prime Minister was made can be credited to the government.

I am one who wants to see the purpose behind that statement carried out. I believe the government could do nothing better than to give concurrence to the resolution I have presented, in which I ask the house to do exactly what was promised by the present Prime Minister. It would bring about a sense of security to the old people in Canada. The letters I have received, the majority of which, strange as it may seem, come from rural centres, are most pathetic. They urge that something be done for the older people. We in Canada are lagging behind all English-speaking countries in our activities in respect to bettering the social and economic lot of the common people. I believe—and the facts prove it—that so far as looking after the well-being of our people is concerned, we are the most backward of any English-speaking part of the British Empire. In many countries pensions are given at the age of sixty-five, and in some at sixty, while in Canada the pensionable age stands at seventy. It cannot be denied that social legislation in other parts of the empire is far more advanced than anything we have here, because the legislation they have enacted speaks for itself.

It is my wish that we may be not a backward but a forward nation. I should like the government—I do not care who does it—to take a step forward and to enact legislation which will give hope and encouragement to the great masses of our people. They are looking for something definite from the government and, so far, everything has been indefinite. I am making a plea to the government to reduce the pensionable age from seventy years to sixty-five years, so that we may take care of those older people who are no longer required in industry, and who have no hope of finding employment. I should like to see a message of hope go out from the house this afternoon to that part of our population, so that at least they may have the encouragement of knowing that in the near future they will be placed upon the pension lists and in their declining years may enjoy at least some form of economic security which, through no fault of their own, they are now denied.

Mr. BAKER: Is the hon. member aware of the fact that as the act stands at present a man has only to live in Canada twenty years to receive the old age pension at seventy? A man may come from Europe when he is more than forty-nine years old, and almost worn out physically; yet at the age of seventy he may receive a pension. Does the hon. member agree that if the limit be reduced to sixty-five, that provision should be changed? I believe it is the defect in the act.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in opening my remarks on the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), which I most wholeheartedly support, may I say that the point raised by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Baker) is not an important one so far as the resolution is concerned. If people are coming to Canada at an age when they are burnt out, that defect can be looked after simply by refusing them entrance to the country, by tightening our immigration laws. But once we have let them in here, discrimination as between citizen and citizen should stop.

Questions respecting old age pensions and other social measures are being forced upon the governments of all countries. Social questions may not be the fault of governments; they arise out of economic development. The fact is, however, that in every country of the world questions have arisen with which, whether they like it or not, governments have had to deal. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North has said, Canada has lagged behind most other countries in respect of social legislation.

So far as I have been able to learn, the matter of paying old age pensions was first discussed in the Canadian parliament in the session of 1906. The matter was raised by Mr. R. A. Pringle, who at that time was the member for Stormont. However, nothing came of that discussion. On May 1, 1922, the question was again raised by Dr. J. E. Fontaine, the Liberal member for Hull, who moved the following resolution:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the dominion government should consider the advisability of devising ways and means for the establishment of a system of old age pensions in Canada.

Two years later on April 29, 1924, the then Prime Minister, who is also the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) moved:

> That a special committee be appointed to make an inquiry into an old age pension system for Canada.

A committee was appointed and it reported in favour of an old age pension scheme. The most important recommendations of the committee were that old age pensions should be paid at the age of seventy years, that the maximum rate of pension should be $20 a month, and that half the cost should be borne by the provincial governments, the federal government assuming the other half. Another two years passed before the government, under a little judicious prodding, introduced an old age pension bill.

It will be seen from reading the debates in Hansard of that year that the bill got rather a hostile reception. Although that was not so very long ago, some of the speeches make curious reading to-day. This indicates how fast we are moving at the present time and how economic changes bring about changed social conditions. The bill passed the house but was defeated in the senate. In the following year another bill was introduced which passed both houses and became law, just twenty-one years after the question was first raised in parliament. This is not very fast progress.

I believe British Columbia was the first province to take advantage of the new act. I understand its legislation was passed before the federal act came into operation. Now I submit that the time has come for a revision of the old age pension scheme as provided in the act of 1927. I am sure there are few people in Canada to-day, not even those who were opposed to the scheme when it was placed on the statute book, who would advocate the repeal of the Old Age Pensions Act. In the distressing times through which we have been passing during the last seven or eight years this act has brought comfort to thousands of people who in their declining years found themselves in need, in most cases through no fault of their own.

However, I think it must be conceded that under present conditions the age limit of seventy years is far too high, and the maximum pension of $20 a month is altogether inadequate for a decent standard of living. It is not enough on which to live and it is too much on which to die. It is sufficient to prevent immediate starvation, but not sufficient to prevent progressive deterioration of health from malnutrition and the lack of certain essential comforts. It should be clear to anyone who has made a study of this subject, or who has come in contact with people living on old age pensions, or people who have not quite reached the age when such pension is obtainable, that it is high time the age limit was lowered and the amount of the pension materially increased.

I think the time has come when many of the annoying regulations imposed by some of the provinces should be removed. I understand it is a fact that in some provinces old age pensioners receive only the amount paid by the federal government. I notice the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) shakes his head.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sure my hon. friend wants to be accurate. The federal government pays seventy-five per cent of what the province pays.

Mr. MacINNIS: That was a misunderstanding on my part. I would say then that in certain provinces old age pensioners are paid only $15 instead of $20. That would amount to pretty nearly the same thing.

As I said, Canada seems to have lagged behind in the matter of social legislation. We shall have to move faster in the future than we have done in the past if we want to be considered one of the world's progressive nations. I appreciate the fact that because of certain conditions in this country we did not see the need or possibly the need was not there. It is also a fact that people do not like to change by leaps and bounds. Man is by his nature conservative and it is only when circumstances become unbearable that people are prepared to move regardless of consequences. This is a fact that should be kept in mind by governments and legislators. More and more of our people are to-day reaching that state where they feel they have nothing to lose. Consequently, more and more of them are reaching that state where they do not care what action they take, provided that action gives promise of quick relief from some of their difficulties.

Speaking as one who has had close contact with many people receiving old age pensions—I come from an almost one hundred per cent working class constituency—I can say that these pensions have been of great value to the people of this country. Inadequate as they are, there is no doubt that they have brought some comfort and happiness and a certain measure of security and even a certain measure of independence to many old people. I hope this parliament will see its way clear to increase that security and thereby to enhance the independence which people value so much—people who have served their day and generation well but who, in the evening of their days, find themselves in straitened circumstances.

One outstanding fact in connection with old age pensions is that no country which put an old age pension law on its statute books has ever repealed it. The general tendency is toward liberalizing old age pension legislation, once it is enacted. I have examined statistics on the subject published by the international labour office, and I should like to quote some facts giving the ages at which these pensions are payable in most of the important countries of the world.

In Austria men qualify at sixty-five and if permanently incapacitated they qualify at sixty. Women are eligible at sixty. In Belgium—

Mr. DUNNING: Would the hon. member be good enough to indicate in each case whether the scheme is contributory or non-contributory?

Mr. MacINNIS: I may not have the information segregated here as to contributory and non-contributory schemes, but my opinion is that in most cases they are contributory.

Mr. DUNNING: They are practically all contributory, I believe.

Mr. MacINNIS: In Belgium, men qualify at sixty-five and women at sixty. In Bulgaria, both men and women are eligible at sixty. In Sweden, men and women qualify at sixty-seven. May I point out that the old age pension in Sweden is compulsory at this age.

In South Africa, the age is sixty-five.

In the U.S.S.R. men qualify at sixty and women at fifty-five. There is a still lower qualifying age for persons working underground or in unhealthy occupations.

In the United States the age in twelve states is sixty-five, and in fourteen states the age is seventy; in one state the age is sixty-eight.

In Czechoslovakia, both men and women are eligible at sixty-five.

In Denmark the age is sixty-five, but under certain conditions old age pensions are paid at sixty.

In Hungary, both men and women are eligible at sixty-five.

In New Zealand, men are eligible for old age pension at sixty-five and women at sixty.

In Poland, sixty-five for both men and women.

In Roumania, sixty for men and women, but the age is lower for underground workers.

The following countries have a lower age for women than for men.

In Austria, women qualify at the age of sixty, men at sixty-five.

In Belgium, women qualify at the age of sixty, men at sixty-five.

In the U.S.S.R., women qualify at fifty-five, and men at sixty.

In Australia, women qualify at the age of sixty, men at sixty-five.

In New Zealand, women qualify at the age of sixty, men at sixty-five.

One of the very first acts of the labour government of New Zealand when it came into office in 1935—

Mr. EDWARDS: Would the hon. member permit a question? Just what did he mean when he said that in Sweden the old age pension is "compulsory"? Does he mean that everyone, whether he requires it or not, is compelled to receive it?

Mr. MacINNIS: My understanding of the old age pension law in Sweden is that everyone contributes to the old age pension scheme; it is automatic and the pension is paid automatically when the prescribed age is reached. The pension is in various parts; there is a contributory pension, and if the contribution is not sufficient to make the pension such as to provide a decent living standard, the necessary amount is paid from the general fund by the government.

Mr. EDWARDS: The answer, then, is that everyone contributes?

Mr. MacINNIS: Everyone contributes. I believe that within certain limits the contribution is proportionate to income. There is a low limit and there is a higher figure.

I should like to read to the house from a statement made by the Minister of Pensions of New Zealand when he introduced the government old age pension scheme in the first session after the election of 1935. I quote this because the approach is so different from that usually made in this country. The quotation is from the New Zealand parliamentary debates—the New Zealand Hansard, I suppose—of September 1, 1936:

> All social legislation, and especially that providing for pensions, is a recognition by the community of the fact that the recipients of the pension have in a very large measure been responsible for the development of the country and the vast accumulations within it. One of the points to be recognized is that such allowances made by the younger generation to their forebears are by no means a charity but in reality a recognition and a return to them of what they themselves have put into the nation. They have no reason to feel that they are placed under any obligation in respect of what they receive under this head. The pension is given to the old people as I have said as a recognition by the community to those who in the past have rendered service to their country as citizens.

Let me stress this: "They have no reason to feel that they are placed under any obligation in respect of what they receive under this head. The pension is given to these old people, as I have said, as a recognition by the community of the services they have rendered in the past to their country as citizens." In this country we already pension some of our citizens, in some cases possibly beyond the value of the services they have rendered. If we are to pension a few for the services they have rendered as citizens, why should we not pension all citizens for their services?

Continuing, Mr. Parry said:

> That principle distinguishes the human animal from the animal kingdom. If we look at the home we do not find there that those children who are able to work say to the weaker or to the invalid members of the family that they are not entitled to the same food, clothing, and conveniences as those who are strong and capable. On the contrary all that is best is conceded to the invalid or the crippled member of the family. Of such a sentiment we are very proud. And if that is a good policy in the home it is equally good in the larger home—the nation.

Until we consider the nation as a larger home, a home where the weak are protected, not exploited, we shall not have a country of which we can truly say that it is civilized, because such protection is the hall-mark of civilization.

The Prime Minister, when he introduced the Old Age Pensions Act in 1925—at any rate when he discussed the subject—made the following statement on page 1980 of Hansard of that year:

> There is need for society to assist in the protection of its members against a condition which simultaneously places burdens upon the workers whose day's work is done, and on the worker whose day's work is just beginning. If the young are to be given a fair start in life the care of the aged should not be their first responsibility.

In my own province of British Columbia, as I believe in others, before they can obtain an old age pension under the provincial regulations, parents are compelled to sue their children, even though they know that those children are unable to contribute to their support.

Because of economic changes it is becoming increasingly difficult for people getting up in years to find employment. Indeed, it is not only difficult for them to find employment; it is difficult for them to keep it when they have it. That power production and the use of machinery displace man-power is no longer disputed. The extent to which employment lags behind increased production in all countries to-day clearly demonstrates that fact. There is, however, another point that is not so well known and that is that power-driven machinery not only displaces workers in industry but also reduces the quality of the labour which is left. In other words, power-driven machine production not only reduces the aggregate number of workers in industry but displaces a number of skilled and experienced workers by a smaller number of unskilled workers. Both these points were brought out clearly in the evidence given before the Turgeon textile commission in 1936. One witness, Mr. W. J. Whitehead, of Associated Textiles of Canada, Limited, gave the following evidence as reported at page 1081:

> Q. So that we come to the conclusion that since 1928 the proportion of labour in the output of the company has been reduced from about 32 per cent to 20 per cent?
> A. I have agreed to that.
> Q. Now I suggest to you that your rates of wages are much lower now than they were in 1928?
> A. We have not denied that.

If the rate of wages is lower and production is higher with a smaller number of employees, then there is bound to be some economic dislocation and there are bound to be a number of people who cannot be looked after, people who cannot obtain income direct from industry. If they cannot get an income direct from industry there is no other source from which they can get it, unless it is provided by the state; and the state can get it only by taxing it out of industry.

In the brief submitted by counsel for the commission, we find the following:

> The industry is responsible for those conditions. In its evolution it has enhanced the number of low positions to the detriment of the higher ones. Some years ago, each one hundred looms occupied ten weavers with few or no helpers. To-day the same number of looms occupies two weavers, three battery-hands and one oil-cleaner, perhaps two. Eight major jobs were replaced by four or five minor ones.

This substantial evidence goes to prove the point I have just made, namely, that machinery not only displaces workers, but also displaces skilled and experienced workers for mere machine-tenders. In other words, more products are turned out with fewer and cheaper labourers.

Let me quote one other statement from the same source. This is taken from the brief submitted by Elie Beauregard, one of counsel for the commission. From page 130 I quote the following:

> The large Wabasso factory, which is no exception, succeeded between 1928 and 1936, in more than doubling its production, while reducing the number of its workers by about one-fourth and its payroll by about one-third.

If the Minister of Finance is at a loss to know where to get money, that should suggest where it can be had. This is not a condition that is peculiar to the textile industry; it is more or less true of all industries in which power machinery is used. Perhaps the textile industry was more ruthless or had more and better opportunities of doing as it pleased. I do not know; I am merely quoting these cases to show the unmistakable trend in industry to-day, a development that is making it increasingly difficult for people of forty and forty-five—not people of sixty, and sixty-five and seventy, but people of forty and forty-five—to get a footing in industry and to keep it when they have got it.

Let me give another quotation from the chief counsel. In his brief to the same commission he makes this statement at page 7:

> More often than not when the worker has reached the forties a forced lay-off, through fatigue or illness means the end of his employment.

He may leave the factory because of a cold, because of some slight indisposition, but he is getting up in years and is no longer as agile as he once was, and what industry needs to-day is not the skilled worker but the agile machine-tender.

> The last to be called when the men go back to work and the first to be released or put on short time the old employee who has not known how to make himself indispensable falls victim, now to a new distribution of work, now to the introduction of improved machinery and, usually, to the competition of those who are younger and more fit. The career of the textile worker is short-lived; it begins early and comes to an early end. The problem of the middle-aged worker is a universal one.

I am not suggesting that we should pension people at forty-five, but I am suggesting as earnestly as I possibly can that this government should do something for people who have reached the age of sixty or sixty-five, those who have reached sixty and are not yet seventy. Have you ever stood before the employment office and watched women of sixty and sixty-five on a cold, wet morning—and I am thinking of my own city of Vancouver—coming up to the office and waiting until it opens? There is no more heartrending spectacle than that, and yet we have it in every city, in every town of this rich dominion.

I would stress this point in regard to what is taking place because of machinery. I am not blaming governments, because governments have very little to do with the development of economic means. These things develop either with, or in spite of governments. I saw the point put very clearly indeed, and very neatly too, in a book which I read a few years ago and which came to my mind when I was considering what I would say on this question. The title of the book is The Economic Consequences of Power Production; the author, Fred Henderson, a fairly well-known English economist. On page 49 he said:

> The handicraftsman has, as it were, been split up into three parts. The physical energy which he contributed to production has been superseded by the new gigantic powers: his operative skill has been superseded by the precision of mechanism, and his craft knowledge has become the technician's specialized knowledge of the reactions between these non-human factors and the materials of his particular industry. Thus the craftsman completely disappears; and what the power machine industry requires by way of labour is an altogether new function for which there was no counterpart quality in the handicraftsman at all. The mass of the workers called into existence by the new conditions as machine minders are an entirely new type, concerned neither with the technique of materials nor with the productive purpose of the machine in relation to a finished commodity, but only with the movement of the machine as a thing in itself; and with that movement only at second hand; not by effecting it directly, but by attending to the controls which admit and regulate the effective power.

That I think puts it so clearly that nothing further need be said regarding it.

Sometimes we are told that we are asking too much of government and of the state. Personally I do not agree with that. But the question cannot be decided yes or no until we settle what is the function of government, and why it came into being. If government is something superimposed upon the people, the government of one class by another, then the government may object and say that too much is asked of it. If on the other hand government is, as I think it should be, an instrument of the people for doing for the people collectively what cannot be done by the people individually, then there is no limit to what the people may ask their government to do. To set a limit in such case would be to set a limit to progress. Questions which come before this house from day to day, a number of which have already been discussed this session, are relentlessly driving home to us the social implications of the changes taking place in the economic system under which we live. It is becoming ever more evident that the more we produce with the socially operated machinery of industry, finance and commerce, the more it is impossible for the individual to provide himself with either comfort or security. It may be said that in our working years we should provide for our old age. But to-day that is foolish, because not even a man in his prime can provide for himself. What nonsense, then, to ask him to lay by something to provide for his old age!

I made inquiry of the civil service commission as to the age factor in employment, and I am told that in the lower grades they do not take on applicants over the age of thirty-five. If the government of Canada will not take on people over thirty-five years of age because they cannot get value for the money they pay, how can we expect industry operating for profit to take on people over that age? The director of unemployment relief in Vancouver said recently, in reporting to the council, that most of the heads of families unemployed at the present time who are over the age of fifty-five would never work again. They are unemployable, and have become so because of being unemployed for three, four or five years. If people are unemployable at fifty-five years of age, we should make more scientific provision for their care than unemployment relief.

Thinking of old people I am continually reminded of a poem by Robert Burns; "Man Was Made to Mourn":

> Look not alone on youthful prime,
> Or manhood's active might;
> Man then is useful to his kind,
> Supported is his right;
> But see him on the edge of life,
> With cares and sorrow worn;
> Then age and want—oh! ill-matched pair—
> Show man was made to mourn.

We have not yet found a formula to extend old age, and I hope we shall not until we find a formula to make it more comfortable. But there is no reason except sheer stupidity why in this dominion, a country so richly blessed with almost everything necessary, we cannot make existence comfortable for all in their old age or those for whom we cannot provide profitable employment. At the present time in every city there is a considerable number of persons between ages of sixty-five and seventy on relief. And those on relief who have reached the age of fifty-five or perhaps fifty and who have been unemployed for any considerable length of time will certainly never work again. It would be a humane act on the part of this government to take these people off relief and give them an old age pension. It is sad to see these people waiting in line for their vouchers or relief in whatever form it is given.

The amount of the old age pension should also be increased. That is imperative. I hope the government will give this matter very serious consideration and before this session is over do something that will bring a greater measure of security and independence to people who have reached the age of sixty or sixty-five and can no longer find profitable employment. And let us do it in such a way as they have done it in our sister dominion of New Zealand, so that it is not charity, but returns to them a part of what they themselves have already put into the country.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): I welcome the introduction of this resolution because it gives me an opportunity to express in a few words some thoughts which have been in my mind for the past three years in connection with the age limit for old age pensions. I represent a city constituency of which a large proportion of the people are employed by either the two great railway systems or the department stores and other institutions where the rule of retirement at the age of sixty-five has become almost absolute. Even in the civil service this rule is recognized by the enforced retirement of civil servants at the age of sixty-five.

One of the problems I have had to face time after time in the last three years has been that of the gap between the age of sixty-five and the age of seventy, when the old age pension comes into effect. For a moment or two I should like to speak to the house about the situation of the railway men in my constituency—and I imagine the situation is the same in every other constituency—with respect to old age pensions. During the last five or six years these men, particularly shop men but also men engaged in the running trades who did not have a great deal of seniority, were very fortunate indeed if they were working sixteen or eighteen days a month, and many of them for periods of months had no employment at all. These men, who are coming now to the age of sixty-five, were caught at a time when the average man was completing the buying of his home and providing for the education of his children, a period during which he was under great expense. Many of these people are now bankrupt at the age of sixty-five, and they find themselves approaching this gap between sixty-five and seventy. Many of them to my knowledge within the last two or three years have had to go on direct relief, or in the alternative they have been thrown upon the kindness of their children, who in many instances are completely unable to provide anything like adequate care for them. It does not seem good enough to me that men and women who have served as these men have, not only in this particular occupation but in many occupations, should have to face that difficulty.

I do not propose to enter into a discussion of the cost of lowering the age from seventy to sixty-five, and at this time I think I should refrain from discussing whether or not it might be advisable to introduce the principle of contributions to old age pensions, because as yet we do not know what is proposed with respect to unemployment insurance. It has been a dream of mine, or should I say a thought of mine, that perhaps when we reach the point of working out an unemployment insurance proposition it may be possible to have something of a joint nature worked out in regard to old age pensions and unemployment insurance. So I am prepared to wait a little longer to find out what is going to be done; but I should like to urge upon the government at this time the claims of these people, not only those who have not worked at all but particularly those who have been on part time at greatly reduced wages during the last six or seven years, and who are now approaching the age of sixty-five. Frankly I do not know what their numbers are, even in my own constituency; but I do know there are many of them, and it might be that the government could in this way better than in any other contribute to the relief of the older unemployed.

I am not one of those who are greatly impressed with the idea that if we lop off ten thousand workmen at the age of sixty we shall be putting on another ten thousand workmen at the age of nineteen or twenty. I have yet to be convinced that by taking a man off the top and putting another man on at the bottom you increase the number of jobs. I agree with those who say that it is better that the younger generation should have some greater opportunity to obtain work. Just at this point I might say that I have personal knowledge of young men of more than average ability, with more than average determination to do anything or try anything, who have reached the age of twenty-six years without having earned a dime working at a regular job. I realize something of the implications of such a situation, and it may be that something might be achieved by transferring jobs, but I do not think it is at all workable as a solution to the problem of unemployment.

I am grateful for this opportunity to say how great I believe the need is for a reduction in the age at which a person may qualify for the old age pension, but even so at the moment I would not advocate that this age should be less than sixty-five. I have said time and again in the last two or three years, in private conversations, and on the public platform, that the position to-day of the man who is fifty years of age and unemployed is practically hopeless with regard to his chance of ever getting back into the occupation which he formerly held. But while I realize that, I am not prepared to advocate that he should become a public charge or even that he should be placed on an equal footing with others with respect to any government scheme of assistance such as the old age pension. However, in my opinion this is the time to make a change, and I believe the way to make the change is to reduce the age to sixty-five, when in our own service we admit that sixty-five is a fit and proper age at which to retire.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my hon. friend will permit me to say that in the service a man may retire at sixty-five but retirement is not compulsory until he reaches the age of seventy.

Mr. MUTCH: All I can say in reply to my hon. friend is that on one or two occasions, when on compassionate grounds and where there was justification, I have been desirous, much against my general inclination, of having a civil servant retained for a year or two beyond the age of sixty-five, I have not been received with any great enthusiasm on the part of the ministers of the crown with whom I have had to deal.

Mr. DUNNING: I was merely stating the law. So far as the government is concerned, the retirement of a civil service employee is not obligatory until the age of seventy. The government has the right to retain by order in council the services of an employee until the age of seventy.

Mr. MUTCH: It has become recognized in practice by the government that it is undesirable to expand the tenure of office of civil servants beyond the age of sixty-five.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, as a general principle.

Mr. MUTCH: I am not particularly anxious to labour that point. I merely wish to establish the fact that we do recognize that in this day and generation sixty-five is the age of retirement. All that I said a moment ago with regard to the railway men, with whose case I have come in close contact, is equally true of men employed in business generally and of men who work for others, in stores and other places, the so-called white collar class of workmen, who must always work for somebody else. They find it very difficult to retain their jobs after the age of sixty-five. The number of those who do is infinitesimal, and the number of people who at sixty-five are in a position to maintain themselves is also very, very small. Some little time ago—and I am sorry I do not have the document with me to-day—I read a table prepared by the statistical department of a life insurance company doing business in Canada, which showed the number of men who are independent at the age of sixty-five. That number was sufficiently small to impress anyone with the necessity for some adjustment in this matter.

While I am in entire sympathy with the aim of this resolution, I would have found it much easier to support the motion had I read it on the order paper and come immediately to a declaration of my views in this regard. However, the resolution does not urge upon the government any immediate expenditure; it calls only for a statement of policy, and I should be inconsistent with my own expressed views if I did not say that I am in sympathy with this resolution in so far as it does bring to the attention of the government, what I think should be brought to its attention, namely the necessity for some change, and I welcome it on that account.

Mr. E. J. WERMENLINGER (Verdun) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, two years ago I rose in this house to say a few words on an almost identical resolution moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps). On that occasion I said that, representing an industrial constituency, I had a clearer understanding of the problem of those who depend on factory employment for a living and that it would be better to create employment by means of public works undertaken either by the state or by private industry.

Two years have passed and we are now at the third session of the eighteenth parliament. I give full credit to the Minister of Labour who has done his utmost to see that every part of the dominion received its share of public works. He has given its due share to the constituency which I have the honour to represent. If he recollects the visit he paid to Verdun last fall with the Minister of Labour of the province of Quebec, he will admit that he was received like a prince and that the people looked upon him as Santa Claus who was to return the following year with more public works.

But, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether, even with the creation of the National Employment Commission presided over by Mr. Purvis, the problem of unemployment has been solved in this country. On February 20, 1936, the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) recalled that President Roosevelt of the United States had stated that even though the industrial activity of 1928 and 1929 should return, the same unemployment conditions would have to be faced, as there would still be six million idle persons in that country. The leader of the opposition added that, counting our population as one-twelfth that of the United States, we would have 500,000 unemployed to take care of.

In view of these facts, Mr. Speaker, and after re-reading the resolution of the hon. member for Winnipeg North, I must say that I am in favour of the first paragraph, which reads as follows:

> Whereas it is becoming more and more difficult for older persons to be absorbed into the useful productive life of the dominion thereby being unable to maintain themselves in decency and comfort.

You will understand how painful it is for those who represent factory constituencies to observe so much poverty, misery and adversity. I remember this passage of the speech the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) delivered on the evening of the great Liberal victory, October 14, 1935:

> Poverty and adversity, want and misery are enemies which Liberalism will seek to banish from our land.

I wonder whether it can be said, after three years and in spite of the commendable efforts of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour, that the problem of unemployment has been definitely solved in this country.

The second paragraph of the resolution reads as follows:

> And whereas, Canada is a country richly endowed with natural resources, capable of maintaining our whole population in a reasonably high standard of living,

I should not care to commit myself on this subject. Although I admit that Canada is richly endowed with natural resources, I think the matter is one for economists and I fear that this paragraph contains a suggestion that the distribution of the fruits of our natural resources should be attended by a system of joint ownership.

Here is the third paragraph:

> This house would welcome a government declaration of policy that would bring about an immediate lowering of the present pensionable age limit of seventy years. . . .

I interrupt the quotation at this point to state that I am in favour of the appointment of a committee of this house, as in 1906, 1907, 1908, 1912, 1913 and again in 1924 and 1925, to consider possible amendments to the Old Age Pension Act, particularly in regard to the immediate lowering of the present pensionable age limit.

I stated a moment ago that those who reside in industrial centres can bear witness to the widespread poverty and confusion that is found in such places. At the session of 1936 one of the arguments brought against any change was that the advocates of a lower age limit were really preaching communism and socialism. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether our pensioned civil servants, our retired judges, our pensioned policemen, firemen and other municipal employees, workmen belonging to labour unions or other organizations having retirement funds can be considered propagandists for communism or socialism in this country. Certainly not.

Another argument was that it would be encouraging laziness and discouraging self-help. I do not wish to repeat what has been said by the hon. members who have preceded me, but it must be admitted that the institution of old age pensions has evolved from year to year in the various countries of the world and some countries have had them only since the turn of the present century. It is as recently as 1908 that Great Britain enacted a non-contributory pension system which remained in force until 1925 when a new act was passed creating a contributory system. The hon. member for Winnipeg North outlined this afternoon the evolution of old age pensions in the different provinces, which evolution is being continued by the resolution now before us, the purpose of which is to lower the pensionable age limit. Let us not forget that, in 1917, New Zealand had passed, under special legislation, a money bill providing for an increase in the rate of old age pensions. Therefore, we ought to proceed gradually. I say that this country has nothing to fear either from communists or from socialists. We always kept progressing, and there is no reason why we should not see to it that social conditions be improved in the future. Canada is supposed to be quite prosperous, and we boast of the stability of our laws and institutions. Consequently there is nothing to fear in that regard.

Then there is the argument concerning the cost. During the session of 1936, the hon. minister of finance stated that the lowering of the age limit from seventy to sixty-five years would entail a considerable expenditure. According to statistics, there are at present in this country 240,000 people, between sixty-five and sixty-nine years of age. If we take into account the number of those old people who receive a pension either as former members of the civil service or the judiciary, or labour unions which provided for their old age, I figure out that only 20 per cent of them would benefit by the old age pension, should we lower the age limit from seventy to sixty-five. That would leave about 48,000, let us say 50,000 people.

When we examine the statistics a little more closely, we notice that old people in Ontario receive an average monthly pension of $18.11. If we multiply $18.11 by approximately 50,000, being the additional number of people entitled to an old age pension under the proposed amendment, it would make a total of $950,000 a month. Multiplied by twelve, it would amount to about $11,000,000, or let us say $12,000,000 everything being included. Taking into consideration the amendment of 1931 which raised the dominion's share from fifty per cent to seventy-five per cent, therefore seventy-five per cent on $12,000,000 would represent an additional cost of $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 in old age pensions, in case that we would lower the limit to sixty-five years of age. Let us say $10,000,000. I do not believe there is one member in this house who is of the opinion that we could not reduce government expenses in this country by 10, 11 or 12 million dollars in order to enable us to grant old age pensions at the age of sixty-five.

Some contend that many of our old people who are to-day in distress, owe it to their carelessness and lack of thrift. I admit it to a certain extent. But is it not a principle of British justice that a hundred culprits should be allowed to escape rather than a single innocent be punished? Though the proportion would not be as large among these destitute, I do not believe that those who have well deserved of their country, and who, through their whole life, did their best to rear their families, to own some property and to serve their land, should be made responsible for the conditions that we have experienced during the last eight, nine or ten years. Where are our carpenters, bricklayers, joiners, tinsmiths, roofers? Those who had not the opportunity to belong to labour unions where work is of a permanent nature, where are they? You will find them before the unemployment commissions, where they are seeking relief. Do you think that the burden of their care should fall upon their children, who have hardly enough to provide for their own needs?

As to the question of saving, the honourable minister of finance told us during the session of 1936 that we should not make unnecessary expenditures. I agree to that. But you will also admit, Mr. Speaker, that from one end of the country to the other, chambers of commerce, boards of trade and the largest newspapers and periodicals in their editorials, claim that it would be possible to save fifty to sixty million dollars in the management of our railways. It appears that we are paying $50,000,000 a year in interest on bonds held by individuals, that is $1,000,000 a week. It appears that we are paying $35,000,000 a year on government loans amounting in all to $1,500,000,000. I would not like to see any saving made in the department of railways through the dismissal of old employees, for it would be like starving Paul to feed Peter. But I do think that by reducing the maintenance cost of large hotels, and the purchases or working expenses of branch lines we could save some money. The report of the Rowell commission will shortly be submitted to the house. We are told that we could make a considerable saving by doing away with overlapping government services. Perhaps the Rowell commission will tell us also that by having less commissions, some members of which are being paid $400 per day and expenses, and others $100 per day and expenses, and by curtailing these expenditures, we would perhaps be in a position to answer the argument of the minister of finance who stated that money was too hard to get.

If we cannot do it by saving money, and without being compelled to tax the whole population, then I would have a suggestion to put forward. Unfortunately, I cannot labour the point very much longer, for I notice on the orders of the day a bill which went through its first reading, namely bill 28, concerning sweepstakes. Don't tell me that it is impossible to find eight, nine or ten million dollars in this country, without having to impose heavier burdens upon the taxpayer, in case that we agree to the new financial measures. In England, 200 million dollars a year go to the sweepstakes. In the United States, the postal authorities discovered that four billion dollars were spent each year in lotteries.

An official of the Red Cross Society stated in a letter to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Furniss) that in a single office in Montreal $298,000 had been spent on betting and sweepstake tickets, the purpose of which was to assist welfare organizations in Ireland, India or Newfoundland. I do not want to take more of the time of the house. I shall leave to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Bertrand) whose speech is more convincing than mine the task of explaining the bill which he has introduced in this house. I want to say, in conclusion that for the above reasons I am in agreement with the views expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. Looking at Part XIII of the Versailles Treaty signed June 28, 1919, particularly at the preamble, we find:

> Whereas the League of Nations has for its object the establishment of universal peace, and such a peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice;
> And whereas conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled; and an improvement of those conditions is urgently required. . . .

And I wish to lay emphasis on the following point.

> Whereas also the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries and to secure the permanent peace of the world.

I shall now refer to the words used by the right hon. the Prime Minister in his speech delivered on the evening of the great Liberal victory of October 14, when the program of social legislation proposed by the right hon. the Leader of the Opposition had apparently been turned down by the electorate:

> Poverty and adversity, indigence and distress, those are the enemies which Liberalism will endeavour to drive out of our country.

Mr. Speaker, I do say that each one of us has a right to express his views in this house, regardless of party politics. I am glad to see the Minister of Finance in his seat because two years ago, on February 20, 1936, he stated that his department was to watch the operation of the act as well as the economic conditions prevailing in the country and that, if there were any possibility, the age limit would be changed. Therefore, I respectfully suggest that, following the example set in 1906, 1912, 1913 and 1914, a committee of this house be appointed for the purpose of studying the necessity or the advisability of amending the Old Age Pensions Act.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches which have been made on this resolution. I do not intend to follow the line pursued by other speakers, although I agree that the last five years prior to the pensionable age are increasingly difficult for people with little or no means. I wish to speak briefly upon the needs of another class of Canadians, namely those who are totally disabled, and I am thinking particularly of people who are so crippled that they are unable to sit, but must lie prone; of others who can sit but cannot walk; and yet others who can walk only a few steps. It may be that I have come into contact with more cases of this kind than most hon. members; in any event I have definitely come to the conclusion that they are people who need help, even more, perhaps, than the blind, because they suffer so much and have no hope of ever being able to provide for themselves.

A year ago I went to the bureau of statistics and asked if I could get some data on the number of persons in Canada who, due to rheumatism, arthritis and other like diseases, are completely crippled, wholly disabled, but I was unable to get any figures because no returns were available. It seems to me that when the census is taken again we should be enabled to learn how many people there are in this country who are totally disabled and, to some extent at least, what caused them to be in that pitiable condition. I am taking the matter up on this resolution, because, in extending pensions to the blind at forty years of age, we did so under the Old Age Pensions Act. No doubt the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) wonders how many more classes of people are to be admitted to pensions under this act; but this seems to be the only place where one can bring up the question. In Ontario a woman in receipt of the mother's allowance receives, when her husband is totally disabled, an extra amount of money, not a great deal, but as much as would be allowed for another child. If her husband needs much care, that is, if there are medical expenses in connection with his disability, the allowance is not sufficient. But with that one exception —and the same may be true of other provinces—people totally disabled do not receive any pension until they are seventy years of age. I will cite two or three cases, and I am sure they will bring to mind similarly afflicted persons known to other hon. members.

In my constituency is a man who, when a boy, and still at public school, was afflicted with some rare disease which left him totally unable to walk or, as years went by, even to stand up. He is now in his forties, and most of the time since his early youth he has been compelled to lie prone; he can scarcely feed himself. He is very intelligent. He lived with his aged mother, who cared for him. At the age of eighty she died, before his eyes, from a heart attack; he, though seeing her, was unable to do anything except call for help, and help had hardly arrived before his mother was gone. Her death left him with no one to care for him and without any means of support. Everyone wanted to do the best they could for him—he had lived in the village all his life—but the only thing that could be done was to take him to the hospital, which happened to be at Hamilton. I wanted to have him live in his own village, because I knew it was breaking his heart to have to go away; but I found that the amount which the municipality were willing to contribute for his support would not be supplemented if he remained in the village, but only if he was taken to hospital in Hamilton; I am not familiar with the institution but I believe it is a place for incurables. In the summer when in his home village he was put in a sort of bed which can be wheeled outside, left there during the day and wheeled inside in the evenings, so he spent his summers in the garden, where his friends and neighbours called and talked with him. His case brought home to me what a cruel thing we had done to him although nobody intended to be cruel. From his public school days until the present time he has not been able to live anything that approaches a normal life; but in his own little cottage in his home village he really was happy; he had his radio, friends came in to read to him, talk to him and treat him in a human way. Then suddenly he is taken away, and as far as I can see—and I have tried to do everything I can—there seems no way of getting him home again. Last year some of his friends were able to take him home for a day or two, but it is not possible for him to remain there.

I will cite another case in my constituency. This woman developed in her forties what seemed to be ordinary rheumatism and it got worse and worse. She is now over seventy and can neither sit nor stand, though she could for many years. It was a progressive disease and each year she got worse. You can imagine how much it must cost to care for a patient from some time in the forties to, say the age of seventy-two. This woman could now get an old age pension, but she lives on a farm. All this time she has suffered so much that one wonders how she can continue to live. Her stepson has taken care of her in a loving and admirable way. He has farmed the land and when he could afford it has kept help; when he cannot afford it he cares for her himself. She told me that she could apply for a pension; but she would have to sign away the farm on which they live, and she said that she could not have it taken away from her stepson, who has done so much for her. She therefore goes on suffering and hoping that the end will be not too long delayed. That has been her condition for many years. These happen to be personal friends of mine, but I am sure that hon. members can all call to mind similar cases.

On Saturday I got a letter from a young man in Quebec who says he is twenty-eight and for sixteen years has been unable to walk. His story is much the same; there is no one to take care of him and he does not know how in the world he is to be supported. There is no pension for him; he does not know where to go, and he wishes to know whether something can be done for him.

Strangely enough, the three letters I have received are all from the province of Quebec. I can give the names if anyone wishes to have them, but I think it is better not to give them. This young man writes:

> Do you not think that it would be only fair to include the crippled and invalids in this law?

He is referring here to the pension to the blind, and he suggests giving the crippled and invalids a pension at forty years of age. He goes on:

> It seems to me that I should be as much entitled as old people to receive a pension by the fact that I am unable to work and without means of livelihood. Old people very often can depend on either a son's or daughter's support.

He says he has no children. The third letter came recently from the province of Quebec. The writer, a man, says:

> I happen to be one of these unfortunates. I am thirty-eight years of age. I have to walk on crutches and my health is very frail. My folks are poor, my father being over sixty years of age, can only work during the summer season, he being too old to work as a lumberjack in the winter time. His income is about $400 a year to support four grown-up persons.
> I had a small business, but on account of sickness I ran into debt and cannot see my way to build up another trade, being short of funds.

He thinks he could work if he could get started at something.

I do not want to prolong the discussion. The need for action is clear to everyone. I was glad we did something for the blind; though it took us a long time we eventually got around to it. People who are totally incapacitated and are thereby denied the happiness of a normal life which the rest of us enjoy and who, moreover, often suffer excruciating pain, ought not as well to be worried by economic difficulties, and I submit that at the earliest possible date we ought to extend pensions to totally disabled persons.

People will ask where the money is to come from. Well, just recently I have been reading in the Star Weekly of Toronto the story of some birds of passage, rather wealthy birds who flit to the Bahamas. Pages are devoted to them. One of them is Mr. Harry Oakes, and he was justifying his flight on the ground that he might avoid taxes. I read that in the same island there was that eminent banker whom we all had the privilege of meeting in the banking committee many years ago, Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor. I read that Sir Herbert Holt also had gone to the Bahamas. If they care to go there it is all right with me; but at least I would see, if I were in the seats of the mighty, that they did not take with them all the great gifts which this country has so richly bestowed upon them, and that from such people income tax should be taken to such an increased extent as to afford large sums of money to be used in alleviating the suffering and mental distress of these our unfortunate fellow citizens. One should not become too perturbed at these newspaper articles; it is likely to cause high blood pressure; but if I did become agitated by such reading matter I would have been particularly violent when I read about these three men. This man, Harry Oakes, took the trouble to give an interview in which he defended himself. I thought he might have spared us that. I suggest that allowing these people of great means to avoid taxation by going to the Bahamas or elsewhere is an affront to all hard working and destitute Canadians, and I hope that something will be done about them before very long.

In conclusion, I would ask the house to consider the case of totally disabled persons.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I have listened this afternoon to the arguments for reducing the pensionable age, and it seems to me there is everything to be said in favour of it; I can think of no real case against it.

[Miss Macphail.]

What are the facts? It is admitted that a certain percentage of people will never again be able to find work and wages. Surely if men and women have put in forty or forty-five years of useful work they are entitled to a few years of leisure if they so desire. On the other hand, people who have reached the age of sixty or over and are not working and receiving wages have very little chance of getting work at that age. It seems that there is a feeling against granting leisure to anybody unless he possesses money. Money seems to be the one claim to leisure. Not only is that so; but if a man has not saved money by the time he reaches old age, the feeling seems to be that he should be punished for that very reason by being made to work years after he is really physically incapable of doing so.

They say that when a man loses his money his follies become vices. It appears too that if a rich man gets out of bed he is a hard working citizen, whereas if a poor man gets into bed he is considered a lazy bum. Be that as it may, the only reason I can see against lowering the age for old age pensions is the expense. It will be said that the country cannot afford it. That may be true in a financial sense, but certainly it is not true in any real sense. Surely no one will say that the Canadian people, with all the power at their disposal, all the machinery and all the skill which they possess and their well known capacity for hard work—and if any people in the world have earned that reputation it is certainly the Canadian people—it is absurd to say that all those resources if used to their full capacity are not sufficient to sustain the people who are too old to be usefully employed.

Consider the rearmament plan in Great Britain; they are spending, I believe, $7,000,000,000 in producing armaments. I do not wish to say anything for or against rearmament; that is not the question; my point is that the people of Great Britain are devoting themselves to accumulating an enormous supply of goods which are not for the use of the people who produce them. Yet everyone admits that on account of that program the people of Great Britain are very much better off than they were before; that their standard of living has risen, simply because the wages and salaries distributed for the making of those munitions have enabled the workers to get more and better food and spend more money on their amusements and pleasures. If part of that money had been distributed for other purposes than making shot and shell and battleships, the result would have been the same. People do not live in battleships and do not consume munitions; but, as I said, the increase of money which has been distributed to the people of Great Britain through the production of armaments has raised the standard of living for the whole country. So that if the government financed these old age pensions in part by the creation of additional credit, which of course is the way in which these munitions are financed, not only could the rest of the people afford it but we would all be very much better off.

Of course people will say that would cause inflation. But in Great Britain in recent years they have spent thousands of millions of dollars on rearmament and there has been no serious inflation, so I fail to see why it would necessarily follow that if we distributed some extra purchasing power in this country there would be any danger of inflation. I know that is the bogey which is always trotted out if anyone suggests a little financing which is not quite orthodox. We are all supposed to be frightened at the word inflation. But there are means of avoiding inflation, and I am quite sure that we could very well deal with that if we had to. It is true that in the financial sense the people of this country and of all countries are overtaxed. It is not likely that they would be ready to agree to more taxation and more work. If people have to work it is poor treatment to bleed them at the same time. What they need is not bleeding but a little blood transfusion, a little blood pumped into them. If we could pump a little money into the people's pockets, we would all work better and be healthier and better off.

It might be said that old age pensions financed in that way would be in the form of a dividend. That, of course, is exactly what it would be. I gather from remarks made here a few days ago that to mention the word "dividend" is to lay oneself open to the charge of political corruption. Well as one who was accused of the gravest political corruption in the history of Canada let me take the opportunity of saying a few words on my own behalf. I do not think hon. members on the other side realize the true state of affairs in Alberta. The facts are that the people themselves were discussing monetary reform for some years; they formed study groups, and you cannot wonder, considering that they were getting five cents a bushel for their grain and next to nothing for their live stock. The more they studied monetary reform the more enthusiastic they became. They organized themselves in constituencies and when the time came they held conventions and nominated men to obtain what they wanted. The demand came from the people, not from those who have been described as cheap politicians going out promising this, that and the other thing to get the people's votes. The people demanded that these things be obtained for them, and if a man accepted nomination it was on those terms. And the people have the remedy in their own hands; if those results are not obtained, they can at the next election turn these men out and replace them with others. That surely is democracy. Our election expenses were financed with nickels and dimes. My own personal election expenses were under $50, as the clerk can tell you. I think it was $37 I spent on my election, my personal expenses.

Mr. DUNNING: You can never run one as cheaply as that again.

Mr. PELLETIER: Not with the example we are getting.

Mr. JAQUES: That remains to be seen. Possibly I may not run again. Anyway I do not think you can say that $37 is an excessive sum to pay to obtain people's votes.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that as you travel among the people of Canada you find that people are not satisfied. Of course I have this advantage over the elder statesmen, in that I probably hear the truth, while they possibly do not. The people are a long way from being satisfied. It is not a case of Liberals or Conservatives. Parliament itself is on trial. The people are getting tired of electing representatives in a democratic way and getting nothing for it but further taxes. One thing is certain. If they do not obtain better results than they have been obtaining in the past their faith in parliamentary government will grow less and less. I should like to read a quotation from The Art of Central Banking, by Mr. R. G. Hawtrey, who is a secretary to the British treasury. He says:

> The common factor in pre-war, and post-war, experience is the intimate association of the state of trade with the enlargements and compressions of consumers' income and outlay effected by central banks. If this fundamental causal sequence were understood, the public would hardly acquiesce in the central banks proceeding from their position of complacent detachment to generate depressions, unemployment, bankruptcy, budget deficits and defaults, with all the resulting political and social convulsions while government after government is broken because it can neither stem the flood of ruin nor even provide tolerable palliatives to alleviate the consequences.

That was written not by a social crediter but by an orthodox economist, who is a secretary to the British treasury. We see the way things are going in Europe. The trend is all towards dictatorship. Parliament, as I have found it, is like a very fine club the members of which are married to rich wives. They talk big about what they are going to do, but when they get home they are told what they are to do. So it is here. We talk very big before an election. We are going to issue currency and credit in terms of public need. We are going to fight the money power. We are to do I don't know what else, but we have not done very much. I do not blame one side of the house more than the other. The fact is that neither side can do anything until parliament regains control of the issue of currency and credit. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) can shake his head—

Mr. DUNNING: We have control of it right here. That is why I shake my head.

Mr. JAQUES: I am delighted to hear that we have control of it, in which case there is no reason why the figure of sixty-five years could not be reduced to sixty years.

Mr. DUNNING: Why not to ten?

Mr. JAQUES: There is no need of that.

Mr. DUNNING: You are fifty-eight now.

Mr. JAQUES: Quite right, and in two more years I would be eligible. But we have this problem. It is admitted by the commission that thousands, and I think hundreds of thousands, of people can never hope for gainful employment in spite of the improvement in the financial figures. Employment does not seem to show a great deal of improvement. There are hundreds of thousands of people out of work in Canada. There is the problem, and it has to be solved in some way. It is not my place to tell ministers of the crown how to finance the thing, but I suggest that the interests of those old people, most of whom have lifetimes of work behind them, should be placed before the interests of the few people who control finance. Believe me, this knowledge about finance is spreading. You cannot hoodwink the people all the time and, as Mr. Hawtrey says, when this casual sequence begins to be understood, things will be different. It is beginning to be understood now; make no mistake about that. Alberta proved it, and do not think that if the provincial government of Alberta is blocked, that is going to be the end of it. Those ideas are spreading all over the world, wherever liberty still remains; and if we want to preserve what liberty we have; if we want to preserve parliamentary government as we know it, then parliament cannot remain in the power of finance, as it certainly is to-day.

[Mr. Jaques.]

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I believe the whole house is grateful indeed for the opportunity that has been afforded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) to discuss this important question, which goes very deep into the social activities of any country, and more particularly Canada. I was glad also to notice that not one of the previous speakers has decried this debate on the ground that we have been wasting the time of the house. I heard that remark made on several occasions previously; for instance, it was made with regard to the discussion on the flag. No time is wasted when we discuss some national, important problem which affects every constituency in this country. Again I say sincerely that I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North should be complimented by all parties in this house upon having given us an opportunity of discussing the all important problem of old age pensions.

(Translation) I wish also to offer my sincere congratulations to the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Wermenlinger) for the speech he delivered a few moments ago. One or two points of his speech, however, I should like him to explain. He stated that when this matter was discussed a few years ago members of the house had been called communists or socialists because they had declared themselves in favour of the resolution of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps). As far as I am concerned, I followed this discussion very carefully a few years ago, and I heard no such accusation made from any side of the house.

The hon. member for Verdun also said that those who had opposed the resolution a few years ago had stated that to lower the pensionable age limit would be to encourage laziness. Once again, I must plead ignorance, for I never heard any member of this house make any such statement.

The hon. member stated also—I do not know how serious he was—that it would be possible to effect a saving by reducing the expenses of the Rowell commission. I do not suppose that the hon. member meant to say that this expenditure is entirely useless. As for me—and I think that in this I faithfully reflect the feeling of my constituents—I am convinced that the appointment of the Rowell commission last autumn was one of the best moves the dominion government ever made. Those who followed the history of this country throughout the last fifteen years could hear murmurs from the Atlantic to the Pacific. In Ontario, part of which I have the honour to represent, there was almost open talk of secession. I grant that such a movement did not go very deep. However, murmurs of it reached Ottawa. The same thing happened in Quebec, in the western provinces and in the maritime provinces. The hour had come when the dominion government was in duty bound to appoint a commission which would visit the various provinces and hear the grievances of each part of the country presented in an orderly manner. That was not all. The out-and-out advocates of local autonomy who, in many cases, aimed at the destruction of national life, would find themselves there in a forum where they necessarily had to be impartial and reasonable. Why, Mr. Speaker? Because the moment they appear before the Rowell commission their statements are given wide publicity from one end of the country to the other, and any false reasoning on their part subjects them to ridicule. Did we not see last autumn alliances formed in some parts of the country with the object of combating the actions of the federal government? I repeat, the present administration deserves the congratulations of the Canadian people for having created the Rowell commission which is seeking the solution of the serious problems now facing this country.

The hon. member for Verdun deemed it logical—I shall not discuss the point—to seek from a national lottery the money required to lower the age limit for old-age pensions. He alluded to a bill to this effect submitted by a Montreal city member and to the problem that will be discussed on the second reading of this bill. Mr. Speaker, it would take at least fifty lotteries to solve all the financial problems with which the country is faced and to supply the funds required for all the social institutions we should like to establish in Canada, and I would not be in favour of establishing lotteries on so large a scale.

(Text) No one could have any quarrel with the resolution. Generally speaking, no one has any quarrel with the solution of the old age pension problem. Providing for the old people was a necessity which was perhaps long overdue. But first things must come first and, Mr. Speaker, this is the forum in which we should speak our own minds sincerely and honestly. I state deliberately that first of all, in its full integrity, we must apply the present old age pension system.

I could refer to dozens of cases, and give positive facts showing a misuse of old age pensions. I shall cite one typical case. Prior to 1930 a farmer from a point north of Cochrane—if necessary I shall give the name—asked me if he would get an old age pension. I said that he would not. I told him he could not get it and he was not entitled to it because he was a well-to-do farmer and could live on his income. I added that his son owed obligations to him, and that as a result he and his wife would be looked after for the rest of their days. But my opponent promised the man that if he would vote for him the pension would be given—and he got it. I say that man should not have received a pension.

We have had several of those cases. The provincial government in Ontario sent out a questionnaire to pensioners in that province, asking the exact facts in each case. In some instances it appears that the pension worked to the detriment of the people who received it. I do not wish to be misquoted, and hasten to state that I am absolutely in favour of the principle of old age pensions; but I must repeat that there is so much abuse of the system now in use that I am in favour of applying the principle universally, and giving the old age pension to all persons over seventy years. That would do away with many of the false statements and the injustices which now exist. If investigations were made in connection with some applications which have been granted, some people would find themselves in gaol, and against the principle of of the act. These are conditions which we must avoid. We must have the interest not only of parliament, but of the people who receive money from a provincial or federal treasury. I have seen so many strange things going on in that regard that in order to improve our Canadian life, I would be in favour of universal application of old age pensions.

Possibly I should point out some of the pertinent facts. There can be no doubt in the mind of any parliamentarian, whether he be in a provincial or a federal house, that conditions are changing rapidly; that there are evolutionary changes in many respects, and that there are more and more social activities in the different provinces. May I set out some of the figures supplied for the year 1936, indicating social improvement activities. In Ontario, where old age pensions, mothers' allowances and other matters of the kind are administered by the Department of Public Welfare, 120,000 Ontarians look to that department for their monthly cheques. I speak only of provincial activities, and I do not include in these figures pensions given by the federal and the provincial governments to civil servants. I do not include pensions given to veterans from the federal treasury, but speak only of the provincial field. So when someone says we are not running very fast, I say that we are walking very steadily, at least in some directions.

In 1936 there were in Ontario more than 56,000 old age pensioners, and the number is increasing at the rate of 2,500 a year. At the present time in Ontario there are 60,000 old age pensioners. Before we applied the principle of old age pensions to Ontario, a survey was made by government officials, and it was shown that the maximum number of pensions sought in Ontario stood at 25,000. When we see the number now given one realizes that it is impossible to have any accurate figures beforehand in connection with the application of social activities.

I believe every citizen in Canada was proud to learn that pensions were to be given to the blind. In Ontario, because of the addition of that group, 3,000 to 4,000 new pensioners were added to the list. I say this was a worthy national investment, and I know there was not a single word of criticism with respect to it from any part of Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was stating how appreciative I was of this opportunity to discuss this resolution. I had said that I was not in favour of lowering the present age limit of seventy years until such time as all the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act had been implemented, and for other reasons which I shall enumerate in a few moments. I was also outlining the different social activities of the province of Ontario. Being used in conjunction with the Old Age Pensions Act we have the Parents' Maintenance Act, an act which in my opinion is absolutely impossible of application. There is an old proverb which says that you cannot whip a dog to hunt, and the same thing applies to certain young people who do not want to help their old folks. It is too bad that the fourth commandment cannot be implemented fully, because in keeping this commandment the young people of both sexes would be greatly blessed. However, I must admit that there have come before the tribunals in my section of the country cases where young people have absolutely refused to help their old parents and cannot be compelled by the law to do so.

We have the Mothers' Allowance Act which is functioning well in Ontario. In 1936 there were in the province 11,500 mothers as well as 30,000 children, receiving help under this act. There is also the Neglected Children's Act under which fifty-four children's aid societies operate. These societies are given the power to interfere with the manner in which children are being brought up. Any one at all familiar with the administration of this act realizes the good that has been accomplished. A total of 23,500 cases were dealt with; 1,000 children were made wards and 850 others were adopted into better families.

We also have the Unmarried Parents' Act, under which 2,500 cases were dealt with last year. The province also maintains three industrial and two training schools where the idea is not to punish but to recreate and send the children back to society after they have mended their ways. This is brought about by providing the proper education in the right environment. I shall not mention the hospitalization which is carried on under provincial administration, the public health work, the tuberculosis sanataria and the asylums. I believe Ontario was the first province to intimate that it was in favour of the principle of unemployment insurance. As soon as the legislation is passed by the central government, it will be applied in the province.

We do not want to remain in one place; we want to keep moving forward; but in considering these social activities there are always financial responsibilities which must be considered. I shall deal with these in a moment. At this time I should like to compliment the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) on what she said this afternoon. Before the present old age pension age limit is lowered, I should like to see all those unable to work, through either disability or other causes, receiving sufficient compensation from the government—not to be wards of the government—to make it possible for them at least to keep body and soul together. I believe this was mentioned in the reports issued by the employment commission last year. Any civilized country should find it possible to pension off those who are unable to work and this pension should be granted regardless of age or sex.

I listened attentively this afternoon to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). The hon. member referred to the fact that machinery was replacing more and more men. He must believe implicitly in the theories of the technocrats. That statement may be true if applied to a particular industry, and there is no doubt that in the last twenty years many men have been replaced by machinery. The only solution of the problem that this creates is shortening the hours of labour. I well remember the agitation which was carried on in the early days of the silver mining section of Cobalt. I was working with the labour leaders, and I can remember how we used to talk in terms of an eight hour day. Some thought we would never see that in our generation, but to-day it is an accomplished fact. With the highly mechanized state of our industry I do not think the time is far distant when we shall have the six hour day principle applied to the industries of this country.

The replacement of men by machines has not been as great as one might be inclined to believe, and it has created a great deal of employment. The fact is that these machines must be created and maintained in operation. The great automobile industry is an example of this. The automobile is a modern invention and no one will say that it was a bad thing for mankind, and that it has not created employment. The same thing is demonstrated by the telephone. In this country, in the United States and in all other countries that use this modern invention, employment is given to tens of thousands of people. In these instances machinery has not entirely replaced the human factor. The same applies to the telegraph and to the radio. We have at least 10,000 people who are directly occupied to-day with radio activities. The same applies to wireless, to aviation and to mining.

The section of the country which I have the honour to represent, the Porcupine district of Ontario, would never have been developed to its present state were it not for the heavy machinery which permitted boring to great depths through the solid rock. A single ounce of gold would never have been produced with the old equipment. There is very little placer gold in this country. The same thing may be said of our other heavy industries. We must not overlook the development of our water powers which has meant so much to Canada. This has been possible because of the machines available. We must be careful and not paint a sad picture by saying that machinery is replacing men to such an extent as to upset our civilization.

These machines must be invented; they must be built, and they must be maintained. Anyone familiar with the fast pace of our industrial life will realize that to-day the average life of a machine is not more than seven or eight years. Not only must these machines be rebuilt, but in many cases they must be replaced entirely. These are matters that should be remembered when discussing this question. We talk in broad terms about the wonderful natural resources of this country, but we must not forget that all these resources were here a thousand years ago. They were here before the shores of the St. Lawrence were colonized by France and before the country was conquered by the British.

These natural resources were not developed. There is only one factor which brought them to development, and that again was the human one. We must be very careful in our statements on this matter. What we have here in the way of natural resources we have to work and fight for. The climatic conditions of Canada are very severe. Sometimes we speak of the wonderful areas which belong to us. It is true that this country is of tremendous size, but some of our great open spaces will be "open" till the end of time. It is very easy to make appeals on a basis of this kind to the passions of the people; but I repeat that it is true of my own province of Ontario and many other sections that our resources are not unlimited, and such as exist must be developed by the human factor, by human labour and inventiveness.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques), speaking to-day of the increased expenditures in which the implementation of this resolution would involve the government, remarked that the matter was subject to the question of financing it but that that should be a secondary consideration. Well, though I am a great optimist I am not as optimistic as all that. I have been in the house for a good many years. When I first came to this chamber the finance minister was the late lamented Hon. Mr. Robb. He was a minister of vision and ability, but even in those so-called boom years he had some financial worries. Later on he was replaced by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). Then we had a change of government and for a year or two the portfolio was held by the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), and later by the present Senator Rhodes. Then the government changed, and again the position is held by the present occupant. The men who hold that difficult position must be realists; they cannot afford to experiment to any great extent with the finances of the country. It is not their money; it is public finance, the money of the people.

It has often struck me as significant that these men are not prepared to take the easy way, according to some theorists here. How much simpler it would be, for instance, to start a printing press and to cover the cost of the pensions of great war veterans by issuing at one stroke some fifty-two millions of dollars, or to print another fifty millions of dollars to cover the deficits on the Canadian National Railways, or to meet interest charges. That would be the easy way, let me say in all sincerity to the Minister of Finance, to preserve his health and avoid worry; apparently all he has to do is to get the printing press going over night and tomorrow we should all have a lot of brand new bills of the Bank of Canada, covering all administration expenditures. I myself could do with a few. But we are realists; we are members of parliament sent here by our constituents to deal in a logical way with the problems of this country. Surely past and present ministers of finance, who must know the financial system of this country and the monetary systems of the world, and who no doubt suffer sleepless nights because of the requests made upon their department, that they cannot implement, would be much happier men if, upon the discussion of a resolution such as this, they could say to you, Mr. Speaker, "I am not satisfied to leave the pensionable age at sixty-five years; I am going to reduce it to fifty years and to pay forty dollars a month instead of twenty." That would be a wonderful statement, even politically speaking, for a minister to be able to make. It would be much easier for me to be reelected if the present minister could do so.

But again we must face the situation as it is. It is fine to be a theorist about the monetary system; it is pleasant to talk of a coming day when the government will be such a wonderful Santa Claus that everything we require from it will be granted. I have no personal grievance against the Social Credit group. But let me examine their position as it might affect our province. Taking the minimum sum they promised during the last election, and applying it to my own riding, if the fifty thousand adults there were to get twenty-five dollars a month each there would be $1,250,000 per month for my constituency. Multiply that by the twelve months of the year, and you have an annual distribution of $15,000,000 in my constituency to adults alone. There is no doubt that that would be greatly welcomed and rapidly spent. But enlarge the field; apply the principle to the whole of Canada, and multiply the sum of $15,000,000 by 245 ridings; at the end of the year you would have distributed $3,675,000,000 to adults only. If you include the children, who would be entitled to some compensation, the amount would be not less than $4,500,000,000, and if you total these distributions for the life of the present parliament they would come to the enormous sum of $22,500,000,000.

Mr. KUHL: Is it physically possible?

Mr. BRADETTE: It is physically impossible. We talk of priming the financial pump—

Mr. KUHL: Are the goods and the services there?

Mr. BRADETTE: The inflation would be over twenty-two billions of dollars. We must realize what that would mean. The dollars in our own pockets which now have some value would then have no value whatever; you could not exchange them for the value of the printed matter there is on them. We must be practical in dealing with such matters, because they are important. I am not going to argue that the present monetary system is absolutely perfect; it is far from it. I believe it should be amended from year to year, and that it should be possible for us to achieve a better relation between production and distribution. The age of need must have disappeared; we have demonstrated that to some extent by the surpluses of all kinds which we have had. But let us not fool ourselves on that account. In this country we may have surpluses of wheat and some other grains; but we have not a surplus of all the commodities required, and so we have to exchange with other nations such surpluses as we have for the goods we require from them. People talk of priming the financial pump. To issue currency in the manner that has been suggested would not be "priming"; we should strike such a huge undercurrent stream that we would have the biggest flood in phony money which has ever been known since that first flood which covered the whole world.

These are considerations we must keep in mind when we discuss the problems of this country. It is easy to make in this chamber proposals which we must know are absolutely impossible of application. I wish it were possible that some hon. members had to undertake for a month or so the responsibilities of the Minister of Finance, and to learn from experience the impossibility of implementing all the requests that are made.

I shall, however, make this observation, that I sincerely believe if ever inflation is carried out by any government, it will be for the enlargement of the social activities of the state, to help the sick and the old and the blind, and that is the very best purpose to which it could be applied.

Mr. KUHL: What is inflation?

Mr. BRADETTE: Well, I am not going to theorize on that point. We had an example of it during the war. But I would like hon. members to realize that nowhere in this world, under any circumstances, can you get something for nothing.

Mr. KUHL: Is there inflation in England now?

Mr. BRADETTE: That is a philosophy which has been with us ever since the birth of time, and we cannot get away from it.

Mr. KUHL: Have they inflation in Britain now?

Mr. BRADETTE: It is inflation in this sense, that the government has perfect control of it.

Mr. KUHL: Would you be in favour of controlled inflation?

Mr. BRADETTE: Controlled, yes. But nobody will make me believe that the redistribution in this country in four or five years of $22,500,000,000 of new money would be a solution of the problems we are facing at the present time.

I do not want to enlarge too much on this question, but I come to the statement made by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce that there are in our midst many people who will never be able to do a good day's work. Undoubtedly we have a great number of unemployed, young and old, but old age is only relative. When we speak of providing a pension for people of sixty-five we must realize that it would not be satisfactory to some people of that age to be pensioned off. I believe it was the present leader of the opposition who, during the election of 1935, said he was going to pension people at the age of fifty. How many members of this chamber would care to be retired at the age of fifty? I know many men who can do a good day's work at a much greater age; I could cite many instances of farmers of sixty and over who can still do a better day's work than some men of twenty or thirty. Old age is only relative, and I would not make the pensionable age lower than it is now until such time as we fully implemented the provisions of the existing act. I have referred to some of the abuses, and I hope some hon. members will enlarge on that.

Again I say, let us be realists as far as possible. After all, governmental expenditures are made under a capitalist system; the present system of government is based upon that principle. I do not believe that any one in this house would want to have governmental capitalism such as they have in Russia. There might be some improvement in old age pensions under such a system; but I would ask anyone who advocates such a system, Does he realize the cost of government in human blood and human misery where that system prevails? I am sure no one wants those things in Canada; no one wants them under our British institutions. If ever the day comes when any of the parties sitting to the left of the speaker should form a government, and if I happen to be sitting in the opposition then, I shall be as fair to them as I want them to be to the government to-day. Well, what is being advocated now? It has been said over and over again that if we had another war it would be possible to finance it. I make this prophecy, that if there were another war Canada would not have provoked it nor would Canada be on the offensive. Canada did not want the war of 1914, and there is not a single member who could criticize our attitude from 1914 to 1918.

We want to solve the problem which we are discussing to-night, just as we want to solve all the problems that face the dominion to-day, because we do not want to see anybody in our constituencies suffer. We want to see people enter into the more abundant life and be engaged in fruitful occupations, and we want to see something done for the youth of the country. I, for one, do not want to see military service in Canada such as they have in Europe. I wonder whether hon. members have pondered the statement made by Hitler some three years ago when France was alarmed at the discovery that a million young Germans were being conscripted for the army. What did Hitler say? To appease France, he said that these men were simply being taken out of the ranks of the unemployed. Surely we do not want two or three hundred thousand young Canadians given employment by this means; we do not want to have them similarly conscripted for military service. There are great undertakings ahead of us in Canada such as reforestation and the development of agriculture. There are a hundred and one ways of employing the youth of the country without adopting any policy such as we see in Europe.

If it were possible, I should like to see the age limit lowered to sixty-five, but I believe that the mover of the resolution is just as fully aware of the difficulties as the rest of us in this house are. He is a humanitarian and he suffers with those who suffer. Just as we all feel in this matter, he wants them to be happy and to live the fuller life, and for that reason, in view of the difficulties which lie in the path of the proposal that he has made, I hope he will find it possible to withdraw his resolution.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I understand that quite a number of members desire to speak on the resolution, and I wish to take this opportunity of putting before the house the point of view of the government in connection with it.

Speaking for myself, no resolution which comes before the house strikes a closer chord of sympathy than the one now under discussion. The subject is one with which I am concerned in an administrative way as the officer of the government who must deal with the provinces with regard to the matter, and consequently from day to day, throughout the year, I hear much in the way of criticism of the present system, both of its shortcomings from the point of view of social service and also of the abuses which are alleged in all provinces to have crept into the administration of it.

An hon. MEMBER: All provinces?

Mr. DUNNING: I believe all provinces, yes. There have come from all provinces, in some cases in greater volume than in others, allegations of abuse of the principle of the old age pension system. Neither the shortcomings nor the abuses, however, should deter this parliament from considering forward steps in connection with social legislation of such importance. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) on this occasion has framed his resolution much more cleverly, if I may say so, than formerly. He has framed it in such a way that it is very difficult for any member of the house to express dissent from the object sought. But I wish to analyse it for a few moments.

Leaving aside the preamble, which does not very much matter except as an introduction to the resolution itself, the motion reads:

> Therefore, be it resolved,—that this house would welcome a government declaration of policy that would bring about an immediate lowering of the present pensionable age limit of seventy years, the effect of such being that the older generation would retire from industrial activity, thereby creating opportunities for the younger generation to be usefully and gainfully employed.

Why not a resolution that this house would welcome a government declaration of policy that would bring about a sufficiency of rain in the western prairies? My hon. friend treats the subject, and not quite innocently, as if a government declaration of policy in this house could effectuate the object which his resolution seeks. That is not the case—yes, there is one form of government declaration of policy in this house which might bring it about; and I am speaking now to the trustees of the Canadian people when I put it to them. There is one form of declaration which might effect the result, and that is for this government, representing this parliament, to express the willingness of the national parliament of Canada as a whole to take over all of the additional cost which would be represented by lowering the pensionable age from seventy to some other point—the resolution does not determine the point, but the mover says sixty-five and some others say sixty. It is possible that the provinces of Canada would agree, provided the government of the dominion agreed to assume all of the cost represented by the lowering of the pensionable age to whatever point might be decided upon.

[Mr. Dunning.]

In so far as the present old age pension scheme is concerned, I do not think there is much chance of getting all of the nine provinces to agree to bear their share of what would be represented by the additional cost to both dominion and provinces of making the change which is advocated. We sometimes lose sight of the fact that when this dominion parliament decided that we should have a dominion-wide old age pension scheme, we could only decide to do that provided the provinces in the exercise of their exclusive constitutional authority with respect to the matter would enter into partnership with us. And they did—slowly. The last province of the nine came in only about two years ago; Quebec came in in 1936, I think. We are in no position to force old age pensions upon any province in Canada. We are in the position of contributing as the national entity towards something which is constitutionally a provincial responsibility.

I sometimes question the wisdom in the long run of these extra-constitutional financial arrangements between the dominion on the one hand and the provinces on the other. The old age pension scheme has been an excellent illustration, throughout the years of its operation, of the difficulties which are inherent in the system of evading our constitution by means of agreements between the dominion on the one hand and each one of the nine provinces separately on the other. We agreed first upon what might be called the skeleton of the scheme. In order to qualify for the assistance offered by the dominion a province engaged to enact a certain type of old age pension legislation to fit into the general national scheme. I wonder whether the house realizes how difficult it is in those circumstances to secure reasonable uniformity in administration from one end of Canada to the other; how particularly difficult it is, after having secured agreement upon the initial legislation which the provinces shall enact, and when as a result of experience it becomes clear that amendments are necessary, to get each one of the nine provinces to agree upon the nature and scope of those necessary amendments; and how impossible it is to work a dominion-provincial agreement if one province or one group of provinces is legislating along a different line from the other eight, or two from the other seven, or three from the other six.

During the two years since this government came into office, I have had the experience of endeavouring to deal with this problem, concluding with a conference of the nine provinces last fall in an endeavour—I think a sincere endeavour on the part of all—to accomplish two things; to remove, on the one hand those anomalies in the regulations which had the effect of depriving really deserving persons of the benefit of the act, and, on the other, those weaknesses in the regulations which made possible abuses in the payment of pensions to persons whom neither this parliament nor the legislatures really intended should receive the benefits of the legislation. I am bound to say that after we had wrestled with the matter for the best part of a week a greater degree of unanimity became manifest than I had ever before experienced in a dominion-provincial conference, and as a result I think there is a considerable improvement in the administration of the Old Age Pensions Act.

I am convinced, however, that you cannot have the maximum of efficiency and of fairness in the administration of an old age pension scheme administered as this one is by each of nine provinces operating within the scope of its own sole jurisdiction, and the dominion government putting up seventy-five per cent of what they spend for old age pensions, with the right of audit but with no right to interfere with the manner in which the province is administering its own law. So I say again the experience with old age pensions does not encourage me to believe that the path of concurrent legislation as between each of nine provinces on the one hand and the dominion on the other is a desirable way to tackle our social problems. I refer to it particularly in relation to social problems because it is in the field of social legislation that the principal difficulty exists in connection with our provincial-federal constitution. In the field of labour legislation and social legislation generally our constitution as it stands at present imposes most of the obligation upon the provinces or upon such creatures as the provinces may create in the form of municipalities or other institutions to carry out that obligation. I shall before concluding make a few suggestions along that line looking to the future; but in the meantime I want to look realistically at the side of the picture which the Minister of Finance must look at, that of the cost of any proposal of magnitude which comes before the house. When I speak of cost in this connection I mean cost in terms of money which is generally acceptable, money which we are all willing to accept at one hundred cents on the dollar. I am not discussing to-night any other kind of money than that which is in my pocket and, I assume, in the pockets of everyone else here. I know from experience that the people receiving old age pensions expect to receive money which will be good from one end of Canada to the other. Therefore I shall not indulge my hon friends in the corner to-night by a discussion of the control of credit and currency in Canada.

Mr. QUELCH: We have that now.

Mr. DUNNING: I hope on some future occasion, if opportunity serves and hon. members will give me sufficient time, to demonstrate to the house that this parliament through instruments which it has created and which are now in operation does control currency and credit in Canada day by day, week by week and month by month. The only question is whether the proper methods of control of credit and currency are being used by the instruments which this parliament has created and which are under its own control for that purpose. On some future occasion I shall attempt to demonstrate that this function is being performed by the instruments which parliament created for the purpose, and that the control is real and continuous. My hon. friends in the corner will then have an opportunity—I am sure they want it—to tell us what their kind of money really is and how their control of credit and currency would function.

For my own part I find it difficult to understand any scheme for giving money or its equivalent to any part of the Canadian people without taking money or its equivalent in equal measure from the rest of the Canadian people. You may describe wealth in any terms you like, Mr. Speaker, but you cannot change that principle. At the present time in our economy, if we want to redistribute wealth—and in measure any old age pension scheme is a redistribution of wealth—we have one method whereby we can secure the wherewithal to do it. That is to tax all of the people in order to be able to give the proceeds of that taxation to some of the people. That is a very well recognized method, and if there is any more painless method which can be suggested by my hon. friends in the corner I am willing to sit at their feet and learn. But I must say that after reading all of their literature I have come to the conclusion that it merely involves calling things by different names and multiplying them. However, there will be a further opportunity to discuss that matter, I am sure, and I know my hon. friends well enough to know that they will welcome it just as much as I will.

Now, what will this cost, in terms of cost that are understandable to all of us. Our hon. friends of the social credit group have an advantage over the rest of us. They can understand quite easily what we mean in terms of cost; they function under the same system as we do; but all the rest of us find it very difficult to understand what they mean in terms of cost. So let it be understood that what I am speaking of to-night when I speak of cost is in terms of cost in Canadian dollars accepted by the Canadian people as being capable of buying a dollar's worth from Halifax to Vancouver.

If we assume that the hon. member for Winnipeg North means by his resolution a reduction of the qualifying age to sixty-five—the resolution does not say that, but in his address my hon. friend indicated that this was what was in his mind, although I am quite sure that he would regard it as only a first step—then what would be the cost? And in this connection it must be remembered that the cost to the dominion for the coming fiscal year under the present old age pension scheme will be about $30,000,000. At the present time there are 175,000 persons receiving old age pensions in Canada. It is estimated that this number will be 177,000 by the beginning of the next fiscal year, on April 1. If we move the age limit from seventy to sixty-five, the total cost of old age pensions to the dominion alone for the next fiscal year will be over $48,000,000. It will be understood, Mr. Speaker, that in these figures I am not including the share of the provinces. It is necessary to add twenty-five per cent to the figures I have given as the dominion cost in order to arrive at the total cost to the country.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Does that take into consideration those who will come in during the next fiscal year who are not in now, or is that on the basis of those now receiving pensions?

Mr. DUNNING: The estimate of $30,000,000 for the next fiscal year is on the basis of what it is estimated will be the number during that year.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Not the number now?

Mr. DUNNING: The number now, as I indicated, is 175,000, and we are estimating 177,000 for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. HEAPS: On what percentage is the minister basing his figure? He stated this afternoon that approximately fifty per cent of those at present over seventy years of age are in receipt of old age pensions.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit, after I get through with this point I shall give the percentages receiving old age pensions in each of the provinces of Canada, but I would rather finish the financial statement first. That is clear, Mr. Speaker. If we lower the age to sixty-five years, it is estimated that the cost to the dominion for the next fiscal year would be $48,000,000. If we lowered it to sixty years, the cost to the dominion during the next fiscal year alone would be $71,646,000.

We have to look to the future in connection with this matter of old age pensions from the cost point of view, and in this connection it must be remembered that the number of those seventy and over, according to the best estimates, will steadily increase during at least the next thirty years, the reason being that a large portion of our population came here as adults, or at least a large portion of our population being immigrants and not being born here, the number of old people will tend to increase for a considerable period of years to come. A study of different age groups in the last census returns of Canada will confirm this tendency. These figures of population have been carefully studied in relation to the number of those seventy and over who might be reasonably expected to be old age pensioners, judging by the experience we have had up to date. Thus we find that even on the basis of the present qualifying age of seventy, and on the basis of the payments presently being made, it is anticipated that the cost of pensions to the dominion in 1941, aside from administrative costs, will be $46,300,000; in 1951, $62,000,000; in 1961, $82,200,000 and in 1971, $92,800,000 without adding to the amount of pension and without reducing the qualifying age.

Mr. LAWSON: Those figures are based on age seventy?

Mr. DUNNING: They are based on age seventy and upon the average amount of pensions now being paid to the proportion of people over seventy, in each of the years which I have named, the same proportion of those now over seventy as are receiving pensions. That is a little complex, but I think I have made it fairly clear.

Just here I should like to remind the house once again that a declaration of policy by the government, as requested by the resolution, implies, I think, that the provinces would continue the proportion they are now paying. I doubt very much if many of the provinces would be able financially, at present at any rate, to stand the increased amount which would be required of them to make up their twenty-five per cent of what would be involved in such an increase. I know that a number of the provinces are having their difficulties to-day in carrying successfully the twenty-five per cent they are obligated to pay under the present agreements between the dominion and those provinces.

Mr. BAKER: Very likely the dominion government will have to give them the money with which to pay.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no doubt that every one of the provinces would welcome a declaration by the dominion that it would pay the whole of the added cost. I am reasonably sure none of them would welcome any other kind of declaration of policy.

I wonder if there is not, at least to some extent, a fallacy in that part of the resolution which assumes that the lowering of the pensionable age would increase the degree of employment opportunity for youth. Other speakers have touched upon that point. My own experience with men in industry who can retire on pensions associated with that industry, or people who could retire on pensions associated with the civil service, is that those people are most reluctant to retire on pension. The great proportion of them wish to continue working. Even those who in a great many instances would be practically as well off on pension as they are working, prefer to keep on working. How often have we heard it said that a man apparently in the full vigour of his late manhood, has retired, expecting to enjoy life for a number of years, but somehow or another he has not lived very long?

Many of us, I am sure, have had friends who retired expecting to enjoy to the full the later years in their lives, but who, because of losing the incentive, and because of losing the joy of work—because work is not a curse; it is a blessing—have found that instead of prolonging their lives have, in all too many instances, shortened them. To that extent I think there is a fallacy at least in degree in the latter part of the resolution.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister is talking about white collar workers, not manual workers.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, manual workers, positively. I am speaking about manual workers; that has been my experience with them in industry.

Mr. SPENCE: Manual workers even more so.

Mr. DUNNING: Ask the executives of the great railways, which have pension schemes, how the men do their best to stay on, in some capacity or another, rather than go on pension.

I promised the hon. member for Winnipeg North that I would give him some information concerning the present percentage of those on old age pensions in the various provinces. The following table will set out the percentage of persons over seventy years of age who are in receipt of old age pensions:

	Per cent
Alberta	54·19
British Columbia	42·81
Manitoba	53·90
New Brunswick	61·23
Nova Scotia	51·53
Ontario	35·50
Prince Edward Island	31·22
Quebec	41·16
Saskatchewan	53·18
Northwest Territories	7·

Quebec appears to have done fairly well in the shorter time in which the scheme has operated in that province. Then, the figure for the Northwest Territories is scarcely a comparable one.

Mr. MALLETTE: Would the minister kindly state who supplied the figures for Quebec?

Mr. DUNNING: They are our own calculations, from the Quebec records.

I do not intend to take up much more time, but I should like to indicate what I sincerely believe ought to be our objective and our course with respect to the problem of old age pensions.

Mr. HEAPS: I asked the minister to give the house the figures on which he was making his estimate as to the increased cost involved in a change from seventy to sixty-five years.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not quite understand the hon. member.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister took as a basis that approximately fifty per cent of those over seventy were receiving pensions.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Would he say there would be about the same percentage between the years sixty-five and seventy who would be entitled to pension?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, the same proportion. The experience in other countries has been our guide in that regard.

In conclusion, I should like to give the house an indication of what I believe our objective should be with regard to old age pensions, and also some idea of the course I think we should pursue in attaining that objective. In the first place, experience in operating this type of social legislation, from the dominion point of view, convinces me that we should look towards a national scheme of old age pensions, nationally administered. I am convinced, in the second place, that the British system of making the lowering of the age limit contingent upon the contributory feature is a sound objective to pursue, and that we should look in that direction. Indeed, I am one who believes that there is no limit to what can be worked out in the direction of lowering the age limit, provided we had a national scheme, nationally administered, and provided that the period below seventy years was made definitely contributory.

I think the experience of the British scheme gives us considerable data to work upon in that regard, and I believe that broadly our objective should be, as I have just stated, ultimately to reach a place where we would have a national scheme of old age pensions, nationally administered, and with the contributory feature prominently associated with any ages lower than the age of seventy, which is the present qualifying limit. I shall not attempt to go into further detail along that line. It would require quite a little time, but I believe that these objectives are sound.

Now, as to the course which should be taken to attain them. As I indicated at the opening of my remarks, at the present time we are in the position of not having legislative jurisdiction with respect to this matter. There are high constitutional authorities in this house of parliament who take the view that it is doubtful if we have the constitutional authority to pay the seventy-five per cent which we are now paying to the provinces. That view has been expressed on more than one occasion in this house and while I do not hold with it, at least it gives an indication of the difficulty surrounding the attainment of the national objectives which I have just described.

Therefore, we must somehow reach a place where the constitutional authority in the matter is beyond question, where this parliament can set up an old age pensions scheme of a type it deems to be desirable and also have the power to administer. When I say that, it must be remembered that I am not unmindful of the extra cost to the dominion that would be involved or of the fact that if this parliament assumes a burden which the constitution presently places upon the provinces, then this parliament must receive access to fields of taxation, sufficient to enable it to meet the added costs in a national way. If we undertake greater national responsibility, then we must have wider national fields from which to derive the revenues necessary to maintain those national responsibilities and national institutions.

My hope is that out of the investigation now being carried on by the Rowell commission into the financial relationships of our confederation there may gradually grow up an appreciation of those services which are essentially national, on the one hand, and those services which are essentially provincial and local, on the other, and that out of it there may come an agreement that we must have a readjustment, not only of the burden of function but also of the ability to secure from the Canadian people the wherewithal to discharge that function.

I congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North upon having brought forward this matter once more in the manner he has. I think the debate has been constructive thus far and I am not intending to close it. However, I did want to put before the house the viewpoint of the government based upon the experience we have had and also the hope of the government for the future with respect to the solution of this problem. I believe we would be hindering rather than helping the ultimate solution by plunging in the direction the hon. member for Winnipeg North desires us to plunge.

Mrs. MARTHA LOUISE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I do not think anyone in the house can fail to be most sympathetic with this resolution. While the resolution does not specify the granting of an old age pension at the age of sixty-five years, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) has specified that as the age at which a pension should be granted. We all know that there are men and women of thirty-five years of age who through physical disability are perhaps older than other men and women of seventy or seventy-five years. We are not all constituted the same and we cannot all stand the same degree of work or anxiety. Eventually I dare say that this will be the age when these old age pensions will be granted.

I quite agree with the hon. minister who has just spoken when he says that any self-respecting man or woman would far rather work, no matter how difficult it may be, than have to rely upon a pension. If I had my health and strength I would not thank anybody for giving me a pension as long as I could earn enough to support myself. I do not agree with hon. members who say that the children should support their parents. We know that the great majority of children are ready to help their parents if it is at all possible, but after all these young people must make their way; they have their own children to educate, to feed and to clothe, and it is difficult for an older person to have to live on the bounty of his children or to have to live with the children or grandchildren. It is not that one does not love these children or grandchildren, but the fact is it is much better that youth and old age should be separate.

As I advocated in the few remarks I made last year, I believe that the government should assume full responsibility for the payment of old age pensions. At the present time these pensions are administered by the nine different provinces. This government pays seventy-five per cent of the cost and yet does not have as much to say about the administration as the provinces that pay only twenty-five per cent. That is not just or fair. Of course there are chisellers, but in all walks of life you are going to find chisellers.

An hon. MEMBER: Even among members of parliament.

Mrs. BLACK: Do I hear "even among members of parliament"? That may be so, but I would not like to accuse the members in the far corner of being chisellers. I believe that one government should administer old age pensions. That would be more economical than the present method and there would be less danger of chiselling.

As I said before, some people of thirty-five years of age are as old as others at seventy or seventy-five years. The former member for the Yukon had a letter written to him not long ago by a man whom he had known in his early days in New Brunswick. This man said: "I think I am old enough to retire and you may be able to find out how old I am; I come from King's county and it may be possible that my birth certificate can be found." King's county was written to and the man's birth certificate was found and sent back. This man who thought he was old enough to retire discovered that he was eighty-three years of age.

Mr. DUNNING: He did not know it until then?

Mrs. BLACK: He did not know it until then. He thought he was around seventy years of age. When he discovered his real age, his friends were afraid that he would realize how old he was and become so exhausted that he would shortly pass away.

Of course I have always felt quite keenly about the administration of old age pensions in the Yukon. It is not a pension there; it is a dole. The Northwest Territories are administered directly by the federal government and the $20 per month is given as a dole, not as a pension. This is very irritating to self-respecting men or women. When they have paid taxes for perhaps forty or fifty years, they do not like having money handed out to them by the government, and have it called a dole instead of a pension. When Yukoners who have lived in the country for forty or fifty years feel that they want to retire, if they are able to work they do not get a pension. If they are unable to work they are given this so-called pension in the shape of a dole. If they say, "My family lives in Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia or one of the other provinces and I would like to go there where I could live near them and my former friends on $20 a month," do they get that amount of money? No. If they go to any one of the provinces and live there a year or two they will receive a dollar or two a month, and until they have lived in the province for twenty years they cannot get the pension. That is neither fair nor just. They could live much more comfortably on the outside, and there are former Yukoners in every province of this country who are suffering under that injustice and who have asked time after time that it be removed. They have been a credit to the Yukon territory and to Canada as a whole; so why in the name of justice should they not be allowed a pension when they have moved to some other part of Canada? I asked the government to consider the administration of old age pensions in the Yukon on exactly the same basis as they consider the administration of old age pensions in the Northwest Territories.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I agree with the remarks of the hon. lady member who has just sat down, as regards men living in the Yukon. I have come across instances of gross injustice due to the conditions to which she refers.

I propose to support this resolution, not only because I was pledged to it in the campaign, but because I have always been of that opinion. I see that I made a speech in this chamber in January, 1935, setting forward the proposal made this afternoon in almost the same terms.

The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has dealt fully and very fairly with the question of the increased cost. I accept his condition that it would be necessary, if we lowered the age, to put on a contributory basis that portion of it which applies to an age lower than seventy. I think that is the way it is managed in Britain; after seventy it is non-contributory, but between sixty-five and seventy it has to be contributory.

The minister held out—rather prominently, I thought—the bugbear that we could not get the provinces to agree to any further expenditure. That same argument was used here ten years ago, that the provinces would not come in; but we left the door open; we said, "You do not need to come in unless you like," and they all one by one came in, and I do not think they would wait so long on this occasion.

If the minister would allow me one other criticism, he did not give any weight to this fact, that a large amount of that increased old age pension would be paid to people who would otherwise be on relief, anyhow; they have to be kept; they are at our door; they are starving or at starvation point; we have to deal with them, and we do deal with them. Several of the provinces adopt what is now a popular idea; they say, "We have balanced the budget," and they add in a lower voice, "all except relief," which is two or three or five million dollars. But we have to meet that problem some time, and we might as well meet it—I think it is best that we should meet it—by giving a larger class of people old age pensions rather than by putting them on relief. A man of sixty-five may be willing and able to work; but he cannot get work, and there is only one alternative—relief. Is it not better to hand out national money in the form of an extended pension than by way of relief?

With any proposal to reduce the age, and indeed even though the minister cannot see his way to reduce the age at the present time, should go very definite steps towards putting on a fair basis the existing act and existing regulations. The act is all right so far as it goes. The regulations are not impossible, but it is the variety of contradictory and unfair interpretations which are put upon them by the various governing boards in the different provinces that make the trouble.

The minister has said, "We cannot compel the provinces to follow regulations that we suggest to them; we must get them to agree." The man who pays the piper can always set the tune. When we are paying seventy-five per cent of a given expenditure, it is always open to us in the future as in the past—we did it ten years ago—to say, "You will conform to these standard regulations as you have to conform to the standard act or you will not get anything." I believe the dominion government has very largely the power, if it chooses to exercise it, to effect a more uniform and more reasonable interpretation of the regulations. The minister dealt broadly with this, so I think it is pertinent to the subject to allude to what I frankly call the rotten interpretations which have been put upon the regulations not only in the province I come from but in other provinces. In British Columbia we have the Parents' Maintenance Act, which compels children to maintain their parents. Prior to some three or four years ago—they have now stopped the worst feature—the British Columbia managing board said to the old man or woman, "Go and sue your child or children. We will not give you any pension; we will not consider giving you any pension until you have produced an order from a competent court to say that the child is unable to support his parents." I have in my possession a letter in which they definitely say, "We will not give that man an old age pension unless he sues his child." I went and saw the child and found that he was living on six dollars a month relief. I admit that the British Columbia board has been shamed into abandoning that feature of their manoeuvres, but they are doing it just as badly in a roundabout way. They say, "Oh well, we are sorry, but the regulation now says we must take into account contributions by children." Here is the wording of it:

—which may reasonably be expected to be made by them.

Perfectly proper language, surely. But how do they interpret it? They interpret it in this way: They say, "This man has three children. He can reasonably expect to receive so much money from each of them. Therefore we will not give the old man (or woman) a pension." But somebody comes along and says, "Yes, but the children are not able to contribute. The son has a family of five children, and if he is not on relief he is drawing only a small wage. The second child is an invalid, and the third is on relief; therefore they are not able to support their parents." Obviously they cannot. But what does the board reply—and I have letters which confirm my statement—"We do not care anything about that. All we know is that this parent might 'reasonably be expected' to receive so much from that child, or those children, and therefore we will not give him a pension." They do not say any more, "Go and sue your child"; they simply leave it in that position, and the pension is withheld. They should grant the pension, and in the odd case of children able to support their parents and neglecting to do so, the board itself should sue the children.

I desire to touch on only some of the worst features. Another of the regulations is that in valuing the property of an applicant who does not have any income—if he receives any income he is, quite properly, charged with it—he shall be regarded as having an income equal to five per cent of its value. On the face of it that may seem just, but the way it works is extremely unjust. A lot of us in British Columbia bought land in the days when optimism was very flamboyant; we have the land and cannot pay taxes on it, and we get no income out of it; it is assessed at five times its market value. Suppose a man has some land like that, assessed at $3,000; five per cent on that is $150, and then there will be $50 of taxes to pay out. But the board says to that man, "You have an income of $150 from that land." The poor old man says, "But I have not; it is a source of loss to me; I have not been able to pay the taxes and I do not get one nickel from it." Nevertheless, the board says, "You have an income of $150." I know of many instances where that interpretation has prevented a person from getting a pension at all. You cannot live on theories and fictions. They say to that old man that he has a fictitious income of $150 and they expect him to live on that. Let anyone try it.

There is one feature of the matter, speaking of the British Columbia government, that I blame them wholly for, namely the way in which they have worked it out. The dominion government said that in valuing the land regard should be had to its assessed value or its market value, whichever is deemed the more equitable. Originally it did not say that; it spoke only of the assessed value. But it was found by experience that that was unfair. In Ontario it was found that the land was often worth more than the assessed value, so that it was changed to read the assessed value or the market value, whichever was deemed the more equitable. That is plain, and the British Columbia board refuses to obey the definite regulation. They will not take into consideration the provision, "whichever is the more equitable."

The real reason for the refusal is that they do not want to have the trouble involved, because if they took the market value they would have to make inquiries. It would not occur very often; but it would occur, and so they say it will save them trouble and they take the assessed value. Then, when I go and point out that the assessed value is five times the market value, they say, "Oh, no, Mr. Neill; you are impugning the integrity of the provincial officers, who are sworn to do their duty. They say that the property is worth $3,000 and it must be worth $3,000." I put before them an instance of my own personal knowledge where I was assessed $5,000 for some land. I appealed and took it to the county court—it was a town—and the assessor refused to go into the box and swear that the land was worth $5,000 because, as he truthfully remarked, "We all knew it is not worth that." The result was that it was cut down from $5,000 to $1,700. That is an illustration. The land is all assessed at far more than the market value. You can easily understand that, because it has not been materially reduced for a number of years, whereas the market value has gone down enormously.

Now, that is something which the dominion government should insist on: they should say to the British Columbia government, "You must abide by the dominion regulations which we have enacted and to which you have agreed." Some of these instances I know personally; others have only been told me, but by people on whom I thoroughly rely. For example, one province refuses to accept an affidavit except from one resident in the province at the time the affidavit is made. I have personal knowledge of that. They have held up a pension for a time because the man had left the province for fifteen years. He had a reputable man, a minister of the gospel living in British Columbia, certify to his residence in the other province, but the other province would not take his affidavit unless the certificate came from someone at the moment resident in that province. What is the sense of that, or where is the justice of it?

I wrote to the board in one province with regard to one man asking why they gave him only $15 a month. I asked whether there had been any reduction on account of income. The man in charge wrote back to this effect: "No. We give him $15 because we think that is plenty for any old age pension." "Pardon me," I said, "the dominion regulations say that if a man qualifies by residence and property—and you do not deny this—he is entitled to $20." But he insisted that $15 was sufficient for anyone. Moreover, he informed me that the administration of the act had given him satisfaction; he believed that he was carrying it out in accordance with justice, probity and so on; and he ended by saying, "This correspondence will now cease because we do not think that any good will come of it, and you are wrong. We will do what we think fit. If we chose to give him $5, we could."

I was not satisfied with this and I got the opinion of one of the best lawyers in Canada and flashed it at him. The result was that he climbed down and gave the old man $20. As a matter of fact they had been going on for years in the conviction that they could give anything they liked, and that there was nothing to stop them from giving anyone $10 if it happened to suit their whims.

Another province takes a lis pendens against the pensioner's property the day the pension is granted. Another refuses to pay so long as the applicant owns anything that can be turned into cash in excess of $30. In British Columbia they demand a statement from a woman's son-in-law. The Parents' Maintenance Act provides that children must support their parents, but it says nothing about sons-in-law supporting mothers-in-law; and yet there must be the most intricate statements as to what the income of the son-in-law is for a whole year and three months separately as well. Affidavits must be obtained from employers, all of this being embarrassing and occasioning delay. There are a number of instances like this in which there is neither British nor any other kind of justice, and I think the dominion government should formulate regulations and compel the various provinces to adhere to them.

I heard a demand made this afternoon for a reduction in the age limit, and in the same breath the gentleman who made that demand stated that it was imperative that the pension should also be increased. That is a popular declaration among a certain number of poor people who think only of their own interest and cannot see a yard in front of them. But a member of the house who puts up that argument, asking for an impossibility of that kind, with the sure and certain knowledge that the dominion government must turn it down, so that he can go back to the country cherishing and brandishing this grievance and saying, "There is your government for you; they turned it down"—either that member is doing it deliberately or he is acknowledging that he is not fit for the position of statesman in Canada to which we all would aspire, and he has no sense of his responsibility beyond the interests of his own particular parish. We all know that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) cannot do that; he cannot reduce the age limit and at the same time increase the pension.

I would suggest two things: first, make pension regulations more reasonable and so inform the boards. I recall, when the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was on the government benches, we brought up some question in connection with soldiers' pensions. He admitted that there was an injustice and he said it would be remedied. Months later we asked whether he was going to bring in legislation to deal with it, and he said in his brusque way, "No; I have looked into the matter and all that is needed is a common sense interpretation of the military regulations. I have had a word with the chairman of the board and there will be no more trouble." And there was not. That is all I ask the minister to do. Tell these boards that while they are there to see that no one gets a pension to which he is not entitled, they are also there—and this they ignore entirely—to see that everyone who is entitled to a pension gets it. I cannot say that of the British Columbia board.

Mr. DUNNING: You appreciate the fact that they are not under our jurisdiction.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, but this can be done by means of regulations. You can say to them, "Here are our regulations; abide by them or we will not pay the seventy-five per cent." The man that pays the piper calls the tune.

In the second place, I would suggest that the minister reduce the age to sixty-five. Third, if it is necessary—and I believe it is—let there be instituted some system of contribution at the younger ages so that as they grow older they will have paid part of the extra cost. I have heard rumours of reduction of taxation in the coming budget; we should all like to see that, but perhaps it would be better and wiser and more fair to keep the taxes as they are for another year and cut the age for pension down as indicated. The cost would not be all lost, because there is no question that whether you call it relief or old age pension these people of sixty-five are on the shelf; they cannot get work and we cannot let them starve;they have to be kept and it would be better for their self-respect and our dignity to do this in the form of old age pension.

I appreciate the fair manner in which the minister spoke. He put both sides of the case fairly, and I appreciate the sympathy he personally expressed, which I am sure is quite sincere. I hope he will allow this resolution to pass, because it is not mandatory; it asks him only to look into the matter, and it would be at least an indication of our united sympathy with the object in view.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): The resolution before the house has been very well debated and I doubt if I can add much to what has been said. I should like first to compliment the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) upon his resolution, which brought from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) the very fine statement he made to the house to-night. I enjoy listening to the Minister of Finance. Every time he makes an excellent speech such as we heard to-night I say to myself that if, when he came to Canada, he had only settled in Ontario instead of Saskatchewan, he would have been a stalwart of the Conservative party in Ontario instead of in the Liberal party of Saskatchewan.

Mr. YOUNG: Would you have a good man ruined?

Mr. LAWSON: He wants to redeem him, not ruin him.

Mr. MacNICOL: I believe the hon. member, who just took his seat (Mr. Neill) referred to administration, and someone speaking earlier also said that there is a great deal of room for improvement in the administration of the act. I am convinced of that. There is a lot of chiselling in connection with this act. I might give two or three examples that I have come in contact with myself, and I have no doubt the number throughout Canada is legion. I have in mind an executive in a large manufacturing company who draws a large salary, but his mother, an aged widow, is an old age pensioner. If the act permits that, it is too bad. That certainly falls below what we should expect of Canadian citizenship.

Another instance I know quite well is that of a big merchant, whose mother and father are both on old age pension. One would think if that man had any pride in himself or in his country he would not permit that. Another instance I know, is that of a family in which there are three sons; they all belong to the professions and appear to be doing very well; they live in three fine houses, but their mother and father are also on old age pension. That is what I call chiselling. These are only examples of a large number. Any man in circumstances such as these who permits his parents to be on old age pension does not measure up to the standard a real Canadian should have. That is chiselling, and I am sure a great deal of money is wasted in this way.

Some hon. member said something about the Australian act. My memory is that in Australia the old age pension act covers everyone who reaches the statutory age, which I believe is sixty-five; but it is necessary to apply for the pension, and of course a large number of people who are comfortably off and able to take care of themselves do not make application. Another hon. member referred to workers under the railway unions and made a comparison between them and the ordinary working man. There is in fact little or no comparison between a conductor or engineer or fireman on a railway, belonging to the most powerful of the labour unions, which look after the interests of their members at all times, and a workman in a factory who is subject at any time to be laid off owing to a falling off in business. The cases are in no way parallel. Someone says that the railway pension schemes are contributory, but I know that railway conductors are retired at a certain age and have not contributed at all. I know some myself; whether or not that is general I do not know.

Then someone asked, "Where would the money come from?" Of course that is an important problem. In looking over the old age pension legislation in ten of the United States, I observe that where the state has to raise fifty per cent of the cost of old age pensions, they have in some instances imposed new types of taxes to support this scheme. In one state they have added two cents a gallon on gasoline, and the federal government has added a tax of one cent a gallon on gasoline throughout the whole United States. It is certain that if this government does at any time embark on a scheme covering people reaching the age of sixty-five, no taxation should be considered that will add to the taxes on land, which is the municipal tax, or the taxes on business, both of which to-day are already overwhelmed with taxes.

The other Toronto members have doubtless all received to-day schedules such as the one I have received. Glancing over it I note what the city of Toronto has paid for unemployment relief in the last four years: 1933, 1934, 1935 and 1936. The gross expenditure was $34,308,585, of which the federal and provincial governments paid $21,981,029, leaving a net charge for the city to bear out of the only means of taxation it has, land, incomes and business, amounting to $12,327,556. I see further that while the city at the commencement paid unemployment relief out of yearly income, during the last four years they found it impossible to do that, and have funded the unemployment relief by five-year serial debentures to the amount of about $10,622,242. That means merely deferring the payment. So that this government, when it does embark on a scheme in accord with the resolution certainly should not levy taxes on either land or business, because business to-day is struggling under a heavy burden, and taxation on land is so high that scarcely anyone can be persuaded to buy property and build on it. One of the great causes of unemployment in the cities is the fact that there is much idle land on which no one is building because the tax rates are so high.

Then I find that a great many of the workers who have been unemployed during the recent years of depression, and who were not old enough to draw old age pensions, are losing their homes. It seems strange that when a man is out of a job and is without any income, everything he has to do adds cost to him. I have in my hand a bailiff's statement to a gentleman of my acquaintance. I shall not give the name; that is neither here nor there, and in any case he is only one of thousands. His tax rate for the year was $73; but when he got behind there was a penalty of $3.60 added on; there was interest and there were the bailiff's charges, all of which meant an added amount of $17.15, so that his bill was for $90.15. So many of those who have been unemployed for several years and who are under the pensionable age are losing their homes. Had the age been reduced to sixty-five, it is possible that many of these men would have been able to retain their homes.

The minister spoke of the contributory unemployment insurance system they have in England, and I am one of those who believe the time is not far distant when this and every other government will have to adopt some sort of scheme whereby they will make up domesday books, if one can so call them, which will contain the record of every worker from the day he commences to work. If he commences at the age of sixteen his name will go down in the book, with his age and the name of his employer, and a ledger account will be opened for his contributions. This cannot be done in these times of depression, with so many thousands of workmen unemployed, but it is something to look forward to. I believe the minister has the same thought. In England the contributors to the old age pension scheme have reached a new high figure. To-day I believe there are about 18,000,000 British workers under the contributory old age pension scheme. The worker himself contributes nine cents, in the case of a male, and the employer contributes nine cents; in the case of a female the contribution by the employer is five cents and by the employee four cents. The measure has worked very satisfactorily there; but, as I have said, it could not be placed in operation in Canada under the conditions that exist here to-day. So, as far as I am concerned, certainly I shall welcome any scheme the government may bring forward that will lower the old age pension limit, and I endorse what was said by the mover of the resolution, that perhaps sixty-five would be the proper age at which old age pensions might be received.

There are perhaps six good reasons why the age limit should be lowered during a time like this. The first reason would be that due to the combines and mergers which have taken place during the last few years a great many men have been laid off when between the ages of forty-five and fifty. During the depression they remained off, and probably never again will gain employment. I have in mind two companies that were merged. I remember that in one company about thirty men over the age of forty-five were laid off by the company which purchased the plant in which they worked. So far as my knowledge goes, while some of those men may have had the occasional day's work, the greater number have had nothing to do from the day they lost their jobs. Not only have they been a charge on their families, but quite a number of them have died. I remember hearing of the death of one the other day, at about the age of sixty-five. That man had not had a thing to do for the past eight years. I met him on the street many times and I never saw him when he did not seem to be a physical wreck, worrying his poor heart out because he had nothing to do. If the old age pension qualification had been less than seventy he would not have benefited to any great extent, but he kept looking forward to his seventieth birthday, although saying all the time that he would never reach it.

Another reason would be the depression itself, and coupled with it the fact that in this country we have not unemployment insurance. I visited the labour offices in the old country: I went to the labour department and talked over unemployment insurance with the deputy minister. In the course of our conversation I asked him as to what would happen when the present vast employment in munitions factories ceased. He replied that the unemployment insurance scheme in the old country would have laid up enough money to keep the vast majority of those who became unemployed for some years after they were laid off. We have nothing like that in this country, and for that reason I think the age limit should be lowered.

The mover of the resolution referred to the governments, and he might even have referred to the municipalities. The federal government itself sets the age limit at which civil servants may be appointed at thirty-five. Fire departments, I believe, have made the age limit of appointment twenty-five. The police department may go a year or two beyond that, but not very much. So in this age it has come to this, that when a man becomes over twenty-five or thirty-five years old, he finds himself shut off from employment by an age limit. Fortunately many municipal bodies have their own old age retirement schemes. The federal government has one such scheme, and many municipal police and fire departments have followed that example. It does seem strange to me that in all these sheltered jobs, which men hold through rain or shine, through sickness or health, even when they have the chance to retire on a large pension they do not wish to do so. A sheltered job certainly has a great advantage, but the worker in the plant has no such thing. His job at all times is precarious. In my time in business I have seen that statement borne out many times. In addition to that, as everyone knows, in its draft conventions the international labour office stated that the age limit for drawing old age pensions should be not over sixty-five.

Then, as was mentioned this afternoon by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail), there are many who are badly crippled in one way or another. At the moment I have in mind a man sixty-three years of age, who is looking forward to his seventieth birthday so that he may draw an old age pension. Through spinal meningitis or some other disease of that kind he became a terrible cripple when he was a boy, and since that time he has been unable to stand up. During all his lifetime he has had to walk on his hands and knees. That is only one example of cripples of one kind or another who would welcome the reduction of the old age pension age limit from seventy to sixty-five years.

We have the examples set by other nations, to which reference has been made by previous speakers. The United States measure of 1935 was a federal one. The federal act was adopted because prior to that year the states had adopted old age pension acts which were somewhat different in each state. To ensure uniformity, in 1935 the federal government passed the federal measure by which they granted, to each state adopting the federal measure, fifty per cent of the cost of operation.

It has been stated that there is a contributory scheme in the United States but, although I have read the act carefully, I cannot find it that way. However, that may be the case. The federal government pays fifty per cent of all operating costs, and the states are supposed to raise the rest of the money. Perhaps hon. members would understand the situation better if I were to read section 124-a of the laws of New York, as published in 1936. This New York State act is copied from the federal act, and reads:

> 124-a. To whom old age assistance is to be given. Old age assistance shall be given under this article to any person who
> (1) Shall have attained the age of 65 years.

The age of sixty-five is, as far as I know, the age limit under all state acts. I believe nearly every state of the union has adopted that age limit. To continue:

> (2) Is unable to support himself, either in whole or in part; and has no children or other person able to support him—

I am convinced that that is an important point. If children in Canada can support their parents, without hardship to themselves, they should be compelled to do so. Pension acts were never intended to support parents of men who have ample means to take care of their parents. Then:

> (3) Is a citizen of the United States;

Then, paragraph 4 is different from the provision in Canada. It reads:

> (4) Has resided in the state of New York for at least five years during the nine years immediately preceding his application for old age assistance.

In other words, as I understand legislation in the United States, any United States citizen of nine years standing is eligible to draw an old age pension in that country. In Canada the period is twenty years, a provision about which I shall speak in a short time. Then:

> (5) Has resided in and been an inhabitant of the state for at least one year immediately preceding the date of application.

With respect to the provision that a man or woman must be a United States citizen for at least nine years, let me point out that the British act states that a British subject residing in Great Britain for twelve years will be eligible to draw old age pension. I know many old country people and people from Newfoundland, a British possession, who have been residing in Canada for longer periods of time, but who do not receive the benefit of old age pensions. I have two old people in mind, one of whom has been here fifteen years and the other eighteen years, and both of whom are more than seventy years of age. Under our system, notwithstanding their great age these old people—and they are only two among many—are denied the benefits of old age pension. That is one matter I would urge the government to consider when it has amendments to the act before it. I should like to see this consideration given to people of British citizenship—and I use that expression only because similar stipulations were made in the English and United States acts—when the government is considering lowering the residence provision. Probably the government would consider reducing the residence period by two or three years, so that the period might be brought down to around fifteen years, and would thereby be made to conform more with the British and United States acts.

As the mover of the resolution has said, in nearly every country of the world where old age pension laws exist, the age limit is sixty-five years. We realize that the English measure provides for a seventy year limit, but for many years they have had a contributory plan through which, having made contributions, about 18,000,000 Britishers are eligible to draw old age pensions.

May I take this opportunity to register my support of the principle of the resolution. I am glad I have had the opportunity to congratulate the Minister of Finance upon the first-class presentation he made.

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): Mr Speaker, when the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) was speaking, I had a feeling that the discussion would resolve itself into a debate on social credit. This feeling was further accentuated when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) took up a great deal of his time in speaking on this particular subject. I say to the minister that I have the authority of the Social Credit group to accept the challenge he has thrown out to us to discuss fully the principles of social credit. I sincerely hope that he will make an opening for us so that, before the present session of parliament closes, we may be afforded an opportunity of discussing in full this very important matter. I can assure him that we shall welcome that opportunity.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps the hon. member would permit me to say that I cannot prevent hon. members from discussing it on any one of several occasions which present themselves automatically under the rules of the house, as the business of the house progresses. When I say that I welcome an opportunity, I am not conferring a favour; I cannot confer that favour. The rules of the house afford the opportunity, and I would welcome hon. members taking advantage of it. I am not in a position either to give or to withhold that favour, and I should not like hon. members to feel under any obligation to me.

Mr. MARSHALL: It was my understanding that the Minister of Finance said he would be prepared to enter into a full dress discussion of social credit. Possibly I misunderstood his meaning.

Mr. DUNNING: I think you did.

Mr. MARSHALL: Then I regret I made that mistake. Without wanting to become obnoxious, let me assure him that on all occasions we shall endeavour to bring before the house what we believe to be the only solution to the economic ills which confront this country.

There are just two points in the address of the Minister of Finance which I should like to touch upon very briefly. I am not prepared to enter into a full discussion of the matters he dealt with as they are too broad in scope. I believe I am right in saying that the minister was very careful to avoid admitting that there exists among those who are over the age of sixty years a condition which should be remedied. The next point is that, if we assume that premise to be correct, the financial condition of the country will not permit a scheme of this kind to be carried out. To me that is a definite admission that it cannot be done under the present economic set-up. I know that what I have to say matters little to the members of the house, but what was said this evening mattered a great deal to those of us who sit here as members of the Social Credit group. Repeatedly we have brought to the attention of the house the submission that this government should take control of currency and credit and use it in terms of public need. This afternoon we had the admission from the Minister of Finance that he as Minister of Finance of the country has control of currency and credit.

Mr. DUNNING: No. I know my hon. friend does not want to put words into my mouth. I did not say that.

Mr. MARSHALL: That is what I took it to mean.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will read Hansard in the morning I am sure he will not get any such impression.

Mr. MARSHALL: I shall be glad to leave it until we get Hansard in the morning.

Mr. DUNNING: I said that this parliament had created the instruments to control the credit and currency of this country. I did not say that I controlled it, although I suppose I am one of the instruments.

Mr. MARSHALL: Which is an admission that the Minister of Finance on behalf of this government controls currency and credit.

Mr. DUNNING: No; I did not say that either. I wish my hon. friend would not persist in misrepresenting me.

Mr. MARSHALL: I do not think anyone in the house can question the fact that the care and protection of the people of this country is a most important thing at this time. The cause of the young people has been constantly championed in the house and this government has made a move to do something for them. A section of the national employment commission which was set up has studied this problem and a solution of some kind has been offered. If we consider that youth has a problem, surely we must recognize that those who are on the wrong side of forty-five years have problems just as perplexing and just as difficult of solution as those facing our youth.

It is an unquestioned fact that the age limit in industry to-day is somewhere around forty-five years. I think it can be definitely stated that the majority of people over forty-five years are in a state of unemployability. I believe the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) is one of the most important introduced in the house at this session. However, it looks very much to me as if it were going to be talked out. In all probability this discussion will not be completed. I should like to see this resolution go to a vote in order that we may find out the feelings of hon. members on this important matter. This is a matter of national importance and as such it should claim precedence over everything else.

I believe we should establish once and for all whether or not there exists among our old people or those who have passed the age of, shall we say, fifty years, a condition that requires immediate attention. Once we have definitely established that fact; once we have agreed that such a condition exists, then we should work together to find a solution. The present distressing conditions which prevail throughout Canada and which have such a deadly grip upon our people are traceable directly to our faulty economic system. In my judgment it is not only foolish but asinine to think that these people can solve their own problems by their own efforts. It is sad to think that these respectable old people who have reached the peak of their usefulness in life have nothing to look forward to except the poorhouse or the dole. It is not surprising that these people are dissatisfied with conditions as they now exist. They look to us who sit here in this parliament to find a remedy and to stay here until we do.

I must say that I cannot agree entirely with the latter portion of the resolution which states that the giving of this allowance or pension to the older generation would retire them from industrial activity, thereby creating opportunities for the younger generation to be usefully and gainfully employed. I believe that Canada would suffer an irreparable loss if we were to force men and women who have reached the age of forty-five, or fifty, or sixty, to give up their labours. The loss would be especially felt in such branches of work as jurisprudence, the sciences, art, music and pursuits of a like nature. The average age of men who do their best work is fifty years. The best work of the workers has been done by men around the age of forty-seven years, whilst that of the thinkers is about fifty-two years. There is a tendency to-day towards the idea that men and women who have passed middle age should be eliminated from industry in order that the younger and more aggressive people may be given a clear chance in the rush to the front.

What are the objections to granting a pension to people over sixty years? Two major objections have been advanced. The first one is that it is entirely a provincial matter. I agree. But what happens when a provincial government endeavours to legislate in an attempt to bring economic security to its people? The legislation which that government considers essential and of vital importance towards attaining this economic security is promptly disallowed by a higher authority. We all know that this has been done in the case of Alberta.

The second objection is that it would mean added expense; that it would raise the taxes. May I say that from the standpoint of orthodox economics I entirely agree, and I further admit that we should guard against increasing the tax burden, against placing on the shoulders of future generations burdens which we find ourselves unable to bear. So I believe that at this stage of parliament we should first of all decide whether or not the need exists. I venture to say that if I were to question all hon. members of the house, they would tell me that the need does exist; but they would wind up their answers by saying, "Where will all the money come from"? I hope that before the end of this session this group will be able to show where it comes from at the present time. If the need exists we should put it up fairly and squarely to the Minister of Finance. He in turn should put to work those experts who are in his department and give them the problem. If those experts are not able to give him a solution; if they cannot tell him how it can be done without increasing taxation, I suggest to him that he fire them and get new ones. To-day the Minister of Finance can find subsidies for steamship companies; he can absorb the deficits of the Canadian National Railways; he can find millions for defence; he can provide at least a quarter of a million dollars for commissions to investigate the textile industry and wheat marketing; but he admits tacitly that this is a problem which is entirely beyond solution.

May I say that a pension to people over the age of sixty would be one of the best means I know of for distributing purchasing power. We would be able to get goods moving off the shelves on which they are resting at the present time, and that in turn would move the wheels of industry for the manufacture of more goods; in fact I am satisfied that every community, every constituency in Canada would directly benefit by a scheme of this kind.

In conclusion, I desire to read part of the report which was submitted by the veterans' assistance commission, which consisted of Colonel Rattray, Lieut-Col. de Martigny and Mr. Robert Macnicol. On page 36 the commission has this to say upon the subject of old age pensions:

> Old age pensions are now dominion wide. Although administration is under the control of the provinces, and to that extent variable, there is little in the working of the present act that is open to criticism. We feel, however, that it is time there was a thorough revision of the basis upon which this act rests.
> We trust that in making these observations we shall not be accused of exceeding the bounds of our inquiry. The interests of the veteran are tied up with the interests of the body of citizenry at large and are affected to an equal degree by any short-coming of general social legislation.
> We feel that the age at which the old age pension is available is too high. In view of the intensity of modern industrial conditions and the greater speed of all our life, the man who has reached the age of sixty-five is entitled to a period of rest. Not only is he entitled to it, but there is an excellent chance that it will be forced on him. As we have already observed, few industries will now employ a man over the age of fifty, and most industries are weeding out their men at sixty-five. Tradesmen also usually slow up when they get to that age. Although we believe in the reality of the pre-aging of those who saw active service, we feel most insistently that a very large number of older civilians are doomed by present legislation to a mere existence for a space of years on the charity of relatives and friends.

If the age limit at which old age pensions are available were reduced to sixty-five, this would eliminate much social distress while at the same time making room for younger people. But the greatest fault in the present old age pension law is its restrictiveness. It is confined to the indigent and to that extent serves as a reward for indigence. In effect it tells the citizens of Canada that if they have been reckless in their expenditures, careless of the future and slothful in their daily affairs, the state will reward them at the age of seventy with a pension; but if they have been industrious, sober and careful of their resources, the state will tax them at the age of seventy for the support of those who have been indigent. Nothing could be more calculated to discourage thrift and encourage thriftlessness than such a law. The only escape from this dilemma is for the state to pension everyone at the age of seventy, or at the age of sixty-five as the case may be, and put these pensions on some contributory basis.

[Mr. Marshall.]

The Dominion of Canada does not inquire of its civil servants when they reach the age of superannuation whether they are millionaires or paupers; it pensions them all on the same basis. It may be argued that this is merely a retirement plan to which the civil servant has contributed. Why should not the old age pension be the same?

In conclusion, may I say this, that we have been labouring under the economics of scarcity too long. It is about time we planned our economy to distribute the abundance which lies around us everywhere and which a bountiful Providence has bestowed upon us.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains (Translation): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the humane object of the resolution presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) I do not at this time feel like supporting it. I think we would be better advised to look first into the grievances voiced by old people in some parts of the country.

The dominion government, contributing seventy-five per cent of old age pensions, has not only the right, but the imperative duty to see that the law is administered on a sound basis. Before considering any amendment concerning the age limit of old people, good administration of the act must be assured. The guiding principle in the distribution of old age pensions ought to be a high sense of justice, regardless of any other motive. Undue preference and favouritism must yield to legitimate requests and to the needs of our old people. Further, the administration of this act appears to be so difficult that any amendment with a view to fixing another age limit would result in making conditions worse. I realize that it is not always easy to judge the case of an applicant on its merit. This task is all the more difficult as there seems to be a conspiracy on the part of certain applicants in order to get a pension to which they are not entitled under the act. Thousands of dollars could be saved through preventing abuses. I would suggest to the dominion government the appointment of revising officers or inspectors, even if the only purpose of saving public money could thus be served. These officers would look after serious complaints and report doubtful cases and abuses to the proper authorities. An important part of their work should consist in supervising the administration and operation of the Old Age Pensions Act.

In all fairness to the population of this country, those applying for old age pension should comply with the provisions of the act. On the other hand, justice and law should have precedence over petty interests trying to evade a fair interpretation of this important social legislation.

There is another aspect of this question that I wish to bring to the attention of the house. Are not the provinces, particularly in this period of stress, already overburdened by the administration of laws coming under their immediate jurisdiction. Notwithstanding their sense of duty, their good will and their spirit of self-sacrifice, it is easy to understand that the arduous duties inherent to their particular functions require their undivided attention. Moreover are the provinces in a position to exercise the necessary supervision on exploiters of all sorts who frequently take advantage of our social legislation?

Personally, I know of no authority better qualified to examine applications for old age pension than our municipal councils. In many cases would not the assessment roll tell the true story about the indigence of an old person? Information could easily be secured from the population of towns and villages should the assessment roll fail to give an accurate account of the case. Therefore, under the circumstances, not only should municipal councils be consulted in the matter but they should pass over the applications for old age pensions and report to the authorities.

Mr. Speaker, we must put a stop to abuses, exploitation and injustice in the administration of the Old Age Pensions Act. We must prevent scoundrels from exploiting old destitute people and selfishly depriving them of their rights. It is the duty of the government to protect the treasury and to safeguard the interests of elderly people applying for the pension to which they are entitled.

Mr. JOSEPH NEEDHAM (The Battlefords): You must be thinking, Mr. Speaker, that by this time all that is necessary to be said has been said, and so I shall not take up many minutes prolonging this discussion. It is really interesting to follow the various speakers and the different points of view they bring out. I have no doubt the government will analyse the whole situation and perhaps evolve some practical solution on which to act, because unquestionably this is a pressing problem facing the country.

This government realizes, I am sure, as do all the provincial governments, that one of its first responsibilities is the care of the citizens whom it governs. The care of the aged should be its first and deepest concern. I am satisfied that as the years go on this problem will increase. There is no doubt that as people get on in years they will be replaced more and more not only by youth but by machines. These old people must be cared for either by the federal government or by the provincial governments or by the municipalities in which they live. We see that during slack times many are laid off; then when there is a slight increase in employment the younger man gets the position and the older man cannot get back. In the discussion this afternoon many have expressed the view that the machine is one of the chief causes of this state of things. I agree with them. We read of more and more new machinery being set up, and its effect on the working population is tremendous. I believe we shall have to recognize the principle that where a machine takes the place of workers, that machine should in some way contribute to their support.

The late King George V on the morning of his jubilee appealed to the citizens of the British Empire to do all in their power to create employment and relieve the distress then prevalent. Two days before he gave that address there appeared in the Winnipeg papers the statement that the Bank of England had just laid off one thousand clerks, having put in machines to do the work. The ages of these clerks were between twenty-six and thirty-four, and the Bank of England recognized its obligation to those discharged employees and offered to give each of them either a lump sum of $10,000 or $10 a week as long as he lived. Seven hundred of them took the $10,000; that amounted to $7,000,000. The other three hundred took the $10 a week for as long as they lived. According to British life insurance tables the average life expectancy of those three hundred men is thirty-seven years, so that in the thirty-seven years the bank will pay for those three hundred the sum of $5,500,000. That is a total of $12,500,000 to those discharged employees. There is a principle which I believe every government and every employer of labour who replaces his employees with machines must reckon with. It will be said that was a very generous gift, and it certainly was. What about the successors of these thousand employees? We must leave them out of the question. But this article went on to say that in nine years those machines saved to the Bank of England all they will pay out to these clerks in thirty-seven years. And in the thirty-seven years the saving to the bank will be $32,950,000, placing the wages of the thousand employees at $30 a week. So we see what the machine means to the employer. But there is a principle which must be recognized and dealt with in some way. When labour is replaced by the machine, I believe the government has a claim on the saving sc made.

Now let us look at this problem from the standpoint of the individuals concerned. Take two young people starting out in life with equal opportunity and equal advantage. They both obtain employment; both acquire a certain measure of wealth. One establishes a home and raises a family; the other does not, but invests his savings in bonds or securities. When they reach the age of sixty-five, one has invested his dollars, but the other has invested something more valuable than money; he has made a contribution to Canada that the other has not. Which should have the first consideration from this country, the man who invests his dollars and gets the interest, or the one who invests in a home and gives Canada sons and daughters? At the age of sixty-five the one may have his home sold from over him to help keep up the interest payable to the other. That shows the real bearing of this problem.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) regarding defects in the regulations and administration of the present act. I want to refer to one or two instances. I have in mind a man eighty-two years of age. I just saw in this week's local paper that this old couple had celebrated their fiftieth wedding anniversary. The old gentleman was away in the United States visiting his family and stayed there longer than he had intended owing to sickness. He was back eight years before the old age pension came into force. When he attained the age he applied for and was given an old age pension. Eight years or more later it was discovered that he had not complied with the regulations. Before the Old Age Pensions Act came into force he had been out of the country for a few days longer than the time limit, and he was cut off. Now he has been back long enough to comply, I believe this year, with all the requirements, but he has been told that he cannot get back on the old age pension unless he pays back to the board the amount he received previously. He has been on relief ever since he was cut off, so how in the world is he ever going to get on the old age pension again? That man has served for over forty years as a justice of the peace, and I should think he would be entitled to a pension on that account.

I have another couple in mind who sold their farm some ten or twelve years ago and thought they had a comfortable living for their old age. During the last six years they have not received one cent from that farm, which has not produced enough to pay the taxes. They cannot get on the old age pension list because they still have an equity in the farm. I think there should be some board to investigate cases of this nature in order that these people may get something different from the relief which may be handed out to them. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni stated, they are getting a form of pension through the relief they receive, but there is a difference between the pension and relief as far as charity and that sort of thing goes.

I understood the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to say that parliament has control of currency and credit. I am very glad to hear that. I do not know when they took control, though at the last election that was one thing they said they were going to do. I have yet to meet the first person who has seen any change in policy, but I can assure the minister that hon. members in this corner will be only too willing to give the minister every possible support in exercising that control, as far as he can influence parliament. We shall do our part along that very line. What better place to start could there be than by issuing the credit of this country in the form of a pension to the old people? I would agree with the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) that it should be made universal in its application, and then perhaps those people we heard of this afternoon, who have gone to the island of Bermuda or some other place, would come back so that they might share in the pension.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, in the time which is left to-night manifestly it is impossible to go into this question of the new economics. It delights me greatly to see the earnestness with which our fellow members of parliament are coming at least to tolerate our remarks when we undertake to discuss this great question. I believe that as the days go by not only the members of this parliament but the people throughout Canada and the world will come to realize that there is a great deal in the new economics.

Speaking in a general sort of way, it seems to me it is absolutely idiotic to think we have an abundance and are unable to give of that abundance to the needy who have spent their lives helping to produce it. During the time at my disposal to-night I am just going to outline very briefly where the money comes from. In the first place one must ask himself, What is money? We have not time to go into that in great detail; but when we look into that question and begin to find out not only what money is but what we in Canada are using for money, where that thing comes from, how it comes, what justifies it and what gives it value, then we shall begin to see where money can come from in great abundance.

Banks create money. Just as soon as anyone feels that he can safely challenge that statement, very well. If he cannot challenge it, it will be well for him to be careful. The next thing is that banks create credit. There are various definitions of credit, with which of course we are familiar; but in a very broad sense banks create what is called bank credit, and bank credit in this country to-day is money. Anyone who thinks he can successfully controvert that statement and bring proof of his statement will find us willing to listen to him. Any man who cannot controvert that statement had better hold his peace until he can, and not begin to laugh at the contentions of the new economics. And may I say, Mr. Speaker, that the number of well informed, careful men who are subscribing to the truth of these statements is increasing tremendously.

The next question is, What is it that justifies a bank or any other institution in creating credit? It is the goods and services which the community in which that organization functions is able to produce. Then, if Canada is able to produce enough goods and services to supply all her people with an abundant life, unquestionably that organization which is entrusted with the task of creating credit, which represents those goods, has the justification for creating that credit, and that statement cannot be successfully controverted.

Mr. THORSON: Will the hon. member explain how it is to be done?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very well; I shall at a later time give the hon. member all the explanation necessary. I ask him to-night, though, to remember that I have only fifteen minutes in which to talk, but a question of that kind is exactly what I welcome. It indicates a penetrating mind and an earnest, sincere attitude, and that is all we want. Very well; let us go on with my line of reasoning. To make it clear to us, and in a way to make it concrete, let us suppose that all the money in the United States were suddenly whisked away so that there was nothing left of what they now call money. Let us suppose that at the same time all the money in Newfoundland should disappear, and that you should be given the task of creating a money system for the two countries at the same time. For which of those countries would you prepare the greater amount of money? Anyone who is over fourteen years of age will say, "Why, the United States, of course." Very well, then; why? "Well," you will say, "because the United States has greater productive and consumptive power." Very well. You have come again to the justification for money. It is productive and consumptive power. Productive power depends upon, first, natural resources; second, the people who are there, their training and disposition to work; third, their industrial equipment, such as manufacturing plants; and, fourth, distributive equipment, such as railways. There are several other factors. But it is perfectly clear that the more of those things which enable one to produce quickly and to deliver as when and where required goods and services, the more money, unquestionably, can be made up.

As soon as that principle is laid down and fully understood, we begin to see where the money ought to come from in Canada. We have many goods; no one can question that. We can have as much money as we have goods, or at least enough money to distribute those goods. The next question is: Will the money cause inflation? That is a brief outline of the whole situation confronting us, but I have insufficient time even to scratch the surface under any of these headings.

So far as I have time to-night I shall discuss these matters. Before commencing the discussion in detail, may I point out that in the United States in the last one hundred years the amount of money circulating in the hands of the people, per capita, has increased from $12.35 in 1834 to $515.33 in 1930. Those who wish to verify those figures will find them fully set out at page 66 of Woodward and Rose's book, Inflation, a most readable, instructive and interesting work.

That money is to be broken down in this way: In 1834, $5.24 of the money in circulation was in coins and bills, and $7.11 in bank deposits. It will be noticed that the amounts are almost equal. But, by 1930, while there was only $29.76 in coins and bills, there was $485.57 in bank deposits. Normally we think of bank deposits as funds in the form of coins and bills. Actually they are not coins and bills; in a large measure they are nothing but bank credit. In other words, in 1930, people were using many times more dollars in bank credit than they were in coins and bills.

That may mean much or little to hon. members, but as we proceed in our investigation of the matter I believe its significance will become more apparent. There is no doubt that it means much to hon. members in this section of the house. May I point out at this time some facts of history. When we go back into the history of our race and study our financial background, we shall find some of the most astonishing facts of which we have ever learned. For example, we shall find that prior to the time of Queen Elizabeth the average educated person knew almost everything about money. The king made the money, and made it in accordance with the needs of the people. In a most astonishing way kings were able to keep price levels even and steady.

How was that done? It is a most interesting study. Until 1694 there was no national debt in Great Britain—not because they did not have wars. Why did the national debt in Great Britain commence at exactly the same time that the Bank of England commenced operations? Why has it grown, in most prodigious proportions ever since? That is a matter which would give anyone cause of serious reflection. Let us examine the first major transaction of the Bank of England. I believe that would be a help in learning the theory of the new economics. William III needed money. A number of well-to-do men, under the leadership of William Paterson, approached the king and in effect said, "We will raise £1,200,000 in gold, and will lend it to you at eight per cent interest, if you will give us the right to create £1,200,000 in paper notes. You may use the £1,200,000 of gold; you may pay us interest on it; you may owe it to us, you and your children and your children's children for a thousand years, and continue paying interest on it. That is just what we want. In turn, we will take the notes and lend them to our friends." When that transaction was consummated, the men who formed the Bank of England created out of nothing but paper £1,200,000 in money. That they realized fully what they had done is to be concluded from these words, which were written by Mr. Paterson:

> If the proprietors of the bank can circulate their own fundation of £1,200,000 without having more than two or three hundred thousand pounds lying dead at one time with another, this bank will be in effect as £900,000 or a million of fresh money brought into the nation.

Hon. members will find that statement in the History of the Bank of England by Doctor Andreades.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask that you call it eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Tuesday, March 1, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING COMMITTEES

BANKING AND COMMERCE—CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT

Mr. W. H. MOORE (Ontario) presented the second report of the standing committee on banking and commerce, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

MARINE AND FISHERIES, RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES, MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. White be substituted for that of Mr. MacNicol on the standing committee on marine and fisheries.

That the name of Mr. MacNicol be substituted for that of Mr. White on the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

That the name of Mr. Kuhl be substituted for that of Mr. Johnston (Bow River) on the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Motions agreed to.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE—ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY 1932, NIAGARA CONVENTION 1929, OGOKI RIVER AND KENOGAMI RIVER (LONG LAKE) PROJECTS, AND EXPORT OF ELECTRICAL POWER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I desire to lay on the table copies in French of correspondence and documents relating to the St. Lawrence deep waterway treaty, 1932; Niagara convention, 1929; Ogoki river and Kenogami river (Long lake) projects, and export of electrical power; also a copy of a communication dated February 25, 1938, from the Premier of Ontario to the Prime Minister of Canada, with reference to the Kenogami river project.

A reply to the communication I have just tabled was sent to the Premier of Ontario to-day, but I do not think it should be tabled until after it has been received by him.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

INTEREST RATE ON REPAYMENTS OF TAXES AND INSURANCE PREMIUMS—ARREARS OR INSTALMENTS SUBJECT TO BONUS PRIVILEGES

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Soldier Settlement Act for the purpose of reducing from seven per centum to five per centum the interest rate charged on certain repayments to the board of taxes and insurance premiums paid by the board in respect to soldier settlement lands in case of default on the part of the settler, and to provide further that the period during which payments of arrears or instalments at present subject to bonus privileges may be made, be further extended to the 31st day of March, 1941.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

WAR VETERANS' ALLOWANCES

EXTENSION OF ALLOWANCES TO INCLUDE CERTAIN OTHER CLASSES—ENLARGEMENT OF MEMBERSHIP OF BOARD

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the War Veterans' Allowance Act so as to extend the allowance payable thereunder to a class of veterans of the great war not presently the recipients of such allowances who, because of tangible or intangible disabilities and handicaps, are incapable of maintaining themselves; to include certain veterans of the South African war; to include among the classes of moneys non-deductible from allowance, pensions or grants accompanying certain military decorations; to provide for the avoidance of overlapping of benefits payable under the War Veterans' Allowance Act and those payable under the Old Age Pension Act, and to enlarge the membership of the war veterans' allowances board.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN POLICY

ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT AS TO BRITISH POLICY AFFECTING LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND RELATIONS WITH ITALY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): In view of recent statements by the Prime Minister of Great Britain regarding the League of Nations, collective security and Italy, has the government of Canada been kept fully informed of the British foreign policy indicated by such statements, and if so, what opinion, if any, has the government expressed on behalf of the Canadian people in relation to any or all of these matters?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend had advised me of his intention to ask this question.

The Canadian government has been furnished with full summaries of recent statements made in the British House of Commons by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the former Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. In addition, it has received a brief report of a conversation with a representative of a foreign government. These communications, as is usually the case, are in the nature of information rather than consultation. The Canadian government has not offered any opinion on the statements in question.

EMPLOYMENT COMMISSION

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF FINAL REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I wish to ask the government and particularly the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) whether the final report of the national employment commission has been laid on the table. If not, when may we expect it to be brought down?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): I believe it has already been stated that it is the intention of the government to lay this report on the table as soon as it is printed and available in both languages. I expect that will be in the course of a very short time.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT

The house resumed from Thursday, February 24, consideration in committee of Bill No. 24, to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1929—Mr. Power.—Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): When the bill was last before the committee all clauses were passed, but the leader of the opposition made a suggestion which I have submitted to the officers of the department, and to which I think it is most reasonable that we should agree, namely, that the act should come into force on proclamation. I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Howe:

That this act shall come into force upon a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council.

That will be section 11.

Mr. McKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): I was not in the house when the minister introduced this bill. I have no desire to reopen the discussion, because the less publicity given this question, the better. I may be entirely out of order, but since it has been brought in I have received communications from certain persons in Lambton county who for over twenty-four years have been growing what is called Indian hemp for commercial purposes. They entered into this project encouraged by the Department of Agriculture and sponsored by them, and have made quite a profitable enterprise out of it during the past several years.

As I read the amendment it is possible to obtain a licence to grow this hemp under certain conditions. That may be all right, but if the restrictions are so great as to make it impracticable to grow this hemp, then I suggest that no licences should be granted at all. If you will look at the Canadian Almanac at page 102, in connection with the tariff, you will notice that hemp seed is listed for free importation. That would lead me to believe that it is possible to import seed and to grow it commercially. I fully realize that if this bill is passed it will be more difficult to control the growing of what is known as marihuana in small plots in back yards, or in flower pots, than it will be to control it in a commercial way.

One grower I have in mind is probably the only man in Canada who has converted hemp into a spinnable fibre for export, and he has built up a profitable sideline. In all fairness, if the restrictions are to be made too severe in the granting of licences, then the privilege should be abolished and this grower should be compensated for the money he has spent on machinery, and for the profitable industry he has built up. I bring this to the attention of the minister because in the twenty-four years that this man has grown this hemp there has been no complaint from the narcotics branch nor from any other source whatever, if there are to be too rigid restrictions he or any other grower should be compensated to the extent I suggest.

Section agreed to.

Bill as amended reported.

TRANSPORT COMMISSION

AUTHORITY TO CONTROL TRANSPORT OF PASSENGERS AND GOODS BY RAILWAYS, SHIPS AND AIRCRAFT

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure conferring authority upon a transport commission (the board of railway commissioners to be known as such) to license, regulate and control the transport of passengers and goods by railways, ships and aircraft, and to fix licence fees and transportation tolls and charges and regulate and control other matters incidental thereto.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of the bill to be founded upon this resolution is to extend the jurisdiction of the board of railway commissioners, which in future, if this bill carries, will be known as the Board of Transport Commissioners, to inland shipping and transportation by air. A bill similar to this was introduced last session in another chamber, and a long series of hearings was held there. In drafting the present bill we have profited by the discussion in the other chamber and eliminated such of the more contentious features as are not essential to the purpose of the measure. We believe that this legislation will serve a constructive purpose, and that it will not be particularly contentious in its present form. The bill will have the effect of not only extending regulation to shipping and aviation, but will also have the effect of alleviating somewhat the possible over-regulation of the railways; for it extends to them the power to contract under certain circumstances, with full publicity and full protection against discrimination, giving them to a limited extent the power to contract which shipping and aviation now have.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think the minister's explanation is an ample explanation of the general principle of the resolution. But possibly we can wait until the bill is brought down to secure the necessary information.

Mr. CHURCH: This is the second time within a week that the transportation question has been before this house. The other day a committee was appointed on the Canadian National Railways estimates. What that committee will do I do not know, because no questions can be asked in the house.

This second transportation bill was before another body last year and I notice that the minister is dropping one of the main features of regulation, that with respect to motor buses and trucks operating on the highways, which are to-day robbing the railways of their business and are in considerable measure responsible for the railway deficit. These deficits are accumulating. The railway commission is not a transport commission at all. In England they have a transport department headed by a transport minister, who has jurisdiction over many matters which were included in the bill introduced here during the session. This is a different resolution. The government should be prepared to tell the house before the second reading of this bill what it is going to do about one of Canada's chief problems, the railway problem. We have no money for ordinary expenditures owing to the deficit on one railway system. What is the government going to do about it? Is it going to have a new transport commission similar to the railway commission which does not now regulate anything?

The minister proposes now to widen the powers of the board of railway commissioners along the lines indicated. We have had three or four royal commissions investigating our railways, including the Duff commission and the Drayton-Acworth commission, and their recommendations were ignored. Now it is proposed to give these new powers to the transport commission. I doubt that that regulatory body will be able to regulate anything. Are you going to include in its jurisdiction all forms of transportation? We had a debate in the house the other day about what they are doing in England along this very line, not only in respect to railways but in respect to motor trucks and buses, reducing the railway deficits and putting the British railways in a condition of efficiency which is a credit to the mother country. Is the minister prepared to put all the cards on the table, or is he going to hearken to another body which discussed this bill last year and take out of it what should be in it, namely the power to regulate these means of transport which are taking the cream of the business from the railways? In England a hundred years ago the railways ruined the canals; now the motor trucks are ruining the railways. If this body is not prepared to deal with the problem in Canada some other body will take our place in 1940. I am not prepared to say what should be done, but this resolution does not go far enough, and I am sorry to see the minister dropping some of the clauses which should be in the bill if we are to have anything other than merely remote control. We know what the railway commission is; we know what the Duff and Drayton reports showed about the way it regulates.

Last week we sent the railways and shipping accounts and estimates to one committee, and now we are to have another body. Look at what the Duff report says about passes. Talk about deadheads on the railways!—I do not wonder at their having deficits. If by this measure we are going to give up control to outside bodies as we have been doing, then responsible government is at an end in this country. We meet here week after week and month after month, yet one of the most important problems facing the government is not dealt with; in fact a private member is almost afraid to mention it. But I intend to keep the matter before the house and before the government because something must be done. We had a similar situation in Toronto and the county of York and adjoining counties, where the Mackenzie and Mann interests had an intolerable grip on the people. They had light, power and transportation franchises all over the three counties, beyond any public control. But the city grappled with that situation and cleaned it up. If they could do that, surely this federal government can do something about what I suggest. I hope we shall have some definite proposals and explanations before the second reading.

Mr. THORSON: Will the minister indicate briefly in what respect the proposed bill differs from the one which was introduced in the senate last year?

Mr. HOWE: The bill differs from that of last year in that any attempt to include control of traffic on the highways has been deleted. The difficulty in that connection of course is that the government has jurisdiction only at certain points. Our legal officers advise me that we have jurisdiction over trucks passing from one province to another, or crossing the international boundary, or in certain of the dominion government parks. It was felt on reconsidering the matter that such jurisdiction as we have is too limited to be particularly effective, under the conditions which prevail in Canada, and in view of the strenuous opposition of the provinces we have decided to delete that feature from the bill this year.

Moreover, an investigation bearing upon these matters is now being carried on in Ontario by the Chevrier commission, from which we hope and believe constructive legislation will emerge.

Another change is that we have excluded from the restrictions relating to shipping the carriage of materials in bulk, such as wheat, coal, iron ore, sand and gravel, to the regulation of which there was a good deal of objection. My own opinion is that the objection was not well founded and that it would be in the interest of those objecting to have regulation extended to those commodities. However the opinion before the last committee was almost unanimous against my view, so that for the present we have dropped regulation for those commodities from the bill. There are other minor changes which will become apparent when the bill is distributed. I think these are the major changes.

Mr. NEILL: I notice that the resolution proposes that the board shall have power to regulate the transportation of passengers and goods by ships. Can the minister tell us whether that will apply only to ships on the great lakes, or will it apply also to ships in the coastal trade on the Atlantic and the Pacific?

Mr. HOWE: It is not proposed to apply that type of regulation to coastwise shipping wholly within British Columbia, to coastwise shipping along the coast of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, or up the St. Lawrence as far as Father Point. It does apply, however, to boats coasting from those points into the great lakes and to boats coasting from a port in British Columbia to a port in another province of Canada.

Mr. NEILL: Why is the coastal traffic not to be regulated? Does the minister not think there is need for it?

Mr. HOWE: Coastwise traffic on either coast is not competitive with other forms of transport. It is more or less a condition by itself. It is my intention at the proper time to send this bill to a committee, where matters of the kind can be discussed. If it is considered in committee that any good purpose would be served by regulating shipping along either coast, a clause of that kind could be inserted.

Mr. KINLEY: This provision with regard to coastwise shipping was in the bill when it was introduced last year, I believe, but there was so much opposition to it to the senate committee that it was struck out. Is that not so?

Mr. HOWE: My recollection is that the bill never included shipping of the type that has been suggested. I may be wrong about that; perhaps it did.

Mr. KINLEY: Yes, it did.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Howe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 31, to establish a Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, with authority in respect of transport by railways, ships and aircraft.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Howe.]

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

AUTHORITY FOR EXTENSION BEYOND THE CONFINES OF CANADA

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 29, to amend The Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937.

He said: Mr. Speaker, hon. members will note that this is a very short bill. As I stated in speaking to the resolution it has two purposes in view, both of which I think were contemplated when the original legislation was passed but were more or less inadvertently omitted.

The first section amends paragraph 14A of the bill to permit Trans-Canada Air Lines to purchase a share of the company which will operate the transatlantic air transport service, such purchase being an obligation of the government of Canada. The memorandum entered into provides that 24½ per cent of the stock of the operating company shall be owned by such company as the government of Canada may designate for that purpose, and it is the intention of the government to designate Trans-Canada Air Lines as the Canadian shareholder of the transatlantic company.

The second purpose of the bill is to permit the extension of the trans-Canada contract to lines outside Canada. As originally drawn the bill permitted the company to operate outside Canada, but such guarantees as might be given by the Post Office Department to the company were limited to points within Canada. The route of the airway crosses a portion of the state of Maine, and it is also probable that the airway will operate two or possibly three international connections. At the present moment it is operating an international connection between Vancouver and Seattle. The purpose of the second paragraph is to enable the guarantees under the trans-Canada contract to extend to these operations.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 1—Transatlantic business.

Mr. GREEN: What is the present position with regard to the issued capital stock of Trans-Canada Air Lines?

Mr. HOWE: The capital stock of Trans-Canada Air Lines at present is wholly owned by the Canadian National Railways. We have been approached by other aviation companies to discuss the disposal of a portion of it, but these offers have never been complete cash offers, and as cash is required for the purposes of the company we have declined to barter for any other commodity.

Mr. GREEN: The present position, then, is that the Canadian National Railways own all the issued stock of Trans-Canada Air Lines, so that really it is a one hundred per cent government enterprise. Under these circumstances would it not be possible for Trans-Canada Air Lines to set up a school or schools for the training of pilots and the ground staffs that are required for Canadian flying. The training of men for the air is being handled in a more or less haphazard fashion at the present time, and if Trans-Canada Air Lines is to be a government enterprise it might be a very good place for the government to give a lead. The future of Canada will depend to a large extent upon the progress we make in our air development, and there seems to be a need for improved training facilities.

Has the minister given consideration to having Trans-Canada Air Lines set up a proper school or schools for the training of men to operate our airways in the future.

Mr. HOWE: I think we have as fine a school for that purpose, located in Winnipeg and operated by Trans-Canada Air Lines, as can be found anywhere on this continent. The present staff, numbering some ninety-nine, have all been trained there; the pilots, the ground crews and the radio operators have all received training at that school. When we started the enterprise we had the option of making arrangements with one or two United States schools, which do similar work, under which we could send our men over there. We decided to bring the necessary talent here, and to carry out the training in Canada, and for some months this work has been proceeding in Winnipeg.

Mr. GREEN: These men are being trained only for trans-Canada airways, are they not?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: My thought was that we might train them for the other air lines as well. Many feeder lines will be operated by private companies, and I think we could raise the standard of flying and ground work right across Canada if the trans-Canada airways undertook to operate a training school for all young men wishing to fly or to learn ground work regardless of whether or not they were to be absorbed by Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Mr. HOWE: The preliminary training is given by the aviation schools, of which there are some twenty-four in Canada. These schools are competent to give a transport licence. The trans-Canada airways will not accept a man who has not had a minimum of a thousand hours flying. There is a gap between the two types of training which must be filled in in some way. Whether it should be the duty of Trans-Canada Air Lines to discharge that duty, or whether the work of the flying clubs could be concentrated in one or two advanced schools, in order to bridge the gap, is now being studied by our department. I think perhaps the latter method is the better one. However, the department is aware of the fact that there is a gap which must be filled in the education of the commercial pilot, and I think that within the next year some progress will be made towards filling that gap.

Mr. GREEN: I suppose all these men who are trained could also be used for defence purposes, if required? Is the training of a type which would be of value in a defence force?

Mr. HOWE: Undoubtedly advanced training for inter-urban flying is different from the training for ordinary transport flying, or freighting. But up to a point the training is parallel. I suppose only those interested in inter-urban flying would go in for the advanced course having to do with instrument flying.

Mr. GREEN: But the minister will give serious consideration to developing schools in connection with the Trans-Canada Air Lines?

Mr. HOWE: We have been and are still giving consideration to it.

Mr. LOCKHART: The minister has said that there is a blank between the present education of these men and possible future requirements. I know that education facilities come entirely within the jurisdiction of the provinces, but in our technical schools there has been some thought of laying the groundwork in connection with flying. The opinion has been given that in five years there will be a dearth of trained men who are air-minded. Have there been any negotiations between provincial departments and the federal government with respect to the necessity of laying the ground-work in technical schools of the provinces, or has any thought been given to the matter.

Mr. HOWE: We have had inquiries from a number of technical schools as to the type of training required by a person who wishes to enter into aviation. In each case we have given as much information as we could. The department has furnished engine parts to permit instruction being given in the mechanics of the aeroplane. I believe however that training in flying is better handled by the federal government, which has jurisdiction over all matters affecting the air. It has the fields and facilities to carry out that training, and while we look to the technical schools to give the ground-work of education, the actual training in flying should be done under the direction of the federal government.

Mr. LOCKHART: I appreciate what the minister has said; nevertheless in some municipalities there are outstanding technical schools some of which are in difficult circumstances; the taxpayers are finding it hard to meet the demands made upon them. The minister will agree that those who engage in this work must be recruited from the young men who are now attending schools. The provincial departments have decreased the grants made to technical schools thereby making technical education a greater burden. I have been advised that the federal department has offered to assist by way of equipment. The point is, however, that the cost per pupil in this type of education is higher, and unless the provincial governments can be persuaded to assist in a greater degree in this type of technical education, I do not see how aviation can be promoted by the technical schools. If young men are to be had for the higher education to be given by the federal government, they must be encouraged in the technical schools, so that they may be drawn therefrom.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the paid-up capital?

Mr. HOWE: The present paid-up capital is, I believe, a million and a quarter.

Mr. MASSEY: Is it the plan to use Canadian pilots on the transatlantic hop, or will that be left entirely to Imperial Airways?

Mr. HOWE: Under the agreement, Imperial Airways are to do the pioneering work in establishing the route. They are doing it now with Imperial Airways machines and pilots. Later on a company will be formed to take over the work, of which Imperial Airways will control fifty-one per cent. I feel sure that when the time comes they will be prepared to give Canadian pilots an opportunity. Imperial Airways now employ a number of Canadian pilots. While in Bermuda a year ago I learned that two of the pilots sent to that point to operate the Bermuda-New York run were Canadian pilots. I feel sure that Canada will be represented.

Mr. MASSEY: Are we training our pilots for Trans-Canada Air Lines only in land ships or for the piloting of boats as well?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: The present training is entirely with land ships.

Mr. MASSEY: At what stage of the development of a pilot is he eligible to enter the school at Winnipeg? What previous training must he have had or how many hours in the air?

Mr. HOWE: He must have a university education, at least a thousand hours of actual transport flying to his credit and a record in transport flying that is more or less outstanding.

Mr. MASSEY: In other words the course being given in Winnipeg is essentially a post graduate course.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MASSEY: Is it in the mind of the minister that, as suggested by the hon. member for Lincoln, we should attempt to develop a type of pilot who would be able to engage not only in the type of flying we have in Canada to-day, but also in transport flying such as is planned for the Trans-Canada Air Lines, so that we may give the incentive to young men to secure the necessary technical training and ground-work, and also provide facilities for them to learn to fly from the very beginning? I think it is recognized that the flying clubs throughout the dominion have been doing a very good work. It will be noticed in the estimates that some of them have been receiving small grants from the government, but many of them have been carrying on under conditions which are far from favourable, and in some cases the clubs have been forced to discontinue their activities. The work of these flying clubs has been to develop men as pilots, ultimately to become air lines pilots. I believe more substantial aid should be given to these flying clubs by the government. Perhaps an instructor could be loaned for certain periods to give the flying club members instruction, not only in flying ships from airport to airport without the aid of a beam, but in all the various phases of flying which are so important.

Mr. HOWE: I must take issue with the statement of my hon. friend that a good many of these clubs have ceased to operate.

Mr. MASSEY: I said some, not a good many.

Mr. HOWE: The total number of clubs in operation to-day is twenty-six. Two clubs died in the initial stages, having been established in communities which were too small to supply the necessary talent. I believe the clubs are now on a firm financial basis. It was never the intention that these clubs should be money-makers although some of them in the larger centres are doing quite well financially. The government gives some aid, perhaps sufficient for the work that they are doing. These clubs and my department are discussing the extension of work along the lines I indicated previously, that is, giving a more advanced training. If something feasible or practicable can be worked out it is possible that the clubs may qualify for more aid from the government.

Mr. MAYBANK: Reference has been made to the personnel of these air lines, and I should like to have some assurance from the minister as to the nationality of those to be employed. Perhaps because of the necessity of the work, certain men have been brought in from the United States. There has been some criticism of this, perhaps unjustly. We have a very good flying school in Winnipeg, and the question has been raised whether steps will be taken to have a Canadian personnel. I am sure the minister will agree that we should give employment to our own people to the exclusion of all others. Has a definite policy been laid down for the employment of Canadians?

Mr. HOWE: The present personnel is approximately ninety-one trained men. There are two Americans employed in Seattle in connection with the American end of the operations between Vancouver and Seattle. I believe these are only booking clerks. Of the remaining personnel in Canada, all are Canadians with the exception of five. One of the five is the vice-president in charge of operations. He was brought here because we were advised that he was the man most capable of establishing this enterprise on a firm foundation. He has had perhaps a finer and longer record in air transportation than any other man on this continent. He was brought here on the understanding that he would devote two years to the work. When it was decided to train our pilots in Canada, four other men were brought in from the United States to give technical assistance. Each one of the four is outstanding in the particular line for which he is responsible. The four are here on a six month's basis, and will be kept as long as their services are needed as training personnel. Their duties are temporary and will be terminated when we think we can get on without them.

Mr. MAYBANK: Are the two men employed in Seattle because the service is an international one? When our railroads run through United States territory a certain number of employees must be citizens of that country. Is this employment due to the United States immigration laws?

Mr. HOWE: The men employed in Seattle are not pilots. They are only minor employees, clerks who sell tickets, and they receive around $100 a month.

Mr. FACTOR: The minister will recall that he had a conference with the board of control of the city of Toronto at which representations were made for the establishment of a training school in that city. There are in the vicinity of Toronto two of the finest airports on the continent, and I should like to know whether the minister has taken into consideration this matter of a flying school.

Mr. HOWE: At the moment we are giving only the most advanced training courses in order to supply men for the trans-Canada operations. The school for this purpose was established in Winnipeg because of flying conditions and the fact that a radio beam and telephonic communications were there. Whether a second school of the kind will be required I doubt very much. However, we are studying the possible bridging of the gap in the education of transport pilots, and in that connection we shall be very glad to consider the suitability of Toronto.

Mr. LOCKHART: The minister has stated that university education is a necessary qualification for a transport pilot. While I have every respect for university graduates, I think it is about time that men who may not have had a university education should be given an opportunity to become pilots in Trans-Canada Air Lines. It will be noticed in many advertisements for civil service positions that a necessary qualification is university education. But many men with great mechanical ability are training at the different airports, and it is possible they would make much better fliers and be more interested in the work than university graduates. Might not the qualifications be reduced to enable men with perhaps senior matriculation or technical school diplomas to engage in this work?

Mr. HOWE: There is hardly a pilot or co-pilot flying a transport plane to-day on the North American continent who is not a university graduate. The training is most exacting. For instance, a pilot must take a very advanced course in meteorology and must have an accurate knowledge of higher physics. He must be well-versed in thermodynamics and in the construction of internal combustion engines. I do not know that anything would prevent a man who had graduated from a technical school and attained high proficiency in transport work from obtaining a place in a service of this kind. But two or three have been tried who had not the background necessary to enable them to master the work that was required of them, and they had to be rejected. It is simply that the technical school man has not the background to absorb the training. It is a condition about which we cannot do very much; the training is required and the man should have it.

Mr. LOCKHART: I hope the minister will appreciate that I am not criticizing him, but I am informed that graduates of technical schools in Great Britain are permitted to go on to a school similar to the one in Winnipeg which he has outlined; that similar schools are provided in Britain, and that men without university training have gone into them and have become among the most successful pilots in Imperial Airways. Is that information correct, or are openings in the Imperial Airways service confined entirely to university graduates?

Mr. HOWE: I have not that information, but I doubt very much whether a man with less than university training is accepted for training as an Imperial Airways pilot.

Mr. BENNETT: They were in the early days of the war.

Mr. HOWE: That is probably true, but such is not the case to-day.

Mr. GREEN: How much will Canada have to invest in this transatlantic service, and what percentages have been put up by Canada, Ireland and the United Kingdom?

Mr. HOWE: The percentage is 51 for the United Kingdom, 24½ for Ireland, and 24½ for Canada, and our contribution is limited to one and a quarter million dollars.

Mr. GREEN: When will that have to be paid?

Mr. HOWE: We are sending a delegate to Ireland next month to discuss the formation of the company. I would estimate that it may be required about a year from now. We are committed to form the company only when a successful service has been established. The agreement provides that in the meantime Imperial Airways will do the pioneering.

Mr. GREEN: Does Canada get any credit for the facilities we are providing, the landing fields and so forth, on this side? I understand we are also providing facilities in Newfoundland. Is that correct?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: We are obligated to provide the beam facilities, the radio facilities and the meteorological services in Canada, and the meteorological service in Newfoundland. The British government has built an airway in Newfoundland and has also provided the radio facilities there. Ireland has done certain work, in Ireland, which takes care of the first leg of the journey. The obligations to furnish facilities are divided between the three countries more or less in proportion to their share of the operations.

Mr. GREEN: That is in addition to the capital investment?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Is not this the appropriate time to take power in the act to enter into a contract for a transpacific service? After all, these air developments come very quickly; in a matter of a year or two we shall be working on a transpacific service, so that we might as well amend the act at the present time to cover that contingency.

Mr. HOWE: I feel that in the matter of transpacific service, parliament would ask me for more information than I am able to give at the moment. It takes so little time to amend the act that I think we had better leave this discussion until we have more information as to the amount of money that will be required.

Mr. MASSEY: What is to be the base or the terminus of the transatlantic service? Will it be in Newfoundland, or in Canada? In other words, will the trans-Canada lines extend to Newfoundland, or will Imperial Airways extend to Canada?

Mr. HOWE: It is all one operation. It is, I believe, specified in the act that services will start from Southampton, England; that a landing place will be at Foynes, Ireland; that another intermediate point will be Botwood, in Newfoundland, and that the Canadian terminus will be Montreal, with an alternative landing place at Shediac should weather conditions make it desirable to utilize it.

Mr. MASSEY: Will boats be flown from Newfoundland through to Montreal? Will Canadian ships pick up any transatlantic passengers in the maritimes; or will they be flown right through to Newfoundland?

Mr. HOWE: If Shediac happens to be used on any trip as a terminus, of course we shall pick passengers up there. But the intention of the act is that Montreal shall be the terminus for the transatlantic service. It is all one operation. It is not Canadian from here to Newfoundland and Irish from Newfoundland to Ireland; it is one company, but there will be three or probably four countries concerned. I understand that England is taking care of Newfoundland's share and that probably Newfoundland will also have an investment, but the four countries will all be shareholders in an operating company which will carry out the whole of the operations.

Mr. LENNARD: When the minister speaks of "Ireland" I assume he refers to Northern Ireland?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. LENNARD: Well, the other part has changed its name.

Mr. HOWE: Eire.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Perhaps the minister can give us some information about the situation in the maritimes. We understood that Shediac was to be one of the terminals on this side. Has the minister any information that the company wants to come straight through from Newfoundland to Montreal, or does it not prefer to having a landing at Shediac or Moncton?

Mr. HOWE: In the test flights of last year Imperial Airways terminated all air flights at Montreal, but, I think, stopped on two occasions at Shediac. Pan-American Airways made Shediac their American base on each flight, although their contract provides, as does the Imperial contract, that Montreal shall be an alternative base for them as well as Shediac. Nothing is yet determined, I believe, as to which will be finally adopted.

Mr. DUPUIS: Have many students enlisted in the Winnipeg school for aviation and radio engineering, and if so, how many are from the province of Quebec?

Mr. HOWE: I have not that information. I know that various branches of the school have supplied about ninety men, but I have no knowledge where they came from or who they are. I have not had a hand in any way in the selection of personnel for trans-Canada airways.

Mr. DUPUIS: Are there now qualified radio engineers, and men qualified in meteorological operation, in the province of Quebec? If so, how many are employed at St. Hubert in radio and meteorological operations, and are they all from Quebec?

Mr. HOWE: I am sure that I cannot inform the hon. member. I have not taken the slightest part in the recruiting of the technical staff of Trans-Canada airways or of the St. Hubert airport. I placed a man in charge of that service who I believe is competent to sort out the material, and I have left it completely to him as to where these pilots are obtained.

Mr. DUPUIS: I wish the committee to know that the youth of our province is anxious to find a place in the activities of this country. I am not raising this as a parochial question; I am simply interested in helping the youth of the province of Quebec, because I am sure that if they were given an opportunity to study these things the minister would find as large a number of qualified young men in that province as in any other. I am trying only to encourage the youth of that province because I am afraid that at present the minister is under the impression that there are not a sufficient number of qualified persons in the province of Quebec to fill these positions. I should be glad if we could help them to fill these positions in connection with the airport in that province.

Mr. GREEN: Will the north Atlantic route be flown the year round, or will there be a different route in the winter?

Mr. HOWE: As far as we know, it is the intention to fly the north Atlantic route twelve months in the year. The service there is in the experimental stage, but that is the intention.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the agreement referred to executed?

Mr. HOWE: The agreement among the four countries? No. A conference was held in Canada two years ago and an agreement was arrived at and initialled, but it has never been carried beyond that stage. Each government approved the agreement as initialled, but no formal agreement was ever signed.

Mr. BENNETT: I ask only for the reason that it might be laid on the table if it were in shape to be seen, since reference has been made to it. If it is a confidential document it need not be.

Mr. HOWE: I have here a document which is not confidential, so far as I am aware. I will lay it on the table.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not signed.

Mr. STIRLING: Do I understand the minister to say that in the ordinary course of events there will be a non-stop flight from Southampton to Montreal?

Mr. HOWE: Not a non-stop flight. The flights are Southampton to Foynes, Ireland, thence to Botwood, Newfoundland, and from Botwood to Montreal.

Mr. STIRLING: The longest non-stop flight will be from Ireland to Botwood?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: And that will be how many miles?

Mr. HOWE: Fifteen hundred.

Mr. STIRLING: Is it at Botwood that the oncoming plane will first begin to pick up the beam?

Mr. HOWE: The beam at Newfoundland has two legs, one leg extending toward Ireland and the other towards Canada. The beam is not continuous from Foynes to Newfoundland. These beams spread as they go, however, and I think that the beam in fairly good weather will extend six hundred miles in each direction, leaving a fairly short gap. Experience to date is that radio reception is perfect all the way across. The aeroplane is in telephonic communication with one shore or the other continuously, and it is only for a short distance out of control of the beam itself. We have assisted recently by establishing cross-bearings along the coast, which allow them to locate the distance travelled. In the early days the distance travelled was obtained from ships as they passed, but we have set up stations to give cross-bearings and we believe that from the standpoint of electrical communication the route is first-class.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Minister may contract with corporation.

Mr. BENNETT: Would it not be better to add after the word "passengers" the word "mails," so as to make it read "transport of passengers, mails and goods"? Goods might not necessarily mean mails. Last year, if my memory serves me, it was suggested that the word "goods" was broad enough to cover it, but mails are not really goods in the ordinary use of the term. It would not hurt to add "mails" to make it clear beyond peradventure.

Mr. DUNNING: I move that the word "mails" be added after the word "passengers" in the twenty-eighth line.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: There must be a partial operation in Canada in order that this section may operate; that is, there must be a partial operation in Canada before there can be operation in the foreign country. That seems to me to be an adequate safeguard.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. GREEN: How many routes outside Canada are in contemplation?

Mr. HOWE: At the moment we have one between Seattle and Vancouver and there may be possibly two more. We have had some discussions about two other routes, but I would not say that that would be the limit. They are divided by international agreement, and there may be three or four more when we have the matter straightened out.

Mr. GREEN: Which routes are being considered now?

Mr. HOWE: While these discussions are taking place between Canada and the United States I think it would be well not to mention exact routes.

Mr. GREEN: Are we buying in Canada the planes for Trans-Canada airways? If not, where are we getting them?

Mr. HOWE: We looked into that question extensively and found that for the number of planes we had to buy, no Canadian manufacturer was interested in getting the agency for one of the recognized types of transport planes. We went into the situation in Britain and found there again that all manufacturers were booked up with civil aviation work, so that we could get no tenders there. Our planes are bought from the Lockheed corporation in California.

Mr. MASSEY: Has the minister any information in regard to the connecting link or feeder line between Toronto and Buffalo or some other United States airport so that the Trans-Canada Air Lines will connect with the United States air lines?

Mr. HOWE: There are several matters under discussion by correspondence with the United States to-day, and it might embarrass not only Canada, but the United States as well, to say whether any particular routes are under discussion.

Mr. MASSEY: I do not wish to embarrass the minister, but I am most anxious to know, because that is a question one hears asked very frequently in Ontario and also the western part of Quebec.

I know that the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard) had it in mind to ask a question—unfortunately he had to leave the chamber for a few minutes—as to the possibility of having the Buffalo-Detroit planes sit down at Hamilton if that airport should be enlarged. The minister says he does not wish to discuss these plans, but may I ask whether any such arrangement has been contemplated?

Mr. HOWE: Nothing of the kind has been contemplated. The United States air lines have made no proposal to us that I know of to sit down at Hamilton.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How will the ticket sales of Trans-Canada Air Lines be handled?

Mr. HOWE: It is expected that all the facilities of the Canadian National Railways, and possibly of other railways in Canada, will be available for that purpose. But at the moment we are more concerned with the mechanical aspect. The handling of traffic is something for the future; no decision has been arrived at as to details of ticket selling.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Will there be cooperation on the part of the government with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in connection with this air service?

Mr. HOWE: As I say, no detailed plan has been worked out for the sale of tickets. We know we have all the resources of the Canadian National Railways available, and I presume discussion will take place with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company so as to get as wide distribution as possible.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Unless there is cooperation with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company they will not sell the tickets. Is it the government's intention to cooperate with the other railways of the country?

Mr. HOWE: Under the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act the two railways agree to cooperate and to continue to cooperate, so I presume that when the Canadian National does anything it will be bound by law to cooperate with the Canadian Pacific.

INSPECTION AND SALE

PROPOSED REGULATIONS RESPECTING BINDER TWINE, SALT AND OTHER COMMODITIES

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 30, to regulate the inspection and sale of binder twine and salt, and to establish weight of bushel for certain commodities commonly sold by the bushel.

He said: I do not think any further explanation is necessary than was made the other day on the resolution with regard to this bill. The intention is simply to repeal certain legislation now included in other statutes and to reenact certain sections in a new bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Definitions.

Mr. SENN: Is there any difference between the definition of "dealer" in this bill and what it was formerly?

Mr. GARDINER: The definition in the original act was in the section which dealt with binder twine, but it means almost exactly the same.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Analysts and inspectors.

Mr. BENNETT: I think subsection (b) should be very carefully considered by the committee. It does not seem to me quite proper that the minister should establish the commodities and the legal weights of commodities; it should be set out in the statute so that anyone may see it. It is highly desirable that anyone should be able to ascertain "the legal weight per bushel for such additional commodities not already covered by section 18 of this act as may be deemed necessary." To have it done by the minister means that people have no way of knowing what the law is and may frequently find themselves in difficulty. That objection has been frequently taken and successfully urged in this chamber. That the minister should fix the legal weight for a commodity, with no statutory provision therefor, is contrary to the general principles which should govern legislation of this kind.

Mr. GARDINER: I presume the reason for the provision is merely to enable the list provided in section 18 to be added to. The list in the original act is a very short one, consisting of eight items, starting with bituminous coal and running to timothy seed. Since that time it would appear that it has been necessary to add many items, and the list is now rather long as we have it in section 18. It is considered advisable that as time goes on and new items may require definition as to weight, someone should have the authority to add them to the list from time to time.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly the point. Parliament meets once a year, and there is no reason why additional commodities should not be inserted in section 18 from time to time by parliament. To have the minister settle what they shall be and thus have the public ignorant of what they are is contrary to principle that should govern an act dealing with the sale of commodities. There will be no means by which one can readily ascertain just what weight a given commodity added to section 18 should have. In other words, it is legislation by a single individual, adding to a section commodities that are not in the act at all and with respect to which under the act there is no means of making known to the public what the weight is and what the commodity is that is being dealt with under section 18. I think the minister will see that this is unsound, because here we are dealing with certain commodities in a statute. If subsection (b) of section 4 is to operate, there is no need of doing this at all. The minister needs only to pass that subsection and determine what shall be the weight of salt and other matters of that kind. If we come to parliament, as we are doing now, to deal with certain commodities, as is the case now, it seems to me that it is not logical or consonant with sound reason that we should depart from that procedure and leave it to the minister to add to section 18 any commodities he wishes.

I think the minister would be the first to object to that if he saw it himself, for it is hardly fair to the community. Subsection (b) need not be there next session. If the minister has additional items he comes to parliament, as he is doing to-day, and adds those items to section 18. I think it is an act of parliament, rather than the view of one individual who is the Minister of Agriculture for the moment, that should govern with respect to the matter. I think the minister will not regard that as an unfair statement. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is charged with the administration of the Weights and Measures Act. This is a special provision dealing with certain matters that are deemed to have greater bearing upon agriculture than upon matters of trade and commerce.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, I quite appreciate the strength of the argument advanced by the right hon. leader of the opposition, but I would suggest that it is really necessary to have subsection (b) there, for this reason: It is assumed that all the items which will need to be dealt with are now in the bill, but there is always the possibility that between sessions the necessity may arise for some weight being set upon the bushelage of something not now contemplated. I think it would be safer to have that power in the hands of the minister, acting on the advice of officials of the department, than to leave the commodity to be dealt in with no definite weight established until the house may meet again. I would imagine that the only advantage which would be taken of this section would be to deal with cases of that kind.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the minister not answered his own argument? The fact that he comes to parliament at all to deal with binder twine and a number of other commodities now in section 18 is conclusive proof, in my judgment, that parliament and not the minister should deal with them. Otherwise it would be only necessary for the minister to pass subsection (b) and then make up his list. But parliament determines the weight of alfalfa seed, bituminous coal and matters of that kind, as they are set out in section 18 on page 4 of the bill. When we find it convenient to come here with respect to binder twine and salt, it indicates that with parliament meeting once a year there is only a period of about six months when parliament could not pass a bill dealing with other matters, and it is better that we should preserve some semblance of democracy in our institutions rather than say that notwithstanding the fact that we have come here to deal with these matters under section 18, we are now going to deal with similar matters by handing them over to the minister. I think the minister will admit that to be unsound. The answer to the argument advanced by the minister is contained in the very bill itself; otherwise there is no need of its being here.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sorry, but I do not think the leader of the opposition has really got my point. There is the possibility that some commodities with which we are not in these days dealing in Canada, may come to be dealt with at any time. By scientific and other means we are developing new commodities; we even have plants brought into sale from time to time which in previous years were not being dealt with commercially. For two or three months before the house meets there may be a need for somebody to define the weight at which that commodity is to be sold, and it seems quite fair to leave in the hands of the minister the power to set that weight. Then, when the house met, perhaps two or three months later, of course parliament could deal with the commodity and put it on some definite list.

Mr. SENN: A number of commodities in general commercial use are not included in this list. For instance, there are carrots, potatoes and other vegetables. They may be dealt with in another statute; I do not know, but unless they are it seems to me that the minister would have power under this section to deal with them as he saw fit.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think there would be any chance of any minister dealing with them otherwise than in the manner in which they are dealt with in the ordinary trade. That is, there are established weights for all of these ordinary commodities with which we are dealing, and I do not think any minister would attempt to change that.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. BENNETT: No. I must say that I think there is a great principle involved here, a principle with regard to which the present Prime Minister railed for hours. No wonder the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) nods his head. Apparently he did not intend to do so, but he remembers the incident to which I refer. It is wholly unsound. Think what it means. It means that we have clothed one man with authority to do what? We have given him authority to establish a legal weight per bushel for such commodities not already included under section 18 of this act as may be deemed necessary. This is not even to be subject to the provisions of any other statute. It gives the minister the power to repeal statutes which have to do with the weights of other commodities.

I am satisfied that this is bureaucracy gone mad. That is what it means. I can remember the present Prime Minister taking hours of the time of the house railing against this sort of thing. This involves a very important principle, namely parliament clothing one individual with the power to fix and establish a legal weight per bushel for any commodity not already dealt with under the act, regardless of all the other statutes in the country. Wheat is named here. Potatoes are not. It is not to be even a matter of order in council; it is the minister himself who may do this. That may be Liberalism, but it is not the brand of Liberalism which was preached from this side of the house during the years from 1930 to 1935. However, other days, other manners.

I cannot think that the minister desires to assume such dictatorial and autocratic powers as are here concerned. If it were not for the principle which is involved I would not waste the time of the committee in speaking about the matter. The principle is: Shall parliament confer upon one man the right, regardless of what other statutes say, to fix the weight of a commodity at any figure he sees fit, and include it as part of section 18, when parliament is now dealing with several commodities, to bring them within section 18 and enlarge the list? In future the list may be enlarged by somebody else. It is just that sort of legislation, as I say, against which the present Prime Minister used to argue not for minutes but for hours, reading from many learned authorities. I can see before me many who on various occasions read from Lord Hewart's book to indicate what a terrible thing it was that the will of the people should be used thus for the purpose of clothing one man with the authority of parliament itself. I dare say there are some who will remember the harsh terms that were used, and the effort made to indicate one man as the person who deserved them. I certainly remember it, being the person alluded to, but apparently that is not a matter of importance now. I do think the minister should not place himself in that position, but of course we realize that he has the power to pass this bill.

Mr. DUPUIS: Mr. Chairman, I remember quite well the incident to which the right hon. leader of the opposition referred, in regard to the present Prime Minister. I personally protested against the custom of giving a minister of the crown arbitrary power. The then Prime Minister, or his ministers, between 1930 and 1935 stated that that was the usual way to do it, and that otherwise the minister could not administer his department.

Mr. BENNETT: Those were regulations made by the governor-in-council.

Mr. DUPUIS: And even in bills. If I had the time I could put my finger on scores of bills—

Mr. BENNETT: You would have great difficulty.

Mr. DUPUIS: —where apparently arbitrary power has been given.

Mr. BENNETT: Be good enough to name one.

Mr. DUPUIS: Of course the right hon. gentleman knows it very well.

Mr. BENNETT: That is unparliamentary, but we will pass it by. Name one.

Mr. DUPUIS: If the right hon. the leader of the opposition would give me a chance I could name scores of bills where the same thing was done by the former government.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. BENNETT: No, but I am not going to waste more time on it.

Mr. GARDINER: Let it stand until I have an opportunity to look into it.

Section 4 stands.

On section 5—Appointment of analysts and inspectors.

Mr. SENN: How are the inspectors to be appointed, and how are they appointed at the present time? Are the appointments under the civil service commission, or by the minister?

Mr. GARDINER: By the civil service commission, under the law, as the section states.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it not necessary to add the appropriate words? That was discussed in the house, and it was thought desirable that the proper words be added to make it clear that the civil service commission must deal with the matter. Possibly that did not happen since this parliament began, but I know that appropriate words were added with respect to the civil service commission. I think the minister knows what I refer to.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. Last session there was a discussion in connection with the Seeds Act.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is right, yes.

Mr. GARDINER: I asked the department this year to insert the proper provision. I believe that has been done.

Mr. DUNNING: The words "authorized by law" have been inserted to cover the point.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right, yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Labels on binder twine for sale in Canada; for export.

Mr. SENN: It seems to me that this clause may be a little ambiguous. We find in section 3 that a dealer means:

> The person or firm manufacturing or importing or selling or having in possession for sale any binder twine.

Does section 6 mean that each man into whose possession the binder twine comes must have his name attached to the label on the binder twine, or does it mean that any one of them will be sufficient?

Mr. GARDINER: Section 169 of the act reads as follows:

> 169. In the following provisions respecting binder twine "dealer" means the person or firm manufacturing or importing or having in his or its possession for sale, or exposing or offering for sale, any binder twine.

Although some few words are different, the meaning is practically the same. Section 170 of the old act is practically the same as section 6 in the bill. It is under that section that in the past sale has been carried out.

Mr. SENN: Suppose I am a dealer in a certain town retailing binder twine and, on analysis, it is found that the binder twine is not in accordance with the provisions of the act, am I liable because the name of the firm which manufactured the binder twine, and not my name, is on the label. It seems to me the section puts the dealer or the retail merchant in an unfortunate position. If that is not the intention of the section, and if it is clear to other people that my interpretation is not the correct one, I am satisfied.

Mr. GARDINER: My experience is that in the past anyone selling binder twine improperly labelled was liable.

Mr. SENN: Whether or not he is a dealer?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: There are only one or two words which seem to present any difficulty. At the end of the section we find that the onus of proof lies upon the dealer "who has or has had the binder twine in his possession."

Mr. DUNNING: That is in connection with export.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that. First of all it is quite clear that binder twine for export need not be labelled in the manner prescribed by the section and second if it is used domestically and is not so labelled the onus of proving that it was for export lies not only upon the dealer but the dealer "who has or has had the binder twine in his possession." I direct attention to these words because they make possible a difficult situation. The minister will correct me if I am wrong but my memory is that the onus of proof has always been upon the dealer in this matter. I think in this instance, we have gone a bit farther. Although I do not carry all these matters in my memory, it would seem to me that the words "who has or has had the binder twine in his possession" create an almost impossible situation.

Mr. GARDINER: Probably the position taken by the leader of the opposition is the correct one. A careful reading of the old act would indicate that perhaps there has been a change. It may have been made for a purpose and, on the other hand, it may have been written in unintentionally. In view of the circumstances I had better let the section stand and have it checked. The old section reads:

> The onus of proof that any unlabelled binder twine is manufactured for export only shall rest upon the manufacturer, dealer, carrier or other person in whose possession the binder twine is found.

Mr. BENNETT: This is quite different.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and I shall have it checked. Meantime I ask that the section stand.

Section stands.

On section 7—Reconditioned or rewound binder twine.

Mr. GARDINER: I have an amendment suggested by a firm of binder twine distributors which I shall ask my colleague to move.

Mr. DUNNING: I move that the following be substituted for section 7:

7. No person shall sell, offer or have in possession for sale as binder twine in Canada, any binder twine which has been damaged by fire or water unless:

(a) in the case of damaged binder twine which has been reconditioned, the original tags on the balls of twine have been removed and replaced with tags labelled in accordance with section 6 of this act, and in addition with the words "Reconditioned Binder Twine," and the original markings on the sacks containing the damaged binder twine have been obliterated or concealed, and the sacks, or labels durably attached thereto, labelled in a conspicuous manner "Reconditioned Binder Twine" or,

(b) in the case of damaged binder twine which has not been reconditioned, the original tags on the balls have been removed and replaced with tags labelled in accordance with section 6 of this act, and in addition with the words "Damaged Binder Twine," and the original markings on the sacks containing such damaged binder twine have been obliterated or concealed, and the sacks, or labels durably attached thereto, labelled in a conspicuous manner "Damaged Binder Twine."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8—Prima facie evidence of improper labelling.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe this is what the experts call random sampling. During the sittings of the price spreads commission the question of random sampling came up and it was found to be highly unsatisfactory. One in twenty is a pretty wide margin, is it not?

Mr. GARDINER: It is the section as it stood in the previous act.

Mr. BENNETT: I know it is.

Mr. GARDINER: It must have been found to be fairly satisfactory as I have had very little complaint with regard to it.

Mr. SENN: Have there been any convictions under this section?

Mr. GARDINER: I have no record of any, but there may have been.

Section agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Offences.

Mr. BENNETT: Subsection 2 is important.

Mr. SENN: This is one reason why I drew the attention of the minister to the definition of "dealer" and to the fact that a dealer is liable if the binder twine does not comply with the regulations. For instance, he is liable if the binder twine does not run 600 or 500 feet to the pound as it may be represented. It would be impossible for a dealer to know this and he is not in a position to find out. If he is a retail merchant I do not think he should be held responsible for a difference of five per cent in what is represented. That would be a very difficult position in which to put a dealer. After all, five per cent is quite a wide margin. With binder twine running 600 feet to the pound, that would amount to thirty feet. If a farmer buys binder twine supposed to run 600 feet to the pound and gets only 570 feet, that is too great a difference.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not had an opportunity to inquire into this section. Section 6 has been allowed to stand, and I should imagine it is just that thought which was in the minds of those who were responsible for redrafting this section. If section 6 is drafted to take care of what the hon. member has in mind, then there should be no difficulty with this section.

Mr. SENN: Does the minister not think that five per cent is quite a wide variation? Surely manufacturers of binder twine putting out twine to run 600 feet to the pound should be able to come within thirty feet?

Mr. GARDINER: That has always been the standard, and I believe it has been found to be quite satisfactory.

Mr. SENN: That would be quite an item where a man was buying a large amount of binder twine.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not going to argue this point because I am not sufficiently familiar with it, but I think five per cent is rather high. When we come to consider salt we find it stands in the same position. Five per cent is rather a large margin of tolerance in connection with a commodity that runs 600 feet to the pound. I think it is going pretty far when it is no violation of the statute to be short thirty feet in 600 feet.

Mr. DUNNING: The difficulty with binder twine is when it comes too long, not when it comes too short. If the twine has been spun out too thinly it loses tensile strength. My experience has been that I would rather have it come short.

Mr. BENNETT: What a fuss the minister would make if he paid for 600 feet and got only 570 feet.

Mr. SENN: The better grades of binder twine do not lose their tensile strength in the same way as the cheaper grades.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite right.

Mr. SENN: An allowance of five per cent is worse in connection with the lower grades.

Mr. DUNNING: When you get a greater length than is stated on a ball of a cheaper grade of twine, you find the twine breaking every few minutes.

Mr. GARDINER: Since 1907 the section has read:

No deficiency in the number of feet of twine contained in any ball shall be deemed to be a contravention of this section unless the deficiency exceeds five per centum of the length indicated by the label.

If it is less than five per cent, it is not an offence.

Section agreed to.

Sections 11 and 12 agreed to.

On section 13—Name and address of packer or importer on every container.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister give us a little explanation of this part II, referring to salt. In my time the unit used to be a barrel weighing so much, but now the salt is put up in round paper containers with a patent outlet and usually marked with the weight. It is proposed that that practice will be continued in place of the old standard, but there is nothing that indicates any standard hereafter with respect to salt. There is nothing in section 18 and there is no standard unit any longer. This section means that any package containing salt shall have marked upon it the weight in the container. That is the way it strikes me.

Mr. GARDINER: That is my understanding of it. The old section read:

Every barrel of salt packed in bulk, sold or offered for sale, shall contain two hundred and eighty pounds of salt, and every barrel or sack of salt sold or offered for sale, shall have the correct gross weight thereof, and in the case of a barrel the net weight also, marked upon it in a plain and permanent manner.

[Mr. Bennett.]

The present section provides for the modern method of packing and selling salt in many different sizes and forms of containers. The old protection would be no protection at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Would it not be desirable to do away with the five per cent? If my memory serves me correctly, salt is now put up in containers of one or two or more pounds. These containers have a patent outlet in the end. I think the old provision of five per cent in connection with barrels should disappear. One can understand that the provision of five per cent in connection with a barrel of salt supposed to weigh 280 pounds might have some application, but with the present method of selling salt in these paper containers it occurs to me that a tare of five per cent is too large. There is no other commodity that I know of which is similarly packed and in connection with which there is a tolerance of as high as five per cent. It is not a case of there being a shrinkage in the weight with the present method of packing as the present packing is done in a most careful way.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a commodity that is presumably packed very dry.

Mr. BENNETT: If anything, it would gather weight. I am sure the minister is familiar with the patent containers and how the salt flows out in a dry manner.

Mr. DUNNING: If it does not flow, then it is heavier than it ought to be.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point exactly. I should think that the old margin of tolerance which was applicable to barrels of salt that got knocked about and lost a certain amount of weight should no longer apply. Such a tolerance does not apply to any other commodity packed in a similar way.

Mr. GARDINER: In view of the fact that we are having the bill stand, I ask that this section stand. I do not think there is any provision in the old act for—

Mr. BENNETT: —any tolerance.

Mr. GARDINER: —any tolerance at all.

Section stands.

On section 15—Markings on barrels and other containers.

Mr. STIRLING: Does this act set out to cover block salt such as is used by dairy farmers, that is, put out for the cows to lick?

Mr. GARDINER: Section 15 does not cover salt of that kind.

Mr. BENNETT: This does not cover rock salt. Might it not be well to add that provision?

Mr. GARDINER: I will check that before coming back.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Section 15 stands?

Mr. GARDINER: I think section 15 can pass. We can check rock salt, as to whether we need any provision for it in the previous section.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister will again look at the section, I think he will agree it does not go quite so far as it has been suggested that it should.

When bags or cartons of salt are packed in barrels or in cardboard containers, the head of the barrel, or both ends of the cardboard container, as the case may be, shall be properly and correctly marked in a plain and durable manner with the number of bags or cartons therein and with the gross weight thereof.

You cannot mark the end of a carton with "the number of bags or cartons therein." The point that the minister made in speaking of it was that the new carton which takes the place of the old barrels in larger quantities shall have marked upon it the weights, and I think he will find there are some words left out there; for obviously it is not the number of bags or cartons which are in the carton that we are concerned about; it is the weight in the carton which should be marked on each end.

Mr. DUNNING: The two sections, 14 and 15, require to be read together. They are dealing with different things.

Mr. STIRLING: These are cartons within cartons.

Mr. BENNETT: Cartons within cartons; that is the way to put it.

Mr. DUNNING: Then it is all right to carry section 15?

Mr. BENNETT: No; it should be reconstructed to cover the sale of the small carton, which now bears upon it—I was looking at one the other day—the statement of the weight. This point is not contemplated in the section at all; for it deals only with cartons within cartons.

Mr. DUNNING: The previous section deals with the individual carton.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. Section 14 says the container shall have these marks on it. Then, "when bags or cartons of salt are packed in barrels or in cardboard containers"—I suppose that means larger containers.

Section agreed to.

Section 16 agreed to.

On section 17—Limitation of prosecution.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe that three months will be too short a time with regard to the question "after packing or repacking," because this contemplates a possible packing taking place which may not become known to the consuming public for some considerable time. I suggested that "three" should be "six." The minister might look carefully at that. The difficulty is that as yet salt is not found in all the provinces. As a matter of fact there is, as is known, a very large deposit at Fort McMurray; but it is a long distance away and so far it has been found difficult to handle that salt as a commercial commodity. In some of our remote communities the salt could be sold, transferred and distributed and the discovery would not take place until much longer than three months. Originally, I believe, the time was thirty days; at any rate it was shorter than at present.

Mr. GARDINER: I see no objection to making that "six" months.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it would help. It does not hurt anybody.

Mr. DUNNING: I move:

That the word "three" in section 17 be struck out and "six" substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 18—Manner of determining a bushel.

Mr. STIRLING: Why are several commodities commonly sold by the bushel, such as apples, potatoes and carrots, omitted from this clause?

Mr. GARDINER: I am quite satisfied that all of those are contained in some other legislation. This is intended to deal only with matters such as were originally in the bill entitled the Inspection and Sale Act, which is now being repealed, and which have not already been covered by other legislation.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister referred to this as being an extended list from the previous act; but it does not pick up, then, all commodities which are commonly sold by the bushel; it leaves other acts to take care of them?

Mr. GARDINER: Obviously it does not take care of them all. If the committee so desires, I shall have the section stand and make sure on that point, but I think the other items are all included in other legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: I think this deals with what one might call the agricultural side rather than the commercial side of commodities.

Mr. SENN: Are the weights which are prescribed there those that are usual in the trade? Is there any variation, so far as these different commodities go, from the accepted weights in the trade?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think there is any variation; I believe these are the usual weights. From just going over this list my impression would be that practically all the commodities listed here are those commonly sold to farmers in the way of seed.

Mr. SENN: Probably the commodities to which the hon. member for Yale was referring come under the fruit branch and the acts which relate to it.

Mr. GARDINER: Vegetables and so on.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the minister has given consideration to the question whether it should be possible to make an arrangement for the sale of commodities by other than weight. The minister knows that complications have arisen, and sometimes litigation has ensued, where one man was talking about a bushel by measurement and the other man was talking about a bushel by weight. This statute provides that in the absence of an agreement for determining a bushel by measure, any reference to a bushel would mean a bushel by weight. It is a provision which I think is sound. I wonder whether we should not go further and provide that all goods should be sold by weight. There is another matter which I submit is worthy of consideration, because frequently I have known difficulty to arise through the contention being made that the so-called bushel measure was not an accurate measure of a bushel, whereas weight is a matter of exact determination and can be arrived at without difficulty. With me it is a question whether in these days the act should not be modified to provide that the standard for these purposes shall be a bushel by weight and not by measure.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, that section will stand, then.

Section stands.

Sections 19 to 21 inclusive agreed to.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

BOARDS OF REVIEW, TIME LIMIT FOR FILING PROPOSALS, ETC.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 25, to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934.

He said: I did not intend to make any extended remarks on the second reading inasmuch as the discussion was fairly full on the financial resolution preceding the introduction of the bill, and in view of the further fact that a discussion on the separate sections of the amending bill will be rather easier than any attempt to discuss the general principle.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I suggest to the minister the advisability of referring this bill to the committee on agriculture, or some other appropriate committee. I do so for this reason. The court in Manitoba has held, I believe, that the act does not apply to a corporation. I believe the departmental officials advised that it did apply to a corporation in which the farmer had incorporated his enterprise and called it a limited company. That view was acted upon in one case, but it went to the court of appeal in Manitoba.

There are a number of other points on which suggestions have been made. For instance, the chief justice of Alberta suggested that jurisdiction should be conferred upon the board of review to deal with a second hearing when there had been a drought and there had been no opportunity for the farmer to give effect within the time limit to the provisions of the compromise arrangement. It is pointed out by many who have suffered under the act that there has been a lack of consideration, on the part of some of the authorities, of the essential condition precedent upon which the act was based, namely, the insolvency of the farmer. The basis of this act is insolvency.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not desirable that farmers should be dealt with as ordinary bankrupts are, because that would involve liquidation of the assets and division of them ratably among the creditors. The purpose was to maintain the principle of bankruptcy and let the farmer work out his own salvation in fear and trembling, paying his creditors, not from the forced liquidation of his assets, as provided by ordinary bankruptcy proceedings, but by making his property more profitable. But the condition precedent to everything was insolvency, that is, inability to pay his debts, and unless that condition attached there was no right to apply under the act. That has, in some instances, been disregarded, and serious consequences have followed with great complaint on the part of those who have been thrifty and saved and lent money sometimes to thriftless persons who now laugh at them.

That situation should be considered, and, as I have said, I suggest to the minister the advisability of referring the bill to the committee on agriculture or some other appropriate committee. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) had suggestions to make the other day. With some of them I am heartily in accord, and I have some suggestions that I should like to make myself. The hon. member had a bill on the order paper. If the bill were referred to an appropriate committee I believe a useful purpose would be served, and it would enable the act to be amended in such a way as to afford a measure of relief that the act does not now afford.

I know there are many suggestions which many members of the house would like to make by way of amendment, and I was going to ask the minister if he could not see it in his heart—his mind rather than his heart—to refer the bill to such a committee as he might name in order that opportunity might be afforded for the suggestion of other amendments than those contained in his bill. Otherwise there will be other bills introduced embodying other amendments, which is the negation of efficiency and effectiveness in parliamentary practice. I believe this difficulty could be overcome if the suggestion I make were acted upon.

Mr. DUNNING: With the permission of the house may I say that I could have given consideration to the suggestion, with rather more time to consider it, had I learned of it previously.

Mr. BENNETT: Give the bill the second reading and then let it stand.

Mr. DUNNING: Naturally, in connection with such a complex matter as this admittedly is, I have a prècis of all the suggestions which have been made in connection with the act from both of the extreme points of view—extremes which have just been mentioned by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I may say frankly that until this year I despaired of getting a sufficient degree of unanimity, or shall I say compromise, between the two very wide extremes as reflected in discussions in the house on former occasions, to warrant opening the act at all. I think the leader of the opposition has a keen appreciation of both the extremes to which I am referring. Other members of the house are conscious more particularly of one of the extremes and seldom of the other. I think I may say that without offence to any hon. member.

I thought that in introducing the bill in this form it would be possible to secure agreement with respect to the proposed amendments largely because, by virtue of one of them, the operation of the act could be terminated in those provinces in which experience has demonstrated that its usefulness is now past and that it has in fact become more generally a detriment than an assistance to those whom it was designed originally to help. At the same time provision is being proposed along the line represented to us, particularly by bodies which are in close touch with the farmer and the representative of the farmer, that in those provinces where the need still manifestly exists, the machinery might be improved and speeded up to the end that the effectiveness of the act might be greater, also with, in addition, clarification of a couple of very difficult points which were referred to in the discussion on the financial resolution, one regarding privity of contract and the other regarding the affairs of deceased farmers.

If there is a general desire in the house to have the matter referred to a committee I am inclined to accede to that desire. But I would point out that if there is a committee investigation there will be the strongest kind of representations for the termination of this act. As to whether we should really improve the act as a result of a kind of free-for-all hearing of witnesses, which would undoubtedly occur before a committee—

Mr. BENNETT: No; that was not intended at all. To refer it to a committee for the purpose of receiving suggestions from members of the house was all I had in mind.

Mr. DUNNING: I can tell my right hon. friend that literally thousands of representations are being received with reference to this act and the necessity and desirability, from the standpoint of a great many people, of definitely terminating its operation. On the other hand, from the sections of the country which still need the application of this law there are equally hundreds if not thousands of representations advocating the broadening of its scope, the widening of it still more in favour of the debtor as against the creditor. I do not know any piece of legislation with which I have had to do concerning which there are such wide extremes of opinion among the people affected. It was for that reason that I felt it desirable to deal with the matter in the house if possible rather than get into a committee proceeding where it is difficult to visualize an unwillingness to hear representations pro and con from all over the country.

However, I am in the hands of the house, and if there is a disposition on the part of hon. members to desire a committee reference, I shall accede to that request. Offhand, if such reference is desired, I think I would suggest the banking and commerce committee as perhaps the most suitable for the purpose. I suppose the committee itself would have to determine whether or not it would hear representations pro and con from all over the country. I can assure the house that if such a committee is decided upon, the sessions will be lengthy; there will be many representations and many concerns desirous of appearing by counsel before the committee. If, however, there is an expression of opinion now on second reading in favour of reference to a committee, I shall ask the house to give the bill second reading and then I shall come along with the proper motion after we have had time to consider the matter further.

Mr. BENNETT: If I might say a further word, I had no intention that the reference to a committee should involve the calling of witnesses, and I did not propose that when the minister moved that the bill go to a committee, he should embody provisions for calling witnesses. My proposal was only for the purpose of enabling members of the house who have suggestions as to reasonable methods to put them before the committee without having to take up the time of the house in submitting amendments which could not be as thoroughly discussed in committee of the whole as they could before a standing committee. I agree entirely with what the minister said as to the inadvisability of proceeding along the lines to which he has referred, and it was not intended that his motion should embody any provision for hearing counsel or witnesses; the idea was merely that members of the house might have an opportunity to appear and suggest amendments which I dare say most of them have had suggested to them by their constituents.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): If this bill is to be referred to a committee, might I suggest that it be a special committee? I believe with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) that there would be large numbers of representations, probably written as well as by people who want to be heard; and as a member of the banking and commerce committee I believe that the time of that committee is going to be very well occupied. I noticed to-day, there was a motion to allow the committee to sit coincidently with the house. It seems to me that if this matter is to be discussed by a committee, it should not be the banking and commerce committee, or no conclusion might be reached this session, and I am of the opinion that we should come to some conclusion this session.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, positively.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe the Minister of Finance is taking the proper course in endeavouring to meet the needs of the various provinces in this regard, and I can assure him that as far as Saskatchewan is concerned it is a matter of very pressing need. The people there look to this session of parliament to do something in two directions; to relieve the present necessity, and if possible to give some relief to those who had their cases dealt with by a former board, conditions having become aggravated in the last two or three years. So I support the idea of having this question considered by a committee, but I think it should be a committee other than the banking and commerce committee, possibly a special committee.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I desire to support the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I think it is absolutely necessary that some further amendments than those provided in this bill be made to the act to meet the situation in Saskatchewan. I know the people there are looking for further amendment, and I support the proposal that the bill go to a committee. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is a good one. Some of these committees are getting pretty well loaded up with work, and as action should be taken promptly in this matter perhaps a special committee is desirable.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): I rise with some hesitation to express an opinion on this matter. The suggestion of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) is that this committee should be restricted pretty well to hearing the opinions of hon. members. Now, as I understand, hon. members can express themselves quite freely and make suggestions and propose amendments in committee of the whole house—they cannot move amendments which may involve expenditure of money, but they can suggest them, and I assume they will be given sympathetic consideration by the government. It seems to me that matters not as important as this have been deemed worthy of consideration by the committee of the whole house, and I do not see why there should be the suggestion from the leader of the opposition, who has taken time for some matters not as important in my opinion as this, that this is not worthy of consideration by the committee of the whole house.

Mr. BENNETT: It would have to come back to the committee of the whole house.

Mr. TUCKER: Well, that is no reason why the matter should be put into the hands of a special committee which, if it is to hear witnesses at all, will be subjected to pressure to hear others than members of the house. I do not see how the committee could possibly refuse to hear witnesses who wished to appear. People will say, Why should members alone be permitted to give evidence? And once the matter is opened up, as the Minister of Finance has said, there will be a drive to have this act repealed. I think the government have been wise to open this in a restricted way and keep it restricted. Any amendments worth while can be suggested in committee of the whole house, will have sympathetic consideration and will be dealt with promptly, and this procedure will save the whole matter from becoming a subject of controversy all over the country.

Mr. W. G. CLARK (York-Sunbury): I am in favour of the view expressed by the hon. member who suggested that this could be dealt with in committee of the whole house. As far as my province is concerned I am sure that this act has been a detriment from the beginning, and the desire of our province is to have it discontinued. But we would like to have the matter settled one way or the other during this session.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be considered by the committee of the whole?

Mr. DUNNING: At the next sitting, I think, because I should like to give consideration to what has been said. There has not been a broad expression of opinion from many members, but I should like to give consideration to what has been said before the bill is again discussed. I am certainly impressed with the seriousness of the difficulties surrounding the act, and I am anxious to pursue a course which will develop something constructive, although I am quite sure that no course can be followed by this parliament which will satisfy either extreme view. It is quite impossible to do that. Of course we may land in the position where we succeed in satisfying no one, but I am quite sure that we can succeed in improving the position of the unfortunates of both classes, creditors and debtors.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Dunning moves that the bill be not now referred to the committee of the whole, but that it be referred at the next sitting of the house.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—STATEMENT OF MR. ROSS (ST. PAUL'S) ON MOTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, as it has been the practice in parliament from time immemorial for members to present the grievances of their constituents before supply is granted, I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to present the grievances of my constituents with respect to the policy of the government in the distribution of the money voted by parliament for grants in aid, as it affects my constituents in regard to providing funds for unemployment relief. This is a matter of grave urgency, and affects not only my riding of St. Paul's but the city of Toronto and the province of Ontario.

Let us consider the statement of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). On Wednesday, February 23, there appeared in the Ottawa Journal a report of a statement purported to have been made by the hon. minister. It is headed, "Irresponsible Threats Futile." In this statement the Minister of Labour is reported to have said:

> Nothing will be gained by irresponsible threats in the discussion of the relief problem in Ontario.

I do not know what "irresponsible threats" were made, other than that the federal government would have to take care of the relief for the increasing number of those unemployed needing relief, and that in the event of the federal government not providing funds for this purpose, the municipalities would be unable to do so and the unemployed would have to take the consequences. Why should they be the goat, when this matter is none of their making? I wish to register my protest.

The minister refers to "irresponsible threats." It seems to me it shows rather a lack of dignity on the part of the minister in expressing himself in this manner. I do not think it becomes a minister of the crown. The minister has been referred to in the press as a "tough guy" for this reason. To say the least, it casts a slur on those in positions of authority in the municipalities and in the province of Ontario. I think it might be well to appreciate the fact that there is serious urgency and a great deal of discontent in connection with this matter. Those who have the responsibility with respect to the solution should receive courtesy, whether the hon. minister thinks they deserve it or not.

There is a big trek into the city of Toronto of unemployed from outside, which throws a further burden on the city, and this is so with other municipalities. In 1930, when the Prime Minister made the statement in the House of Commons that he could see no urgency with respect to the unemployment situation in Toronto, there were thousands of citizens of that city starving, and the citizens of Toronto themselves were forced to come to the help of these destitute people. I wonder if the Minister of Labour sees no urgency in Toronto at the present time. Perhaps he will not go as far as to say "not a five cent piece for Tory Toronto."

Toronto has stood the burden of relief up to the very limit and far and away beyond what is the city's responsibility. There is an urgency to this matter. The municipality of the city of Toronto is unable to strike its tax rate at the present time. Relief has been so heavy, and the fact is that the municipalities are now so burdened by taxes that they are unable to contribute further. The city is faced with an increased allowance for relief. The allowance was based on the Campbell report made several years ago when prices were much lower, and is inadequate at the present time. The Minister of Labour is reported to have stated:

> It is important to remember that the unemployment problem is gradually moving in the direction of solution. This statement is supported by preliminary figures contained in reports received from every province.

That may have been so some months ago, but the situation had materially altered in January and February of this year in the city of Toronto, and I imagine this is so in other municipalities. There was a very large increase in the number of those on relief in January of this year, and a still further increase in February. There were over 68,000 on relief in January. There were over 73,000 on relief in February. There are more now, and we know that there are a great many who have become unemployed but who have not yet gone on relief. A great many are of the opinion that there are as many people in the city of Toronto unemployed to-day as there were at this time last year, if not more. In any event, there are almost as many on relief as at this time last year. In my own riding of St. Paul's I can hear on every side nothing but conversations of this kind: "Bill has been laid off." "Tom's on short time." "I wonder how soon I will be cut down or laid off." "Do you think we are going to have another depression?" And yet the Minister of Labour is reported to have said that the unemployment problem is gradually moving in the direction of a solution.

The Minister of Labour is reported to have stated:

> As to the question of the dominion government's contribution by grants in aid, three things should be borne in mind in considering this:
> (1) That Canada, being under a federal constitution, the dominion government is bound to exercise absolute impartiality in granting aid;
> (2) That aid granted must be paid by all Canadians;
> (3) That unemployment has decreased.

With respect to (3), in the last four months unemployment has not decreased in Toronto; it has increased, and the prospects are that it will continue to increase. With respect to (1) and (2), I quite agree with the minister, but this is not being carried out. Far from it; instead of exercising "absolute impartiality", the greatest partiality is being shown. The hon. minister is reported to have stated:

> Now, as we near the end of the fiscal year, a demand comes from one province for an immediate increase in the grant in aid to that province. This demand is made even though the province in question is in excellent condition financially, and quite able to assist needy municipalities.

And again:

> The grant to Ontario is fair and reasonable, having regard to the reduction of relief and the financial position of the province.

Most certainly the financial contribution from Ontario, in comparison with that of other provinces, is not being considered. Is that fair? Further on in his statement, the minister is reported as saying:

> The fact that the condition due to drought in the west constitutes a national emergency was agreed to by all parties is apparently forgotten.

It has not been forgotten.

While there is a national emergency with respect to unemployment, as a result of drought in the west, there is undoubtedly a national emergency in connection with industrial unemployment in the east, largely due to the policy of this government in allowing a great increase in manufactured goods imported into Canada, and particularly the province of Ontario and the city of Toronto.

The bureau of statistics shows that there has been a large increase in imports. The following are the figures showing imports through the port of Toronto:

	1935	1936	1937
October. ..	$10,408,503	$11,864,600	$14,295,819
November .	9,935,756	12,169,109	13,506,105
December .	7,895,955	9,995,590	10,219,275

The following figures will show the increase in the importations of automobiles into Canada:

	1935	1936	1937
October.	88,187	649,450	1,078,893
November. ..	170,711	661,216	1,398,751
December. ..	114,341	764,783	1,176,585

I do not wish to take time to quote the many other examples of increased importations which are due to the lowering of tariffs. In 1936, one automobile manufacturer ordered $100,000 in parts from a parts manufacturer; in 1937 the order was reduced to 60,000, and in 1938 there are no orders.

I believe this industry gives a fair example. The balance of trade has changed. In the twelve months ended December 31, 1936, we had a favourable trade balance of $57,051,952. In 1937, it had dropped to $44,876,419, and on January 31, 1938, it had reversed to an adverse balance of $20,135,836. Is this a repetition of 1929?

If it were not for these circumstances, by now we would not have employable unemployed. I cannot, nor can any other fair-minded person agree with the burden placed upon Ontario, simply because of its financial position. Because it is in a better financial position than some other provinces, why should Ontario have to assume the financial responsibilities of the federal government with respect to employable unemployed? I refer particularly to the employable unemployed. Why should Saskatchewan receive one hundred per cent relief, when, simply because they are in a better financial position, other provinces in Canada are asked to assume some of the burden? Is this absolute impartiality?

How does the minister reconcile his statement:

> The government has since then proceeded on the principle of allocating fairly among the provinces the amount authorized by parliament. The government has no blank cheque.

If this is not a blank cheque, then I should like to know what a blank cheque is. The government makes a decision, then writes in the name of the province for which, in its own arbitrary discretion, it would most like to write a cheque. What a funny kind of absolute impartiality! That kind of fun is no joke for either Ontario or Toronto. Perhaps it is intended to be a left-handed compliment.

What influences have been brought to bear on the government by the recipients? Is it the solid block from western Canada supporting the government which has twisted the government's mind in this matter? Speeches delivered earlier this session cannot but have left a lasting impression on our minds in this respect. I should like to know how the word "fairly" is defined, because I cannot reconcile any dictionary interpretation I have ever seen with the practice of the government.

I want to make it abundantly clear that I have no quarrel with Saskatchewan or with any other province over the amounts of grants they have received or are about to receive, but I want to make it clear that the only basis on which the $19,500,000 voted last session for relief purposes can be fairly, equitably and with absolute impartiality allocated is on the basis of employable unemployed. It is a question not of financial position or contribution, but simply one of employable unemployment. The minister has said that these payments are to be made by all Canadians, and has also said:

> The dominion government is not and never has been responsible for meeting social need as distinct from emergency employment need. The British North America Act gives the provincial governments the primary obligation for meeting this social distress.

This is admitted, and I do not see that there is any quarrel in this respect.

The figures of the national employment commission with respect to Ontario show that the unemployables amounted to thirty per cent of the total employed in the month of September. There has been a large increase in unemployment in the last few months, and consequently there are less than twenty per cent unemployable now in Ontario. The figure for Toronto is less than ten per cent. These figures are based on those issued by the national employment commission, and must be admitted.

We find that $7,194,954 was expended for relief purposes in Toronto in the calendar year 1937. The figures show that as there were ten per cent unemployable in Toronto, that city and Ontario combined should contribute only $719,495 for Toronto, whereas Toronto contributed $3,279,346 in 1937. To a very large extent, by way of taxes on its citizens, it also contributed to the relief of other provinces. The province of Ontario, also, contributed. Is this absolute impartiality?

The fiscal policy of the government—not Toronto, or Ontario—is responsible for unemployment. The policy of the government in reducing tariffs on manufactured articles, and in the non-application of the valuation of articles entering the country for duty purposes, has been responsible for a tremendous influx of manufactured goods, and also for the entry of large quantities of goods which have been dumped into Canada, on account of the drop in prices in the United States.

Every time a manufactured article, the like of which is produced in Canada, enters and is sold in Canada, it takes the amount of labour required to produce it away from the citizens of Canada, Ontario and Toronto. If labour is taken away from the workmen of this province, it must take employment from our workmen. This means more unemployment. If the government insists upon allowing this entry of manufactured articles into the country, it is responsible for the resultant increase in unemployment. The city of Toronto depends on industry, on industrial employment, for the welfare of its workers. Therefore, if the workers of Toronto are unemployed, it is the responsibility of the federal governmest to see that they are adequately maintained.

Canadian manufacturers have told the government that if they had the advantage of their own markets they could employ thousands more workers, without increasing prices, and that they could, in fact, reduce costs and improve continuity of employment. They have also informed the government that further reduction of tariffs will increase unemployment and lower wages. If sections of the country are to have lower tariffs, people in the east will have to have compensation.

The city of Toronto is unable to collect sufficient money by taxes. Properties are assessed too highly and taxes are too great. The position is becoming such that instead of property being an asset, it is becoming a liability. Government bonds give almost as great a net yield on the capital invested; and there is no incentive on the part of individuals to risk their capital. As a consequence, building is at a low ebb. The slum situation is serious. Fine, large buildings have been torn down to save taxes, with a consequent loss of revenue to the city. Toronto is not the only municipality that is in the same position. What a deplorable state of affairs!

The proposal of the government again to lower the tariff on articles imported into Canada from the United States through a revision of the Canada-United States trade agreement, the prospect of having these items bound for a period of years and the general uncertainty in this respect have had the effect of slowing up the manufacturing industries of Ontario ever since the first rumours became prevalent in September or October of 1937. It is ridiculous to think that manufacturers with millions in capital involved, entrusted by thousands of shareholders and having payrolls of millions for thousands of workers, should be unable to gather one iota of information with respect to the contemplated changes in tariffs affecting them. These items may be bound for years.

How can a wise manufacturer make plans for the running of his plant during 1938 when all these rumours are abroad? If he has been considering extensions to his operations which would benefit his workers, he certainly would not act under conditions as they are to-day. It is common knowledge that those in charge of industry are not acting—they cannot. This is also true: They should be able to act. But the policy of this government has tied their hands. What about 1939, 1940 and 1941? They should be able to plan for the future. And is this all?

What security is there for the workman in these circumstances? Can he give his best to his employer when he is constantly under this apprehension? Is he working for the future? When can he hope to have his new home? When can he hope to have his old one paid for? How can he hope to improve his standard of living beyond that of a mere day to day existence? How can he budget for the future? How can he save? What can he hope of the future? No wonder there is apathy when it originates here. What are all these rumours about? They are about the contemplated revision of a trade agreement.

We are to give something away in return for what? Trade with one of the most unstable nations of the world commercially, a nation with large inventories, a nation with more than ten million workers unemployed at the present time, a nation with its own house in great disorder economically. I ask you: What stability commercially can we expect from such instability? We do not want periods of great prosperity followed by periods of severe depression. We would do better if we stuck to our knitting and minded our own business. Are we trying to bargain with them to take something they do not want, or is it something that they must have and for which we do not have to bargain?

Mr. HANSON: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I have sat in this house since 1930; my English is poor and my grammar is terrible, but when I have tried to read a speech I have always been called to order. I notice that in this eighteenth parliament any hon. member can rise in his place and read his speech for forty minutes. I should like to have the privilege of preparing a speech and reading it in the house, and I ask for a ruling on this.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the right hon. gentleman desire to speak on the point of order?

Mr. BENNETT: I have just this observation to make. We had a discussion the other day about amending the rules of the house and on that occasion an admirable speech was read.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is that speeches shall not be read, but it has not always been observed. Hon. members do read speeches even though it is against the rule.

Mr. BENNETT: He can use notes.

Mr. SPEAKER: An hon. member may refer to his notes.

Mr. HANSON: If that is to be the practice, I should like to have the same privilege.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is it something that they must have from us to compete with us in our own markets? Let us sell them the goods they need; let us not try to build up an artificial relationship. That is a quack remedy. We are a nation. We built our own plant, our own canals, our own railways, and are now building our own airways along national lines. We must use these nationally. We began by building our prosperity on national lines, and history shows that every time we got away from our own national economy we had a depression. We have been grasping for artificial foreign trade.

This government has adopted a laissez-faire policy with respect to the west and has scrapped the constructive policy of the former government. The first step was in connection with the wheat board. The wheat economy of the west has failed and it will fail again. The west must have a change. It will never be continuously prosperous until industries are established. The west has the assets most needed for manufacturing. It has oil, coal and gas in abundance, and there is plenty of labour available. Protection is necessary for the development of industries. The west is dependent upon the east for its support; the east must help the west. In the meantime, the east must have adequate protection and, if necessary, the west will have to be compensated.

We are one of a commonwealth of nations. From 1932 until October, 1937, we progressed steadily in prosperity as a result of our empire relationships. We are a nation of the commonwealth of nations. Let us have protection that protects nationally and within the commonwealth of nations, mutual protection that is mutually satisfactory. We are bound together by ties that are stronger than trade, but that are helped by trade—sentiment and mutual defence and common laws. This is not the case as between ourselves and the United States. No such ties exist.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

JURISDICTION OF RAILWAY COMMISSION OVER TELEPHONE TOLLS AND SERVICES

Mr. WILFRID LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) moved the second reading of Bill No. 14, to amend the Railway Act (telephone tolls).

He said: During the session of 1937 I had the privilege of introducing a bill to amend the Railway Act, the purport of which was to extend and clarify the jurisdiction of the board of railway commissioners with regard to telephone companies. The bill went through the first and second readings, and was then referred, according to the rules, to the railway committee, where it was defeated on a division taken at my own request.

Since the prorogation of parliament I have received so many communications asking me to follow up the measure, and have gathered such useful data, that I could not lose heart. I know that where trusts are concerned one must fight every inch of the way. When people are acquainted with the actual conditions, the Bell Telephone Company will have to make concessions. We are dealing with a public utility. Every telephone subscriber is entitled to fair treatment. In the present case did the trust ever think of anything but collecting revenues?

In Loretteville, nine miles from Quebec, there are many subscribers who have to call Quebec once, twice or even several times a day. Is it fair to charge them each time for a long distance call? It might have been reasonable when the telephone was first established in Quebec, but surely not now. It seems as though the company did not know or did not wish to know that our town, like Montreal, Three Rivers and other towns in our province, had considerably increased. Important centres have sprung up a few miles away, and conditions are not what they were years ago. However, the Bell Telephone Company insists on maintaining the same limits as they established when first they started to operate in our community. In certain spots the area of local calls barely covers the town. We are asking the company not to court bankruptcy, but to arrange the service according to present needs. We want the company to extend their local rates in a more reasonable way, and more particularly, to include in that local district the small surrounding farming and industrial communities.

The case was submitted to and heard by the board of railway commissioners in January, 1937, but that did not alter the situation. The commissioners arrived at the conclusion that the "establishment, the splitting up or readjustment of telephone exchanges were matters of internal economy for the company with which the board could not properly interfere." However, Mr. Garceau, a member of the board, while concurring in the decision, submitted that the board had a right to interfere when there was clear evidence that unreasonable or unfair rates were charged on account of such splitting up or readjustment.

Seeing that the board disagreed, there was only one way left, and that was to amend the Railway Act as regards the telephone rates. At the very beginning of the 1937 session I introduced the bill in order to give the board of railway commissioners the necessary powers. The bill seemed at first to be welcome, but unfortunately it did not meet with the support we hoped for. That was perhaps to be expected; but I did not give up the struggle, and I have come back with the bill.

Quebec is not the only city which is suffering from the treatment meted out by the telephone trust. Montreal is in exactly the same position. A great number of subscribers in the outskirts of the metropolis never could see why they had to pay long distance rates to call Montreal when the company was piling up profits. When the case was heard before the board of railway commissioners the representatives of the company stated, "The expenditures that you want to force upon us are too heavy, and our company is not able to bear them." They talk about expenditures, but we are dealing now with decreasing profits. Let us see whether the company is unable to make a very small sacrifice for the benefit of its subscribers in the outskirts of large cities.

I have before me the financial statement of the Bell Telephone Company for 1936. It shows that the net profits amounted to $8,929,000 and that business was improving throughout the country. But that is not enough to enable one to grasp actual conditions. As I have already said, I suggest that part of what might be called "operating expenses" is handed out to the Northern Electric, a subsidiary of the Bell Telephone Company, including but very few shareholders. They hide their profits; they dare not distribute them to the Bell Telephone Company and its shareholders. It is a manoeuvre to hide actual dividends from the public, and the people are thus prevented from sharing in the profits piled up by the company. That is a social injustice, but it is the way the trust is acting.

"Labor" of Washington, on December 29, 1936, gave out some interesting details about the company's unjustifiable methods. The Federal Board of Transportation, it says, investigated the Bell company and another manufacturing company which is one of the latter's subsidiaries, the Western Electric Company. The investigators found that about $500,000,000 of the Bell company's equipment value was sheer "water." Cyrus G. Hill, chief engineer of the board, explained how the American Telephone and Telegraph Company made enormous profits. The Bell company, Mr. Hill stated, purchases ninety-two per cent of its equipment from the Western Electric, thus precluding any competition and enabling the Western Electric to charge whatever prices they want. The money is simply transferred from one to another of the company's coffers.

In the same article something is said about the appliance commonly called the French telephone. As a result of additional charges the company made a further profit of $24,000,000. The additional charges were levied on the ground that it entailed a further expenditure for the company. Such a claim is groundless, said Mr. Hill. As a matter of fact, the new telephones mean a great saving as they eliminate wire manufacturing costs and other expenditures, amounting to more than $85,000,000. Thus are things done in the United States.

The part played by the Western Electric Company, Incorporated, in its relations with the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, is similar to the part played in this country by the Northern Electric Company in connection with the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. I have before me a document which shows clearly how the Northern Electric is controlled by the Bell Telephone Company. I succeeded in obtaining the list of the Northern Electric Company's shareholders. Here it is—a very short one indeed. It shows that there are just two large shareholders, the Bell Telephone Company of Canada and the Western Electric Company, Incorporated, the former with 456,540 shares, and the latter with 353,130 shares. The Western Electric is the very company referred to by investigator Hill in his report.

The Bell company claims that the adjustmake anyone believe that it is not in a position to have its system adjusted to meet present needs, even though this should entail a very small decrease in its profits. Besides, we are not requesting at the present time anything from the company itself; we simply wish the board of railway commissioners to be empowered to approve or disapprove the limits and rates of exchanges, after which the board will arbitrate on the issue.

I feel confident that the board will not allow the continuance of the abnormal conditions about which subscribers living in the outskirts of Quebec city are complaining. The company will possibly claim that since my bill was brought down in the house, it has granted a yearly reduction of $25,000 in my constituency; but the principle of the matter at issue is in no way affected; for there are in my constituency various small industrial and farming communities, in continuous contact with Quebec, which are in need of easy telephone communication in order to sell their products as well as to purchase supplies in that city. This necessitates numerous calls every day, and even when they are unable to get the interested party on the line they must pay a toll for the useless call.

The Bell company claims that the adjustment suggested would mean too heavy an expenditure on its part. My reply will be that the Bell Telephone has never granted the public a single appreciable change in its rates.

I am now urging hon. members to help me in this matter, because, if we wish to stem the rising tide of communism in this country, the best way is to give the common people, those who wish to live and breathe freely under our fair Canadian sun, the means of providing for their wants, and to afford also to our Canadian people the utilities to which they are rightly entitled.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): The bill introduced by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Lacroix) follows along the general line of a bill introduced by him last session. While I did not disagree with the principle of the bill which my hon. friend introduced at the last session, I thought it necessary to oppose its passage by reason of the fact that by its wording it would have had the effect of making the board of railway commissioners into a rate-creating commission whereas their proper function is that of a rate-regulating commission. In the present bill that wording has been corrected; therefore I find myself in entire agreement with this bill.

We must all recognize that the Bell Telephone Company has a monopoly of a great public service in the districts in which it operates, and it is entirely sound government to provide that a public service monopoly shall be regulated as completely as possible. If, as appears from the Loretteville case, the board has not ample power to pass on tolls for zones outside a city area, I congratulate my hon. friend upon introducing a bill which definitely gives the board that power.

However, in accepting this bill, I cannot agree with all that the hon. member has said about our telephone monopoly. I think it is important to the people of Canada that the telephone business be a monopoly. If, for example, in the city of Quebec there were two competing telephone companies, this would mean that every business house would have to subscribe to both services, and every householder who happened to be on one company's system would be handicapped if he did not have access to the subscribers of the other company. Therefore we may say that the telephone business is a natural monopoly, and that it is better for the population served by telephone that this should be so. However, the Bell Telephone Company, having a monopoly, must conduct its business with extreme care to see to it that no injustice is done to any group of its subscribers. I believe the Bell Telephone Company is exercising care to see that no class of subscribers should have a particular complaint as against other classes of subscribers. As my hon. friend has said, as a result of the Loretteville case, even though the board had no jurisdiction to make a ruling the telephone company of its own volition has adjusted the rates complained of more nearly in line with what the telephone subscribers demanded.

There are many curious features about the telephone business in general that need to be considered before we pass judgment on a particular situation. It is the only business of which I know where it does not follow that the profits are greater with an increasing amount of business at each centre. As a matter of fact it costs the Bell Telephone Company more to give service in a city where there are a hundred thousand instruments than it does in a city where there are fifty thousand instruments. The highest rates per telephone in Canada are in the largest cities of Canada, Toronto and Montreal. The reason for that, of course, is that every telephone in a large area has to be connected with every other telephone in that area, thus making necessary a most complicated, complex and expensive system of cables, automatic connectors and devices of that kind. The larger the telephone exchange, the more complicated are its processes and the more expensive its equipment.

That being the case, we find that whereas the resident of a large city may find it worth while to pay the price required for telephone service in that city, which will connect him with every other telephone subscriber in the city, a man living outside the city whose business and connections are not principally in the city may require a different kind of service. An example of that can be found in the city of Ottawa. In the old days the Ottawa exchange served only the city of Ottawa proper, and toll charges had to be paid on calls to Rockcliffe and Eastview. However, with the steady growth of these connections we have the Ottawa exchange now serving Ottawa, Hull, Rockcliffe, Eastview and Westboro, all within the exchange and all given service at a flat rate.

Mr. MacNICOL: If a subscriber in Ottawa wishes to telephone to a subscriber in Hull, does he have to pay a toll?

Mr. HOWE: No; they are served by the same exchange. But the cost of a business telephone in Ottawa is $5.50 per month, and the cost of a residence telephone is $3.10 per month. Now we come to the town of Aylmer, which is not a part of the Ottawa exchange and where it is necessary to pay a toll in order to talk to Ottawa.

Mr. MacNICOL: How much?

Mr. HOWE: Ten cents per call. But the prices of telephones in Aylmer are, of course, very much less than in Ottawa. For instance, a business telephone in Aylmer costs $2.50 per month, or about half the cost of a business telephone in Ottawa, while a residence telephone in Aylmer costs $2.05 per month. It is very probable that many residents of Aylmer find it much better to have a telephone service at a lower price, which they can use within the Aylmer zone, than to pay the higher price which would be entailed by a connection with Ottawa. There may be others who require to make frequent calls to Ottawa, and who might find it better to be connected directly with the Ottawa exchange. But the effect of the telephone company would be twofold if all the telephones in the Aylmer zone, let us say, were connected with the Ottawa exchange. There would be a tendency to increase the cost of all telephones in Ottawa, and a certain result would be that the people of Aylmer would find it necessary to pay the Ottawa rate, probably plus a mileage charge which usually goes on a telephone when the connection is over two miles from the exchange.

I am simply pointing this out to show that there is some background of equity in the theory of zones outside cities. I am quite aware that zoning is not popular with some of the people who live outside the cities. For instance, a business house located outside the free zone of the telephone exchange may have the great bulk of its business in the city, and may find that city telephone calls are rather expensive. On the other hand, I venture to say that in its zone there are private citizens who have telephones, that could not afford telephones at the rates charged in the city. So sometimes we are apt to overemphasize the viewpoint of the business man living outside an exchange zone as against that of an ordinary resident living in the same vicinity, who wishes to have a telephone at a reasonable price in order that he may talk with his neighbours and occasionally telephone to the city.

I may say that the telephone company is experimenting with new plans for handling zones adjacent to large cities. I think in some of the areas close to Toronto a plan is being instituted whereby a rate is being given which will allow a certain number of free calls per month into the city. I think the arrangement is one hundred free calls plus five cents a call in excess of the free limit. I understand that this plan is being tried as an experiment, to see whether the people are better or less pleased as a result.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister referring to the new orders of the telephone company in connection with telephone charges between Toronto and Weston?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; that is the thought I have in mind. I may say that I have made no particular study of this situation; I have drawn on what I have learned of the telephone business generally during the past few years. I had that particular case drawn to my attention because someone was discussing it a short time ago, but I am not attempting to lay down any doctrine of telephone engineering. Since the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency has made rather a serious attack on the telephone company, however, I just wish to point out that there is a basis of reason in the attitude of the company, and that possibly while some business people in a zoned area find their telephones more expensive because they are in that area, there are many ordinary residence telephones which enjoy lower rates due to the fact that they are located in the zone rather than connected with the main exchange.

I think that on the whole, in giving Canada an efficient telephone service at reasonable cost, the Bell Telephone Company is doing a good job. We find that it is a progressive company. Recently in the city of Ottawa it has changed over from manually operated to automatic phones, and in all parts of Canada we find it constantly improving its technique. Some time ago a new process developed which multiplied by four the number of messages the company is able to send over a single wire. Automatically and very quickly thereafter long distance tolls were reduced.

The close connection between the Bell Telephone Company and the Northern Electric Company has been referred to. I think neither company would attempt for a moment to disguise the fact that the Northern Electric Company is a subsidiary of the Bell Telephone Company. I see nothing improper in that relationship. The telephone company uses about ninety per cent of the telephone and other equipment manufactured by the Northern Electric Company. The close association between the two companies permits the telephone company to buy its equipment at or near manufacturing costs, and the close connection between the Northern Electric Company and the Western Electric Company, which manufactures for the American telephone company, allows an interchange of patents and a general collaboration in connection with inventive work.

I believe that in a discussion of the operation of a highly specialized business, such as the telephone business, where the public benefits from the fact that one company controls all telephones, the operating company should not be condemned solely because it is a monopoly. But I believe that it becomes the duty of the state to apply every legitimate form of regulation to the company, and to take full power to review its rate making, in every particular. For that reason I believe the bill is desirable, and I therefore suggest that the bill be given second reading, and referred to the committee of the whole house.

Mr. CHURCH: In attempting to clarify the present jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, does not the present bill in effect overrule the decision of the board in the case of Quebec-Montmorency Chamber of Commerce v. Bell Telephone Company? In attempting to clarify the jurisdiction of the board, does not the proposed bill, ipso facto, overrule the board?

Mr. HOWE: I would hardly think that is so. I am not very familiar with the Loretteville case, but my understanding is that the board were asked to give a ruling on a matter having to do with rate charges in a zone outside the city of Quebec. I believe the board stated that its jurisdiction under the act did not extend to the type of decision it was then asked to make. The bill purports simply to enlarge the act under which the board operates, and to make it clear that the board has jurisdiction as set out in the act. The position will be that if the board goes back to Loretteville it may consider the case, as it will have ample authority to consider the case to which it felt formerly that its jurisdiction did not extend.

Mr. MacNICOL: Before the minister takes his seat, may I ask him if, before the Bell Telephone Company was committed to issue the new tolls for services between Toronto and Weston, those new tolls and service charges were reviewed by the government, through the board which has control over the Bell Telephone Company?

Mr. HOWE: In a discussion of the matter with Mr. Campbell, the rate authority of the railway board, he mentioned that the proposal had been brought before him, and that he was now studying it. I believe I can tell the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) that before those tolls are put into force they will be reviewed by the board of railway commissioners. I think it is quite possible that a public hearing will be held at which representations can be made.

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, may I call the minister's attention to what I have always considered an injustice in connection with rural telephone lines connected with the Bell Telephone Company. The Bell Telephone Company charge to the rural company the long distance calls originating from rural lines. They send their bills in monthly, for payment. On the other hand, the rural company may collect at intervals of six months or possibly only once a year. Yet they have to pay every month for long distance calls originating on their lines, and they get nothing for doing this. There is no fee collected by rural lines for long distance calls originating on those lines, where there is connection with the Bell Telephone Company. For many years I have been associated with one of the largest rural telephone companies in this section of the country, and we simply collect money for the Bell Telephone Company. If one of our customers defaults, it is our misfortune, because we have already paid his long distance fees.

I have in mind a farmer who at one time was president of a farm organization and did considerable telephoning to Toronto. Afterwards he failed, and we were left not only with our own telephone bill, but with a large long distance bill which we had already paid, but on which we could not collect. Every year in connection with rural lines we lose a certain amount of money which we have paid over to the Bell Telephone Company on calls originating on our lines. We have to look to the farmer for our money, and if he does not pay we are out that much. I have always felt that the Bell Telephone Company should allow some fee for long distance work originating on rural lines.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 1—Telephone companies.

Mr. NEILL: Should not this bill have gone to the railway committee?

Mr. HOWE: It is now being more or less piloted by the government. A similar bill was considered thoroughly in the railway committee last year and they seemed to be for it. I see no reason why it should not pass to-night.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

APPLICATION OF PROVISIONS OF CHINESE IMMIGRATION ACT, REVISED STATUTES, 1927, CHAPTER 95

The house resumed from Friday, February 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Neill for the second reading of Bill No. 11, respecting Japanese immigration.

[Mr. Thompson.]

Mr. D. A. McNIVEN (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I should like to extend my personal congratulations to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) upon the presentation of his motion for the second reading of this bill. This was a task which he accomplished with his usual thoroughness and logic. I regret exceedingly my inability to support the measure so ably sponsored by the hon. member, as this question is regarded by all members from British Columbia as being of paramount importance to that province. I would not for one moment discount the local problem which this bill is designed to correct, but its provisions are much wider than that; they may assume national, if not international, proportions.

The world situation is so complicated and complex to-day that we should hesitate before taking any action, the consequences of which we are unable to foresee and against which we may or may not be able to protect ourselves at this time. The question of oriental immigration has always been important on the Pacific coast, and this problem is reflected in all the provinces to a greater or lesser degree. We were told the other evening that in 1923 restrictions were imposed upon Chinese immigration. At that time the matter of Japanese immigration was left open or guarded by an agreement entered into between the Canadian and Japanese governments. I have no doubt that distinction was made because of the fact that during the world war Japan was a member of the allied forces, and her fleet protected the Pacific coast and was responsible for keeping away from our shores the German raiders which had created a certain amount of havoc in that part of the world and which were subsequently disposed of by the Australian navy.

We were also told the other evening that in years gone by there had been a certain laxity in immigration matters, and as a result many orientals, of both Chinese and Japanese origin, had entered this country without authority. We were told how in recent months action had been taken to examine into these illegal entries and that some nine hundred orientals had left the country because they knew that they would be deported in any event in a short time, while another six hundred had actually been deported. As an instance of the long arm of the law I should like to cite a case in Regina. Some time in August, 1937, an oriental was arrested in that city charged with having entered

Canada illegally. Although he had been conducting a market gardening business in Regina for a period of seven years, he could give no satisfactory account as to how he came into the country. He was given a hearing before a board which sat in Vancouver; but being unable to satisfy the board that he had entered legally, he was put on board a ship and sent back to the place whence he came.

The other evening the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) mentioned that while it might be considered all right for hon. members to express opinions which might be regarded as the opinions of members only, it was a different matter when parliament spoke—that would be regarded as one nation speaking to another.

SUPPLY

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—STATEMENT BY MR. ROSS (ST. PAUL'S) ON MOTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Dunning for committee of supply.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, before the recess I had mentioned that we were one of a commonwealth of nations; that we were bound together by ties which were stronger than trade but which were helped by trade—sentiment, mutual defence and common laws. Trade treaties between governments foreign to each other are likely to press with severity on one side or the other. You take a treaty as it were for better or for worse, like marriage, and for those who deem it for worse, it feels like a yoke all the time. Do not let us forget that divorce is difficult. Do not let us bind any more items under the Canada-United States trade agreement.

Earlier in my remarks I mentioned the balance of trade, referring to the trade balance between Canada and the United States. I maintain that the action of this government in departing from our national and empire policy is responsible for the unemployment situation which obtains to-day, and the prospect of a further increase in unemployment is staring us in the face. Employable unemployment is the responsibility of this government. The money must be found, but I object to the policy of this government in balancing its budget at the expense of my constituents in St. Paul's or of the people of the city of Toronto and the province of Ontario.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): My constituents also have a grievance; it is much the same as the one which has been so ably expounded to-day by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross). By wire, by letter, and finally by long distance call I was summoned home to my constituency to attend at the city hall, Toronto, and discuss, first, with their elected representatives, the mayor and members of the board of control, a matter of great moment to them. They felt that they could not strike on the one billion dollars of assessment in that great city an equitable tax rate which would permit it to grow and prosper as it should, the reason being that the cost of direct relief and of social services has grown by leaps and bounds, causing an increase in the necessary mill rate, whilst the assessment in each of the last five years has been shrinking, with the net result that they cannot derive enough money from their taxation system to meet the relief moneys for about ten per cent of their population, or some 70,000 people, who find themselves on relief.

About two years ago we had an election in this country, and I have a vivid recollection that my hon. friends opposite allowed their supporters to put labels here, there and yon on the bill-boards, "Elect us and we will give you some action." The plea I make to-night to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and to the cabinet generally will be along the line of asking for some of that "action." I shall first recite as briefly as possible the position in which the city of Toronto, and particularly my constituents in the Danforth riding, now find themselves.

Following our meeting on February 19, the mayors of the province of Ontario met at Toronto on February 23. They passed a resolution. I admit at once that it was in very strong terms; let me say in the same sentence that I think it needed to be in strong terms if we were to get what hon. members opposite discussed so much in the last election, namely action. The important part of this resolution, as I see it, is the last part, but I shall first read the preamble, as follows:

> Protesting against refusal of the dominion government to increase relief grants in aid of the province, an emergency meeting of the Ontario Mayors' Association was held this day.

The resolution, adopted after considerable debate over how strong it should be, read as follows:

> Be it resolved that this association of mayors place itself on record as insisting that the federal government immediately revise the grants in aid to the province to equal at least forty per cent of relief expenditures in Ontario, failing the granting of which we notify you that—

And this is the important part.

—our ratepayers are taxed to the point of confiscation.

My constituency of Danforth is one of the greatest home-owning constituencies in Canada. The people there try to own their own homes, and in so doing, to my mind they make as desirable a class of citizen as one can have in any country. But when we find that these homes are going back to mortgage companies, and in some cases even reverting to the city itself, so that Toronto, as one year follows another, finds itself increasingly in the real estate and houseowning business through its citizens losing their equities in their homes, the situation becomes serious. I shall at once be told that relief is a matter for the municipalities and for the provinces. In an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal on February 23 the Minister of Labour says, quite properly:

The dominion government is not, and has never been responsible for meeting social need as distinguished from emergency unemployment need.

In the tax structure of Toronto, examining the position of direct emergency unemployment relief, we find this situation. In 1933 the amount charged by the city to its taxpayers for the payment of direct emergency relief was only $12,239. The province permitted the municipalities to issue five-year serial debentures for the major portion of the cost of their direct relief. The following year interest on these debentures had to be met, with the result that the total cost to be included in the tax bills in 1934 rose to $656,467. Again debentures were issued, and again the interest on those debentures had to be provided for in the tax rate of the city, with the result that in 1935 the direct cost to the taxpayers doubled and approached $1,390,970. In 1936, when debentures were again issued, the amount required inclusive of interest and sinking fund charges for direct relief payments amounted to $2,381,191. The point is that we are pyramiding year by year the cost of direct relief. If, as I gather from the statements, perhaps the government would give some consideration to that portion of the relief cost which is not social services, which has not to do with the unemployables but represents direct relief to those unemployed and able to work, then I say the minister has a direct responsibility to meet the difficulty in which some 750,000 people in one great centre find themselves and the problem their representatives face in striking a tax rate for that city.

The reasons why I say it is necessary that something be done are obvious. Take building permits, for instance. Eight or nine years ago they amounted to $22,000,000. As a matter of fact, in 1931 the amount was still $22,000,000. Last year it dropped to $8,000,000. You will say at once that that has added $8,000,000 to the assessment; but as a matter of fact the grand total of the assessment in the city of Toronto shrank in the same year by $4,000,000, with the net result that that $8,000,000 was taken up, and together with the $4,000,000 we have a shrinkage of $12,000,000. In other words, the assessment is going down $1,000,000 a month, and while it is going down at that monthly rate the tax rate itself, which before the war was 18½ mills and two years ago was 31½ mills, last year was 34·85 mills. Unless this government takes some action to meet the direct relief situation before the tax rate is struck for this coming year, the tax rate will be one, two or three mills higher. It depends on how seriously this government takes the position in which it finds itself.

I am very much concerned about the people there who are losing their homes and are unable to pay their taxes. Speaking for the people of Toronto, I am greatly concerned that they as a city should be forced into the real estate business. Every time a quit claim deed is given the city of Toronto, it is common knowledge that the city loses those taxes, and, by thousands of feet of frontage, property is being vested in the name of the city of Toronto and they are losing possible tax revenue therefrom. At the same time I cannot remember any year during which so many buildings, many of them really good buildings, were torn down, for no other reason than the fact that people could not pay the taxes on the assessed value of those buildings. True, they make parking spaces and so on; but is it good economy to tear down really good buildings? Slum clearance? Yes. But are you going to make more slums at the same time by forcing the tax rate so high that those who have equities in their homes cannot maintain those homes and keep them in repair? As fast as you clear away slums you create more and more slums, because owners with their equities are unable to keep their homes in repair.

I do not want to be destructive in what I have to say with reference to this matter. I believe that something real could be done, and I say this to the cabinet as a whole, with that tremendous majority behind them: You went to the country with a policy of action and here and now I say to you, Put a strong man in charge of this problem of able-bodied men not being able to find work, and clothe that man with the responsibility of going to industries of every kind. He will find at the head of our industries men with hearts and souls, anxious to help their country. He will find them a little nervous of a strong man sent by this government if he asks these people, "Why are you not employing as many men as you did in 1929? What are you doing to help your country, to keep men at work?"

Let me divide the problem into two categories and get down to the theme of my thought, namely, the secondary industries. It is quite true that since 1929 in the primary industries the number employed have increased from 80,000 to 100,000 odd. I am glad to see that increase. But the secondary industries take ten men for every one who is in the primary industries. We had a million men and women working in the secondary industries in 1929, and we have seen that figure shrink until to-day it is only 920,000. The government will say that during the last two years there has been some improvement here and there. Yes; I grant that; but there has not been enough improvement to take care of that ten per cent of our population who are able to work, that ten per cent of cost which is destroying the tax structure of municipalities like Toronto by absorbing relief costs to the extent, last year for instance, of $2,000,000—and it seems to be doubling every year.

How is this improvement going to be brought about? It would take a superman, I admit, to do this overnight. I admit at once it cannot be done overnight. I will say this, however, that if a Minister of Labour could sit at the head of a table with the different groups of men comprising the secondary industries and particularly the manufacturing industries, which employ half a million of our people in Canada, he could tell those who have fallen down on the job two or three things which they should do on behalf of their fellow-citizens. And what are those things? He could say to them, "Study your payroll. Don't consider your employees as a commodity, as raw material; don't sit back and simply ask for efficiency from your submanagers; but remember that these men who work for you have hearts and souls, have wives and families who have to be looked after. Spread work out among your employees; see to it that every possible bit of work is given to your employees, and forget during this time of stress and strain in Canada that yearly dividend or yearly balance sheet with its big profit."

That same strong man, whom this government has the power to put at the head of affairs so far as this particular problem is concerned, could study the balance sheets which were referred to a moment ago—the balance sheet of the Bell Telephone Company for example. What did the hon. gentleman say? Eight millions of profit in the Bell Telephone Company. Why did he not go further and say that 16,000 employees have been laid off by the telephone companies in the last few years? Why do not utilities of that kind put some heart and soul into their operations? They would do it if a strong man sat at a conference table and told them that if they did not do it, drastic action would be taken.

These men in industry are God-fearing men as a whole, decent fine citizens, 99$\frac{9}{10}$ per cent of them. It is my privilege to know a great number of them, and I have yet to find them resorting to sharp practice. I have yet to find them lacking in sympathy with their fellow men. They are worrying about the state of things, but they have no leadership. This government is not giving any leadership or bringing them together. True you have here a report, a preliminary one. You are going to have another report, and after that I suppose another. But we need action. This country needs action if we are going to get this extra ten per cent back to work. There is the iron and steel industry with a shrinkage of 35,000 employees. Get your iron and steel men around the table, say to them, "Fifty per cent of your men are working over forty-eight hours a week; can you not rearrange your working schedules to spread the work among more men and give those men a forty-eight hour week?" Some hon. member says forty-four hours; if the times are as bad as that I would say forty-four also. A total of 99,187 men are controlled by this industry, there are 35,895 fewer employed to-day than there were in 1929; yet twenty-five per cent of them are working over forty-eight hours a week.

Then there are the manufacturers of lumber. Get the heads of this industry together and ask them, "Why are you employing 8,339 fewer men than you were in 1929?" "Well, we do not have the business; what can we do about it?" Mr. Strong Man, Mr. Man of Action, and this government of action with an overwhelming majority, tell these lumber manufacturers that they are working 41,878 men over forty-eight hours a week, and some of them fifty-five hours a week. Ask them to rearrange their schedules and make work for ten per cent more men in their industry. Retail and wholesale trade, retail merchandise stores, large departmental stores—who in this government is exercising any control over what they are doing with their personnel? Who is exercising any control over the chartered banks of Canada, which are laying off men in the higher age brackets and hiring boys of eighteen or twenty at half the price? What action is being taken; who is doing anything in that regard? Nothing of any real consequence is being done. We have reports, academic discussions; but if the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the cabinet which surrounds him would take definite, drastic action in regard to this problem, he would have the backing of this entire chamber, and as one year succeeds another we would have more nearly cleaned up this problem which is not only menacing the morale of our people, making unemployables out of employables, but also breaking down the tax structure of our municipalities and making it impossible for home owners to continue to own their own homes.

Just next door to the farm where I was born, within a mile from where I live, the R. H. McGregor school, which houses now some 2,000 pupils and which some thirty-five years ago housed three members of this hon. house and a leader of the opposition in the provincial legislature of Saskatchewan, four boys in that little red school house that in twenty years did not have an average population of twenty-four, now looks out on forty acres of land which has been taxed $7,000 a year or more. By the sale of the ground on which the school house stands, valued at some $40,000, and another piece valued at $54,000, a total of $94,000 of taxable value has been paid back to the municipality in taxes. A most desirable piece of property on the outskirts of the city of Toronto, has been taxed at the rate of $7,000 a year, until the owner of that property could not pay any more taxes and to-day languishes in the mental hospital at Mimico, out of his mind, while on June 1 of this year the township of East York will take over forty-two acres of building land, and that struggling, broken-down, bankrupt municipality will find itself the owner of that much more real estate, knowing not what to do with it, losing the revenue of $7,000 a year from that particular property because construction is at a standstill in Toronto, as people buying homes would find themselves taxed out of those homes again, and therefore hesitate to start any construction program. Until the tax rate is brought down construction will not start.

The minister will admit, we all admit, that of all the industries which are suffering, the construction industry is probably suffering most. The shrinkage since 1929 is 25,000 mechanics. I appeal to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) to meet these mayors in conference and discuss with them calmly their difficulties, remembering that if we are to get back to any kind of prosperity we must make those homeowning and homeloving people contented, who are now so fast losing their equities. And, I pray the minister, do not counter some poor mayor by saying that these irresponsible threats are futile. I hope the government are not approaching the problem from that angle. We hope they approach it from the angle of conciliation and trying to find a remedy for this difficult situation in order to start again some real prosperity in this country. Action is what we need; action with the heads of all sorts of organizations who are willing to help, anxious to help, is the crying need of this country to-day. Give us that action; give us that leadership and you will get the support of all sections of the house.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I did not know that this discussion was coming up on a motion to go into supply, as my motion is number one for to-morrow. But I have no objection to the motion, although it anticipates mine of January 27. Since 1936 I have had this matter on the order paper. I was here all day yesterday and last week and the week before and the week before that, hoping to have my motion considered. It was the first motion handed in this session, but it is No. 7 on the order paper, and is up to be dealt with to-morrow. I had no notice of the present discussion.

As one of the representatives of the city of Toronto I have no hesitation in laying the case of that city before the government. I do not know whether the minister had notice of this question coming up or not, but I have brought to the attention of the house for the past four years, the problem of the condition of the real estate holder in Toronto burdened with relief. Among the larger municipalities, with populations over 40,000, you find that in every case the taxes levied on real estate amount to ninety-two to ninety-four per cent of all municipal revenue.

The hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Harris) has described the lot of the industrial worker to-day. Most hon. members are real estate owners; they are familiar with the unfortunate position of that form of investment. So bad is it that nobody wants to have any investment in real estate, if he can get a better investment. The tax on real estate to-day, Mr. Speaker, as perhaps you know, constitutes a rent in itself, as a result of Canada's overgovernment and overtaxation. The relief problem of the municipalities is directly both the cause and the effect of mistakes which we have made in taxation. There is practically no building of homes or residences going on in Toronto, the city from which I come; that kind of construction is practically at a standstill. I have before me the assessment report for the year, which shows that there is a great scarcity of homes. Now we have decreases in relief, decreased vouchers, decreased clothing allowances and so on, with increases in rent, as a result of the insane taxation policy of this country in allowing a triple income tax.

From confederation down to 1918 the income tax was exclusively within the domain of the municipalities, with the result that in Toronto they did not altogether depend upon real estate for revenue. Their income and business taxes, amounting to millions of dollars, enabled the larger cities and towns to go into social services, health services, hospitalization and so on, costing millions of dollars in Toronto, where they are doing good work for the people of the province as a whole. Our taxation principle seems to be the law of the jungle, the survival of the fittest. First, the dominion came along in 1918 and levied an income tax. I was a member of a deputation which came here to meet Sir Thomas White, Minister of Finance of that day, who told us that he did not like to impose that tax but that he hoped it would remain for only a few years, until after the war was over. It has remained ever since. The province imposed a duplicate tax, and as a result the burden on real estate is absolutely crushing.

Let me give the house the number of residences built last year, according to page 14 of the last report by Mr. Farley, the assessment commissioner. By wards the homes built were as follows:

Ward	No. of homes built
7	16

In other words, only 265 new homes were built last year, which is a direct result of putting taxes on real estate. Not only has this knocked the building trade to pieces; it has ruined all forms of building construction, with the result that these construction workers are losing their homes and are out of work. This state of affairs, of course, is not local to Toronto; it exists in all the cities and reacts on the municipal councils, who have not the proper funds with which to take care of those on relief. The people on relief are very largely industrial workers, who compose fifty-one per cent of the population of this country. Through no fault of their own they are being driven to the wall. Many of these families have been in Toronto for three generations after having come from the old land. They have never been out of work; they have never been on relief and have never known such a state of affairs before. The remedy for all this is to give us back our income tax and let us share the federal income tax.

I say the burden should be removed from real estate and shifted to those able to bear it. Yesterday we heard from the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) with regard to millionaires leaving the country. On page 13 of the report of the Ontario Associated Boards of Real Estate a table appears comparing the municipal taxation on $100,000 worth of real estate and the revenue on $100,000 put into four per cent bonds. The real estate taxation is figured on an average of 40 mills, which would amount to $4,000. What about the amount invested in bonds? Everyone is trying to get out of the real estate market and put their money into some other form of securities. The taxation derived from $100,000 in bonds totals only $105. In other words, the tax on the real estate amounts to 40 mills, while the tax on the bonds totals only 1·05 mills.

No commodity other than real estate pays taxes to all three governing bodies, the municipality, the province and the dominion. What other commodity pays to the municipality as much as four per cent of a capital charge? In addition to that, the income from that real estate is taxed by both the dominion and the province. This is a system which prevails nowhere in the world, so far as I know, with the exception of Canada and the United States. In the old land they have eliminated the inequalities. The city of Toronto has done its best. We have a brief here, as one hon. gentleman stated, from his worship the mayor of Toronto, showing the state of affairs, and at the meeting of mayors they said there would be a rebellion if it goes on much longer. I need not read what was said at that meeting; I am sure every hon. member has read it for himself. Some action will have to be taken.

Let me remind the house, however, that the city of Toronto has spent on relief a total of $17,765,452. Social services, care of outdoor patients and hospitalization account for another tremendous amount. In a comparatively few years over $8,000,000 has been spent in that way, and the annual expenditure has increased from 1920 until the present time. The amount spent on hospitals has increased each year. In 1922 it was $1,377,000. It rose steadily until in 1932 it was over $5,000,000, and in 1937 over $6,000,000. There is a total expenditure of $51,576,000 shown in this report by the Department of Public Welfare of Toronto.

The minister replied to the representations made by the mayors, and no doubt that reply was made on behalf of the government. I doubt if it will appeal to the wisdom and judgment of members of the House of Commons. After all, what control have we, sitting in this house, over the affairs of the country when the executive take things into their own hands and say they are going to give only a small amount for Ontario relief? I am wondering whether or not this is a Christian country. To-morrow will be the first day of Lent, and I wish we would look into the suffering that is going on among the working classes of this country. I know hundreds of these families on relief, and I am not satisfied with all these commissions that have been appointed and the figures that have been handed out. It is true that they deal with many industries, but a great many of these people are only on part time. Very few of them have full time work, because very few industries are running at full time. I questioned the figures, and the reply of the minister seemed rather cold to come from a warm-hearted person such as he is. I have great respect for the minister, and I do not say it is altogether his fault. I believe it is the fault of parliament in not speaking out about these problems.

The reply was a very discouraging one for the men, women and children on relief throughout this country, and the members of the house will have to interpret that reply. Only the other day we were asked by the municipal council of Toronto to interpret it. We do not want communism or fascism in Canada. We do not want to live under a dictator, and lose our freedom. They may be worshipping false gods, but at least I will say this, that they are ready to spend their lives in the service of their people, as they see it. The municipalities cry out for bread for those on relief, and the government offers them a stone. The government's answer is that they do not care to answer the question, "Who is thy neighbour?" It is the first duty of the government to look after the health, peace, prosperity and contentment of its people. It was so in the day of the Greeks and Romans, and it is so to-day. There is no use refusing to give an answer to the requests of municipalities. When they ask for bread they are just given a stone—because that is all it is. The dominion wants to shunt the whole burden on to the municipalities.

[Mr. Church.]

The municipalities have no funds to buy these increased vouchers. Is the house going to say that the families of those poor men shall have no medical attention, shall have no medicine and no clothing; that their fuel allowance will be cut; that their houses shall be cold in weather like this; that they will have to look elsewhere for their vouchers—despite the increases in prices of food, rents and everything else? I say that this is an injustice to the municipalities that are crying out for relief, and asking adequate federal aid in the matter.

I say that if the party system is going to live, then it will have to deal with this problem immediately and give aid, or it will have a rude awakening in 1940. I believe in a two party system; I strongly support it. But I believe a two party system should be strong enough to solve these problems, and not make it necessary to leave them to socialism, and other isms, or permit other groups to come in in 1940 to solve the problem in a way the country might not like.

There are several members of the medical profession in the house. They have visited the homes of the people throughout the country, as have health officers, social welfare workers, district and neighbourhood investigators, surgeons and provincial and federal organizations. These people have visited the homes, and know the conditions under which some people are living. I hope the minister's reply will be reconsidered.

We now come to a consideration of the cost of effecting the necessary changes. Some years ago the government appointed an employment commission, headed by Mr. Purvis who, by subtracting and deducting, got the unemployment figure down to about 115,000. I know for a fact that his figures were not correct, and I do not believe they are correct to-day. In my view, if the commission had not been appointed and the House of Commons had kept the question of unemployment under its own control, or the control of the minister, the work would have been done much better.

The government descended on the municipalities, and took the income tax. Not satisfied with that, it passed bills by which it proposed to give the provinces direct as well as indirect taxation. If the government had its way and if this latter had gone through, every article of food and clothing would have an indirect tax on it from the provinces as well as the dominions. In view of these facts I say that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) should share the income tax with the municipalities, the way the provincial income tax has been shared with them. Those taxes never belonged to the provinces or the dominion.

I have visited the homes of these people, and I know that the result of the present unfair, unjust system is that hundreds of municipalities are in a bad condition to-day. I see the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson) in his seat. May I say to him that I have before me reports from the great province of British Columbia, and I can show him where, from his province, east to the Atlantic seaboard, hundreds of municipalities are bankrupt to-day. They cannot pay their fixed or maintenance charges. The municipalities have not their income tax moneys, which formerly supplied them with funds to build municipal institutions, schools and hospitals, to improve their parks, and all that sort of thing. Since the income tax has been taken away, the municipal public works have been starving. They have no moneys to pay for direct relief work. In the federal program of relief works voted here there was no equality of treatment. There have been some relief works in the other provinces, of which Ontario got little or nothing, because favouritism was shown. Some municipalities got court houses—I have Three Rivers in mind. Something was done for Winnipeg, and in Montreal botanical gardens were constructed. I am not complaining about that, because apparently they had enough pull to get the money from the government. But I ask that there should be some equality of privilege shown in the same way to the municipalities of Ontario which got little or nothing.

Some time ago I pointed out what Italy is doing in matters of relief for her unemployed. She is building public works and municipal institutions of all kinds, sufficient for the next forty years. She is building schools, hospitals, court houses and public buildings of all kinds, to take care of relief works, with the result that unemployment in Italy is at a very low ebb.

Some years ago, supported by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who is now leader of one of the groups in the house, I asked the government of that day if it was prepared to give a third of the cost of unemployment relief, in conjunction with municipal and provincial authorities. The then Minister of Labour, Mr. Heenan, replied, "The answer is No." He stated that unemployment relief, and matters respecting unemployment generally, and social services, under the British North America Act were matters for the municipalities and the provinces.

The government which has brought many of these people into the country, under the British North America Act has jurisdiction over trade and commerce and immigration. It has control of banks and banking, bills of exchange and notes. It has almost unlimited powers of taxation to solve its problems. The provinces, like the dominion, have made a raid on the municipalities and taken income and business taxes. They have taken away from the municipalities those moneys in order to balance the provincial budgets. The result is that they balance their budgets at the expense of the municipalities, but the cities and towns are in bad condition, and the condition of real estate is deplorable.

The result is that the outlook has been destroyed. The people are becoming, to a great extent, proletarian. In the early days in Canada every one owned property. Most industrial workers owned their own homes. Some of them had small stores or market gardens. They may have kept a cow, or a few cattle. We have been slow to see how the industrial workers have lost all that. To-day they do not own property, and to a great extent are becoming proletarian. Conditions are not as they were in the days of Macdonald and Laurier, which I described a moment ago. I do not know what will become of the people of Canada, if these conditions continue. The plight of the industrial workers is just as bad as that of the people in the prairie provinces who have suffered from drought, a people who have the admiration of all people in the dominion. I hope every help will be given them, but I must say at the same time that the plight of the industrial worker is just as bad, and he has had no help by federal legislation, like the farmers and fishermen. Fancy all that, in a land like Canada, which has plenty of food and clothing.

Mr. HANSON: May I ask a question?

Mr. CHURCH: Now the government seeks to evade its responsibility by appointing commissions and reading figures. Let me read a few figures, and point out that we shall never be able to give vouchers by reading trade reports or commission reports. The burden which is unloaded on the large cities and towns threatens the existence of municipal institutions in Canada.

Mr. HANSON: May I ask a question?

Mr. CHURCH: The government now gives grudgingly. Why do they not tell the people in Toronto: "We cannot give you an increase in relief; we cannot give you any food as we are not liable for it?" Why do they not tell the people of Canada themselves? Why do they not tell the members of parliament to tell that to their constituents?

The workers to whom I referred a few minutes ago are getting along the best they can under the policy of the federal government. Men, women and children are suffering in this land of milk and honey. Are we going to hide behind useless commissions while all this is going on? I think it is the duty of the government to give some active aid to the municipalities as requested by the mayors. It will be remembered that two or three years ago an employment commission was set up which it was said would improve conditions. Well, it did not do it. We hear no end of praise of our natural resources, our farm lands and forests, yet we cannot find the money with which to make this a better country in which to live.

We need something like this to wake up the people of Canada to how things are going. Hon. members may remember the reference that was made at the sittings of the price spreads and mass buying committee and commission to the industrial workers and those on relief. The conditions of the people on relief were described by witnesses. We heard of people working in sweat shops for ten and twelve hours a day, and receiving $4, $5 and $6 per week. We heard of the conditions in some of the departmental stores. I am describing the awful conditions of workers out of work.

Mr. HANSON: The hon. member is wandering all over the place and criticizing this government for what they have not done. I ask him if he has any solution to offer or any concrete proposition to make to the government. He has referred to the member for Skeena, and I am proud to represent that constituency.

Mr. CHURCH: The hon. member for Skeena is very fond of rising in his place to ask irrelevant questions, but when I sit down he will have an opportunity to tell us how he stands for the electors of Skeena, Prince Rupert and other places who are on relief, and to propose a cure. He will have an opportunity to tell us what this government proposes to do about the matter.

Mr. HANSON: I should like to find a remedy.

Mr. CHURCH: The hon. member is very fond of complaining about people reading their speeches. This afternoon he objected to the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) reading his speech, but I would remind him that his right hon. leader read some pages about the League of Nations last session.

[Mr. Church.]

The hon. member for Skeena as a good government follower just sat in his place and said, "Me too." Where was the hon. gentleman the other evening when we heard about the condition of workers on the Pacific coast because of the Japanese? A red herring was drawn across the trail by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The hon. member did not say one word. If he is willing to lick the boots of the Japanese, I, as a member of parliament, am not. I am going to fight for the industrial workers in British Columbia, and Ontario too, who are suffering because of lack of relief and on account of Japanese matters. I am ready to fight for the industrial workers in my own constituency, and I do not want to waste any more time on the hon. member. I have the floor, and I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker. Will the hon. member for Skeena first take the mote out of his eye in connection with Japanese employment, and then he can ask me to take the beam out of the eye of one who fights for those on relief. I propose to stand up for the industrial workers of this country.

Mr. HANSON: I would try to treat labour right.

Mr. CHURCH: You shifted our new deal legislation over to the law courts. I can remember the members of the opposition of those days smiling as they said that the privy council would give a decision against that legislation. They were ready to let the bills pass as they felt they would be upset by the privy council.

I did not know this matter was coming up to-night, and I have not had a chance to prepare myself. I want to refer to the reply made by the Minister of Labour to a statement made at the meeting of the Ontario mayors. I quote from the report of the statement of the minister:

> The grant to Ontario was fair and reasonable having regard to the reduction of relief and the financial position of the province, it declared.
> "No change will be made in the grants set out in the agreements now before the provincial governments," the statement said. "The grants will be paid to provinces under the terms of these agreements and not otherwise."

The responsibility for help and relief rests in the government. The province of Ontario contributed enough in income tax to pay the relief costs of all of Canada. There was collected from the municipalities of Ontario federally a total of $252,000,000 in income tax, and according to the statement of the Bank of Canada the cost of relief for all of Canada was only $212,000,000 for the same period. In other words, in that period this government spent $40,000,000 less than what Ontario paid in income tax for the relief of the unemployed of the whole Dominion of Canada. As a remedy, the municipalities of Ontario should have part of this income tax. According to a report prepared by the mayor's office in Toronto the per capita cost for Ontario is less from the federal government than in other places. It has been said that Ontario is a solvent province, and that may be the reason for the action taken. It may be considered that Toronto is a solvent city as it owns all its public utilities which are operated at cost, and so it receives less per capita.

I believe the members on the government benches have an appreciation of the lot of these workers. Many of them own real estate, and they do not have to be told anything about what has happened. If a man owns real estate and has a tenant who is on relief, he gets no rent. The man on relief is getting only half what he should get, and the result is he can pay no rent. I see the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) smiling. He knows all about this as he has some of these tenants. In conclusion, may I say that I hope the minister will see his way clear to revise this policy. He has until March 31 to do this, and I hope the government of the day will give some consideration to this matter.

I have figures for Toronto, for London and for Vancouver. The city of Winnipeg has got out a book the same as those published by other cities. I have before me a report by the assessment commissioner which shows a decrease in the amount of building.

I say in conclusion that I hope some attention will be given to this particular matter, because these people should not be allowed to starve. They are our own kith and kin; they are not wooden men, they are men of flesh and blood who have suffered and are suffering to-day as they have never suffered before, as a result of these horrible and un-Christian conditions.

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) has introduced to-day a question which beyond a shadow of doubt is one of the most serious that the municipalities of this dominion are facing at this time. As a member representing one of the constituencies of Toronto, I feel it is incumbent upon me to speak, although briefly, on this question. I wish to dot every "i" and cross every "t" to which we have listened in the stentorian speech of the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris). The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), who followed, presented not only the immediate problem of Toronto but a problem that is also dominion-wide. I do not wish to repeat what these hon. gentlemen have said, or to deal statistically with the subject; but I think it is well worth while that every hon. member, whether he represents a rural or an urban constituency, should bear in mind that there is indeed a forgotten man in Canada, and that that man is the small home owner.

There is not a member of the house but has deep feelings in regard to those who have had to face the indignity and the burden of relief. We have discussed at length in this chamber the problems which arise as a result of the necessity of relief. On the other hand there has been relatively little discussion concerning the problem of the small home owner. Here is a man who by his own ability to earn and to save as he earns has contrived to purchase a small home; he has lived there perhaps for some little time and is endeavouring to pay off, bit by bit, the mortgage on that property. In recent years and even to-day he lives in jeopardy because, as a result of conditions beyond his control, his earnings have been less, his income has decreased, and he is barely able to meet the payments on his home and to pay his taxes as well. If he is out of a job for any length of time, the chances are that he is unable to make payments on his home or to ease the burden of taxation which falls upon him, and thus his ownership is challenged.

This question we are discussing is a question not only of relief, but of that which accompanies relief. It is, therefore, not a simple problem, but as the minister knows, is irreducibly tied up with the question of realty taxation. During the last session I had the privilege of introducing a resolution with regard to the subject of slum clearance and the building of low cost houses. I said, in part, as reported on page 742 of Hansard of last year:

> I will also say to the minister that the financing of housing schemes and slum clearance plans is not the great bugaboo; I think he will grant me that. There are two other far greater difficulties; the one, the system of realty taxation existing through this entire dominion; the other, the fact that under the British North America Act it is up to the provinces and the municipalities to institute action.
> Mr. Dunning: That is the greatest difficulty.
> Mr. Massey: I have said that. The greatest stumbling block in the way of ridding our cities of the scars that mar them, the greatest difficulty in the way of rehousing our rural population, is to be found, on the one hand, in the present system of realty taxation, and, on the other, in the restrictions placed upon this government by the British North America Act. If the national employment commission has spent its money and its time only on the study of taxation and can bring any recommendations on this question that are attractive to provincial and municipal governments, then their work has been well worth while on that basis alone. We cannot expect extensive building, either under building societies or under the aegis of provincial or municipal governments, until our system of taxation is completely readjusted. I urge upon the government with all the earnestness of which I am capable that full and complete study be given to this phase of our national scheme of things.

In the last municipal election in Toronto there was proposed to the electors a by-law. In rejecting that by-law, the electors declared with no small degree of emphasis that under its terms they were not in favour of any housing and slum clearance plan. But it would be unfair if this interpretation alone were to be placed upon the result of that vote. After all, the municipal voter is a realty taxpayer, and as some one recently so well expressed it, to ask a realty taxpayer to vote for that by-law was like asking the Women's Christian Temperance Union to vote for more beer parlours. There has been placed upon the realty taxpayer, particularly in the last few years, an almost inconceivable burden, a burden which has steadily increased, and his fear was expressed by his vote at the municipal election which I have mentioned. I do not believe there was a single person who voted against that by-law but had in his heart the desire to see the slums of Toronto cleared away and some low cost housing plan instituted; but in fairness to his own family and in the face of his own direct responsibility to pay taxes et al, he could not see his way clear to vote upon himself a further burden when he could scarcely carry the burdens under which he already had to struggle. That, it seems to me, is the lesson which is taught us by that incident in Toronto, comparatively a few weeks ago.

I repeat that these questions of relief and realty taxation are interlocked in the present set-up. What is being done at the moment? What is suggested is to place a further burden upon the taxpayer of the municipality, the man who has a home and who perforce must pay taxes upon it. The demand is one which is beyond the pale of reason, for after all there is a limit beyond which we cannot go if we wish to maintain our homes. I stand here to-night to speak not only for the people whom I have the honour to represent and whom I am so proud to represent in this house, but for all realty taxpayers in all parts of the dominion who find unbearable the burden of taxation for relief and other purposes, of which I have spoken. It is of paramount importance to our dominion that our citizens maintain their homes. As I have already drawn to the attention of the house, we have neglected our housing—and neglected it, I feel, shamefully in many ways. We have forced many, who have not had the means to build or own their own homes, to live in places which are a disgrace to the community. We have done little or nothing to aid those compelled to live in such surroundings to live in better places. Very little interest has been taken in housing societies, housing centres and similar organizations which have been developed in Canada; now we are faced with a further step in the wrong direction, which places additional burdens upon those who find it an almost insuperable difficulty to maintain what they have.

In the speech from the throne we were told that the national employment commission had concluded its duties. Before the present government came into office, and during the election of 1935, we were told from coast to coast, from platforms, over the radio, in the press and other organs of publicity, that we should vote Liberal and get action. There is not the slightest doubt that over forty per cent of the people of Canada who voted, voted Liberal; but I ask you, Mr. Speaker, have they got action? The silence on the benches opposite confirms the suggested truth of my question. We have not got action.

Mr. HANSON: Did we have action before?

Mr. MASSEY: We are having reaction at the moment, apparently. If hon. members opposite go into their own municipalities and ask the small home owner if he is better off now than he was just over two years ago, and that small home owner answers as he feels, he will say, "No, I am worse off." Those are the facts; that is the situation which we face. We may have heard a good deal so far this session from hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to increasing good times. I am sure that if they will compare Canada's position as world trader in 1938 with Canada's position as a world trader in the middle of 1935, they will find that we have risen only in proportion with increasing good times throughout the world; but at the same time there is not one hon. gentleman opposite who will not admit that at the moment we are facing a recession—I believe that is the new technical term for a depression—and that times are not as good as they were a few months ago.

The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) this afternoon called attention to the fact that unemployment at the moment was increasing rather than decreasing, and yet in face of such a situation we now find that the municipalities are threatened with the problem of themselves having to assume direct relief. This is not in keeping with the fullest interests of the country as a whole; it cannot be; for we are challenging the very existence of our homes, and when we touch our homes we are challenging the very centre of our national life; for no national life can prevail if there are merely houses, and not homes. Accordingly, when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) feels that the mayors of the various municipalities are getting, to say the least, rambunctious, and are becoming threatening, he must realize that they in their positions of importance have a responsibility to the municipalities which they represent, and that in their own way, in the way they think best, they are attempting to protect the small home owner in the municipality. I am sure that when the minister speaks, as he will in a few minutes, he will have much to say concerning the attitude of the mayors, and therefore I make this statement in advance of what he may say.

In conclusion, I would make one comment upon the general situation. We fully realize that throughout Canada, not only in municipalities but in rural centres as well and on the farms, there are thousands of houses which are unfit for habitation. Homes they are called, but homes they cannot be in the fullest sense of that noble word. This whole question of national housing is one the solution for which has been postponed too long. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson), for whom we all have a high regard—

Mr. HANSON: Thank you.

Mr. MASSEY: —comes from a country of which he is justly proud. Those of us who have had the honour of visiting his native heath have realized the progress that has been made there particularly in connection with housing. The hon. gentleman himself may not have been to his native land in recent years; but he is a student who is constantly in pursuit of the finer things of life, and he realizes fully what his own country has done in that regard. I am sure that if he rises in his place to-night he will say that he could wish nothing more for the peace and happiness of his own constituency than that they should have homes at least as good as, if not better than, the homes one finds in Sweden, and these homes are not taxed out of existence.

We cannot contemplate such action as has been projected by the Minister of Labour without feeling that we are striking what is essentially a death blow to slum clearance and rehousing in Canada. It seems to me nothing short of a tragedy that at this time when hopes have been raised, when faith has been placed in the thought that something might be done, for two and a half years nothing has been done in the way of housing. I fully realize that the national employment commission when it was appointed faced a gigantic task. I have nothing whatever to say to-night in criticism of the actions of that commission. I should not like to be accused of having forecast to-night anything that may not be brought down in the report of that commission, which has not yet been tabled and of criticizing something I have not seen. I say to the minister, however—and I know that he will not misunderstand me—that the question before the house at this time is one that must bring to mind at once not only the matter of the problem about to be handed to the municipalities of raising further funds for relief, not only the method by which those funds will be raised, but also perforce the whole question of national housing. And I am sure that when the minister replies he will make some statement in regard to this all-important subject, perhaps not in anticipation of the tabling of the report of his highly expensive national employment commission, but as an assurance to the people of Canada, at this critical time, that even though so far this government has turned a blind eye and a deaf ear toward those who have had to live under conditions nothing short of deplorable, and also to those who have lived in jeopardy from day to day lest as a result of ever increasing taxes they have had to pay they would lose that which they already have, there are under contemplation plans for the amelioration of the difficulties and hardships occasioned by slum conditions, and the total absence of low cost housing schemes.

Mr. G. E. WOOD (Brant): I feel reluctant to reply to hon. members from Toronto in this debate, which I might term a filibuster. I am not, I must admit, very familiar with the rules of the house, I do not know what the motion is. It seems to me, however, to be a sort of free-for-all for every member to air his own local disabilities, and perhaps it would be just as well if hon. members from Toronto would be like the Scotchman who wished that we could only see ourselves as others see us.

Some of the remote districts in Ontario may have a contribution to offer towards a solution of some of the difficulties which exist in the city of Toronto, because after all the demands that are made there are going to affect us in the more remote districts of the country. I have to admit that I admire the splendid way in which hon. members from Toronto, especially the hon.

member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), can present their viewpoint. I am somewhat jealous of the language he seems to have at his command to circle around the thoughts which he entertains. I suppose that may be due to the fact that Toronto is the centre of Ontario's educational system. The rest of us, especially in the rural districts, have to make considerable sacrifice when we send our boys and girls to the colleges and the university in Toronto, and in spite of all the hardship which seems to be inflicted upon Toronto we feel that a good deal of our money from the rest of Ontario goes into that city's educational institutions.

Mr. MASSEY: May I ask the hon. member what he considers to be the city which provides his greatest market?

Mr. WOOD: I am not sure that that has anything to do with this question. Perhaps I shall answer that later on.

The city of Toronto is also the financial centre for Ontario. While it may provide a good market for the farmers of Ontario, it will be found that after paying the charges made for doing our business, we are paying the city of Toronto very well for buying our goods. Toronto also seems to have a magnetic influence drawing many secondary industries there. The very fact that Toronto is the centre of Ontario's education, finance, and more or less its industries, causes me to think that the exhibition given us to-night by hon. members from Toronto is rather a sorry spectacle to present to a self-respecting House of Commons.

I wish to draw attention to a few figures which bear out my point. The city of Toronto has a population of about 628,000. The figures I give are taken from the 1935 report of the Department of Municipal Affairs for Ontario, that being the last year available, although I believe the 1936 report is just off the press. There are five municipalities adjacent to the city of Toronto, and there seems to be an influence somewhere that creates the condition of affairs which is associated with them. Consequently I should feel somewhat shy about being too closely associated with the city of Toronto, as far as the spending of money is concerned. In Ontario thirty-four municipalities have defaulted on their obligations, and of this number five are adjacent to the city of Toronto. I have compiled figures showing the wealth that those municipalities have at their disposal. It seems that an unfortunate lack of ability to use this wealth has got them into the unfortunate condition of which we have been told to-night.

[Mr. Wood.]

The population of the city of Toronto and its suburbs is about 800,000; the population of Ontario is about 3,320,000. That is, the population of Toronto and its suburbs represents about one-quarter of the population of Ontario. Now these municipalities have an assessment of $1,018,400,000 out of a total assessment in the whole province of $3,000,835,872. The city of Toronto has a business assessment of $118,294,435 out of a total business assessment for the whole province of $242,000,000. In other words, the city of Toronto enjoys a business assessment of about one-half that of the whole province. Again, the income of that section of which we have heard so much to-night is $35,450,000 out of a total income tax assessment for the whole of Ontario of $71,000,000. That is, Toronto has half the income tax assessment of Ontario. That seems to show that there must be something wrong in the administration of all this wealth. The total municipal debt of Ontario is $461,653,182, and Toronto and adjacent municipalities have nearly half of that debt, or $209,925,000. It seems to me, therefore, that the present difficulties are due to their spending in recent years. Is it that they have made some errors in their general administration? After all, as I look over this report I find that out of thirty-eight counties in Ontario nine have no debt at all; many others have no county or building debt—

Mr. MASSEY: How about Brant?

Mr. WOOD: I am glad to report that in six years Brant will not owe one cent. Furthermore, since the hon. member for Greenwood has raised the question, I am proud to announce that there is one municipality in the county I have the honour to represent, the municipality of Burford, which had a surplus this year and has already paid $10,000 on the county tax for 1938.

Mr. MASSEY: On the other hand, if the hon. member were facing such a condition as I suggested to-night and the city of Toronto were free of debt, perhaps the situation in which we are at the moment might be reversed.

Mr. WOOD: No, I do not think it would. I should like to tell the hon. member that when it comes to downright honest-to-goodness frugality and thrift you have to give credit to those rural districts which are still close to the influence of the old pioneer blood. I understand the hon. member for Greenwood anticipates that we are going to have another recession. Well, we have many people in the riding I represent who are ready for another depression and always will be, because they live within their means and know how to finance. There is a character in this old foundation stock which makes them refuse to sacrifice their homes and go into debt. Their wives will go without a new dress; they will go without things instead of going into debt for them. That is the spirit which is responsible for the fact that so many of these rural municipalities have no debt.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to ask the hon. member as a matter of information whether when he gives figures of the debt of the municipalities it is gross or net debt.

Mr. WOOD: It is the gross debt.

Mr. HEAPS: Should he not as a matter of fairness to the cities he has mentioned give the net debt?

Mr. WOOD: Of course, but I may add that as regards those municipalities I have mentioned, $16,000,000 of the debt which is in default is not included in that figure.

Mr. HEAPS: If I might continue the question—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think the hon. member objects to answering this question. In the case of a municipality such as the city of Toronto I think it is hardly fair to speak of the gross debt without explaining as to the utilities—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We should like to hear this speech.

Mr. WOOD: It just depends upon your philosophy of life and the things you are in the habit of enjoying. I may go into debt to buy an automobile; I will enjoy it, and I have some value for it. But my philosophy is that I would rather have that automobile paid for before I started to use it. I know it is a lot easier for me. Perhaps that answers the question of the hon. member.

Mr. HEAPS: No, it does not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOOD: I have often wondered what the unthrifty people are going to do after the thrifty people have exhausted their funds, and how they are going to make a living then. True, there seems to be some magnetism in our industrial centres by virtue of the fact that living there is a great deal easier. You do not have to put as much energy into making a living. I go to Toronto quite often, and I find that their picture shows are flourishing, and you can see a great deal of prosperity in and about Toronto. They enjoy life. I should like to draw the attention of the house for a few moments to something I happened to see in the Toronto Daily Star in regard to an Indian by the name of Charlie Jones, who came to Toronto from Shawanga, which is somewhere near Parry Sound. I should like to tell the house what one of our aborigines had to say about the city of Toronto, and I quote this for the very fact that he comes with an open mind. He has made his living in remote districts, and his judgment is not warped by the fact that he has been associated with any other municipality. Apparently he was taken through the city of Toronto by a representative of the Toronto Star, and this question was put to him:

"What do you think of it so far?" . . . "It is beautiful," said Charlie. "Everybody hurrying, but maybe going no place."

This is what I want hon. members to notice:

"But everybody looks contented. I never saw anybody before that was in such a hurry and yet looked so contented. When people hurry like this, you expect them to look worried. Nobody in this city looks worried."

That is the opinion of one of our Indians upon seeing the city of Toronto, and I think that state of affairs is wholesome when we consider that hon. members come here to-night hoping that they can pull a long face and induce us to help the city of Toronto even more, when after all it would be just as well if they would actually give us the expression of their own hearts. In defence of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson) to-night, may I say that I had occasion—

An hon. MEMBER: Can he not defend himself?

Mr. WOOD: Yes, he can easily defend himself, but for the benefit of the house there is one observation I should like to make. Last year I took advantage of the opportunity to go to that section of our country. I had occasion to stop off at Prince George, I believe it was. I am not sure whether that is in the constituency of the hon. member for Skeena; but in any case when the train stopped I commenced to talk to one of the residents of that community, asking about the condition of affairs in that locality. He said, "You know, in 1935 we had fourteen sawmills, and only two were operating. Now not only are the fourteen running but two additional sawmills have been put in." Perhaps that answers the question fairly well.

Mr. MASSEY: Ottawa agreements, 1932.

Mr. TURGEON: United States agreement, 1936.

Mr. WOOD: I do not want to delay the house very much longer, but I thought perhaps some of these observations would be worth drawing to the attention of the house. A person should be reluctant to criticize until he has some constructive suggestion to offer. I generally try to observe that rule as much as possible. It is easy to criticize, but sometimes it is difficult to substitute anything better. The nearest I could get in the case of the hon. member for Greenwood would be to suggest that he go back to the city of Toronto and recommend that it be placed under the municipal board of Ontario, as several other municipalities have been. I would also recommend that he go to some of these rural districts that are out of debt and select a group of commissioners there under which Toronto could be operated.

I take this matter seriously. I really believe there is such a thing as a city getting so large and having all the centres of education and finance that it begins to think all the wisdom is concentrated in it. There are some other municipalities, such as the one I represent, which have not done so badly. In 1932 we farmers were selling our eggs at eight cents, our butter at sixteen cents and our wheat at forty-two cents, but we were able to weather the storm, pay our obligations and at the same time reduce our municipal debts. I am very happy to say, as I mentioned earlier in my remarks, that the constituency which I have the honour to represent will be out of debt in a period of six years, and I am satisfied that the people living there will be reluctant to go into debt again. After all, debt is one of the things that make it very hard for us to take our place in industrial society. We are carrying too large a debt for our population, because concealed in the purchase price of every commodity we buy is some part of this debt.

Some mention has been made of the tariff. I believe the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) drew attention to the fact that it was unfortunate that there was such a large importation of goods which could be manufactured here, thus depriving these people of work. I do not think the solution suggested is a particularly good one. I am sometimes inclined to take the view that we hold the tariff guilty, either by going up or going down, of doing a good deal more than it really does. We give it a great deal more credit and a much more important place in our national life than we should. My attention was called to an incident that occurred in the town of Paris. I happened to go into one of the mills there, and the manager showed me a cloth of which he said it would take about seven yards to make a suit for an average man. The manufacturer would get about $5.04 for that amount of cloth. I was told that the cloth would make a suit somewhat similar to the one I am wearing to-night, and that the suit would sell for something around $40, showing the difference between what the manufacturer gets for the actual goods and the price for which the suit sells after the tailor makes it and it is retailed. So you see that a great many costs seem to enter into it, and I think a great deal of that cost can be traced to extravagant municipal, provincial and federal administration.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to express my indebtedness to the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) for the answer he has already given to those who have spoken from the other side of the house in connection with the matter of grants in aid to the province of Ontario. I am sorry I was not in my seat this afternoon when the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) brought up this matter for consideration. Due to a misunderstanding, I was not aware the question was coming up this afternoon, and did not learn of it until after the six o'clock recess. However, I have followed carefully what has been said by other hon. members who have spoken on behalf of the city of Toronto, and I should like to deal—

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Speaker, if the minister would permit an interruption: I was not speaking on behalf of the city of Toronto alone. I am sure he will understand my remarks were national in character.

Mr. ROGERS: I am glad to accept the correction. I understand fully, of course, that those who have spoken have done so particularly on behalf of the city they represent, but also with wider considerations in view.

Let me make it clear at the outset that the dominion government does not make grants in aid to the cities or to any other municipalities. The grant in aid which is paid by the dominion government is paid to the several provinces of the dominion, and the grant payable to the various provinces is restricted by the amount of money which has been appropriated by parliament for the purpose.

It will be within the memory of hon. members that at the last session $19,500,000 was voted for this purpose. In the allocation of that sum the government has done its utmost to meet the needs of the various provinces, as those needs were determined, first, by the dimensions of the unemployment problem and, second, by the financial position of the province concerned. I should like to say emphatically that there has never been any discrimination in the allocation of grants in aid to the various provinces. It is necessary to mention that to-night, because I understand a suggestion was made this afternoon that because of drought conditions in western Canada, of an emergency nature, that total grant of $19,500,000 was heavily charged by increased grants to the western provinces. I should like to contradict that statement—if it was a statement—or to remove the impression which may have been created by what was said this afternoon.

I realize fully that in the distribution of the grant in aid to the various provinces, it is of great importance that the dominion government should avoid any suggestion of discrimination or any preference to one group of provinces over another group of provinces. Therefore, when we were obliged to deal with the emergency situation which developed in western Canada last summer, we did so upon the basis of governor-general's warrants, voted especially for this purpose, and there was no reduction of grants in aid which would otherwise have been available for the eastern provinces.

I will say—and I believe it will be fully understood by hon. members—that in the circumstances we did not feel it possible to make as drastic reductions of the grants payable to the western provinces as we felt justified in doing in the case of the eastern provinces. However, there is only one province in which the grant has been maintained steadily throughout the year, namely Saskatchewan. That grant was maintained because, when the drought area was defined within which the dominion government assumed one hundred per cent financial responsibility, its boundaries were drawn very strictly, and did not by any means include all the areas in the province which suffered severely from the climatic conditions which existed in western Canada during the past summer. I doubt if any hon. member would seriously urge that the dominion government was in error in maintaining the grant in aid to Saskatchewan without reduction throughout the year.

The grant paid to Ontario for the months of October, November and December was $465,000.

An hon. MEMBER: Per month?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. Under the terms of the agreements which are now before the provinces, including Ontario, that amount is continued as a maximum, subject only to the qualification that it shall be reduced if the amount should be in excess of thirty per cent of the total expenditures for relief in the province. But according to the figures we have received from the provincial government, there is no possibility that the maximum will not be reached during the months of January, February and March, the period covered by the agreement now under discussion.

We have not as yet brought down the estimates for the forthcoming year, and therefore we have not dealt with the grants in aid to the provinces for the next fiscal year. I stated after meeting with the mayors of Ontario that, having regard to the reduction of unemployment, and the financial position of Ontario, the grant paid to that province was a fair and reasonable one. May I point out to hon. members from Toronto, or from other municipalities in Ontario, that to my knowledge the dominion government has never interfered with the provincial government in the distribution of the grant in aid to the municipalities. In other words, Ontario is able, of itself, to determine the financial needs of the municipalities within its borders. We try to meet the situation as we see it in the various provinces. It is the duty of the provincial government, therefore, to deal with the situation as it is observed in the various municipalities.

While I am on this point, I should like to observe that it is also within the power of any provincial government to widen the powers of taxation enjoyed by the municipalities. I know of nothing to prevent a provincial legislature from conferring upon a municipality any power of taxation which the province itself possesses. I fully agree with what has been said to-night regarding the plight of the small property owner. From the time I first came into active contact with the relief problem in Canada I have been impressed with the unfairness of a system of relief which presses as heavily as it does upon those who own real estate. But I would suggest to hon. members that the only solution to this problem does not lie in an increase in grants in aid payable by the dominion to the provinces. It is within the power of the provinces to increase the grants to municipalities, over and above the amount received from the dominion government. It is also within the power of the provincial governments to confer wider powers of taxation upon the municipalities within their borders.

The whole question of the respective obligations of various governmental agencies towards relief is one which is coming before the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. Submissions have been made on behalf of the municipalities of the various provinces. I have no doubt further submissions will be made on behalf of the mayors of the dominion. No one can doubt the importance of this aspect of our system of public finance. But until that question receives the wider consideration it deserves, I think we should bear in mind that the dominion government is two degrees removed from the municipalities. It has never been indifferent to the plight of the municipalities, but the primary responsibility for dealing with the position in which the municipalities find themselves rests with the provincial governments. I believe that has always been well understood.

At the same time I should like to make it clear that although that is the correct constitutional position—I do not hesitate to use that phrase in describing it, for it is a position which has been accepted alike by the preceding and the present administrations—when this government came into office it was so much impressed with the plight of the municipalities that one of the first things it did was to increase the grants in aid to the provinces by seventy-five per cent. At the same time it was made clear in the order in council that the additional amount should be passed over for the relief of the municipalities. I think I am entitled to point that out to hon. friends opposite.

Mr. STEWART: Was that not a seasonal increase? The grants go down in the summer and are increased as the winter months come on. Was that increase not made in October with the winter coming on?

Mr. ROGERS: The grants were increased for December, January, February and March by seventy-five per cent.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Over the previous year?

Mr. ROGERS: Over the previous year.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): For the same months?

Mr. ROGERS: Over what they had been for a period of fifteen months.

Mr. STEWART: For the same months?

Mr. ROGERS: Over what they had been since August, 1934. They had been maintained at the same rate from August, 1934, to December, 1935, and we increased them by seventy-five per cent for the months I have mentioned. Thereafter, as employment improved, we made gradual reductions, first by way of a percentage and later in the form of adjustments which had regard rather to the actual unemployment conditions in the various provinces.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Which had been done every season.

Mr. ROGERS: Which had not been done every season, if I may correct my hon. friend. Prior to August, 1934, the grants had been on a basis of 33⅓ per cent by the dominion, 33⅓ per cent by the province and 33⅓ per cent by the municipality. Following a dominion-provincial conference, in July, 1934, the previous administration decided to pay the grants upon the basis of a fixed grant in aid payable monthly to the various provinces. That system was maintained up to the time to which I have referred. In December, 1935, two months after this administration came into office, we increased those grants by seventy-five per cent.

Mr. EDWARDS: Was that seventy-five per cent increase for the whole year or just for certain months?

Mr. ROGERS: I have tried to make myself clear. It was an increase of seventy-five per cent in the amounts which had been paid monthly in the preceding year. As I say, there was no revision from August, 1934, to December, 1935.

Mr. DUNNING: No increase or no change.

Mr. ROGERS: No change whatever.

Mr. DUNNING: They ran the same from August, 1934, to December, 1935.

Mr. ROGERS: I mention that because I think it should be recognized by hon. members opposite that this government has had in mind the position of the municipalities. When we reduced the grants in aid, the reduction was upon the basis of the improvement in the general employment situation, and also the improved financial position of most of the provinces of the dominion.

I doubt very much if we are going to make progress toward a reduction of the relief problem unless we take account of these essential factors. For example, if the dominion government were to increase the grants while the problem remained the same, it would simply afford an inducement to the provinces and the municipalities to relax their efforts to reduce the relief problem. I say that with some knowledge of what has happened in previous years. As a matter of fact, those who were members of the previous administration will understand me when I say that the chief reason for the dominion government departing from the principle of percentage payments was simply the fact that with a percentage basis there was no way in which relief lists could be kept properly under control. That was the reason why the percentage basis was abandoned and grants in aid adopted as a substitute. Following the recommendations of the national employment commission, we have attached to the grants in aid a maximum percentage rather in order to avoid the periodic and somewhat disturbing revisions of grants in aid from one quarter to another.

I think it must be recognized also that there has been a marked improvement in the unemployment situation. The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) suggested that there is a real need at this time for a strong man or a superman.

Mr. BOUCHARD: With a strong voice.

Mr. ROGERS: I am sure he will not misunderstand me when I remind him that he was a supporter of an administration which certainly in his view and in the view of many people in this country was headed by a strong man, a man who, some people believed, was a superman. I should like to give my hon. friend the unemployment record for those years. I should also like to remind him of the fact that this record occurred during the years following the changing of the tariff policy of this country at an emergency session. The result of that policy was not an improvement in employment, but rather a marked increase in unemployment.

Mr. HARRIS: Will the minister give the world record for that period?

Mr. ROGERS: Here are the number of unemployed for the months of December in successive years:

1930	413,000
1931	543,000
1932	675,000
1933	623,000
1934	571,000
1935	546,000
1936	502,000
1937	381,000

In the past year there has been an improvement of 120,000. Not only that, but the relief lists show that there have been removed from the relief rolls and added to the wage rolls of this country a number very close to 100,000. You cannot go back to any year from 1929 to the present time and find as great an improvement in a single year.

Mr. EDWARDS: Has the minister the figures for December, 1937, and January, 1938?

Mr. ROGERS: The figure for December, 1937, is 381,000. I believe there will be a further opportunity to-morrow to continue this discussion in connection with another motion.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 2, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

DIVERSION OF WATER

CORRESPONDENCE TABLED RESPECTING KENOGAMI RIVER PROJECT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish to lay on the table a copy of a communication dated March 1, 1938, from the Prime Minister of Canada to the Premier of Ontario regarding the Kenogami river diversion project.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONS

EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION OF WINNIPEG AND ST. BONIFACE HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 32, to amend the Winnipeg and St. Boniface Harbour Commissioners Act.

He said: The purpose of the bill is to extend the jurisdiction of the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commissioners to the waters of municipalities, contiguous to the cities of Winnipeg and St. Boniface, which desire to be brought under the act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MONCTON, N.B., PUBLIC WHARF

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Were tenders called for the recently constructed warehouse on the public wharf at Moncton, New Brunswick, or was the work done by day work?

2. If by contract, what was the amount of each tender, and to whom was the contract given?

3. Who was appointed foreman on this work, and what amount did he receive for his services?

Mr. CARDIN:

1 and 2. Work done by day labour.

3. (a) Reid McManus; (b) $255.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY

Mr. McCULLOCH:

What was the total cost of changing the narrow gauge to the standard gauge on the Prince Edward Island railway?

Mr. HOWE: The total cost of converting the line, according to the accounts, was $1,786,565.22, of which $1,200,570.11 was charged to capital account and $585,995.11 to operating expenses. In addition, a loss of $383,667.05 was incurred in retirement of narrow gauge equipment.

EFFECT ON CANADIANS OF ITALO-ETHIOPIAN WAR

Mr. HANSELL:

1. How many Canadian citizens lost their lives in or as the result of the Italo-Ethiopian struggle?
2. What is the total estimated value of property such as buildings, land or personal enterprises, belonging to Canadian citizens, confiscated by Italy?
3. How many of the following types of property were confiscated: (a) hospitals; (b) schools; (c) homes; (d) land; (e) other?
4. If any of the above properties were confiscated, what are they being used for now?
5. How much has been paid to Canada in this connection by way of reparations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Two Canadian nationals are known to have been killed in Ethiopia during the period of the Italo-Abyssinian war.

HOG PRODUCTION, GRADING AND EXPORT

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. How many hogs were slaughtered in Canada in each of the three years 1935, 1936, and 1937?
2. How many hogs in each year were officially graded: (a) on the hoof; (b) on the rail?
3. How many in each year were classed as selects?
4. What percentage of the kill in each year was exported to Great Britain as: (a) Wiltshire sides; (b) hams; (c) box cuts?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Inspected slaughtering of hogs:

1935	2,805,825
1936	3,562,534
1937	3,802,141

2. Number of hogs officially graded:

	(a) Live graded	(b) Carcass graded
1935	2,831,479	115,209
1936	3,297,973	447,493
1937	2,923,769	1,002,541

3. Number of hogs officially graded as selects alive or "A" grade carcass grading:

	Selects	"A" grade
1935	650,180	40,043
1936	805,987	154,776
1937	714,847	312,087

4. Exports of Wiltshire sides, hams and other cuts to Great Britain:

	Wiltshires	Hams	Other cuts	Total bacon
1935	79,126,105	24,254,274	17,945,337	121,325,616
1936	93,644,513	37,109,089	30,201,510	160,955,112
1937	115,084,817	41,726,249	35,946,097	192,757,163

Percentage of inspected slaughtering of hogs exported to Great Britain. On the basis of 120 pounds of bacon to a hog, bacon exports were equivalent to live hogs as follows:

	Pounds
1935	121,325,616	=1,011,046 live hogs
1936	160,955,112	=1,341,292 " "
1937	192,757,163	=1,606,309 " "

Inspected slaughterings equivalent in live hogs exported:

	Percentage of total kill exported
1935	36 %
1936	37·6%
1937	42·2%

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

FEDERAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR DIRECT RELIEF—CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM AFFECTING SOCIAL SERVICES

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government be requested to consider making direct relief, and also in part, urgent relief works, a federal responsibility entirely and not a municipal or provincial one, notwithstanding the provisions of any law, statute, usage or custom to the contrary;

And also consider a new measure of constitutional reform adapted to Canada's present-day circumstances so as to afford a more ready, just, equable and more immediate remedy and basis of dealing with all of Canada's social services of all and every kind, thus providing a quicker solution of the same and more equality of treatment for all provinces of confederation on the principle of each for all and all for each;

And, if deemed advisable, a select committee of the house be appointed to make a study and review of the whole question and report back to the house as quickly as possible.

He said: This resolution has been on the order paper since January 27 last. I did not know until the moment it came up yesterday of another such motion to go into supply. But, after all is said and done, the discussion yesterday will do no harm, although it anticipated this prior motion. In regard to the remarks I made last night, I believe from what the late Right Hon. Austen Chamberlain said that one will find as I have found the House of Commons to be a place of much kindness. I found also that the House of Commons is a sort of gentlemen's club. If I made any personal remarks last night it was the first time since I have been a member. But I say now that I am very much disappointed at the stand taken by the minister as far as the municipalities are concerned. I did not speak last night for the city of Toronto, far from it; my remarks were national in scope, not provincial, not municipal. They related to a problem which is Canada's greatest domestic problem since we have been a country, the care of the health, comfort, welfare and well-being of all the citizens of this country. That should be the supreme interest of parliament.

I am sorry if this resolution is taking up too much time, but too much time cannot be given to this chief domestic problem. This is the twenty-fifth day since parliament met and what have we done for the average forgotten man, the industrial worker, the farmer and the toiler who have no work by which to earn a living? Nearly all hon. members are owners of real estate; many of them know conditions better than I do; the medical men who visit these people, the social workers, the municipal workers, know the conditions that exist. Parliament meets and does nothing about the matter. The motion before the house to-day puts directly on the House of Commons full responsibility for the solution of this problem.

I was asked a question by an hon. member last night. I am sorry I did not know what his question was. I had no time to answer questions. Had I known what the hon. gentleman was asking I should have answered. He asked me what remedies I had. I did propose remedies. During the debate on the appointment of the Purvis commission I laid this matter right at the doorstep of the government and the gentlemen on the front benches and proposed remedies; I pleaded the cause of the man on the street to the man in the cabinet. I was very much disappointed last night at the reply which the minister made in the house. I gave concrete cases; I quoted conditions in forty cities all over Canada.

The government of the day is responsible for the solution of these problems as long as it is the government. Under the principles of responsible government the responsibility is not on members of the opposition; it is not on the private members. Under the constitutional practice from the days of Edmund Burke the government of the day is responsible to the electors for the way it administers the country, this sacred trust, as long as it is the government.

This resolution of mine is divided into two parts. It places the burden of relief where it belongs, on the federal government. I was asked last year by some municipalities to bring this matter up. They were of the opinion that the dominion government is the only body which can solve this problem, inasmuch as that government controls the tariff, trade and commerce, banks and banking and bills of exchange, and immigration. They brought the people into the country. This view of the municipalities was recently emphasized at the meeting of mayors. They asked that relief be borne forty per cent by the dominion, forty per cent by the provinces and twenty per cent by the municipalities Some ten years ago when the hon. member for Winnipeg

North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and I brought this question of relief to the attention of parliament, we suggested that the cost should be divided amongst the federal, the provincial and the municipal governments, one-third each. Until the dominion-provincial conference of 1934 that was the rule. At that time the dominion government changed the whole policy and decided that they would not deal directly with the municipalities in regard to relief. It is in the cities of over 40,000 population that ninety-five per cent of this relief burden arises. I am not referring to the drought sections, because that situation occurred later. In this resolution I ask that the government solve these problems. We live in a land of plenty, a land flowing with milk and honey; yet we have people starving owing to the failure of the government of the day to solve the greatest problem Canada has, that of distribution which is at the base of the whole question.

The second part of the resolution deals with the constitutional question. Last year I had a resolution before the house for constitutional, parliamentary, cabinet and law reform. The government in reply said, "We will appoint a royal commission," which they did. The commission was to be chosen to revise, amend and bring in a sort of new bill of rights for the forgotten man, and amendments to the British North America Act. That has all been changed, and we have now travelling throughout Canada a roaming commission, which can do nothing at all but give this parliament advice and opinions.

We were told two years ago that this travelling minstrel show, the Purvis commission, headed by the Canadian representative of the du Pont dynasty, the gentlemen who control Canadian Industries Limited, and other vast corporations, who controls sixty per cent of the companies engaged in transportation, distribution, agriculture and so on, was going to solve these problems, but that first it had to make a survey. We were told that we ought to read the essays of Carlyle before we would understand the problems of the country, and we were told that we did not have the facts. After spending two years in the collection of facts, what did we find? We found that all that was discovered had been found out by the committee headed by Senator Couzens in the United States in 1927. They even copied the youth assistance idea from the findings of that committee, and that matter was brought up from the opposition benches years ago.

What reply did we get? Apparently the government policy is to balance the budget and stop feeding the hungry. That is the policy of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers); I say that without fear of contradiction. They want to turn all these people back on the municipalities for any relief, who can depend only upon real estate taxes to meet their expenditures. Most hon. gentlemen here own real estate; we are investors first and members of parliament afterwards. Once in a while, instead of coming down here for five or six months and looking after the business of the country, we should look after our own affairs. I do not think I need appeal to hon. gentlemen because they are all investors in real estate.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this problem can be settled only by the House of Commons. No municipal council and no provincial government can settle it. No Purvis commission or any other body can give us the solution. No Rowell commission can deal with it. That commission is travelling all over Canada. It is going to be a harvest for the lawyers, but all the unemployed will be dead before we get a report or any action on it. It simply means that the government of the day is postponing action. When the government does not have the courage to deal with a problem, a favourite way to postpone action is to appoint a roving royal commission and take judges off the bench instead of leaving them to attend to their judicial duties. We are told that this new Rowell commission is a fact-finding commission, as the Purvis commission was supposed to be. This is the second fact-finding commission we have sent out on the road. It will visit all parts of Canada; it will cost a large sum of money for lawyers to present briefs, and after they are presented they will be simply thrown into the waste paper basket. The commission was appointed solely for political expediency and will find out nothing not now known.

I repeat that parliament is the only place where this problem can be settled. In a previous debate I said that the provinces never should have been created; that they were created in this way by the fathers of confederation for political rather than economic reasons. At that time, in 1936, I coined the epigram that the various provinces, now ruled entirely by Liberal administrations, were like nine Balkan states, all quarrelling among themselves, and that is just what they are The present government do not admit responsibility for this problem; they say their aid is only a grant or loan. They go back to their stand of ten years ago When I asked a former Minister of Labour, Mr. Heenan if this government would contribute one-third of the cost, he said no; that the question of unemployment under the British North America Act was one for the municipalities and the provinces

In my opinion, the remedies which have been proposed by the present government are wholly futile. It seems to me, after reading what the Minister of Labour said in the house last night, that he is making the whole problem a political question. I moved in the house, a week before the meeting of the mayors, that certain papers regarding relief be laid on the table. That information was laid on the table of the house on Friday, and on Saturday, at the meeting of mayors, only one or two government members had copies of it, the opposition members had none. I say to the minister that this is not a political question in any shape or form; it is an economic problem entirely. The remedies suggested by the government remind me of the celebrated remark of a well known Canadian, the late Hon. J. Israel Tarte, who said that elections are not won with prayers, and that platforms are made to get in on and not to stand on.

If hon. members opposite want to find out the policy of the Liberal party, or the remedies they propose, let them remember what was on the bill-boards all over the country during the last campaign, in 1935. "Beat Bennett and Bad Times." "Action, not Promises." "End Unemployment, Vote Liberal." That advertisement was in black and yellow colours, those of a famous racing stable, on a big bill-board at the Don river. Those colours were significant—the black for the unemployed and the yellow for the yellow policy of the government which will not tackle this problem. They did beat Bennett, but they have not carried out their promises to give us better times or solve unemployment or relief. They have appointed several commissions but otherwise have done nothing. They shoved off this new deal into the law courts, and then the decisions were put into cold storage. Nothing has been done even in regard to sickness and unemployment insurance, which has been part of the Liberal platform since 1919. Now it is said that nothing will be done about it this session, until the report of this Rowell commission is brought in next year or the year after. Parliament will not see it until after the next election.

This is the twenty-fifth day of this session, and the electors and ratepayers back home are asking what we are going to do about the matter. We have all the facts we want. The next election will be won by the voters of the middle classes and those whom I have called the forgotten men, together with the industrial workers who have been driven to the wall. Eighteen men control the wealth of all Canada, the products of the sea, the soil, the forest and the mines, and no effort is made to have any equitable distribution of wealth or to solve the question of distributism. The only fair basis I see on which to meet this problem is the percentage basis. We have several volumes of these figures, reports and indexes which have been presented by the minister, but they do not show the real state of affairs in industry at all. Many Canadian workers are on part time. Many industries are closed up altogether, while others are threatened by the continuous tinkering with the tariff. It has been said that there may be some interference with the Ottawa agreements of 1932. While all this tariff tinkering is going on, who will invest money in business in Canada?

Last night the minister gave figures indicating that the number of unemployed has decreased steadily since 1930, until in 1937 the figure stood at 381,000. He said that last year it improved by 120,000, while 100,000 were taken off relief and put on payrolls. I challenge these figures. I had a letter from an indexed worker in my riding stating that he had been working in a very large industry in ward six. But he has been laid off for three or four months and has been unable to find other work. He applied to the fire department but could not get a job. In my opinion these indexes are not reliable. They may be all right sometimes, but it is another matter when the government undertake to count the people in the country who are out of work.

The main problem in industry in Canada, as I say, is that of unemployment, because no scheme of doles or insurance can take away the desire of free citizens to work. No insurance scheme can be a substitute for the desire of the ordinary man to find employment. Employment is the only agency by which the wealth of the nation can be distributed. Without distribution production is a mere waste of time. I am not altogether a believer in socialism. I believe the day to day conduct of business in Canada should be left to those who understand it, namely to the business men and the retail men in the country. It should not be left to a lot of index collectors, professors, royal commissions and so forth. I believe there are many abuses of the capitalist system, and many abuses in industry. Some people are protectionists only for what they can get out of it, protection themselves. The worst enemy of protection is that five per cent of the manufacturers who maintain sweat shops, and do not give the employees a chance, as was revealed by the price spreads committee. That committee should be reestablished, and the sooner the better. I believe business should be conducted along proper lines, and that there should be a fair readjustment and sharing of the profits of labour in industry.

The question of income tax has been referred to previously. I have before me the monthly reports of the Bank of Canada. They show that the country spent about $212,000,000 on unemployment, and the details are given in a chart. This chart shows a steady increase. About $212,000,000 has been spent on unemployment since the depression started. What has been collected in income tax in Ontario? During that same time they have collected $252,000,000 in that province. Every year the people of Ontario pay the full cost of relief for the whole of Canada, including the cost in the drought area of Saskatchewan, What does Ontario get? It gets little or nothing.

I believe in the principle of each for all and all for each, as set out at confederation. That is the only proper principle. Why should some provinces, because they support the government, be given a better percentage? Why is Ontario not given more consideration, because in that province the industrial worker is suffering as much as those who are in the prairie provinces? I am asking for a larger share of the income tax receipts.

I say that the dominion should share with the municipalities what it receives from Sir Thomas White's act of 1918. Real estate and income taxes have been taken away from the municipalities, and that means a loss of about $3,500,000 a year to the city of Toronto. I brought this matter to the attention of the house in the session of 1926-27 when, as reported at page 145 of volume I, of Hansard I moved:

> Whereas it was deemed necessary and expedient to impose an income tax by the parliament of Canada as a revenue measure growing out of the war and to temporarily invade the former exclusive field of the municipalities to collect this form of taxation.
> And whereas such taxation has led to duplication and there is an urgent demand for further reduction of taxation and to restore to the municipalities their former exclusive rights and prerogatives to this form of taxation.
> Therefore this house will support the government in any immediate measures it may take to give effect to the principles of this resolution or to reduce taxation generally, including income tax, sales tax, stamp revenue postage and other forms of what are called nuisance taxes.

Some of those taxes have been removed, but the income tax has remained. In introducing the income tax measure in 1918, the then minister of finance said that he hoped in a few years to hand back this type of taxation to the municipalities.

For these reasons I say that these conditions should be investigated. Then, would it not be a good thing to have a referendum at the next election giving the people an opportunity to say what they think about the duplication by way of overgovernment and overtaxation in Canada by having provincial governments. We should have a referendum as to whether or not the people are prepared to vote on the abolition of provincial legislatures. Since confederation they have been at the root of many errors in Canada. They have been at the root base of many racial jealousies. They have handed out natural resources of the sea, the forest and the mines to favourites, and we have had nothing to do with the matter. They are just a second municipal system. They were established only as an afterthought of the fathers of confederation. With her 47,000,000 people, Great Britain has not such a system. Australia has had one only recently, and I say that the form we have is just a glorified municipal council, or a large county council, as Sir Oliver Mowat called them.

What have they been doing? The moment Toronto, or Hamilton, or London or Windsor finds a new source of revenue, what does the province do? It grabs that source of revenue for itself, and takes it away from the municipality. It loads the burden of debt on real estate. I contrast the reply the mayors of Canada received from the minister with what Mr. Hopkins, WPA administrator, told the United States mayors at the Mayflower hotel conference held recently. He joined with the mayors of Chicago, Los Angeles and Cleveland in asserting the responsibility of the federal government for the care of the unemployed. The conference took no action, however, on the question, beyond referring to its resolutions committee a resolution asking a thirty per cent increase in WPA quotas to cities, on account of the increased cost of food, clothing, coal and rent. The administrator was supported by Mr. J. Warren Madden, chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, who told the conference there is no reason whatever for Americans to be pessimistic about the practicability of industrial democracy. There is considerable reason for the workers to be pessimistic about any action taken by this government with respect to the control of the high cost of living or relief.

I notice in a recent publication of hon. members opposite, known as the Canadian Liberal Monthly, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett is charged with the responsibility for Liberal inaction. In answer to that statement, would not Hansard show the discussion in connection with Mr. Bennett's New Deal policy when hon. members opposite, then on this side of the house, sat as dumb as oysters? The head of the department would not say whether he was for or against it, and had no views on the subject during the debate.

The answer of the present Minister of Labour to the municipalities is along the same line. The government has not been able to make up its mind with respect to social reforms, on which platform it was elected. If the government literature in this monthly publication is correct in saying that the legislation of the late government was ill considered, hastily drafted, and condemned with the stigma of unconstitutionality, were not hon. members opposite, now on the government benches, aware of that fact when the legislation was passed? Where have they been since they took office? They will have to repeal those measures, or cure their defects. But nothing has been done, except that the decision of the privy council has been put into cold storage, and unemployment relief abandoned after all the bill-board promises.

What does the government propose to do for the house owner? Is it going to wait until the royal commission presents its report? The relief in municipalities will be reduced, if the federal government does not do something about the matter. Fears were expressed at the mayors' meeting with respect to relief, and it was indicated that if dominion grants are not increased, the provinces will not make to the municipalities the grants which they made last year. Through income tax the provinces have taken money belonging to the municipalities.

In passing, may I say a word or two about my observations of last night. I did not refer to local matters. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) made some observations in the house last night. He made his annual filibuster—to use his own word—against the city of Toronto. He is one of those hit and run members, who hits out about something he knows nothing about. He was one of those who supported the Drury farmers government in Ontario.

I was not responsible for bringing up this matter and I did not know anything about it. In answer to the hon. gentleman I may say that every utility in the city of Toronto is self-sustaining and has its own sinking fund and costs not a cent in the tax rate. Services are given to the public at cost. Twenty years ago the water rates were running away behind, but to-day the city of Toronto is supplying water to about fifteen different municipalities at cost, and that fine system is self-sustaining on low rates. Roads have been built into the county as far as fifteen miles to permit the bringing in of milk and other farm produce. The city of Toronto paid forty per cent of the cost of building and maintaining the Toronto-Hamilton highway. If it were not for the city of Toronto there would be no hydro electric service in the province or any Chippawa plant. The city of Toronto saw to it that outside places received their electric power at the same rate. The Toronto transportation system, the hydro electric system, the water system and other utilities are all self-sustaining; it is not necessary for the taxpayers to put up one cent in taxes for them. Toronto is the most solvent city on the American continent.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), the whip for the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, said, it was most unfair to consider the gross debt and pay no attention to the net debt, but what did the hon. member for Brant care about that? Toronto is the only city that I know of which supplies transportation at cost on a five cent basis. The hon. member for Brant made his annual tirade against the city of Toronto. He was one of those who supported the farmer government, known as the Drury government, in Ontario. We all know where they went. Manufacturers and others were denounced as grabbers and robbers, and the result was that no manufacturer would invest in industry in the province while that government remained in office. The hon. gentleman represents 18,000 constituents in Brant constituency, but when I followed Sir George Foster as the member for North Toronto I represented 120,000. Apparently the hon. gentleman is not a believer in that good old clear grit doctrine, "representation by population." I was surprised to see the Minister of Labour justify the erroneous statements which had been made by the hon. member for Brant and congratulate him. I was surprised when Liberal members from Toronto did not rise in their places to correct the hon. gentleman. I have the report from the bureau of statistics and I know that his figures were not correct.

According to the figures of the bureau of statistics, the real estate board, the Bank of Canada, and others, the capital debt of Toronto is little or nothing considering the net debt and the great revenues of utilities. That city has the largest sinking fund of any city in the dominion. A total of $28,000,000 has been set aside as a sinking fund to pay the debt. The city spends many thousands in providing hospitalization and education, summer and winter fairs, and other services which this government should provide. This parliament was able to vote three millions and a quarter to provide for the health of animals, but it could vote only $427,000 to provide for the health of humans. It was left to the city of Toronto to pioneer in modern health work under the late Doctor Hastings. That work benefited the city of Brantford and other places throughout Canada.

The city of Toronto was left out of the distribution of relief work and had to pay $100,000 for the construction of a breakwater at the island. The first time since confederation cities in Quebec were given millions of dollars when Toronto got little or nothing. This was the treatment given although that city contributes vast amounts in the form of income tax. All these relief works are a direct charge against income and are paid for largely by income tax collections. I do not wish to detain the house any longer as our session to-day will be only for the afternoon and there are others who may want to express an opinion on this matter. This is not a local matter, but it has been made a political football by the present government.

This House of Commons is the only body that can solve this problem. As the resolution refers t the British North America Act, I shall say a few words about that. We want the British North America Act for the living, not for the dead. This act has placed our industrial workers and farmers in straitjackets. The phrase I used three years ago is still true and these people are still in straitjackets. We are the only body that can settle this question, not the present royal commission under Mr. Rowell. The British North America Act should be revised and all these social services should be readjusted. Confederation is at the cross roads; we are at the parting of the ways under the act as it is at the present time.

If the government wants to find some money to provide these social services, let them solve the railway problem. Did not the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and others say in the last election that if they were returned to power they would settle the railway problem in short order? We must provide for a deficit of $40,000,000 a year in connection with our railways. Then there is drought relief, pensions and all that to be considered. This government can afford to send a useless deputation to the League of Nations; they can spend three and a quarter millions all told on that organization since 1922; there are many ways of finding revenue; but when it comes to providing a few dollars for hospitalization and relief of the hungry and needy, they say they have not anything.

It would have been far better if the advice of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) had been taken and these matters discussed at a round table conference as they do in Washington. That would have been better than appointing a royal commission which can only collect facts and give advice about which nothing will be done for years. That would have been the proper way to settle these matters, especially when the government of the day have their friends in office in the provincial governments. Or it would have been far better if a committee of this house had been set up to consider these things. We got somewhere with the mass buying and price spreads committee and we demonstrated that facts could be found very quickly.

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, if I understood the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) correctly, he suggested that we ought to approach this problem first as investors and second as members of parliament. I suggest to him that we should reverse that process and consider the problem first as members of a national parliament and second as investors.

Before the economic depression set in, relief was primarily a municipal and provincial responsibility and was assumed by these authorities as such. In order to illustrate this point may I say that figures furnished by the department of public welfare of the city of Toronto indicate that even back in the year 1922 Toronto spent some $114,969 on direct unemployment relief, in addition to providing other general social services such as hospitalization, care of indigents, clinics, children's aid societies, Ontario training schools, industrial refuges, mothers' allowances, old age pensions and the like. In 1922 the city of Toronto expended $1,367,444 on direct relief and the providing of these general social services; and so on during the years 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926 and 1927. In 1928 and 1929, two years of so-called boom or prosperity, the city of Toronto expended, respectively, $1,909,007 and $2,036,910. These figures clearly indicate that the municipal authorities were then assuming this responsibility and perhaps were quite capable of doing so. When, however, relief became so general as to constitute a matter of national concern, the dominion government came to the assistance of the provincial and municipal authorities with a system of grants in aid. I shall not discuss at the present time the efficacy of that system, or criticize it unduly, but I should like to quote a passage from the interim report of the national employment commission, referring to the situation in respect of grants in aid as the commission saw it on taking office:

> A system of aid, to which the dominion contributed, which had developed without adequate regard for the causes of the distress relieved and with insufficient safeguards, and which in consequence tended to discourage rather than encourage reemployment.

In any event this system of grants in aid was established, and under the legislation of the former administration the dominion contributed on a percentage basis; thirty-three and a third per cent was provided by the province, the municipality and the federal government respectively. In August, 1934, when the administration which the hon. member for Broadview supported was in power, the system was changed and the grants in aid were cut down to a monthly sum of $600,000. This was in effect between August 1, 1934, and November 30, 1935, while the former administration was in office. In other words, during that period the grant in aid was decreased in percentage from thirty-three and a third to 21·11 per cent. I ask the hon. member for Broadview and the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), both of whom were in the house at that time, why they kept such a discreet silence when the percentage of relief was decreased? Why did they not criticize the administration for reducing the percentage of relief as I have indicated? The other two hon. members, representing St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) and Greenwood (Mr. Massey), were not then in the house; they were only budding politicians; but surely the hon. members for Danforth and Broadview could have risen in their places and protested against the decrease. I am not prepared to criticize the former administration for having inaugurated that reduction, because I think they found that a percentage grant of relief is not in the interest of the taxpayer, that it encourages an excess of municipal expenditures and has caused many municipalities to become insolvent. But in any event these hon. members were silent.

Mr. HARRIS: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. FACTOR: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS: What portion of the moneys paid out for direct relief at the time he mentions were revealed in the tax rate or in the taxes collected by the city of Toronto in the year to which he refers, which I believe was 1933?

Mr. FACTOR: I have those figures, and if the hon. member will permit me I will refer to them later.

Mr. HARRIS: The hon. member knows that there was nothing in the tax rate, and that now there are two millions of dollars paid in taxes.

Mr. FACTOR: I appreciate the question, and I will answer it when I come to it.

Mr. HARRIS: That explains the silence.

Mr. FACTOR: In 1935 the present administration came into power, and what happened? The grants in aid to the province were increased to seventy-five per cent and the monthly grants increased to $1,050,000. In other words the percentage was increased from 21·11 to 31·91. I do not recall hearing the hon. members for Broadview and Danforth give any measure of praise to this administration for increasing the grant in aid from twenty-one to thirty-one per cent. There was an indiscreet silence at that time.

In April 1936 conditions undoubtedly had improved, and the grants in aid were reduced to $892,000. There were successive adjustments from April 1936 to June 1937, when the grants amounted roughly to about $600,000 a month, or thirty-two per cent of the total. In July 1937 they were reduced to $480,000, and remained at this amount till September, 1937, then amounting to thirty-eight per cent of the total; and in October 1937 the amount was reduced to $465,000, to continue to the end of the fiscal year, March 31.

I wish to quote a few figures to indicate how fairly and adequately the federal administration tried to deal with the provinces. Since the government came into office the dominion grants in aid to all the provinces, as of December 31, 1937, amounted to $59,404,798. Of this amount Ontario has received $19,941,750, or 33·6 per cent. The population of Ontario, according to the bureau of statistics estimates for the year 1937, is 33·4 of the population of the dominion. I believe hon. members will agree with me that that was a fair allocation of the grants in aid. Further, of the total number in receipt of material aid in the dominion in January 1937, twenty-nine per cent were in Ontario; in January 1938 the percentage in Ontario of the dominion total dropped to 22·6. From January 1937 to January 1938 the reduction of the numbers in Ontario in receipt of material aid was 32·4; in the same period the reduction for the dominion, apart from the drought areas, was 23·6 per cent, and for the dominion including the drought areas, 13·6 per cent. In January 1937 the percentage of Ontario's population on material aid was 9·2; in January 1938 the percentage had dropped to 6·2. The percentage of the population in receipt of material aid, apart from the drought area, was, in January 1937, 9·1, and in January 1938, 7·1. Persons in receipt of assistance in Ontario in January 1937 numbered 340,099; the number in receipt of assistance in January 1938 was 230,000, or a reduction of thirty-two per cent. Cost of relief, as estimated by the province, was in January 1937, $2,503,462, and in January 1938, $1,800,000, or a reduction of twenty-eight per cent. Last session parliament voted some $19,500,000 for distribution to the provinces by way of grants in aid, and I can sincerely say that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and this government have allocated that sum very fairly and equitably, considering the financial position of the respective provinces. A province that claims a surplus, a reduction in debt, a province that reduces taxation in various forms, is a province that should not ask for as much assistance as one that is not in such a good financial position. That is my opinion.

May I for a few moments consider the problem of the city of Toronto. I wish to discuss the situation there not as a local matter but as one that is indicative generally of the situation in the municipalities. In the first place I would point out that the tax rate in Toronto for the last year was 34·85 as compared with 18·5 mills in 1912. The taxation last year totalled $32,437,530, of which realty supplied $28,532,530, or approximately 93 per cent. I have no doubt hon. members will all agree that the burden of taxation on realty in Toronto and in other municipalities is getting beyond endurance; it is reaching the stage where the municipalities will be unable to carry the load. I say further with regard to real estate that with present values and under present revenue-producing conditions seventy-five per cent of the real estate in Toronto is not worth the mortgages placed upon it. This is a very serious situation.

In the last few years, from 1932 until last year, the assessment in the city of Toronto was reduced from $989,000,000, in round figures, to $906,000,000; in other words, because of the decrease in the value of real estate, the assessment was reduced by over $80,000,000 in that period, with the inevitable result that the tax rate had to be increased and the load of taxation again placed heavily on real estate. I would also point out the tremendous load that has been borne by the municipality so far as direct relief is concerned. I have statistics for the last fifteen years from 1922, showing that the total cost to the city of Toronto of unemployment relief was the huge sum of $17,765,452. It is becoming an intolerable burden for the taxpayers. So far as the relief situation is concerned, let me assure you that the people on relief in Toronto are not getting honey and cakes, so to speak; the level of the relief voucher is very low, and the city council has under consideration a motion to increase it by fifteen per cent. Hon. members will appreciate the almost impossible position in which the municipalities find themselves, particularly Toronto.

I must insist, however, that there is also a bright side to the picture. I was surprised to hear the hon members for Broadview, Danforth, St. Paul's and Greenwood say that the conditions were not better in Toronto last year than they were before. Why did they not refer to the same brief that was furnished by the department of public welfare? They should have looked up the figures to see what happened in Toronto.

Mr. HARRIS: I did not make the statement that the hon. member has just attributed to me.

Mr. FACTOR: If I read Hansard correctly I thought the hon. member was criticizing the administration, that he wanted a strong man of action to do something.

Mr. HARRIS: Quite so, yes.

Mr. FACTOR: Well, let me for the enlightenment of the hon. member give him some figures furnished by the department of public welfare of Toronto. With the permission of the house I should like to place this table on Hansard because it clearly indicates the enormous improvement that has taken place in 1937 as compared with 1936. The gross expenditure for relief for 1936 was in round figures, $8,765,000 and for the year 1937, $7,194,000 or a reduction of $1,570,000. Let us take the net cost to the city. In 1936 it was $3,139,000 and in 1937, $2,409,000, or a reduction of $729.339.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the hon. gentleman read the figures for 1936-37, for December?

Mr. FACTOR: Yes. I shall be glad to do that. For December, 1936, the net cost to the city was $369,910 and for December, 1937, it was $266,766. Let me say this to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). If he will cast his eagle eye over the last column of these statistics he will find a most encouraging picture with regard to the total number of persons on voucher and house of industry relief, including single men in hostels. I should like to read these figures by months because they show beyond question the steady, gradual improvement in Toronto as a result of policies put into operation by the present administration. In January, 1936, there were 100,415 people on relief and in January, 1937, 78,561.

This is the table:

DIRECT UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Let me point out that between the months of January, 1936, and October, 1937, there was a fifty per cent reduction in the number of people on relief in Toronto, from 100,000 to 50,000. Will hon. members deny, then, that conditions have improved? I am not saying that we have reached Utopia; far from it. The problem of unemployment relief is still the greatest domestic problem facing the people of Canada to-day. As long as we have even 61,000 people on relief in the city of Toronto, as we had in December, 1937, we cannot sit back in smug self-complacency and say that we have solved the problem of relief or of unemployment.

Here may I interject a word in regard to the trade policies of the government. Much has been said by protectionist members from Toronto to the effect that this policy of expansion of trade has—I think they almost said—hurt the city of Toronto, if one interprets their remarks correctly. But I tell those hon. members that I know of no single cause which has been so effective in bringing about the reduction in unemployment in Toronto last year as the trade policies of this administration.

Mr. EDWARDS: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. FACTOR: Certainly.

Mr. EDWARDS: Will he explain how any person will be given work if the goods are produced in another country?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is a pertinent question. How are you going to do it if the work is done in another country?

An hon. MEMBER: All exports and no imports!

Mr. EDWARDS: No, I do not believe in that.

Mr. FACTOR: I do not know of any work that Canadians are able to do in this country which has been diminished by the policies of the present administration. On the contrary I tell the hon. member, who comes from an industrial centre, that because of the trade policies of the present administration the purchasing power of the agricultural population has been largely increased so that they are able to buy more of the products of the industrial centres.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not like to interrupt, but if the hon. member will permit, I tell him that ninety-five per cent of the production of the county of Waterloo is consumed within the county of Waterloo.

Mr. MacNICOL: Because the manufacturing towns prosper.

Mr. FACTOR: If the hon. members want to make a speech I shall be glad to listen to them.

Mr. EDWARDS: Pardon me.

Mr. FACTOR: I repeat that we must have a balanced economy. I am not prepared to have our secondary industries sacrificed in any way, but I do say that the extreme point of view suggested by hon. members opposite will not do our national economy any good.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is all a myth.

Mr. FACTOR: Getting back to the problem of unemployment as far as the city of Toronto is concerned, it is clearly shown that there has been considerable improvement. But in all kindness to hon. members from Toronto I say that extreme and exaggerated speeches in this house will not do Toronto any good. They will not do the province of Ontario any good or do this country any good.

Miss MACPHAIL: Ontario is used to exaggerated speeches.

Mr. FACTOR: You mean from Toronto.

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. lady means from Queen's park.

Mr. FACTOR: This government has dealt fairly and equitably with the problem of relief. It has contributed seventy-five per cent of the cost of old age pensions, has assumed the cost of pensions to the blind—

Mr. SPENCE: This government is paying the seventy-five per cent now, but the government did not start it. Why take the credit for it?

Mr. FACTOR: This government is continuing to pay the shot, and it was this government which inaugurated pensions for the blind. The total cost of old age pensions and pensions to the blind in 1937 was $9,441,984. In the province of Ontario this government assumed the entire cost of supplementary assistance to unemployed war pensioners, which in 1937 amounted in that province to over a million dollars. This government is going to enact unemployment insurance. This government as indicated by a resolution of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power), is extending the War Veterans' Allowance Act to include relief of war veterans who have been in a theatre of war and who are not one hundred per cent physically fit. I ask this government that, in bringing down the estimates for the coming year, it cooperate to the fullest extent with the provincial authorities so that the taxpayers in Toronto and other municipalities may have their burden lightened.

Mr. MacNICOL: Only a change of government will do that.

Mr. STREIGHT: That will be a long time coming.

Mr. FACTOR: We have in the last few months been in a period of recession. I think the revenues of the country indicate that we are being affected by conditions in the United States, and, optimistic as I should like to be, I fear that for 1938 the relief picture may not be as pleasant as we all hope it will be. I therefore suggest that the government take this condition into consideration in making their estimates for relief for 1938.

I believe that the respective powers of the municipalities, provinces and dominion in regard to raising revenues to meet such obligations as arise from relief expenditures, while they may have been appropriate at the time of confederation, are entirely unsatisfactory in the light of present conditions. I believe that the government took a proper step in establishing the Rowell commission to investigate this problem, in order to furnish to hon. members of this house the information gathered by their investigations. There ought to be re-allocation of responsibility to meet present-day conditions, but surely the basis of any change must be accurate information, and the government have taken the initial step to obtain that accurate information. If the resolution of the hon. member for Broadview is adopted the effect would be to substitute a committee of this house for the Rowell commission. With all due respect to the qualifications and abilities of hon. members of this house I maintain that the members of the royal commission are far more suitable, far more able, and perhaps have far more time and greater capacity to undertake an investigation of this kind, and to furnish the necessary information, and I feel certain that the time is fast approaching when, based upon the information gathered by the royal commission, this administration, which I know will be in power for the next few years to come, will take the matter into consideration and so adjust conditions as to meet the problem that we are discussing this afternoon.

May I conclude by saying to all members of this house that it certainly is not in the best interests or to the advantage of our country at this time and on this occasion to snipe politically, or indulge in carping criticism of the actions of the government. This is a time for unity. This is a time for accord among all those who have the interests of our country at heart. Tremendous problems face us to-day, and the only way we can hope to solve them is, first, by having a thorough understanding of them, and, second, by unanimity in an endeavour to solve them.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, though this resolution is brought forward by a Conservative member from Toronto I feel that we in this corner cannot let the opportunity pass without expressing our support of the principles involved in it. These principles, I think, are two; first, that direct relief should be regarded as a federal responsibility, and second, the need for constitutional reform. Again and again we have urged these principles.

First with regard to constitutional reform, it is quite true that there is a special commission investigating the relations between the dominion and the provinces, but that would not preclude a thorough study of the situation by a committee of this house. In his closing words the last speaker suggested that we had to have a very thorough knowledge of the situation. I think that is true, and while we are having committees dealing with all sorts of subjects there is no real reason why a committee of this house should not deal with the urgent problem that is before us to-day. Suppose the Rowell commission does report in the course of another year. What then? It will lay before us a certain amount of information. It may make certain recommendations. It is then for the government to adopt the report and the recommendations. We have had a good many royal commissions in the past which have cost the country a great deal of money and which have made very thorough investigations, but this government has taken no action on those recommendations. Suppose this commission comes back and reports that there should be radical changes in the British North America Act. Is it possible that this government would recommend those changes? For years we have been recommending such changes as being absolutely necessary, yet nothing has come of the matter. This year the government is asking for one simple amendment, to facilitate the passage of an unemployment measure. That in itself is anticipating what the royal commission may recommend, and I am afraid that, like a great many other things, this particular matter will be held up.

Almost daily we are blocked in this house by jurisdictional disputes. I was in a committee yesterday where this same thing came up, as it comes up again and again. We all know that the House of Commons can do practically nothing because of this trouble over jurisdiction. In the meantime the people are suffering; the country is suffering. Why should we let another parliament pass by without taking some action? Why should not we in this very parliament, instead of seeking one little amendment to the British North America Act, claim the right to amend the act as we see fit? Until some government is courageous enough to take some such action, I am afraid various social measures are not going to get very far.

Now we come to the main question, that of federal responsibility for direct relief. I would point out that, as everyone knows, to-day unemployment differs radically from the unemployment of twenty or thirty years ago. To-day unemployment is not due primarily to local causes. It may be that there is still a small amount of unemployment which is due to individual incapacity, individual shiftlessness, laziness and so on, but we all recognize that the great mass of unemployment to-day is due to general causes, great national causes, in fact world causes. Everything in the way of improvement in the situation, according to the last speaker, is due to the actions of the Liberal government; but everything in the way of depression is due to the policies of the United States, or something else. I submit that we need to get away from that kind of party argument. Whatever government is in power is going to have difficulty with the unemployment question as it exists at the present time.

I do not intend to-day to burden the record with a mass of figures. I would refer hon. members to the statements that have been submitted by the province of Manitoba or by my own city of Winnipeg. I do not think we need go to the submissions of other provinces. The conditions prevailing in my own province and especially in my own city are almost desperate. I am not however making a plea merely on that local ground, because we are more or less typical of the whole of Canada, though undoubtedly the west is more seriously affected. I suggest that the difficulty to-day is to no small extent due to the tariff and trade policies of this country, and let me say that, despite all the protestations of the Liberal party, tariffs have not altered very materially under the Liberal regime. The trouble is due to financial policy, for which this dominion government is primarily responsible, and to our foreign policy. And when we have large numbers of the people unemployed because of the policies of the dominion government, I care not whether they are the policies of the Conservative government or of the Liberal government, the least the dominion government can do is to assume responsibility for the effects of those policies. That is the ground for pressing this resolution.

This year, Mr. Speaker, I think more than in any other year I have been in parliament, I have been almost obsessed with a sense of the futility of the whole business, with a sense of frustration. I look around this house and recognize the faces of a great many people I have come to know during the years I have been here. They are splendid men, men who are kind, thoughtful, and ordinarily intelligent. And yet this problem has been with us year after year. We have had it, in acute form, for nearly ten years. What are we doing about it? We are puting it off from month to month and from year to year. I require all the courage I can summon to get to my feet on the floor of the house this year. There are about seventy members present. I would not say it is not worth while to talk to seventy people; but what is going to be accomplished by talk? One can put forward the best arguments of which he is capable; one can enter upon the record large masses of statistics, but what do they avail?

The government has a huge majority, and there is nothing to prevent its meeting the needs of the people—nothing whatever. And yet I charge that, speaking by and large, the government has done very little since it was elected, nearly three years ago—very little. When we look at the program placed before us at this session, what does it amount to? The biggest thing, so far as the common people are concerned, is the unemployment insurance measure. But does anyone imagine it is going to go through? And if it does go through, it will touch only the very fringe of the problem of unemployment.

There is the situation we face. The government has a huge majority and yet it does practically nothing. Further than that, it is using its majority to prevent measures being effectively brought before the house. What has happened? There was a division on the address in reply, and since that time there has been no division of the house. Steadily, steadily, steadily, whether a question is of importance or of very little importance, the government has adopted the tactics of either adjourning the debate, when a matter is a very ticklish one which, if brought to a vote, might cause an inconvenience, or on the other hand, of talking it out. I presume that will be the fate of the resolution now before us, and of almost every other resolution hon. members may present this session. That means, in turn, that a great many resolutions which at least some of us thought would be important are being shoved aside. I would not mind so much having private resolutions pushed aside, if the government were doing something along these important lines, but it is not. I think it is time the country as a whole recognized the fact that this government is not only proposing to do nothing, but also is determined to implement a certain policy of "hush, hush" which prevents parliament being the forum it ought to be.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

This kind of thing is a danger to democracy. All along we have boasted that constitutional, parliamentary means afforded the best way in which to bring about reforms. If I were in the position of many a poor unemployed man to-day, do you imagine I could be persuaded to wait, wait, wait, until parliament helped me out, or until some commission reported favourably, and parliament took recommended action? I do not believe it. I do not wonder that there are crimes committed. I am not advocating crime—and I do not want anyone to put that in my mouth—but I say I do not wonder that desperate, unemployed men commit crimes. I do not wonder a bit.

Nor do I wonder at the development of fascism in some parts of Canada. If we are not going to get action from a so-called democratic government, men are not going to go on suffering forever. They are going to take action in some other way. I say that any government which has postponed constructive action, as this government has done, is a menace to democracy in Canada.

I think of the large groups of out-of-works I have met. I have no doubt many hon. members meet similar groups in their constituencies. Sometimes I imagine that because some of us are trying to represent labour we meet more than our share of these people. We see them in homes of refuge, in camps, and on the streets. A haphazard way of treating them has been going on for eight or ten years. The men are either getting desperate or, on the other hand, are becoming so hopeless that they will never be of any use to the country.

I am thinking particularly of the youth. Again and again we have had inquiries as to what is to be done for our youth. Recreational projects have been brought to our attention. But when I see a young fellow of twenty, twenty-three or twenty-five years who has never worked and never will work,—if this condition continues much longer he will not be capable of working—I urge it is a desperate situation. These men are not trained to work. In time, they have not the disposition, and never will work. If there were only fifty, a hundred or a thousand of these young men perhaps we might not feel that the condition was serious, but there are tens of thousands of them, and the best we have hitherto been able to do for them has been to send them to a camp where they receive a meagre amount, and where they engage in what they themselves know to be a dead-end sort of vocations, if they may be called such. They are at jobs which lead nowhere, and they know it.

I shall not enter further into the situation to-day. From time to time we have advocated various constructive measures. We believe that if a man is out of work, through no fault of his own, the state has the responsibility of giving him a decent living—not a pittance, and not charity. I do not ask that that decent living should be given without his contributing his part. When I think of the statistics which were read to us a few days ago respecting housing conditions in almost all our cities in Canada, I conclude that there is work enough to do. There is plenty of work to be done in Canada, and I advocate housing because I do not know of any program which would put a larger number of unemployed to work, or which would benefit a larger section of the public.

What can we do about it? Does the government purpose putting on an extensive housing campaign? We have not heard of it. Again we hear, "Where is the money to come from?" This morning in the banking and commerce committee we were told by an expert from the United States that there was great difficulty to-day in finding fields for investment. Certain classes of people are able to amass wealth, and their savings are so great that they do not know how to invest them in regular enterprise. That situation has developed in Canada as well.

It is obvious that nothing short of some considerable redistribution in national income will bring about a desirable condition. Why not accomplish it by means of taxation? Again and again we have urged in the house a heavier income tax. I do not see why the tax should not be higher in the higher income brackets. Then, the inheritance tax, I think, has never been used by the federal parliament. There is no reason why the dominion should not use it, despite the fact that some provinces are using it.

The other day a very estimable gentleman died leaving a fortune of $2,000,000 almost entirely to his own family. There have been several deaths recently from which we have come to know of the considerable fortunes which have been piled up by a few individuals in our midst. Giving due credit to these men for their ability and all the rest of it, the opportunity to amass a large fortune to-day is granted by the state. There is no earthly reason why at least a portion of these great fortunes should not be taken back and utilized for the good of the less fortunate members of the community—none whatever.

It was some years ago that I read in a pamphlet dealing with the inheritance tax published by the British labour party this little phrase:

Naked man came into the world and naked he should go out again.

There is a great deal of truth in that. Let us make provision for the immediate needs of the dependants of the man who passes away, but let us not seek to perpetuate these fortunes which really mean that the rest of the community is under tribute to those who inherit. Although the government may talk out this resolution this afternoon, although it may continue to move the adjournment of the debates on the various motions which we bring forward from time to time, these are only temporary ways of saving its own—

Miss MACPHAIL: Hide.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, its own hide, as the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) suggests. Those are only temporary ways of, shall I say, sliding by without dividing the party and without raising any great hostility in certain sections of the country, but I do not think such tactics can be regarded in any sense as indications of true statesmanship. As I said earlier, to neglect these pressing, vital social problems is to endanger that democracy which I think we all hold dear.

Mr. J. A. MARSH (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively last night to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) when he was replying to several hon. members representing city constituencies. In rising to speak to-day, and it will be but briefly, I am actuated only by a deep concern for the man who wishes to fulfil what I would say is the third most fundamental material thing in life. Perhaps you may not agree with my sequence of ideas, but I would say that the first is to get married, the second is to have a family and the third is to own a home, pay for it, live in it and keep it regardless of all the adversities to which the average man is subject.

May I presume that we are all agreed that a nation of home owners is a contented and happy nation. I was reading the other day that the people of a certain country not far removed from us spent more last year on radios than they spent on the purchase of homes, and that they had spent several times more money on the purchase of automobiles than on the acquiring of homes. I do not think that is the condition in Canada, and I would be very sorry if it is. I submit that if citizens in Canada are to preserve and keep their homes and if the young man is to fulfil the ambition of his boyhood to own a home as a sanctuary for himself, his wife and his children, some tax-alleviating legislation must be passed to make that possible.

It has been said, I think truthfully, that the building trades are the backbone of prosperity, and that the product or products of the building trade is real estate from which is extracted the bulk of our taxation. The burden of relief in our municipalities has been soaring since 1930. Because of increasing tax rates and assessments which have been consistently too high, we have placed on the home owner a burden of taxation that he cannot bear up under. The poor home owner is bowlegged and humpbacked from trying to carry this burden. This condition has been caused by a frantic effort on the part of the municipalities to get revenue from the only source available, that is from real estate taxation and other levies in the way of licences and levies on the business man.

Several hon. members from Toronto have pointed out that in that city real estate bears ninety per cent of the burden of taxation. In Hamilton real estate bears 88·4 per cent of the burden of taxation. The result is that the home owner and the small business man are bearing almost the total burden of relief. What incentive is there for a man to own his home? What incentive is there for a young man to fulfil the dearest ambition of his life, and practise one of the fundamental principles of citizenship?

To some extent municipalities are restricted in their ability to tax. The province has wider powers and the federal government, through this House of Commons, has access to the widest field of all in the way of taxation. The mayors of various cities waited upon the provincial government and also upon the Minister of Labour of this government, and the result was that the province said: We will cooperate with you, we will try to do something for you, we will try to shoulder a greater part of your load. However, I understand that this is a step which this government, through its Minister of Labour, does not care to take. The result is a stalemate and the municipalities are faced with the probability of having to shoulder more than half the cost of relief for 1938.

I was interested last night in hearing the Minister of Labour say:

> I fully agree with what has been said to-night regarding the plight of the small property owner. From the time I first came into active contact with the relief problem in Canada I have been impressed with the unfairness of a system of relief which presses as heavily as it does upon those who own real estate. But I would suggest to hon. members that the only solution to this problem does not lie in an increase in grants in aid payable by the dominion to the provinces. It is within the power of the provinces to increase the grants to municipalities, over and above the amount received from the dominion government. It is also within the power of the provincial governments to confer wider powers of taxation upon the municipalities within their borders.

The province has promised fuller cooperation, and inasmuch as this is a national problem, I suggest that we regard it as such and do something to relieve the property owner. I wonder if we realize the extent of unemployment and relief payments still obtaining in our cities, despite what we hear of increasing revenues and trade and commerce. I am not saying that conditions are not slowly getting better. The employment figures are mounting gradually, but I am speaking about the municipality of which I know most, the city of Hamilton. In December 1937 we had 2,606 families on relief, and now the number of families is 3,002, an increase of 400 during the last two months. Last year we paid out in direct relief $1,319,918, of which the city's share was $345,222. Of that amount the city of Hamilton budgeted $100,000 and funded the balance of $245,222. I do not want to tire the house with figures, but I will briefly present some items to indicate what we have paid out in relief in various forms. Last year there was expended: for food, $721,400; fuel $166,748; clothing, $59,835; shelter, $308,713; medical services, $50,075, and for a land settlement scheme, purely an experiment in the city of Hamilton with the surrounding community, but one which I believe has definite possibilities, $12,372. There are some other charges, which at the moment I cannot earmark, amounting to $775, or a total of $1,319,918 for direct relief.

Now, the point is that the cost of relief did not improve materially during the year. In January, 1937 we spent $134,011; in December of the same year, $126,546—in other words, approximately $7,400 less, an improvement of eight per cent. My submission is that so small a decline in expenditure cannot be regarded as a real improvement.

I desire now to say just a word or two about the ability of the property owner in Hamilton to pay his taxes. In 1930 arrears of taxes in our city amounted to $1,107,710 against an assessment of $165,440,160. Seven years later what do we find? We have tax arrears to the amount of $2,488,555 on substantially the same assessment, or a trifle less, namely $164,127,200.

What does it all mean? It means that the home owner cannot continue much longer to shoulder his present burden of taxation. Neither can the business man. I implore the Minister of Labour and this government to look into this matter more thoroughly, to hear again the mayors' association and see what can be worked out in the way of help. When a citizen is interviewed by a municipal official in the department of welfare, and that official, the guardian of the taxpayer's money, is trying to solve his problem and allow him as much as his regulations will permit, he ends by saying, "It is all we can do for you." I am sure that this citizen and the official alike are reminded of those words in the bible, "And they all with one consent began to make excuse." One said, "I have married a wife, and therefore I cannot come." Another said, "I have bought five yoke of oxen. . . I pray thee have me excused." I submit that this eternal "passing the buck" from the municipality to the province, from the province to the dominion, and back to the municipality is something that must stop if people are to retain whatever vestige of trust they have in democratic government.

I do not agree with the resolution in its entirety. I believe that if we do not hold the municipality liable for a percentage of the cost of relief, that relief cannot be properly administered by the municipality. The municipality should have a stake in this relief debt. But I contend also that the province and the dominion should be responsible for at least seventy-five per cent of the load and thereby lessen the burden now carried by the homeowner and the taxpayer.

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): I have no intention of speaking very long, for I know there are other hon. members who are anxious to say a few words. But I am interested in the first part of this resolution—more so than in the rest of it—that is, where it asks the government to consider making direct relief a federal responsibility. I contend that relief is a federal responsibility, but it is one which the government has not assumed. If we review the history of relief since 1930 and compare the debts of the cities, we shall find that there has been a tremendous increase in the mill rate of our cities throughout the country. At the same time the desire has been repeatedly expressed in the house to put people back to work. If there is anything which has had a retarding effect upon the building of homes, it is the rising mill rate. Because of the tax burden people are discouraged from building houses for themselves. Since 1930, when relief became a problem of national scope, thousands have lost their homes. It was never intended that the cities should carry a burden of relief as we know it to-day, because it is something unusual, the result of economic paralysis and of conditions which never before existed. In the early days of the depression the obligation should have been taken over by the federal government.

I intended to quote this afternoon some figures showing the rise in various mill rates throughout the dominion, but so many figures have been given and so little time remains that I believe I should leave them out at this time. I wonder how many members in the house have any idea of the humiliation which is suffered by people who are in receipt of relief. How many hon. members can realize the mental anguish which these people have suffered and are suffering to-day? It is time that the house should no longer sit back with a complacent attitude but should become informed of the facts of the way our people are living.

I wish to place on Hansard a letter which was received to-day by a friend of mine in this city. It has to do with a case of a young married couple. They had one child, and there was soon to be another one. These people were compelled to apply for relief. They applied here; they applied there; no one would accept the responsibility. I believe the Red Cross organization gave them a couple of dollars; that is all they have received in the last two months. When they applied again, some days ago, they were told that they should go to Montreal. The husband had been in this city for a year; his wife was an Ottawa girl; and all they received was a ticket to go to Montreal. I now have a letter written by them from Montreal, and I ask hon. members to try to picture the mental anguish these people are suffering because of the apathy of parliament in face of this, the greatest of our national questions, human life and human happiness. The letter reads as follows:

> A few words to let you know that we arrived at Montreal at 5 p.m. and had to rent a room. I just came in now and it's eight o'clock. I have been walking all the day and we are in a very desperate position.
> I went to the government social service where Miss Joyce sent me with a note and they sent me to the identification cards office. They won't give me my card unless I would be in a position to give them the exact names and address and date where I used to stay in 1933 to 1938. I told them I could give the name and address of the landlord where I used to stay two years ago and could get them somebody to prove that I was here five years ago, but I told them I couldn't easily remember the exact name and address where I stayed the last five years, so they told me I could not get my identification card—

And incidentally relief.

—unless I gave them the exact information.

Then I went to the relief office and there they told me that it was impossible for them to give me my relief without an identification card. I was very discouraged to hear that from a supposedly human voice, and I tried to explain it wasn't fair to do that to a woman and child who only wanted something to eat and a place to sleep.

There is an interesting part of this letter from which I gather that this young man lost his temper. I do not blame him. He got out of patience with all the red tape he had to go through and he was threatened. He was told that he was nothing but a communist and that if he did not get out the police would be sent after him. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that the day has come when the administration of relief should be taken out of the hands of nincompoops and placed in responsible hands, the hands of people who will recognize relief as a permanent problem and not as something that will be got rid of by increasing foreign trade. I could tell hon. members stories that would astound them, stories of the humiliating experiences of people on relief, of girls who are being told that they are good looking and do not need relief. That is happening in Canada, the country we are so proud of, as living in a Christian state. I wonder how much Christianity there is in a system which condemns people to this sort of thing, when they are knocked about from pillar to post and no voice is raised in their name.

With regard to the second part of the resolution, calling upon the government to consider urgent public works, I have heard some hon. members refer again in this debate to the question of money. We all agree that money is the most significant question in the house; it is the instrument with which we have to deal with ninety per cent of our social evils, and without which we can do nothing. But I have wondered in the last few years what has happened to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). In the election of 1935, when he was aspiring to the office he now holds, he declared that the Liberal government would issue $500,000,000 of new currency. Now, however, we have nothing but silence from him; we have no money.

If there is one problem which must be tackled in Canada it is the problem that faces us with regard to the great mass of the people. To-day this government should be busy organizing the youthful and intellectual resources of the country in an effort to give our young people a place in society. That should be the first job of the government, more important than any other job they have before them. Are we going to pussyfoot around this question in the next five years as we did in the last five, or are we going to take the bit in our teeth and go places? The solution to the problem of unemployment is wrapped up with the question of money, rather than with foreign markets. If the Minister of National Defence would rise in his place and propose that parliament should issue currency to the extent he proposed a few years ago, not half a dozen men would be opposed to him.

We are facing a strange paradox. We have everything in the world, natural resources, willing hands, intellectual resources, everything; yet we are destroying the most valuable asset of the country, our Canadian youth, because this government has not the intestinal fortitude to handle the problem. I know that many members of the government, many of those sitting on ministerial benches, have not had experience with many of these people of whom I am speaking. What is wrong with the people on relief is not simply that they have not a job; the most significant feature of the problem is the soul-destroying conditions under which they live. We must give them a new hope; we must let them know that they are a part of Canadian society.

If I could do anything to shake the government and to lift it out of the rut it is now in, I would surely do so. Someone says "Ha, ha." I wish some hon. gentlemen would cast aside, for six short weeks or so, whatever riches they have; I wish they would divest themselves of their cloak of membership, and go through the country without anything and look for a job. Let them endeavour to find work and they will learn at first hand what the problem of the mass of the people really is. No one can afford to say "Ha, ha" in the house. I say to hon. gentlemen: It is your responsibility as members of this federal house; it is my responsibility, and I believe that the joint efforts of all parties could produce something within one week. We need homes. In the west we could stand some more oil development. Why cannot these things be done? Is it because we cannot sell things to some foreign power?

When people speak to me about depressions I try to grasp just what they mean, for the word implies at least something that is beyond our control. I believe, however, that throughout the world to-day the people are waking up to the real circumstances of our economic existence. If these poor people who depend upon this government to bring in some legislation to provide them with an opportunity to live, are waiting for expanding markets—well, heaven help them, because they will never be reabsorbed into our industrial life.

One hon. member spoke to-day of the desire of Canadian youth to be home owners. That is, of course, natural; we should all like to be home owners. But there are a great many fewer home owners to-day than there were in 1930. Many homes have been lost in tax sales. Many people who invested $2,000 or $3,000 in $5,000 homes have lost their investment. They were thrifty people, but they were caught in the economic maelstrom. To-day they are on relief.

Recently I read of an investigation that was carried out in the city of Ottawa with regard to chiselling among people on relief. Is it not astounding—trying to prove that somebody who is getting less than nothing, if you can imagine that, is chiselling? If we were to concentrate our attention for a moment on those who are chiselling, not on a little margarine or butter, but by thousands, for instance, insurance companies, big corporations, if we only had a few more investigations into their operations, this would be appreciated by the Canadian people. To talk about men on relief buying motor cars, or a radio, it is astounding. All one has to do to see the impossibility of it, is to look at the report. In any event every man on relief is entitled to a radio. Why should he not have a radio? Every Canadian is entitled to the luxuries we can provide in this country. Goods are made that people may use and enjoy them. Our economic system should be so organized that we can distribute all we can produce. On the one hand the government talks of overproduction, while on the other people cannot get the goods. They are called relief recipients. We would not have overproduction if these people had plenty to eat and plenty to wear.

But I shall be asked, where are you going to get the money? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) differentiates between the kind of money he has and the kind to which I am referring. I wonder if the minister ever saw the kind they have in the cities, which they refer to as vouchers, which they give to relief recipients, and for which the city of Calgary pays interest to the Bank of Montreal. The words of Professor Soddy can be used to describe money; it is anything, no matter what it is made of or why people want it, provided it has arrived at the degree of acceptability that people will exchange goods and services for it. It is not wealth in itself. If we have wealth in this country, it is the duty of the government to remove the obstacles in the way of distributing that wealth.

I heartily endorse the resolution of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). I only hope that too many resolutions of this kind are not talked out this session. Let us try to do something to solve this national problem, not evade it. The problem cannot be talked out of existence. While some hon. members may not agree with the theory which this group presents to the house, remember that what is facing the country to-day is not a theory, but a condition with which the government must deal.

Mr. A. M. EDWARDS (Waterloo South): I do not intend to detain the house at any great length on this subject, but I want to say a few words in commendation of the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). The ground has been covered fully by hon. members who have preceded me, and I do not propose to follow their observations, I cannot follow the hon. member (Mr. Poole) who spoke last very closely, but I do find myself in some considerable degree of sympathy with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in his remarks, and also the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood).

A great deal of attention has been paid to the city of Toronto and its troubles, but I think we are not here to legislate for any one centre in particular. Toronto is a large centre; it might be called my market town; but it seems to me that much of the improvement which government speakers claim has taken place in different municipalities, particularly industrial, is due in no small measure to the careful management and intelligent grasp of a serious situation by municipal councils. I have followed a great deal of the work of several municipal councils, not only of the city or municipality in which I live but also of the county councils, and for years the policy of those councils has been one of retrenchment, and an endeavour to pay as they go. A great deal of the difficulty in which some municipalities find themselves to-day, causing them to call on governments to assume their load, is due in no small measure to reckless spending in days gone by. However, that is water under the bridge. I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), if he could draw money out of an inexhaustible well, would be very glad to cooperate with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers in relieving this situation. But take as an example the city of Galt in which I live, for the first four years of the depression we raised each year one-third of the amount required to relieve unemployment. It was a three-way payment plan; one-third was raised by private subscription; one-third came from the province and one-third from the federal government. During those four years not one cent of the money required to take care of the unemployed was charged against municipal taxes. To-day what do we find? We are able to reduce our mill rate without increasing assessments.

I want to commend the earnest endeavour of the Minister of Labour to relieve this situation. I speak particularly of the housing plan and the home improvement plan; they have taken up a great deal of the slack in our district. I do not know of any year for the last eight or ten in which we had as much home building as during the past year. And that can be enlarged. As we all know, there is no line of industrial endeavour which gives as much employment to labour as building. I am told by contractors that if you trace a building back to its elements, eighty-three per cent of the cost goes for labour. So that anything done to enlarge the building program would assist materially in lightening the burden of unemployment.

Mr. DUNNING: About eighty-five per cent is labour in the home improvement plan.

Mr. EDWARDS: And about eighty-three per cent in new housing.

Another matter of which I want to speak for a moment is the plan on which these funds are distributed. I do not want to say anything derogatory to municipal control. Perhaps it is all right; I have no knowledge. But if I may be allowed a personal word, in Galt we appointed a committee of patriotic citizens who handled our unemployment relief funds during the four years of which I have spoken. They did this very satisfactorily. Careful attention was given to all cases; they were carefully investigated and relief was paid in a satisfactory way where required. In distributing relief through the province and down through the municipality, without implying anything, I think there is a temptation there, and with some people the temptation to play municipal politics is very strong. So that if relief can be handled, particularly where large amounts are involved, by an independent committee at the final distribution of the funds, that I think is very desirable indeed.

Now, to get back to the resolution, we all know it is nearly impossible for the municipalities to carry this burden of relief. The taxation on real estate to-day is so heavy that building houses for rental or investment is almost prohibitive. No one can get even a modest return on the investment. There is plenty of money for this sort of investment if only people were assured of even a modest return. Under these circumstances the burden of unemployment relief appears to be a national burden. It should come back in its entirety to the federal government. I hope the municipalities will cooperate to the extent of reducing their requirements to the minimum by handling relief funds very carefully.

I am going to offer a suggestion to the Minister of Labour as to how this relief problem could be handled. I do not mean distribution. My idea is this, that interference in private business over a period of years has been greatly responsible for the situation we are in to-day. For the past twenty years Anglo-Saxon America has been playing the game of government in business. Whether it has been wheat marketing, railways, mortgaging or whatever else you wish, when private enterprise got into any difficulty whatever the solution was to put the government in. Well, we have had an opportunity to see just how that has worked over quite a period of years. That has been a commonplace, as I say, for a long time. That is what happened in Canada in connection with radio. After five years of experimenting with radio I do not think I would be amiss in saying that conditions are in a rather bad state. I was going to say they were in a sorry mess, but I would hardly go that far. Instead of achieving the goal of Canadianizing the air, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation coast to coast network, built at considerable cost to the Canadian taxpayer, is now being used as a cut-rate pipe line to give much prized supplementary facilities to American broadcasters in the Canadian market.

The point I wish to make is that the only way to take up the slack is to encourage private industry, to stop continually sniping at successful private business, and to aid business in every legitimate way possible. I feel sure that if this is done, the heavy fog of unemployment and unrest will rapidly pass away. I was going to speak last night, but did not have an opportunity to do so. I find to-day however, that I am in very distinguished company in what I have said. According to this morning's Gazette, Sir Josiah Stamp, speaking in New York last night, said something very much along the same line, and I should like to read just two or three extracts from his remarks. He was addressing the British Empire Chamber of Commerce in New York city and went on to state what were the key factors of the economic outlook, outlining four points bearing on the recession, which he described as "convenient to watch". Three of the points were mechanical and the other psychological. The first mechanical point was that of credit and monetary facilities. The second mechanical factor was the effect of taxation, and I suspect that the effect of the undistributed profits tax appeared there. I want to say here that another very great load on industry to-day is the heavy sales tax we have in this country, which of course has to be taken up by the consumer. The third mechanical factor was the industrial question, and he believed that the best prosperity was secured by allowing business to make good profits. This may seem terrible to some members of the house, but this is what he said:

> The higher profits are, the more rapid expansion and employment . . . but if costs, particularly wage levels and hours of working, are forcibly thrown out of relation with prices the margin of profit is in jeopardy, and restriction of production is inevitable.

Then he went on to discuss the psychological feature of it, and said:

> My fourth factor is psychological. So long as business is afraid of what the government will do it can make no long distance plan for development and political fears are the worst enemies of economic progress.

If I have any suggestion to offer to the government to-day, it is this: I am not going to say that the government snipes at business, but we have a good many people who continually snipe at business not only in the house but on the platforms throughout the country. It is a popular thing to do, and it is a very easy thing to do. But private business, under proper supervision, is the right idea for handling this unemployment situation, and I do not think there is the least doubt but that given a chance it will gradually work us out of that difficulty. Just to give an idea of the different businesses that have been socialized—I am not going to say anything about that at the present moment, but I might say—

Mr. DUNNING: That would be very interesting.

Mr. EDWARDS: Well, then, I shall say it. I am going to read a list of businesses which different governments have stepped into, and I think, after I read this list, even the most skeptical will be convinced that the experiments in socialization have not only been costly to the taxpayers and to the country as a whole but put an unfair handicap and brake on private enterprise of the type which has been the major force in the development of this dominion. The Financial Post of February 5, 1938, published this list of businesses which have been invaded by the government. I certainly gasped when I saw it, and I do not think very many people fully appreciate the way private enterprise has been encroached upon. The list is as follows:

Light and power	Hotels
Ferry boats	Express
Steam railways	Restaurants
Radio broadcasting	Market gardening
Steamships	Meat packing
Sale of liquor	Electric railways
Farming	Mortgage lending
Coal mining	Insurance
Magazine publishing	Amusement parks
Grain elevators	Telegraphs
Gas supply	Warehousing and storage
Street cars	Printing
Saving banks	Land development
Construction
Telephones

I think that is a very surprising list.

Mr. DUNNING: Some of it is a bit far-fetched, is it not?

Mr. EDWARDS: Perhaps it is, a little.

An hon. MEMBER: Restaurants?

Mr. EULER: The parliamentary restaurant.

Mr. EDWARDS: We are operating one here, and under the Canadian National system we are operating hotels in which there are restaurants. I think it is a proper list, though one may have to use one's imagination a little in connection with a few of the items. But there is the list. Without criticizing, or wishing to criticize in any way, may I point out that I think the more we encourage people to invest their money in private enterprise, under supervision, the better it would be. I do not mean that they should be permitted to do just as they like. I served six months on the price spreads commission, and I certainly learned something in that time. I have offered a plan to absorb the unemployed to a large extent, and I trust the government will take action in regard to it.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this is the second discussion in two successive days on unemployment and relief. Another opportunity to debate the same question was afforded in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. For my own part, I welcome these opportunities for discussion of this vital question of unemployment and relief, whether the discussion assumes the form of criticism of government policies or whether, as rarely happens, it assumes the form of commendation or encouragement for those who at present have responsibility in the matter.

This afternoon various references have been made to the gravity of unemployment at this time. I am sorry the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is not in his seat. He spoke with great vehemence, and with evident sincerity, but it did seem to me, that he spoke in unduly pessimistic terms. What he said would certainly have been much more appropriate two years ago than it is to-day, and even more appropriate two years before that. I fully agree with hon. members that much still remains to be done before we can feel that we have successfully attacked the unemployment problem. At the same time there has been a very marked improvement in the past two years, and particularly in the past twelve months.

I am sure some hon. members must have seen the reference to unemployment in the speech from the throne delivered yesterday in the province of Nova Scotia. That speech from the throne contained the significant reference, with respect to unemployment, that whereas in 1933 there were 75,000 people on relief in Nova Scotia, at the present time the number has been reduced to 6,500. I am sure that record cannot be wholly duplicated in any other province. At the same time it is a clear indication that there has been a decided betterment in the general situation. Even in the province of Manitoba, where the member for Winnipeg North Centre resides, there has been a substantial improvement in employment during the past year. I am sure he is fully aware that farm relief in that province has almost disappeared, and that there has been a consequent reduction of unemployment in the city of Winnipeg. I believe it is correct to say that in the past year in the city of Winnipeg the relief lists have been reduced by about 1,000 families.

Manitoba is the great distributing centre for the western provinces, and its capacity to absorb the unemployed is limited very largely by the crops raised throughout the whole of western Canada. I quite understand that in the western provinces there has not been as great an improvement in unemployment as there has been in the eastern provinces, which respond more quickly to an improvement in economic conditions. After all we must acknowledge that what has taken place in the drought areas of western Canada—and this applies as much to the period in which the previous administration held office, as it does to-day—has been due not to any failure of government policies but rather to a very serious climatic disturbance. It was a blight, as it were, which for a long time has deprived those provinces of the best part of their natural income. Therefore I doubt if we shall really know the extent to which we shall be able to absorb those who are unemployed until we have once more had normal crop conditions in western Canada. I mention this because I think it is clear that the betterment in the situation in western Canada would have been far greater if there had been normal crops in Saskatchewan.

I do not purpose at this time entering further into the statistical position. On the address in reply I did take occasion to place before hon. members, in statistical terms, the improvement in connection with unemployment which has taken place during the past year. It does seem to me that while hon. members—and quite fairly, from their point of view—criticize the government upon its failure to bring about policies capable of solving the problem completely, they ought at the same time—and I am sure they do—take keen satisfaction in the thought that there has been steady progress in the past two years. We must all hope that this progress will not suffer any serious interruption, and that a year from now we may be able to look back upon a similar period presenting the same grounds for satisfaction and encouragement.

The discussion this afternoon has touched particularly upon two questions. The resolution however covers a wide field and has permitted a rather discursive debate. The first point raised by a number of hon. members relates to the grant in aid paid by the dominion government to the provinces for relief purposes. I shall deal only briefly with this matter, because I touched upon it last night. May I repeat that in the allocation of the grant in aid to the various provinces we have made every effort to avoid anything in the way of discrimination. From time to time the suggestion has been made that the eastern provinces have been prejudiced by the fact that it was necessary to make special expenditures in the drought areas of Saskatchewan. As far as the grant in aid of $19,500,000 is concerned, may I emphasize once more that we did not charge that grant in aid with any of the expenditures in the drought area. I believe if we had done so the eastern provinces might fairly have said that there had been discrimination against them. I have put the facts squarely before the house in order that there may be no misconception upon that point.

While I am on that phase of the question I should like to refer to a suggestion made not long ago that, in view of the situation which had developed in western Canada, the east ought to assist willingly to carry the west. That is a sentiment to which I believe no one on this side of the house would take exception, and it is one which is shared generally by hon. members in all groups. I did feel however, when the statement was made, that we ought also to recognize that if now the east is called upon in some measure to support the west, the west has also in a large measure supported the east. May I point out that the period of great industrial development in the eastern provinces coincided in point of time with the building of the Canadian Pacific railway, and the rapid settlement of the western provinces. I am quite sure that those who are engaged in manufacturing or merchandising will confirm my statement when I say that not only were many factories established in that period in Ontario and Quebec, but there was a great expansion of factories which formerly had a much more limited market. As a matter of fact, this applies not only to Ontario and Quebec but also to the maritime provinces. In my own former home in Nova Scotia I can think of at least half a dozen factories that came into existence to meet the great demand for commodities coming from western Canada in that rapid period of settlement which occurred at the beginning of the present century. So when we speak of the east supporting the west at this time, I believe we should constantly keep in mind the fact that western Canada has provided a market which made it possible for eastern industries to attain the position they now occupy.

Let me turn to the terms of the resolution before the house. As I mentioned a moment ago, it covers a great deal of territory, but I think it will be generally agreed that the major proposal is that which relates to the financial responsibility for relief. I should like to say that the hon. member for Broadview has been entirely consistent in the position he has taken upon this question. So far as I am aware he took this position when his own party was in power. But perhaps he will permit me to remind him that consistency is a fickle mistress; keeping company with error as well as with truth. I believe the hon. member for Broadview is consistently wrong when he suggests that the dominion government, at this time and within the present structure of our constitution, ought to assume the entire financial responsibility for relief. I say that for a number of reasons.

Let me deal first of all with the cost involved. Despite what has been said by some of my hon. friends in the far corner of the house, this government is obliged to count the cost with respect to any proposed expenditure. It is within the power of municipalities to appeal to the provincial government for grants in aid; it is within the power of the provincial governments to appeal to the dominion government for grants in aid, but the dominion government can appeal to no one for grants in aid. In connection with its increased expenditures it can go only to the taxpayers of this country. That is a consideration which we are bound to keep in view.

The actual cost of the proposal contained in this resolution would be in the neighbourhood of $100,000,000, taking the relief problem as it exists at the present time. The cost would be much beyond that if the numbers on relief equalled the numbers in 1933, during the worst days of the depression. If this government assumed the responsibility for that additional expenditure it would have to consider how additional revenues could be obtained by taxation. There are two taxes which have a certain degree of flexibility. One is the income tax and the other is the sales tax.

I think it is quite clear from the returns made by the income tax branch of the Department of National Revenue that it would be quite impossible to raise this additional sum by increasing the taxes imposed on the higher brackets of incomes. No doubt some additional income could be obtained in that way—so far as I am concerned I would prefer that it be done in that manner—but there is no doubt that if we endeavoured to obtain this revenue it would be necessary to go into the lower brackets of income where we would be taxing once more the small homeowners who have already been seriously affected by the heavy burden of relief in our municipalities.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister mean $100,000,000 annually?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, $100,000,000 annually to cover direct relief and relief works.

Mr. HEAPS: What percentage is the government paying now of that $100,000,000?

Mr. ROGERS: I cannot give my hon. friend the exact figure, but it would be roughly thirty per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: If it is thirty per cent, it would appear that there is not much difference between what is paid now by the federal government and what was paid a few years ago.

Mr. ROGERS: There is, because the total amount expended was greater some years ago.

Mr. HEAPS: Earlier?

Mr. ROGERS: Some years ago, when the expenditures for relief ran far in excess of what they are to-day.

Mr. HEAPS: Do I understand the minister to say that to-day the government is paying a greater share than was paid four or five years ago?

Mr. ROGERS: I should say it is not greater than in 1933, but greater than what the government was paying in the latter part of 1934. Certainly that would be so after August, 1934, when the old system of the dominion government paying thirty-three and a third per cent of the total cost was superseded by the present system of grants in aid. For example, the dominion contribution in November, 1935 to the province of Ontario represented twenty per cent of the total cost of relief in that province. We are paying much more now than we did in 1934 and in most of 1935.

Mr. HEAPS: I want to find out if the proportion now borne by the municipalities is greater than it was in 1934.

Mr. ROGERS: It is really not possible to answer that question, as I have not those figures here. My hon. friend is also aware that the percentage borne by the municipalities varies not only within the provinces but as between the provinces.

Mr. TUSTIN: How do they arrive at the amount of the grants in aid? Is that worked out on a percentage basis in connection with each province?

Mr. ROGERS: The amount is based upon an estimate of what will be required for the forthcoming year. A lump sum is allocated by this parliament to the various provinces on the basis of those unemployed, qualified by the financial position of the province. It is not possible to reduce that to the terms of an algebraic formula, but looking back over the years I believe we would be justified in saying that the allocation among the provinces has been fair and reasonable, having regard to the problem itself and the financial position of the several provinces.

If we did not have recourse to the income tax to raise the money required by the dominion government taking over the entire cost of relief, we would have to consider the sales tax. I think it will be agreed that here again we would be burdening that group of moderate wage earners who represent, so to speak, the working force of the country as a whole. Not only that, but with an increase in the sales tax we would be providing another deterrent to a revival of the building industry.

I do not propose to develop these points any further. I have brought them out simply as an illustration of the difficulties that would confront the dominion government in assuming the entire financial responsibility for relief within the present structure of the constitution. I use those words deliberately because it has been agreed generally, both by the preceding administration and the present government, that so far as present constitutional responsibility is concerned, the primary responsibility lies with the municipalities, while the responsibility in a secondary sense lies with the provincial governments. The dominion government goes in to assist the province when the problem has reached the point where it is beyond provincial resources. I do not suggest that an improvised method of dealing with the situation has been wholly satisfactory. We are doing our utmost to improve it from time to time, and the agreements now before the provinces are designed for that purpose. I believe that when these agreements are fully understood and accepted by the provinces, we shall be able to remove some, at any rate, of the abuses which now exist in the administration of relief.

But there is also another reason why it would be most unwise for the dominion government at this time, as suggested in this resolution, to assume the entire responsibility for relief. That reason lies in the fact that the relief problem at present is not wholly an unemployment problem. Relief lists in all provinces have been heavily charged with charity cases and unemployables. That, I am quite sure, is within the knowledge of any member of the house who has had close acquaintance with the development of relief during recent years. It is clear, therefore, that as the relief problem is contracted, this constant element of unemployables becomes relatively greater in the total. It is greater to-day than it was a year ago. It was greater then than it was the year before that. So this proposal means in effect that the dominion government at this time is asked not only to take over unemployment relief but also to take over from the provinces the care of unemployables. Now, if the dominion government had not already accepted some measure of responsibility in relation to unemployables, there would be better reason for a proposal of this kind at this time. But, as it has already been pointed out this afternoon, the dominion government, through old age pensions, through pensions for the blind, through special care for unemployed pensioners, through provision which is now in contemplation for an extension of allowances to unemployed war veterans, has already taken over from the provinces a very considerable part of the burden of unemployable persons. That being the case, I certainly feel it would be a great mistake for the dominion, in advance of a further review and readjustment of its relations with the provinces, to assume this new burden and to do so, as proposed here, "notwithstanding the provisions of any law, statute, usage or custom to the contrary."

There is a further reason why this proposal would not be satisfactory at this time.

Mr. THOMPSON: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. ROGERS: Certainly.

Mr. THOMPSON: Has the government decided that it has authority to continue raising money by income tax from the people of Canada? I remember, when Sir Thomas White first placed—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the question and I shall be glad to answer it, but I have only five minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON: Sir Thomas White made the statement that it would be only for a few years, and he doubted their authority to impose it.

Mr. ROGERS: So far as I am informed, there has never been any question as to the legal competence of the dominion parliament to impose an income tax.

Mr. THOMPSON: For war purposes.

Mr. ROGERS: Oh, no.

Mr. EULER: It is in the British North America Act.

Mr. ROGERS: The British North America Act gives parliament the power to raise money by any mode or system of taxation. It is true that certain assurances were given by Sir Thomas White at that time, but even he did not anticipate the way in which dominion expenditures would pyramid during the war years.

Mr. THOMPSON: The premier of Ontario says we have no authority.

Mr. ROGERS: I wish to refer finally to the reason why the dominion government should not at this time under existing conditions assume entire responsibility for relief. I refer to the question of administration. This resolution does not make any reference to administration, but I would like hon. members to realize that under present conditions the administration of relief is conducted almost exclusively by officials of our municipal governments. They have gained a very wide experience in these last years, and many of them administer relief without additional recompense of any kind. If the dominion government assumed responsibility for relief, it is clear, I think, that this would mean of necessity the setting up of a self-perpetuating organization for administration and at the present time there is no branch of the government that is equipped with an organization suitable to deal with relief across the entire dominion. The one organization which would be useful in this connection is the employment service of Canada, but that employment service is not a national employment service in the strict sense of the word. Contributions are made to it by the dominion government, but the actual control of it lies with the provinces.

Not only that, but if the mover of the resolution does not suggest that the dominion should take over the cost of administration of relief and does mean that the dominion should pay the entire cost but leave the administration to the municipalities, it is clear that we shall be entering into a most vicious arrangement. Under that arrangement municipalities, instead of having two or three dollars from outside to one of their own to expend, would receive all that was required for relief purposes without at the same time being responsible in any way for raising that money by taxation. I believe we have had sufficient experience in this country with the abuses of a system of that kind to convince us that, whatever the errors of the past may have been, we certainly ought not to repeat and extend them at this time.

Finally, as to the proposal for constitutional reform, it does seem to me that my hon. friend who has suggested in the first part of his resolution that the dominion government should take over the entire cost of relief has, so to speak, allowed the horse to be stolen and in the second part of the resolution is professing a willingness to lock the stable door. I feel there is a grave necessity for a constitutional revision and this whole question of relief and social service must play an important part in that investigation, but certainly, in advance of that investigation, it would be folly for the dominion government to assume this entire burden of unemployment relief, without any readjustment of powers or revenues of the provinces.

On motion of Mr. Euler the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 3, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMITTEE

CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the names of Messieurs Hartigan and Tucker be substituted for those of Messieurs Beaubien and Donnelly on the special select committee appointed to inquire into the operation of the Civil Service Act and all matters pertaining thereto.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DUFFIELD BUILDING, HAMILTON, ONT.

Mr. LENNARD:

1. Is the building known as "The Duffield Building" at Hamilton, Ontario, still leased by the federal government?
2. If so, what is the yearly rental of this building?
3. To what use is it being put this winter?
4. Is any revenue being derived from it?
5. What was the cost of maintenance for the twelve months ending December 31, 1937?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes. The five year lease expires April 1, 1938.
2. $20,000.
3. Building presently vacant.
4. No.
5. $2,655.58.

KINISTINO, SASK., INDIAN SCHOOL

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. What was the cost of building the Indian school on the Kinistino Indian reserve, No. 91, in the Pleasant Dale municipality?

[Mr. Rogers.]

2. Were tenders called? If so, what was the amount of each tender?
3. To whom was the contract awarded?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. $4,962.13.
2. No.
3. Work done by day labour under direction of departmental engineer.

*SASKATCHEWAN RELIEF—FEED AND FODDER

Mr. NEEDHAM:

1. Was the direct relief in Saskatchewan, of feed and fodder for 1936 and 1937 up to April 1, cancelled?
2. If so, why were not farmers' notes returned?
3. Was the twenty per cent of rural municipalities' share also cancelled?

Mr. DUNNING: This question calls for information which is entirely the business of the province of Saskatchewan. It is not on record here, so far as I can learn.

AMALGAMATIONS AND MERGERS

Mr. THOMPSON:

How many corporations have been granted letters patent by the Secretary of State for Canada between the years 1921 to 1937 inclusive where powers were granted for amalgamation or merger of it with other corporations, or where powers were granted to it to acquire the business of more than one corporation or business then in existence?

Mr. RINFRET: 12,548 letters patent and supplementary letters patent have been issued by the Secretary of State during the period from January 1, 1921, to December 31, 1937.

The principal objects of each company incorporated are set out in the notice published in the "Canada Gazette" in respect of each incorporation. Each company incorporated under the Companies Act has, as ancillary and incidental to the purposes or objects set forth in the letters patent or supplementary letters patent, the power, unless such power is expressly excluded by the letters patent or supplementary letters patent, to purchase or otherwise acquire and undertake all or any of the assets, business, property, privileges, contracts, rights, obligations and liabilities of any other company or any society, firm or person carrying on any business which the company is authorized to carry on, or possessed of property suitable for the purposes of the company. (s. 14 of "The Companies Act, 1934.")

Mr. Wegenast in his book on "Canadian Companies" (1931) at page 164 says:

It was formerly considered important that the charter should set out in detail every line of activity in which the company might wish to engage, and the enumeration of powers gradually assumed the more or less stereotyped forms which are to be found in Palmer's Precedents. These precedents were so uniformly used as models that in 1907 the Ontario legislature incorporated them bodily in its Companies Act. . . . In 1924 a similar section was brought into the dominion act.

Similar incidental powers are conferred by the companies acts of nearly all the provinces of Canada.

It will be observed, therefore, that few applications for letters patent now ask specific authority in the letters patent in respect to taking over business of other companies, since such acquisition comes within the ancillary and incidental powers.

To examine the 12,548 letters patent and supplementary letters patent issued during the period indicated would require the services of a legal officer for many months, since the interpretation of the language used in the applications could not be entrusted to the regular clerical staff.

WILLIAM H. CALDWELL

Mr. LENNARD:

1. Was William H. Caldwell, inspector at the south pier, Burlington channel, until September 22, 1937, employed by the government for the remainder of the year? If so, where?
2. How many days during each of the months of October, November and December, 1937, was he employed?
3. How many hours a day was he employed, and under whose supervision?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes, as inspector on the construction of the terminal wharf at Hamilton.
2. Twenty-six days each month.
3. (a) Eight hours per day; (b) Senior assistant engineer, C. C. Jeffery.

GOVERNMENT VESSELS—COAL

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Has the government any vessels at the port of Sorel, or in use on the St. Lawrence river?
2. If so: (a) what are their names; (b) their use; (c) where is the coal used for fuel obtained; (d) from whom is it purchased; (e) how is it purchased?
3. Has the government ever purchased imported Russian coal for fuel on these vessels?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.
2. Government vessels at Sorel or working out of Sorel: (a) Argenteuil, Berthier, Frontenac, Jalobert, Safeguarder, Vercheres; (b) Lighthouse and buoy service: Argenteuil, Safeguarder, Vercheres. Ship channel service boats: Berthier, Frontenac, Jalobert; (c) Mined in Nova Scotia; (d) Sorel, P.Q., Lavallee, Lachapelle, Cournoyer Ltee.; (e) By tender at points where there are more than one dealer; by agreed price otherwise.
3. No.

PORT OF CHURCHILL

Mr. PURDY:

1. What has been the cost to the federal treasury to date for developing Churchill, including the construction of wharves, sheds, elevators, etc.?
2. What has been the cost to the federal treasury to date in connection with aids to navigation for this port?
3. What has been the annual cost for each of the last three fiscal years for maintaining the various services at this port, including aids to navigation made necessary by its existence?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Department of Railways and Canals: To December 31, 1936,

Capital appropriations	$13,263,758 77
Income appropriations	77,120 91
Collection of revenue appropriations	713,519 85

2. Department of Marine:

Hudson bay and Strait to March 31, 1937	$4,178,506 58

(Includes Radio, Hydrographic, N. B. McLean, Meteorology, Aids to Navigation).

3. Department of Railways and Canals:

	Net.
1934-35	$171,095 47
1935-36	79,424 44
1936-37 (to December 31, 1936)	49,085 34
National Harbours Board: 1937	$140,889 61

(These expenses are included in the total given in answer to Question No. 1, above.)

Department of Marine—Radio, Hydrographic, N. B. McLean, Meteorology, Aids to Navigation:

1934-35	$109,668 11
1935-36	110,522 18
1936-37	126,844 63

(These maintenance expenditures are included in the total of Aids to Navigation given in answer to Question 2).

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT—PEEL COUNTY, ONTARIO

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. How many applications were made by farmers in the county of Peel under the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in each of the years 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937, and 1938?

2. How many of such applications were settled in each of the said years without reference to the board of review?

3. How many cases of Peel applicants were heard in each of the said years by the board of review?

4. How many of such cases are now awaiting disposition by the board of review?

5. Under the provisions of the said act, what was the total reduction in: (a) claims of secured creditors; (b) claims of unsecured creditors, with respect to applications made by farmers in the county of Peel in each of the above mentioned years?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. 1934, 1; 1935, 63; 1936, 40; 1937, 13; 1938, 13.

2. 1934, nil; 1935, 28; 1936, 21; 1937, 13; 1938, 7.

3. 1934, nil; 1935, 16; 1936, 17; 1937, 17; 1938, 1.

4. 4.

5.

	(a) Secured	(b) Unsecured
1934..	nil	nil
1935..	$ 9,968	$ 6,261
1936..	21,997	8,206
1937..	32,290	10,241
1938..	6,894	322

(Six cases not yet disposed of by official receiver.)

OLD AGE PENSIONS—QUEBEC

Mr. MALLETTE:

Since the Old Age Pensions Act came into force in the province of Quebec, what sums have been paid to the said province by the dominion government, each month?

Mr. DUNNING: Payments to the provinces of the dominion's contributions under the Old Age Pensions Act are made quarterly. The following amounts have been paid to the province of Quebec:

Old Age Pensions

As of March 31, 1937..	*$2,345,107 05
June 30..	2,597,524 70
September 30..	2,029,284 20
December 31..	1,874,485 58
	$8,846,401 53

Pensions for the Blind

As of December 31, 1937..	$ 8,321 12
	$8,854,722 65

*This amount covers the period August 1, 1936, to March 31, 1937.

[Mr. Graydon.]

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT—FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. By provinces: (a) what was the original number of soldier settlers; (b) what is the present number of soldier settlers; (c) what number of settlers have abandoned their lands, given quit claims, etc.; (d) what number of civilian settlers purchased such lands; (e) what number of British families were settled by the board; (f) what is the number of loans fully repaid; (g) what number of properties is now in the hands of the board; (h) what is the total book debt of such properties in the hands of the board; (i) what is the total investment represented by the board's operations?

2. What was the total amount in dollars of concessions granted by various remedial legislation?

3. What are the actual ascertained losses on resale of security taken by the board?

4. How many settlers in each province benefited through dollar for dollar bonus plan, in each of the years of 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937?

5. (a) What is the number of applications by debtors of the board under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act; (b) what is the total indebtedness dealt with; (c) what is the total write-down for each class of settlers; (d) what is the average reduction in debt in each class?

6. (a) What is the total number of properties on hand, with number leased in 1937, and number of properties unoccupied in 1937; (b) what is the number of properties that have reverted to municipalities and provinces under section 21 (a) of the act?

FARM IMPLEMENTS COMMITTEE

CONSIDERATION DURING THE PRESENT SESSION OF SECOND REPORT PRESENTED APRIL 8, 1937

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the second report of the special committee of the house, appointed on the 1st of February, 1937, to continue and complete an inquiry, begun by the standing committee on agriculture and colonization pursuant to a resolution of the house on the 2nd March, 1936, into the causes underlying the high prices of farm implements, with particular reference to the advance in prices in the year 1936, presented to this house on the 8th of April, 1937, be considered by the house during the present session of parliament.

He said: Hon. members will recall that in the 1936 session, by resolution of the house passed on March 2, the standing committee on agriculture and colonization was asked to inquire into the causes underlying the high prices of farm implements, with particular reference to the advance in prices in the year 1936. At the 1937 session a special committee of the house was appointed on February 1, to continue the investigation begun the year before. The second report of the special committee was presented to the house on April 8, 1937. In view of the lack of opportunity for adequate consideration, concurrence in the report was not proceeded with. The house will recall that we were anxious to prorogue in time to permit hon. members to be present at the coronation ceremonies in the old country, and an undertaking was given by the government that if the request for concurrence was not pressed at that time arrangements would be made to permit of concurrence being asked for at the present session.

Consideration of a report tabled during a previous session is a new departure for the House of Commons of Canada, but there is however precedent for it in the procedure followed at Westminster. The citation in reference thereto will be found in Beauchesne, paragraph 659, as follows:

> By a motion made for that purpose in the British house, the report of a committee presented during a previous session has been taken into consideration.

The record will be found in the English journals, volume 86. I have in my hand a copy of what appears in the record of the journals. The propriety of the course I am proposing is also indicated in Bourinot, third edition, at pages 554-5, in the following words:

> It (i.e., a report) remains in the possession and on the journals of the house as a basis or ground for such further proceedings as may be proper or necessary.

Adoption of the present motion will enable the house to consider the report at an opportune time during the present session.

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in looking over the recommendations of the committee to which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has referred one finds a recommendation concerning cream separators.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The time to discuss the report would be when concurrence is asked.

Mr. MASSEY: I was not going to discuss the report. I was going to direct attention to the fact that during the course of that investigation no evidence was taken from Canadian manufacturers of cream separators, yet one of the recommendations contained in the report is in connection with cream separators. My thought was that it might be desirable to have the committee meet again in order to take evidence on a matter with regard to which they did not take evidence previously.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say to my hon. friend that the report of the committee was made to the house. It was complete at the time concurrence was being asked last session. The undertaking at that time was that an opportunity would be granted at the present session to seek concurrence in the report, and I think the government is obligated to carry out that assurance.

Mr. MASSEY: It seems to me that before concurrence is asked the committee should complete its work. The committee may have figured that it had concluded its work, but since hon. members have had time to look through the report they may find that one of the recommendations is based upon wholly inadequate information.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is quite correct with respect to the suggestion that the report should stand over until this session. I think I suggested it to the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) when he began his discussion. The motion is not only highly proper but is one which this house is obligated to pass—not the government but the house as such; because we did agree to postpone consideration of the matter until this session.

The point that has been just brought to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) is intended to intimate that there was no Canadian evidence taken with respect to cream separators. I suppose, like most of us, the hon. gentleman has received a communication asking if it would be possible to have that done. I think the government would be the first to realize that it is desirable that there should be no possible thought of unfairness with respect to a matter of this kind. I have no opinion to express with respect to the merits of it at all. I only know—and I fancy many other hon. members of the house are in the same situation— that I was advised as to what was the position, and wondered whether or not it would be possible for these Canadian producers to have an opportunity to present their evidence. The report could then be brought back to the house with the additional evidence, because in the report there is a recommendation that deals with cream separators.

It seems to me quite clear, however, that this motion must pass in the first instance. Then when the motion for concurrence is made it would be proper for that order to be discharged for the moment and for the report to be remitted for one sitting of the committee, or whatever may be thought desirable, to enable the evidence of Canadian producers to be given as to the cost of production of cream separators.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With the concluding words of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) I am in full accord. The motion should be adopted now. When we are discussing concurrence in the report the house can decide what it may wish to do by way of having the report further considered.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

QUESTION OF CONSIDERATION THIS SESSION OF FINAL REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE, PRESENTED APRIL 6, 1937

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if he would be prepared to move a resolution in connection with the report of the franchise committee, similar to the motion that has just been adopted in regard to the report concerning farm implements. The attendant circumstances appear to me to be exactly the same, including, if I am not mistaken, a promise made across the floor of the house that we would be given an opportunity to debate the report this session.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend that the government intend to bring down a bill dealing with the question of the franchise, and on that bill there will be ample opportunity for the discussion my hon. friend has in mind. I can assure my hon. friend there is no desire in any way to restrict the discussion on franchise matters at this session.

Mr. NEILL: That is not exactly the same thing. If the report was discussed in the house it might be anticipated that it would result in some modification of the proposed bill, but if the bill is brought down the legislation is there and the government will see it through. The undertaking, as I recall it, was that the report would be discussed in the house, and not a bill founded upon it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The bill to be introduced will be based upon the recommendations made by the committee last session, and the bill will be sent to a committee where its provisions can be considered. The committee will be at liberty to discuss all that is to be found in the previous report.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. NEILL: Then the difference will be between a discussion in this house and a discussion in a small committee, which is not exactly the same thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There will be both; there will be a discussion in the committee and also in this house.

DIVERSION OF WATER

INQUIRY AS TO ANSWER TO QUESTION RESPECTING DIVERSION FROM HUDSON BAY WATERSHED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if I am to have an answer to the question I asked on February 3 in reference to the diversion of Albany river water. I note that the question is no longer on the order paper. Neither have I had any answer, but in the white book submitted the other day I did find a letter dated January 27, according to which the government apparently has consented to the violation of the Albany river water, and I should like to know if that is the government policy.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. friend that I did not intentionally overlook answering any question of his. He has just used the expression that the government consented to the "violation" of river waters. Does he mean the diversion of some waters? The violation of waters is a new phrase. I must confess that I do not know what particular point has been overlooked in my hon. friend's previous question. I thought everything had been answered as satisfactorily as it could be answered. If my hon. friend would put another question on the order paper which will meet the exact point he has in mind I shall endeavour to see that it is promptly answered.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

AVAILABILITY OF WEEKLY CERTIFIED REPORTS MADE UNDER THE STATUTE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to offer a suggestion to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), in view of the fact that the reports called for by the Canadian Wheat Board Act, which are made to him every week, for the purposes of a return would be very voluminous and very difficult to prepare. It would serve a useful purpose and probably meet the requirements of us all if the minister would bring the originals, without filing them as sessional papers, but making them available for inspection in the office of the clerk of sessional papers. This would obviate the necessity of much copying, and would enable us to get the information sought in time to be of use in connection with measures which will necessarily have to be considered during the session.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to give consideration to the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I should like to know whether he means that the reports for the past year should be submitted.

Mr. BENNETT: The statute provides that the board shall send to the minister every week certain reports certified by the auditors. Obviously we have a right to see those documents, and it would seem to me to be much easier if the originals were merely placed in the custody of the clerk of sessional papers, so that they could be inspected by all members of the house. I meant not only this year, but 1936 as well.

Mr. EULER: Reports are received by the minister each week, but I am not so sure it is the intention of the act that they shall be made available to all members of the house. However I am perfectly willing to consider the suggestion.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE

QUESTION AS TO RATIFICATION OF CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING MARINE MATTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are proceeded with I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). In October, 1936, a special conference of the International Labour Office dealt with marine matters, and at that time certain conventions and recommendations were made. Has the government ratified any of the recommendations or conventions, or is it the intention of the government in the near future to do so?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I may say that the conventions and recommendations to which the hon. member has referred are being studied by officers of my department, and I assume some decision will be arrived at shortly.

SASKATCHEWAN SCHOOLS

INQUIRY AS TO ALLOCATION OF RELIEF FUNDS AS EMERGENCY GRANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. EDWARDS (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) based on a telegram and several communications I have received. Probably if I read the telegram it will be self-explanatory. It is addressed to me, and is in these words:

> Canadian Teachers Federation is appealing to the federal members on behalf of Saskatchewan schools. Teachers are unpaid for months; equipment and supplies are inadequate; hundreds of children are being deprived of educational opportunities. Galt local secondary school teachers' federation requests your co-operation in securing emergency grants.

I appreciate the distribution of the relief funds in the manner in which it is done, namely through the provincial authorities, but I should like to ask the minister if there is not some plan by which some of this money could be diverted for this particular cause, or some suggestion made which would have the desired effect.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members have received circular letters respecting the plight of school teachers in Saskatchewan. In answer to the hon. member I can say only that assistance which has been given to provincial governments under the extraordinary conditions which have prevailed in several past years, has not carried with it any special provision for the ear-marking of the use of moneys for a particular class of the population.

It will be remembered, however, that during the last session special extra grants were made to certain provincial governments, and that those grants were made available following an investigation by the Bank of Canada into the affairs of the provinces. Among the matters reported upon, as a result of the investigation by the bank was, of course, the difficulties in connection with school and educational matters generally. So far as the government is concerned, those considerations entered into the determination on the part of the government to place before the house the provision which was voted as extra subsidy to the provinces concerned.

I believe I can say that the condition with respect to schools in Saskatchewan has improved, as a result of the assistance which was voted by parliament to Saskatchewan a year ago. The government is not unmindful of the present condition, which of course has been accentuated by the unfortunate drough‘ of 1937, and again, in connection with any special provision which it may be necessary to make, will have in mind the plight of the schools and school teachers. I do not think it will be likely that there will be any special ear-marking of any funds granted by parliament to go to a particular class of people within a province. Education is entirely within the control of the provincial authorities. Naturally the plight of an educational system might be taken into consideration by this parliament, in rendering assistance to a government, but it is questionable if we could go so far as to indicate that a certain proportion of the moneys granted by parliament should be used for the relief of a specific class when, as a matter of fact, the whole population are in very serious difficulties.

Mr. BENNETT: I rise to correct at least one statement made by the minister. In Saskatchewan we have been making a direct appropriation for one class of the population, and ear-marking it for that purpose, namely, for relief. It is so designated in the order in council—for direct and other relief. The order in council reads that the sum of so much is advanced for relief.

Mr. DUNNING: That is a purpose, not a class.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a class, the class who are on relief.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: That is perfectly obvious. I think it is scarcely a correct statement to say that we do not ear-mark, because we do ear-mark for that particular class. It is the same with seed grain.

Mr. DUNNING: The grants made to any province for relief are not made for the relief of any particular class in the province. They are made for the purpose of relieving any who may be in necessity, no matter to what class they may belong.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): There are grants for seed grain.

Mr. DUNNING: My objection is to singling out a particular class to get special consideration.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the third reading of Bill No. 24, to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1929.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Dunning.]

INSPECTION AND SALE

PROPOSED REGULATIONS RESPECTING BINDER TWINE, SALT AND OTHER COMMODITIES

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 1, consideration in committe of Bill No. 30, to regulate the inspection and sale of binder twine and salt, and to establish weight of bushel for certain commodities commonly sold by the bushel—Mr. Gardiner—Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: This bill was before the committee a few days ago, and upon that occasion certain sections were allowed to stand.

On section 4—analysts and inspectors.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The first subsection standing is paragraph (b) of section 4. On inquiry of the department I am given to understand that while they would prefer to have subsection (b) remain in the bill, if the committee considers it advisable to drop it, there would be no objection. The leader of the opposition raised an objection to that subsection.

Mr. BENNETT: I still think it is unsound.

Mr. GARDINER: I would agree to its being deleted.

Mr ROGERS: I would move that subsection (b) of section 4 be deleted.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 4 as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Labels on binder twine for sale in Canada.

Mr. ROGERS: I move:

That subsection 2 of section 6 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"Binder twine manufactured for export only and not to be sold for use in Canada need not be so labelled, but the onus of proof that any unlabelled binder twine is manufactured for export only shall rest upon the dealer, carrier or other person in whose possession the binder twine is found."

Mr. BENNETT: I think that meets the difficulty.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. SENN: Is the minister satisfied to allow the onus as to alleged infringement to rest upon the retail dealer?

Mr. GARDINER: That was the point raised, and on going into the matter with the officials of the department I found that they had in mind the fact that to-day a good deal of binder twine moves by truck. They were taking out the word "carrier," but I personally drew attention to the fact that that might be a very dangerous thing to do with so much twine being carried by truck. All this subsection says is that where a person is found carrying or has in his possession binder twine of this particular class, then he must show that it is going into export. We are trying to avoid the possibility of a carrier loading up twine, say at Saskatoon, heading towards the American boundary and then peddling it along the way. Under this subsection any officer would have the right to compel a person in whose possession binder twine is found to submit proof that the twine is going into export and is not being sold locally.

Mr. SENN: I do not think the minister gets my point. I was referring to subsection 1, which provides that the dealer shall be responsible for the number of feet in a ball and for seeing that it is correctly labelled, and that all the other requirements of the act are complied with. The dealer may be a retail merchant who would not know whether the twine was going to run six hundred feet to the pound, or whether it would be more than five per cent short. If twine is found in his possession that is over five per cent short, under this act he would be liable to a fine. I submit it would be practically impossible for a local dealer to discover that.

Mr. GARDINER: We discussed this point in connection with the penalty section, and finally came to the conclusion that there was no other way of dealing with the matter. While what the hon. member has said may be perfectly true, that a person who has twine in his possession cannot be certain of its length without measuring the twine, on the other hand a manufacturer cannot be certain that the individual who has the twine in his possession did not cut off a hundred feet. All that such a man would have to do would be to take the tag off the end of the twine, run off a hundred feet, cut it off and put the tag on again. It would not be fair to say that such an individual should not have some responsibility if action were taken. This section has been in its present form for many years, and, as I pointed out the other day, the penalty in connection with the tolerance of five per cent has been there since 1907.

Mr. SENN: Have there been any prosecutions of retail merchants under this section?

Mr. GARDINER: I would imagine that if there had been any prosecutions that is where they would have started, but I am not in a position to say just how many there have been.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): Would it be possible to substitute the word "maker" for the word "dealer" in that section? Binder twine is labelled by the manufacturer and not by the dealer.

Mr. GARDINER: "Dealer" is defined in section 3 as a firm or person manufacturing or importing or selling or having in possession for sale any binder twine.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 14—Labelling on salt containers.

Mr. GARDINER: Subsection 2 reads:

No deficiency in the weight of the salt contained in any package shall be deemed a contravention of this act unless it exceeds five per centum.

When the question was raised the other day I said that there did not seem to be any provision for the five per cent tolerance in the old act. I am informed by the department that on a more careful consideration of the matter they do not think there is any real reason why this subsection should be included in the bill and I am quite prepared to have it deleted.

Mr. ROGERS: I move that subsection 2 of section 14 be deleted.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. STIRLING: I also raised the question of block salt.

Mr. GARDINER: I have been informed that table salt and other kinds of salt that we were discussing the other day are covered by other legislation. In so far as salt is concerned this bill deals only with salt entering into the further manufacture of a product, and for that reason it is not necessary to deal with rock salt, block salt or any salt of that kind.

Mr. BENNETT: Where does that appear in the act? I was looking for it the other day.

Mr. GARDINER: It is covered partly by section 14 and section 15. The question was raised as to whether we should put those in.

Mr. BENNETT: Since the house has been in committee I have looked at one of these salt cartons to see how it was marked. It is said to contain two pounds net, but it is not marked on the end. Why should the producer be put to the expense of marking the contents of the package on the outside? Section 14 requires that each package shall be marked and it struck me that a double obligation was being put upon the producer that was unnecessary.

Mr. GARDINER: This bill does not deal with salt for human consumption. The type of container the leader of the opposition would be examining would be covered by the Food and Drugs Act. The regulations issued under that act cover all salt used for human consumption.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it proposed to add something to this bill to make that clear?

Mr. GARDINER: I am taking the opinion of the legal authorities in the department with regard to it. I understand that that is taken care of elsewhere.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has had considerable experience and I think he will agree that in the absence of some words of limitation—I am not aware whether they are in other parts of the bill—this would apply to every kind of salt and every kind of binder twine.

Mr. STIRLING: Particularly as "carton" is mentioned.

Mr. BENNETT: As the hon. member for Yale says, the word "carton" is used. Section 14 reads:

> Every barrel, sack, carton or other container of salt sold or offered for sale in Canada shall be properly and correctly labelled or marked in a plain and durable manner with the net weight and, in the case of a barrel, with the net and gross weights.

The cartons sold in the store have upon them the statement that the net weight is two or four pounds, as the case may be, and there is a patent outlet at one end. The minister surely has not been advised by his legal officers that some words of limitation are not essential in the light of that section, which refers to all kinds of salt, and goes so far as to cover any form of container.

Mr. STIRLING: I understood the minister to say that the object of this act is to cover salt which is to be used to further degrees of manufacture. If that be so, should not that qualification appear in one of these clauses dealing with salt?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I think that is correct. I have been checking through to find if there is any reference to it, but I do not see any. Allow part II to stand, and go on with part III.

Section stands.

On section 18—Manner of determining a bushel.

Mr. GARDINER: The question raised the other day had to do with the description at the top of the list of items for which weights are given.

> In contracts for the sale and delivery of any of the undermentioned articles the bushel shall be determined by weighing unless a bushel by measure is specially agreed upon between the parties to such sale, and the weight equivalent to a bushel shall be as follows.

The question was raised as to why some items were not in the list. A further question was raised whether there should not be a different wording in the paragraph preceding the list. I am inclined to think that the leader of the opposition was correct in the representations he made the other day regarding it.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to direct the attention of the minister, before he concludes, to section 19, which perhaps I may be allowed to take with section 18 in order to make my point. Section 19 contemplates sale by weight only, whereas section 18 contemplates special provisions being made for sale by measurement, other than by weight, and the two apparently have not been synchronized, to use a word which at one time was in great favour here. The truth is that section 18 should not, if section 19 is to prevail, contain the words "unless a bushel by measure is specially agreed upon between the parties to such sale," because section 19 provides:

> "Every person who violates any provision of part III of this act, providing that a bushel of any article shall be determined by weighing, and specifying the number of pounds such bushel shall contain, shall, for a first offence, be liable . . ."

I merely point that out in order that the minister may make his arrangements accordingly.

Mr. GARDINER: The suggestion is made that all of the words above the table in section 18 be struck out and that these words be substituted:

> Legal weights per bushel shall be as follows:

A simple statement.

Mr. STIRLING: That is better.

Mr. BENNETT: That makes it clear. It overcomes the difficulty, I think.

Mr. STIRLING: Why are certain commodities commonly sold by the bushel not mentioned here?

Mr. GARDINER: I am proposing to have added to this list, "potatoes, 60 lbs." That is the only item other than those here enumerated upon which at the moment sufficient agreement has been arrived at to enable it to be placed in this list. Commodities such as turnips and beets and others have not been sold often enough by the bushel by weight to warrant the department's arriving at a definite conclusion with regard to them.

Mr. STIRLING: That applies to apples?

Mr. GARDINER: But the weight with regard to potatoes is pretty well established, and we propose to put it as 60 pounds.

Mr. STIRLING: What the minister has said applies to apples, it not being sufficiently determined what a bushel of apples weighs; is that so?

Mr. GARDINER: I am told that the variety of sizes makes it very difficult to determine weights for apples, and the same would be true of many other vegetables unless they are properly graded.

Mr. BENNETT: With regard to the proposed rewording of the paragraph above the table in section 18, I think it should read: "Legal weights per bushel of the undermentioned articles shall be as follows."

Mr. GARDINER: That would be more satisfactory.

Mr. DUNNING: I move that.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. SENN: Does that mean that every transaction that is carried out between two parties in the disposition of any of these articles must be done by weight, or does it mean that by mutual agreement there may be sale by measure?

Mr. GARDINER: My understanding is that this will mean that if individuals enter into an agreement they may sell by measure or in any other way they choose, but that if once they get into court and a decision has to be made it will be made on the basis of weight.

Mr. BENNETT: There could be no court action under this statute, as it now reads, with respect to any sale other than sale by weight. I suggest that there should be struck out of section 19 these words: "providing that a bushel of any article shall be determined by weighing, and specifying the number of pounds such bushel shall contain." These words put a construction upon the preceding section, which is not desirable in a statute, and they describe the preceding section, which is not sound draftsmanship. All that is necessary is to provide that "Every person who violates part III of this act shall, for a first offence," and so on. Section 18 provides for the offence.

Mr. GARDINER: My right hon. friend's suggestion is, then, to strike out all the words between "act" and "shall."

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: I suggest that the words "potatoes. . . . 60 lbs." be added to the list set out in section 18.

Mr. SENN: If you are going to add potatoes, what about turnips, carrots, and other vegetables of the kind? It is hard to determine what a bushel of turnips is. If they are large it takes only a few to make a bushel; if they are small you get a good deal more weight in a bushel. I suggest that turnips and carrots at any rate should be included.

Mr. GARDINER: That is why previously we had subsection (b) in the act. A great deal of objection was raised to the minister having power to determine what the weight should be in some cases, and we have removed subsection (b). I do not think it would be wise to put turnips in because the weight has not been sufficiently well established. The sizes vary a great deal and the grading of turnips has not been carried to the extent that it has been with potatoes. It would be difficult to establish a weight that would be satisfactory.

Mr. BOTHWELL: If you amend section 19 by striking out the words between "act" and "shall" you have to alter section 18 again; otherwise there is no sense at all, nor will there be any way of discovering what the offence is. If you had the words: "In contracts for the sale and delivery of any of the undermentioned articles," and added the words, "the legal weights per bushel shall be as follows," the section might be all right. But merely to put in the latter words is not sufficient because you do not presuppose a transaction or dealing in the articles in question.

On section 19—Offence and penalty.

Mr. GARDINER: If I understand the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition, it is that the section should read: "Every person who violates any provision of part III of this act shall, for a first offence," and so on, the intervening words being struck out.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is it.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

INTEREST RATE ON REPAYMENTS OF TAXES AND INSURANCE PREMIUMS—ARREARS OR INSTALMENTS SUBJECT TO BONUS PRIVILEGES

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Soldier Settlement Act for the purpose of reducing from seven per centum to five per centum the interest rate charged on certain repayments to the board of taxes and insurance premiums paid by the board in respect to soldier settlement lands in case of default on the part of the settler, and to provide further that the period during which payments of arrears or instalments at present subject to bonus privileges may be made, be further extended to the 31st day of March, 1941.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Mr. CRERAR: This resolution deals first with interest rates and second with the bonus privilege at present obtaining. Curiously enough there are two conflicting sections in the Soldier Settlement Act regarding rates of interest that shall be charged on advances made by the board for the payment of taxes, insurance and the like. For the last fifteen years or more interest on such advances has been charged at five per cent. The amendment is simply to put it beyond question that five per cent is the rate that should govern.

The extension of the dollar for dollar bonus privilege was first made effective in 1933 for a period of three years. In the session of 1936 it was further extended for a period of two years, so that the privilege lapses on March 31 of this year. It is not proposed under the amending bill to extend the bonus privilege to those who have been able to take advantage of it in the period terminating at the end of this month; the proposal is to extend the privilege for three years to those who, owing to crop failure or other reasons, have been unable to take advantage of it in the past. That is the purpose of the resolution and the bill which will be founded upon it if the resolution passes.

Mr. PERLEY: How many soldier settlers have been able to take advantage of the bonus scheme within the last two years?

Mr. CRERAR: The total number of soldier settlers who have been able to take advantage of the bonus is 8,451, and the civilian settlers number 4,278. Then there were 1,274 under the British families scheme.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. CHURCH: Would it not be better to extend the period for five years instead of three? What would be the amount of the taxes, insurance premiums and so on, in connection with these eight thousand odd settlers?

Mr. CRERAR: If conditions three years from now are such that the scheme should be extended for a further period to settlers unable to take advantage of the bonus up to that time, it could be done by parliament later. I think on general principles it is not good policy to extend the scheme too far ahead. That was recognized when the legislation was first introduced in 1933. The period under which the bonus could be taken advantage of was fixed at three years. Later on, in 1936, legislation was brought down extending it for a further period of three years, and in another place that was reduced to two years.

I do not think I have the information at hand as to the total amount of advances given for the payment of taxes, insurance premiums and so on, but when the estimates of the soldier settlement board are before the house, all these details will be available.

Mr. NEILL: I regret that the wording of this resolution is rather misleading. I had some reason to believe that the legislation would be as indicated by the minister, but when I saw the resolution, which says——the period during which payments of arrears or instalments at present subject to bonus privileges may be made, be further extended—

—I took it to mean what it appears to convey, that the whole scheme would be extended. I took the trouble to ring up an official of the department, and I was told that it meant just what it says. Knowing how keenly interested the settlers in my district were, I so advised them. What they want is the rescission of interest, and I understand some soldiers' association in the neighbourhood of Lloydminster made representations to that effect. Be that as it may, I hastened to tell these settlers, who are in a desperate financial plight, that while the minister or the government was not in a position to give them what they asked in connection with the rescission of interest, at least the bonus would be extended for a further period, and I think I was justified in doing so. I am in the opinion of the house whether that language does not convey very clearly that the whole scheme would be extended. Now we are told that it is going to be limited to those who have not been able to take advantage of it; that those who have taken advantage of it, who are just as much entitled to it and who are just as much in need, are shut out.

If the government did intend to do what they now say, certainly it should have been so expressed in the resolution.

How many settlers does the minister anticipate will come under this scheme, leaving out the many who, as he says, have taken advantage of it already? To how many will it be applicable?

Mr. CRERAR: It will be applicable to all who have not taken advantage of it.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, I know that now, but can the minister not give us any idea of the number?

Mr. CRERAR: That is rather a difficult question to answer, because there are some soldier settlers who have taken partial advantage of the bonus. That is, they have not been able to keep up all their payments and remain in good standing as of, say, the 31st March of this year, but they have been able to make some of them. Those who have taken full advantage and those who have taken partial advantage number, as I said a moment ago, 8,451 soldier settlers out of a total of 9,459.

Mr. NEILL: Then there will be about a thousand to whom it will now be available?

Mr. CRERAR: No. It will be available to a thousand, but it will be available also to those who have not taken full advantage of it up to the present time. Do I make my point clear to my hon. friend?

Mr. NEILL: Yes. We are finding out more all the time. That is a different interpretation from the one we had a moment ago. I thought it was available only to those who had not taken any advantage of it.

Mr. CRERAR: No; I said to those who had not been able to take advantage of it, and that meant full advantage. Perhaps I may have been guilty of a lack of clarity, but I think I can assure my hon. friend now that all arrears as at the 31st March this year will carry the bonus privilege.

Mr. NEILL: Can the minister give us any idea as to what that number would be? Apparently roughly speaking there are about a thousand who have not taken advantage of it. Can the minister give us any idea as to the size of the second class, who have taken partial advantage of it?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot at the moment. That would involve an examination of all the accounts.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I should like to associate myself with the protest of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I do not know whether it is because he and I belong to the same race—

Mr. NEILL: The same tribe.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): —or tribe, that we are not able to read the language of the resolution clearly. To me it indicated just what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni stated, and I think that is the proper way to read it.

I should like to protest against this. I think it is unfair to those who, by sacrifice and industry, and in a desire to carry out their obligations to this country, have made their payments to a greater or less degree. If they are going to be shut out from any further benefits under this legislation it is most unfair. It is well known that this legislation has been tremendously costly to the people of Canada. Some civilians, as well as some former soldiers, have made no effort to carry out their obligations. They are being favoured and encouraged by this type of legislation to make no payments for as long a period as possible. It is well known that for many years now, and I think rightly, the government has been very chary about dispossessing any men of their land. I do not know of any cases where men have been dispossessed as long as they wanted to remain on the land. Some men alongside or nearby or in other places throughout the country made special efforts to make the payments. They made sacrifices, and did without the comforts they might have had, and for which they might have used their money, in order that they might take advantage of this plan. Some of them have made payments up to date, and some, in their anxiety to carry out their word, have paid ahead. They are going to be shut out from the benefits of this legislation, while those who made the least effort to meet the terms of their contracts are going to get the greatest advantage. When we contrast those who to-day or to-morrow might be selling farm produce at prevailing prices, and who receive the benefits of this legislation, with those who during the depression years sold produce at lower prices and made payments in order to get the advantage of the legislation and to live up to their contracts, we must conclude that it is unfair to withhold the benefits of the legislation from the class which did its best to pay.

Mr. PERLEY: I wish to associate myself with the last two speakers. I do not think there should be any limit to the soldier settlers to whom this scheme should be extended. There are very few who have not been taking advantage of it, and, as the last speaker has said, there are many who, under desperate circumstances and driven hard, have deprived themselves of much they might otherwise have had, in order to take advantage of the scheme. They should not be discriminated against.

The scheme should be extended to all soldier settlers. I would be in favour of going even farther than that, and writing off some of the arrears of interest, without the bonus scheme, and giving these men a fresh start and fresh hope. I trust the minister will see fit to extend it to all.

Mr. REID: Did I understand the minister to say that those who have paid partly will come under this plan? Suppose a man has paid for one or two years and now finds himself unable to pay and to take advantage of the dollar for dollar arrangement; would he by this enactment be deprived of the advantage of that privilege?

Mr. CRERAR: No. This measure brings about a condition under which a soldier settler, whether fully or partly in arrears, can secure the dollar for dollar bonus privilege on all payments due up to March 31 of this year. I trust I have made that point clear.

As to the point raised by the hon. members for Comox-Alberni and Melfort, I agree the resolution might have been more clearly worded. When I read it I had some doubt. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni knows, a resolution is prepared by the law clerks in accordance with the terms of the proposed bill. I discussed the matter with one of the law clerks and he assured me that while possibly it might have been more clearly drawn, it did in fact cover the bill in the terms I have explained. I shall not get into a legal argument with the hon. member, because he is far too good a lawyer for me.

When the suggestion is made that the extension should cover every soldier settler, and everyone who comes under the act, I think possibly it is going too far. The purpose of the present extension is to give some people, particularly those in the drought areas in western Canada, the opportunity to take advantage of the scheme for that period during which, had they had good crops, they would have benefited. Advantage has been taken of the plan to an amount totalling $4,409,000. It may be of interest to the committee to have before it the reductions already made in connection with soldier settlers.

First of all an interest exemption measure was passed in 1922 which conferred benefits estimated at $10,269,000. In 1925 there was a reduction in connection with live stock amounting to $2,927,000, almost $3,000,000. In 1927 there was a land revaluation which conferred benefits amounting to $7,479,000. In 1930 there was a thirty per cent reduction.

Mr. NEILL: That was on accrued indebtedness, including interest.

Mr. CRERAR: This was a straight reduction of thirty per cent on soldier settlement accounts as of October 1.

Mr. NEILL: That was not on principal; it was on the total indebtedness, including interest at that date.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, but the amount of it was $14,921,000. Then in 1932 there was an interest remission of $2,344,000, in round figures.

Mr. NEILL: Was that one year's interest?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; interest charges for the year October 1, 1931, to October 1, 1932. were remitted.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does that figure of $2,344,000 include soldier settlers and British families?

Mr. CRERAR: I think it covers all. That of course is the 1932 remission only, for the period I have stated.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have a figure from the department which gives the interest remission in connection with soldier settlers as $1,893,782.78.

Mr. CRERAR: I presume the balance would be on civilian purchases. I have just indicated the extent to which the dollar for dollar bonus has been accepted. Then under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act the advantages secured amounted to $1,397,000. That is an estimated figure, but probably it is very close to the mark. This gives a total of more than $43,500,000 during the period.

While I have no doubt it is the desire of every hon. member, and probably of the people generally, that the soldier settler should be fairly and even generously treated, yet I think they have fared pretty well in view of these reductions which from time to time have been made. The dollar for dollar bonus was established in 1933 chiefly because of the low prices then obtaining in connection with all sorts of farm products. A comparison of prices of 1933 and 1937 shows that prices in all classes of farm products have increased from fifty per cent in some cases to over one hundred per cent in others. Consequently soldiers producing agricultural products for sale have been able to take advantage of these better prices. I do not think anyone would argue, for instance, that if wheat went to $2 per bushel a soldier who had been able to take advantage of the dollar for dollar bonus up to March 31 of this year, and who has had the advantage of the other reductions I have mentioned, would be suffering any great hardship if he were asked to forego any further bonus privilege. That is what the legislation proposes.

Mr. PERLEY: What is the total outstanding liability at the present time?

Mr. CRERAR: The total liability at the present time is about $50,000,000, but that would include soldier settlers, civilian settlers, the three thousand family scheme and the New Brunswick family scheme.

Mr. COLDWELL: The difficulty about the dollar for dollar bonus, just referred to by the minister, is that many soldier settlers cannot take advantage of the act because they have had no crops upon which they could get a bonus.

Mr. CRERAR: That is the purpose of this legislation, to extend for three years the opportunity of taking advantage of the act.

Mr. COLDWELL: I realize that. Numbers of returned soldier settlers have spoken to me about their condition, and I have personally seen what they were up against. The condition of many of them in Saskatchewan is very bad. One group is particularly anxious to have an audience with the minister to discuss this whole matter. The figures would seem to indicate that ever since the first settlements were made, the number of soldier settlers has been decreasing. I find that the original number of soldier settlers was 25,017, while the present number is only 9,888. In other words, the number of abandonments and quit claims among the soldier settlers has amounted to 10,439.

Mr. CRERAR: That is the difference between the two figures?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: A considerable number have paid up their obligations in full, I do not want to break into my hon. friend's argument, but my information is that at the end of the 1936-37 collection year a total of 5,369 settlers of all classes were fully paid up with no arrears, and of that number, 3,713 had actually paid that year's instalment and that of the previous year with the aid of the bonus. Since the inception of the bonus in 1933, 1,117 settlers have repaid their loans in full.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have these figures from the minister's department which perhaps I should give in full since they tell a different story. They are as of November 30, 1937:

Original number of soldier settlers		25,017
Present number of soldier settlers		9,888
Number of abandonments, quit claims, etc.		10,439
Number of civilian purchasers		5,790
Number of British families		1,790
Number of repaid loans		6,566
Number of properties on hand:
Leased, 1937	1,882
Unoccupied	708

I assume the present unoccupied land was land that should never have been settled upon; most probably it was extremely submarginal. If those figures present any picture at all—and I think they do—they would seem to indicate a high proportion of abandonments, quit claims, and so on. No doubt some of these people were quite unsuited to life on the land, but I would submit that the great number of abandonments would indicate that they have been unable to meet their obligations. After all, not more than one-half of any group of people should possibly find themselves compelled to abandon an undertaking because of their unsuitability.

I am in agreement with the principle that this legislation should be continued, but my plea is that the soldier settlement and other allied schemes should be reconsidered in the light of present day conditions. Large numbers of the settlers cannot take advantage of the scheme now presented to parliament. Even if they can take advantage of it temporarily, a large number will be in a hopeless position two or three years hence. I submit that parliament will have to consider the revaluation of the properties and the drastic writing down of the principal debt and the accrued interest, as mentioned by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley).

The picture presented by the soldier settlement scheme is only part of a general picture presented by all the settlement of western Canada. For several years I have been of opinion that before western Canada can be rehabilitated a very large part of the burden of debt will have to be removed from agriculture and the individual farmer. We have the power in this particular connection. This scheme, which I am supporting, may seem to be generous to those who are not familiar with the situation, but in reality it neither can nor does meet the requirements of the settlers.

Mr. NEILL: I am not prepared to quarrel with the minister's statement that these settlers have been fairly or liberally dealt with.

I think they have been fairly dealt with, and in some regards it may be said that they have been dealt with liberally. That may be the conclusion if the action of the government with regard to these settlers is compared with what would be taken by a fairly strict mortgage company. But we must remember that the mortgage company in making reductions would be animated by the same thought as now animates the government, namely, "We are not going to get anything; we will make this gesture of liberality by cutting the amount down in an effort to keep the men on the land." But the most cold-blooded mortgage company would do and has done that. Whether the government thought it was better business to do that than to turn the man off the land is another question, but I think the government has treated these men fairly.

I do not deny that, but we are dealing with a situation which looks much larger when expressed in the sums which the minister has mentioned than when expressed in terms of the number of settlers. Nevertheless, I think the treatment has been fair. For instance, take the land revaluation. I had a great deal to do with the initiation of that scheme, as it was in my district that a preliminary revaluation was first made by order of the government of the day. They sent a man named White out from the prairies, and his report revealed such vast and startling discrepancies between the real value and the value which very often these settlers had undertaken voluntarily to pay that the government realized that something would have to be done. The following year a revaluation was made.

Then we had the live stock reduction which was more than necessary. Cattle which had brought $150 to $175 in the boom days can be bought to-day, even when prices have improved a little, for $50. It is hard to realize the prices that were paid then as we have forgotten the boom which occurred in the prices of farm products in 1919 and 1920.

These men bought the land at a price based partly on the keen competition to get on the land and partly on the high prices of agricultural produce at that time. When they bought the land eggs were selling at a dollar a dozen and butter at a dollar a pound, and it was only a year or two afterwards that eggs were selling at sixteen cents a dozen. It takes a good deal of reduction in the value of land to make it possible to produce eggs at sixteen cents a dozen if that land was bought on a basis of eggs at a dollar a dozen. The cuts that were made in interest during the depression were only such as were reasonable so far as the debtor was concerned, because any creditor was glad to make these reductions. They were afraid that they would not get their money anyhow and that they would have to carry their debtors, and they made these reductions. As a matter of fact a good many private creditors did the same.

The minister has mentioned various large reductions, and that is true; but has anyone ever suggested that the reductions were not wholly justified? I would prove that contention in this way. After all these large reductions in land valuations were made, reductions which, if my memory serves me correctly, ran to about forty per cent on the average—it varied in individual cases, but the average was about forty per cent—on top of that and all the other reductions, after all that was done and times began to get better, then the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act came along and we find that the comparatively few men applying under it got from the government reductions amounting to over a million dollars. That shows that at present values, under the auspices of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, the valuations placed by the government are even now too high, because the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act cut them down to the extent of a million dollars or so.

An hon. member has suggested that we should have a revaluation; but I submit that we are having that revaluation now under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and that will meet that part of the situation. But as regards the dollar for dollar agreement, my people and I myself, after looking into it, thought the proper scheme was rescission of interest. That, however, is evidently beyond the intention of the government. I would suggest, if it is not too late, that they should at least make this dollar for dollar bonus for three years longer apply to everyone. It will be disastrous and most inimical in its effect on the mentality of the men if for the first time the government's policy is to invite people not to pay their debts. At any rate, they are saying to the settlers, "Don't pay in full and you will be carried along." That is a bad suggestion. If a concession is to be given, it should be given to all; otherwise men are being encouraged not to pay their debts, and people these days do not need much encouragement along that line. I suggest that they should all be put on an equal basis. The man who has been industrious and thrifty, who has done without things that he would like to have had, whose family have denied themselves in various ways, all for the purpose of getting enough money together to take advantage of the dollar for dollar bonus, should not be discriminated against, while another man sits down and does nothing but simply says—and this is coming to be the attitude more and more—"Oh, well, the government eventually will give us the land anyhow."

I would urge the minister, before the bill is brought down, to consider applying the concession to all settlers, at least to settlers who are of the same class and who are working under the same conditions. I do not believe that this would involve any very large amount, but I suggest that they should all be put on the same basis.

Mr. REID: Like the two previous speakers, I am sorry that I misinterpreted the proper wording of the resolution because I believed that it would apply to all soldier settlers. It is my opinion that the soldier settlement legislation, from its inception to the present time, under any changes which have been made in it, has had primarily in mind the prairie provinces. They have been the guiding influence when any change has been made in the act.

British Columbia is entirely different from Saskatchewan, and naturally its problems are different and, may I say, just as serious. As regards the figures quoted by the minister, it is true that considerable concessions have been granted; but over $25,000,000 have been paid out in cost of administration, while the total of collections has been around $55,000,000. For the unsuccessful carrying out of the act the blame cannot be laid entirely at the feet of the soldier settlers, and before I am through I shall make a suggestion in line with what has been done in New Zealand, where they were faced with problems similar to ours.

One hon. member has said that no soldier settler has been forced off his property. I disagree with that, because before I left home, the situation of one soldier settler was drawn to my attention. Let me give, by way of illustration, certain facts in connection with this man. He has paid something like $1,400, and his indebtedness to-day is $3,800. If he took advantage of the dollar for dollar bonus by a further payment of some $1,480, he would receive clear title to his property. As it is, however, he has paid in $1,400. If the board obtained the land and sold it, they would not get more than $1,300. Proceedings have been taken against him and under the act his only recourse is an appeal to the supreme court.

Let me ask the minister this question: If he were in that settler's shoes and had to pay about $1,500, having already paid $1,400, would he make that payment when he could obtain the same land for $1,300? If the soldier settlement board got possession of the land, that is all they could sell it for. I asked the administrator what he would take for the land, and he would not quote a figure. I then asked him whether he would take $1,200 or $1,300, and he said, "I believe I would." I replied, "You certainly would, because that is all the land is worth." That illustrates the position of soldier settlers in the Fraser valley.

I believe there is a great deal of merit in the New Zealand system, because there they have given security of tenure, at any rate as secure as it can possibly be made, to the soldier settlers. They have put through a revaluation scheme and a price is fixed for the property. For instance, if the man had his land revalued and he owed $1,000 to the government, no more interest would be charged on that amount as long as he remained on the land. He thus knows exactly how much his indebtedness will be to-morrow or the next day, or ten years hence; and if he wants to obtain title, or if his heirs after he passes on wish to obtain it by the payment of that $1,000, he or they will become possessed of that property upon so doing. This protects the man and gives him security of tenure.

Throughout the Fraser valley proceedings are being taken to dispossess some soldier settlers and this is very serious especially with eggs at seventeen cents a dozen, butter fat around thirty cents a pound and feed, heaven knows how high. The soldier settlers in that district are despondent, and we feel that all the legislation introduced and carried out under the soldier settlement board has been based upon the requirements of the prairie farms, no attention having been paid to soldier settlement in the Fraser valley, where men have to expend a great deal of energy and money before they can bring one acre under cultivation.

There is one point which I think the minister should take seriously into consideration. In British Columbia—and I believe the situation is the same throughout Canada—the soldier settlers are not allowed to sell a portion of the property in order to obtain the bonus. We have soldier settlers with forty, sixty, eighty and one hundred acres of land, part of it bush, part of it cleared. Part of it they will never be able to clear. But a prospective purchaser comes along and wants to buy it. The man may want to sell five acres off a portion which he does not use, but if he does sell he will not receive any benefit of the bonus. Personally I think that he should; that it would help him considerably; so long as it did not dispossess him, but was done with a view of helping him to make his payments, he should be allowed to sell part of that farm. I ask the minister seriously to consider the security of tenure angle as outlined and as carried into effect by New Zealand.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I desire to add my voice to that of hon. members who have spoken on behalf of this class of returned men, because their plight was drawn to my attention just prior to coming down for the present session, when I visited a number of them at Hesketh, near Drumheller. They are in a drought area. I do not agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) that some of these men would be encouraged to take advantage of the dollar for dollar bonus and on that account would not pay off their obligations as quickly as possible. I found in conversation with returned men in my own district that they are only too anxious to get rid of this burden of debt if they are permitted to do so. They appreciate the fact that in 1927 there was a reduction of about thirty per cent in the valuations of the lands, but it must be remembered that when that land was valuated the prices were high and the returns they received for their products were also high, whereas that land has now gone down in value probably fifty per cent. That is especially true of the farmers whom I visited just before I came here; as they are in the drought area they should have every consideration.

I do not mean to leave the impression that returned men in British Columbia should not also have consideration, but I am particularly interested in the men in my district. A situation which was drawn to my attention in regard to these returned soldier settlers was that apparently some were more of the speculative type, and these men in the good years took advantage of this dollar for dollar bonus and were able to clear off their indebtedness and to claim title to their land. On the other hand other returned men are permanently settled there with their families, which have increased year by year, and they are in an entirely different situation. They are in a drought area and it is impossible for them to carry on.

I should like to see this dollar for dollar bonus maintained without any set period for termination. I think we should go further with it, in view of the fact that in the first place about $110,000,000 was loaned out, and if we take into consideration bad debts and cost of administration I believe the experiment has cost us already over $68,000,000. In view of that tremendous expense we should be a little more lenient with these returned men and make it permissible for them, if they have a good crop, for instance next year, and can pay off their whole indebtedness, to have this dollar for dollar bonus applied to the whole thing. As it stands, I believe, it applies to a certain portion. These men are anxious to get the debt cleared off, and a number of them told me that if they should have any crop next year they would like to take advantage of the dollar for dollar bonus and pay off the whole debt.

I believe that it would be good business to eliminate entirely arrears of interest for the last four or five years. If that were done, it would give these returned men a chance to obtain a clear title to their homes, which they are desirous of getting. It would be good administrative policy to give every consideration to these men, because there may come a time when we shall have to ask men to leave our country and fight for their homes, and it would be setting a poor example if at this time we cease to consider the needs of our returned men. I hope that when the government brings down this legislation, it will see fit to provide for some concessions in this respect.

Mr. QUELCH: Many returned men are a little leery about coming under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. They realize that in the past they have received fairly sympathetic consideration from the government, and fear that if they avail themselves of this act they will be subject to different treatment. If they come under this act, will they receive exactly the same treatment as before, with regard, for instance, to collections in the event of poor crops?

Mr. CRERAR: Certainly they will not be discriminated against. While it is true that in some parts of Canada soldier settlers have not taken as full advantage as they might have done of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, yet a great many have done so, and I believe they have received very fair consideration. The likelihood is that the authorities having to do with the administration of that act would, if anything, lean to the side of leniency. So far as the returned soldier is concerned, it is my observation that such is the case. I believe that, with this provision extending the opportunity to those who have not been able to take advantage of it, with the fact that the interest rate is five per cent, and with the further fact that they have recourse under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act through official receivers and boards of review where all the circumstances of their case can be placed before authorities who have power to deal with it, it can fairly be said that no hardship remains. I am informed that when this question of the dollar for dollar bonus was considered at the recent Canadian Legion convention at Port Arthur, the consensus of opinion expressed was precisely on the lines of the legislation brought down. If my information is correct—and I think it is—the delegates did not ask that the dollar for dollar bonus be extended right across the board, to all who had been able to take advantage of it and to those who had not, but requested that an opportunity should be given to those who, because of crop failures or other circumstances, have been unable to take advantage of it.

Mr. NEILL: Did the legion definitely say that?

Mr. CRERAR: That is the information I have.

Mr. NEILL: The answer is, I am afraid, that the legion does not represent the settlers. The minister does not seem to be quite sure. I asked my soldier settlers if they would send a delegate to that convention of which he speaks in order that their views might be expressed there, and they said they could not afford to do so. Unfortunately the legion in what I would call its higher aspects has got more or less into the hands of a bureaucracy or aristocracy of colonels and generals, who can afford to attend these meetings. These people and influential legion branches in the cities have run the legion. Nowadays the voice of the poor man is not heard nearly to the extent that it used to be and that it should be. If the legion passed a resolution such as the minister stated, it is because they were not fully informed, and the reason they were not fully informed on the situation and the facts is that the poor man, the small man, the settler to whom a dollar looks so big, could not afford to send a delegate—they cannot afford to send a delegate to represent them at their provincial conventions—and only the leading lights and more or less the moneyed men or the men who have some government jobs or something of the kind can afford to go around the country to these conferences. I say that the settler was not adequately represented at that convention if they passed a resolution of that kind.

Mr. CRERAR: So far as that is concerned, General Ross, who was for several years head of the legion—president, I believe, was the title of his office—came from a rural district in Saskatchewan, from Yorkton, and he was wholly familiar with the conditions obtaining among the settlers in the prairie provinces. I know further that during the course of his office he visited all parts of the country in connection with legion work. His successor, Colonel Foster, comes, I believe, from Vancouver.

Mr. BENNETT: Chief of police of Vancouver.

Mr. CRERAR: I discussed this proposal with Colonel Foster and he told me what the legion had discussed at their meeting at Fort William.

Mr. NEILL: That just bears out what I have been contending, that Colonel Foster and the legion do not represent the soldier settlers of British Columbia.

Mr. CRERAR: I am not going to pass judgment on that; but at any rate Colonel Foster is the man whom the delegates to the general meeting of the organization elected as president, and I assume he is the man they desired to have in that position. I know General Ross took a very active part in the work of the legion, and I have not the slightest doubt that Colonel Foster will do the same. Consequently I think this is reasonable legislation. If conditions change, it is always open to parliament to extend it or to enlarge the benefits. I was not in the house when the dollar for dollar bonus privilege was established, but as far as my knowledge goes that step was taken at that time because of the extraordinarily low prices to which all classes of agricultural produce had fallen in Canada. I have already given the committee the information that the price index for 1937 as compared with 1933 shows that the value of farm products has gone up from fifty per cent to, in some cases, well over one hundred per cent, in other words has doubled. On the whole I think the legislation is reasonable.

Mr. GREEN: One remark made by my good friend the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) I think was unfortunate Perhaps he did not mean to go quite so far in his attack on the officers of the Canadian Legion. It would be too bad if the committee got the impression that the legion is made up of ex-officers or wealthy men, because such is not the case. I think the legion, as well as other soldier organizations across Canada, represents all ranks and all classes.

Mr. NEILL: I did not say "made up of," I said "managed by."

Mr. GREEN: Well, all these soldier organizations are doing the best they can for the returned soldiers of Canada, and as a returned soldier myself I should like it made clear that there is no question of their being led by wealthy men or ex-officers.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Before addressing a question to the minister let me say that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni came near the truth in describing the convention—not the legion—in its relation to that resolution. I was amazed at the passing of a resolution of that kind. I asked a senior officer afterwards and he said that it was better to be moderate, not to ask too much; that the government had treated them generously in the past. I happen to know a little about the convention, and it is in line with what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni said.

I would ask the minister whether the bill is to be based on the resolution or if the resolution is merely descriptive of a bill already drafted.

Mr. CRERAR: The resolution is descriptive of the bill drafted. The first step is the drafting of the bill; then the law clerks are supposed to draft the resolution to agree with the terms of the bill. They tell me that has been done in this instance.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I am satisfied with that answer; I think it is correct, although differing somewhat from my idea of what we are doing when we pass a resolution authorizing the introduction of legislation. As a layman perhaps my misunderstanding was excusable, but I thought the bill would be based on the resolution this house passed.

In any case I should like to draw the attention of the minister and the committee to the similarity of language used in the resolution before us to-day and that used in 1936 when similar legislation was before the house. It differs by the addition of three words; that is all I can find. In the present resolution we have the words, "to provide further that the period during which payments of arrears or instalments at present subject to bonus privileges may be made." Two words there, the words "at present," are not found in the resolution of 1936. I am not saying that the inclusion of those words does not change the sense of the resolution, but in my opinion it does not. The resolution of 1936 read:

> That it is expedient to amend the Soldier Settlement Act to provide that the period during which payment of arrears or instalments subject to bonus privileges may be made be extended to the 31st day of March, 1938.

To all intents and purposes that resolution is exactly the same as the one now before us, and so I think there is justification for the mistake made by myself and others in thinking it means the same as the resolution of 1936.

A good deal has been said to-day about the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act being open to ex-soldiers. As a matter of fact the legion convention at Fort William recommended that as many as possible take advantage of that machinery. But there are in this country many ex-soldiers, as well as other settlers, who do not want to have anything to do with that piece of legislation, which is based on the dominion's powers to regulate bankruptcy.

Mr. BENNETT: It involves the assumption that the settler is himself insolvent. The act can be applied only if the applicant is insolvent.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Yes, and many settlers do not want to go before a court on that assumption. They want to meet their contracts, but on as favourable terms as others are getting. For that reason I think it is not a good thing that we should speak so much here of their having that machinery available.

In reference to what the minister said about reductions which have been made in the past, it is true that nominally and on paper, and I think actually, parliament and governments from time to time have been quite generous in the treatment of soldiers, once the obligation was incurred. But in the incurring of the obligation governments and parliament in times past have been most unwise in authorizing expenditures.

Someone quoted prices of cattle supplied to these men in the earlier days. I myself saw horses costing as much as $500 a team sold to settlers who had no feed for them, no work for them to do, no knowledge of horses; the horses knew nothing about the men and the men knew nothing about the horses. The result was that within a few months those horses, fed up for market and sold at a high price, were practically without value. The same is true in regard to cattle and machinery, where the latter was sold to men who had no use for it, no place to store it, and in some cases no cleared land on which to pile it. That kind of thing entailed greatly increased debt for the settlers.

I am not criticizing any administration that was responsible for these things; they were part of many other mistakes. Nevertheless the debts were incurred, and the reductions made in connection with debts incurred for stock and equipment were not enough to put many of the settlers on a sound footing. A reduction was made that applied to all. Later on other reductions were made, culminating in the thirty per cent reduction, I think in 1930. There the committee which dealt with the question of soldier settlers was faced with this very difficult situation. Many men had made sacrifices, realized on life insurance, borrowed money from friends, relatives and mortgage companies, and paid off their liabilities in full. Then a year or two later, or in some cases a few months later, they found that if they had not paid off their debts they would have been eligible for substantial relief, such as those about them were receiving. No one was to blame for that situation, because once a man has paid his debt to the government he cannot get any reduction, since he does not owe anything. But this created a feeling of dissatisfaction on the part of those who had tried their hardest and done their best to pay off their obligations.

Then the dollar for dollar bonus plan came along. There was no mistake about the intention of the plan at that time, and it was carried out quite successfully. Two years ago the extension was made, and there was no argument about those to whom it was to apply. Now, however, almost the selfsame resolution is before us to-day, but it is being given an entirely different interpretation. I strongly object to that, and I think it is most important. It may be that I am wrong and that the words "further" and "at present" do change the sense of the resolution as compared with the one of two years ago. But until I am told that the addition of these three words does change the meaning of the resolution, I think that the committee should hold that if this measure passes in its present form it means that the same terms should be embodied in the bill that we are going to discuss later, of which this resolution is assumed to be descriptive.

Mr. REID: In support of my remarks of a few moments ago I want to give the minister some figures pertaining to soldier settlers in the Fraser valley in British Columbia, in order to show how serious the matter really is. The payments due in the Fraser valley last year amounted to just over a million dollars. There was actually paid the sum of $90,454.68. Of 1,668 payments due only some 621 were made. Those are the latest figures I have been able to obtain from the department. This is a serious matter. In the Fraser valley there are three particular collection points: Abbotsford, Chilliwack and Vancouver. At Abbotsford the amount due in 1937 was $83,522.62, of which $5,150.40 was paid. At Chilliwack the amount due was $137,774.30, of which $10,452.98 was paid, and in the Vancouver district $118,751.58 was due, and only $8,148.40 was paid. That clearly illustrates just how serious the situation is in the Fraser valley, where there are men who have never been able to take advantage of the dollar for dollar offer, and never will due to economic conditions. In many cases the interest charges have increased the cost of the property to twice the original cost, and while there are some few who can get relief under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, I think it is too bad when the director has to say to a man, "Go to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act; we will not oppose you." There are only a few who can take advantage of that because, as has been pointed out, a man has to be declared bankrupt before he can take advantage of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

I should like to see the act remain as it is; but I think the high interest charges which exist at present, at least on the debts due in British Columbia, should be carefully reviewed by the board. I should like to refer also to the large staff in the city of Vancouver, which I claim means a considerable overhead in looking after what is to-day really a collection agency. What is bothering most of the settlers out there is that if they are forced off their property, the board will actually sell the land for about one-third of what is against the property while it is in the possession of a soldier settler. He naturally says to himself and to the board, "Why can't I get some further reduction?" I think the figures I gave a few moments ago are interesting, and I draw that situation seriously to the attention of the minister.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to amplify the point made by the hon. member for Melfort. He modestly said he thought he might be wrong, but I do not think he is. I think the minister was mistaken when he made the statement to the hon. member that the custom is for the resolution to be founded on the bill. I submit that the custom in this house is the direct opposite. Time and again we have the minister in charge of a resolution saying, "Mr. Speaker, the bill which will be founded on this resolution, if it passes—" and so on. There is no question that the resolution comes first, and is introduced with the sanction, or the approval and recommendation, of the governor general.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister said that to-day.

Mr. NEILL: He used that language when he first introduced the resolution, but in answer to the hon. member for Melfort he said that the bill was already formulated and that the resolution was founded on it. That is an important difference, for this reason.

We know we private members cannot make any amendment asking a change in the terms, because that involves the expenditure of public money, and that is a matter entirely up to the government. But I think, if the bill, when it is brought down, contains not the legislation foreshadowed by this resolution but this other modified legislation which the minister has indicated, it will be our duty and privilege to rise to a point of order and say that the bill brought down is out of order because it is not founded upon the resolution and does not carry out one of the most important items in the resolution—the provision that the present privileges would be extended. Now we find that they are going to be extended to only a small portion of those concerned. If the government is determined to take this stand, I think it will have to withdraw this resolution and introduce another expressing what is now proposed. I submit that the bill to be introduced will be out of order unless it follows the terms of this resolution.

Mr. CRERAR: I am not a lawyer, but I am advised by the legal officers of parliament who have to do with these matters that this resolution is in order for the purpose that I explained. If the hon. member for Comox-Alberni takes a different view, I must express regret that he feels that way about the question. In matters legal I have to be guided by the officers properly constituted for that purpose.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like very much to emphasize the point made by the hon. member for Melfort in reply to the minister in regard to the soldiers coming under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. They are afraid that if they come under that act and are removed, as it were, from the protection of parliament, in the event of times getting worse, while they may not be discriminated against, they will have lost their rights under anything that might be done subsequently by parliament.

Mr. CRERAR: That is not the case.

Mr. COLDWELL: As was pointed out, the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is a matter of insolvency and bankruptcy. This the soldier settlers dislike. I said previously that I did not think we were being sufficiently realistic in viewing this matter. I have before me some further figures which I think confirm that statement. If we take the Saskatoon area, where many of these settlers are to be found, the number of instalments due in 1936-37 was 4,658. Of these there were 573 already prepaid from previous years. In addition there were 408 fully paid in the year 1936-37, making a total of 981, or only twenty-one per cent of the payments due. In other words, last year only twenty-one per cent of those soldiers met their instalments.

I should like also to emphasize the suggestion made by the hon. member for New Westminster regarding the New Zealand plan. That is a security of tenure plan, which some of us have been advocating for a very long time for more persons than soldier settlers. The New Zealand land policy is one, I think, that might be studied particularly for application where the government itself has control of a given area. It's basic principle is that the people on the land shall be given undisputed possession of that land as long as they use it, and the debt meantime be cut down to the point where, over a period of years without interest, they can expect to retire the obligation. The New Zealand government has put this policy into effect. Several years ago, when it was only a proposal, I had an opportunity of hearing a great deal about it from one of the present ministers of that government. Although two or three years ago there was an inclination to ridicule such a land policy, in the province from which I come, it is being used for soldier settlers in New Zealand. I am glad the hon. member for New Westminster drew it to the attention of the committee, and I should like to emphasize it.

Mr. FAIR: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments and suggestions which have been brought forward, but I am not satisfied that any of them have gone far enough. Having lived among soldier settlers for a number of years, I am satisfied they will never get out of their present position. At the time the plan came into being, the average loan was $4,155. To the end of December, 1937, only forty-five per cent of the loans had been paid off. At the same time thirty-nine per cent of the original settlers were still paying on their loans.

Coming along to the end of March, 1931, we find that the average indebtedness of the soldier settler was $2,311. At the end of December, 1937, the average indebtedness was $2,271, or an average reduction in seven years of $40 per settler. I would ask the minister how many years it will take for those settlers to pay up under existing conditions. We have no guarantee whatever that farming conditions will be any better in the future.

The minister told us a few moments ago that prices of farm products are better than they have been in the past, but I would remind him that our wheat yields are far below what they have been. While in the district from which I come we have had crops averaging from twenty-five to thirty bushels to the acre, last year we averaged between three and four bushels to the acre. I would ask him how he concludes people are better off to-day than they were when crops yielded a higher average. From the inception of the plan to March, 1937, the amount of interest charged up was $30,643,796.76. Added to that are the costs of administration, amounting to $23,765,179.70, giving a total of $54,408,976.46. We find that the amount paid by all soldier settlers to the end of March, 1937, was $56,158,021, or very little more than the amount of interest and administration charges. I have no doubt the minister is more familiar with those figures than I am.

I say it is time something definite was done for soldier settlers, to bring them out of their present position. I had not intended to say very much at this time; but before the resolution passes, or any legislation is brought down affecting soldier settlers, may I recommend to the attention of the minister the submission of the soldier settlers union, with headquarters at Lloydminster, Saskatchewan. I believe a copy was sent to the minister and to several other hon. members in February of last year, but if he has lost his copy I shall be pleased to let him have mine. I suggest that some substantial amendments be made in favour of soldier settlers.

Mr. WOOD: I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the administration by the soldier settlement board in the township of Tuscarora, in which there happen to be about seventy soldier settlers. This township includes the Six Nations Indian reserve. In the last few years property of Indian ex-soldiers in that reserve has been repossessed by the board. Some of it has been resold to civilians, and some of it has been rented by the board, and the rent applied to the payments due the board on the property. The difference between the price realized on the sale of the repossessed property and the original advance made by the board is held as a claim against the original owner. The fact that he participates in a semi-annual interest fund distribution to the band gives the board a claim on him personally. Unfortunately the claim is imposed not only against the original owner, but also against his wife and family. The board seizes the semi-annual interest payments to apply to the loss which has been incurred in consequence of the repossession of the property and its sale to a civilian.

I was surprised to learn that that condition of affairs exists, because I do not think it exists in respect to any other group of soldiers. I wish the minister would see whether this discrimination cannot be corrected. I do not believe it is fair; I do not think there is any justice in it. At this time some claims are reverting even to the third generation. Where will it end? In some cases many families will be involved, and the difference to which I have referred is not sufficient at the present time to do more than pay the interest on the claim against the Indian ex-soldier or his descendants.

I am quite aware that soldier settlement on that reserve is at present administered by a branch of the Department of Indian Affairs; yet I feel that the responsibility rests upon the board, and if the minister will give the matter consideration I shall be pleased.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall be glad to do so. I am not personally familiar with the facts mentioned by the hon. member, but the matter will be looked into.

Mr. O'NEILL: In rising to support the remarks made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, I was of the opinion that this measure would extend the privileges to everybody, and that the condition would be the same as it was before. But from the minister's explanation it would seem that only a certain class are to benefit. For my part I should like to see it extended to all of them. Those who had the privileges before, should continue to have them. Supporting the hon. member for New Westminster, may I say that in the interior of British Columbia we have conditions similar to those he described in the Fraser valley.

I have one particular instance that came to my attention. A piece of land was taken up by one of these soldier settlers. To date he has paid in the neighbourhood of $1,100, including his bonus and interest charges, but he still owes more than what he has actually paid. If he let go of that land, it would bring in the open market only about half what he owes on it. He made a payment last year of $50 or $60, but the interest on the money he owed was more than his payment. The result was that although he made a payment, at the end of the year he owed more than he had at the beginning. I do not think this man would continue to pay the charges on this land were it not for the fact that when he took it up he gave the soldier settlement board a mortgage on his homestead. That is why he is struggling to make the payments; if they are not paid he will lose his homestead.

Mention was made by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Only to-day I was speaking to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) about a matter, the particulars of which I have here on my desk. A certain man purchased a piece of land from the soldier settlement board and later on sold it to a third party. The party of the third part took advantage of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. He appeared before a board of review and had his indebtedness to the settlement board reduced by some $2,000. This reduction applied also to the payments due by the party of the second part to the party of the third part. The whole thing has reached a point where I simply cannot understand it. The only thing that can be done is to refer it to a lawyer to have it untangled. I would not want to see this act done away with; but at the same time there is no doubt that many people are taking advantage of it, and the very people whom the act was intended to help are being penalized. I do not know just how a question like this will be settled, but I certainly would like to see this resolution apply to everyone and not to just a particular class.

Mr. McINTOSH: North of the North Saskatchewan river in the northwestern part of Saskatchewan there is a goodly number of soldier settlers. Many of these men have been in there for years and they are vitally interested in any legislation which may be enacted in Ottawa. They feel that if legislation is enacted to help in the meeting of their payments, even then the problem will only be half met. They believe, and I think rightly, that even if that is done there is still a long range problem to be settled, the problem of how many of these soldier settlers will be able to remain on the land if some help is not extended—not forthcoming.

It would appear that year by year the number of soldier settlers on the land in that part of the province—I assume the same is true of other parts of the province and also of other provinces—is gradually being reduced. These men are being dispossessed, and the result is that those who are still on the land are beginning to feel somewhat discouraged. They are all of the opinion that the department should do something to alleviate their distress. This must be done if these men are to remain on the land and get any benefit from the moneys they have paid to date.

A few years ago the soldier settlers in that part of the province organized a soldier settlers' union. I encouraged that because I felt that if these soldier settlers were fully organized they could yearly draw up a bill of complaint—a petition of grievances—and present it to the authorities in the different areas. In turn those complaints could be presented to the department with the possibility of action being taken to redress their wrongs. But they feel that with all their attempts at organization, with all their efforts to benefit their lot, they have not a very safe hold on the future. Consequently they are looking to Ottawa for action.

After reading this resolution, I have come to the conclusion that the department would be well advised not to discriminate in any way. Bonus payments should be allowed to every soldier settler, whether or not he is paid up. These men would thus be given a chance to remain on the land and be more satisfied than they are at the present time. I agree with those hon. members on this side of the house who have said that on first reading of the resolution they believed that it was to be extended to all soldier settlers, not just to those who are in arrears. I believe that is the understanding among these soldier settlers throughout the west. I ask the minister if it would not be possible to modify the resolution so that when the bill is brought in, it will be as beneficial and non-discriminatory as possible.

Mr. MacNICOL: How much did it cost last year to administer the soldier settlement board, and what were the returns from the work?

Mr. CRERAR: I am afraid I have not that information at the moment, but I shall try to have it when the bill is before us. Ordinarily that would be asked for when the estimates for the soldier settlement board were before the committee for consideration.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It has been said that this resolution is similar to the one passed two years ago, and I should like to ask the minister if he will consider withdrawing this and making it fit the bill which he says is going to be introduced, or whether he will change the bill to fit the terms of the resolution we are now discussing? If we pass a resolution that is exactly the same as the one we passed two years ago, I think we have a right to look for the same type of legislation.

Mr. CRERAR: The resolution is not quite the same.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There are three words different. The first is the addition of "further." That is "further" to the reduction in the interest from seven per centum to five per centum, and then there is the designation of who shall receive the bonus payment. In March, 1936, we were dealing with contracts and payments that were at that time "subject" to the bonus being given, instead of "at present subject" in the resolution before us. So that while I did express some doubt as to the legal meaning of these words, I can see no difference whatever, and I do not believe that the law officers can prove any difference.

I had an unhappy experience with the law officers of the crown who drafted certain soldier settlement amendments some years ago. In 1928, an amendment was passed in the special soldier committee, the purpose being to provide that no homestead crown land entered upon by soldier settlers at a date subsequent to their receipt of the latest authorization of a loan from the board could be seizable or could be held for debts incurred before entry was made. The law officers of the department and of the Department of Justice so garbled that simple amendment that after it had been sent back two or three times from that committee, and after they had assured us finally that it was good law and good legal English, it came to the house and half a dozen legal men, among them the then leader of the opposition, who is in the same position today, attacked it, with the result that the whole amendment had to be returned in an effort to make it abundantly clear just what was intended.

I will admit, therefore, that I come to the house rather prejudiced against the drafting done by some of the law officers of the crown. In this instance I claim that the resolution is in all its essential features the same as the one we had two years ago, and if we pass it we have a right to assume that the minister will introduce a bill similar to that which was brought in on the basis of the resolution which was passed in 1936. On the other hand, I would have no objection to having the resolution withdrawn, if it is merely descriptive of the bill that is to follow, on the understanding that it will be reframed in accordance with the bill which it is proposed to bring down. But the department cannot have it both ways. Either the resolution is the same as the one we had before or it is different. If it is different, very well; in that event the bill will be different. But if the resolution is the same, then—perhaps, like one hon. member from British Columbia, I do not easily grasp these things—I must confess that I cannot see the difference.

Mr. NEILL: The government has set its hen on duck's eggs and now proposes to give us chickens, and we do not want chickens.

Mr. NEEDHAM: This resolution is not tackling the problem that the soldier settlers are up against; it is not giving them much hope for ultimately liquidating their obligations. I agree with many others who have spoken that the soldier settler is getting discouraged. He has worked hard and tried to meet his obligations, but the problem is too great for him. I was talking to one man last fall and he presented a case which perhaps is a little peculiar. It is this. Two young fellows took over a section of land, half a section each, sixteen years ago. They put up their shacks and went to work; they paid to the municipality in taxes over $4,000 and to the soldier settlement board over $5,000, and now they owe more than they did at the start. Analyse that situation from the standpoint of what that land was bringing to the crown before these men took it over, and see where they stand now. Before that land was taken over, it was crown land that was rented for pasturage and it brought in $25 a year. In the sixteen years, had it remained under the crown, the crown would have got $670 from it. As a matter of fact they have got over $5,000. To put the matter another way, if it had continued as pasture land it would have taken over 200 years for the crown to receive the amount it has actually received to date from that land. These settlers have been there sixteen years; they owe more today than they did when they first went on the land and, as they say, they would have been beter off on relief; for they have worked sixteen years for the country for three meals a day.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend mean to say that soldiers paid for crown land—that they paid the government of Canada for crown land?

Mr. NEEDHAM: In meeting their obligations.

Mr. DUNNING: What obligations?

Mr. NEEDHAM: In connection with the land they took over from the board.

Mr. DUNNING: But no crown land was charged for; that is a certainty.

Mr. NEEDHAM: It was school land, I suppose. It was land they took over from the board anyway.

Mr. DUNNING: School land? That is a different matter; that belongs to the province. Crown land, in the ordinary sense, no soldier settler has paid for at any time.

Mr. NEEDHAM: It was taken over from the board sixteen years ago, and that is the situation.

Mr. POOLE: Over ten years ago this land belonged not to the province but to the federal government.

Mr. DUNNING: What land? School lands?

Mr. POOLE: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: School lands were always held in trust by the dominion for the province. To-day they are administered by the province. It was never crown land in the sense of being available for homesteading.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Crerar thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 33, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

AUTHORIZATION OF PAYMENT OF $100,000 FOR THE YEAR ENDING JULY 1, 1938

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Minister of Public Works on behalf of His Majesty to enter into an agreement to pay to the corporation of the city of Ottawa the sum of $100,000 for the year ending July 1, 1938.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Mr. CARDIN: This resolution provides purely and simply for the introduction of a bill authorizing the Minister of Public Works to extend for another year the agreement between the city of Ottawa and the Department of Public Works. The agreement provides for a payment of $100,000 to the city of Ottawa as compensation for fire protection of buildings belonging to the government and for water used in sprinkling in the parks and on certain streets under the control of the federal district commission. This agreement was concluded as far back as 1920. It was then for a period of five years. In 1925 the amount of $75,000 which had been provided in the agreement of 1920 was increased to the present sum of $100,000. Since that time the agreement has been renewed by legislation passed at each session of the house.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not wish to delay the passage of this vote, but there are two or three features of it which I think parliament should understand. The agreement is between two parties: the king, represented by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), who has just spoken, and the mayor and corporation of the city of Ottawa; the vote is $100,000. The agreement began away back in 1920, on March 13. It is a subvention to the city of Ottawa, and it started in this way. There was a meeting at Niagara Falls of the Union of Canadian Municipalities the year I was president. I read a paper dealing with subventions in other countries by governments—for the state and federal capitals of Australia and all over the world. At that time the late Mr. Fisher, who was born in Toronto, was mayor of Ottawa. On March 13, 1920, as mayor of Ottawa, on behalf of the corporation, he made an agreement with the government. It was said at that time that the agreement was to spend $75,000 for what was known as sprinkling the streets. It was a lot of money to grant for that purpose; I do not know whether there was a general election in sight at the time or not. The "sprinkling" amounted to very much less in fact.

But the item grew. We are in a building under the control of the Speaker, who keeps it very clean, but if you step outside the door you are under a federal district commission; yet it is all in the city of Ottawa. The vote was expressed to be for a sprinkling system. Sprinkling what? For cleaning certain streets of Ottawa. When the minister was asked in 1920 how much was to be voted, he said, $75,000. That is a lot of money for sprinkling. The next year the vote came up they amended the information; and they said, "Oh no, it is just along the lines of the union of municipalities report, and provided a subvention in exchange for services rendered by the municipality to the capital of the country." What were those services? Fire, police protection and other services. It may be remembered that Sir Wilfrid Laurier proposed to make this city the Washington of the north. Now they are going to make Washington the Ottawa of the south.

This vote is a most improvident arrangement, because, under constitutional practice, every vote must have a principle. The principle in this case is all wrong. I am not opposed to Ottawa, I should be glad to see this city get everything that is coming to it; but when one looks into this agreement, and adds to the amount of this vote what the federal district commission are now spending on the park system of Ottawa, it runs into a very large sum of money for capital and maintenance. Nearly half a million dollars is voted direct by this parliament to the city of Ottawa for purely municipal institutions—parks and playgrounds and the rest—and on capital account and purchase of properties, tearing down buildings under this agreement and also through the federal district commission—$257,000 through the commission.

What is this agreement? Of what does it consist? How is the amount of the vote computed? First of all $75,000 was asked for; then it was increased by thirty-three and one-third per cent to $100,000. For what? When they started, the agreement was to sprinkle the streets. Then the federal district commission was established, a federal commission for the city, besides this agreement. The vote was marked up to $100,000, and when you look into the principle of the thing, what is it? A direct subvention, contrary to the British North America Act. I doubt if this agreement would stand in the law courts.

In spite of all that has been said in the last two days about the condition of our municipalities, it is proposed to vote the city of Ottawa a straight cash grant for doing nothing more than is being done by every large city and town in Canada of over forty thousand people that have federal exempt property of many kinds but that get nothing. New federal buildings have been erected in many cities. Why should the government not pay those cities for water supply, police protection, fire protection for federal exempt property throughout Canada? In my opinion there should be equality of treatment. I do not oppose the agreement merely for the sake of opposing it. But what is the value of fire protection and the sprinkling system to the government's buildings here? The fire protection amounts to very little in case of a big fire. We know that in 1916, a few years before this agreement was prepared there was a fire here which destroyed the old parliament buildings because there was not sufficient pressure, no adequate water supply, although there is a fire department. Why, they have as large a water supply at Fort Erie as they had in Ottawa in 1916 when that fire occurred. Fire engulfed the whole parliament buildings; the new ones cost eighteen million dollars, and we cannot step outside without having a commission to fix up the cleaning of the pavements.

The principle of this bill should apply to every city and town in Canada if it applies here. For example, as my report at the union showed, in Australia the city of Sydney, New South Wales, and other state capitals get a subvention. That is how Mayor Fisher conceived the idea of this particular agreement. In Australia they maintain the police force and the fire department; the grant was formerly a million and a quarter dollars and is now two million dollars in exchange for services rendered in these cities to the federal and state governments of the day.

I repeat that I want to find out the principle of this vote. I do so especially in view of the present condition of real estate in our cities, as pointed out in the last few days in the course of an argument which has been a real contribution to the subject. Under the present Minister of Public Works federal buildings have been built all across Canada for sums ranging from $10,000 to $100,000, in cities where the revenues are very small. Why should these municipalities not receive, on the same principle, subventions in exchange for federal exempt property and services? They do everything that Ottawa does under this agreement in connection with fire protection, police protection, and water supply. In the city I come from they spent fifteen to twenty million dollars on a duplicate water supply, largely to give the citizens a high pressure system in the down-town district where the government has erected a million dollar federal building and is collecting in that one building revenues of $110,000,000 in customs and income taxes.

Why should Toronto not have the same consideration? We come to the second clause in the agreement. I shall be through in a minute, Mr. Chairman. I have no wish to delay the vote, but there may be other speakers. Why should other cities not receive the same treatment? Why should Ottawa receive a vote of $100,000 when, right in this same city, we are maintaining a whole second parks system through the federal district commission at the expense of the taxpayers all over Canada? This vote is paid out of income. The moneys to be expended under this agreement will come out of sales tax and income tax. Why should the taxpayers be charged with these expenditures? The industrial worker has no protection; he is losing his home. Why should Ottawa not pay its own bills for its municipal services? Why should it receive the equivalent of two or three mills on the dollar under this agreement as well as through the federal district commission? If we look at the work done by the federal district commission we find, in the western section, it includes Island park, Rideau canal, Echo drive, Dow's lake park, Confederation park, lake Flora park, Val Tetreau park, Central park, Bronson avenue and Somerset street parks, and then there is the eastern section, making a total of $115,000 of an appropriation, with maintenance charges as well. They cover the whole city. Not only that, look at the federal expenditures on capital, tearing down buildings and all that sort of thing, running into millions of dollars, while other municipalities have to look on, and Ottawa "gives us the laugh."

The principle is wrong. Why should the income taxpayers of Quebec and Ontario have to pay for this? The agreement is improvident. They do not give $100,000 of value. Why do they not clean the streets? Look at the number of people injured; look at the state of the streets right in front of the door of this building on Wellington street, such that no one can walk on the pavement without danger. We have to have here in Ottawa three duplicate street cleaning services: first, the Department of Public Works; second, the city; third, the commission, and fourth, Mr. Speaker, if necessary, could go out himself with a few of us and clean the streets and walks in front of this building.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CHURCH: I shall conclude in just three or four minutes. I am not criticizing the city of Ottawa at all; I want it to have equality of treatment with the rest of Canada. This is a very fine city, and I worked with the municipal officers for many years. What I object to is the federal and provincial governments refusing to contribute to taxation for municipal purposes. For example, for many years the city of Toronto had to build curbs, roads and sidewalks all along federal and provincial property, and this government did not contribute a cent towards the cost. I do not blame the city of Ottawa for getting an agreement under which they will obtain $100,000. I would not care, if services were given, if they got half a million, and if the other Canadian cities were treated in the same way. They have a very fine school system here; they have fine hospitals and an excellent health service, but they get nothing from the federal authorities. The service rendered is not limited to fire protection and water works. These things concern the health of the people, but the city does not get a cent from the federal government.

They have cured all that in England. You have to go to the British cities to get good government. Look what Joseph Chamberlain did for the city of Birmingham. He spent a fortune there. The government of Canada is not doing anything for the people who live in the larger municipalities, or, for that matter, for those who live in rural places. I used to know the late Mayor Fisher of Ottawa. He went to Jarvis street collegiate. He prepared an estimate amounting to $886,455, as what the city of Ottawa should have received from the federal government. He included $77,000 for water rates; $2,000 for sprinkling the streets, $57,000 for income tax, because some high government officials were exempt from municipal taxation; $482,000 for property tax; $226,000 for business tax, and $3,000 for property leased to the dominion government. In some ways, of course, that calculation would not be fair, but at least they are entitled to what they spend.

I do not wish to reflect on any of the city officials here. I have known some of them for many years. This city has very fine officials, who work for small pay. There is efficiency here. It is true that there is not sufficient hotel accommodation, but that will come. I would not object to a proper federal district commission for this city, but I hope the day is coming when we shall not tear down any more public buildings. Let us wait until the depression is over. I believe we are spending too much money, when one considers the eight per cent sales tax and the condition of the farmers and those on relief.

I certainly believe there should be a better break all over Canada for the municipalities, by both the federal and the provincial governments. Why should the municipalities have real estate loaded up the way it is? If a man owns property, he has to pay fifty per cent of the cost of his own roadway, his sidewalk and his local improvements. He has also to pay for federal municipal works, and he has to help provide all these social services without which the people cannot get along. Why should he have to add to his local taxes to pay for local improvements, roads, sewers, sidewalks, waterworks, and all that sort of thing right in front of federal property? The old Grand Trunk paid taxes. In one municipality which I could mention that company was a large taxpayer, but to-day in Toronto the Royal York hotel does not pay any municipal taxes. This is unfair and unjust, and with all these exemptions how is a municipality to live? The municipalities are starving to-day, so much so that they have not a dollar with which properly to repair public buildings, build new schools, construct proper hospital accommodation, help the medical profession in the fine work they are doing, and maintain clinics. They have not a dollar for these services, which are largely maintained by the municipalities. In a rich country like Canada I think the dominion government should come to the help of the overburdened municipalities and pay in all cities for the services rendered. At the present time all these services are carried on through taxes imposed on property owned by you gentlemen and all the rest of us who have invested in real estate. This situation has been cured in England, in the United States, in Australia, in New Zealand, in France and in many other places. The municipalities are paid for the service they render.

You cannot expect the city of Ottawa to give adequate fire protection for a building like this if they do not get some proper compensation for it. I think the agreement speaks for itself. There is both federal and provincial property here. I can tell the committee about the case of the normal schools in London and Toronto, as well as the model school which takes up a whole block on Gerrard and Church streets. The city of Toronto had to build a sidewalk around that property; they had to build a roadway, and the province would not contribute a cent until Sir James Whitney in 1906 changed that principle. He said the Ontario government should be big enough to help the municipalities by paying for the city services rendered.

The only object I had in speaking on this motion was to try to get a fair deal for the municipalities. I have always been a great admirer of the city of Ottawa. I like the people here, and there is a great deal provided in the way of municipal services. I do plead for the municipalities. Mine is a national argument, not a provincial or federal one.

Mr. McCANN: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Broadview has been rather more generous to the city of Ottawa in the remarks he has made since having his dinner than he was in those before six o'clock. As I listened to his argument prior to the recess, it was that Ottawa was not entitled to this amount of money for services rendered because other cities, in which there were federal buildings, were not being treated on a similar basis.

I hold no brief for the city of Ottawa although, like all hon. gentlemen here, I am a part time resident of this city. Having lived in this section of the country all my life, I know the needs of this city perhaps better than do some other hon. gentlemen. I know that business men and property holders here are by no means satisfied with the arrangement which is made by the federal government from year to year. That agreement was brought about, I suppose, by compromise and because of the fact that Ottawa city officials feel that they cannot do better. I do not regard the $100,000 a year that is paid to the city of Ottawa as a bonus or a subvention. You are paying in part for services rendered. You are paying for sewers, for roads, for water service, for police protection, for the sprinkling of the streets, and so on.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that perhaps the biggest objection is based on the fact that you remove so much very valuable property from the assessment roll. The present policy of the government in regard to the beautification of this city is indeed laudable, and I am glad to see that they are taking the long view with reference to making the capital of this country a city of which we may be justly proud. There is no very severe criticism in Canada of the amount of money spent by the federal government with that object in view, but I submit that the present policy practically divides the city into two parts. If in the centre of the city large federal buildings are to be erected for governmental purposes, and if a space is to be given over for parks, we are going to have east, west and south of that area two business sections. It is an old axiom with reference to real estate that property lying adjacent to valuable property will be valuable. That does not hold in connection with the very valuable buildings which are being erected by the government.

For purposes of business, I would say that the presence of government property on business streets, as is contemplated with the erection of the post office at the corner of Sparks and Elgin streets, is detrimental to and lowers the value of the business property adjacent to it. The people who come to do business in this city in government offices are not the people who are going to carry on a large commercial business with the occupants of the buildings along Sparks street in the vicinity of the post office. I would say that the property of people on the opposite side of the street is reduced in value immediately a post office is erected at the corner of Elgin and Sparks streets. I would say the property opposite would depreciate in value anywhere from twenty-five per cent to fifty per cent, unless at some time or another that property, too, was taken over by the government.

In view of these facts, I think the government could afford to deal much more generously with the civic authorities in Ottawa than it has heretofore. A new principle has been accepted, and is being put into effect by the Ontario government with reference to the property which they hold and in which they do business. It has lately been proclaimed by the premier that they propose to pay taxes on those properties in which they have their liquor stores. They see the reasonableness of the demand which has been made by several cities and municipalities that, as the liquor stores are carrying on a commercial business, they should pay taxes equal to those paid by other people doing business in the same city.

I submit the same holds good with reference to federal government property. If the Post Office Department, a business organization, is carrying on a business—I admit it is not a competitive business—then it can well afford to pay taxes on the property in which it does business. A good property is being taken down, one which from year to year has yielded taxes to the municipality of Ottawa. The very moment that those buildings become the property of the federal government they are replaced by a federal building, and that much is removed from the assessment rolls of the city. By a proportionate amount, the taxes are lowered. In turn, those taxes have to be met by other property holders and business men.

All services of the city are at the disposal of the government, if they were in a position to take advantage of them. There is the health service, of which the hon. member has made mention, as well as police protection, educational facilities, fire protection, and the administration of justice. All these services are given in the municipality, and are at the disposal of the federal authority, if they were in a position to take advantage of them. The very fact that they are not in that position and that they do not need some of these services is no argument that they should not pay their fair and just share of the cost.

The agreement before us is practically the same as the one which has been in effect for a number of years. I suggest that it ought to be revised yearly, and on an upward basis. From year to year assessments have had to be raised in Ottawa. Chiefly on account of the relief problem, the tax rate in this and other cities has had to be raised continually; yet over a long term of years there is no change in the amount of money paid by the federal government. If the Minister of Public Works wants to deal fairly with Ottawa, I believe he should change his resolution from $100,000 to at least $200,000, as the amount to be paid to Ottawa for services rendered, and even at that amount the government is not paying more than fifty per cent of the value received. This government in the capital city cannot give an example to other municipalities by wanting something for nothing.

Mr. HEAPS: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the two hon. members who have preceded me. I believe every hon. member is anxious to deal with the utmost fairness with the city of Ottawa, and all are anxious to see Ottawa become a worth while capital of a great dominion. But I certainly cannot follow the arguments which have been presented by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. For instance, he has told us that the Ontario government are content to pay taxes on the liquor stores they control in the various parts of the province. I have not heard that the Ontario government will pay taxes on the hydro utility, an organization which does a fair amount of business in Ottawa. I do not know, for instance, that the Ontario government makes any contribution towards the taxes of Toronto, the capital city of Ontario. I know of no provincial government which makes a lump sum contribution to the capital city of any province for the services it receives.

I am not using these observations as an argument against the measure submitted to the committee, but I am speaking in answer to the statements which have been made. Further, I have not much sympathy for the plea on behalf of the business men in Ottawa, the description of the hardships through which they are going, or the deterioration of property values in the city. I say that, because I think there is no city in the dominion which has been better off in the past seven or eight years, taking it all in all, than has been the city of Ottawa. It has not suffered one part of what other cities have suffered in the past few years, in connection with meeting its municipal obligations. They have been extremely well off, compared with nearly all other municipalities in Canada.

On the other hand, if one were to take away from Ottawa all the improvements for which the government has been responsible, there would be very little that the city could show that it has done towards making the capital city a worthy capital for the dominion. Having had some experience in municipal affairs, perhaps I might be permitted to say that there is not that civic pride in Ottawa which I should like to see the people have towards making Ottawa a worthy capital city. If one takes away the parks and driveways and public buildings controlled by the federal government, what is there to show what is being done by the city?

I am not making these statements as an argument against voting the amount indicated. I wish the government to deal with the utmost fairness with the city of Ottawa, and I am not opposing the granting of $100,000. I want to see Ottawa a worth while capital, but I also want to see her own people become a little more sympathetic, as indicated by their future action, towards the activity of this government in trying to make Ottawa the city it should be.

I am aware of the complaints that have been made in the past when buildings have been torn down. In my opinion, the tearing down of some buildings has been a good thing for Ottawa. I remember a few years ago when the confederation park was first started. There was a great outcry because property was being expropriated by the government in order that this park might be set up in the centre of the city. I do not know the exact sum spent in this connection, but it was up in the millions. The old Russell theatre as well as other buildings were torn down, and the complaint was made that we were reducing the assessed value of the city. In my judgment, when a city is made more beautiful and more attractive to those who live in it and who visit it as tourists, the property values are enhanced, not reduced. That is exactly what the government has done here in Ottawa. I have been coming to Ottawa for a number of years, and I am anxious to have the government continue to try to make Ottawa a worthy capital of the Dominion of Canada, but I should like to see a little more cooperation in this regard on the part of the people of Ottawa.

Mr. BLAIR: Ottawa is situated in the province of Ontario. When large buildings are built here at the expense of the other provinces, I wonder if they do not sometimes feel that a federal district should be set up here like they have in the United States and in Mexico. Such a district would be controlled by the dominion government. I do not know how this could be brought about, but if it has been done in other countries it can be done here. Then the other provinces would feel that this was part of their own territory, instead of it being a part of Ontario as at present.

Mr. KUHL: This resolution is an example of the many anomalies that exist in our present constitutional position, just alluded to by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. Canada claims to be a self-governing unit, so why should we not have a federal district under the control of the federal government, as is the case with the district of Canberra in Australia? In giving evidence before the special committee on the British North America Act, Doctor Beauchesne mentioned the creation of a federal district during a discussion on the need of a new constitution for Canada. On page 132 of the evidence he is reported as follows:

If we have a constituent assembly and if we discuss the making of a new constitution, I think it should provide for a federal district. I think it is an anomaly that dominion affairs should, to a certain extent, be subject to provincial authority. I would suggest that we have a federal district taking in about twenty-five square miles on each side of the Ottawa river.

And then on page 133 we find the following statement by Doctor Beauchesne:

If there was a federal district, in order to make that federal district attractive in a big country like Canada, I would suggest the creation by the government of a national park of 75,000 to 100,000 acres to the north and northwest of the city. I would suggest that as much as possible of the country round about the Laurentian hills be included in order to make the park beautiful and attractive.

That is a worth-while suggestion and the people of Canada should be made aware of the situation. If that were done, I believe they would demand that this and other anomalies which exist should be cleared up. All of our national matters should be arranged in accordance with our status as a nation.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Cardin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 34, to authorize an agreement between His Majesty the King and the Corporation of the city of Ottawa.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Civil aviation division—

Airways and airports—Construction and improvements including lighting and radio facilities (capital), $1,722,400.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): This vote was discussed at great length on the last occasion it was before the committee.

Mr. REID: I should like to make a correction in connection with certain remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) on Thursday last when this item was under discussion. I am sorry the hon. member is not present when this correction is being made. At page 804 of Hansard he is reported as having made a statement which I endeavoured to correct the following day. I was called to order before I could complete the statement I wished to make on that occasion. With reference to the two air fields the hon. gentleman said:

I am not blaming the minister personally. I would not accuse him of doing this. I know there was considerable pressure brought to bear on him from the minister for British Columbia and from the hon. member for New Westminster.

I wish now to make a few remarks with regard to that statement. When I made the correction the other day, I disputed the statement and described it as false and untrue. I never at any time brought any pressure to bear either upon the minister or upon the Minister of National Defence in connection with this or any other emergency landing field. The situation was this, if I may briefly explain it. These two sites, that at Chilliwack and the Langley Prairie site, had been contracted for and had been under negotiation some time prior to the election of 1935. When the present government came into office, the matter was still under advisement in 1936, and it had been suggested to the then minister, under whose department it was at that time, that is to say the Minister of National Defence, that these sites should be looked into, because it was felt at that time that as far as the Langley Prairie site was concerned, it was not the best one available in the district. When this was brought to the attention of the Minister of National Defence, it was pointed out by his officials that the field had been chosen after careful flights by competent airmen of the department. I differed with the point of view of the airmen and as a matter of fact I still differ with them. That, however, is aside from the point at the moment.

The fact is that the negotiations had proceeded so far—at least the information given me by the minister was to that effect—that the title deed had been taken from one of the parties, a Doctor Saunders, who had agreed to sell his farm as an airport at $200 an acre. Not only had he given the deed over, but he had sold his buildings and contracted for another farm in the Sumas prairie, which is in the Chilliwack electoral district; and the department felt that it had then gone too far to stop. Hence, I understand, the negotiation was finally completed some time late in 1936. I am not sure of the exact date, but I want to make the record clear. At that time, that is in 1936, I protested against the emergency field being purchased at that point, and still do; but I found, as I have stated, that prior to 1935, beginning in 1932, the late government had taken steps to acquire property not only in Chilliwack but in Langley Prairie and that the emergency field at Langley Prairie would probably not have been proceeded with had it not been for the fact that the deed for the property had been handed over to the government and Doctor Saunders had sold everything he had and acquired a farm elsewhere.

That is the only interest I took in the matter at that time, and I take great exception to the remarks made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, who made the accusation, stating that he knew that political pressure had been brought to bear by the Minister of National Defence and by myself. When a member of this house says that he knows something, I think he should be asked to produce proof. I would not state in the house that I knew unless I was prepared to back up that statement. On the floor of the house I have made statements which I have always been ready to back up, and I say that the statements which I am now making are absolutely correct in so far as any actions of mine are concerned. At no time did I bring any pressure of any kind to bear upon any minister in connection with these emergency landing fields. I am glad that the hon. member for Fraser Valley is now in his place, because I wish to tell him that I did protest verbally to the then Minister of National Defence, under whose jurisdiction the two landing fields were, that the Langley airport site was not the best available in my district; but that statement, I believe, was not corroborated by the officials of the department who have to do with the choosing of these fields.

As regards the other site at Chilliwack, my information is—and the minister can correct me if I am wrong—that it would have been gone on with at the time the matter was under the Department of National Defence, but for the fact that it had been brought to the attention of the department that the taking over of the site there involved a dyking charge running over twenty or thirty years, and the department was not willing to recommend to the government that such charges on that site be incurred. As time went on, the jurisdiction and authority over these airport sites changed from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Transport, under whose jurisdiction they now are.

I wish to make this frank statement to the committee now, and I am glad that the hon. member for Fraser Valley is here and I can correct him. I repeat that at no time, either by word or inference, did I ever bring pressure of any kind to bear upon the department or the minister or any minister either to go ahead with the airport site at the present site or to interfere with the one in the hon. member's own riding, the one in Chilliwack. I trust that this explanation, which I have made honestly and sincerely, will be accepted by the hon. member.

Mr. BARBER: As a member of this house I am in honour bound to accept the statement of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), and I am very sorry if the information I received, upon which my remarks were based the other night, was groundless. I am bound to accept, and I do accept, the statement of the hon. gentleman that he did not in any way use his influence in connection with the establishment or development of the airport at Langley. What I did particularly try to point out the other night was that the airport at Chilliwack, which was clear of fog conditions, was chosen by the officials of the department. I had nothing whatever to do with the choosing of it. The officials of the department flew over the site and surveyed the land from a plane. There was another field which some thought more desirable, being closer in, but owing to air currents they did not think it would be satisfactory.

The hon. member has referred to dyking charges. The option taken on the 160 acres at Chilliwack was $16,000, and apparently, at the time the option was taken, the dyking charge had been overlooked. On going into the matter they found that the total capital charge for dyking amounted to $50 an acre, and it was thought, as I discussed the matter with the present Minister of National Defence, that some arrangement could be made between this government and the government of British Columbia with a view to having a reduction in that capital charge. But even if that reduction had not been made, the total charge would have been $24,000—$16,000 for the price of the land and $8,000 to take care of dyking charge.

Even if, in the development of this field, a few thousand dollars more had to be expended, say a total of $30,000, there is quite a difference between $30,000 for a 160-acre port and $90,000 which is being expended on a 90-acre port in the fog district within ten or fifteen minutes' flying of Vancouver. So I tried to make it quite plain that some discrimination might have taken place; that the port which was more desirable from the standpoint of air men themselves was set aside, and that the other one the government has continued to develop. I accept the word of the minister that a lot of this expenditure had been made previously and was handed to him when he took office. A considerable portion was made under the defence department. But the substance of the complaint from the people out there, including many of the air men, is what I placed before the committee the other night and which I repeat to-night.

Mr. GREEN: What is the policy of the government with regard to assisting in the construction of airports which are not on the Trans-Canada airway? Many of the large cities of Canada are not on that airway, and some of them, no doubt, will be served by feeder lines.

Mr. HOWE: We have a particular vote for that assistance, vote No. 390. If the hon. member would not mind, I would prefer to discuss the matter under the proper vote.

Mr. GREEN: There have been reports in the paper that the government have purchased 600 acres at Patricia bay, which is on the southern end of Vancouver island, and there is some question whether this property is to be used as a base for transpacific flying or is merely for defence purposes. It is involving an expenditure of, I believe, several hundred thousand dollars. Would the minister explain to the committee what that airport is for?

Mr. HOWE: That expenditure is entirely for defence. It is in the defence department estimates. I know nothing of the details.

Mr. GREEN: It is not to be used for civil flying?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. MASSEY: On Monday last I asked on the order paper, under notices of motion, for the production of papers and——all correspondence exchanged between the ministries of public works, labour, transport, or other departments of government, and the city of Toronto, in connection with the building of the Toronto airports on the Toronto island and at Malton.

That motion was passed as an order for return. The reason I asked for those papers is, as the minister may imagine, that there has been a great deal of discussion among those who are air-minded in Toronto as to the value, from the viewpoint of practicability, of the Malton airport. There was quite an agitation on the part of many who knew a great deal about flying and its hazards to have the Toronto flying club field on Wilson avenue enlarged and made fit for an emergency field for transport planes. The decision, however, was in favour of Malton. Would the minister be good enough to tell the committee what part the Trans-Canada airways played in that decision, and upon what the final decision was based? How was it that Malton, as far away from Toronto as it is, was selected rather than the flying club field which is immediately adjacent to the city and within twenty minutes by direct road of down town?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend will understand that the airports in Toronto are the property of the city. The department was asked to advise on certain matters. We reported on every field that the city of Toronto asked us to report upon. We prepared estimates of cost and reports as to the feasibility for flying. After these reports were in, the city of Toronto made their choice, and after they had done so we granted such assistance as we could grant under the order in council which governs contributions to municipalities. I should like to make it clear that the choice was that of the city of Toronto, and that this department was responsible only for advice as to physical conditions and estimated expenditures for development of certain properties that it was asked to report upon.

Mr. MASSEY: Did the department recommend the choice of Malton?

Mr. HOWE: The department did not recommend anything. It simply gave the facts?

Mr. MASSEY: Is the minister fully satisfied that Malton is the better of the two airports, from his point of view as being directly concerned with the operation of the Trans-Canada Air Lines?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say which is the better, because I never studied the matter from that angle, but I can say that we regard the Malton field as potentially the finest airport which has ever been built on this continent. It seems to have everything.

Mr. GRAYDON: Hear, hear.

Mr. MASSEY: With all due deference to the opinion of the minister, and the enthusiasm of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), which has manifested itself on so many occasions, there is an opinion, which is at times extremely vocal, that the Toronto flying club field is the better of the two. We are faced now with two rather unfortunate circumstances at Toronto in connection with our air field. The one on the island is, after all, on an island; and the other evening in this chamber the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) was directly concerned at the thought of the use of a chain ferry for the transportation of passengers to and from the airport. It is obvious that an island airport has its disadvantages from the point of view of accessibility when there is a connecting tunnel or a bridge. We in Toronto possess the advantage of having an island upon which an aerodrome can be erected, and when one considers the experience in Boston, a city the minister well knows, with its excellent airport suitable for both land and sea planes immediately adjacent to the city, we are pleased to have the airport in a similar situation, but there is some little concern voiced about efficient transportation to and from the island. The minister has explained that that is a matter for the city of Toronto to solve. We are also faced with another awkward situation. The Malton airport is at least forty-five minutes away from the centre of the city of Toronto, away out in the county of Peel.

Mr. THOMPSON: In the bush.

Mr. MASSEY: On the other hand, the flying club field is at most twenty minutes from downtown, connected by a very broad highway most of the way. May I ask the minister, if there should be a great rush of traffic as a result of the new air line necessitating a change in the future, would the choice again be that of the city of Toronto or would it be that of the Trans-Canada Air Lines, in view of the feeling that the inconvenience caused passengers by having this field so far out justifies a port nearer the city? Surely we have the experience of Buffalo just across the lake to keep us free from an error similar to the one that was made there. One has to drive for forty-five minutes from downtown Buffalo to reach the aerodrome, and now that city is faced with the obligation of establishing its airport nearer to the city, at very heavy cost. We are hoping that the Trans-Canada Air Lines will be successful. If this is so, then the Malton airport will prove to be too far from the city, and then perhaps we shall have an airport near Toronto itself. If such should be the case, would the minister inform the committee whether the Trans-Canada Air Lines would be prepared to share at least part of the cost of doing what many feel should have been done in the first place, or must we assume that for many years to come this airport at Malton will be maintained?

Mr. HOWE: I am unable to answer my hon. friend's question, for the reason that my mind cannot comprehend a city having two expensive airports which would give any consideration at all to building a third. If my hon. friend can contemplate Toronto with three large airports, I shall take the question under consideration and try to answer him at a future time.

Mr. GRAYDON: This is one of the few occasions on which I disagree with the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey). I must take this opportunity to point out to the committee, and particularly to the minister, that if any surprise or concern was felt in the city of Toronto or elsewhere as to the suitability of Malton for an airport, that concern and surprise were not shared by the citizens of the banner riding of Peel. May I also point out one of the erroneous statements the hon. member for Greenwood made in the course of his remarks; he said Malton airport is forty-five minutes from the centre of Toronto. If the hon. member took pains to find the exact travelling time he must have done it on a bicycle, not by modern fast forms of transportation. As to the means by which some hon. members from the city of Toronto travel, I have no particular information, but in travelling time Malton is much nearer to Toronto than forty-five minutes. Having ridden with the hon. member for Greenwood on a couple of occasions, I would say that perhaps fifteen minutes, or twenty at the outside, would be enough for him.

Mr. MASSEY: May I say to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) that I appreciate his comments with regard to my suggested prowess as a driver. May I assure him that I referred to the Malton airport as unfortunate in its location not because it is in the county of Peel, but because the county of Peel is so far from Toronto.

Mr. BARBER: I notice by the press that planes crossing British Columbia between Lethbridge and Vancouver have been forced to cancel several trips owing, I believe, to cloud conditions. Is it the opinion of the minister or his officials that this difficulty can be overcome by flying at higher altitudes, or shall we be up against it for all time?

Mr. HOWE: In the last few days every plane from Mexico to Alaska has been grounded. One plane unfortunately would appear not to have had as good weather reports as we have, because it went too far into the clouds, sought to turn back, and has not been heard from since. I think the fact that our results have been what they are is due to the accuracy of our weather reporting and to the good administration of the line generally. This unfavourable weather was a local condition; our people located it and kept the planes from getting into trouble.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to ask the minister a couple of questions as to the construction of this airport and on what principle airports are constructed. With all due respect to the hon. member for Peel, I would say that he certainly put it over the city of Toronto, except that he did not have anything to do with it, did not know anything about it, and I doubt if he knew the airport was going there. I have a return here to an order of the house, and I know the three eminent gentlemen and famous soldiers who approved years ago the airport on the sand bar on the west end of Toronto island. Major Handley Page is a man of the highest authority, General Ray Collishaw, M.C., D.S.O., is a young man born in British Columbia, one of the leading airmen in the world to-day. The late Colonel William G. Barker's name is known to everyone; he it was who brought down seventy-four planes and won the Victoria Cross in the great war. I took them out on a tour of the harbour improvements many times and to see the proposed sites for an airport. No one ever complained about tall buildings. I have a great respect for the present minister, but I should like to know whether the construction of these airports is being carried out on the same basis as the mistakes made at the western entrance to Toronto harbour. I have here the correspondence laid on the table by the minister, and I am surprised that there should be such a lack of business methods on the part of the present government in connection with this airport at the western end of Toronto harbour, linked with another one in the country at Malton which, in my opinion, is entirely unnecessary. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is concerned in this, having to find the funds for all this expenditure.

It will take a long time to travel between Malton and Toronto in a motor car; you will find yourself served with blue papers and white papers, going through five or six municipalities trying to maintain their police forces by fines. This return shows the log-rolling and politics brought into play to get them to cancel that agreement made by the late government of a million dollars for a tunnel and airport. The former minister was a competent minister; the delay getting the contracts let was owing to financial conditions. Some of the Liberal candidates in the city of Toronto and Ontario at the last election took part in this rescission campaign, and in getting the present government to make a scrap of paper of the former government's bargain made with the harbour board and the city, which has spent so much on the harbour.

Let me tell the minister not to mind who his advisers are to-day; these men who approved that airport are distinguished airmen whom I named, who fought in France and Flanders and Italy and obtained decorations. They surveyed the western entrance site and lake there. The present minister is not to blame, but I am surprised that the government took such spendthrift action. I should like those who are speaking about the heavy taxation for the boards of trade and chambers of commerce of the country to read this return and see the political log-rolling that took place. There has been about $150,000 wasted on the tunnel; they might just as well have thrown into Toronto bay the cost of abandoning this contract. The city and the harbour board could sue the government to-day in the exchequer court. I was on the Toronto harbour board for twenty years and chairman for some years, and I have the opinion of legal experts that the government is under a contract to build two bridges there, and is liable to the city and the harbour commission for the damages they sustained through the cancellation of that tunnel work.

Has any improvement resulted from either a military or commercial point of view by going out to this remote place? No. I have seen airports in many other cities which show that this talk about the menace of high buildings around Toronto is a myth; there are just as many in other places. I accompanied these officers and many others. I knew them for years; we went over the ground at the island daily, in bad weather and good, and they were of opinion that that was the logical place. I may not know as much about this problem as the ministers' experts—I know some of the gentlemen and have great respect for them—but the Borden government established a Royal Air Force centre in Toronto; 18,000 cadets and mechanics were trained there during the war and British officers came here as instructors. I have spoken to many of these men; many are decorated men, and their opinion is the same as that of the officers I have mentioned, that the island was an ideal place.

What is there at this place called Malton? You have to build roads and all kinds of things which will run into hundreds of thousands of dollars. The city of Toronto is spending money out in the country for the benefit of surrounding municipalities, and the government compelled them illegally to do this. With all the suffering there is in the country to-day, the government is going too fast with these expenditures. Toronto is the only city I know of that is putting up this capital sum to be a link in this Canadian service. What other municipality is doing this? Is Montreal? No; Montreal has not been asked to do what Toronto has done. There are plenty of buildings around the harbour at Montreal. Something ought to be done about this matter; it ought to go to some committee of this house to be looked into, including the abandonment of the work started by the former government. The committee will see the unbusinesslike methods of the present government in the handling of this airport problem in the Toronto district, where they virtually coerced the taxpayers into spending what will amount to a million dollars before they are finished.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): Are the Brockway and Blissville air fields to be finished this year?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; it is the intention to proceed with that work this year.

Item agreed to.

Airways and airports—operation and maintenance including lighting, radio and meteorological services, $910,669.

Mr. GREEN: Apparently this item includes the inspection service. Just what inspection services does the government supply? That is of great importance now that we are opening up our airways across Canada.

Mr. HOWE: This vote is for the operation of the physical properties having to do with our airports. It has to do with the cost of operating the airports themselves, the meteorological service, the radio beams and all the auxiliaries to flying as far as ground facilities are concerned. There is nothing here about inspection.

Mr. GREEN: Which vote does cover the inspection service?

Mr. HOWE: Item No. 385, covering air service administration, which was passed a few days ago.

Mr. GREEN: What inspection services are supplied by the department?

Mr. HOWE: Well, we have six districts across Canada, with two inspectors in each district. Those inspectors inspect the logs of the planes, watch overloading, check the airworthiness of the machines, examine pilots and have general supervision over all flying in their districts.

Mr. GREEN: Do they also cover the flying in the north country?

Mr. HOWE: Entirely. They inspect landing fields, approve routes and have everything to do with safety in flying.

Mr. GREEN: I notice an increase of about $100,000 in the vote for temporary assistance. Would the minister explain that?

Mr. HOWE: The increase in this vote is due to the fact that we have more facilities to maintain now. As we build more airports and extend our operations further, of course the operating expenses of the airports increase. The vote is larger this year because we are making provision for the inauguration of the eastern end of our service to Montreal and Toronto this year.

Mr. GREEN: Does the vote include any expenditure in connection with the trans-atlantic service?

Mr. HOWE: None at all.

Mr. LENNARD: I notice that this item is partly for meteorological services. Will the minister explain why meteorological services are included in this vote when item No. 391 is a vote for meteorological services?

Mr. HOWE: The vote for meteorological services generally is for the services that have been performed for a great number of years, but the meteorological services included in this vote are those pertaining directly to the airways. It includes the cost of a teletype service connecting the fields and forecasting centres along the route, as well as spot observers. It is simply the services directly pertaining to this route. Of course the airways have the benefit of all the observations that are paid for under the other vote as well.

Mr. MARSH: I note that this vote is increased by $52,000, and after looking at the items which are included I am not surprised at that. I note that the minister is paying due attention to what might be considered one of the prime requisites of safety in flying, by making plans for proper meteorological service. I see that there is to be one controller, a climatologist, six weather forecasters, eight meteorologists, several meteorological observers and a clerical staff numbering a score or more, all of whom are necessary. I assume that this meteorological service will include barometric readings, charts, weather maps and information regarding the storm routes and channels.

There are a number of questions I should like to ask. At what places will this equipment be centred? Will it be located at the various airports across the country, and in addition will there be stations at points where, because of the geological formation of the country, it would appear advisable to locate a meteorological station? Also, will there be a meteorological station at Hamilton? I do not ask that question because of any selfish motive on the part of the city of Hamilton. The meteorological bureau in Toronto, which forecasts weather for Ontario, can do so with, we shall say, about seventy-five to eighty per cent success in coverage of the province as a whole. But down in the Niagara peninsula, due to the fact that it is at the tail end of about three storm routes, the forecasting in connection with weather is not more than about fifty-five to sixty per cent correct. And in saying that, I do not cast any reflection on the meteorological bureau at Toronto.

Mr. HOWE: While Toronto is the headquarters for the entire service, we have forecasting centres particularly for aviation at such points as Vancouver, Lethbridge, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Kapuskasing and Montreal, and later on there will be a forecasting station at Moncton. I assume, when the line pushes west from Toronto, there will be a forecasting station at Windsor as well. At the forecasting centre, maps are drawn at two hour intervals, and the forecasts which the pilot needs, when he is under the control of that particular centre, are telephoned to him according to the weather which is interpreted for that locality. That is, when the pilot is near a forecasting centre, he is controlled by the weather reports from that station, but of course all weather reports are sent on the teletype from coast to coast. The teletype also carries reports from the United States and spot observations along the route of the Trans-Canada line, so that the forecasting is available not only locally; the weather maps cover the whole country as well.

Mr. MARSH: I assume, then, that there will be other weather stations apart from the airports?

Mr. HOWE: Oh, yes. We have had a very fine meteorological service in this country for many years. The airports are a special service in addition to the usual meteorological service. But we have meteorological stations controlling the agriculture and weather maps service, and service to ships at sea, which is more or less independent of this service.

Mr. BROOKS: I notice in the year 1937-38 there was an item of $12,400 for expenses in connection with the training of pilots, and the awarding of the Webster trophy. This year it has been dropped. Does that mean that there will be no competition for the Webster trophy in 1938-39?

Mr. HOWE: That award was a joint vote between the Department of National Defence and the Department of Transport. By agreement with flying clubs we have made different arrangements. I am advised by my officers that the award will be continued, and that the vote was to pay for the expense of judging the candidates for the award. That is being taken care of in the civil aviation vote, as part of the departmental expenses. Although the vote is different, the result will be the same.

Mr. BARBER: In connection with lighting and radio service, are all the fields in the west, and particularly in the mountain section, to be lighted and supplied with radio service, or just certain fields?

Mr. HOWE: What we describe as the hundred-mile fields—as a matter of fact they are a little closer together than that—will be completely lighted. Those fields are regarded as essential in twin-engine, high-speed flying. The intermediate, or thirty-mile fields, which are not main fields, will have boundary lighting, but the runways will not be lighted to the extent they are lighted on the main fields.

Mr. BARBER: What about radio?

Mr. HOWE: The radio beams are located at intervals of about one hundred miles.

Item agreed to.

Grants to aeroplane clubs, including grant of $5,000 to the Canadian Flying Clubs Association, $60,000.

Mr. GREEN: This is one vote which I think the minister might increase. The other day he said that the training of pilots and ground crews in Canada was on a rather haphazard basis. I suggest to him that if a larger grant were made to these clubs; if more aircraft were given to them, and if new clubs were established, this might go some distance in overcoming the present difficulty in training pilots and ground crews.

Mr. HOWE: The training clubs are on a better business basis to-day than they have ever been. The way to encourage training clubs is not necessarily to give them large grants, but rather to give them such help as they need to run their clubs efficiently. We find that by following that procedure we are getting efficiency in the clubs.

This vote is the same as was given last year. With the help indicated in this vote the clubs are working into first-class financial position; some in the larger centres are becoming quite affluent. If we doubled or trebled the vote, I doubt if we would get any better service than we are getting to-day. I know of no club which has not sufficient equipment for its work; in fact, some have more equipment than they really need.

Some discussion has taken place as to whether or not the clubs are willing to give more advanced training. We do not want all the clubs to have advanced training, but we think an advanced training school for certain districts could be organized. I have told the clubs that if they can work out practical arrangements which would be satisfactory to themselves and to officers of this department, we would then consider a further grant to help them in the next step in flying. I may say that the grants to clubs have varied from the sublime to the ridiculous. The following list will indicate the amounts which have been given:

1927-28	$ 47,000
1928-29	165,000
1929-30	117,000
1930-31	84,000
1931-32	37,000
1932-33	20,000
1933-34	22,000
1934-35	30,000
1935-36	74,000
1936-37	109,000
1937-38	60,000

After a good deal of study we have come to the conclusion that these clubs can function very well on about $60,000 a year, until some further advanced training is undertaken.

Mr. GREEN: If the clubs should cooperate, as the minister suggests, and if they set up more advanced training schools, is the vote large enough?

Mr. HOWE: If a conclusion is reached before parliament prorogues, we may consider additional aid; but if not, the grant will have to stand for this year. There is no great urgency in the matter.

Mr. GREEN: How are the clubs divided? How many are there in the different provinces?

Mr. HOWE: There is the Aerial Club of British Columbia, the Brandon Aerial Club, the Brant and Norfolk Aerial Club, the Border Cities Club, the Cape Breton Flying Club, the Calgary Aerial Club, the Edmonton and Northern Alberta Club, the Fort William Aerial Club, and other clubs at Halifax, Hamilton, Kingston, Kitchener and Waterloo, London, Moose Jaw, Montreal, Ottawa, Regina, St. Catharines, Saint John, Saskatoon, Toronto and Winnipeg.

Mr. GREEN: Does the government take steps to help in the promotion of clubs, or are they started by groups of individuals in different localities?

Mr. HOWE: The association of flying clubs has an efficient secretary in Mr. Ross, who looks after that part of the business very well. I know that with his help there is no trouble in starting a club.

Mr. LOCKHART: I noted the minister made reference to the different clubs throughout Canada which are receiving assistance. May I join with the hon. member for Vancouver South in urging that increases be given. The matter of financing is part of the difficulty of municipalities which are making a real effort to maintain flying clubs in their districts. Many municipalities have been making large contributions to these clubs. Just recently I received a communication to the effect that because of the relief situation it may be necessary to raise the tax rate in my own particular locality. If this vote were increased, I think it would prove encouraging to the clubs and enable them to provide better facilities. It would also be of some assistance to the municipalities which may be contributing from $1,000 to $1,500 or $2,000 to these clubs. Could the minister not consider making some increase in connection with those clubs which are being assisted by the municipalities?

Mr. HOWE: I imagine the main difficulty my hon. friend finds with his club is that it is situated only thirty miles from Hamilton. Perhaps there is not sufficient distance between the two cities to permit both clubs to prosper. Our reports indicate that the hon. member's club is doing very well, and I know he has contributed a good deal himself to its success. He takes a great interest in the club. I say again that the way to make these clubs efficient is not to give them large sums of money. The hon. member's club is in good financial shape, and it is being kept that way because everyone is on his toes. You will find many people ready to take up a plane if it does not cost anything.

Mr. LOCKHART: I do not think the minister got my point. Municipalities are finding it difficult to-day to strike their tax rates. I just received a notice from my own city to the effect that unless some adjustment was made in the relief situation, it would be necessary to increase the tax by three to four mills. That municipality is contributing to the airport at which many pilots have been trained.

Mr. HOWE: Could my hon. friend state what his city contributes to the club annually?

Mr. LOCKHART: I do not know the exact amount, but I know they are paying a good portion of the rent and making other contributions. During my term in municipal office the hangars were completely remodelled and other assistance was given. All these contributions help to raise the tax rate. I was wondering if further assistance could not be given in some way, as suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver South.

Item agreed to.

To provide for contributions to assist municipalities to improve existing airports or provide new airports, $800,000.

Mr. BARBER: What is the basis upon which assistance is given to municipal airports?

Mr. HOWE: We found that practically all the cities along the Trans-Canada air route had civic fields in various stages of completion. Vancouver had spent a great deal of money on a field, and the same was true of Calgary, Edmonton, Lethbridge and other cities along the route. But practically none of these fields was up to the standard required for high speed planes. Most of the fields were put into operation in 1928 and 1929 when landing speeds of aeroplanes were much lower. Many cities were not in a financial position to put the fields into the shape necessary for high speed flying, and a policy was laid down whereby the government agreed to give assistance to those fields necessary for a Trans-Canada service. This was in the form of a grant of one-third of the investment made by the city in its field; or if that contribution was not sufficient, then the government would join with the city by paying twenty-five per cent of any further investment made in the field. The government contribution is in the form of a grant, the ownership of the field remaining with the city. This aid is confined to fields required for the Trans-Canada service.

Mr. BROOKS: I understood the minister to say the other evening that the Trans-Canada service would have its eastern terminus at Moncton, and Halifax, Saint John and Charlottetown would be dependent upon private service. Would this vote provide any money for air fields in large centres like Saint John, Halifax and Charlottetown? It would seem to me to be rather unfair if those centres were left to their own resources as far as the providing of air facilities is concerned. I have nothing to say with regard to the controversy which is raging in certain sections of the maritime provinces over the report that the airport is to be at Moncton; I simply want to know if these centres will receive consideration under this vote.

Mr. HOWE: There has been a good deal of misunderstanding over my statement. As I said, it is the intention to extend the Trans-Canada service to all the principal centres in the maritimes. Whether this service is undertaken by government or private operation, it would still be Trans-Canada service and those cities would qualify for this grant. We are in negotiation with three of them at the moment and one was assisted last year. Similarly the cities in the Saskatchewan loop, such as Moose Jaw, Saskatoon, Prince Albert and North Battleford will be part of the Trans-Canada service, although the service will be given by private rather than by government operation.

Mr. BROOKS: Why is it called a feeder service?

Mr. HOWE: Because we do not run around that way in going to the coast.

Mr. BROOKS: I mean at the eastern end.

Mr. HOWE: You can call it what you like, but the fact is it is a trans-Canada service.

Mr. BROOKS: The services from Halifax to Moncton and from Saint John to Moncton were called feeder services the other night.

Mr. McIVOR: Through the efficiency of the Department of Transport we shall soon have a fine air field at Fort William. Our city council are most enterprising and enthusiastic and they have great visions for the future. A by-law was recently passed to provide $40,000 for this purpose, but a local paper at Ottawa had the amount as $400,000. The amount increased greatly in the passage of the news from Fort William to Ottawa. We appreciate the advertising which we received from the Ottawa paper, but I wanted to make this correction.

Mr. BETTS: I should like to commend the department for increasing this vote by $300,000, but in my opinion we are still far behind in the pace we should set in developing our air transportation. There is no country in the world with such an enviable record as Canada as far as the exploits of flying men in the war were concerned. There is no country where private enterprise in the development of aviation has gone ahead as fast as in Canada. But there is no civilized country in which the government has hung back more lamentably. A grant of $800,000 for the assistance of municipalities to improve existing airports or to provide new airports is merely a drop in the bucket. As far as this type of transportation goes, we are still in the backwoods. Sums of money are being spent on public buildings and other public enterprises which had far better be diverted into the Department of Transport and devoted to this very item. I would ask the minister not to grow weary in well-doing but to press onward and go in for more development and help the municipalities, providing for better air fields everywhere, because that is money which will pay big dividends in the near future.

Mr. LAWSON: I would refer back to the question asked by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) in order that I might have a little clearer picture in my mind of the basis of these grants. Am I correct in my interpretation of the minister's answer? Let me assume that the municipality has spent $300,000 on an air field. The department decides that it is to be a landing field in the trans-Canada system and that it needs further moneys expended upon it for the purpose of bringing it up to the required standard. Does the department thereupon automatically advance to the municipality by way of grant an amount not exceeding in the aggregate $100,000 without the municipality first putting up any more money?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; we survey the needs. Take an airport such as my hon. friend has mentioned where $300,000 has been spent. If we find that it needs the expenditure of another $100,000 to bring it up to standard, we grant the city the full $100,000. If $200,000 is required, we grant $100,000 on past work and another $25,000 against the city's $75,000 for future work.

Mr. LAWSON: And the same rule will be applied to all municipalities?

Mr. HOWE: All municipalities that we require for our services.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): Fredericton, the capital of New Brunswick, is situated near the main Trans-Canada line. Will this contribution apply to that city when the situation there warrants it?

Mr. HOWE: I dislike giving snap judgments on such a situation, but if Fredericton will write to the department we shall go into the matter, send our engineer down and have the field looked over.

Mr. GREEN: In connection with an earlier item I asked the minister whether he could tell us the policy of the government in regard to assisting cities that are not on the Trans-Canada airway. I asked what assistance would be given in the construction of airports in such centres, and was told that I should have to wait until this item came up. Can the minister tell us now what the policy is?

Mr. HOWE: We do not lay down blanket policies for situations we know nothing about. If my hon. friend will mention some specific situation, we shall look into it and see what help can be forthcoming, but we have no general policy for situations of that kind. Our staff is so busy in this particular work, which we hope to finish this year—the work of getting the Trans-Canada under way—that we can not spend much time on these other problems. If my hon. friend has one particular problem in mind, we shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. GREEN: I have not any one particular problem in mind. At any rate, the department has not laid down the policy that it will help only those cities that are on the Trans-Canada airway or on certain feeder lines?

Mr. HOWE: We have not laid down any policy that excludes any project; but if there is an urgent case where help is needed and if such help is justified by the activities, we shall look into it, and under such circumstances perhaps we might be able to give assistance.

Mr. GREEN: Whether it is on the Trans-Canada airway or not?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: Are there municipalities in which the department will require fields for Trans-Canada airways, in respect of which there has not been money already spent by the municipality upon a landing field? If so, what would be the policy with respect to grants to such a municipality? Suppose you were going to create a new airport.

Mr. HOWE: We have one fairly close to home. We have formed no policy with respect to it but are using the military field. The Ottawa situation is the only one I can think of, and I assume that is the one my hon. friend has in mind. I do not know what the outcome will be.

Mr. DUFFUS: It has been reported that negotiations have been going on for the purchase of a property near the city of Oshawa. Is that for civil or national defence purposes?

Mr. HOWE: It is not civil purposes and I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. McINTOSH: In the discussion that has ensued with respect to the $800,000 item for assisting municipalities in the matter of air transportation, the hon. member for London made a statement the intent of which was that we were not progressing perhaps as satisfactorily as we should as a young nation as far as air development is concerned. I would call the attention of the committee to the position as it existed when the opposition as a government were in power.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. McINTOSH: It will take only a minute or two.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McINTOSH: I should like to have order, Mr. Chairman, if there is such a thing. In 1930 when the Liberal party was defeated at the polls, we had an air mail service from Moose Jaw through Saskatoon and North Battleford to Edmonton. The new government had been in power for only a very short time when that service was scrapped and never renewed. Meanwhile, on the basis of that service, the city of North Battleford, as a young centre, went to work and spent a good deal of money in developing an air field, providing for requisites in a local way in order to adapt itself to the new trend in air transportation.

This government has been in power about two years and during that time has taken hold of the air transportation situation in a progressive way. All I need do to prove that statement is to refer to the record put on Hansard a day or two ago with regard to the northern feeder service in Saskatchewan. As I pointed out, in that province the feeder air line service, with Regina as the base, will be in operation in a few months, and that feeder air line service will have a five-city tie-up—Regina, Moose Jaw, North Battleford, Prince Albert and Saskatoon. That is a splendid beginning. We expect that further developments will take place; that the air connection which we have lost between North Battleford and Edmonton will be regained in the near future, and that as a city we shall have continuous contact with Edmonton and other points into the far north. In so far as the present government is concerned, it should be commended for the policy it has adopted and the progress it has made in air transportation not only provincially but nationally.

Mr. BROOKS: Can the hon. gentleman tell us whether this transportation in the north has been carried out by the government or by private concerns?

Mr. McINTOSH: The feeder air line service has been carried out by private companies encouraged by the non-disruptive combination policy adopted by this government.

Mr. LAWSON: It does seem a far stretch from the discussion of a national air transport service to air mail contracts prior to 1930. The remarks of the hon. member for North Battleford compel me, however, to call to the attention of the committee the fact that the service concerning which he has spoken was not an air mail service wherein and whereby planes were owned by the government or by the people of the country. What the hon. gentleman is referring to is the fact that when the Conservative government came into power in 1930, it found itself in the position of falling revenues with a depression already started, and loaded with air mail contracts made by the previous government with private corporations at fabulous prices. I cannot speak with certainty with reference to the contract to which the hon. member referred, but I can speak with certainty regarding one contract to carry mail from the city of Toronto to the city of Buffalo. The contract was so improvident—

Mr. McINTOSH: You are talking about only one contract.

Mr. LAWSON: Well, I cannot talk about more than one at a time.

Mr. McINTOSH: Evidently.

Mr. LAWSON: The hon. member was talking about only one. That contract was so improvident that it was costing the government of this country fifty cents per letter in addition to what was paid by the person who had to put stamps upon the letter. Under those circumstances, the previous government found it necessary to curtail those air mail services. It was not a question of curtailing the national development of a national airways service.

Mr. HOWE: This is all out of order. We are discussing at the moment aids to municipalities. Could we get back to the subject?

Mr. ESLING: Has the minister received any plan and proposal for a feeder landing field at the city of Nelson, which is the capital of the Kootenay country?

Mr. HOWE: It is very difficult to find a field around Nelson. We have examined the situation, but we have not given up hope; we shall look into the question further, and if there is a possibility there, we shall pursue the matter.

Mr. ESLING: This city of Nelson is an ambitious city. In order to provide a proper field it is necessary to build a river wall and to reclaim a considerable area of land. In such a case, could the city be assured of one-third of an expenditure up to the sum of $100,000, under this present policy of municipal aid?

Mr. HOWE: I think this is hardly the place to go into a large project of that kind. The building of an air field for Nelson is a half million dollar project anyway, and it requires a good deal of study. I shall be glad to take the matter up with the proper authorities at Nelson when the proper time comes.

[Mr. Lawson.]

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister give an explanation as to the amount of money that has been paid to the city of Vancouver in this connection? We understood last year that $160,000 would be paid, but I believe that amount has not yet been paid.

Mr. HOWE: We decided that an expenditure of $90,000 was sufficient to put the Vancouver airport into the shape required for our work, and we granted Vancouver that sum last year.

Mr. GREEN: Has that money all been paid?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Is any more to be paid?

Mr. HOWE: If further improvements are required, Vancouver is entitled to a further grant on the basis of the money the city has spent.

Mr. STEWART: I notice that there is an increase of $300,000 in this item over the corresponding item of last year. Has the minister any details of the directions in which he proposes to expend this increase?

Mr. HOWE: We have made a general survey of the work that we think is required, but it is hardly down to the point where we can detail it. This is a blanket vote, but we think about $800,000 will do the work which we are trying to do this year; that is as near as we can survey it.

Mr. LENNARD: Is the airport at Hamilton, Ontario, one of those under consideration to be improved under this feeder system?

Mr. HOWE: We sent a contract to Hamilton as a result of negotiations, and the good people of Hamilton are holding it unsigned, as far as I know.

Item agreed to.

Meteorological division—

Meteorological service, including allowance of $400 to L. F. Gorman, observer at Ottawa, $426,000.

Mr. LAWSON: Is the allowance some special remuneration in addition to the regular salary, or what is the purpose of it?

Mr. HOWE: It is made to a civil servant who has been doing this work for many years. He is very highly trained in it, and by arrangement with the department concerned we allow him $400 for the work.

Mr. MARSH: Does this item of $426,000 include the meteorological service that we have been getting from year to year, or does it concern the air service only?

Mr. HOWE: This is a vote for the services that we have been providing for many years. It provides the weather reports, the services to agriculture and the service to ships at sea. It covers about a thousand observation stations at various parts of Canada, the cost of wiring in information, the cost of compiling it, and the cost of wiring it out to the points where this service extends.

Mr. MARSH: And this will be available for use of the air service and can be harnessed to fit in with your needs for this work?

Mr. HOWE: Both services are run by the same organization. The director of meteorology is also the director of the weather service for the Trans-Canada. But the service that is specifically for the Trans-Canada is not included in this vote. It is included in the vote we passed two or three items earlier.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Why, on page 212 of the estimates are the amounts shown as $426,000 and $416,800, and on page 46 the totals are shown as $426,500 and $417,800? Is that a typographical error, or what accounts for the difference of a thousand dollars?

Mr. HOWE: It must be a typographical error. The proper amount is $416,800.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I do not understand that.

Mr. HOWE: It seems to be a typographical error. The correct amount is $416,800.

Mr. MASSEY: There are two other items in there.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): That is what I cannot understand.

Mr. HOWE: I have not the same book as the hon. member has. The vote for this year is $426,000. The vote last year was $416,800. Is that what my hon. friend is referring to?

Mr. DUNNING: The total of the details of this vote on page 212 is $426,000, and the total of the vote itself on page 46 is also $426,000. There is no error as far as I can see.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Quite so, but the following item of 1937-38 is $417,800, and on page 212 the figure is given as $416,800.

Mr. DUNNING: The Kingston observatory is included in the one case and not in the other. It is shown as a separate item; it is not an error at all.

Item agreed to.

Grant to Kingston observatory, $500.

Mr. MASSEY: Is this the only observatory that receives a grant, and if so, why not others?

Mr. HOWE: At the inception of the meteorological service arrangements were made with the Kingston observatory to do certain scientific work for the weather bureau, and that work has been maintained by Kingston since then. It is a very old vote, and we continue to make Kingston a grant for that service.

Mr. MASSEY: Does the Dunlap observatory make any contribution to the service at all?

Mr. HOWE: We work very closely with the university of Toronto. Practically all our advanced students are graduates of that university; our staff give courses at Toronto and we interchange equipment. Certain of our equipment is located in the university of Toronto.

Item agreed to.

Radio division—

Administration of the Radiotelegraph Act and regulations, $100,775.

Mr. LAWSON: I want a good deal of information about this.

Mr. HOWE: This is not the one the hon. member is looking for.

Mr. LAWSON: No; but I should like the minister to be good enough to make a distinction for me here. This is for administration of the Radiotelegraph Act and regulations. Item No. 395 is for suppression of local electrical interferences. When I turn to the details I find that under item No. 393 there is apparently a chief inspector and so many inspectors, and similarly in item No. 395. Does this first item relate to the cost of dealing with the inspection of stations other than individual receiving sets and interference with them, and does item No. 395 deal with interference with the individual receiving set; what is the difference between the two?

Mr. HOWE: This vote, item No. 393, is for the administration of the Radiotelegraph Act, which has to do with all matters affecting the administration of radiotelegraph, ship to shore communication, and use of wave lengths over the whole dominion. For instance, the broadcasting corporation administers everything connected with broadcasting, but it is under the Radiotelegraph Act as to the distribution of wave lengths. The administration of the allocation of wave lengths between private broadcasting, communication with airplanes, point to point radio communication, shore to ship radio communication, and radio direction finding, comes under the Radiotelegraph Act. It is the duty of this department, under this vote, to carry out the regulations and provide all inspection facilities and the technical services required to administer that act.

Mr. LAWSON: Then this item does not deal with the inspection of individual radios?

Mr. HOWE: Not at all, no.

Mr. LAWSON: Would the minister be good enough to give the reasons for the increase in this item? Is it merely statutory increases?

Mr. HOWE: Restoration of statutory deduction, $3,413; statutory increases, $1,170; sundry promotions, $930.

Mr. McLEAN (Simcoe): I intended to ask the minister a question under an item further down, but his remarks prompt me to ask it under this item. Is it the intention to broaden the regulations and requirements applying to freight ships plying on the great lakes? At present I believe the shipping act requires that ships of 5,000 tons gross or more have wireless sets and an operator on board, and even those ships may be exempted under certain conditions.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend will allow this item to pass, the item he wishes to discuss is No. 394, direction-finding stations.

Item agreed to.

Radio direction finding stations, radio beacons and radiotelegraph stations, operation and maintenance, $634,324.75.

Mr. McLEAN (Simcoe): May we expect that these regulations will be extended? Certain happenings in recent years indicate the necessity of having them extended and stiffened. Hon. members will recall that a year ago last fall a ship, the Sand Merchant, was lost on lake Erie with all on board, a crew of nineteen, under circumstances which would indicate that if there had been proper ship to shore communication those lives probably would not have been lost. Again, during the past season the Calgadoc, a ship which ordinarily plied on the great lakes, was lost with all on board somewhere in the vicinity of Newfoundland. There was no ship to shore communication and nothing was known as to what happened to the ship. Particularly in Ontario a large number of men are occupied in manning freight ships that ply on the great lakes. Under the best of circumstances their occupation is extremely hazardous. They are in a less favourable position than many other labouring men in that during their working season they are scattered on boats all over the great lakes, and after the season is over they are scattered all over the province in small groups. They have no strong organization, and so many of them are out of work and so keen to get jobs on the ships that it is difficult for them to speak for themselves with any degree of force in connection with regulations relating to safety. Under those circumstances I think the time has come when the regulations under which freight ships operate ought to be revised.

I have information from some officials of the department that experiments are being carried out in connection with telephone communication from ship to shore and that it is intended to have a conference with authorities from the United States with a view to having uniform regulations applying to Canadian and United States ships on the great lakes. I know a large number of seamen and their families in Ontario would like an assurance from the minister that the department will take up at an early date the revision of the regulations affecting the conditions under which the seamen of Ontario operate, especially on freight boats on the great lakes, in order that when these ships get into trouble, as they often do during the bad weather, these workmen may have some chance to preserve their lives.

Mr. HOWE: We are giving constant study to that problem. A year ago last autumn we put into force for the first time a provision for compulsory wireless operators on freighters of 5,000 tons and over. Since then we have been trying to solve the problem of the smaller ships, and I think we have arrived at a satisfactory solution. We have established radiotelephone receiving equipment at our principal ship to shore stations along the great lakes, and have made arrangements whereby a telephone instrument can be installed on the ship by which connection can be made to the nearest ship to shore station, and then with automatic connection over the Bell telephone system to any point we wish. A great many companies have installed these sets voluntarily. The cost is about $500 per season. This overcomes the great difficulty of requiring wireless operators on ships, which meant considerable cost. The expense of a wireless installation and an operator was a considerable item for a freighter carrying a small operating crew. One difficulty we have is to get uniform regulations with the United States. The business on the great lakes is highly competitive, and we have always kept our regulations a little more stringent than those of the United States. We are having conversations at present which we hope will lead to the adoption of standard rules, which will enable us to make sure that freighters, down to a very small size, are required at all times to have communication with the shore.

Mr. MASSEY: Would the minister be good enough to explain the activities to be carried forward under this item, in relation to those to be carried forward under item No. 388?

Mr. HOWE: Item No. 388 covers simply the radio beams for the airways. These are the ship to shore direction finding stations that we have all along our coasts. This service is one of the principal aids to navigation to-day. We have the shore direction finding stations; radio beacons; radiotelegraph stations, which go up into the arctic, along the great lakes and on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. It is an extensive service which has been built up over a series of years.

Item agreed to.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Post offices, including salaries and other expenses of headquarters and staff post offices and supplies and equipment for revenue post offices, $14,624,470.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is this the item that was under discussion last Friday evening?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Acting Postmaster General): It is.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have not very much more to ask the acting Postmaster General, and perhaps he can tell me what I want to know. On Friday evening the acting minister gave some figures in connection with the new post office station "L" on St. Clair avenue west in Toronto, and also some figures in connection with the old station "L." At that time he made the statement that the cost per foot of space in the new post office was seventy-eight cents. As a matter of fact it is 78·8 cents, almost seventy-nine cents. During the same evening I made the statement that the Post Office Department could have had an additional 720 square feet in the old post office. The acting minister gave the figures of the architect, showing that the ground floor space in the former post office was 3,775 feet and the basement space 1,880 feet, or a total of 5,655 feet. The department could have had an additional 720 square feet on the ground floor, with the same space in the basement, which would have given a total space of 6,460 square feet. I believe the department has on file a letter from the owners of the former post office building indicating that the department could have had the additional space for an additional $50 a month or $600 a year, which would have made the rental for the old building $5,400 plus $600, or a total of $6,000, which is equivalent to eighty cents a square foot.

So apparently the department went to all that trouble and inconvenienced thousands of people for about 1·2 cents per foot under what they were paying before. I know the minister is a business man; I have every reason to believe that he has been successful, and what I should like to ask him is this: Would he have liked any private person, let alone a government, to treat him as the Post Office Department treated the owner of that building? I am sure he would not. I think it was a shocking exhibition. I cannot find language to describe the sort of treatment that was accorded the owner of that property.

An hon. MEMBER: Shabby.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall not use that word. I like to use nice, genteel words, particularly to the acting minister. He is a business man, and business men do not usually treat other business men in a shabby manner, so I shall not use that word in talking to the hon. gentleman. But I repeat that I do not believe there is a business man in this country, unless he did it for some very, very strange reasons which he would not like to disclose, who would treat another business man as this government treated the owner of that property. The building was constructed in accordance with plans which, if not prepared by the department, were o.-k.'d by the government when the present administration was in power previously. It will cost the owner a large sum of money to change that splendid building from use as a post office to use as anything else. The main door is in the centre of the building. It will have to be pulled down and the whole front wall pulled out in order to reconstruct the building for other commercial use, and I believe that is being done now.

The acting minister should tell the committee why this outrageous treatment was meted out to a Canadian citizen. The minister would not do it. I would not do it. Why did the department do it? It certainly was not to gain a few additional feet of space because, according to the figures I have quoted, they could have had a total of 7,460 square feet in the old building, and according to their own figures they went into a place where they have only 8,671 feet, so that is a mere bagatelle larger. In addition they went into a building that has only two outside walls, back and front, whereas the building they left had three outside walls. There must have been some other reason behind the action taken than the desire for a little more space. I also understand that a petition was circulated. I did not see it; it was taken around while I was in the old country, but I believe the petition was signed by the large majority of the merchants in that community. I am further sure that if they had gone to the residents of that community whose children did go to the old station "L" on St. Clair avenue, west of Oakwood avenue, they would have found the citizens of the community would have signed a petition against moving it. Certainly there is little excuse for changing the post office from west to east of Oakwood avenue.

Mr. EULER: In reply I can only reiterate what I said the other evening when these estimates were under consideration, except perhaps to add that there seems to have been a difference, not of opinion, but as to certain facts. I said the other evening that under the old contract we were paying for the former building at the rate of ninety-five cents per square foot, and that the new contract is at the rate of seventy-eight cents.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is 78·8.

Mr. EULER: Make it seventy-nine, and be generous about it. Then, much to my surprise, the hon. member said that the additional space had been offered free by the owner of the former building.

Mr. MacNICOL: To-night I said $50 a month.

Mr. EULER: To-night he has corrected it to the extent of saying that the proprietor asked an additional $50 a month. That was an important point in my mind, and I had inquiries made. The result is that I find there is nothing whatsoever in the department which offers the space either free or at any definite figure. That being the case, I simply have to assume that if he offered the additional space, and did not indicate the figure of $50, it would be offered at the same rate we were paying, namely ninety-five cents per square foot. Under those circumstances we were getting new premises at the rate of seventy-eight cents per square foot. The fact that we obtained a very large additional space of 3,016 feet, which gave us 8,671 feet in the new premises, as compared with 5,655 in the old; the fact that the department needed more space at that point, and the additional fact that we were getting it at seventy-eight cents instead of ninety-five cents per square foot, would seem to be sufficient reason for making the change. I am afraid I can add nothing further.

Mr. MacNICOL: I quite appreciate that had the acting minister been the Postmaster General, he would have done as any other business man would have done, namely, have inquired if the owner of the building had more space available. Had the Postmaster General looked up the correspondence which took place when the former Conservative government was in office, he would have found on file letters from the owner offering an additional store space, 18 by 40 feet, or 720 square feet. As I said before, it was only a night or two before I went away that I heard of the proposed change. At that time the owner came to see me to find out if I knew anything about it. I said I did not, but I would telephone the Minister of Public Works. I believe I wired him and, following that, wrote him, to get the information.

Apparently at that time no contract had been signed. I understood from the owner at that time that sooner than lose the government as a tenant—because, paying regularly, the government is a good tenant—he would include the store with the post office at the same money. I took the trouble on Saturday morning last to write to Toronto to find out if I was right in making that statement. I received a letter back from the owner telling me that he would have asked $50 more.

Mr. EULER: He would have?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes.

Mr. EULER: But did he? Did he actually make that offer?

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not know. Did the government ask him if they could have more space?

Mr. FACTOR: Does he own the property which the hon. member says he offered to rent to the government?

Mr. MacNICOL: The government has been his tenant for ten years, since the building was built under the direction of the former Liberal government.

Mr. FACTOR: Extra space?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes. I am sure the hon. member for Spadina knows the building well; I refer to the one at the corner of Appleton and St. Clair avenues. The former post office faces on St. Clair avenue. It is on the northeast corner. Then, east of the main entrance, in the same building, is a store. I know that the former government, while in office, was offered the whole building, and I am surprised to hear the acting minister say that no inquiry was made of the owner as to whether or not they could have more space.

Mr. EULER: I did not say that.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear that. Did the government inquire?

Mr. EULER: I do not know.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do the officials know?

Mr. FACTOR: May I interrupt the hon. member to tell him that the owner's solicitor had seen me, and had told me that the owner of the old post office had no further space to give to the government.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, but I know the hon. member for Trinity—I mean Spadina—knows as well as I do—

Mr. FACTOR: I am not the member for Trinity.

Mr. MacNICOL: He knows as well as I do that it is one building. In the first place the government rented part of the building, and they left the store on the right side of the front door. The hon. member for Trinity knows that well, because he lives out there.

Mr. FACTOR: I am not the member for Trinity.

Mr. MacNICOL: For Spadina, then.

Mr. EULER: I do not know that much is to be gained by continuing this discussion. I am sure the hon. member will accept my answer when I say that I have asked for all the correspondence there is in the matter and it discloses that there is nothing in the department to indicate that the owner of the first property ever offered the property either for the additional amount of $50 a month, or free. The hon. member now admits that it was not offered free. I would say this without attempting—to use a vulgar term—to pass the buck, if there were any necessity to secure a new space it would not be the Post Office Department that would enter into negotiations; it would be the Department of Public Works. But I would still say that in the final analysis the department required more space, and that it received more space at a less price per foot than we were paying before. That is my final answer.

Mr. MacNICOL: I cannot let the acting minister get away with the statement that he received more space at a less price per foot, basing his statement on his figures of a few moments ago, namely 78.8 cents and ninety-five cents. As I have said, with the additional part the department could have had, the price then would have been eighty cents per foot, or 1.2 cents more per foot.

Mr. EULER: I have no knowledge that that was ever offered to the department. I do not question the hon. member's word when he says he had a conversation with the owner, and that he was told that an offer had been made at $50 a month extra. But so far as I know, the department has no knowledge of that offer, and I think it would be fair to assume that if he wanted to rent us more space, naturally he would be asking the same rate per square foot as he received for the space we already had.

Mr. MacNICOL: The acting minister would not treat anybody like that. He is too square a man to treat anybody like that—after having a tenant for ten years to just—

Mr. EULER: Did the hon. member say I was a squarehead or a square man?

Mr. MacNICOL: I said "a square man." I would not say anything unkind about the minister.

Mr. EULER: I am sure the hon. member would not.

Mr. MacNICOL: But I would not treat anybody like that, and the minister would not, either. I have quite a number of tenants, and certainly I would not expect to be treated like that by a tenant, nor would I treat a tenant in that way. I say this is one of the shabbiest transactions between the government as a tenant and the owner of a building I have ever come in contact with, and I do not believe for a moment that more space is all that was behind this.

Mr. HEAPS: From what I have heard of this discussion I would not be surprised if there was a nigger somewhere in the woodpile.

Mr. MacNICOL: Half a dozen.

Mr. HEAPS: I was thinking of only one. If that nigger could be discovered, I think we would find written across him the word "patronage."

Mr. LAWSON: In whitewash.

Mr. HEAPS: I think something should be said about patronage while we are discussing this particular vote. I am very much opposed to patronage and I think the less hon. members have to do with it, the better it would be for them, the better for the House of Commons and the better for the country as a whole.

Mr. DUNNING: And for the ministers.

Mr. HEAPS: And for the ministers. I cannot understand why hon. members should be so anxious to have patronage bestowed upon them. Some hon. members may say that I am not on the government side and do not realize the pressure to which they are subjected; they may say that I am freer to speak than they; but there have been one or two occasions when a little patronage has been offered to me and I was happy to have nothing to do with it. I do not think patronage brings any friends to a member. I think the member who tries to dispense patronage to his constituents or to his friends ultimately makes more enemies than friends.

Patronage has a demoralizing effect upon the public life of the country and I for one would like to see it absolutely abolished. I know the minister will realize that I am not speaking in a personal way. I do not know of any minister who has been more anxious to do away with the evils of patronage than the minister who is taking charge to-night of the estimates of the Post Office Department. For years, whenever a change in government occurred, whether from Liberal to Conservative or Conservative to Liberal, the question of patronage in the Post Office Department has always come up. I remember in 1930 and 1931 when there was a great outcry from members of the Liberal party about the many changes made in the postal service. I quite agreed with them that those changes were entirely unjustified and were not in the interests of the Post Office Department.

There is one particular form of patronage to which I desire to direct the attention of the minister at this particular time. I do not believe the minister or the officials of the department can give efficient and sound administration so long as patronage is handed out by hon. members to their constituents or friends. I am informed that in the post offices in the principal cities certain persons are permitted to sell stamps to the public. I am told that these people get this privilege through patronage. I cannot understand why private individuals should be permitted to come into a public institution to sell stamps. The stamps are sold to these private concerns, as they might be termed, and they in turn sell them to the public at a slight profit. I am informed further that the stamps purchased by the government, stamps produced by the government, are purchased through these contractors who make a certain profit on the sale. To me that is almost unbelievable.

Has the minister any information in that regard? I have been told that this condition exists in most of the large cities. Why should a private concern be permitted to sell government stamps in a government building? If this condition does exist, I should like to know if the minister intends to take immediate steps to see that it is ended. The government should sell its own stamps in its own buildings.

Mr. SPENCE: I happen to know the owner of the old post office referred to by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). The man was in the same business in which I was engaged for many years. I consider that the action taken was one of the most unscrupulous things a government could do. The acting minister may not be able to give a full answer, and I do not think we would expect him to. This building was built by Mr. Calderone at the suggestion of the Post Office Department in Ottawa at a considerable cost to suit their purposes. The change was not made by this government in order to save money; it was made to help some friends of my hon. friends who had two stores on the other side of the street a little further down which could not be rented at a reasonable price. Calderone had no opportunity to offer the government extra space. When we were in power he told us that he would increase the space if necessary and at that time we took a lease for three years.

I do not think any minister can rise in his place and defend the Post Office Department for the action taken in this particular case. This post office was built to the order of the department. I say that because the architect of the department in Toronto knew all about the specifications and plans. As the hon. member for Davenport has said, extra space could have been obtained at a cost no greater than what is being paid to-day. Even if the cost were greater, this government should have done the decent thing. It makes no difference to me personally as I am no longer engaged in the food business, but I like to see everyone get a square deal.

I am not so down on patronage as my hon. friend to my left, but I believe the benefit of the doubt should be given when it does not cost any more. In this particular case it was a matter of helping friends of my hon. friends who had two stores that they wanted to rent and could not. Calderone will have to tear out the whole front of his store at a probable cost of $4,000 to $5,000 to make it suitable for business purposes. To my mind, the action taken was a most unscrupulous thing for a government to do.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister explain the manner of engaging help in the cities for the Christmas rush? At the last session it was suggested to the Postmaster General that soldiers engaged at Christmas should be engaged through the veterans' assistance commission. As the minister knows, honorary committees were set up in many cities under this commission for the purpose of trying to get work for unemployed veterans. As I say, we suggested last session that all soldier help should be obtained through these committees. Despite this suggestion and a tentative promise by the Postmaster General, very few if any of the soldiers engaged in Vancouver were engaged through the honorary committee there. I believe all appointments were made through the Liberal association. This is most unfair to the unemployed veterans and to these local committees under the veterans' assistance commission. The members of these committees serve without remuneration of any kind, and I suggest to the acting minister that the practice of which I complain should not be followed during the coming Christmas season. The department should go to these honorary committees and get the names of unemployed veterans, and there should be no interference at all by political organizations.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend inquires as to how the appointments are made for the Christmas business. I can speak from personal experience in my own riding, and I take it that the same thing is followed pretty well throughout. First of all, there is an eligible list which the civil service commission has, and which, as the hon. gentleman knows, is made up largely of returned men. In any particular post office where extra help is required, this list is drawn upon and when it is exhausted other sources must be found. In my own case, which I believe applies in probably all other cities—and I know of no such committee as my hon. friend speaks of; at any rate it did not exist in my own district—the practice that has been followed has been usually to apply to the soldier organizations to suggest others to supplement the eligible list when it has been exhausted. In some instances perhaps a few other men may be added. Perhaps I may be criticized for what I am about to say, but I for one would not say that absolutely in every instance a returned man must be chosen. The great majority of them are, of course, returned men, but it is quite possible that a man with a large family who has been out of work for some time might be taken on. There may be instances where such men with large families are given jobs, one or two or three of them, and that would be justifiable. Otherwise the practice, as I have stated it, applies pretty well throughout the country.

Mr. GREEN: I am not complaining about some of the men engaged being civilians, but there are fifteen or twenty cities in which this government has set up honorary committees to try to find work for unemployed returned men, and in Vancouver there were over five thousand returned men registered with the local committee. We understood that the post office, in getting soldiers for employment at Christmas time, would go to that committee instead of obtaining the men through political sources. It is a bad principle to force men under these conditions to get political approval, and I would ask that the practice be changed during the next Christmas period.

Mr. HANSELL: I wish to call the attention of the minister to a matter of some importance, and that is with reference to the hours in which the smaller post offices are open. About a year ago I believe the rule was changed. Some of the post offices had been allowed to close for half a day a week, and the rule was changed compelling them to remain open six days in the week. That new rule is working some little hardship on the small post offices, because I believe they are kept open for that extra time at the expense of the postmaster, and in many instances they are not rendering sufficient public service to warrant their being kept open for the full six days. There are some small towns that have a sort of civic half holiday once a week. These smaller towns are situated in farming communities and the post office might as well remain closed on these half holidays. I was talking to a postmaster on one occasion, and he told me that he remained open one Wednesday afternoon when all the stores in the town were closed and that he did busines to the extent of selling a three-cent postage stamp. This nevertheless necessitated his turning on electric lights about four o'clock in the afternoon, burning extra coal and incurring other expense. I would ask the minister, if that arrangement is to be continued, to leave it more or less in the hands of the inspectors and make the rule elastic enough to permit the post office to close for that particular afternoon if the officials so advise.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend could not have been here the other evening when we discussed this same question. I have a good deal of sympathy with what he says. On that occasion I told the committee that the district inspector, in cases such as the hon.

gentleman has mentioned, has authority to permit the closing of the office for certain periods.

Mr. LENNARD: With reference to the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South in connection with extra help employed in the post office in Hamilton, there were 228 men employed, and the postal authorities there were instructed, before the men were hired, to employ veterans up to the number of fifty only. These names were to be obtained from the different veterans' organizations in that city, but the number was limited to fifty. It was not a question of how many veterans were out of work in that period. The names of the other 178 extra employees were obtained from another source, a political source.

With regard to the question discussed by the hon. member for Macleod, the position of sub-post offices, I may say that there are certain sub-post offices on the outskirts of Hamilton where, before these areas were taken into the city, the postmasters received seventy per cent of the sales. Now they receive only two per cent. In several of them the postmasters receive between $15 and $20 a month, and in addition to the great reduction in their remuneration they have been forced in the past two years to remain open on holidays. Not being on regular salary, they are not entitled to any superannuation, and I suggest that their case is one that the department should consider very carefully. It should make some improvement in the remuneration given them.

Mr. EULER: What sort of post offices is the hon. gentleman referring to?

Mr. LENNARD: I am referring to the sub-post offices on the outskirts of Hamilton. Before that area was taken in, the postmasters received seventy per cent of the sales, and now they get only two per cent. Another thing I do not consider fair is that there is no parcel delivery, the parcels being all handled through the post office. They have all the heavy work they had before and the same hours.

Mr. EULER: They would not have the same work in regard to first-class mails; they would have a letter-carrier service.

Mr. LENNARD: There is that difference of course, but they have to keep the same establishment for a longer period than before.

Mr. COLDWELL: With regard to the question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), the acting minister may not know of political patronage exercised in the Post Office Department; but from what we hear from time to time, Liberal committees at the present time have a good deal to do with post office appointments. Moreover, in constituencies represented by opposition members it is commonly stated—I said this in the house last year—that the defeated candidates are consulted from time to time regarding post office and other government services in those constituencies. I notice that, according to the press, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) has asked to have placed under the civil service commission another group of employees in his department. I assume he realizes that political patronage, whenever or by whom exercised, is an evil.

I am asking the acting Postmaster General if it be not possible that in that department the groups of permanent officials now not within the purview of the civil service commission be placed under that commission; and with regard to post office appointments in the smaller communities and the provision of post offices, they also should be removed from any semblance of political patronage. I notice that one hon. member shakes his head. Well, in my constituency there is at least one post office located in a building which is a disgrace to Canada. Ever since I have been here I have taken up, as I believe my predecessor also did, this matter with the government, but somehow no improvement has been made. I refer to the Pike Lake post office in the province of Saskatchewan. I have visited it. It is a tiny shack, built of cardboard and lumber, and because of the condition of the building there is a smell of dampness and unpleasantness; yet it is situate at quite a popular summer resort. Patrons have petitioned and protested but nothing has been done. What influence retains a service of this description I do not know. I am not blaming the person who is looking after it, because the amount of revenue is small, but I say that other and better buildings in the neighbourhood should be used. I am not thinking of any political appointment. There are in that community Liberals, Conservatives and my own supporters, some of whom, of all parties, could provide accommodation of a better type. But whenever one speaks of these matters, one is told that the person to consult is the defeated candidate rather than the member.

That kind of political patronage is an evil which saps at the very root of efficiency in public service, and the sooner we get down to a business basis in connection with our government services, the sooner this parliament will be more respected than it is to-day. I believe that one of the factors which are undermining the democratic institutions of this country is the widespread use of political patronage, both provincially and federally; and the sooner we can get away from it—and the Post Office Department is a department where every effort should be made to clean out patronage—the better off Canada will be.

Mr. EULER: The hon. member speaks of a post office building which is quite unfit for occupation. The information I have is that the revenues are $65 a year. We pay the postmaster $100. So, if we want to regard the matter from the point of view of revenue, we can hardly afford a much better building than the one now in use. However, I am free to say that, whether or not the revenues are quite sufficient, every post office building should at least be a credit and should not warrant the description that has been given of the one to which the hon. member refers. I shall be glad to have an investigation made with regard to it.

The hon. member said something more, regarding patronage in the Post Office Department, that all these positions should be placed under the civil service commission. I believe that theoretically I would be inclined to agree with him; but when I point out to him that during the Christmas rush we employed from Halifax to Vancouver some 7,400 extra men for perhaps only a few days, I think he will admit that that is hardly an occasion for action by the civil service commission.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not mean that.

Mr. EULER: He also made reference to what has been done in the Department of National Revenue. As it happens, that department is merely regularizing by statute a practice which it has been observing for a long time.

Mr. COLDWELL: A good practice.

Mr. EULER: These appointments have been made for some years by the civil service commission, and will continue to be made in that way.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): What was the total cost of the transfer of the business from St. Clair and Appleton avenues to a new location east of Oakwood avenue—the post office which, I think, was referred to a short time ago? I wish to know the total costs of all kinds, including painting and general expenses; also the terms of the lease of the old building which was vacated, the amount per annum paid on that lease, and the total amount per annum that is paid for the new quarters. I understand that both of them are rental propositions. Also, what is the length of the lease of the new premises; what was the remaining duration of the old lease, and why was the change made. I know the building fairly well, and it seems to me that the old place was well located, well established, giving good service, and doing all that could be expected. It is rumoured that this is another case of patronage. I do not wish to have too much of this patronage going on all the time in the Post Office Department.

In my own district, when I made an inquiry last year about the employment of the temporary staff of the Toronto post office, I discovered upon getting the names and addresses that people were hired from all parts of the country, not in Toronto at all. I support the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), that the Post Office Department should rid itself of this terrible condition of patronage. Last year I made inquiries about a change of a sub-post office in my district, and I was informed that the reason was that the defeated Liberal member had the first say in placing or changing the site of that sub-post office. I was surprised to hear that. I did not think patronage dug as deep as that. As an innocent newcomer I was surprised. However, we learn as we go along. Perhaps the acting Postmaster General (Mr. Euler) will give the information.

Mr. EULER: The cost of the removal was $481. Leases were for five years respectively. The former space was 5,655 square feet, costing $5,400 per annum; the present space is 8,671 square feet, costing $6,840, and would have cost at the same rate as we paid for the other space, $8,280 per annum.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why does the minister keep saying what it would have cost, when the department made no inquiry? I might just as well say that if I had bought a certain suit, it would have cost me $125; but I did not buy it; I got one for $25. That is no argument at all.

Mr. EULER: If I paid $80 for one suit and wanted to buy another I would assume I would pay $80.

Mr. MacNICOL: This is not a question of suits; it is something else altogether, namely that the government was offered 7,460 square feet, and the acting Postmaster General says the department did not inquire—

Mr. EULER: I did not say that.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understood the minister to say the department did not inquire from the owner whether they could have more space.

Mr. EULER: No; I did not say that; I said I did not know. But I am informed that they did not.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have said that more space was offered to the former government when the lease was up for renewal, and I say now that had the government inquired as to whether they could have more space, they could have had another 1,440 feet and the cost would then have been eighty cents a foot and not ninety-five cents. At 1·2 cents a foot it will take a long time to save the $480 that the government spent in moving from one place to the other. In my humble judgment this shows very poor business methods.

Mr. BETTS: I wish to add my protest to what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) as to the manner in which temporary help is employed at Christmas time in my riding. In London there is an honorary committee of the veterans' assistance commission, composed of eight or nine very busy men who have given a great deal of extremely unselfish and excellent work in classifying the returned soldiers in London and establishing a register of unemployed veterans. There is a paid permanent secretary, the only member of the committee who is paid, who is on duty there all the time. That is certainly the best body for selecting temporary help from amongst the veterans, and it should be used. It would be an encouragement to these men who are giving their services to help the returned soldiers and be far more satisfactory to the returned soldier than the present practice of forcing him to trot around to the defeated candidate or the Liberal committee and have his application o.-k.'d. That is manifestly unfair and improper. If the postal department cannot cooperate with the Department of Pensions and National Health by allowing this work to be done by these honorary committees of the veterans' assistance commission where they exist, it is a sad state of affairs.

Mr. STEWART: I wish to supplement the remarks of other hon. members who have spoken as to the existence of political patronage in the administration of the Post Office Department. I speak of what I know in the constituency I represent. A change has come over conditions there; I think that for a considerable time until recently the administration was not of that nature. I find that rural mail routes are changed without any cause, that a post office is moved from a store where it was well established for years and taken a mile or two down to a farm house, to the inconvenience of the patrons of that office. I find a temporary appointment made where a permanent appointment ought to be made, and returned soldiers passed over. I find that as election time draws near these people are approached, canvassed, induced and persuaded, and then if the right result is not obtained, after the election they are punished. I do not think the minister or the officials can be aware of what is going on, of the existence of these conditions; but what I am saying here I have said outside this house and I propose to say it outside the house again at the right time. What I am asking to-night is that when recommendations come along, they be carefully investigated and full information obtained, and that these changes be made on the basis of public service rather than petty political patronage.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

END OF VOLUME I.
