The amendments quite clearly take the lead from the United States because the cellular radio technology is shared equally by Canada and the United States and indeed by most developed countries. In the United States they have recognized that this is a problem. They have recognized that most individuals who have cellular telephones do not think of them as radios. We have heard that time and time again in the debate on report stage today. That is exactly what it is. It is a radio. It is different from a hard-line phone where individuals can only listen in if they break the law and wire-tap or eavesdrop through electronic means.

Because of the advent of cellular technology, today almost everybody in business has a cellular telephone. Almost everybody who is a professional has a cellular telephone.

A few years ago everybody had a beeper. It is just about as inexpensive today to have a telephone as it is to have a beeper. People who used the old radio phones with the whips on the backs recognized that there was a problem. Most of them were used on construction sites and places like that and people realized that their transmissions could be picked up.

Because of the type of marketing that has been employed to sell cellular technology with its cheap price and availability, people think it is just like a hard-wired telephone. They are not as careful as they should be about their conversations.

Many instances of interceptions, some even dealing with the Royal Family have been reported. Some have involved ministers in British Columbia where private conversations were picked up on scanners. Once they were picked up they were related to the media and caused a great deal of embarrassment. It is almost as if the mind police are there. No matter what you say somewhere somebody may be listening.

There are a number of things we can do. Although it is probably not practicable in the short term, we should try to communicate to the hundreds of thousands of individuals who have cellular telephones in their cars, pockets, briefcases or at home that they are radios and their transmissions can be picked up. They should therefore be very careful.

It is not in the interest of those individuals who sell cellular technology to tell their potential customers to be careful. The reason people buy cellular technology is to make it easier to communicate. If they are told it is easier to communicate but everybody can hear them maybe it would not be as easy to sell the product.

The amendments put forward by my colleague for Mount Royal and seconded by my colleague for Cape Breton—The Sydneys simply say to just hold it now. Maybe we are using too big a stick at this point to solve the problem because we are dealing with stealing private conversations. We should put it in the context of theft. We are imposing on people's privacy in their private conversations. One of the things we proposed in the amendment is that instead of saying we are going to make it illegal and once it is illegal that will compel people not to do it, we will deal with the technology. What we are dealing with here are scanners, some of which are capable of picking up the band waves on which cellular phones are being used. If we want to get at the problem should we not first indicate clearly in law that the manufacture, importation, distribution and sale of those types of pieces of equipment are illegal, that one cannot do it?

It seems to me not to deal with that problem first will mean that we basically have a law on the books which is not enforceable. What are we going to have? Are we going to have the cellular police? How many people is the government going to have? Will there be a policeman in the back seat of everybody's car monitoring to see if there is some static on the line or will there be somebody in everybody's basement that has a scanner in their living-room? How in the name of goodness does this bill put forward a reasonable solution to the problem?

We do not have 10 scanners or 100 scanners. There are tens of thousands of scanners out there and tens of thousands of scanners on the shelves in Radio Shack and other places that have the capability to pick up those bands on which cellular conversations take place. It seems to me that the first thing we should do is make sure that those pieces of equipment are not available in the marketplace and that we make the distribution, sale or ownership illegal.

I think if we do that, we will find that we are not putting the cart before the horse; we are putting the horse before the cart. The government for some reason has not chosen to do that.

I really do get concerned. In a political science class, I think it was at Prince Andrew High School about three years ago during the abortion debate when we were talking about the various proposals that were put forward, they asked the question is a law that is unenforceable really a law. If law makers pass laws knowing that they cannot be enforced, have the law makers not been negligent? Do we simply wash our hands, saying we have dealt with the issue knowing that the solution that has been proposed is not enforceable? I think we do a great disservice to the Canadian public when we take that type of approach. I think we do a great disservice.

I have heard no compelling evidence from anybody that the solution proposed in this bill is actually workable. I cannot figure out for the life of me how just by making the use of these things illegal and putting them under the Criminal Code and all of a sudden having some enforcement in some way will make people comply with it up front.

Indeed if we look at what they have done in the United States at the Federal Communications Commission there are pieces of legislation going forward prohibiting marketing radio scanners capable of intercepting cellular phone conversations. They have decided the way that one deals with this problem is to nip it in the bud. You make sure there is not a problem by making sure that these types of equipment cannot be purchased, imported, sold or owned, rather than just saying: "Everybody can have it but we are just going to make it illegal".

It is like saying to everybody: "You can all have a gun, but it is illegal if you put bullets in it and we are going to have people going around to make sure you do not have bullets in your gun". It is the same type of thing. Maybe if we have a problem with bullets and guns we should deal with the guns first.

I support the amendment that has been put forward by my colleague from Mount Royal. I think she makes eminent good sense. She normally does when she speaks in this House. I dare say that there is no one in this House, probably including the minister—yes, including the minister—that is as knowledgeable in the field or has worked as hard in her official capacity as the communications critic, as does the member. She does not put things forward just to be divisive or to cause debate. She puts them forward to try to better the legislation.

I would have thought by this point in time that the members opposite would have recognized that and seen the pearls of wisdom that she does put forward on pieces of legislation like this and would have accepted it.

In conclusion, it is not just the Liberal Party that is saying that perhaps the government is putting the cart before the horse and is proposing solutions that may not work. Indeed the commissioner himself indicated very clearly at the committee hearings that he would have preferred that technical means be found to deal with cellular privacy rather than using that big blunt instrument of the Criminal Code and we in this party concur.

As a result, we agree fully with the suggestions of the privacy commissioner that we have to try to find technical solutions to this problem first before using the heavy hand of the Criminal Code and the jail system which is already under great strains to deal with what otherwise might a problem more easily arrived at by adopting the amendments to clause 24 on page 23.

• (1355)

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I do agree with the hon. member for Mount Royal on one thing. It is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to define how many scanners are in Canada.

She was quite correct when she said that the figure of 900,000 scanners was bandied about several times during the committee hearings. It seems to me that what she was saying lends itself to what the government is trying to do. Because it is impossible to just state what exactly is or is not a scanner or what is or is not capable of picking up cellular conversations, it is better to do what the government is doing. We will make it illegal if one is the kind of individual who wants to sell other people's conversations.

I think the proposal suggested by the Liberal Party is completely unworkable. The Liberals want to ban any device capable of picking up a cellular telephone conversation. UHF receivers, including tens of thousands of older televisions, are capable of picking up these conversations. Many ordinary radios are capable of picking up those conversations. Much of the sophisticated equipment used anywhere from airports to businesses is capable of or can be adapted to picking it up. That is why the so-called solution of the Liberal Party, supported by the New Democratic Party, just cannot work. It cannot work and they know it cannot work.

That is the part of the argument by the member for Mount Royal with which I completely agree. Yes, she is right, I do not know whether there are 500,000 or 900,000 or 20,000. However, we are trying to get at what we think is wrong. We are getting at the electronic eavesdroppers. I am surprised that the hon. members would find that so offensive.

They suggest that we have to keep looking for a technological solution. They say that if one does not like people overhearing one's conversation then get a better encrypter or put in a more sophisticated encrypter. I can say with respect to that we are losing the war in electronics. The electronics are always going to be ahead of us. I think we are being short-sighted. We are doing ourselves a disfavour by not supporting the amendments that we have here because privacy affects all of us.

I suggest to the hon. member for Chambly that he should not be so worried about the businesses that want to listen in on their employees' conversations. They will be able to look after their own interests, I am quite certain. It is not necessary for him to take up their cause. They will do just fine.

The other individuals in the Liberal Party say: "Just get a technological solution". We are losing the war to the computer. Our privacy is being threatened every day. We heard evidence on that. We have less and less protection. That is why the government says: "If you are in the business of being a peeping Tom with respect to this sort of thing, if you are a professional snoop, if you are in the business of selling other people's conversations, then you are the kind of person who we do not like". These are the kind of people who are affected by legislation such as this. I say not to buy the argument that somehow we will just stay one step ahead of the computers and the technology. We have been losing that battle for a long time.

There are people in the United States now who, contrary to the suggestion that we should be looking at what they are doing, are looking at the route that we have taken on this because they realize that this is a threat to the privacy of their citizens as well. It is one that I believe commends itself to the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 4 standing in the name of the hon. member for Mount Royal.

• (1400)

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 7. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

[Translation]

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of the bill now before the House.

Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, it is the wish of the government to defer the divisions to the same time as the deffered divisions of last Friday will be held.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the parliamentary secretary to the leader of the government is asking me to defer the divisions to a later date. Consequently, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a) the taking of the divisions on the question now before the House is deffered until tomorrow at 6 p.m., when the bells will sound for not more than 15 minutes.

It being two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

NATIONAL ACTION COMMITTEE ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming—French River): Mr. Speaker, on Friday I raised questions in the House concerning the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and President Judy Rebick's selection of the lobby group's new president.

I raised the issue because surely there is a Canadian woman from Newfoundland to Yukon who could lead NAC. There are many Canadians who would like answers from Ms. Rebick on her exclusive manners. There are many taxpayers who would like to know where their tax money is going.

Beyond this, I find it highly insulting that Ms. Rebick would hide in the shadows of political correctness and not answer to the concern many Canadian women have: Who is representing them?

To throw labels and insults at people is not responsible. To ask about a person's work status in Canada when she is in our country only on a student visa is a legitimate question.

I maintain that Canadian women's concerns and interests are best represented by a Canadian, a citizen who has lived here and understands the issues facing our country's women.

Even more important than this, Canadian women should be given an opportunity to choose who will represent them.

CROATIA

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I recently spent one week in Croatia and my visits to those Canadians involved in the situation, be it through the International Red Cross, refugee camps, the civilian police, the military or the European Community monitoring mission, revealed that all are conducting themselves admirably. All Canadians should be proud and supportive.

Our Armed Forces personnel, in their own words, are well trained and well equipped and, in the words of others, they are well respected. There is imminent danger, even death, but Canadians are prepared to do what is necessary.

They do wonder if the people back home are aware of the gravity of the situation. They wonder why there is not more debate in the House. They wonder why there has been no official political delegation to see first hand the situation. They wonder why the deluge of mail at Christmas has been followed by months of little correspondence.

Let us support these people who are performing most difficult tasks in an unspeakable environment.

CLAM FISHERY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the minister of fisheries and the department officials in Ottawa, Moncton, Antigonish and Halifax for responding to the needs of the residents along the Northumberland Strait and the Five Island shore who had expressed their concerns about the future of the clam fishery on both shores.

The minister and the officials addressed the situation in a timely and appropriate manner which appears will resolve the concerns of the people involved. Under the new regulations recently announced DFO officials are now able to take the necessary action to protect the clam beds and conserve the resource for future generations.

DFO officials in Moncton, Antigonish and Halifax have taken a key interest in this issue and have met with the clam fishermen involved to hear their concerns and listen to their advice.

• (1405)

The quick action taken by the department has resulted in the defusing of a very controversial subject in my area and has gone a long way toward conserving the resource. I would like to thank the minister and his officials involved for their co-operation and assistance.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the matter of peacekeeping, which is of growing importance and concern to many Canadians.

We are among the best in the world when it comes to this task, with some 4,500 Canadian peacekeepers stationed around the globe. However it is dangerous and the results are often frightening. This past Saturday in the former Yugoslavia two Canadian soldiers were injured when their armoured personnel carrier hit an anti-tank mine.

Canada has never refused an invitation to join a mission. Right now we can meet our current duties but we do not have the resources to join new peacekeeping efforts. Not surprisingly, the government has no plan for Canada and its peacekeeping role. This lack of planning will result in more accidents, more wounded and sometimes more killed.

More often in the new world of peacemaking our troops have been sent in to what can only be called hot spots. More often we are asking our forces to risk their lives during these operations.

Is it too much to ask this government to make a commitment to our forces by creating a solid Canadian policy on peacekeeping? I should say not.

NATIONAL CONSUMER WEEK

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, National Consumer Week starts today. With its theme It's Everybody's Business, it focuses on raising public awareness of issues affecting consumers and the marketplace.

The government is repeating last year's theme because it is convinced that all economic partners in this country should be consulted on measures dealing with consumer issues. All groups in our society must take an active part in these consultations.

The theme focuses on generating public interest in marketplace issues and highlights the important role consumers, educators, businesses and government play in addressing marketplace issues.

This week, all Canadians are invited to rediscover the benefits of being informed consumers and thus helping to develop a fair, efficient and competitive marketplace.

National Consumer Week will give Canadians an opportunity to become better informed on issues that concern all consumers and on their own rights and responsibilities.

ABORIGINAL YOUTH

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I want to draw the government's attention to the continuing high rate of suicide among aboriginal youth. Within the last few weeks several more young people in the Northwest Territories have taken their own lives and several others have attempted suicide.

Earlier this month a special meeting was held in Iqaluit. The high school guidance counsellor is overwhelmed by the number of students who have told him they are thinking of killing themselves. In the words of the counsellor: "The numbers are staggering". Throughout Canada, from the Arctic to the east and west coasts, aboriginal youth are trying and taking their own lives at horrifying rates.

Miles Morrisseau, an aboriginal writer, talked in his column last week about how the will to live has been drained from many aboriginal youth by hopelessness and the sense that no one cares. He suggested calling off 1993 as the year of the indigenous peoples until there is something to celebrate. He said it is a tragic year when the words "succeed" and "native" are most often put together when the story is about suicide.

I do not want the government to forget amid its current preoccupations this terrible crisis in aboriginal communities. The government must now show it cares.

THE LATE GUY CARIGNAN

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, Saturday the people of the municipality of La Sarre paid a last moving tribute to their mayor, Guy Carignan, who died on Tuesday, April 20.

Elected mayor of La Sarre not long ago, Guy Carignan leaves us with the memory of a man who was kind, honest, very generous with his time, trustworthy and totally dedicated to his community.

Guy Carignan was always ready to defend a just cause and the interests of his region.

To his wife and children, I wish to extend my sincere condolences and hope they will find the strength to face this ordeal. I would like to add that Guy will always be an inspiration to our community, and especially to its younger members.

To Guy Carignan, one last word: Thank you.

FISHERIES

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced his much delayed assistance package for groundfishermen in Atlantic Canada. Unfortunately the government intends to provide income support for only one year.

Does the minister expect a crisis that was over eight years in the making to go away in just one year? Some fishermen in my riding are looking at reductions of over $100,000 because of the quota cuts. Despite this the government is providing only $406 a week in assistance. How can the minister expect fishermen to make their boat payments, pay their mortgages and still put food on the table?

• (1410)

Conservative fisheries mismanagement has extended itself into a half-baked plan to help fishermen. Fishermen deserve better government than they have been getting, and come this fall they will get that in a Liberal government.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I have become aware of a situation in which non-unionized workers of the federal government are being denied their UI benefits.

During the last PSAC strike many non-unionized workers at the taxation centre in Winnipeg crossed the PSAC picket line and went to work. Shortly into the strike these workers were sent home because of equipment failure. As a result many applied for UI benefits which I believe they are entitled to receive.

These workers should not be penalized because of the position taken by their unionized co-workers. They came to work and through no fault of their own were not able to perform their duties. These people deserve UI benefits and I will continue to pursue this matter to ensure that their benefits are reinstated.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, 10 years ago when there was a Liberal federal government Canada's Catholic bishops called for alternative people-oriented economic and social policies. In particular they urged the government not to fight inflation by creating more unemployment.

This month the bishops restated their concerns and pointed out the social crisis created by widespread and sustained unemployment, including the fact that thousands of young Canadians have little hope for the future.

The bishops reminded us all that in the 1980s the Liberal government put control of inflation above job creation and "forced wage-earners and the unemployed to carry an unfair burden". Today they point out that the Conservative government is "forcing the unemployed to carry a disproportionate burden".

They conclude that "as long as job creation is not a firm priority the current social crisis will only worsen". They propose that Canada needs "new economic strategies that will create decent jobs and revitalize social programs". They stress the need for close co-operation between governments, business, labour and other groups in society in working out a new vision for Canadian society.

The similarities between the ethical approaches to the economy proposed by the Catholic bishops and the New Democrats' job strategy are striking. On this budget day I know the government will not listen to the NDP but why will it not listen to the Catholic bishops? Can it be because these church leaders have labelled their economic policies and those pursued by the Liberals as unethical?

HEALTH

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to hear that the Nova Scotia government is prepared to follow the lead of the federal government in providing compensation to victims of contaminated blood or blood products.

However I was very disturbed to hear the Ontario health minister admit that the provinces had agreed to hold a united front to stop any such assistance to these unfortunate victims of the system, many of whom have already died, are dying or will die. I cannot believe the callousness of this action.

I was also very annoyed to hear the health minister of B.C. say that the subject needed more study. This subject has been studied to death. What is needed is some immediate compassionate action to assist these innocent people who are facing horrendous mental, physical and financial problems.

Provincial health ministers should be meeting right now to prepare a plan for such assistance before more victims are dead and their families are destroyed both emotionally and financially.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, few issues have raised such passion as the question of public signs in Quebec. Overzealous, restrictive legislation has not conveyed images of an open, respectful society. Bill 178 is repugnant. Its message makes non-francophones feel like second class citizens and has become an embarrassment for Quebec. Majority rights must never be obtained through the suppression of minorities.

This weekend we noted with encouragement and a sense of justice that the Quebec Liberal council proposed amendments to Bill 178 which will create greater linguistic expression. Now the government is to act. Hopefully in the forthcoming draft of the law not only free expression but the important issue of access to English language education for Canadian children without having to prove their eligibility will be addressed.

The right to bilingualism for communities like Rosemere should also be preserved. The English language hospitals and health networks should be protected, as should the travelling public in the matter of road and resort signage.

While I support the promotion of the French language for all of us we should never have reached a time in our society when the right to express one's self inside or outside in either official language has become an issue. It is urgent to correct this unnecessary policy which ignores minority rights.

STUDENT EMPLOYMENT

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, although one of the few areas with more money in 1993, the Challenge program will not be able to fulfil the need for student summer employment nor gain the potential the student work force offers. That is why it remains important for every business and institution in Canada to stretch as much as they possibly can to help temporary employment, particularly for those students who need it to continue their education.

• (1415)

Possibly the Challenge program could also change its focus so that more funds are used on a matching basis with employers to create the greatest number of jobs. For example, if the $2.50 base rate were allocated to a larger portion of the program on the basis of matching or higher sharing by employers, the total number of students employed would likely increase.

That is not to discount institutional or non-profit employment where Challenge pays a higher share, but perhaps even those budgets could be stretched on a large sharing basis so as to create an ever larger number of student jobs. The Challenge program is a good one but will not fulfil the need alone.

Canadian employers in all sectors should strive to tap the student work potential this summer. It is a good investment in the future of our nation.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. I am very pleased the minister has changed her mind and has come back to Parliament, because I believe Canadians are very deeply concerned about the status and safety of our forces in Bosnia.

Contrary to what the government House leader said in answer to questions last Friday, we have heard the following kinds of statements made. The UN commander in Yugoslavia said the order is that Canadians "protect Srebrenica". The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that having declared Srebrenica as a safe haven it is important that the UN live up to its commitments. An official at external affairs said there is a line being drawn for the first time.

Canadians want to know what line is exactly being drawn. What mandate is being given to our troops? Are they being asked to defend the civilians in Srebrenica? Are they being given the proper equipment to fulfil that task? Will reinforcements be given to them? Does the government have a contingency plan to rescue these troops in case of a serious attack?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Simmons: General McDougall, Corporal Campbell.

Mrs. McDougall: —I thought the hon. member might want to hear a response from myself since I have been in very close touch not just with our own military but also with our international allies on this subject.

First of all we, as others do, recognize the risks in Srebrenica which exist also in other parts of Bosnia and in other parts of the former Yugoslavia. They are obviously doing a superb job. I think all Canadians would applaud the job they are doing there.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. McDougall: I had a lengthy discussion with our military this morning. They are confident in the professionalism and in the leadership of our own troops on the ground in Srebrenica as elsewhere. Obviously we recognize the extra sensitivity in Srebrenica.

As always there are contingency plans. There are UN plans for any kind of change in what happens on the ground whether that should be some kind of attack or whether there is a need for a withdrawal. Should the situation change in any way there are contingency plans that have been established by UNPROFOR of which our people on the ground have been a part.

Both the Minister of National Defence and myself are fully confident in our military and the actions they have taken in this regard.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, seeing as the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not answer the question I put, I will repeat the question for the Minister of National Defence.

No one is questioning the professionalism or the competence of our troops. We are questioning the mandate that has been given and whether in fact the troops, about 120 in number, very lightly equipped, are now being asked to protect civilians in that endangered outpost, whether the Government of Canada has agreed to that, and if that mandate is in fact in place whether we are giving them the proper equipment, ensuring they will have reinforcements and primarily ensuring the safety and protection of the troops in a very vulnerable, sensitive position.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to underline that the UN mission going on in Srebrenica is under UN command. It is worth carrying out and it is being well carried out. It is a success because the shooting has stopped in that region as a result of the Canadian presence there and as a result of the actions that have been taken by describing that as a safe haven.

If there is any change in the situation then there will be action taken. There are contingency plans to ensure that there are reinforcements available, including air cover that has been specifically and explicitly promised by our allies, and other contingency plans that will assist our people on the ground to know exactly what to do should the situation change.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are still not getting an answer to a very serious question.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): The Tory government may laugh about this but it is not a laughing matter. It is not a laughing matter to be given the mandate to provide for the protection of our troops at the same time that they are not being given the kind of equipment or back-up they need. We want to know exactly.

The minister talks about change of conditions. We had today the imposition of a new sanctions program. Serious discussion is now being looked at in terms of air strikes. We do not know what the government's position is on that because clearly it will bring about retaliation.

Can the Minister of National Defence, the Secretary of State for External Affairs or somebody tell us exactly what is the Canadian position? Do we support these air strikes? Do we support a mandate where Canadian troops have been given the mission to defend civilians in Srebrenica?

When will we have a full and proper debate in this House so that the Parliament of Canada will find out exactly what is going on and we can have the consent of the Canadian people through their elected representatives?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I think Canadian people, from everything they have been telling me, are strongly supportive of what we are doing in Yugoslavia.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. McDougall: That mission as well, but there is a very explicit mission for the Canadians who are in Srebrenica, that is that it is a humanitarian effort and it is the evacuation of the wounded and of other civilians who may be ill. That is what the mission is all about.

The Canadians like others are in a position of making a determination as to what is the extent of their capacity to defend the town. If the town requires defending then there will be reinforcement of the Canadians in order to defend it.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, last week the Minister of National Defence said that the beating incident in Somalia of March 16 was not conveyed to headquarters in Ottawa and so Canadians did not find out about it. Since then we all know otherwise. We know that the minister was briefed the next day.

I want to ask the Minister of National Defence: Why was this House given misleading and inaccurate information?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say that I will be making a statement on this and other events in the period allotted to ministerial statements immediately after Question Period, but the House was not given incorrect or misleading information.

With respect to the event to which the hon. member refers, I was briefed the next day that a death had taken place. It was not until March 31 that it was communicated to me that death had now been characterized as a homicide or as a murder. The press release was released, and I had it in the House the last time I was here, in Mogadishu. It is the custom of the armed forces to make those releases on the spot where the events have occurred.

I indicated that in my view there should have been better communication between Mogadishu. I am sorry, I think it was actually posted in Belet Huen. There should have been better communication between Somalia and the Department of National Defence. I have taken steps to ensure that kind of communication is now in place so that there is full understanding in Ottawa of all press releases and all information that have been made available throughout the world where our forces are in theatre.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, the point here is that Parliament has had to find out about these incidents in Somalia through the media, through private letters and through questions in the House. We know now that the minister has had the knowledge and information but she failed to disclose them. As a result unfortunately unnecessary confusion and speculation have added to a serious and sensitive situation.

Will the Minister of National Defence undertake a full-time commitment to regularly and openly brief Parliament on the conduct of Canadian peacekeeping operations without delay as they occur?

• (1425)

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is already the practice of the Department of National Defence to make public all the events that occur around the world. These have been well covered.

As I said, I will be making a statement in the House this afternoon, but I am not aware of any events that ought to have been disclosed to Parliament that were not disclosed to Parliament. If that hon. member has an example of something that should have been communicated I will be more than happy to take it under advisement.

We have been fully communicative of all the events that have touched on the particular activities of our peacekeeping forces.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Defence.

In respect of the death on March 4, the early reports were that it was the death of a Somali and there was no hint of any allegation of homicide in that case until just last week.

Was the minister similarly kept in the dark by her own department, as she now says she was in respect of the March 16 incident and, if so, where did the cover-up begin and end? Was the minister herself the victim of a cover-up? Finally can the minister tell us what she did when she discovered she had not been told the full story by her own department?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there was no cover-up and no effort to withhold information.

I have made every effort since the beginning of these events to ensure that they are disclosed to the public, but that they are disclosed to the public in a way that does not compromise my obligations under the National Defence Act to remain scrupulously neutral as to the interpretation of those events in light of the possibility that I may have to play one of my roles under the National Defence Act in a quasi-judicial capacity, which is why I have instructed General Reay, the Judge Advocate General and others to meet publicly to disclose all events and all facts that relate to these particular circumstances.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I take it from the minister's answer that the people in the field who appear to have kept that information from the minister are still there and are still responsible for the command of our forces there.

In February the minister was interviewed in Halifax about a proposal that Alexa McDonough and others have made about having a peacekeeping centre in Cornwallis. The minister then said, and I quote: "The idea of a peacekeeping training centre is a wonderful idea for most people who do not know anything about peacekeeping, but I have had discussions with senior members of the Canadian military who are a bit perplexed as to what you would teach people about the normal skill of a good combat-ready military".

Is the minister, in light of what we have now heard about events in Somalia, still as convinced as she was in February that she alone knows that combat readiness is all the skills that are necessary to deal with as difficult and complex a situation as our forces are in in Somalia?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is a broad variety of skills and preparation required in deploying our troops wherever they are in the world, whether it is on humanitarian issues, peacekeeping or peacemaking operations. This training is carried out in the course of the training of the Canadian Armed Forces. It is for that reason senior members of the Department of National Defence were perplexed as to what additional kinds of things might be provided in a separate institution that are not provided now.

It is important for us always, and I as Minister of National Defence responsible for the direction of the armed forces take the responsibility seriously, to ensure that training which is part of the normal training of the Canadian Armed Forces is in fact carried out to the highest standard.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, on May 1 a human rights organization called African Rights will be issuing a report in which it reports that our country is not the only one with these kinds of problems in Somalia, that in fact 230 Somalis have been killed by the multination9zal forces who are there under Operation Restore Hope. They have also said that the Somalis have been marginalized and Operation Restore Hope has achieved little or nothing of substance.

I wonder if the minister would agree that it is appropriate in a sense of priorities that we are spending more this year on our peacekeeping operation in Somalia than the entire CIDA budget for development assistance in all of Africa.

• (1430)

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that anyone who has seen the reports of the work that has been done by the Canadian forces and others in Somalia would for a moment think that anything was being accomplished there other than the alleviation of human suffering in enormous quality. That is what our people have been doing and that is what they will continue to do.

HELICOPTER PROGRAM

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Defence. This is a time of record unemployment. One million Canadian children are living in poverty and 700,000 Canadian children have used food banks. It is no time to spend close to $6 billion on the EH-101 cold war helicopters.

In the January 19, 1993 Victoria Times-Colonist the minister had this to say: "I am convinced the helicopter decision was the correct one".

I want to ask her today, in view of the overwhelming evidence to the contrary, does she still think today that that decision was a correct one and, if so, why?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is a correct one because I have seen no compelling evidence to the contrary.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that this minister and this government put cold war helicopters above unemployed Canadians and hungry children in Canada.

The minister in The Ottawa Sun on February 2 said: "I", the innocent Minister of Justice at that time, "posed the question about the helicopters but I was persuaded it was good policy and that the cost of cancelling it would be unacceptable".

Four out of five Canadians tell the minister and tell the government they do not want these helicopters bought at this time. Why are the minister and the government refusing to cancel this decision today?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all with respect to the question of the unemployed, there will be 45,000 person-years of employment for Canadians as a result of this particular contract. I do not think that is insignificant.

I would also say that I have spoken on this subject across the country and every time I have had a chance to answer questions which are posed across Canada, as I pose the question myself as a member of cabinet, about the validity and about the merit of this decision, every time I have had an opportunity to explain that decision I have found that the people who heard the explanation were overwhelmingly supportive of the decision. That is why I believe in its intrinsic merits.

POVERTY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

While his government promised that economic prosperity would trickle down to all Canadians, the fact remains that hundreds of thousands of Canadians across the country have been both excluded and forgotten.

I ask the Prime Minister: Given that the number of Canadians living in poverty has increased every single year that this government has been in office, how can his government possibly condone its vicious shell game of trying to redraw and lower the poverty line? When will the government actually get around to trying to eradicate the root causes of such poverty in this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says that the government promised that prosperity would trickle down. That is a false statement. The government never said any such thing. If my hon. friend begins his question with an inaccurate statement, then one can only conclude that the rest of the question is also seriously flawed, as indeed it is.

How does one deal with poverty? By creating jobs; 48,000 last month. There were 1.4 million new jobs created since this government came into office, the highest job creation record of the G-7 countries. The government has done this by keeping inflation low. Inflation is now at a 30-year low at 1.5 per cent or thereabouts.

Mr. Marchi: What is the price of that?

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says what is the price. There are costs to be paid. Obviously there are costs to be paid. Productivity has increased. Inflation is low. The IMF and the World Bank say that Canada will lead the industrialized world in terms of economic growth and our exports are at record highs.

The Royal Bank and most international institutions have now just predicted a decade of strong economic growth. I think that my hon. friend will see why when the Minister of Finance arrives shortly to present another budget that will secure Canada's economic growth and prosperity and deal with some of the important matters that my hon. friend has just raised.

• (1435)

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the price of that government's policy is 1.5 million unemployed, 3 million on welfare, increased line-ups at food banks, poverty, misery and the list goes on.

Given that a sad face of this chronic poverty in Canada is the hardship faced by the increasing number of one-parent families led by single women, 50 per cent of whom are unemployed and over 60 per cent of those who are actually employed earn, according to Statistics Canada, low-income wages, and given that this group is among the most economically disadvantaged and most vulnerable of Canadians, how can this government think itself responsible when it allows the chair of the poverty subcommittee to turn a blind eye to these Canadian families and in the process pretend that their problems have simply gone away?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in regard to the serious problem raised by my hon. friend, I would draw his attention to a study recently published by the University of Chicago's School of Social Work, a highly respected group, where it indicates that the policies pursued by the Government of the United States when compared over the last decade with the Government of Canada have been very seriously wanting.

They urge upon them policies like those pursued by the Government of Canada which has had the reverse effect of that suggested by my hon. friend with the exception of the recession, which has been tough for everybody, particularly those to whom he refers. The number of people on welfare, the number of people who need help at this time has been reduced, which indicates that the policies, for example, in favour of children, in favour of single families, in favour of targeting the resources of Canada to those families that need it most, are having a very significant effect.

I urge my friend to read this analysis from the University of Chicago which will indicate that he ought not to be disparaging what has been taking place in Canada but speaking of it with pride because other jurisdictions like the United States admire and envy the results that we have been able to secure in Canada.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from one week in Croatia. I came away most impressed with the training, the equipment and the esprit de corps of our Armed Forces.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Butland: I know that all members of the House would want to express support of these peacekeepers performing admirably in a most dangerous environment.

My question is for the Minister of National Defence. It concerns the situation in Srebrenica. At the invitation of Serbian officials we heard General MacKenzie, now a private citizen, on national television negotiating the status of Canadian forces. Is the minister in dialogue with General MacKenzie? What is his mandate? Is it appropriate that he be the spokesperson for the Canadian government?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I think that it is important to know that Mr. MacKenzie stressed that he was going as a private citizen to see the the Bosnian Serbs and the Serbs in the area because of earlier relationships that he built up with them.

I want to congratulate the hon. member for taking an interest in this and for going himself. I should point out to the House that I shortly will be going to Croatia, Bosnia and also Somalia.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's comments, but I suggest that General MacKenzie's actions have led to a direct impact on Canadian troops. I am just wondering if that is appropriate.

My supplementary question is as follows. Given the fact that economic sanctions are now in place and some type of military intervention is imminent, will the minister indicate to Canadians if she is prepared to commit further Canadian support to any military escalation that might occur? More important, will she commit herself to a full debate in the House of Commons on this critical issue before any such action is taken?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all in terms of the particular situation of Srebrenica, the cease-fire there and the demilitarization there, that was a step that was agreed to by all the parties in the region.

It was not something that was imposed on Srebrenica by UNPROFOR.

The sanctions indeed go into effect at midnight tonight. This is something that Canada has been advocating for a long time, including the sanctions and their enforcement on the Danube as well as the Adriatic. We are very pleased that this action is being taken.

It is not inevitable that there will be an escalation. I want to underline that. In the question there was an implication that this was automatically coming. Obviously we are all concerned about that.

Remember, our objectives were to prevent the conflict from spreading, to provide humanitarian assistance and peacekeepers and monitor cease-fires wherever we could do that. That was the objective of the international mission there under UNPROFOR.

Should anything change, Canada will do its part as it always has. At the moment there is no inevitability about that.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my friend, the Minister of Fisheries.

He made his announcement on Friday concerning compensation. That was certainly a step in the right direction. Yet the amount of money allocated, given the massive need in the five easternmost provinces, can only be called pitiful in that context.

The minister said that an estimated 2,000 fishermen and 5,600 plant workers would be eligible. He must be aware and I am sure he is that about 20,000 people need help in those five provinces because of the massive quota cuts and the job losses.

I ask the minister: Is it his intention to try to compensate only about one-third of the people in need? Who is going to qualify for this program?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to even get a grudging admission from the hon. gentleman that there is a program that was announced last Friday. This is indeed a step forward. The amount devoted to the program will never be enough. If we had the resources then I would certainly like to see more money allocated.

This is an amount that is reasonable. Our best estimate is that about 5,000-odd plant workers and about 2,000 fisherpersons will need assistance because they will not be able to qualify for unemployment insurance. They will not be able to get jobs this year as a result of the reduction in the quotas.

This is a $191 million program to assist with $18 million for job creation programs so that they can qualify for UI if they have not. There is $92 million over three years for training. They can become more professional as fishermen if that is what they wish, or there is other training for work outside the fishery for plant workers and fishermen.

There is a transitional fisheries adjustment allowance totalling up to $19 million so that they will receive at least the average of their last three years' UI once they have agreed that they will go into training. This will support a program for those in really dire straits.

The Plant Workers Adjustment Program for early retirement will be extended to the fish plants throughout the region that are affected by these TAC reductions. This $191 million program is to be added to in excess of $1 billion that the government allocated to meeting this situation in the last two years. I think this is reasonable and generous. It is all that we can afford in the present circumstances. I hope it meets the bill.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the minister has been aware for many months now of the problems in the gulf fishery, the Scotia shelf and on the south coast of Newfoundland.

Yet, on Friday he indicated that it is going to take nearly another month, May 15 I think is the date he used, to work out the details. Surely there is a way to speed up the process. I ask him, can he do that? Is there some way to avoid stalling further on this? There are a lot of people out there hinging on this announcement and its details. Can he speed up the process somehow?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I have been trying to speed up the process for the last two or three months.

If I could speed it up more speedily, I would certainly do so. There are certain formalities that have to be met. For example, there is the institution called the Treasury Board. It is positively not safe for anyone or any department to do anything that has not been vetted by Treasury Board first. We have the criteria worked out. I am hoping it will go to Treasury Board this week and that we get a quick response.

Basically this will apply to fish plants where at least 25 per cent of their throughput has been groundfish and to fishermen, 50 per cent of whose landed catch has come from groundfish. This is because the problem is with groundfish and not other species.

I will pass the hon. gentleman's suggestions on to the Treasury Board for quick action. If so, I do not see any reason that we could not announce criteria at the end of this week. It would be a miracle, but we could do it.

ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment who probably knows of President Clinton's announcement that the United States will stabilize greenhouse gas emissions by the year 2000 and will produce a plan by next August. The Government of Canada announced its intention to stabilize greenhouse gas emissions three years ago, but still has no plan other than a shopping list of options in the National Action Strategy.

Why after three years has the government still to produce a comprehensive and specific plan to stabilize greenhouse gas emissions to hopefully prevent global climate change?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, needless to say as Earth Day was last week we were very happy to acknowledge and to hear the news that the present American administration would commit itself to stabilizing its greenhouse gases at 1990 levels for the year 2000 as they had committed to doing during the election campaign. That is exactly what Canada committed to doing three years ago. We were also very happy to hear the news that the American administration had taken the advice of our Prime Minister and decided to sign and ratify the biodiversity convention.

On my hon. friend's specific question, Canada has made a commitment to a quick start agenda to having not only signed but also ratified the convention on climate change. We intend to produce our national plan which requires very close co-operation with provincial and territorial governments in Canada for that purpose. We intend to produce our commitments to the climate change convention by June. As of this morning, the information I have from my department is that we will be able to meet that commitment.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. However, it does not give the reasons for the three-year delay.

As he quite rightly said Canada has ratified the biodiversity convention. However, the question is: Why the delay on Canada's part in introducing the needed legislation to protect endangered plants and animals and the spaces they depend on for their survival? Why the delay in introducing this legislation?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there is no delay. Canada is able to meet most of the commitments to the biodiversity convention, the commitments we made to the green plan and also the commitments that are made through different provincial legislatures.

For example, on the protected spaces side there are very clear commitments. Real progress has been made over the last two years in meeting our commitments as expressed and articulated through the green plan. On endangered species, we brought forward Bill C-42 which was the last piece of legislation to be approved by this House in 1992. As per the recommendations made by the Standing Committee on the Environment we are ready to look at any other suggestions on protecting species in this country that the House may deem as being appropriate.

AIR SAFETY

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport.

I raised in the House the issue of aerobatic flying in the air space of St. Andrews airport. I have yet to receive a formal response to my inquiry on the status of aerobatic flying at St. Andrews.

Can the minister please tell the House how she intends to deal with this very public issue of concern?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to confirm for the hon. member that I have directed officials that no aerobatic flights will be allowed in the air space over St. Andrews airport. The only exception will be one day a year for the aerobatic competition. I understand that is acceptable to both the member and his constituents. At the same time, Transport Canada officials in the region are working with the Manitoba Air Flying Club to make sure that they can find a suitable arrangement for them to do their practising in other air space in the Manitoba area.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

On Friday during Question Period and also earlier today the member for Timiskaming—French River made a racist and unjustified attack of the incoming president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may be concerned about a remark but I have said before in this House that to accuse an hon. member of making a racist comment is unparliamentary in this day and age. I would ask the hon. member if she wishes to refer to something that the member said and if she wants to enlarge on that in such a way that it is a matter that the government can answer, I will certainly let her do so. But I would ask her to withdraw the word "racist".

Ms. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For the record, Ms. Sunera Thobani is not an illegal—

Some hon. members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I am not stopping the hon. member from pursuing the question. I will listen very carefully to it. But I do want the word "racist" withdrawn.

Ms. Hunter: I withdraw the term "racist".

Let me give the background. Ms. Sunera Thobani is not an illegal immigrant, has never been an illegal immigrant and I suspect the reason the comments were made was because of her skin colour. I ask the Prime Minister—

Some hon. members: Withdraw.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am very sorry but I am going to have to move on. I am prepared to discuss it afterward with the hon. member. The hon. member for Sudbury.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of industry.

While this government talks about competitiveness it has implemented a drug patent policy that will cost Canadian companies such as INCO millions of dollars because of increased costs for employee drug plans. In a recent memo to its employees and pensioners INCO promotes the use of lower cost generic drugs as a cost saving measure.

Why has this Conservative government implemented this uncompetitive, detrimental and costly policy for Canadians?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's description is totally inaccurate. In terms of patented medicines—remember the distinction, not all prescriptions but patented medicines—the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board has kept the prices of those drugs at less than inflation for the last five years. Those drugs not on patent, which represent 80 per cent of the drugs purchased by Canadians, have in fact gone up more than inflation. The control measures on those are entirely provincial through their formularies and so on.

The hon. member is distorting the facts when she says that Bill C-91 has had anything but a very beneficial effect on drug prices and of course profoundly in bringing forward hundreds of millions of dollars of investment and jobs in this important high-tech sector.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I am quoting from a memo which INCO sent out to its employees. This same memo states: "When you get a generic drug you are getting a drug that is exactly the same quality as the brand drug but you are getting it at a saving. Another plus is that when you use generic products in Canada you are buying Canadian".

Why has the minister implemented a drug patent policy that places profits in the hands of foreign multinational corporations at the expense of Canadian jobs, Canadian innovation and the Canadian generic drug industry?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member might have been in Mississauga last week when Astra invested $150 million and the president said that this was new research due to Bill C-91. Even Premier Rae had to praise the investment and acknowledge that it came from Bill C-91.

Mr. Dingwall: Who?

Mr. Marchi: Now you like Rae.

Mr. Andre: Perhaps the hon. member could ask her colleagues not to interrupt. The hon. member should recognize that once a drug is off patent, one can produce as many generic copies of it as there is approval for.

• (1455)

What that memo says is that ASA costs less than aspirin. That is because aspirin is the brand product and ASA is the generic product. For anything off patent there can be as many products as there are producers out there for it. What that memo says is that people should shop. If people did shop according to that memo the prices on all of the off-patented drugs would probably increase less than inflation as has been the case in terms of the patented drugs as a result of this government's legislation.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of immigration.

It was recently reported that Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, an Egyptian militant and spiritual leader of the extremists who are charged with bombing the World Trade Centre in New York, was granted entry to Canada last fall and attended certain meetings here.

Could the minister explain how this individual was granted entry into Canada when thousands of others who are not dangerous are denied entry every day? Was the sheik's visit to Canada illegal and if so, why was it not prevented?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I feel vindicated. This is the member who opposed the modification of the Immigration Act to prevent the entry of undesirables to Canada. Today he stands up and asks how this could have happened in the past. I do not know if it did, but this is exactly why we modified the Immigration Act, to prevent the entry to Canada of criminals.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, this is the usual red herring raised by the minister.

Our law has prevented the entry of these people into our country for years and years. That has been on our law books for years now. The difference is that we need sufficient trained officers at the border to enforce that law.

The law was enforced last fall against these types of people and they have been turned down for years. But they were not turned down last fall because there are not enough trained people there to enforce this law.

This sheik has been associated with groups that espouse political terrorism. If his entry was illegal, I ask again how he got by the border officials when our law did say that type of person should be prevented entry at that time. I want to know if there has been an investigation into this matter and what the results of that investigation are. Let us not have any more nonsense.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to talk about red herrings.

The hon. member is talking about there not being enough officials to enforce Canadian law. I remember not long ago in this House I introduced the reconfiguration of our offices in Canada. Then we could place more emphasis on enforcement. Again, the Liberals opposed it. Now he complains again. The Liberal Party of Canada must make up its mind. It cannot have it both ways.

ARTS AND CULTURE

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Prime Minister.

The budget of the Canada Council for the arts has effectively been decreased by some 30 per cent since 1981-82. A recent study by Vanderhoof and Associates demonstrates after an analysis of some 60 performing arts organizations that the cuts by the Canada Council in fact increase the deficit rather than decrease it. This is because of the increased payments to UI and welfare, and the decrease in GST and tax revenues.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he, as leader of this government, will review the cuts to the arts organizations since it seems as though they are counterproductive. Cuts to arts in fact increase rather than reduce the deficit.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is well known that in these times of fiscal and financial constraint everybody must contribute. The actions being taken by the Minister of Communications are to make sure that we respect the very difficult financial situation we are in, and the decisions that have been taken are along this line.

• (1500)

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I prefer going to the Prime Minister.

The Independent Film and Video Alliance represents 7,000 independent film and video producers in Canada. Its budget has also been cut because of the cutbacks to the Canada Council. Most of the independent producers live well below the poverty line and the cutbacks will force many on to UIC or welfare.

Can the minister explain to the House what is the economic sense in cutting funding to the arts if the net result is greater cost to the public Treasury in UI and welfare payments?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think this government has done very well for the arts and culture in Canada over the past few years.

I would like to remind the hon. member that this government has adopted many pieces of legislation such as:

—the Broadcasting Act and the Radiocommunications Act. It instituted public lending rights, adopted laws to protect authors and artists and passed the Status of the Artist Act.

I think that in the last nine years this government proved that it cares for arts and culture, and it has no lessons to be taught, particularly by the NDP considering the recent decisions made by the Ontario government.

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Youth.

Since the establishment of the summer employment portion of the Challenge program in 1985, thousands of young people have gained valuable summer employment as a result of wage contributions by the federal government to their employers.

The funding criteria have varied since the inception of the Challenge program and separate formulas are now in place for the private sector, for institutions and for non-profit organizations. The goal remains as many student jobs as possible.

I would like the minister to describe the categories by which the Challenge program is presently organized to allocate funds for creating the largest number of those jobs. Could we not increase the number of those jobs by allocating a higher portion of the Challenge budget to matching arrangements at the $250 base rate?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I assume from a very strict interpretation of the question of my hon. colleague, and if we were guaranteed to get the same amount of employers from the private sector, that he would be correct. Unfortunately that is not the advice I get.

INCIDENTS IN SOMALIA

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address an issue which I know has been of concern to the Canadian people.

A series of incidents has taken place in Somalia which casts a shadow on the fine reputation of the Canadian forces. In the search for truth, for justice and to reassure the men and women of the Canadian forces and their families, these incidents must be addressed.

Four incidents are of particular concern. First, on February 17, 1993, 30 soldiers at a bridge in Belet Huen were confronted by a violent demonstration involving about 300 Somalis, some of whom were throwing stones. After shots were fired by Canadian soldiers, one Somali was killed and one was wounded. The incident was investigated by the local commander.

On the night of March 4, 1993, two Somali citizens approached the Canadian compound. Shots were fired and one Somali was killed and the other wounded. After staff at national defence headquarters examined the report of that incident, they ordered a military police investigation which is now in progress.

[Translation]

On March 16, 1993 a Somali was captured in the Canadian compound. He was later found dead as a result of a beating suffered while in Canadian custody. Subsequently, a member of the Canadian Forces who had been placed in closed custody for his alleged involvement in the incident attempted suicide. An investigation into the death of the Somali was instituted, and subsequently halted when it was determined that a military police investigation was warranted. This investigation is now under way.

• (1505)

On March 17, 1993 when an aid convoy arrived at Belet Huen from Mogadishu a fight broke out between the Somali drivers and local Somali residents, in which shots were fired. A member of the Canadian forces was directed to return fire and one Somali was killed. An investigation was conducted by the local commander.

[English]

After the first incident there was a press briefing in Mogadishu. It was reported by American press writers and Canadian press.

After the second incident the Canadian commander briefed the press and the story was carried in most major Canadian newspapers.

After the third incident, a press release was posted in Mogadishu and it was first reported in Canada by Radio Canada on March 30.

In the fourth case there was a press release in Mogadishu on March 17. The story was then carried by wire services and newspapers.

[Translation]

As I stated in the House, there was an apparent problem with communications between the theatre of operations and national defence headquarters. I have given instructions and measures have been taken to correct this problem. Nevertheless, the investigation and reporting of these incidents demonstrate the Canadian forces commitment to openness and their desire to see justice done.

[English]

Broad concerns have been voiced. There is a concern over secrecy. There is a concern about the Canadian forces and the units sent to Somalia. There have been press comments about violence and racism exhibited by Canadian troops in Somalia.

Over the past few weeks I have been confronted by two imperatives. Under the National Defence Act I am responsible for the management and direction of the Canadian forces. I also have quasi-judicial responsibilities in the military system of justice. In order not to prejudice the ongoing investigation and the rights of individuals involved, I have been careful not to discuss the details of these events. In these capacities I must balance the need to inform the public and Parliament with the need to ensure that the military justice process is not prejudiced.

In weighing all these responsibilities I have sought advice on how best to address these concerns within the context of recent legal developments concerning the holding of public inquiries. I cannot allow a situation to continue which could undermine public trust or the morale of the Canadian forces.

I have received the considered advice of the Office of the Judge Advocate General, which is the legal department of the Department of National Defence, and the Department of Justice and now believe that I have found a way to address this situation.

I have, under section 45 of the National Defence Act, directed the chief of the defence staff to convene a board of inquiry at the earliest possible opportunity. The terms of reference of this inquiry will allow it to conduct an effective and timely investigation while at the same time respecting the most recent jurisprudence. To provide for participation by independent civilian members on a military board of inquiry, I am amending military regulations to allow civilian membership.

The purpose of the board of inquiry is to provide insight into the problems experienced by the Canadian forces in Somalia. Principally it will inquire into whether any of the concerns arising from this Canadian forces operation are the result of systemic problems, particularly in the Canadian Airborne Regiment. I hope to have the report of this inquiry by the end of July and it will be made public.

Finally let me assure you that we are treating these events with the utmost seriousness and are taking all measures possible to resolve them. These incidents do not reflect the outstanding over-all performance of the Canadian Forces in Somalia as well as in the former Yugoslavia, in Cambodia and, indeed, here at home in Canada.

[English]

We are all justifiably proud of our armed forces and in particular I would like personally to express my support for their families at this difficult time. Finally let me assure that these events have not diverted our attention from our responsibilities with respect to our engagements throughout the world.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Official Opposition I acknowledge the minister's statement. I understand what she has said. I regret that this could not have been done five and half weeks ago. I believe if this had been done earlier in the House a lot of the speculation and unnecessary confusion surrounding the specific events to which she referred, the confusion about the conduct of peacekeeping operations and other more serious issues involving how we do peacekeeping at this time in our history may well have been avoided.

The incidents described in the minister's statement and the conduct of the department after these incidents were conducted were addressed. What the minister did not address was the major question I have been asking since the knowledge of the March 16 Somalia incident became known to the Canadian public.

There are four specific concerns that I have with the minister's statement. My first concern is with respect to the apparent problem with communications between the theatre and national defence headquarters. I am aware, as indeed is the House now, there is a requirement for the commanding officer to issue a significant incident report on incidents of the nature the minister described. There is a requirement that the chief of the defence staff be briefed on this and indeed that the minister be briefed shortly after, as soon as possible.

The minister attends or should attend regular sessions of defence council. The forum is there for the minister to have been made aware certainly within 24 hours of these events that have occurred. We are only finding out about it today, five weeks after the occurrence. The details have not been addressed and that is another aspect.

I can understand that perhaps the minister does not want to address the details, but that does not avoid the major point, that the minister in her responsibility for the direction and management of the Canadian forces as a corollary of that is responsible for informing the Canadian public, the House of Commons and Parliament on the conduct of these operations. This was not done and perhaps would not have been done for some time unless the questions were raised by the Official Opposition in the House to cause the minister to return and attend to her job in a full-time manner so that the issues could be dealt with properly.

There is also my concern in the area of the details of the terms of reference in the board of inquiry. I must say I do welcome the board of inquiry but the details itself bother me. The minister in her statement singles out the concern arising from the Canadian forces operation and any systematic problems, particularly to the Canadian Airborne Regiment.

I am somewhat concerned that any unit in the Canadian forces involved in peacekeeping would have to be singled out so specifically in the terms of reference of a board of inquiry. I believe the investigation terms of reference should include a broader concern over the conduct of information and specifically into the conduct of ministerial responsibility and the knowledge of Parliament of how Canadian peacekeepers are conducting their operations. This should be done in such a way that would avoid speculation and rumour and the necessity for private correspondence, media disclosures and other clandestine or not overt matters to be the subject of rumour and speculation and indeed questions in the House of Commons. I believe that has to be included as well.

Third, I am concerned as are my colleagues on this side of the House that the conduct of peacekeeping operations in Canada at this time in our history is not being done properly. There has been question after question in this House. There has been testimony to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

There has been testimony by experts to the defence committee. Their logic and chronology follows the same items. They acknowledge that Canada has been involved in as many peacekeeping operations in the last four years as in the whole 46-year history of our immaculate record of peacekeeping operations.

We have reduced the army by 4,000 troops, yet we have more peacekeepers in the field now than ever. We have 4,700 in 18 different locations.

In the testimony of the external affairs minister she says that we are being stretched thinly. She is concerned about it. Experts, including two generals in uniform, have had to speak out about the conduct of the operations and the fact that we are being spread too thinly.

Experts in the defence committee have given convincing and compelling testimony about the size of regular force units and about their concern that the number of militia soldiers far exceeds what is normally expected in the total force concept. They have expressed concern about the equipment and the mandate that our Canadian forces peacekeepers are given and the whole manner in which it is conducted.

I am reluctant for reasons that would be obvious to everybody in this House to raise this, but as a member of the Official Opposition and as an associate defence critic I feel compelled on this occasion to take notice of the alarming statement of the chief of the defence staff in a recent Maclean's article. It indicated that there may be some difficulties with leadership and discipline.

For the chief of the defence staff to make that admission is a very serious concern. I raise it in the context of this minister's statement on this occasion because it was in the same context that it was raised in the article to which I make reference.

There is only one way that the Canadian people will be satisfied in this area. We need to address these concerns that I have just chronicled. We need a full, open and specific debate involving the considerable expertise on both sides of the House so that we can once and for all put the conduct of Canadian peacekeeping operations into the proper perspective. Then it will be done with the full knowledge and approval of the Canadian public and indeed of Parliament.

In closing, I would be less than adequate if I did not mention the fact that we in the Official Opposition have always been very laudatory and rightly so on the conduct of our Canadian forces peacekeepers. We have had, over 45 years, more than 85,000 young men and women participating in every United Nations operation that has been under way.

We have nothing but the greatest respect. There has been nothing said in this incident or at any other time that would reflect anything but the deepest and greatest respect and honour for our young men and women. We will continue to do so.

In summary, I look forward to the findings, conclusions and recommendations of this board of inquiry. However, I would once again ask the minister to keep a close watch on what is happening and to immediately implement a full and proper debate in Parliament on all aspects of our current peacekeeping undertakings.

• (1520)

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, first let me begin by congratulating the minister on coming to the House finally with a statement. It is a good thing that she has done and we appreciate it. It does in fact provide us with an opportunity at least to have a mini-debate, if we can call it that, on the situation with our forces in Somalia.

Let me also say at the outset that I welcome the idea of establishing a board of inquiry. That is a positive step. I further welcome the idea that there should be civilian representation on it.

I would ask the minister this. I am sure we could give her unanimous consent to do so. Will she stand in the House and say that she would agree to consult with the other parties in the House on the make-up of it so that the people of Canada can have confidence that it is truly a non-partisan commission that has been set up to get to the truth of what has happened?

Having said those things, let me voice some concerns.

[Translation]

What the minister tells us today in her statement is nothing new. She is only repeating information that we were able to get mainly from the press. She does not say anything about how she as Minister of National Defence has assumed her responsibilities.

[English]

The statement that the minister has given us today barely outlines what is already known by some of the initial press statements and leaves far more unanswered than she has answered. Let me just take them incident by incident.

Look at February 17. The account she has given to the House today does not include information which is already public. The commander of the troops facing that demonstration ordered his troops to fire two shots at the Somalis who were unarmed. One of them was then killed.

The statement about the March 4, 1993 incident says nothing about the serious allegations that were outlined in the House last week.

The incident on March 16, 1993 barely touches on the information that is already public.

In the account of the incident on March 17, 1993 the minister's statement makes no reference to the fact that the Somali who was killed was an employee of the International Red Cross and was trying himself to deal with the disturbance that was occurring at the time. There is no reference here to any investigation of that incident having been launched by the Minister of National Defence.

The minister goes on in her statement to outline the so-called press briefings leaving the impression that those briefings were full and complete. The fact is that they were so terse as to be misleading. When it came to the accounts of the incident on March 16, the third incident, the local commanders actively misled the local media from what was happening. They refused to answer their questions and turned them away from the story.

The minister has refused in this statement to give any accounting whatsoever for her particular response to any of this information. We are not asking her to breach her responsibilities—

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Yes, you are.

Mr. Brewin: The minister says that we are. Let us just test that.

How does it in any way intervene with her responsibilities if she could tell this House what instructions the Government of Canada gave to our forces in Somalia in respect to the use of force? How does that in any way impinge upon the investigation? She could at least tell us that.

In December when the government sent the forces there it did not have in place any rules of engagement. I asked the minister this on Friday. The government House leader in her place refused to give any information in the House as to whether there were any rules of engagement now in place and the minister has refused so far to answer that question in the House.

Let me say further that she has put it down to a problem of communications between the theatre and national defence headquarters. Let us give her that. Let us say that information did not reach her or national headquarters for weeks after these incidents. That still leaves the minister with a question to answer that has nothing to do with her responsibilities under the prosecution or the judge advocate side of her responsibilities.

This is the question. Once she heard of all these incidents what did she do about it? What action did she take? Are the same commanders in the field? Are they operating with the same instructions? What is being done to assure Canadians that the reputation of our peacekeepers will not be further tarnished? The minister has answered none of that.

Then we come to the conclusion or the terms of reference that she has set out in this board of inquiry. The finger is pointed at the Canadian Airborne Regiment. However, there is nothing in here inviting the board of inquiry to ask questions about the responsibility of the Minister of National Defence for what has happened or for the senior officers as to what has happened.

What has happened is that there are far more questions left unanswered in this statement that the Canadian people are now entitled to.

We have a situation that my friend referred to. The chief of the defence staff has said that discipline has broken down among our forces there. Let me say this. We all understand that it is a very difficult situation in Somalia. There can be no doubt about that. I repeat that we all understand it. We have all supported our peacekeepers for years. We see this as a very important responsibility for Canadians. However, it is the responsibility of the Minister of National Defence for the operations of our peacekeepers to ensure that they are operating under proper restraint and if they fail to do so that she take immediate action to deal with that situation.

Even in today's paper there was reference to a press gag—as it was called—of the forces there in telling them that they cannot talk to members of the media. Yet the deputy commander was allowed to talk. What did he do? He blamed the opposition and the media for carrying on some vendetta against them in the interest of protecting the Minister of National Defence. Clearly that is not a fair and proper thing.

This is a very serious situation. We again congratulate the minister for at least going as far as she has. However, we would ask the minister at the earliest opportunity, which is tomorrow, to come forward with a more detailed statement and to account in this House for her responsibilities as the Minister of National Defence.

PETITIONS

GRAIN SHIPMENTS

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under Standing Order 36, on behalf of a number of Manitobans in asking the government to increase grain shipments by way of the Port of Churchill to a point where it equals 5 per cent of the export sales of the Wheat Board.

ALLIANCE OF LIFE

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition on behalf of a number of Canadians. They are requesting by way of this petition that the government withhold funding to the planned parenthood project because there already exists a group called the Alliance for Life which is not dependant upon government support.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary has been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was outside the House when you called for motions. With the consent of the House, I would have a motion to propose.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, we understand the duties of a very active and very learned parliamentary secretary and in view of the fact that we have given prior consent to the motion which he is going to move I do not think there is any difficulty in getting unanimous consent.

AUTHORIZATION TO TRAVEL FOR STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles A. I therefore move:

> That 8 members of the Standing Committee on Transport and 9 staff persons be authorized to travel to Vancouver, B.C., and Winnipeg, Manitoba, from May 10 to 11, 1993 and to Saint John, New Brunswick and Halifax, Nova Scotia, from May 27 to May 28, 1993 in order to hold public hearings on the National Transportation Act Review Commission Report.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

SITUATION IN BOSNIA

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am in receipt of a notice of motion under Standing Order 52(1) from the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under Standing Order 52 to make a motion to adjourn the House for an emergency debate concerning the situation confronting Canadian troops in Srebrenica, Bosnia.

Circumstances surrounding the situation change as we speak. However, I certainly think everyone would recognize that they are in a critical state. It is very precarious for 150 men and women in the Canadian Armed Forces. Under a cease-fire agreement with the Bosnian Serbs Canadian troops were to evacuate and disarm Bosnian Muslims.

Yesterday morning they were told that the Canadians must leave immediately as it was claimed they had failed to adequately disarm the residents.

At the same time the Serbians have rejected a peace proposal. General MacKenzie today, on behalf of the government although a private citizen, supposedly has been making decisions on behalf of Canadian troops, which is unacceptable.

I realize this may be seen as ill timed. I believe Canadian lives in a foreign country are more important than a budget and could take precedence over any budgetary discussions and presentations we would have today.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I listened to what the hon. member said and I would simply remind the House that the Minister of National Defence made a statement a few moments ago in which she—

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am informed that in this situation, the Chair can make a decision immediately, since the motion is not debatable.

The hon. member has raised a matter that is of tremendous concern to all members of this House, and the Chair is therefore very much aware of the importance of the hon. member's request. However, as the hon. member knows full well, the criteria in the Standing Orders for emergency debates under Standing Order 52 are very strict. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion does not today meet all the criteria in the Standing Orders for an emergency debate. However, that should not prevent the hon. member from raising the matter again some other day, if he thinks that would be appropriate.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Dingwall: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that at approximately 4.30 p.m. or thereabouts the Minister of Finance will be tabling his budget in the House of Commons, I understand that we will now be proceeding to report stage on Bill S-17, an act to amend the Copyright Act, the Industrial Design Act, the Integrated Circuit Topography Act, the Patent Act, the Trade-marks Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

• (1535)

My distinguished colleague from Dartmouth will be giving the position of the Official Opposition. I do not know how many members from the New Democratic Party will participate or whether my learned colleague from Nova Scotia will participate.

Perhaps we could suspend until 4.30 p.m. when those debates are completed so that members can have a few moments to prepare themselves with regard to the anticipation of the Minister of Finance's budget.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I listened to the comments made by the Leader of the Opposition in the House and I must point out that consultations were held last week. Opposition parties, that is the Official Opposition as well as the NDP, were informed of government agenda for this week.

We wish to proceed with Bill S–17 as quickly as possible, and then move on to Bill C–72.

Therefore, I simply want to mention that we on this side of the House want to proceed with the order of business as established.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to debate this much longer. All I can say to my hon. friend is that these matters were raised. If he will reflect and check upon his notes it was quite clear that members of the government would not get all of the bills it has listed, which include Bill C–109, Bill C–72, Bill S–17, Bill C–107 and Bill C–90.

I think I made that abundantly clear to the government House leader as well as to the parliamentary secretary. What I was hoping to do by my suggestion was to facilitate and have an understanding that when we complete Bill S–17, which I would hope would happen before 4.30 p.m., only a few moments, we could then adjourn the House until 4.30 p.m. when the Minister of Finance is to table his budget.

If members do not wish to co–operate and cannot see their way to co–operate with that kind of suggestion then we will have to debate Bill S–17 until 4.30 p.m. today, and perhaps we will have to debate it on Friday and again next week.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. House leader of the Official Opposition can give us, and the NDP also, a guarantee that we will be able to complete Bill S–17 before 4.30 p.m. then we would certainly be pleased to consider the suggestion he just made.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I take it, and please correct me if I am wrong, there is agreement to the effect that once Bill S–17 is disposed of the House will suspend its sitting until 4.30 p.m. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY LAW IMPROVEMENT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill S–17, an act to amend the Copyright Act, the Industrial Design Act, the Integrated Circuit Topography Act, the Patent Act, the Trade–marks Act and other acts in consequence thereof, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee.

Hon. Doug Lewis (for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that the bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

• (1540)

Mr. Lewis (for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Darryl L. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity this afternoon to rise in the House on a memorable day for all Canadians, budget day, and speak to Bill S–17.

Bill S-17 amends various provision in five pieces of legislation: the Patent Act, the Trade-marks Act, the Copyright Act, the Industrial Design Act and the Integrated Circuit Topography Act. Each of these acts is concerned with specific aspects of intellectual property. The government has tried to take a different approach here. We are putting together in one comprehensive bill a number of technical amendments concerning each of the acts I just mentioned. The procedure is comparable to what is done through the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act.

To my knowledge, this is the first time Parliament has tried to deal with administrative and technical changes to all legislation governing a specific field like intellectual property.

This use of framework legislation may set new standards for dealing effectively and appropriately with the business of Parliament.

This is a time of rapid technological change. It is absolutely essential, in a very competitive world economy, to keep abreast of the latest developments with respect to intellectual property. Outdated legislation is costly for Canadians. It restricts innovation and creativity in developing new products and industrial processes.

It is difficult to amend legislation as complex and sensitive as the provisions on intellectual property. Over the years attempts to do so have caused considerable controversy. That is why we are delighted with the way all concerned have co-operated in getting this bill back to the House for third reading this afternoon.

The bill was the subject of a very useful analysis in committee, and I had the privilege of sitting on the legislative committee in question. The bill was amended to reflect proposals made by members of all parties here in the House of Commons. Most of the provisions of the bill remained unchanged.

The Patent Act will be amended to permit the deposit of a sample of biological material with a patent application. Further amendments will allow for electronic filing of documents and correcting a number of technical problems.

As a result of amendments that will be made to the Trade-marks Act, the requirement to record licensees as registered users will be abolished.

Administrative amendments to the Copyright Act will improve the operation and administration of the copyright office.

According to the Industrial Design Act, the validity of a registration will no longer be affected if the registration was filed in the wrong name.

These are only a few of the amendments the bill contains. It makes sense to deal with such technical and administrative details in one comprehensive and flexible bill.

Those who work in the field of intellectual property view many of the amendments proposed here this afternoon as critically urgent. We have the support of those who will be affected by this bill as well. Among other things, we benefitted from the expert advice of the intellectual property advisory committee.

What will be the effect of these amendments? The bill will reduce fees for users of intellectual property by eliminating a number of technical obstacles. It will promote a more efficient administration of the five acts governing this field. Bill S-17 clarifies the wording of certain sections of our legislation on intellectual property. It also simplifies some regulatory procedures. It allows the implementation of technological changes but, more importantly, it promotes a better use of intellectual property in Canada by making it more accessible.

These changes do not aim at replacing the in depth review of Canadian laws on intellectual property. The government modernized and streamlined a good number of acts affected by these amendments, and it will continue to improve them. The measures in Bill S-17 are a necessary complement to the more important changes which have been made and which will continue to be made.

In the high-tech economy of the nineties, prosperity depends on creativity and innovation. Bill S-17, which eliminates the technical and administrative obstacles preventing us from being fully competitive at the international level, will benefit all Canadians.

[English]

This afternoon on third reading of Bill S-17 I am happy to be able to mention the importance of the collaboration the government has received with the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party of Canada. As I mentioned earlier, I was honoured to be able to sit on the legislative committee, an important committee. The good co-operation of all parties involved enabled us to proceed rapidly with these changes so essential for Bill S-17.

[Translation]

I urge all members of this House to support Bill S-17 and pass it as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, as we get to final reading on this particular bill, it is important to review a little bit of process.

As my hon. colleague who sat on the committee and sits on the consumer and corporate affairs committee with me rightly indicated, this bill is most aptly described as a bill that is corrective surgery. It seeks to try to make a number of amendments to a number of acts dealing with intellectual property. Indeed five acts are covered by this particular bill. This bill was initiated in the Senate which although is within our rules of procedure does not happen very often.

The bill amends the Copyright Act, the Industrial Design Act, the Integrated Circuit Topography Act, the Patent Act and the Trade-marks Act. Most of the amendments that have been put forward in this bill are of a housekeeping nature. Most of the amendments seek to streamline some of the regulatory mechanisms within those various agencies that administer these acts to try to ensure that there is some continuity of regulation in how intellectual property is dealt with in Canada.

When we started debate on this bill after it came over from the other place, the government indicated it wanted the bill passed very quickly. We on this side of the House said that we had read the bill and had looked at the debate that had taken place. We did not see that there was anything so special in the bill that it should not have the scrutiny of a committee.

The reason we did that was not because we thought there was anything terribly contentious in it, but because as a matter of practice we believed it was important, no matter how minor or how unanimous the consent on certain aspects of legislation, that the process be followed through in order to ensure that any individual who wished to provide input had the ability to do so.

I am not going to repeat the very good overview my hon. colleague gave on the various amendments and how they affected those particular five acts that had been alluded to. However, one of the concerns we on this side had was on this new direction that seems to have been forged in the last few years where parliamentarians give far too much of their authority to legislate and the responsibility to review legislation to the Governor in Council.

In short, what happens in many cases is rather than get a lot of the cumbersome matters for full and thorough debate on the floor of the House of Commons, the government simply delegates the responsibility to the executive branch through Governor in Council.

My colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and I indicated at the time that we wanted to ensure when this bill went forward that we had the benefit of listening to the officials. We wanted to find out what was the full and total impact of a lot of this regulation-making authority that this bill seemed to be taking out of the hands of parliamentarians and giving to the Governor in Council.

Indeed, during the committee hearings most of my fears were put to rest. Most of what is being done is not so onerous that we should be concerned, even though there are one or two little clauses in the bill that allow the Governor in Council to set or prescribe fees. That always gives us some concern over here. On far too many occasions we have seen the bunch opposite take the opportunity of making a little tax big. That way they can fill their coffers with additional revenues. That being said and done, we believe the bill is worth supporting.

It is interesting to note the different way that this bill came about. The bill came about after a fairly rigorous examination of the five acts by a special committee. That special committee was made up of various stakeholders in intellectual property that would be covered by the five acts. Before this bill came forward there was a tremendous level of consultation. Indeed, many other aspects of standardization and harmonization of intellectual property regulation were on the table. However, the advisory committee did not believe there was enough consensus to go forward with those, so it did not. Therefore, there are still a lot of issues that have to be debated and dealt with.

One of the acts that has been amended is the Patent Act. It is interesting to note that the government in this case sought the advice of an advisory committee before it went forward. A very high degree of consensus was required before it came forward with the bill. However, in November and December of this year when we last did amendments to the Patent Act, this government believed it was not important to consult or to go through any advisory committee. It was simply going to succumb to the pressures of the multinational drug companies and the U.S. trade negotiators during the Reagan–Bush era to basically cash in the rights of Canadians to have access to generic drugs, lower cost prescriptions and to have some competition in the work place.

The reason I raise this point is that it is interesting that within three months the government seems to have done two things. First, when dealing with patent acts and patent law it came into the House with a bill that was universally panned by provincial health care ministers, by private insurers and by the health care industry in general. Anybody who knew anything about the health care system and pharmaceuticals in Canada said that that was a horrendous bill. Last fall they said that those changes to the Patent Act could well cost the Canadian health care system anywhere from $7 billion to $12 billion, that it would drive up the cost of prescription drugs.

Did the government consult these people? No, it did not. That is something we have to look at. The government did not consult at that point in time. As a matter of fact the government was so hell–bent to get that piece of legislation through it imposed closure every step of the way in the House of Commons.

The people and their representatives, the people who sit on all sides of this House who are responsible to the Canadian public, were not allowed to have a full airing. When it was sent to committee, it is interesting how differently that Patent Act change was dealt with from this one. The government sent it to committee with a loaded gun at the temples of a lot of the opposition members. We were told before we heard one single individual say one single thing about those changes to the Patent Act that we were allowed to have eight or ten hours of committee hearings. If we did not like it, the government would shut it down using the big, blunt instrument of closure.

Those amendments to the Patent Act had the potential to devastate our health care system in Canada. We know they will cause higher drug costs. We even had a report a few weeks ago from the government's own Patented Medicine Prices Review Board. INCO is a very large important industry in Ontario. We found out today that its health care costs are going through the roof primarily because of rising drug costs. It would have been nice if the government had decided consultation was as important as what it obviously deemed it was for these technical changes when it set about making those fundamental changes to the Patent Act back in the fall.

In conclusion we on this side will support this initiative. The bill itself will do a lot to tidy up many of the regulations in place. However, we implore the government to be consistent. When it feels technical regulations have to be changed it has to consult with the stakeholders in the industry.

Surely to goodness when it goes into things like the Patent Act to change patent protection and kill the generic industry in Canada it should not use a back door approach to consultation saying: "We will tell you once we make up our mind". It should have done the same thing. It should have slowed the process down and brought in the health care ministers the users, the private insurers to what the impact of those changes would be, just like it did when it was dealing with technical amendments to these bills, but in particular the Patent Act.

The Liberal Party and I support not only the clauses in this bill, but we also support the process which brought it about, the process of consultation, a process that we see used far too seldom by this government in this Parliament.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, again it is my honour and privilege to raise certain issues dealing with this bill before us.

I will start by saying that I support Bill S–17 which originated in the other place. The speed of its passage up to now in the House of Commons has been remarkable. If the passage of other bills were as quick as this we would certainly have a bit more faith in this place. This bill was dealt with very quickly. It is essentially non–controversial and is one which has as its chief impact, I would say, a housekeeping purpose. It does that very well.

This bill amends five pieces of intellectual property legislation: the Patent Act, the Trade-marks Act, the Industrial Design Act, the Copyright Act and—hold on to your boots for this one, because it is not that easy to understand—the Integrated Circuit Topography Act. For all of us who are computer buffs what that means is that it is essentially dealing with computer circuits and software. Someone actually putting that software on the market has the right to expect a certain amount of protection.

This is a kind of technological nouveauté, it is new. We have been behind in this type of patent protection for many years and now we are trying to step on board and protect makers of all kinds of computer circuits and software. Generally it is house cleaning and it is very good house cleaning at that.

The bill in general sets forth different administrative practices and procedures so that Canada can come into the 21st century on the same wavelength as other countries as far as patent protection is concerned. This bill provides for a quid pro quo, reciprocity between countries as far as patent protection is concerned.

The five different intellectual property acts I was mentioning earlier are all related. Collectively they provide framework legislation that governs innovative activities of Canadian industry and research organizations and businesses.

• (1600)

The bill is very technical. It is very difficult for people who are not in the patent protection business or industry to really understand at first glance. Even the French translation sends one to Le Petit Robert on many occasions. It is very interesting. Some of the words actually look like they have just come on the scene for the first time.

It is interesting to note that the impetus for this particular bill comes from the private sector. We as parliamentarians have been asked by the private sector to give it the guidelines and the protections it seeks in order to know on which foot to dance in the realm of patent protection.

I would say that the amendments to the intellectual property patent system have been a long time in coming. They have come about through a consultative process that has been most exhaustive. Several dozen private, public and quasi-public organizations and government organizations have been consulted. The fact that the bill is non-controversial right now shows the value of broad consultation before starting to put things on paper. At least before starting to translate things into both official languages people should generally agree on the terms and definitions. That is why I think this bill is moving along so rapidly. Once again, it is a bill that receives wide political support.

Bill S-17 will encourage more accessible and effective use of intellectual property in Canada without a doubt. It will contribute to efficiencies in government and hopefully reduce costs to intellectual property users by eliminating a number of technical problems and improving the administration of the various acts.

Some of the amendments proposed in the bill will correct some serious technical problems with respect to a patent on a particular seed that has been developed. We are into bioengineering now, and when we try to describe what the seed does, what is different and why there should be a patent on it, it is very difficult.

The bill allows the giving to the government of the biological specimen and for others to examine and analyse it, in addition to describing what it does, what is different and how it came about. It removes one of the problems we had in the past in a Supreme Court decision where under the law as it existed prior to this bill coming into force, or as the law now stands actually, there had to be full disclosure as there always was. In addition to disclosure of what it does and a written description, the biological specimen could not be put as a deposit to meet the requirements of the Patent Act that way.

If this law is passed it will give researchers and people who want to look into the whole patent field in biological engineering several pathways with which they can check the patent they are looking forward to obtaining or how their product differs from a particular biological product, whether it is a seed or any other biological product.

I would like to make clear however that we are not talking about patenting life forms or new life forms. We are not going to have a particular cow that is going to be the property of Merck drugs, for example, which farmers will have to buy if they want the particular cow. We are not going to have life forms patented. On the question of limited specific senses of bioengineering we are going to have a certain amount of latitude where researchers can patent their discoveries, but it will be very limited.

In reading what the government has already said, before we get into life forms and patenting life forms in a general sense we are going to have very exhaustive debate because there we are dealing with a very serious issue.

If there is a better seed developed which is similar to what has been developed in the past but is one that has specific properties then a company can withhold permission for this particular seed, and the properties of the seed, which may be able to feed the entire population of one country in terms of the way it does its cultivating. Then we have a serious problem. This country would perhaps have to pay some very high royalties in order to obtain something which it should be able to have if not for free then for very little extra money.

We have to discuss very carefully this question of patenting life forms. That is why I welcome the fact that the government is looking at it very carefully before it proceeds in a legislative sense.

I would like to mention the Copyright Act, as it is the main piece of intellectual property legislation which permits the deposit of biological specimens or products. Under the Copyright Act there is another problem and that concerns the fixing of fees.

One of the problems with the government's Patent Act and other acts we have had prior to the Patent Act is that when the government fixes fees, whether it is for a patent application or a patent that is actually given to a particular company or researcher, it uses these fees as a system of taxation and they become very onerous. They actually become very self-defeating. In many cases they are much more than they should be because of the government's desperate desire to raise revenue.

It is funny that I am saying that today on budget day. In an hour we are going to see how the government is going to increase other fees.

On the question of the Patent Act and the intellectual property pieces of legislation which are involved in Bill S-17, we are allowing the government to fix the fees whether or not they happen to be in keeping with inflation without coming back here to Parliament. The court cases we have seen in the past show that the government cannot fix fees far in excess of what the normal cost of the administration of the act is.

That is the job of Parliament. If we are going to tax people we should tax them and say this is a tax. We have to vote as representatives of the people and say that we believe we have to increase taxes by 5 per cent, 6 per cent or 7 per cent, and then we as representatives go back to our ridings and are judged by what we have done.

We cannot do it in a back-door way by letting the government establish a back-door mechanism for increasing fees and levying fees that may or may not be suitable or may be in excess of what it really takes in order to administer the act.

Probably the most serious caveat I have with regard to Bill S-17 is the fact that it gives this power to the government that I do not think it should have. When this legislation comes to the committee on statutes and regulations it may run into trouble for precisely that point.

Other parts of this bill deal with house cleaning. For example, clause 4 of the Copyright Act eliminates the requirement that entries in the copyright register be personally signed by the Registrar of Copyright or the Commissioner of Patents. That is a sound idea.

I have already mentioned clause 8 of this bill, which I disagree with, which would give the Governor in Council the power to make regulations and prescribe fees to be paid to the copyright office for anything required or authorized to be done in the administration of the Copyright Act. That is giving a little too much authority and that concerns me.

In general, if we look at the efficiencies that are gained and if we look at the fact that from now on people wishing to have applications filed and treated by the patent granting authorities of the government—and I should say that we certainly do need efficiency because there is a huge backlog. I understand there are thousands upon thousands of applications pending. Part of this legislation will allow the electronic filing of these applications, which will increase the efficiency as well.

It is important to note that although there is a serious reservation concerning the question of fees this is a piece of legislation on which we feel that the New Democratic Party, and we are happy to see that the Liberals are also on board on this, can agree with the government that it is something that is long overdue.

I hope the government will take note of this because this is not a rare occasion in which all parties say they agree with a bill, with a certain legislation. We hear constantly from the government that the opposition is always in opposition and never says that the government does anything right. It is against the law of averages that this government could do everything wrong. Now and then it is going to stumble upon something which needs doing and which is done right. This is one of those rare occasions.

I wish the government would learn the lesson from this piece of legislation and in the future have a great deal more pre-consultative exercises in which it meets with the actual people concerned with the legislation.

Mr. Lewis: It is inclusive.

Mr. Edmonston: One of my friends, the hon. minister, talks about inclusiveness. Perhaps the word is inclusiveness but I think it is just consultation. We need to talk to the people of this country, not at the people of this country. We need to make sure that what we are doing here is absolutely necessary and improves the situation. I think this does.

I am proud to be a member of this Parliament in which we can all agree upon something. I hope that in the future we will see other pieces of legislation that allow us to do the same thing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In accordance with the agreement reached earlier today, I now suspend the sitting of the House until 4.30 p.m.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 4.14 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 4.33 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 83(2), the House will now deal with Ways and Means Motion No. 30 which derives from the financial statement.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would like to take this opportunity to express my sincere appreciation to the thousands of Canadians who have communicated with me in the preparation of this budget. I would also like to thank the many who participated in the pre-budget consultation process and all those who gave me the benefit of their thoughts, ideas and suggestions in the preparation of the budget.

I also want to say thank you to my colleagues on this side of the House, and indeed to all members of the House of Commons who have from time to time offered suggestions, sometimes in the crossfire of debate. Excellent suggestions have come from the House and from my cabinet colleagues. I want to thank them very much for their support. Most of all I want to thank the Prime Minister for his constant support and guidance and particularly for the confidence that he has expressed in me in discharging this very important position. I want to thank him very much for his ongoing support, advice and good counsel. I hope that it has been put to good use in this particular budget.

Today I am presenting a budget that will deliver: no new taxes; no tax increases; more than $30 billion in spending cuts and other measures; zero real growth for federal spending on programs and services; the lowest federal program spending as a share of the economy in more than 30 years; the elimination of all new federal borrowing within five years and a strong, positive initiative for a co-operative national attack on all government debt.

Since my hon. friends across the way did not get it all let me repeat it in French.

[Translation]

Speaker. No new taxes and no tax increases. More than $30 billion in spending cuts. Zero real growth for federal spending on programs and services. The lowest federal program spending in 30 years. The elimination of all new federal borrowing within five years and a federal-provincial attack on the public debt.

[English]

The goal of this budget is to free the economy for more job creating growth by steadily reducing the burden of deficits and debt. Today I will also outline a process to bring federal and provincial governments together to work toward that goal.

There is only one taxpayer. Canadians want a national solution to the national debt problem and they want their governments to act now.

• (1640)

This budget sets out a responsible, achievable course of action. It builds upon the actions in previous federal budgets but recognizes that a problem that began two decades ago cannot disappear overnight.

It also underlines that by working together as governments and as Canadians we can make an immediate and fundamental change for the better in the prospects of our economy, our country and our people.

This budget is presented at a time of unprecedented concern about the collective spending and borrowing habits of our governments. Canadians are justified in their concerns. They know that a household cannot keep running up credit card bills and borrowing to pay interest. They have seen what happens when governments act as if they are exempt from the same basic rules of common sense.

Here is what happens: Taxpayers pay more and more for less and less service from government because interest eats up a growing share of the tax dollar. Those higher taxes act as a break on the economy. Less economic activity means less growth and fewer jobs.

Home owners pay higher mortgage rates because government borrowing drives up the price of money. Higher interest rates discourage investors and consumers and that too means less growth and fewer jobs.

Finally, in an effort to maintain a standard of living that we no longer earn, we rely more and more on foreign lenders. This leaves Canada with less and less control of its own economic future and the income that we do earn goes increasingly to pay interest to foreigners.

Canadians want to keep control of their future. They want their governments to have the means to maintain vital social support services and the flexibility to respond to emerging priorities. Less borrowing, lower taxes, more jobs and more choice: that is the direction in which people want to go. That is the direction in which this government is going.

This government has been and is fully committed to helping Canadians build a stronger economy that creates jobs and that can adapt, compete and prosper in a new more competitive and rapidly changing global economy.

That is why we have continued to move forward on policies such as bold trade initiatives to secure and expand access to markets; innovative job training measures to help Canadians adapt to a changing work place; tax reforms to increase incentives for work, investment and prosperity and regulatory reform and privatization to reduce the burden of government and improve efficiency.

Most of all, we must and will continue with our firm, responsible spending control policies. That is of fundamental importance as we set forth on this debate. Since 1984-85 we have made real progress in a changing, uncertain world economy. We have cut the average annual growth of federal program spending from 13.8 per cent to 14.1 per cent. We have cut the federal deficit from 8.7 per cent to 5.1 per cent as a proportion of our national income.

We have turned an operating deficit into an operating surplus. This means the government now spends less on programs and services than it raises in revenues and has done so for the last six years.

Over the past few years, a persistent and painful global economic slowdown has repeatedly forced governments, businesses and households in Canada and indeed around the world to adjust their plans for the future. This has hastened the basic restructuring of our economy in response to global economic change.

To help Canadians cope with the economic downturn and adapt to global competition, we took firm action in the February 1992 budget and the December statement.

We cut personal income taxes. We enriched and restructured the child benefit system to help families with low or moderate incomes. This is injecting $1.7 billion into the economy this year alone.

We introduced the Home Buyer's Plan to help Canadians buy or build homes using funds from their RRSPs. More than $1.4 billion of these funds have been invested in homes by 148,000 Canadians.

We increased our already substantial support for small businesses, the prime source of new job creation in Canada. They are now creating more new jobs.

We substantially improved access for small business to financing by overhauling the Small Businesses Loans Act. Indications are that banks will lend more than an additional $1 billion to small businesses this year.

• (1645)

We increased to $3.8 billion our investment in Canada's most important resource, the knowledge and skills of its people. This will benefit more than one million Canadians this year alone.

We announced major new strategic capital investments in Canada's national transportation and communication networks. A start is now being made on infrastructure projects creating 15,000 person-years of employment with an additional 15,000 to come from further projects to be announced in the weeks and months ahead.

We provided tax relief for manufacturers and since August manufacturing shipments have grown at an annual rate of almost 15 per cent. In February unfilled orders increased 5 per cent, the largest increase in almost five years.

These measures are being funded out of savings from last year's budget and the December statement. They have been implemented and they are working. The bottom line is jobs; 200,000 full-time jobs created since last August.

In December, following on the Prosperity Initiative, we set aside an additional $400 million over five years for further tax changes in three areas which are important to economic growth and job creation.

Today I am proposing tax changes to improve the treatment of rapidly depreciating new equipment; strengthen the ability of Canadian firms to access new technologies and improve the effectiveness of incentives, particularly for small innovative companies. The details of this initiative are contained in the supplementary information which I will be tabling.

In response to representations on the equity capital needs of smaller knowledge-based firms, we will also explore ways to develop mechanisms to encourage investors to support local companies and at the same time lend their expertise to help the companies succeed.

In 1992 we broadened and deepened the Expenditure Control Plan which was introduced in the 1990 budget. We did not increase taxes for Canadians, but we did cut departmental operating budgets. We cut cabinet ministers' salaries and froze salaries for MPs and all public servants. We reduced grants and subsidies to most organizations by 10 per cent and we streamlined government by eliminating or restructuring agencies, commissions and boards. We also took action to control unemployment insurance costs.

We have delivered. Program spending in 1992-93 is on target with the December forecast and $500 million below the target in last year's budget.

As we all know, during 1992 the world economy grew more slowly than expected. The result for Canada was lower than expected growth, lower revenues and higher deficits. For 1992-93 revenues were more than $9 billion lower than forecast in February 1992. Regrettably these lower than expected revenues have brought the deficit for 1992-93 to $35.5 billion, $1.1 billion higher than forecast in December. I am disappointed by this setback and share the concern expressed by the moans of the members opposite. We must take action and we are taking action.

We are taking corrective action to keep the 1993–94 deficit on target at $32.6 billion and we are tackling the medium–term deficit challenge with aggressive new action. I hope I have the support of hon. members across the way.

This budget sets out a five–year plan to eliminate new borrowing by further cutting back spending and by making government leaner and more efficient. The key to the plan is this: Federal government program expenditures will be held to zero real growth, that is growth no greater than inflation.

The measures in this budget extend and reinforce the actions in the December statement. They will yield combined savings of $3.8 billion in 1993–94, rising to $7.9 billion in 1997–98. All told, these measures will save $30.7 billion over the five–year period.

I want to emphasize again there are no tax increases in this budget. We believe that there are only two ways to reduce the deficit: higher revenues and lower spending. The right way to get the deficit down is by cutting spending. The right way to get revenues up is to encourage more economic growth and we cannot do that by raising taxes.

The first priority in reducing spending cuts is to cut the operating costs of government. Since 1984–85 these costs have been tightly and repeatedly restrained. As a result, operating costs have declined to just under 15 per cent of total program spending in 1991–92. The real cost of delivering programs has been cut by a full 14 per cent.

To further reduce the cost of government, I am announcing the following actions:

Departmental operating budgets, including reserves for contingencies and new initiatives, will be cut by an additional $300 million in both 1993–94 and 1994–95, rising to $1.2 billion in 1997–98. Including the wage freeze and the operating budget reductions in the December statement, the reduction by 1997–98 will amount to 10 per cent. Total savings will be $7.5 billion over the five–year period.

These are significant cuts. They will force increases in productivity but will also result in reduced service levels and the closure of offices and points of service. To improve efficiency while cutting costs, the federal government will have to employ fewer people. These are very challenging and difficult circumstances, but clearly it is in this area that we must extract greater efficiencies.

Defence spending will be frozen in real terms beginning in 1994–95. Together with the actions taken in December, this will generate savings of $361 million in 1993–94, rising to $2 billion in 1997–98, for a total of $5.9 billion over the five–year period.

Funding for the research councils will be held to 1.5 per cent annual growth rate after 1994–95.

The same constraint of 1.5 per cent annual growth will be placed on government spending on international assistance. Canada's efforts in this area will continue to compare favourably with those of other major industrial countries.

Most of the grants and contributions already reduced by 10 per cent this year and next will be reduced by 15 per cent in 1995–96 and 20 per cent thereafter. This measure underlines the need for greater self–reliance on the part of advocacy groups and other private sector organizations.

We must also ensure that we obtain maximum value for the money we spend by reducing economic distortions and ensuring that we meet the global competitive challenge. Working closely with the affected parties, the government has begun a process of reform in the area of western grain transportation; and it intends to pursue reform in the application of Atlantic freight subsidies and in the dairy industry. To facilitate reform, the government is prepared to direct back to these sectors savings from the deepening of the cuts in grants and contributions.

In the December 1992 statement, funding for regional development was reduced by 10 per cent for both 1993–94 and 1994–95. This reduction is now being extended. In addition, this funding will be reduced by a further $90 million in 1993–94, rising to $100 million per year beginning in 1994–95. Over time there will be a shift from grants to repayable contributions. This will provide a pool of funds for new regional development projects and reduce the need for government financing. By 1997–98, the yield from the repayment of contributions will amount to at least $100 million per year, and that will be available for projects for funding in all regions of Canada.

In addition, the government will not renew economic and regional development agreements in both forestry and mining as they expire over the next few years. We will also review the future of ERDA agreements in other sectoral areas.

With respect to major Crown corporations, operating subsidies will be reduced by $50 million in 1995–96 and by $100 million per year thereafter for both the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and VIA Rail Canada.

As well, the unemployment insurance benefit rate will be extended at the current level.

With respect to social housing, the government, through the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, will not increase its current support of about $2 billion a year for social housing. CMHC will no longer fund housing through 35-year subsidy commitments which impose most of the costs of today's housing support on future taxpayers. Funds to maintain existing housing in good repair, and scope for new commitments, will be found through increased efficiencies in program financing and delivery. CMHC's special purpose funding for shelters for victims of family violence, for housing on Indian reserves and for the integration of persons with disabilities will continue as planned.

There are two major areas representing about $50 billion in annual federal program spending, or about 40 per cent of the total, which have again been exempted from reductions.

Income security benefits for the elderly, programs specifically for the disabled, veterans' pensions and allowances, selected native programs, the Canadian Jobs Strategy and famine relief are all exempt from cuts in this budget.

Second, in recognition of the national nature of the fiscal problem, no additional restraint is being imposed on major federal transfers to provinces. These transfers will continue to grow at a rate greater than all other federal program spending.

Because the major federal transfers to provinces are expected to grow by 4 per cent over the next five years, provinces will receive about $9 billion more than they would have if these transfers were to be restrained to the same 1.5 per cent rate of growth as all other federal program spending. As an example, for a province like Newfoundland, allowing this higher growth rate in transfers means over $400 million more. That is almost twice the size of Newfoundland's deficit this year and it is equal to $700 for each Newfoundlander.

With respect to the Spending Control Act, as promised in the 1992 budget the government will act to reduce the control program spending limits under the Spending Control Act to reflect the impact of legislating the full funding of pensions and restructuring of the child benefit system.

In addition, the limits under the act will be further reduced by law to bring them into line with the low inflation environment and to ensure a permanent lowering of government spending. The new lower limits will also be extended to the end of 1997–98.

I turn now to the business of government operations and the need for streamlining. Like Canadian businesses, governments must reduce costs and operate more efficiently. The measures in this budget have been designed to encourage continued improvement.

To provide managers the flexibility to do their jobs and make more effective use of shrinking resources, the government will seek basic changes in the work force adjustment directive when it meets with the unions this summer for the scheduled triennial review.

The government will continue to streamline its operations and improve the cost effectiveness of its service delivery. We will make government smaller, simpler and more accessible to Canadians. Building on the streamlining actions in the 1992 budget, an additional 12 government organizations ranging from large departments to small agencies and advisory bodies are being eliminated or restructured.

We will complete the organizational merger of the two Departments of Taxation and Customs and Excise into a single new Department of National Revenue. This will provide for more effective administration of the tax system, including better use of resources to combat tobacco smuggling and to improve compliance generally. Efforts will be stepped up to ensure the taxes owing are paid and paid in a timely way.

Eight advisory and other bodies whose functions are no longer needed or can be carried out in another way will be eliminated. Two other advisory bodies, the National Advisory Council on Aging and the National Council on Welfare, will be merged.

With respect to privatization, since 1984 the government has privatized or dissolved 39 Crown enterprises and other holdings and improved operations for the remainder. The number of full-time Crown corporation employees has been reduced by nearly 90,000. Building on these initiatives, a number of organizations in various areas of government will be considered for privatization or commercialization. Details are in the supplementary information.

In the eyes of the business client, a bewildering array of federal, provincial, municipal and private sector services are being offered, leaving the impression of complexity, overlap, duplication and all-around inefficiency.

In response to these concerns I announced in the February 1992 budget several initiatives aimed at improving service. As part of this effort three pilot business centres have been established to provide a single point of contact for business services. They are now in operation in Edmonton, Winnipeg and Halifax. The government will be working with other levels of government to provide one of these centres in at least one major urban area in each province. The result will be better service for business and cost savings for governments. I am pleased to advise that at the present time there are current discussions under way with respect to the establishment of one in Vancouver, in Toronto and in Montreal.

The excessive regulatory burden has long been an obstacle to business and enterprise. In the 1992 budget the government launched a major review of regulatory programs. This initiative is well advanced. Preliminary analysis of more than 700 regulations suggests that one in four will be struck from the books. An equal number will be modified. These actions will result in substantial cost savings to the private sector and the government. My colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, will provide an update on the progress of this review later this week.

The federal government will encourage all governments to review regulatory programs with the goal of reducing overlap and duplication and ensuring maximum efficiency and benefit for all Canadians.

Reducing the compliance cost for taxpayers remains a high priority. On December 10, 1992 the government introduced a simplified system for calculating GST input tax credits. Since then we have continued to work with the small business community. We will be announcing improvements to the quick method of GST accounting which will simplify the tax for hundreds of thousands of small businesses.

Today I am also proposing measures to streamline government and improve cash management. The quarterly instalment income tax system will be modified. The result of this will provide for some 300,000 persons owing relatively small amounts of tax who will no longer have to make instalments. An additional 500,000 higher income taxpayers will now be required to pay on a quarterly basis. As well, beginning in 1994 the GST credit for individuals will be paid twice a year, in April and October, instead of quarterly. This will save $7.5 million in administration costs while delivering the same benefit to the recipient.

I turn now to the economic outlook for Canada. With the help of the measures I have described and the growing benefits of the government's wide range of economic renewal actions since 1984, the Canadian economy is improving and is poised for strong performance in the years ahead. For example, the OECD has forecast that Canada will have the strongest economic growth among the G-7 industrial countries this year and next.

In the past few months we have seen an encouraging pick-up in the pace of economic growth, employment, retail sales and a number of other key indicators. Strongest of all has been our export performance, currently the main force behind the recovery. Our export strength has been underpinned by the dramatic improvement in our cost competitiveness and our increased access to the U.S. market under the free trade agreement. Strong export performance will continue to help the recovery through 1993 and 1994.

I expect real growth to average close to 3 per cent for 1993 and to increase to more than 4.5 per cent in 1994 as the recovery becomes more broadly based. Domestic demand will be spurred by low interest rates. I expect a strong rebound in both residential investment and business investment.

Job prospects will improve steadily. I expect employment to increase by about 300,000 from the fourth quarter of 1992 to the fourth quarter of this year and more than 400,000 during 1994. These gains will be accompanied by strong growth in labour productivity resulting from extensive restructuring and the structural policy reforms we have put in place. In the near term the unemployment rate will decline slowly because of an expected increase in the labour force participation rate, but employment will grow by 1.7 per cent in 1993 and by 3 per cent in 1994.

Inflation will remain low. I expect inflation to average 2.5 per cent in 1993 compared with 1.5 per cent in 1992, which reflects the recent depreciation in Canadian currency and some provincial indirect tax increases. I expect inflation to decline once again to below 2 per cent in 1994. This sustained low inflation will help keep interest rates low and I expect further declines in long-term rates.

For the period from 1995 to 1998 our fiscal projections are based on the following economic assumptions: economic growth at an average of 4.25 per cent; a decline in the unemployment rate to 7.5 per cent by 1998; inflation averaging 1.5 per cent; and interest rates remaining low.

I believe that these are indeed prudent assumptions. They project real economic output rising over the medium term but still remaining somewhat below the economy's full potential by 1998.

Indeed there are uncertainties to be faced, but I believe that Canadians can look forward to several years of solid growth in job creation in an environment favourable for confidence, investment and business expansion.

• (1705)

I turn now to the fiscal situation. The expenditure control measures in this budget will restore the fiscal balance of the federal government over the medium term. Federal program spending will be reduced to 13.9 per cent of Canada's national income in 1997-98. That is the lowest level in more than 30 years. Excluding transfers to provinces, program spending will grow at an average annual rate of only 1.5 per cent. That is below the projected average inflation rate.

The last time that program expenditures were held at or below this level of growth was in the early fifties, 40 years ago. Furthermore this low level has been achieved on only five different occasions since Confederation. This indeed is an historical breakthrough. It is an historical plan and it is a reasonable plan.

There will be substantial year-over-year reductions in the deficit. As a result, by 1997-98—it is really amazing when you start getting to them over there they start squirming—the government will end all new borrowing in domestic and foreign financial markets and will begin to reduce its publicly held debt.

Interest payments on the debt will be reduced from a peak of 36 cents for each dollar of revenue in 1990-91 to 26 cents in 1997-98. The deficit will be reduced to less than 1 per cent of national income, down from the current level of 5.1 per cent and 8.7 per cent in 1984-85. This is the lowest level in more than 25 years.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and I say to my colleagues across the way: Good fiscal policy is good economic policy and sustained fiscal progress is essential for sustained economic growth and job creation.

I now turn to the issue of the national challenge of dealing with the deficit and the debt. We all know that all governments in Canada face similar financial problems. It is worth repeating once again that there is only one taxpayer.

Decisive action is required now to protect our collective ability to make choices in the future, to preserve our social programs, to create jobs and to ensure a prosperous and competitive economy. For that is the ultimate challenge that we all share.

More than ever, Canadians want all governments to work together on the challenges confronting the Canadian economy and particularly on the national deficit and debt problem, for this is truly a Canadian problem.

I meet regularly with provincial and territorial finance ministers to review the state of the economy and the country's finances. These meetings have led to a greater understanding of the fiscal situation which each of us faces. We have worked together on the costs of government and expenditure management, a review of pressures on government spending and experience in addressing these pressures. It has underlined the need for a lasting commitment to spending restraint by all levels of government.

I believe it is now time to go further. I note that a number of provincial premiers have emphasized the need for greater federal-provincial co-operation on practical solutions to Canada's fiscal problems. My conversations with provincial finance ministers have underlined this interest.

Consequently, I have invited my provincial and territorial colleagues to a special meeting in Ottawa on May 30 and 31 to begin working on a co-operative approach to the debt problem. I have spoken to each of the finance ministers personally.

• (1710)

The Prime Minister has written a letter to all the premiers supporting this initiative. Together we will discuss Canada's national debt and deficit problem and ways to develop practical approaches and practical solutions to the problem. This should be seen as a welcome initiative.

There are many possible areas for better co-operation: better sharing of information, ideas and experience; finding more efficient ways to deliver services to the public; eliminating wasteful overlap and duplication; improving harmonization; and collecting revenues more efficiently to reduce the compliance burden on Canadians.

In each and every one of these areas we can do better and I call upon all governments to join in this effort. I call upon all Canadians to support us in this very important effort.

In conclusion, Canadians want less government borrowing, lower taxes, more jobs and more choice for the future.

That is what this budget is all about. It charts a responsible, achievable course to increase the job-creating potential of our economy and to secure the financial health of government.

All governments and all taxpayers share that goal. But to achieve it will require national co-operation and sustained, concerted effort.

Canadians have faced some difficult times together. Time and again our people have pulled together to overcome adversity and build a stronger country.

Today as a country we face major economic and financial challenges. But let us remember that we are solidly on course for success. The signs of progress are growing: Canadian businesses are becoming more competitive and Canadian workers more productive; exports have surged and employment is rising again; inflation is near its lowest level in 30 years; and the deficit/debt problem is increasingly being addressed.

The foundation for growth, jobs, and prosperity in the newly emerging economy is being put into place. It is there to be strengthened and built on for the greater benefit of all Canadians.

Realism tells us that it will not be easy to win the battle against high deficits and rising debt. But experience does show us that Canadians have what it takes to succeed.

With discipline, courage, and co-operation, we can achieve success, the kind of success that will make Canada a stronger, more prosperous country for the balance of this decade and the new century to come.

Before I sit down I would like to table the appropriate budgetary documents for the House and for all members.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, this is nothing more than a stale, warmed over budget from a tired Conservative government whose members have run up a white flag in the face of this jobless recovery, surrendering 1.5 million unemployed Canadians to more years of despair and hopelessness.

This budget is a fairy tale when it comes to the debt and the deficit.

[Translation]

It is a fairy tale, like all other Tory budgets, when it comes to dealing with the deficit and the debt.

[English]

All the Conservative budgets have been fairy tales on this subject. This Conservative Minister of Finance and his predecessor were always wrong in their forecasts of what they would achieve in terms of the debt and the deficit. Why should we believe that this minister knows what he is talking about when he says Conservatives can deal with the deficit in five years?

That is what he and his predecessor have been saying every year for the past nine years. They have been wrong every time.

• (1715)

The government's own budget papers today say that at the end of five years the public debt will go up from $450 billion this year to $563 billion.

When it comes to the debt and the deficit this Conservative government is like a pyromaniac being asked to be left in charge of the fire department.

After the additional pain to Canadians spelled out in this budget, by the end of the next five years, 1997-98 the deficit will still be $8 billion.

Of the two main Conservative leadership candidates one said she would get rid of the deficit entirely in five years. The other one said he would get rid of the deficit entirely in four years.

Today when the Minister of Finance said that at the end of five years there would still be an $8 billion deficit he is saying in effect that these two candidates do not know what they are talking about. Or they are saying to him that the Minister of Finance is an incompetent.

By the way, the Conservative government has set a new record today. The budget papers say that after nine years of its government Canada's foreign indebtedness has reached a new record since the last record of foreign indebtedness.

Guess when that was? It was back in 1961 under the last long-term Conservative government when John Diefenbaker was Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister seems to doubt that. I ask him to look at the budget papers where that 1961 date is spelled out. If the Prime Minister does not agree with this then he is saying he does not think his Minister of Finance knows what he is talking about.

The Minister of Finance admits that Conservative policies will still mean 11 per cent unemployment this year and about the same next year. He says that at the end of five years jobs and the economy will still be below Canada's productive capacity.

What an admission of defeat and surrender. The Conservatives now and in the future are condemning 1.5 million Canadians to more years of misery and despair.

[Translation]

Nothing but despair for our youth, for a whole generation of Canadians.

[English]

Canada can and must do better but it will not come from this budget. This Conservative government's message of despair, defeat and surrender is not the plan for economic growth, jobs and progress that Canadians need.

Liberals have begun presenting such a plan. We have been talking about it and we will be talking more about it in the course of this budget debate and all around the country.

One thing that is missing in this budget is anything about the helicopters and the $5.8 billion for them. There is money for helicopters but the Conservative government is cutting hundreds of millions of dollars from the GST rebate cheques for poor Canadians. We have money for helicopters but not for poor Canadians.

I want to move:

That the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 83(2) the motion is deemed adopted.

Consequently, pursuant to Standing Order 83(2), this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at ten o'clock a.m.

The House adjourned at 5.21 p.m.

GROSSE ÎLE HISTORIC SITE PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–423, an act to protect and enhance the historic site of Grosse Île.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Breaugh: Members may know that this has been the subject of hearings across Canada. Many people in the Irish community are very concerned, not that the Government of Canada will not develop this site but that it be done in a proper way, acknowledging the contribution and sacrifices made by Irish immigrants, particularly those who are buried on the site known as Grosse Île.

This strikes me as a reasonable way to proceed. Those who have some concerns on the matter will feel their concerns have been heard and protected and that this national historic site will remain forever a part of Canada, an ongoing monument to those Irish who died during the great famines.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Breaugh moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

IMMIGRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–424, an act to amend the Immigration Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to bring the Canadian Immigration Act up to date with current opinion in Canada and in the world but in which Canada may be a world leader.

In the past the immigration laws of the United Nations and of Canada reflected mainly the situation of men who were engaged in political activity or were religious leaders and were persecuted. Now it is becoming evident that women in some cases are persecuted because they are women.

This bill amends our Immigration Act so that it adds a sixth ground of recognized persecution. In addition to race, nationality, religion, membership in a particular group or political opinion, it would now read that a person may be found a refugee by reason of a well-founded fear of persecution for reasons of race, sex, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group or political opinion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Heap moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

VIOLENCE

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present thousands and thousands of names on a petition signed by people not just in Calgary but across western Canada in memory of young Ryan Garrioch who was brutally murdered on a school playground last May in Calgary.

• (1015)

They are drawing the attention of Parliament to the following: that the majority of Canadians support equal treatment of criminal offenders but with legislated aid shelters from criminal law for very young adolescents and that chapter 15 of the charter of rights guarantees equality rights.

Therefore these thousands of petitioners—and there are more to come on behalf of this family who is mourning—are requesting that Parliament revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated Juvenile Delinquents Act with a lowered maximum age of 13 years.

PLANNED PARENTHOOD

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I would also present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition signed by several people in western Canada.

Planned Parenthood, a special interest group is seeking government funding for a project known as SIRCH, which stands for sexuality, information and a resource clearing house. These funds of course come from the taxpayers and the citizens of Canada. Such a clearing house including a national depository collection, centralized reference and resource service, and a national toll-free line already exist through the national education organization, Alliance for Life.

The petitioners pray that Parliament will find that SIRCH is an unnecessary duplication of services. The undersigned in this petition humbly call upon Parliament to withhold all financial support from Planned Parenthood and the SIRCH project.

UNIVERSAL HEALTH CARE

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and privilege of presenting petitions on behalf of Canadian senior citizens who have lost a great deal of confidence in this government.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to take all necessary measures to entrench in the Constitution the obligation for the government to ensure publicly financed universal medical and health care systems.

[English]

I wonder if this government has the courage to take a step for our seniors.

HIGHWAYS

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, the petition I am presenting this morning has about 4,400 names on it. It was initiated by a group of college students in my riding.

It was started when one of their classmates was killed in a tragic traffic accident a few weeks ago. It is asking the government to arrange its priorities differently.

The student who lost her life was Deborah Utman. She was one of 24 people to die tragically in the past few years on that 40-kilometre stretch of highway leading from Highway 401 into the nation's capital.

Through this petition people living in the community served by this highway are asking this government to move on it and start a dialogue immediately with the Ontario provincial government for the completion of the highway into four lanes.

Of course the primary concern is the saving of lives. Of secondary importance would be the economic impact that the construction of that highway would have on the capital region and indeed all of eastern Ontario.

It is an honour to present this petition on behalf of my constituents.

HEALTH CARE

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, older citizens of my community have deposited, according to the normal procedures of the House through Standing Order 36, the following resolution. They consider universal medical care a fundamental element of the Canadian identity. They indicate that recent budgetary costs have had a serious impact on their health and have undermined the principles of universality.

These petitioners, these older citizens who have paid and wish to continue to pay and to benefit, have asked the government to take all the necessary measures so that within the Constitution of Canada there will be this obligation by governments to assure to all citizens that hospital and health care remain a universal principle by the state.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and pleasure, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition from over 100 residents of Toronto, York, Welland, Bond Head, Port Robinson, Kleinburg, Newmarket, Scarborough, Uxbridge, Sunderland, Willow Beach and Holland Landing.

These residents of Canada undersigned are concerned with the negotiations for a North American free trade agreement which they say will result and has already begun to result in even greater trade concessions being demanded of Canada, threatening even more good Canadian jobs.

It will also place restrictions on the ability of Canada's federal, provincial and territorial governments to assist industry to conserve Canadian natural resources for Canadians and to advance the social programs we need. The free trade agreement cannot be remedied through negotiation. The petitioners point out that there will be an election before January 1, 1994 when the free trade agreement is scheduled to come into force. Therefore they call on this House to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and to recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the privilege of presenting these petitions signed by not only my constituents but by people from all across the Toronto region.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to accept legislation designed to eliminate violence against women and children. They want to encourage and support women to report incidents of assault or abuse and provide relief and support to women as mothers to protect their children.

They want to emphasize the need for abuser rehabilitation and they want to concentrate special effort on the training of police, lawyers, court workers and judges to become knowledgeable about women and child abuse and to focus public attention on this very important and long ignored problem.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the students from the University of Saskatchewan who reflect the views of students from across Canada have asked me to present this petition which I do with a great deal of pleasure.

The petitioners condemn the goods and services tax on books and reading materials. In their opinion, the goods and services tax on books and learning materials has harmed publishers, bookstores, libraries, students and writers.

They ask the government to review its policy and rescind it.

SOCIAL SCIENCES

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition.

This is really the government's last chance because there will be a vote on this item today to delay the proposed merger of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council with the Canada Council.

These petitioners point out that Canada's most challenging problems are in the social sciences area. There are questions such as unemployment, poverty, et cetera. Without a vital Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council we could and will be at a disadvantage. Again, they ask the government to defer its decision.

I think this is a very reasonable request.

[English]

GORE BAY—MANITOULIN AIRPORT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by some 175 constituents of mine from Manitoulin Island. They are from such places like Gore Bay, Ice Lake, Mindemoya, Little Current, Spring Bay and Providence Bay.

These petitioners are calling on the government to maintain the manned weather station at the Gore Bay–Manitoulin airport. They point out that this has implications for safety at the airport. The staff at the weather station not only operate the weather station but they are also involved in areas of the operation of the airport itself relating to security, fuel sales, radio operation, scheduling of air flights, air ambulance, search and rescue, runway and beacon lighting.

We are not only dealing with five permanent jobs but also the operation of the airport and the long–term viability of that community as regards transportation and tourism.

These constituents of mine call on the government to retain and maintain the staffed weather station at the Gore Bay–Manitoulin airport.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of Kamloops, British Columbia who point out their disappointment that the government used a form of closure to limit the debate on the North America free trade agreement to less than five hours at the second reading stage. That is where we discuss the legislation in principle.

They point out that water is not an area of exclusion within the North American free trade agreement. They point out that raw logs are exempt, that unprocessed fish on the east coast of Canada are specifically made exempt but water is not.

• (1025)

The petitioners point out that at the moment there is a project where the backers intend to divert part of the North Thompson River and eventually sell that water in southern California. They are very concerned in terms of the ecological impact of this type of water diversion plan. They are asking that the Canadian government make water an exclusion from the free trade agreement so that our Canadian rivers and lakes will be saved for future generations here in Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Monday, April 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, when I moved the adjournment of the budget debate yesterday I described this budget as a white flag being raised by all the members of a tired Conservative government in surrender to a jobless recovery, a jobless economy. Perhaps I should have called the budget this government's shroud because this is surely the last will and testament of a dying government.

In this budget there is nothing for the unemployed, nothing for our young people entering the labour force hoping for a future. In fact the Minister of Finance is projecting unemployment at or near to 11 per cent well into 1994, a message of despair for the 1.5 unemployed Canadians and their families.

On page 21 of the budget papers themselves the Minister of Finance admits that unemployment will be high right through 1998, five years from now. Here is what the budget papers say:

> The medium-term projection underlying the fiscal plan is based on the assumption that some excess capacity in labour and product markets will remain through 1998.

Underneath this convoluted Department of Finance language the meaning is clear. There still will not be enough jobs five years from now for Canadians if this Conservative government stays in office, but I am sure this is not something Canadians will allow to happen.

Before he brought down his budget the Minister of Finance in effect admitted that putting Canadians back to work would not be his primary focus. He claimed that the deficit was his number one economic enemy.

Canadians are going to think that sounds rather strange coming from this Conservative government. Is this not the same government that said when it was first elected in 1984 that the deficit would be its priority? Is this not the same Conservative government that for the last nine years brought in deficit after deficit all in the $30 billion area? Is this not the same government that over these same nine years piled up more public debt than all previous governments since Confederation? I think so, Mr. Speaker, because there was an accumulated debt of $168 billion approximately by 1984, accumulated in the 117 years since Confederation. However, in only nine years of Conservative government, of Conservative fiscal mismanagement, that debt ballooned to $458 billion. Yet the Conservatives are the people who say they know how to run this country's affairs.

An hon. member: What a laugh.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): What a laugh, someone said. Canadians have tragically learned that is not the case.

Even after bragging last week about how his budget was going to fight the deficit, the minister when presenting his budget papers was still forecasting in them that the deficit would be $35.5 billion this year.

Even after five more years under his so–called deficit reduction plan the minister says there would still be a deficit left of $8 billion. Over that same period he plans, the Conservatives plan, to add over $100 billion more to the public debt bringing it to $563.2 billion by 1998.

Under this Conservative government more and more of Canada's debt is held by foreigners leaving us increasingly vulnerable to outside pressures. The government knows this. On page 26 of the budget the Minister of Finance admits that Canada's foreign indebtedness has not been as high since 1961. As I said last night, that was during the last period of long–term Conservative government when the Prime Minister was the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker.

When I pointed that out yesterday our present Conservative Prime Minister doubted this could be so, but here it is in black and white, right here in the Conservative budget and budget papers. This Conservative government and the present Prime Minister have beaten the record of the last Conservative government to the detriment of the Canadian people.

In fact the deficit for 1992–93 is $8 billion higher than this Minister of Finance said it would be in his February 1992 budget and $1.1 billion higher than he said it would be only last December in his economic statement. These guys really know how to forecast. Is that sound fiscal management? I do not think so and Canadians will not think so either.

I am sure that no Conservative members will be as disappointed with this Conservative deficit non–plan than the Minister of National Defence who said she could eliminate the deficit entirely in five years and the Minister of the Environment who then upped the ante saying that he could do it in only four years.

How are these ministers going to reconcile their leadership campaign promises with the Minister of Finance's budget? Will they vote against it because it does not meet these leadership promises? Or will they vote for it and acknowledge when it comes to fiscal realism they do not know what they are talking about? After all that is what the Minister of Finance in effect said himself about these two colleagues when he forecast yesterday a budget deficit of $8 billion, not zero but $8 billion five years from now.

If this budget is not believable when it comes to deficit control, exactly what does it do? Well it certainly does not set priorities. The Minister of Finance who wants to be known as "Maz the Knife" has said he is four square behind spending $5.8 billion on unneeded high–tech military helicopters which were planned for during a cold war that fortunately ended years ago.

His plan and the Conservative government's commitment is to spend this $5.8 billion at a time when in this budget the government is cutting funds for social housing, for low–income housing, for regional development and is even taking away the January GST rebate cheques from lower income Canadians.

Why is it that after all the talk, the hype, the sales pitches, the Conservatives have failed by their own admission to meet their own objective and bring the deficit under control? It is because they just do not get it. They fail to recognize that meaningful deficit reduction can only be expected when there is strong economic growth and strong increasing employment.

The Minister of Finance and the Conservatives admitted in the budget that government revenues have been weak and would continue to be weak for years under their projections. Why is this? It is because of a continuing weak economy and slow economic growth. The Tories have failed to realize that the deficit, employment, economic growth, inflation and taxation are all interrelated. What is required is a set of co–ordinated and balanced economic policies.

This is exactly what the Conservatives have not given Canadians over the past nine years. There is no doubt the deficit is a problem that must be dealt with. However, any fiscally responsible economic strategy must have two tracks. This is the Liberal approach, the Liberal plan.

The first track involves expenditure control through streamlining government and eliminating duplication while delivering the services that Canadians need. This must take place, we believe, in consultation and not in conflict with the provinces. In addition, the federal government must hold off on new programs that do not contribute to economic growth and job creation.

On the second track at the same time governments must foster economic growth and job creation. This means investing in people, research and development and infrastructure. When people are working it means higher government revenues without their having to pay higher taxes. At the same time governments do not have to spend on unemployment insurance and welfare.

Studies have confirmed that the one million Canadians who are unemployed cost the federal government more than $20 billion, likely $25 billion each and every year they remain out of work. If one million Canadians could be put back to work, it would free up $25 billion which could be directed to other productive purposes. This means these people would be put back to work. That is something for which the Conservatives have no plan. It is something for which the Conservatives have no commitment.

People often ask what government spending we Liberals would like to cut. By way of example, I have already mentioned the $5.8 billion military helicopter program. That is one area. I would also like to see a substantial cut in the $19 billion the government spends on unemployment insurance, not by cutting benefits but by putting people back to work.

Someone once said that to govern is to choose, but this Conservative government has a mania for making bad choices. For example, the Conservatives have no plan for jobs and growth. However, they do have a detailed plan for a multimillion dollar unnecessary farewell trip to Europe by the current Prime Minister. The Conservatives announced no plan for growth and jobs, but the Prime Minister's office has just announced all the details, the full agenda for the multimillion dollar farewell trip by the Prime Minister.

The egomania of the Prime Minister is more important than jobs for Canadians. Surely that cannot be right. Canadians can and will make sure that the next election will also be the farewell trip for the new Conservative leader and the Conservative government as well. We are going to have two farewell trips, one by the present Prime Minister and during the next election the farewell trip for his successor as well.

In my own city of Windsor and in cities just like it across this country, people have been devastated by Conservative policies that have brought recession and unemployment. Policies like the GST and the trade deals have closed factories and produced hundreds of thousands of bankruptcies.

People in my community feel they have done more than their share in bearing the burden of these Conservative policies. I think people in my community and communities like it right across this country would be prepared to do their share as part of a plan to help get this country moving. However they see no such plan for recovery and growth in this budget or in anything the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister, or those hoping to succeed him, have had to say so far or are likely to say.

In the budget documents the government admits that even in 1998, five years from now, if there is still a Conservative government it expects to be spending $18 billion a year on unemployment insurance. That is only about $1 billion less than it is spending today. That is hardly a vote of confidence by this Conservative government in its own capacity for economic management.

As the Leader of the Opposition told Toronto's Empire Club on February 11 of this year, fostering economic growth does not mean new federal spending to finance our future. It does mean changing priorities and investing in that future. Without the Liberal two-track approach to deficit reduction and economic growth, any efforts to balance expenditures and revenues will prove futile at best and counterproductive at worst. Meanwhile the stagnant economy will continue. It will continue unless this two-track approach becomes the foundation of a new economic plan for Canada.

The fact is that neither this budget nor any of the Conservative leadership candidates have provided a realistic vision, a plan to achieve the twin objectives of fiscal responsibility and strong economic growth.

[Translation]

Unlike the Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party, the Liberal Party developed an economic policy which will really prepare the Canadian economy for the 21st century.

[English]

For Liberals the ultimate objective of economic policy is to build a value-added economy that will create permanent jobs for Canadians and protect and enhance our social fabric. This means providing Canadians with more jobs with a future in industries with a future.

To maintain high-paying jobs in the global economy Canada will need a work force second to none in skills and flexibility. In co-operation with the provinces, business and labour a new Liberal government would establish a national apprenticeship program and a Canada youth service, for example.

A new Liberal government would see technological innovation as a real opportunity for Canadians. It would pursue a research and development strategy that would enhance Canada's ability to finance, market, administer and diffuse our advanced technology.

A new Liberal government would revitalize the small business sector which is crucial to Canada's long-term economic health. It is this sector that will likely generate the most jobs for Canadians.

A new Liberal government would promote and pursue a global trade strategy and aggressively exploit the potential for export sales to growth areas such as the Pacific rim and Latin America.

A new Liberal government is committed to the concept of a true Canadian economic union, one that would eliminate provincial barriers to the movement of goods, services, capital and labour and create billions of dollars of additional economic activity for Canadians.

Liberals believe that with a national government that stands up for them Canadians can compete with the best in the world, creating new economic growth and opportunity here at home.

Yes, I would have to say that a new Liberal government alone cannot solve all of our economic problems. There is no single magical solution. However I believe that a new Liberal government will make an important difference, a real difference for the better for all Canadians.

• (1045)

In order to make this economic change, we will have to establish new partnerships with all stakeholders in this country—the private sector, the unions, the provinces, the municipalities, the voluntary agencies—and we will have to stop, once and for all, to pit these groups against one another, as the Tories have been doing for nine years.

[English]

In a recent speech the distinguished economist, Judith Maxwell, said:

> A society that stops building for tomorrow gets stale and deteriorates.

That is what has happened to Canada under the last nine years of Conservative rule. Conservatives have stopped investing in order to build for tomorrow. They have stopped investing in people, education, research and development. They have stopped investing in our country's infrastructure. They have stopped investing in the building blocks of a prosperous and competitive economy. As a consequence of the Conservatives not investing in our future, the Canadian economy continues to falter and our high standard of living, perhaps a lot less high since the Conservatives got in, is at risk. The future of our children is at risk.

This Conservative government has failed to respond to the challenges of a new world economy. It has failed to put people back to work. It has failed to offer a real future for our young people. Conservatives simply do not get it. They simply do not realize what has to be done. They have forgotten, or they do not want to agree, as a very wise person said to me this morning, that for Canadians there is a society to be maintained, cultures to be encouraged and a country to be built. Instead of a crusade for a better and more prosperous Canada, the Conservatives have simply presented a budget that is an admission of defeat, a shroud for a dying government.

This is not a budget to respond to the economic and social needs of Canadians. Instead, unfortunately, it is a budget designed to respond to the political needs of the Tory leadership candidates. There is no plan in this budget to get the economy moving quickly forward again and to create more jobs for the 1.5 million unemployed and the young people entering the labour force who are seeking a future and who deserve a future.

However the fact is that the needs of Canada for economic growth and jobs have to come ahead of the ambitions of the Conservative leadership candidates and their misguided expectation that somehow they will be able to perpetuate their years in office. These needs of Canada for economic growth and jobs must come first. However that will happen only once we have an election in which this tired Conservative government, even with a new leader, will be replaced by a new Liberal government, a Liberal government with a strong economic action plan and with the mandate to implement it.

I conclude by moving:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and by substituting—

What amounts to a strong motion of non-confidence in this government.

—by substituting the following therefor:

this House condemns the government for presenting a shopworn copy of last year's budget that – fails to present a realistic and comprehensive program to create jobs and economic recovery to permit the millions of Canadians whose lives have been crushed by Tory policies to regain their hope and their livelihood, – fails to offer a credible and fair plan to control and reduce public debt and – fails to provide Canadians with a true and an accurate account of the eight and one-half years of Conservative government mismanagement".

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair rules the amendment moved by the hon. member for Windsor West to be in order.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's budget is clearly the budget of a tired government. In fact it is the budget of a bankrupt government that is leaving a country bankrupt.

It is incredible that we have a government that is leaving very shortly, and hopefully as quickly as possible when we have the next election, and is leaving this country in a situation in which there is the highest number of unemployed Canadians we have ever had, the highest debt and the highest number of bankruptcies. Nothing in this budget addressed any of those issues. Nothing in this budget gave hope to Canadians. A government without vision leaves a country without hope, and that is the legacy of almost nine years of Tory leadership.

The crisis we have in this country now is a fiscal crisis. There are those who say that the only way we can deal with the fiscal crisis is to create a human crisis. That is what this government has done. The human deficit of unemployment is incredible in this country. While the official statistics rest at 11 per cent, there are many studies that indicate one in four Canadians are either unemployed or underemployed and are seeking employment in this country, or better employment.

It is unbelievable that this government could stand up yesterday and present a budget to this House that was based on continuing unemployment of 11 per cent this year and further double digit unemployment in the next year. It seems that level of unemployment is acceptable to this government. One million children living in poverty is acceptable to this government, if we look at this budget. Hundreds of thousands of people using food banks is acceptable to this government.

Three years ago this House stood together and said that we would eradicate poverty by the year 2000 and this government chose to bring in its last budget which did not even acknowledge the level of poverty it has created in this country. It is a shame.

The government did have choices. Did it choose to do anything about jobs? No it did not. It chose to ignore the example of many of our trading partners, the United States, Japan and Europe, which have very recently introduced jobs plans, of investing in growth and developing a dynamic and modern economy to take us into the 21st century.

Why did this government choose to ignore the fact that our economy is simply not working? To the contrary, it continued with more of the same and said that the cure for the devastation it has created is more devastation. We on this side of the House, the New Democratic Party, say Canadians will not accept that, Canadians will not let the Tories get away with that.

There is one major reason that the Canadian economy is not working and it is that Canadians are not working.

A recovery without jobs is no recovery at all. A future without jobs is a future without hope. That is unacceptable. It is a betrayal of the people this government is here to serve.

• (1055)

Is the government attacking the deficit? No. With a deficit of $35 billion this year and a deficit of almost $33 billion next year, this exercise is a failure. And why did the government fail? Because it has refused to stop wasting money and because it will not admit that the best way to reduce the deficit is to attack unemployment. The government could have cancelled the helicopter purchase, a deal that will cost the government nearly $6 billion for helicopters to be used to fight an enemy who, since the end of the cold war, no longer exists.

No, it chose to reduce unemployment insurance benefits, to reduce federal regional development grants and transportation subsidies for farmers. It preferred to reduce subsidies for institutions like the CBC, those institutions that unite and define us as a country.

[English]

The government had the opportunity to close tax loopholes to the powerful and wealthy and end the private family trust exemption that cost up to $600 million each year. It had the opportunity to cancel the business entertainment deduction that costs up to $1 billion each year.

It chose instead to make life more difficult for low income Canadians by reducing the number of times the GST rebate is received to twice a year from four times a year. I know that people who have jobs and those on the government side who are living quite comfortably may not understand the real life that many low income Canadians live. They may not understand that change will really cause a severe hardship to many families.

In addition, the government chose to cut development assistance to the world's poorest citizens and made drastic cuts to advocacy groups that generally speaking, on very limited budgets, give a voice to those who are less powerful in our society.

Let us look at what the government did in this budget. It made sure that any cuts made were to those with the least power and the least voice. Those who were exempted from any sacrifice were those with the most: the rich, the powerful and those with private family trusts. Those revenues would have offset any savings by far.

This is a political budget and not a financial budget. The government made the political choice to really get the unemployed and the victims who feel powerless but it is not going to touch its friends who fund its party and will fund the next election. No, no, it is going to leave them alone.

Canadians know and want a government that stands on the side of all Canadians and not just one segment of Canadians. Mr. Speaker, as the leader of the New Democratic Party I say to you there is only one party that stands on the side of all Canadians and that is the New Democrats.

The reality is that the poorest fifth of Canadians own one-third of one per cent of the wealth in this country. The richest fifth of Canadians own 69 per cent of the wealth of this country. Have those in the richest one-fifth been asked to contribute, to sacrifice? No, they have not. Have they been asked to pay their fair share? Not at all.

Why not? As I said earlier it is because this government serves its friends. That is probably one of the saddest things for Canadians about this budget. Canadians did not understand it before but it is clear this government acts as a voice for private greed and not as a voice for public interest and the common good.

It is long past the time we had a government that could recapture that spirit of the public interest and common good in this country so all Canadians can benefit from the riches of our country.

Recently—I was flying back from my riding—I was sitting in the airport beside a couple of people who were discussing what they had been doing. They said they had taken their families to Europe skiing and were intending to travel a bit in Europe. They were looking forward to what they were going to do in the summer. At the end of that conversation they said they were very concerned that governments are not really cutting back social spending and health care.

The day before that I was sitting in a union hall in Faro, Yukon, in my riding where hundreds of workers are laid off and others are in danger of losing their positions. We sat and talked about the devastation to their families; the fact that labour laws did not protect them; the fact that these workers were last call on anything that might happen in terms of receiving their benefits and what was owed to them. They could not understand why a government would not protect the working people of this country.

The contrast between those two incidents is graphic. Once again I say that those who have the most are asked to pay the least. The working people who compose the engine that drives this country are asked to make the most sacrifices and are last in line when this government makes its policy and when it draws up a budget.

An hon. member: Shame, shame.

Ms. McLaughlin: Unemployment is at 11 per cent and it is killing the Canadian economy. It is killing our productivity, our ability to grow and the hopes of many Canadians whether they are miners in Faro, auto workers in Ontario or fish plant workers in the Atlantic.

The OECD has determined that Canada has the largest gap between actual output and potential output of any major industrialized nation in modern history. That output gap translates into lost production of goods and services of more than $70 billion.

As I mentioned earlier, the other gap we have is between those who have the most and those who have the least. We are now spending $80 billion a year to provide services for those who are unemployed and in poverty. Let us attack that deficit. Let us attack the real deficit, the human deficit and also the financial deficit created by unacceptable unemployment rates. To not do so is insulting to those Canadians who are truly suffering across this country.

This morning I met with a group of farmers who really do not know what their future is going to be, yet surely there is nothing more basic than the sovereignty of food. The agricultural industry is both an important part of our economy and an important part of our own well-being. Yet they feel abandoned by this government and by Canadians. Surely this is the group we should be most concerned about in terms of our national well-being as well as our economic well-being.

Would it not be a change if we had a government that chose to act like a government, accepted responsibility for the people within its borders, stopped simply depending and hoping in some Disney-like fashion that if the economies of Europe, Japan and the United States improve then Canada will somehow be dragged along?

We are better than that. We have some of the most skilled workers. We have a strong agricultural community. We have men and women who are building this country into what they hope it can be. The government obviously does not have the least bit of faith in Canadians because its plan is to see if somehow Canada can get dragged along on the hopes of other countries.

Is it not time Canadians and the Canadian government stood up with pride and said they had ideas, initiative and spirit? We live in a country that looks outward to other countries but we stand proud and free. We can succeed because we have the people to do it.

We will never bring down the deficit and the debt unless we get Canadians back to work. We do not have to be economists to figure out that decreasing revenues are a direct result of fewer people working. The deficit is a symptom.

Let us take a moment to look at how the deficit was created. The government brought in a high interest rate policy, a high dollar policy, a bad trade deal and the GST all at the same time. It really led us down the path. It says it is a recession but it is not. It is a made-in-Canada depression and those one in four Canadians who are looking for jobs or looking for better jobs do not just see this as some vague kind of jobless recovery. They look to those in the government to stand up for them and say: "We care about you, we have a jobs plan to address this, we are going to do it, we have the courage, we have the guts and we are going to put it before Parliament," but not this government.

What about the projections of the government? Last year it missed its budget projection on the deficit reduction by about $8 billion and clearly again it was because of a shortfall in tax revenues.

We need a government that will stand up and say it is not going to attack the unemployed, it is going to attack unemployment. It is about time.

[Translation]

I think we should remind the government of the following important equation: more people on the labour market means more tax revenue. More people on the labour market means that fewer Canadians will depend on the government to get by. Increased revenue combined with a drop in income support payments like unemployment insurance will reduce the deficit. The government has failed to understand this equation. And Canadians are paying the price. It is about time the government paid the price for its own incompetence, and that time will come on election day.

[English]

The government predicts a much rosier picture in terms of deficit reduction and unemployment four or five years down the road. The only good news is that it will not be there four or five years down the road.

This is the last budget of this Conservative government. Otherwise I would suggest it call in someone from The National Enquirer to develop its projections because it has about the same legitimacy. Sometimes The National Enquirer is actually much more accurate with its yearly predictions than the finance minister.

How do we get the economy moving and create jobs for Canadians? The Liberals have not offered any answers. The Reform Party's solution is to totally destroy the social foundation on which our economy is based.

We need a jobs plan in this country and only the New Democratic Party has presented a plan that will create 1.6 million new jobs over the next five years. According to independent analysis, it would bring down inflation and the deficit. It would not tax lower and middle-income Canadians further.

The government is right when it says ordinary Canadians cannot afford to pay any more taxes. We agree. After all it is this government that increased taxes on the average family by over $1,900 a year. It has devastated our economy with the GST and it is only fitting for the thief to recognize there is nothing more to steal.

[Translation]

The New Democratic Party has an economic strategy based on full employment, which will put the economy back on track. We have formulated the following specific proposals: a national infrastructure reinforcement program; a national daycare program; a national investment fund; investment in research and development; development of new technology; and fiscal and monetary policies that set a priority on job creation.

• (1110)

[English]

Our plan would end bad trade deals that have cost Canadians thousands and hundreds of thousands of jobs. It would introduce a fair tax system where the rich and large corporations finally pay their fair share.

This is a tired government. We understand. We are tired of the government too. It is a bankrupt government. It is a government without vision. Its way is not working. That is the bottom line. Its way does not work and we do not need more of its way which does not work for Canadians.

Unemployment at these levels cannot be sustained. It is a human waste. It is an economic waste and it is a national shame. The source of that shame, the Conservative government, must be defeated.

This country is capable of great things but we cannot in the budget presented by the Minister of Finance see anything great. There is more to this country and there is more hope for Canadians than this government has offered.

This government in nine years has destroyed this country. We in the New Democratic Party say, call that election. You will get the message from Canadians and New Democrats will help to build a new, better and more prosperous Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the remarks of the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

Part of her remarks I actually agreed with in total. The concern that I have has to do with small business. We all know the greatest hope for new job creation lies with the small business sector in this country.

We have home based businesses, small businesses where people might employ only three, four or five people. There are close to 1.3 million such businesses in Canada. They are finding it very difficult to get access to capital.

The financial institutions in this country are just not playing ball. The government made a commitment to all of us in this House a few months ago that the Small Businesses Loans Act would be the financial instrument to put capital back into the hands of the small business sector.

The government made a commitment that it would promote that bill. It has not lived up to it. This sector to me is our greatest hope. I did not really get a sense, and I say this respectfully, from her remarks that that sector was getting support. I would like her to deal with that.

I would like to know what the New Democratic Party would do to try to make the banks wake up and realize that in addition to finding money for the Reichmanns, the Bronfmans, the Campeaus and a lot of other developers in this country, they should take the time to go out and make small business loans which are the source of this new job hope.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a very important question. As he well knows, being very familiar with this, small business creates about 80 per cent of the new jobs in our economy. Therefore there must be a lot of attention paid to this.

The member is quite right. It has certainly been my experience across Canada that access to capital for small business for new initiatives and in some cases for continuing initiatives is very limited.

In a lot of areas but particularly in rural areas, in areas outside central Canada, it is often more difficult. That is why seeing the government reducing regional development funding is incredible. Some of that regional development funding of course would go directly to small business.

It is also quite incredible in this time of depression and recession when one sees that one of the major banks in Canada over the last two years made $1 billion profit.

It would seem to me that a government interested in small business would bring bank presidents together, would begin to talk about this and would begin to implement policies that would under the Bank Act make loans to small business, obviously ones that were accountable and feasible, as a real part of banks' responsibilities to this country.

I would say also that in the New Democratic Party's jobs plan we propose a national investment fund. The idea of that fund is specifically directed to the member's point about encouraging small business, in making sure that private funds, public funds and regional funds directed by regional boards are directed to investment in just exactly those kinds of enterprises that are appropriate to each region of the country. I think we have seen that a highly centralized system of encouraging regional development often does not work because the people of that area who obviously know the most about that area both in economic terms and in a business sense have not been the ones that have been able to make those decisions.

There are also many changes that can be made to reduce the paper burden on small businesses. I am sure anyone in this House who has either been in small business as I have or others will know that the GST has phenomenally increased the administrative burden, paraticularly for smaller businesses.

That is why we in this party propose to eliminate the GST over a period of time. We feel this would put more money in the hands of consumers. It would reduce and make the business climate more favourable specifically for small business and it would create jobs as has already been indicated by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business.

I am certainly in agreement with the member that small business must be the real focus of any plan for the economy. I look forward to seeing the Liberals' plan for small business when they have a plan.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak today in support of the budget that my colleague, the Minister of Finance, presented yesterday.

It is interesting that the budget comes at the same time as spring. I see a lot of symbolism in that because, as everyone knows, spring in Canada always brings with it a feeling of optimism and dynamism. This budget will give Canadians what they need for new growth, new jobs and renewed prosperity.

Of course, success never comes without effort. As Corneille wrote in Polyeucte, "Do we have to win so many times before we triumph?" Canada has had to face so many economic and financial challenges in the last several years that it seemed at times as though we would never get there and would always have to start over.

Today we see that these efforts were not in vain. The budget presented by my colleague, the Minister of Finance, clearly shows us that we were right not to doubt and not to give up but to follow his lead he gave us with the unconditional support and unshakable determination of our Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney.

I would like to talk to you today about some measures in the budget which I think are particularly important and of some effects that the budget will have, especially in the department for which I am responsible, the Department of Transport.

The first objective of the 1993 budget is our number one priority: freeing the Canadian economy so that it can grow and create the jobs we need. For that, we must lighten the burden our economy and our people are saddled with as a result of the deficit and the debt.

During his pre-budget consultations, the Minister of Finance found an unprecedented concern over the excessive borrowing and spending habits of federal and provincial governments.

Canadians definitely want less government borrowing, lower taxes, more jobs and greater choices for the future. Canadians saw what happened when governments acted as though they could add to the debt indefinitely. Taxpayers pay more and more to receive less and less service from the government when interest payments take a growing share of every dollar in tax revenue. Higher and higher taxes slow down the economy, and reduce economic activity, decrease growth and employment.

• (1120)

The 1993 budget answers these concerns by considerably tightening the spending restrictions presented in the economic and fiscal statement of last December. In its main proposals, the budget first imposes no new taxes; second, saves over $30 billion in spending reductions and other measures that will be implemented over the next five years. This means that the government will restrict the growth in program spending; that is, there will be no real growth in spending, not counting interest charges on the public debt. Third, it is reducing the cost of the federal government by streamlining its activities, reducing the regulatory burden and improving efficiency.

[English]

The goal of the budget, the Minister of Finance said, is to free the economy for more job creating growth by steadily reducing the burden of deficits and debt. Transportation is not immune from such a balancing exercise. Fiscal restraint must be shared by all Canadians.

However, Canada is a trading nation and transportation will remain a cornerstone of our economic well-being. The government has recognized the importance of transportation infrastructure in guaranteeing our future economic prosperity. Indeed, the diverse nature of Canada's economy places ever-increasing importance on a safe and efficient transportation system that will allow us to meet the growing challenges of the new global economy.

Major new strategic capital investments in Canada's national transportation and communications networks are under way. Agreements have been signed with five provinces to improve hundreds of kilometres of highways and to create many thousands of jobs. An additional 15,000 person-years of employment are expected to be provided from further projects to be announced in the weeks and months ahead.

These transportation improvement initiatives are being funded out of savings from last year's budget and the December economic and fiscal statement. The measures have been implemented and they are working.

I do not need to underscore the importance of the highway network in Canada. Canadians make around 90 per cent of their trips by car and bus. Close to 60 per cent of freight traffic moves by truck. Recent studies have demonstrated that certain sections of the national highway system do not meet the increasing needs of highway transport. This situation creates safety problems and results in congestion and delays for travellers and commerce. Millions of dollars are lost each year when travellers and freight are tied up in traffic jams.

The Government of Canada has recognized this and has invested strategically in the construction and maintenance of highway infrastructure which will generate important benefits in terms of improved safety and economic growth.

[Translation]

As for the equipment used by Transport Canada to carry out its mandate, we will examine the possible benefits of privatizing our helicopter fleet. We will also take a thorough look at the fleet and aircraft service activities to determine the most economic way to provide the service. A pilot project will be implemented to use private sector resources for flight inspection services in Western Canada, provided technical accuracy can be assured. International experience has proven that the private sector can provide similar services more efficiently and economically, while maintaining high safety standards.

In the area of subsidies for transportation and agriculture, the grants and contributions provided in the Western Grain Transportation Act, the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act and the Maritime Freight Rates Act will be reduced by 15 per cent in 1995–96 and 20 per cent in each of the following two years. This has already been the subject of several discussions with the appropriate authorities.

• (1125)

[English]

Services have been rationalized and VIA Rail's operating budget will be reduced by $50 million in 1995–96 and by $100 million for each of the following two years. Although I expect there will be a strong reaction to this initiative, VIA Rail has already demonstrated a flexibility and determination beyond what had previously been predicted.

Responsible sound management and corporate restructuring have allowed VIA Rail to fulfil its mandate and even to cut its dependence on government funds further than expected while continuing to provide first class rail passenger services across Canada. VIA Rail's restructuring was necessary due to its spiralling financial requirements which led to our decision in 1990 to reduce its funding by half. This in turn led to a 50 per cent reduction in VIA Rail's services.

During the three years since the reduction, VIA Rail has been able to improve its performance substantially. It has managed to provide transcontinental corridor and remote services at funding levels below those authorized by the government. As well, its service to the public has improved. Its on–time performance now exceeds 90 per cent and most of its trains are now equipped with LRC equipment or rebuilt cars.

In 1992 VIA Rail was able to increase its train frequencies on the Montreal–Ottawa–Toronto routes without any increase in its need for resources. It will take VIA Rail some time to analyse the impact of the cuts on train services and the corporation's work force and to prepare a strategy for its new commercial mandate. We expect an announcement on the impact on train services in late 1993 or early 1994.

These measures, together with the many others detailed in the budget, will maintain the 1993–94 deficit at the projected level of $32.6 billion and will considerably reduce the federal deficit in the next five years, as the recovery now under way strengthens.

By 1997–98, the government will end all new borrowing, both in Canada and abroad. Interest payments on the debt will decline to 26 cents per dollar of revenue, compared to 36 cents in 1990–91. The deficit will be reduced to $8 billion, less than 1 per cent of national revenue, compared to 5.1 per cent in 1991–92.

With the measures to stimulate the recovery in the budget of February 1992 and the economic statement last December, the Canadian economy has created over 200,000 full–time jobs since last August.

We are now in a good position to gradually improve our economic performance; our real growth will be nearly 3 per cent in 1993 and over 4.5 per cent in 1994, while inflation and interest rates will remain low.

More than ever, Canadians want their governments to co–operate for the sake of economic prosperity and international competitiveness. They want a national solution to the national debt problem and want governments to act without delay. The Minister of Finance has already invited his provincial and territorial counterparts to Ottawa in late May to begin working on this.

With the 1993 federal budget, the government has a responsible and achievable plan to restore the nation's finances and strengthen our economy's ability to create jobs.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I want to discuss the issue of the deficit, which was raised by the Minister of Transport. The minister said in his comments that the burden imposed by the deficit and the debt had to be alleviated, thereby implying that the government had managed to do so, when in fact it is the opposite, as we well know.

The government failed miserably on this issue, and I wonder if the minister recognizes the magnitude of this failed attempt.

The minister knows full well that the deficit for the year which just ended last March 31 will be of the order of $35.5 billion. He also knows—if he read today's newspapers—that nobody believes the economic forecasts contained in yesterday's budget. We are told that real growth will reach 4.5 per cent in 1994. The government is dreaming in colour.

During the eighties, there was significant economic growth because of the strength of the American economy and the strength of growth and consumption in Canada. However, I want to emphasize that nobody believes that the recovery in the United States will be as strong this time as it was in the eighties, and I also want to refer to one of the indicators mentioned on page 42 of yesterday's budget. For the current year, the government anticipates an increase of only 0.5 per cent in the personal income of Canadians, while the population will grow by about 1.5 per cent. This means that Canadians will suffer a net loss of income. Instead of having—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member should either ask his question or conclude, because there are other members who want to ask questions.

Mr. Berger: This means that Canadian consumers will have less money to spend this year. How can the minister justify his optimism, given these facts?

Mr. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, I think that my hon. colleague, like all hon. members of this House, will recognize that no one in the world has infallible means of predicting what is going to happen in the years ahead. Everybody has their own prediction tools and it is always on that basis that all calculations are made.

I think that we are in very good company when we base our forecasts on those of such a reputable and absolutely impartial organization as the International Monetary Fund, which has been saying for months now that in 1993-94, Canada will have the highest growth rate in the world. We are basing our predictions and forecasts on such in-depth and reliable analyses as those of the International Monetary Fund.

The people of Canada must be absolutely delighted with what the Conservative government has achieved over the past nine years and what it is planning for the future, as compared to the statement the leader of the Liberal Party made in his riding of Shawinigan just last Sunday that, if elected, his party would try to bring the deficit down only to 3 per cent of Gross Domestic Product, while the measures we are putting into place at this time will reduce the deficit much more.

What is even more disturbing and disquieting for the population as a whole to realize is that not only did his party put this country thoughtlessly in debt the last time it was in power, but he is now proposing to maintain the deficit indefinitely at $25 billion a year. If ever there was one thing that should alert Canadians to the dangers that lie ahead if that party were to come back to power, it is this very statement by the leader of the Liberal Party.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport regarding the cuts to VIA Rail and also to the CBC.

Back in 1981 when Jean-Luc Pepin was Minister of Transport he decided to cut VIA services by 19 per cent. At that time the now Minister of Finance led a Conservative Party task force across the country to find out the views of Canadians on the appropriateness of VIA Rail passenger services. The report he issued on behalf of his colleagues said in part: "The task force affirms that the federal government has a responsibility to ensure that rail services in Canada be retained, modernized and expanded as an important part of our national transportation system."

We know and the minister in his own comments reminded us of the 50 per cent cut in the subsidy level to VIA a little over two years ago. He pointed out that there will be further cuts. In fact, by the year 1997–98 the VIA subsidy will be $138 million.

The question I want to put to the Minister of Transport is, how can he expect VIA Rail to continue to operate outside of the Windsor–Toronto–Ottawa–Montreal–Quebec City corridor if that is the level of subsidy that is going to be available?

As he knows, the routes from Toronto to Vancouver, and the routes from Montreal to the Atlantic do not and never can pay their own way. Why has he and his government decided to put an end to VIA Rail? That is really what it amounts to. Why is he not prepared to invest in the national unity of this country to ensure that people can travel to see each other, to meet each other and to visit this great country? Why is the government doing that when it should be funding it properly and providing new capital services?

Mr. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to the period when Mr. Jean–Luc Pepin was Minister of Transport. If my memory serves me well, I think this was around the end of the 1960s or the beginning of the 1970s. About 25 years have gone by since then. I do not really keep very good records of when the Liberals were in office. I would prefer we forget that completely because of the legacy they left this country where we are now facing at both the federal and provincial levels almost a financial crisis situation.

Everybody who has been consulted over the past few months and years have said that we must address the question of the national debt and the national deficit. Otherwise we will have to very badly attack some of the essential programs this country must provide to its citizens.

We have demonstrated and VIA Rail has demonstrated since the cuts in 1989 that it can restructure and rearrange its services to provide an appropriate level of services to Canadians who want to use the train and at the same time live within their budgets. I have every confidence that it will continue to do so.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, I believe I heard a portable telephone ringing in the House a few moments ago. I did not see a member actually answer the phone.

An hon. member: There it goes again.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it very much if you would clarify for the House that this is entirely inappropriate.

The reason I make the point is not to criticize the member particularly, but to remind everyone that members in the House are required to speak and answer on their own feet. If we allow such devices to be brought into the House, we are going to find ourselves in a situation where ministers will be answering questions based on answers given to them over the telephone by their aides and so on. We could entirely disrupt the order of—

An hon. member: It is the lobbyists calling them telling them what to do.

Mr. Johnson: Yes, as my colleague says, we could end up with lobbyists calling in to tell members how they should speak. I think it is entirely inappropriate and I would appreciate it if the Speaker would clarify that it is inappropriate to have such devices in the House.

• (1140)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I simply want to state the obvious. To my knowledge, our parliamentary tradition and our current Standing Orders do not allow for the use of that kind of modern devices in the House. I think there is no need to dwell on that.

However, I must say that during a parliamentary visit to New Zealand, I was surprised to see all members of Parliament with a telephone on their desk. I do not believe that we have reached the same level of sophistication in the House of Commons of Canada. Anyway I will not dwell on that subject and I invite all members to be very cautious about that. It may happen from time to time that an hon. member forgets to turn his telephone off, but I invite you all to be very cautious. This House is clearly dedicated to direct parliamentary debate which takes the form of oral exchanges between members.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, while I certainly agree with the point of order raised by the hon. member I would simply point out that indeed portable telephones might well improve the quality of answers coming from the minister.

[Translation]

It just proves that the government has completely lost contact with reality. For the second time in four months, the Minister of Finance intended to propose a supposedly growth oriented budget plan. Mr. Speaker, as you can see from yesterday's budget, the only thing that could be growing is the frustration of the Canadian people toward a government that refuses to take the necessary steps to give them hope once again.

[English]

This has not been a simple recession. We have gone through a fundamental restructuring of the world's economy, a restructuring that has been made worse in this country as a result of the monetary and fiscal policies followed by this government.

The problem is that we are not alone in this restructuring and it is the failure of this government to understand this simple fact that has led to its projections consistently not being met; $1 billion out in the deficit in the last four months, $8 billion out in the deficit in the last year, projections which have made this government the laughing stock of governments around the world.

We can live with that I suppose because its life is so short lived. Those who cannot live with this government's failures are the 1.6 million unemployed in this country, those who are on welfare, the ever-increasing army of the working poor. The Minister of Finance stands up here and talks of double-digit employment as if it is a simple statistic on a written page.

I would ask them to leave the written page and go into the real world. Come into my riding and see what it is like when families are broken up, see what it is like when young people are condemned to a decade of no jobs and suddenly begin to realize that the life for which they had such hope has disappeared before them.

There are four keys to job creation. The first is a lowering of our real interest rates, putting this country on a competitive basis with the rest of the world. In yesterday's budget the interest rates projected by this government continue for the next five years at historically high levels, far higher than our competitors, far higher than will make it possible for us to develop a competitive economy.

When one looks at the reactions of the world's financial community to this budget one must be fearful that interest rates will continue to rise and under those circumstances we will be plunged once again into recession. We will be plunged once again into a period of deflation while the rest of the world continues its restructuring and young Canadians begin to ask themselves if indeed there is a future for them in this country.

The second key is retraining. Nothing in this budget recognizes that the most important natural resources in this country do not lie buried deep in the ground. They lie in the skills and talents of those who walk upon it.

• (1145)

Research and development is the third key. This budget deals with research and development as tokenism. It talks of mechanisms, it talks of exploring, it talks of process but there is nothing concrete to enable Canadians to build an innovative economy. There is nothing in this budget that will allow us to take on both the Germans and the Japanese, those who are meeting the modern challenges.

There is no mention of environmental technologies, medical technologies and the great growth areas which are required if we are going to create the jobs of tomorrow.

Finally the fourth key is small and medium sized business. My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood has been so articulate in this House on the subject. What does the budget say about small business, that area of the economy which is creating 85 per cent of all the jobs in this country? It is virtually silent. Is it because small and medium sized businesses are Canadian-owned and that this government looks south for its economic direction and not within the heart and fabric of the Canadian nation?

The multinationals of tomorrow are today being created by two people in back sheds. This is happening right around the world and it is not happening in Canada. That is why Canadians are losing faith. It is why they have lost faith with this government.

When the Liberals take power within the next three months—maybe four months depending upon when this government finally summons the courage to go to the Canadian people—we will once again give Canadians the tools and the confidence to rise to the challenges that lie outside our borders.

[Translation]

What is most astonishing in this budget is that, while Canadian taxpayers seem willing to directly address the deficit, the Minister of Finance instead served them a rehash, in a context so optimistic as to make everyone dream.

[English]

The 1993-94 budget is the last Tory budget.

An hon. member: Thank God.

Mr. Martin: Thank heaven.

It is also the last budget to be written according to the conventional wisdom of old style politics. The hallmarks of political budget-making are stamped on every page of this very lean document; dubious deficit forecasts, inflated economic assumptions.

This budget demonstrates the government's fiscal, economic and intellectual bankruptcy. For better or for worse the people of Canada are adjusting to very different economic circumstances. Every business, every volunteer group, every association in the country is coping with change. It is very clear—if there was any doubt of it before—after yesterday's budget that this government is not.

In the real world off Parliament Hill and outside the dynamics of the Tory leadership race that this budget was designed to comfort, a political revolution is under way. Canadians are demanding an end to the volleys of taxation that issue from the nation's capital every spring. They are demanding that governments cease their political fiddling while our prosperity burns.

In a thousand ways the central issue of our time, the reordering of the relationships between Canadians and their governments, is intruding on the business as usual world of politics and government; the rejection of executive federalism.

The popular uprising against a British Columbia proposed homeowners' tax in March of this year and the massive unpopularity of governments from coast to coast all bespeak a deep and an urgent hunger for change. Canadians are demanding nothing less than an end to the political economy of governments that can neither follow the wishes of their citizens today nor bring before them the questions that must be decided tomorrow.

The challenge facing Canada is twofold. An immediate reordering of our public finances must be undertaken to avert a fiscal crisis. At the same time a reordering of the politics that underlie our financial problems must occur. The failure to meet either challenge will result in the failure to meet both.

Liberals propose to confront this challenge head on. Canadians must take full possession of the reordering of their public finances. There must be a new covenant between Canadians and the three senior levels of government. Growth strategies and mechanisms for their achievement must be arrived at. Plans for improving the cost efficiency of government services through a deep restructuring must be adopted. The tax structure must be reordered.

Again, my colleague from Broadview has been so articulate as indeed my colleague from London, those who really have brought forth a new vision as to how Canadians can govern themselves, can tax themselves and can bring themselves out of the depths of despair into which this government has unfortunately plunged them. A fundamental evaluation of the respective roles, the responsibilities and the powers of taxation of all three levels of government must be undertaken.

In the debates that take place between governments, why is it that the federal and provincial governments can seemingly continue to ignore municipal governments, those who are on the front line of social change? Why is it that they ignore the business community, the volunteer associations and the sole taxpayer who is at the bottom of this incredible pyramid of cost and efficiency led by this Conservative government?

Irregular taxation among jurisdictions has produced economic distortions, inefficient and wasteful collection costs and a perverse sense that the tax system is irrational and unfair.

Canadians are prepared to pay their fair share of taxes. What they object to is when they see discrimination against them in favour of others. What they object to is when they see that the services that they have come to expect cut back and their taxes going up. There is a deep feeling that the system is warped against Canadians. Over the last nine years in fact that is the legacy of this government.

We will not solve the debt problem in this country without a national consensus on what it is reasonable to ask of the Canadian taxpayer and unless there is a consensus on how he or she is to be taxed.

We have a phenomenal opportunity to build one of the great countries of the world. The problems of this nation are not going to be solved by jargon and rhetoric. They are going to be solved by a nation which is able to achieve great things together.

The budget speaks to the government's economic plan. The budget sets out to the Canadian people the plan by which it sees them achieving this greatness, by which it sees them competing with other countries in the world whose economies are prospering. If that is the case and this budget is the best this government can do, what hope is there for Canadians?

Yesterday we were in the lock-up for four hours. I expected to be occupied. I read the document in 20 minutes. The government explained it to us in five minutes. In fact it did not even send in the departmental officials until the very end because there was not enough to explain.

Why did we have this budget? It was a non-event. Why did we have the last December statement? It was a non-event. Has this government run out of ideas and imagination?

Mr. Mills: All hype, no hope.

Mr. Martin: All hype, no hope.

Mr. Arseneault: Bankrupt of ideas.

Mr. Martin: Bankrupt of ideas.

• (1155)

My God, we could do a better budget on this side in the next five minutes than that government has done in the last four months.

[Translation]

This budget is nothing more than the last wishes of a government that has decided to throw in the towel. This government has been promising us for almost nine years now that it would firmly attack the deficit. It has failed totally. The federal government and the provinces are now deeper in debt than ever before. And the saddest thing in all of that is that this budget will never be successful in reassuring international financial markets, which was one of the goals of this exercise.

Because he wanted to leave all options open to the next leader of the government, the Minister of Finance is jeopardizing the economic health of the whole country. Canadians have had enough of this mascarade. Young people on social welfare and the unemployed have had enough of this mascarade. We are wasting valuable time. The citizens of this country have the right to judge now. The curtain must fall on this government, and the sooner the better.

[English]

The time has come to let the Canadian people judge if what they want is the empty vessel served up by this government or a political party, a movement and a consensus which understands that we will solve the deficit through growth, that we will give Canadians hope through growth, that we will resolve the national unity problem by giving Canadians from coast to coast, from British Columbia to Newfoundland, a goal to believe in. That is the Liberal vision.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few minutes to respond to some of my colleague's statements.

I was also a little surprised yesterday with regard to the budget. I feel it was more or less an economic statement. One thing that perhaps some of us have forgotten is going back to the economic statement of December 2 presented by the Minister of Finance.

I want to review a couple of areas. My colleague mentioned what he felt was the fundamental restructuring of society. It had to do with lowering real interest rates, retraining using human resources, research and development, and environmental concerns, and the member also mentioned medical and research concerns.

If we take a look over the last period of five to six years, real interest rates are probably the lowest they have been in 20 years. With regard to that area we have to take into consideration the inflation factor. Most of us here would find that over the past number of years inflation has been worked on pretty heavily. It was 1.9 per cent in last month's statistics report.

We have a relatively stable Canadian dollar now. While it has only been for the last six or eight months, we are sitting in the 79 cent, 79.5 cent area, which is extremely important for our exports and our trade.

Training and human resources are very important. I would like to say with regard to the UI changes that were announced in the economic statement, $2.2 billion out of the UI account this year will be spent on job training and job creation for the unemployed. If we put that in the complete package with the government it totals $3.8 billion.

On research and development, we have some of the very best tax credits for research and development in the world.

One thing I want to say with regard—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I invite the hon. member to ask her question or to conclude her remarks because there are other members who want to ask questions.

• (1200)

Mrs. Sparrow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is hard to get in with these people all clamouring to get out there.

I take those four points the member mentioned very seriously because job creation is important, there is no doubt about it. All of us recognize that unemployment is too high, but the member specifically has to put in more funding.

I would like to know if the member is in a position to comment here in the House with regard to obtaining that funding through curtailment of payments either through transfers to people or to the provincial governments. There is no doubt that 68 per cent to 69 per cent of government expenditures go to transfer payments. Is the member going to increase UI contributions or premiums that are paid by the employers and employees, which would be very difficult? Where is the member going to get the funding for these particular areas to answer his four points?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to thank the member for her question and intervention and for her recognition that what we got yesterday was not a budget but a very poor statement at best.

I must say that I hope tomorrow within her caucus she will be a voice of reason unfortunately surrounded by a sea of irrationality.

An hon. member: Misery.

Mr. Martin: No, the misery is in the country, the irrationality is in the Conservative caucus.

Let me simply deal with the points she raised. The fact is that the projections that are made in terms of real interest rates are historically high. They are almost twice as high as the real interest rates in the United States. The crucial point is not where real interest rates in Canada are in absolute terms but where real interest rates are in relation to our competitors. If they have a lower cost of capital than we do then the effect on our ability to expand is felt directly.

In terms of training, it is not enough to simply spend money. We really have to become very focused on where the problems lie, which is why we as a party have advocated a youth corps to give the 36 per cent of high school students who drop out by grade 10 an incentive to go back to school. It is why we have talked about an apprenticeship program in order to handle the very important transition from high school to the work place.

Germany graduates 600,000 apprentices a year. We graduate 24,000. We are condemning a vast segment of our young population to a lifetime of unemployment.

In terms of research and development, we have really said that the role of government is to focus on changing the economic culture of the land toward one of innovation so that research and development simply does not become an aside.

The science minister sits away back there on the back benches. He is not on the front benches and is not a major minister.

Mrs. Sparrow: He's right there.

Mr. Martin: He is given the opportunity to speak about once every six months, and only then if all the senior ministers on a Friday are not in the House.

We are saying that science and technology must become the focus of the industrial development of the country so that we can build a modern economy.

On the issue of funding, first of all we should look at return on investment. Second, if what we want to do is build a modern economy then we should do it on Canadian technology. Do not buy Italian technology to build helicopters to fight a war that is over. Give us a chance to build the things we need for the future.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, first I want to congratulate my colleague from LaSalle—Émard for a true message of hope. This is what Canadians want today with so many people not working.

In point four of his plan he referred to the importance of small business in revitalizing the economy and putting people back to work. The question that we get as Liberals is how will we be different in approaching the banks, the financial institutions and the credit unions of Canada and mobilizing them and inspiring them to the realization that small business is where it is at and that is where financial institutions have to focus.

• (1205)

As the chairman of our platform committee I know that the member has done a lot of work in this area. Will the member please give the message of hope to the small business sector and the people of this country on how we will approach the financial institutions of this land on assisting small business.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for LaSalle—Émard has one and a half minutes left.

[English]

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. In the minute and a half that I have been given I want to say that there is no doubt that one of the fundamental problems in Canada is that instead of the financial sector being at the service of the productive sector, enabling us to create the economies of tomorrow, the productive sector has become the plaything of the financial sector.

The Canadian banking system, and most financial intermediaries, are failing in two areas. First, the credit crunch is real. Small and medium sized businesses have been cut off at the pass. They are cut off when they get into financial difficulties or when they are about to take off and they need the money to expand into the markets of the world. The second failure is that we will never build an innovative economy if the banks and financial institutions do not have within their own staffs those engineers and scientists capable of evaluating projects which arise out of the mind, which are not simply bricks and mortar, the conventional kinds of things the Canadian financial system has financed.

We would say to the Canadian financial system: Either you solve that problem or we will open the doors and others will come in to do it. We believe with the power of government and the national consensus of the Canadian people, which says that the financial system has a responsibility to make up for the monopoly powers it has, that those monopoly powers will not stand unless it fills the responsibilities they were designed to fill.

Mr. Mills: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have talked to our colleagues here and because of the nature of this very important debate we would hope to get concurrence of the House so that we could sit right through the lunch hour to continue to debate this very important piece of legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House are agreeable to the hon. member's suggestion to continue the debate during lunch hour.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to extend debate over the lunch hour?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, when this government was elected to office almost nine years ago the biggest challenge facing us was to restore some fiscal sanity to our economy. Now nine years later, where are we? Some will complain that the deficit is almost as high today as it was in September 1984. Others will criticize us because the national debt has more than doubled since we took office. It would be instructive to review the past nine years and seriously look at these comments in the light of economic realities today.

In 1984 this government inherited a national debt of $206 billion. When the Liberals were elected in 1968 the debt stood at only $18.8 billion but when they left it was $206 billion. During that 17-year period Canada's debt increased and became 11 times higher. By comparison, since 1984 the debt has grown from the inherited $206 billion to $458 billion for this year.

On the surface it would seem reasonable for the opposition Liberal Party to complain that the debt has doubled under Conservative management. However the comparison soon wears thin when one considers that rather than 11 times higher, which happened while the Liberals were in office, it is now over twice as high. On top of that, this government has not added one cent to the debt since 1987.

From 1970 to 1984 a surplus of $220 million became a deficit of $38.5 billion under the Liberal administration. Government spending was out of control. Those are not just my words but those are the words of the Auditor General who in the mid-1970s said he was deeply concerned "that Parliament, indeed the government, had lost or was close to losing effective control of the public purse." He then went on to say: "Federal management and control in the Government of Canada is grossly inadequate." That is what the Auditor General said while the Liberals were in office.

During the Trudeau years, government spending on programs had increased at an average annual rate of 13.8 per cent, far in excess of inflation. If this trend had been allowed to continue after 1984 the result would have been catastrophic. If we had allowed spending to continue at the same average pace as the Liberals, the national debt would have sky-rocketed from $206 billion when we inherited it to over $900 billion today, rather than the $458 billion. This year's annual deficit would be over $85 billion rather than the $32.6 billion for this fiscal year.

We could not leave this burden to our children and to our grandchildren. Action was needed and action was taken. Barely two months into our first term, the Minister of Finance laid out our economic plan, a plan that has been adhered to in every single budget including this one, nine budgets and five economic statements in a row.

What have we done? Every single budget and every economic statement that this government has offered to Canadians has cut spending. Every single one and every time the opposition complained about our cutting of spending.

Since 1985 a total of $118 billion has been cut by this government. Added to that the December economic statement cut spending by $8 billion. This budget further cuts spending this year by $3.8 billion and next year by $5.8 billion, totalling $30.7 billion over the next five years.

Compared to the average annual increase of 13.8 per cent of the Liberal 15-year period, our program spending since 1985 has averaged only 3.9 per cent per year. Beginning in 1991 the Spending Control Act was passed by Parliament that legislated an annual ceiling of 3 per cent per year. With the measures of this budget, the average program spending will now be held at only 1.5 per cent over each of the next five years. This is well below inflation. The 1.5 per cent average annual increase will be the lowest we have seen in Canada since the early 1950s, or 40 years ago.

The contrast is even more dramatic when compared to the 9.3 per cent under the current Liberal leader when he was Minister of Finance. More astonishing were the increases the present Liberal leader permitted when he was President of the Treasury Board: 16.3 per cent in 1976 and 14.6 per cent in 1977. Clearly this contrast shows this government's fiscal responsibility where our actions speak louder than words. No wonder then that the Auditor General just after two years of Conservative management said: "Members of Parliament and the taxpayers of Canada should be heartened by genuine improvements."

It would be instructive to look at the spending habits of provincial governments over the same period of time. While the federal government was spending at an annual average rate of 3.9 per cent from 1984 to 1992, Ontario during the same years spent at a rate of 10.6 per cent and the province was not alone.

For the city of Kitchener in my riding the average annual increase over those same years was 7.5 per cent. The local public school-board's increase was 9.5 per cent. I must mention that the city and the school-board sometimes had to start new programs demanded by the province without sufficient funding. Impressive and deep cuts have been made in this year's budget.

It also seems that Premier Rae and his socialist cohorts at Queen's Park are beginning to see the light. No one should be misled by the socialists here or at Queen's Park in Toronto who say that we have just simply passed on our problem to them. Yes, we have asked them to share part of the national problem. However Ontario's own treasury papers tell us that we did not cut our transfer payments to Ontario. Transfers to Ontario, according to its papers, actually increased from 12.9 per cent to 17.2 per cent of total provincial revenues. Remember that these are not my figures; they come straight from the Government of Ontario.

Added to that the impact of our measures on Ontario represented under 1 per cent in the first year and under 2 per cent in subsequent years of the total provincial revenues. All the while Ontario continued spending at an average annual rate of 10.6 per cent while we here in Ottawa over those same years were spending at an average rate of 3.9 per cent.

As I said earlier the national debt has more than doubled since 1984. Also we have not added one penny to the debt since 1987. What does that mean? Quite simply since 1987 we have been running an operating surplus.

In 1985 we ran a $16.1 billion operating deficit in our first year. In effect on top of the annual interest payments on the debt, another $16.1 billion was added to the debt. By 1987 we turned this around. Since then the cumulative effect of the surpluses in each year has actually reduced the national debt by $25 billion.

Since 1984 the government has privatized or dissolved 39 Crown enterprises and other holdings and has improved the operations for the remainder. The number of full-time Crown corporation employees has been reduced by nearly 90,000 individuals.

In 1984 the inflation rate stood at 4.4 per cent. Today it is under 2.5 per cent. Interest rates have fallen from 13 per cent in 1984 to 6 per cent today. Therefore mortgage rates have also tumbled. The annual cost of carrying a five-year $75,000 mortgage has been cut by $3,300 per year since we were first elected.

Even the unemployment rate is lower today at 11 per cent compared to 11.2 per cent in 1984. That is after coming out of the worst economic downturn since the Great Depression of the 1930s.

Job creation features in the 1992 budget and the December statement are now beginning to work and we can see the evidence of that. There are 200,000 new full-time jobs since August of last year and 48,000 new jobs in March of this year. Between 1984 and 1990 more jobs were created in Canada than in all of the following countries combined: France, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Greece, Ireland, New Zealand, Belgium, Switzerland, and Finland. They represent more than four times the population of Canada.

Since 1984 Canada has led all G-7 countries in percentage increase in job creation. According to the OECD, Canada will have the strongest percentage increase in jobs of any major industrialized nation this year and next.

This budget announces a further 10 per cent cut added to the 10 per cent cut in the December 1992 statement. This is to be followed by subsequent cuts of 15 per cent and a cut of 20 per cent for all advocacy groups.

I personally think they should all be at zero. In other words they should all be cut 100 per cent and not this piece-meal of 10, 10, 15 and 20 on top of the cuts we made previously. These advocacy groups should raise all of their money through their own membership and the Government of Canada should give them not one penny.

• (1220)

As it is now we discriminate in favour of liberal leftist feminist groups such as the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and we discriminate against other women's groups such as the conservative-minded group REAL Women. The truth is that all of these advocacy groups, whether right or left, should be cut 100 per cent.

Funding for multicultural groups should also be cut 100 per cent. They should do what other successful ethnic groups, such as the five German clubs in the Kitchener-Waterloo region have successfully done over the years, that is, raise their own money. Those five clubs have never asked for nor received a penny of federal government money and all of them are very successful and are growing.

We could then take the money saved and use some of it to enhance Canadian citizenship and pride in being a Canadian. That is exactly why all the immigrants come to Canada in the first place: to be Canadian citizens and to be a part of and live in and contribute to what is the best country in the world in which to live according to the United Nations.

Also, we could take some of this money saved and use it for a package to stimulate the building of new homes. I recommended such cuts and such a stimulative measure to the minister. I recommended a modest mortgage interest deductibility program limited to all first-time buyers of new homes for a 10-year period.

It would help young families to buy new homes. It would stimulate the construction industry. It would put unemployed manufacturing workers back to work rather than drawing on UI benefits and welfare. It would put them to work in housing construction and trades that could be quickly learned. Yes, it would cost money at first. Then in less than two years it would begin to pay it all back and all Canadians would reap the benefits.

Nevertheless I am very pleased to read the following from the budget:

> In response to representations on the equity capital needs of smaller, knowledge-based firms, we will also explore ways to develop mechanisms to encourage investors to support local companies and at the same time lend their expertise to help the companies succeed.

This part of the budget is in direct response to an idea developed in the Kitchener-Waterloo, Cambridge and Guelph area under the leadership of Mr. Larry Zepf which I and other area MPs had brought to the Minister of Finance. This must be added to other representations by the MPs from Kitchener-Waterloo, Cambridge and Guelph such as the welcome news of the faster write-offs of new high-tech equipment in this budget and the additional $230 million for Canadian companies undertaking research and development in the December statement. All will help job creation in our region and across Canada.

In conclusion, the best part of this budget and of the actions taken since 1984 is that because of a disciplined cutting of spending in every budget and after the worst recession since the Depression of the 1930s there is now finally some light at the end of the tunnel. We can now project, if we stay the course and only if we stay the course, the elimination of the annual deficit and we can begin to pay off on our national debt in four years' time.

We can do this without any new taxes. In fact, new taxes will deny consumers the ability to spend and to speed the recovery. If we did cut taxes the socialists in Toronto would just take away for themselves any tax cut we might make, as they did in 1992.

There are only two ways to reduce the deficit: higher revenues and lower spending. The right way to reduce the deficit is to cut spending. The right way to get higher revenues is to encourage economic growth. We cannot do that by raising taxes.

According to international think-tanks, investment agencies and the United Nations, if Canada continues the disciplined course it has been on since 1984 it is poised to lead the world in economic growth over the next few years. We have the opportunity, again if we stay the course and only if we stay the course to eliminate our deficit and to begin to pay down on our debt.

• (1225)

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): I listened with interest to the hon. member's speech. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I must say to the hon. member that I am very concerned with this so-called budget.

After reading through it and listening to comments made by hon. members this morning, the media and experts in the media, I agree with them that there is no growth or employment strategy in the budget.

The government seems to be withdrawing from regional development. It is withdrawing from mining, tourism, forestry and plans on withdrawing from a number of other sectors in the near future.

Mr. Mills: It is ignoring small business.

Mr. Arseneault: It ignores small business completely. It uses the term "small business" in its documentation but there is no concrete solution to the problems that small businesses must now face and that is to have access to capital and new investments. There is nothing in this budget for that.

Mr. Tobin: Right on.

Mr. Mills: Right on.

Mr. Arseneault: The Conservative plan for economic renewal is a complete failure. This budget is yet another example of the fiscal mismanagement that has been exhibited by the government since it came to Parliament in 1984. The government has been a complete failure. Again this budget is evidence of that failure.

More specifically we heard the member brag about some of the cuts that are in this budget to multiculturalism and advocacy groups. With that philosophy in mind I am wondering why the hon. member did not recommend to others in his caucus to cut the $5.8 billion helicopter program with the savings going to address the human deficit that we have in this country.

What about the Prime Minister's luxury multimillion dollar trip? Why has the member not stood in his place and said that that trip should be cut? Here is the member's chance to answer. Let us cut.

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, through you to the member. The member has identified many different areas. Let me respond briefly to each of them in part.

Mr. Tobin: Start with the Prime Minister's trip.

Mr. Reimer: He talked about cuts in mining and tourism. The member will remember that he and I were on the same side of the issue in the referendum debate. We said that it was time for the federal government to start recognizing that some of these areas are better addressed by the provinces than by the federal government.

In part that is what we are beginning to do. We are beginning to say that that is where the major responsibility lies. Therefore the care and funding for that should begin to take place there. In part that is what is happening.

The member says that this budget ignores completely small business. What is amazing to me is how quickly the opposition forgets. The opposition forgot that in December we introduced an economic statement in the House that addressed specifically small business.

Mr. Mills: It is not working.

Mr. Reimer: The members opposite cry out and say that it is not working. Then let us look at job creation figures which I cited: 48,000 in this past month. If that were put on an annual basis the percentage of increase of job creation in Canada is remarkable and that comes right after a very devastating recession in Canada.

Those job creation figures that are occurring now, partly because of our measures in the 1992 budget and the small business actions taken in the December economic statement, are all beginning to bear fruit.

Mr. Mills: Say that the banks are loaning to small business. Say it in this House.

Mr. Reimer: Let me go on. The member talks about the helicopters. Those members like to put helicopters in opposition to every single item of the budget. They are always focusing on this one item but what they forget is that the helicopter purchase is within the budget of the DND. It has been there and is planned to go over a 13-year period. It is not all spent in one year. They forget to say all of the job benefits that come to Canada. They forget to say what benefits come to Canada because of the building of these 50 helicopters. They forget to say the long-term benefits that Canada will realize in developing people who have skills in research and development and in the high-tech development of equipment. They forget to say that if we in fact do that, then we will not repeat the problem that all of us as Canadians went through when we had to cancel the Avro project because no one was buying new aeroplanes. In a sense they want that repeated.

This is the last point that the member raised. The other member who wanted to ask a question wanted to be sure that I addressed this. The member referred to the luxury trips—those are his words—of the Prime Minister in his planned trip to Europe and to the Soviet Union.

There is one thing that I find really disturbing about comments such as this one. This is not just debate difference. This is in essence saying that we Canadians do not have any pride in our institutions. In essence it is saying that we Canadians have no pride in our Prime Minister and that we have no pride in Canada and that we do not want our Prime Minister to go to other countries to be the advocate for Canada.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Reimer: Do you notice, Mr. Speaker, how they laugh? All the words of derision are all from the seats of their pants. When the American President flies in Air Force One, as the first aircraft is called for the United States, I am always impressed by one thing. At least Americans say: "The President, whether I voted for him or not, has the right to do that." When a Canadian does it, oh, no he is not allowed to do that. I think it is time that we had a little more pride in our institutions and in our country and then we would not use words like that.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the hon. member's speech. At one point I consulted the public accounts, and I would like to correct the hon. member's erroneous and deplorable presentation of the facts.

[English]

In the public accounts report of 1984 it says that the total national accumulated debt is $157 billion and not the figure that he stated. He should check the Auditor General's report like I did. I would invite him to come with me to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

In 1992 the last public accounts report stated that the national debt is $423.1 billion. This is in 1992. If he had bothered to read the 1993 budget of the Minister of Finance he would have discovered that on page 19 the net national public debt is $491.2 billion. In other words, contrary to what he said at the beginning of his speech, his government managed to more than triple the national debt.

Mr. Arseneault: More than any other government since Confederation.

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting how we on this side and the members on the opposite side like to use figures for our advantage.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Reimer: Both we and they do it. They laugh when I do it but I am supposed to cry when they do it. Is that not correct?

It is interesting that when they ask a question they do not want an answer. They do not give any simple common courtesy as I did to the member. I was quiet and I listened. Now when I want to respond, they all yell. That tells me that if they really were interested they would keep quiet. However, no, they are not interested in the truth. They could not care less what the truth is and they just simply want to twist things to their advantage.

In trying to respond—

Mr. Bellemare: The member cannot respond unless he gets the books as I have offered to do.

• (1235)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I ask for the co-operation of all members. The public and I are having some difficulty hearing the hon. member. Some people watch our debate and I think they want to hear the hon. member.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order. I listened attentively to the member's remarks and I took notes. He did say in his opening remarks that the national debt was $206 billion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I regret that this is not a point of order.

[Translation]

This is not a point of order, but a matter for debate. The point was already raised by the hon. member for Gloucester. The hon. member is trying to give his version of the facts which he will when he has an opportunity to do so. I would ask hon. members to respect the views of their opponents. According to our parliamentary system, members on all sides should be able to hear a member's arguments without constant interruptions. I am sorry to have to state the obvious, but it is the basis of our parliamentary system. The hon. member for Kitchener.

[English]

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, I will quickly respond to the best of my knowledge. I will stand by my figure until I am shown that it is incorrect.

To the best of my knowledge and according to the research I have done and by all the figures I have looked at and have been told, the deficit we inherited in 1984 was $206 billion.

I stand by that figure and that is what I used in my speech. That is where I went from. What is it now? If I look at 1992-93 and the budget document that we have from yesterday, it is the figure that I used of $458 billion.

I stand by the figures I used. Therefore when I said that it has more than doubled during the Conservative time from 1984 to the present from $206 billion to $458 billion, that is correct. It has a little more than doubled.

When I said that it went 11 times higher during the Liberal period, I stand by that because those are the figures I have.

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I realize the hon. member who just spoke and I do not have the same views, but the hon. member does not seem to agree with my figures taken from the public accounts reports from 1984 and 1992. I could even quote chapter and verse, but the hon. member referred to would not agree.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. In this House, all members may express their views, and it is up to the public to judge. It is not up to the Chair to determine who is right and who is wrong or to weigh arguments that are brought before the House. You have taken one position, the hon. member has taken another position. I think the public is able to make up its own mind. It is not up to the Chair to judge whether your source or the source quoted by the hon. member is right or wrong. The Chair notes what is said. It is all part of the debate. The Chair does not intend to judge the quality of the sources quoted in this House.

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, when we refer to reports that were tabled in Parliament—as you know, I am a member of the public accounts committee—it is not right for a member to make statements that convey the exact opposite of the figures tabled by the Auditor General of Canada and the Comptroller General of Canada. The figures I received from these two sources, from the Auditor General of Canada and the Comptroller General of Canada—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. Again, I am afraid I will have to cut short this point of order. When members on both sides of the House quote from public documents that were tabled here in the House, it is not up to the Chair to judge those documents. They exist, and they were tabled. You are referring to the public accounts, and the hon. member is referring to the budget speech. The Speaker is the servant of the House and, as such, listens carefully to the views of hon. members, but it is not up to him to say who is right. When a vote is held, hon. members can render their own verdict, speaking on behalf of their constituents and the people who support them.

Mr. Bellemare: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Is the hon. member insinuating that the Comptroller General of Canada, that the Auditor General of Canada to whom I just spoke on the telephone, and I, a member of the public accounts committee, lied to the House, or would the hon. member agree he made a mistake by not checking his sources?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am afraid I will have to be firm. This is not a point of order nor a question of privilege. We are talking about views that were expressed. As far as I know, the hon. member did not say his opponent was a liar, and there is no reason why the Chair should demand a withdrawal of any kind. Both members have expressed different views, and that is allowed according to the rules of parliamentary and democratic debate.

[English]

Mr. Arseneault: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to prolong this, but in light of the comments that have been made and exchanged between the two members and since the comptroller and the Auditor General seem to be criticizing the Minister of Finance and vice versa, I wonder if it would not be wise for the Minister of Finance to withdraw his budget in the meantime to check the figures.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): This is not a point of order.

[Translation]

I am sorry, but I cannot go on repeating the same arguments, and I hope this will be the end of it. If members have different views, they can express those views in the course of this debate. There is plenty of room and time for members to express their points of view.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in this debate. Let me say that I was quite surprised by some of the comments made by the member for Kitchener. Even though he sits on that side, he is known to many of us in this House as generally having some degree of common sense.

I am certain that the people of Kitchener would be quite surprised to hear the member, albeit in a difficult situation, less than 24 hours after a so-called budget that preached the virtues of restraint and everybody doing their fair share, defending as appropriate, wrapping in the flag of patriotism, issuing a call to arms, the Prime Minister's first class, paid, goodbye holiday trip around the world, through Europe and the United States at a cost of millions of dollars. He says it is an appropriate gesture and all Canadians ought to stand, face the flag, salute and feel their heart bursting with pride as the Prime Minister really shows how Canada can spend lavishly at a time of restraint.

I say to the member with great respect that I suspect the people of Kitchener will not appreciate the member for Kitchener taking that view in this regard.

An hon. member: Hard working people.

Mr. Tobin: Let me say to the member as well that I hope the people of Kitchener are watching today. If some are watching, I hope they will call up the Kitchener-Waterloo Record, the newspaper in Kitchener and ask it to request a copy of the member's comments.

I do not think they will be impressed with the member's comments at a time of restraint when governments all across the country are putting cuts in place. We are within days of an historical vote in the Soviet Union where the people showed they were committed to democracy. They said yes to Yeltsin, yes to reform, yes to staying the course and not going back to the old ways of the old communist government and the cold war. A massive number, 70 per cent, surprised the planet and said yes to staying the course, yet this government would bring in a budget and keep in place a $6 billion expenditure for cold war helicopters.

Only a few weeks ago the minister of defence was saying: "But we have to keep this expense in place because we do not know what is going to happen in the Soviet Union. Yeltsin may be pushed out. The people may go back to a communist regime."

I do not think anybody on the planet was prepared. A scant few days ago the results came in with a margin of greater than 70 per cent. The hard-pressed people of the Soviet Union, living in difficult circumstances, making great sacrifices and doing without nevertheless embraced democracy by an overwhelming margin in North American terms, an unheard of margin. They wrapped their arms around the concept of democracy and reform and said they would stay the course.

What is Canada's answer to that historic vote? Our answer is to bring in a budget in which we keep in place a $6 billion cold war expenditure. What is the member's comment opposite? It is an appropriate expenditure. We need to spend those billions to watch our enemy, the Soviet Union. Even the United States, the arch enemy of the old and gone Soviet empire has chosen to upgrade over 500 helicopters in its helicopter fleet. Two hundred and thirty nine search and rescue style helicopters have been upgraded at a cost of $10 million each. Over 300 Chinooks have been upgraded by the United States but Canada alone in the world is going to spend nearly $6 billion on helicopters we do not need.

The company in question, Westland Augusta is bankrupt. It has been taken over by an Italian crown corporation. The president of the company has been arrested and charged in a bribery scandal and is now before the courts in Europe. The helicopter in question crashed, killing all the crew and the remaining prototypes have been grounded pending an investigation. Yet this government insists on proceeding—

An hon. member: That is right.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for South Shore.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I am sure it was inadvertent on the part of my hon. friend because I know he would not want to mislead the House when he said the type of helicopter we are buying crashed. He refers to a $6 billion contract when he knows perfectly well that it is a $4.4 billion contract. These points have been frequently—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but it is not a question of order.

Mr. Mills: Gucci helicopters.

Mr. Tobin: Not only was it not a point of order, it did not even make any sense. It is a $5.8 billion expenditure.

Mrs. Sparrow: It's $4.4 billion and you know it. Your nose is growing.

Mr. Tobin: The hon. member opposite says: "No, no, you cannot say $6 billion, it is only $5.8 billion." Let me tell you about government projections. According to its own budget papers in 1991–92 this government projected a deficit this year of $27.5 billion, which is why it cannot be taken seriously.

Do you know how much it was off by? Can you guess how much it was off by? Was it off by a mere billion? Was it $2 billion?

Some hon. members: More, more, more.

Mr. Tobin: Was it $3 billion? Was it $4 billion; $5 billion; $6 billion? Was it $7 billion? Was it $8 billion? It was off by a full $9 billion.

Some hon. members: How much?

Mr. Tobin: It was off by $9 billion. This government projected in its last full budget that it would create in the intervening period to this day an additional 500,000 new jobs. How much do you think it was off by? Was it off by 100,000, 300,000, 500,000 or 700,000? It was off by 800,000 because it did not create 500,000 jobs. In the intervening period, the economy has actually lost an additional 300,000 jobs.

How can anybody take the projections of this Minister of Finance and this government seriously?

This budget has been printed on recycled paper and so it should be. It is a recycled document. Only an excellent, first class, used car salesman could call this document a new model this year. This is old, used, abandoned, the tires are flat and the gas tank is empty.

• (1250)

Canadians expected a game plan. They expected the government to invite them to engage in a crusade to rebuild, reinvigorate this country and make it competitive to ensure we can challenge the world and earn our fair share of this planet's wealth. They were prepared to do their part.

I have just spent weeks in the province of Newfoundland knocking on the doors of some of the poorest people in this country. Do you know what they said? They said governments cannot spend beyond their means. They are not putting their hands out and saying "spend, spend, spend"; they are saying "be responsible." They are saying "be competent"; they are saying "give us a game plan and we will do our part. Invite us to participate in rebuilding this country and restoring confidence. We will do our part."

Then the government yesterday produced this thin, mean, tired, worn out, transparently empty, political patronizing piece of paper called a budget that invites people to just close their eyes to the disaster this government has visited upon this country.

The ship of state of Canada is in the middle of the ocean. The winds are high, the waves are high and she is being battered to and fro. What this ship needs is a steady hand on the wheel. What do we have instead? We have a tired Tory government telling the passengers, the population of Canada, to go back to sleep, that the ship is on course. The course is disaster. This is not just my opinion or the opinion of the members opposite. It is not a journalist's opinion nor the public's opinion. The budget documents tell the story.

What do they say? The Auditor General, as my colleague has made clear, pointed out that in 1984 the public debt of Canada was $157 billion. From the time the country was founded until 1984, 117 years, the total debt acquired in building the infrastructure of the country—the highways, schools, universities, towns, transportation systems—was $157 billion. With that we built and created one of the greatest nations on earth.

What has happened in the intervening nine years? Are there any more highways? Are there any more transportation systems? Have any more great cities been created out of dry land on the Atlantic, on the prairies, in the heartland? No. What has happened to the deficit in the intervening years?

Let us look right in the budget document. All members pick up their documents and turn to page 63. It is right in the document. From the $157 billion it cost to build an entire nation over 117 years, in nine years this government drove the deficit to $458.6 billion at the end of this fiscal year.

An hon. member: With over three million people out of work.

Mr. Tobin: And what does it give us for that? What new infrastructure, what new population, what new cities, what new highways, what new hospitals, what new industries?

Mr. Speaker, you have not heard the best part yet. I know your curiosity is now piqued. It is telling us that if we re-elect it four years from now—page 62 of the document—it will add another $100 billion to the national debt. During the life of another government if it is re-elected, the national debt will go up to $563.2 billion, another $105 billion. That is its plan. That is what it is putting on paper. That is what it is admitting to. If everything goes fantastically well it will increase the debt by only another $105 billion.

That is the game plan opposite. This is the party that campaigned on the notion of fiscal responsibility.

Let us look at another page in the budget because I do not want to give you my opinion. You might think it is kind of shaded, given that I would like nothing more than to see this crowd booted out. Let us look at the budget document itself. Let us turn now to page 26. Members of the public who do not have their copy yet should write down the number so they can look at it later when they do have a copy of the budget. On page 26 there is an incredible admission:

• (1255)

> Canada's gross international liabilities are partly offset by foreign assets held by Canadians. Nevertheless, relative to the size of the economy, Canada is now by far the most indebted of the major industrial countries. Further, Canada's net foreign liabilities reached a post-war record in 1992—43.8 per cent of GDP.

The budget document says that this government has put Canada in the position where we are now the largest debtor nation in the entire industrialized world and that under this government we set a record in 1992. What was the record? We have a post-war record whereby 43.8 per cent of our GDP is our foreign liability. This is our foreign-held debt or Canadian paper held in foreign hands. Of that total, 40 per cent is held by Japan.

I said it was a record. When was the previous record? Let me read on in the document:

> Its previous peak was 42 per cent in 1961.

What party was in power in 1961? It was the last time the Tories were in power under Mr. Diefenbaker.

All the rhetoric in the world by the member for Kitchener and by every happy and well-trained member opposite in the Conservative Party will not change the facts contained in their government's own budget document. The legacy of this government is to bring Canada to the point where Canada under this administration in nine years has almost tripled the previous debt piled up in the first 117 years of Confederation and where Canada in the western industrialized world is the largest—bar none and second to none—debtor nation on the planet. One can think of all the countries one wants to.

The Conservatives standing up and saying with that record to the people of Canada: "Re-elect us and we will pile on another $100 billion of debt," is like the pyromaniac arrested with the match in his hand who says: "Sorry fellows, I was just kidding. I would like now to apply to be fire chief." If it were not so tragic and so serious it would be laughable.

I do not even know why we had a budget yesterday. It was a phoney budget and a phoney exercise. There were no changes in the fiscal arrangements between the federal and provincial governments, no changes in the corporate tax rate, no changes in the personal income tax rate, no initiatives to create jobs or no long-term plans to come to grips with the annual deficit or the long-term debt.

There was only one thing it did that was of any substance and only one way in which it tipped its hand. It did two things. The member for St. John's East cannot be pleased with this. I notice that he is looking distinctly uncomfortable about it. I refer to page 53 in the book. The government indicated that it is not going to renew federal-provincial agreements in the areas of forestry and mining. There will be no more federal-provincial co-operation in forestry or mining. That is important to my area of Corner Brook, Newfoundland, to central Newfoundland, to western Newfoundland and to the forestry sector all across Canada. This sector provides one in every 10 Canadian jobs.

It wiped out and happily said goodbye to the mining sector. This is also important to my part of the country and to my riding in particular and to the Baie Verte peninsula.

What else was said? It was said that the government will be reviewing the economic and regional development agreements in other sectors as they expire. This includes economic and regional development agreements in agriculture, communications, the environment, fisheries, transportation, industrial development, industrial innovation and tourism. In every area and far-flung region of this country those who have the least among us seek to rebuild their infrastructure, add value to their industrial base and take their natural resource area and build on it to create new wealth. In every area where those who have the least reach out their hands in a sense of co-operation, partnership and building, this federal government is going to withdraw the federal hand and walk away and abandon the regions of Canada. That is the game plan and that statement in the budget makes a mockery of a statement yesterday or two days ago by the Minister of National Defence in Atlantic Canada when she said that she wanted to put more money into regional development. It is an absolute farce.

There is one other important matter. The defence minister said: "If I am elected as leader of the Conservative Party I will wipe out the deficit in five years." The Minister of the Environment said: "If I am elected as leader of the Conservative Party I will wipe out the deficit in four years." That is the claim.

Again, let us look at the budget papers. We want to have an objective opinion. According to the budget papers, the Minister of Finance is forecasting that—even if we believe all of his blown up, hyperventilated, exaggerated claims to growth and productivity which I do not not of course having had experience with believing those things in the past—there will be at least a $14 billion annual deficit on the date by which the Minister of the Environment says we will have no deficit. There will be at least an $8 billion annual deficit on the date by which the Minister of National Defence claims she will wipe out the deficit.

If the leadership candidates for the Conservative Party cannot get their story straight with their own Minister of Finance who is telling us that we cannot wipe out the debt in five years or in four years despite his best efforts, then it is time for Tory leadership candidates to explain precisely to Canadians how they are going to eliminate the debt. Let the Minister of National Defence tell us whether it is old age security, medicare or education funding. What basic programs important to Canadians are going to be wiped out to pay for helicopters and to keep a campaign commitment that was given by someone who had not thought it through?

The ordinary people of Canada, the people who sit in their T-shirts with beers in their hands and with whom the Minister of National Defence cannot relate, know bull when they see it. This budget and these campaign promises both belong in the same category. I cannot say the word in the House, Mr. Speaker. Let me just say this. The people of Canada know a phoney exercise when they see it. It takes a face like a horse's you know what to get up and try to present this budget to the people of Canada as a serious exercise in regulating and managing our economy. This is a shameful and ridiculous exercise that we have engaged in with members opposite.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte.

Before I get into the question and the reference to the pages that he was referring to I would like to talk about that little debate we had on budget figures and why I used $206 billion.

Look at the public accounts for 1991-92 on page 1.2 and table 1.1 that is headed deficit and net debt: "In the year ended March 31, 1984 the net debt was $167.8 billion." I will read further on the same page: "From April 1, 1984 to March 31, 1985 the net debt was $206.3 billion." This is the figure I used.

The reason I used the figure $206.3 billion from the public accounts was that the election was on September 4, 1984. Therefore, I should use the numbers that go after that or are in that current fiscal year. That is the reason I used it.

When I said I stand by the number of $206 billion then I have to use the number of $206 billion because that is the figure in the fiscal year in which we came in. I cannot go to the previous year. I have to use the $206 billion. I have no other choice.

I think in the debate we should be careful why we use certain numbers. The member was right to quote $157 billion—I think it was $167 billion—for the previous year. I have no quarrel with that. However, I have to use the number from the fiscal year in which we were elected and that was $206 billion.

I have a few questions. The first question is with regard to page 62.

I have to thank the member, through you Mr. Speaker, for his kind remarks to me. He was very gracious. In trying to be gracious to the member I must say that I enjoy the play acting he does every day in Question Period in the House. I enjoy his choice of words. I think we all do. I think some of us who do not come from Newfoundland envy those from Newfoundland. They have a remarkable ability and use of the English language. We enjoy listening to them and we have just had a good display of that here today. I do not know how much we learned. There was a tremendous amount of heat but I am not sure there was a lot of light.

My question is this. On page 62 he took us through the line of net public debt, which is $458 billion for this year through to $563 billion for 1997–98. That is correct. He was right.

Guess what? I want to ask this question through you, Mr. Speaker. Why did the member ignore the next line? He said nothing about it. That line shows that the financial requirements excluding foreign exchange will go from minus $34.4 billion this year to $1 billion in 1997–98. Why did the member leave that line out?

My second question is this. He quoted page 26 and said: "Look at the damaging things that are said. Canada is now by far the most indebted of the major industrial countries." That is true and exactly right.

Why is it that for nine budgets and five economic statements where we tried to cut spending the member voted against it every single time? Why did he do that? Why did he not join us in cutting the spending? Why did he not support us in cutting the spending?

My last question—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Time is running out. In all fairness I have to give the floor to the hon. member.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious to some people that the way to avoid hearing the truth expressed a second time is to make the noise of a stick in an empty barrel and keep pounding away until the clock runs out.

I frankly do not know what the member's great debating point was. If the member stands on his feet and says: "We agree that the deficit or the debt of Canada is going to increase by $105 billion in the next four year if our government is re-elected; there is no argument," then I do not know where he thinks the great debating point in that is.

If he agrees with the budget documents that the annual deficit cannot be wiped out, as is claimed by the two leadership candidates, then I do not know what his argument is.

The member talked about Newfoundlanders having a great—I do not know if it is true or untrue—ability to express themselves but I will say one thing. Where I come from we do not need to try to find semantic arguments in numbers to say things. The people of Canada know when their nation is in trouble.

The people of Canada not just in Newfoundland but all across this country want to do something about it. They want to participate in a plan. We are profoundly disappointed that there is no plan.

What was the great debating point in having the member note that Canada is the largest debtor nation in the world? Why did we not vote with the government? It is because we believed, as we do today, that the government's approach was wrong. The government's approach was to surrender in the face of unemployment.

We do not believe in the so-called war against inflation and that 1.6 million unemployed across this country or nearly three million underemployed are acceptable losses—to use a Vietnam kind of wording—in the war against inflation. We have been saying that for a number of years. We have not been listened to.

This economic experiment where all bend down before the altar of so-called unshackled capitalism as proposed by this government has failed. It has failed.

In Great Britain where Margaret Thatcher held sway the country is in a mess. In a recent Gallup poll more than 50 per cent of the people of Great Britain said that if they had the opportunity they would leave Great Britain.

In the United States where Ronald Reagan held sway with his so-called revolution the debt of that country has been driven through the roof. Those who were fundamentally dishonest have profited. The savings and loans scandal was unvarnished greed where people took the pension funds, the retirement funds and the savings of the innocent.

They created phoney corporations and this was all done legally under the Republican's new U.S. law. They ripped off hundreds of millions and billions. They ran with the cash and left innocent people bankrupt. The American government bailed them out. That same right wing philosophy prevailed here and got us in trouble.

We bailed out the banks. We are spending almost $6 billion on helicopters because some lobbyist is making a mint off the commission but we will not put one nickel on the table to put an unemployed Canadian back to work.

The government will not even ask our people who are begging for a chance to participate with us in a crusade for our country. Canadians know this is a great country. They just want a government and a plan that knows it as well. They want a chance to rebuild this great land.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, we hear so much being spoken about the helicopters and the cost of these helicopters. Opposition members do not take into account that the amount of money which is $4.6 billion in 1992 dollars will be spent over 13 years. That is quite different from what is being quoted all the time.

There are 800 helicopters presently on order in the world and Canada will have 10 per cent of every helicopter built. It will also create 45,000 person-year jobs for Canadians. I think this is something we have to put down. There is job creation and that is very important.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member made her comments sincerely but I want to tell her there are not 800 helicopters on order world-wide.

Mrs. Sparrow: Yes, there are.

Mr. Tobin: No, there are not.

Mrs. Sparrow: That is not true.

Mr. Tobin: I am giving you the facts. There are 70 on order world-wide and 50 were ordered by Canada alone. We are ordering more of those helicopters than all the rest of the planet combined, including the two countries that are building them. The member opposite, whom I have known for a long time, should check her facts before she says it is not true.

Members opposite are sensitive about these helicopters because they are going to bring this party and this government crashing back down to earth.

Canadians know a multimillion dollar job to fill the pockets of lobbyists when they see it. The only people who are going to profit from this are Tory lobbyists.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I hope the rest of the debate can be conducted without these histrionics because I do not think they are helpful to Canadians who are concerned, as I know a number of my friends opposite are, where we are going vis-à-vis the deficit and the debt. People are interested in the future of our country want to see a responsible method taken to reduce the deficit and the debt. They want to see something concrete and some real plans.

I regret that while a lot is being said on the other side about what is wrong with this budget, I see very little productive or positive comments coming from them and no suggestion or plan that would give Canadians confidence. The fact of the matter is they do not have a plan and they do not have any new ideas.

Mr. Milliken: Well neither do you in this budget. This is all old stuff. Nobody else thinks this is good either.

Mrs. Dobbie: I would say that the budget of April 26, 1993 is now before us and this is what we are dealing with, not old stuff. We are dealing with the future and what is going on in the country today.

It is no surprise—you have been listening to it all day—when I say the budget has not met with universal approval. Canada would not be Canada if it had and the opposition would not be the opposition if it approved of anything the government did because members of the opposition are very hungry for power these days.

Although they do not have any real plan or any real idea of what they might do with that power, we can smell the greed and hunger over there. It is affecting and impacting their judgment and it often impacts on what they are saying.

While it is easy for the opposition to criticize, I think it would be much more difficult to be in the finance minister's resoled shoes. The hon. finance minister did not go out and buy a new pair of shoes in honour of what is happening these days in the economy. He had his current shoes resoled. I would say it is much more difficult to be in his shoes than it is to sit on the other side of the House and criticize indiscriminately simply for the sake of opposing.

I really want to extend my very sympathetic understanding to my colleague, the hon. Minister of Finance. He had some very tough choices to make and he was faced with bringing down a budget very close to an election and of course close to a change in leadership. He is doing this at a time when our options are so few. I congratulate him, as my colleague the Minister of the Environment pointed out, for setting the table for the next leadership convention and the election that is coming. He is setting the table for a renewed mandate for the Conservative government. I think he has done an admirable job under these circumstances and once again I extend my congratulations to him.

The opposition has made a great to-do this morning about the fact it did not see anything in the budget to stimulate the economy. I want to set the record straight by pointing out that this budget is an adjunct to the financial statement that was made in December which contained many provisions to stimulate the economy. I see my friend opposite does not want to hear this so he is leaving. He is blocking out what I say and ignoring it because the truth is very difficult for him to take. I can understand that. Nevertheless I am going to say this anyway for his edification. Perhaps he will be good enough to read the record later.

We have taken measures to support the recovery and let me just list some of them. There has been a reduction in the personal income surtax which is already in effect. It has put more money in the pockets of Canadians in those provinces that did not take that money back and use it for their own purposes. Certainly in my province, Manitoba, the tax reduction was allowed to stand and Manitobans now have more money as a result of the initiative taken by the federal government.

We have also introduced a two-year special home-buyer's plan which is in effect. There have been other things like a reduction in manufacturing and processing tax rates and an increase in the CCA for manufacturing and processing machinery and equipment. We have redirected capital gains exemptions. We have streamlined research and development tax credits and made changes to the withholding tax.

We have done a number of other things and I will not go into all of the detail, but just in case my friends opposite want to bring this up I can tell them that much has been done to stimulate the recovery in Canada and it is paying off. We are seeing the impact now. The economy is growing and has been doing so for seven consecutive quarters. Clearly we are past the recession and now on to a steady rate of growth.

In this budget there is a long list of measures that will be very positive for Canada. We will save $3.8 billion in this fiscal year of 1993-94 and this is important for the short term. We will not raise taxes or add new taxes. We will further simplify the GST remittance system for small businesses which is important to their competitiveness and their ability to reduce the cost of doing business.

One of the highlights in the non-monetary measures carried in this budget is the further reduction of regulations so small businesses will be able to find a level playing-field and remove obstacles to their competitiveness. The happy result is that in addition to saving small business money we are also going to save the taxpayer money because the cost of administration will come down when, out of the 700 regulations we examine, we abandon one out of every four. That is the kind of positive initiative that organizations like the Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Council of National Business have been requesting for a long time. They know that the paper burden and regulation for the sake of regulation reduce Canada's competitive position and make it difficult for us to take full advantage of the economic recovery opportunities that are out there waiting for us as we pull out of this recession.

We will also do something that will help individuals. I have had many people talk to me about the tax system that requires quarterly tax instalments. That will now be modified and about 300,000 tax filers will be exempt from having to file their tax claims on a quarterly basis. That will affect mainly seniors with lower incomes. At the same time it will also save us some money.

In addition to that we are going to send out GST rebates twice a year instead of four times a year. That will reduce the administrative costs to the tune of about $7.5 million a year. All of these sensible, careful measures are designed to improve our competitive position and reduce the costs of budgeting and administering our government. This is just a small example of the many progressive measures contained in this budget and I heartily applaud them.

I also applaud the winding up of eight redundant government agencies and the merging of four more. I urge that the planned privatization of the targeted Crown corporations be accomplished with all good haste because that will save us even more money.

I am also delighted to see the rationalization of program spending in the provincial jurisdictions of mining and forestry. These are sensible measures that will make this government more efficient and more responsive to the needs of the 1990s. It is time the federal government got out of provincial jurisdiction because we simply cannot afford to duplicate services and compete with one another when there is only one taxpayer out there and only one tax dollar to spend.

In spite of all this, I must say that given the national psyche that currently understands the very real imperatives of the debt, I think with some regret of what my hon. colleague might have done if the circumstances had been different and we were not at the end of a mandate, for example.

I think of the directions a new leader must be prepared to give the finance minister as early as this fall after the coming election. Real change will have to take place in the way we do the business of government, not just federally here in Ottawa but at all levels of government. Real change will also have to take place in the way people look at government and what they expect of government. Perhaps some of our sacred cows will have to be led to the slaughterhouse as we look for ways to cope with the deficit and debt.

Governments can no longer be all things to all people. We can no longer set ourselves up as our brother's keeper, taking care of people's concerns from the cradle to the grave, because we simply do not have the resources to do it. The prosperity that we thought we were enjoying in the 1970s and the early 1980s was a false prosperity based on borrowing that we did on our children's future. That must now come to an end as it always ultimately had to.

Now we must change our way of doing things and our way of looking at things. Canadians must take responsibility for their own destinies. They must understand it is not a question of what their government can do for them. The question is: what is my responsibility to myself, my participation in democracy and my fellow Canadians? How productive can I be? What can I contribute? Because it is through contribution, productivity and getting involved in helping out that we realize the full benefit of our citizenship in this wonderful country. Attitudes will have to change.

While I applaud the work of my colleague, the Minister of Finance, I want to pause for a moment to consider other possibilities. For example, this budget allows the provincial governments to continue to increase their spending at a rate of 4 per cent per year while the federal government will restrain its increases to 1.5 per cent a year, even though we expect inflation to run somewhere between 1.5 per cent and 2.5 per cent. That means no real spending federally and no real spending growth.

I ask Canadians to consider whether or not the provincial governments can continue to increase their expenditures at the rate of 4 per cent growth when we are facing this very serious and real situation vis-à-vis our total national debt. I think the provinces must take responsibility along with the federal government and the municipalities and come together to work on these problems as a single unit rather than each going its own way because that is taking us to perdition.

If we had reduced the provincial transfers to the same rate of growth as the rest of our budget we would save $9 billion over the next five years. Coincidentally, that is about the same amount as our budgetary shortfall this year in terms of our expectations of revenues. It is a serious amount of money and I think that while we are dealing with this year's budget, if we look over the next five years I would suggest to provincial finance ministers that they begin to examine ways to cut their own expenditures in very real terms so they do not have to accept growth in transfer payments from the taxpayer who is sending part of his money to the federal government. At some point or other, if we do not get this under control, tax increases will be absolutely necessary and nobody wants that to happen, least of all the federal government.

• (1325)

When the finance ministers come together, as the federal Minister of Finance has pledged they will do, and I think that is a very positive thing, they are going to be forced to come to the very same conclusion that most Canadians have already reached. That is that there is only one taxpayer, regardless of how many levels of government there are, and the taxpayer is saying: "Enough is enough. Get your fiscal house in order. Do it decisively and do it now."

The budget proposes to cut grants and contributions 10 per cent this year and 10 per cent next year. It promises further reductions of 15 per cent in 1995 and 1996 and 20 per cent thereafter. That is very good and positive.

At the same time we are exempting a long list of programs such as transfers for individuals receiving veterans and Old Age Security benefits, the Canadian Jobs Strategy, selected native programs, famine relief and programs for the disabled. This is gentle and humane treatment as indeed it should be because it is part of our job to look after the vulnerable.

In addition to that we are exempting granting agencies, such as the Canada Council. Their budgets, as well as the budgets of university granting councils will be kept to the same rate of increase, 1.5 per cent, as other government spending.

In addition, grants and contributions affecting science and technology will receive favourable treatment. I approve of that because education has to be one of our highest priorities. In fact, all of these things are high on our priority list and I respect the thinking that went into the exemptions.

However we must begin to think about our future priorities and how they will be funded. We have to make some decisions about whether or not we as Canadians are willing to give up some of our cherished but perhaps non-essential programs in order to preserve funding for things like education and health.

I noticed as the debate proceeded this morning and members opposite stood in their places and spoke, that while they had a great deal of criticism on the cuts made in this particular budget and the measures that have been taken, they had very little to offer as alternatives. They did not tell us what programs they would cut or how they would decrease their expenditures without hurting individuals.

People across the country are calling out for even deeper cuts because they are concerned about what is going to happen in the future. They are demanding that contributions to advocacy groups and other special interest groups be eliminated altogether. People are telling us that unless a program can be shown to have a net benefit to a large number of Canadians, we should not be funding it. People are saying that we all have to become more self-reliant, we have to become more independent. People are also saying that they are really tired of robbing Peter to pay an ever-greedy and hungry Paul whose rich diet is making him too heavy to carry himself alone.

I know the finance minister is a very kind and gentle man who wants to ease the pain of these cuts by making them gradually. That is why the bulk of the announced savings of $30 billion is scheduled to occur in years three, four and five. We are delighted, as I said before, to learn that there will be no new taxes and no additional taxes as a result of this budget.

I am still concerned however that our debt will continue to grow. Even with a $30 billion savings by 1997-98 we will see the debt grow to over $563 billion. This is in spite of the good news that the deficit will be reduced by then to $8 billion on an anticipated gross domestic product of $928 billion.

I believe it is very much a question of priorities that Canadians must continue to address. In this budget, for example, we speak about constraining annual growth in government spending on international assistance by limiting increases to 1.5 per cent beginning in 1994-95. That is after taking into account the 10 per cent decreases announced in December for the coming year of 1993-94. As I said earlier, famine relief is exempted. Given the very real difficulties that many countries face, this move may seem to be somewhat harsh and it certainly is regrettable. However, I would suggest that if we do not get our finances in order we will no longer be able to borrow the money with which to support these initiatives.

On balance, this budget is a lot less painful than many of us had hoped and perhaps others had feared. It is true that the full impact has not yet been analysed. After all, $3.9 billion in expenditure cuts is not insignificant. Of course, $30 billion is even more significant. I must emphasize the importance of meeting and even exceeding these expenditure reductions in the coming five years.

Experience tells us that the fine people over at the Department of Finance have a very long history of budgetary optimism. They do not have unfortunately a particularly good record of predicting revenues.

I urge caution in accepting the premises that tell us to expect a growth rate of 4.6 per cent in 1994. I have not crunched the numbers, but I question the wisdom of bucking the consensus of private sector outlooks by rejecting a growth projection of 4 per cent and the premise that expects the gap between real output to narrow to 5.5 per cent by 1994 and close to 1.75 per cent by 1998.

There are some really big questions we have to ask ourselves: will inflation average out at 1.5 per cent over the medium term? Will employment fall to 7.5 per cent by the end of 1998? These are some concerns that I would like to voice as we look optimistically ahead on a five-year plan. There are just too many unknowns and intangibles, not the least of which is an unprecedented acceleration in technological change and a bulge in the age of the work force which was trained to meet employment patterns of two and three decades ago.

We must focus our minds on the changes we are making for this year and ask if they are going to save our credibility on the international money markets. That is what is important right now. I suggest that they are.

Perhaps the most important message sent yesterday is the one that promises an all-out attempt by the federal government to find a co-operative approach with the provinces in future budget setting. No government can act in isolation of others in the 1990s. Our competitive position will depend on our ability to act cohesively, to tackle our problems together as Canadians and not as a rag-tag assortment of political entities acting as though they were independent of one another and of the federal government. We must all work together to keep our country whole.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I would have expected my colleague to support her government's budget. I do not criticize that, but she did ask one question: what will the opposition do besides criticize? We suggested that we could cancel the helicopter project and perhaps invest in an infrastructure program for improving the sewers, roads and the other things of our cities and towns that improve the quality of life.

I want to ask my colleague some specific questions. What will this budget do for the 1.6 million unemployed Canadians, for the 2.7 million Canadians receiving social assistance, for the more than two million Canadians using food banks? I do not say that critically. It is an important question to me. How will this help them? What will it do for the middle class which is really the motor of the Canadian economy? If the middle class is suffering, then clearly the economic performance of the country will not be as good as it might be.

My final question is more specific to Manitoba. What will be the impact of this budget with respect to the cuts being imposed on regional development, the cuts with respect to VIA Rail, the cuts with respect to CBC, the cuts with respect to the mining and forestry agreements? These will all have negative job impacts in Manitoba. I am wondering if my hon. colleague would care to respond to those specific questions.

Mrs. Dobbie: Mr. Speaker, I always appreciate the intelligent questions of my colleague opposite. I will try to answer them; I hope I got them all down.

He asked about the helicopters and he talked about infrastructure spending. I suggest to my hon. colleague that in fact helicopters are part of our infrastructure. Our ability to protect our coastal waters, to manage search and rescue missions, to ensure that we have integrity in the north and sovereignty are dependent on our ability to have helicopters that do not fall out of the sky because they have aged beyond the point of no return. Spending on helicopters is spending on part of the infrastructure. I would point out as my colleague mentioned not that long ago, that the money which is being spent on the helicopters, some $4.5 billion, is not being spent in one year. It is being spent over a period of 13 years. I think the impact on the budget is far less important than people may believe.

The hon. member also asked what we are doing to help with the question of employment. That is a very difficult and serious question. There are many pressures right now on the marketplace. They have to do not just with the fact that we have gone through a recession, but that we are going through some fundamental restructuring in our economy and some fundamental restructuring in the way we do business throughout the world. Part of that has to do with technological change as well as the economic restructuring. Another part of it has to do here in Canada with the fact that we have a lot more competition for jobs. Forty-five per cent of women work and that places competition and competitive stresses on traditional entrant into the work force.

We have taken measures in the December economic statement to ensure that the economy will move forward in a productive way and that recovery will gather momentum. If these predictions are correct—and I do have the same doubts I am sure my hon. friend does about predictions for five years—but if correct, unemployment will be reduced by 7.5 per cent at the end of five years. I assure the hon. member that if this government is in office it will continue to do everything it can to accelerate the pace of that change.

The hon. member also asked what this budget will do for the middle class. Again, making sure that we have our fiscal house in order is part of ensuring that our middle class, which is the largest contributor to our coffers, has an infrastructure, a government in place that is rational and controls its deficits and leaves some options and some choices open.

As far as real spending on programs to improve conditions for the unemployed or improve conditions for the middle class, my friend must know that the options right now are extremely limited. It is a choice again of from whom do you steal to pay the other fellow. I suggest that getting the economy in order and making sure that jobs are being created, as in fact they are on a daily basis as the economy begins to grow, will do more for the middle class and the unemployed than any artificial stimulus the government might create.

Finally, the hon. member asks about cuts in Manitoba. Last night that question was asked in my presence and in the presence of Mr. Manness, the minister of finance in Manitoba. His response was the best one. He said clearly that as long as these expenditure reductions were fairly spread across the provinces he had no complaint because all of us must do our part.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question prefaced by a couple of quick comments for the member for Winnipeg South. I understand that we have differing views of priorities and what is right, coming from different philosophies, but we accept those even though we may argue about them from time to time.

In one case in order to defend what I firmly believe is the indefensible in this budget, the member said that the federal government was getting out of the forestry agreements because it was an example of governments competing with each other. That seemed to be the suggestion.

Maybe coming from Winnipeg she is not as aware as some other members of the nature of these agreements. They started back in 1983 I think with John Roberts in the former Liberal administration. It was a one-year program, $55 million a year from the federal government and $55 million from the province in the case of B.C.

When the present government assumed office in 1984, the gentleman who is still Minister of Forestry, who was the author of The Green Ghetto prior to that, did something that was good. He spent less money annually but got better results by negotiating these jointly administered, jointly funded agreements and got more bang for the buck. This allowed the provinces and the federal government by working together to accomplish much more with less money than was the case when it was done on the short term. I simply cannot understand her reference to these kinds of jointly negotiated, jointly funded, jointly administered agreements, as governments competing with each other. It is one of the best investments I have seen during all the time I have been a member of this place or simply been interested in the forestry industry or the political sphere.

It strikes me as almost an insult to the present minister when he has announced that he is leaving parliamentary life, to eliminate the federal government's share in a program that has returned more and demanded more money if we are to fulfil any commitment to the green plan or the principle of sustainable development. I believe in this case she was defending the indefensible. I would like to ask her to try to justify it or perhaps tell me that I was wrong in my interpretation of what she said.

Mrs. Dobbie: Mr. Speaker, I do appreciate the question. I think it is a valid one and I am glad it was raised.

The fact is that programs of this nature are not created to last forever. They do not and should not replace the natural and normal condition that would prevail, which is that forestry is a provincial jurisdiction as are all other resources. Constitutionally it is not appropriate for the federal government to spend a long time in a field like forestry.

In addition to that there are some practical implications here. There was competition, duplication and in some cases resentment because of the occupation of this field by the federal government. Not that long ago I had the occasion to be with the minister of forestry in Manitoba, actually the Minister of Natural Resources because he deals with more than forests. He pointed out to me that while he was the minister responsible for all the forests in Manitoba, he had fewer foresters in the province than did the federal Minister of Forestry, and the federal Minister of Forestry had no responsibility for forests in the province of Manitoba.

While the short-term program may have had a very beneficial effect in some areas, and certainly in my area because we do have forestry and logging and I have lumber companies in my own riding, there has to be a sunset clause on these programs. We have to back out of them when the expenditure can no longer be justified according to the long waiting list of priorities that is out there for the dollars that are available.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that I was not here yesterday to listen to the minister's speech. I was at a nomination meeting in Essex—Windsor which had been scheduled long before and could not be changed. However I must say that if there has been any budget to miss in the eight and a half years of Conservative government, any budget that one could somehow nod through and not have missed a thing, it is this budget. Aside from having an awful lot of propaganda trying to prop up failed records, this budget has absolutely nothing in it. It has no new ideas of any sort and no new initiatives. We were told that the guillotine was coming down in this budget and there was going to be a serious attempt to get control of the deficit situation in this country.

What do we find? Absolutely nothing, except a little bit of creative bookkeeping which puts the GST tax rebate for next year into the next fiscal year by paying people twice a year instead of four times a year.

• (1345)

That represents $625 million in savings out of the $1 billion in savings that is supposedly in this budget.

We have just been talking about the forestry industry and I must say I am struck with horror when I think of the budget and the number of trees that have been sacrificed to produce this piece of absolutely empty nonsense. It is just tragic.

We have an economic crisis here in Canada in 1993. We have 11 per cent of our population out of work, according to the official figures. A real measure of the unemployment rate might be calculated by asking how many people really want to work. We might go back and find the participation rate in the economy in a province where there was a fair amount of economic activity, like Ontario, in the period just before the recession hit in early 1990. The participation rate was about 70.1 per cent at that stage. If we were to apply that participation rate now to the whole country, and surely it is fair to do so because that is a measure of the number of people who wanted to work then and who want to work now, we see that over 17 per cent of the people in this country are unemployed. We are talking about a national catastrophe.

There has been a lot of hoo-ha about a debt crisis. The biggest debt crisis we have in this country is the one this government suffers from when it comes to ideas and compassion for those who are out of work. It exhibits an absolutely abysmal lack of care.

With that number of people out of work, the government brings forward a budget that has absolutely nothing in it to try to help those who are out of work. We have seen previous budgets that have had in my view a set of unfortunate initiatives, but usually in every case it has been possible to point to at least one or two areas where the minister of the day has tried to show some political or economic initiative to deal with the unemployment problem in Canada.

There is not even the pretence of that in this budget. There is nothing here whatsoever. You can start with the summary of the Minister of Finance about all the great things that are in this budget: "No new taxes, no tax increases. More than $30 billion in spending cuts and other measures." Of course, the spending cuts are all in the future. They do not affect the present.

There are all sort of things but not one single point is mentioned about what is going to be done about the serious problem of unemployment in Canada. In fact the only thing that is in this budget which deals with unemployment is an extension of the reduction in unemployment benefits for unemployed people into the future.

It is a heartless government that has lost touch with the realities in this country.

• (1350)

I stood up in the House last week in an Opposition Day debate and listed, from my constituency alone, close to 3,000 workers who had lost their jobs through the dozens of plant shutdowns that have taken place in the Windsor area. Is there anything in this budget that attempts to respond to the concerns of those people? There is not a thing.

In addition, we have to say there are some usual petty, nasty, wicked little hooks in this budget as there have been in every Conservative budget that has been produced since this government came into power.

In this case it has taken the GST rebate which goes to poorer families in this country who were promised it would be given four times a year to offset the increased burden of the GST and said: "We are going to do away with four times a year. We are going to make it just twice a year." There is no recognition of the increased problems that will cause for poorer families in Canada.

On top of it all, these great deficit fighters on the other side of the aisle have brought forward in their last budget a deficit that is higher than the deficit they projected for their first budget in 1985. In other words, we have had almost nine years of Conservative rule in this country by people who are mesmerized by the deficit. Despite all its rhetoric, fuming, excuses and close to 40 new taxes it has put into effect to hit Canadians, the government has to project a higher deficit in its last budget than it could project in its first budget in 1985.

Mind you it is consistent with previous Conservative budgets too. This budget, like all Conservative budgets since 1985 is really good at dealing with the deficit problem five years down the road. If we believe in Alice in Wonderland and like to read our kids fairy stories we could find all sorts of material in this budget. Suddenly, miraculously, the Canadian economy is going to start growing at 4.5 per cent per year. It does not say how. It is going to happen. It will be 4.5 per cent per year.

This remarkable, miraculous growth is going to create a reduction in the deficit. Suddenly by 1998, safely down the road, the borrowing requirements of this government are going to be eliminated. This is the first step toward eliminating the deficit.

It is funny. If you go back to the first budget of the Conservatives in 1985, they were going to have reached that no borrowing position by this year, 1993. Here we are in 1993 and what do we have? We have a bigger deficit than in the first year that the Conservatives presented a budget.

Talk about mismanagement, talk about the tooth fairy, talk about Alice in Wonderland. Anybody who believes the statistics presented in this budget needs to be taken to the Clarke Institute in Toronto and given an extensive series of shock treatments.

The reality is that there is virtually nothing in this budget that will help with any of Canada's problems whatsoever. I have to admit there is one good thing that I have managed to find in the course of 94 pages, one good point. That is the suggestion that we should merge the National Advisory Council on Aging and the National Council of Welfare. That makes sense, but the government says it is also going to do away with all sorts of other committees which it turns out do not have any members anyway so it is awfully easy to get rid of them. That does not prove very much.

It is a budget without a hope of doing anything to help people in this country. By bringing this budget forward at this time the Conservatives have lost the chance in the final budget they will present, I hope for a generation, to keep some of the promises they made, such as the promise to set up a national child care program.

I had people speaking with me this morning from child care advocacy groups across this country, not just the parents but some of the children who have benefited so much from national child care efforts in the past in Canada. They left me some of their very well-presented propaganda. It makes the case very well that we need a national child care program in this country. We need a program to put people to work in the child care area but above all we need a program that will help children by providing high quality child care throughout Canada.

Our New Democrat jobs program makes a commitment to such a child care program for Canada but this government, despite its promises in the last election, has refused to come through.

This government promised to help small business, but again it has not done so. We have argued that we need a national investment fund in this country for Canadian-owned businesses so they would have access to the capital they need to expand their activities through venture capital.

We have argued for a commitment to work force training. We have argued for encouragement of employee ownership where feasible and tightened research requirements on foreign investment. All of those things could have been part of this budget without any extra expenditure of money in many cases. Yet there are no new ideas, no new initiatives, and no new hope for Canada's unemployed.

I wonder if I could call it two o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 2 p.m., the House will now proceed to statements by members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, an article published in the newspaper Les Affaires of April 17, 1993, says that "the federal government delivered the goods in Quebec, through the Canada-Quebec agreement on regional development."

Indeed, the Conservative government provided $440 million out of a total of $820 million, over a period of five years which started in 1988.

Canada also delivered the goods as regards budgets. Moreover, the federal government added $130 million to bail out, over the next two years, programs for which financing had ended. We are not very concerned with criticism made in some regions, to the effect that the amounts announced were only partially spent.

As of February 28, 1993 the federal government had committed $26.62 million out of a total of $35 million in the northwest region of Quebec. On the other hand, as of December 31, 1992, the Quebec government, through this same agreement on the northwest region of its province, had only committed $12.3 million out of a total of $40 million.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are longing for a revival of confidence in their country, renewed hope for their future and brighter prospects for their children. On farms, in small towns, in factories and in homes Canadians expect better for the 39 new taxes they have faced under this government than they received yesterday.

This government cannot seem to grasp that it is not a question of more government or less government but of good government. It is a question of effective public services delivered at a price the country can afford by a Public Service that has the talent and tools it needs to do the job that Parliament has told it to do.

This calculator budgeting that comes up with arbitrary percentage or dollar cuts simply is not delivering the value that Canadians expect for the increased taxes they are going to continue paying into the future.

JACK WALTERS

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I met with a number of outstanding but distraught young athletes who are members of our national speed skating team. They expressed to me their dismay that their coach, Jack Walters, had been fired by the Canadian Amateur Speed Skating Association.

Throughout the past 20 years, 12 of which he spent coaching Gaetan Boucher, Jack Walters has earned the respect and admiration of the national and international speed skating community as one of the world's finest coaches.

This extraordinary reputation is due to the mutual trust, confidence and respect between him and his athletes, outstanding results and his willingness to share his progressive and innovative ideas among the national and international community of coaches.

Canadian taxpayers pay 70 per cent to 75 per cent of the Canadian Amateur Speed Skating Association's costs. On their behalf I ask the minister to get involved and if appropriate to appoint a facilitator so that our young athletes can be assured that petty politics and bureaucratic muddling are not threatening their chance to achieve the goals they have set for themselves on behalf of Canada.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, over the past nine years the Conservative government has asked us to make sacrifices in order to fight the federal deficit and the federal debt, help future generations, develop a globally competitive economy and improve our quality of life, and we have.

Canadians placed their trust in this government. Since the Conservatives took office in 1984 the federal debt has more than doubled to $460 billion. They have consistently posted annual deficits in the $30 billion range. The tax burden on the hard working middle class family has increased to 44 per cent of their income. Over 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed, among them are over 430,000 young people; 30 per cent of our high school students continue to drop out; 2.2 million live on welfare; 2 million rely on food banks; and violent crime has gone up 40 per cent. Tory times are tough times.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the real failure of this government is that it does not understand what truly holds Canada together. Our national institutions make this country viable, institutions like the CBC which allows us to learn about each other, VIA Rail which enables us to visit each other and Canada Post which allows us to communicate with each other.

Yesterday's budget makes it obvious that the Tories are plotting the death of VIA Rail. These latest cuts will force VIA to cut routes and services and make it much more difficult for VIA to acquire the new equipment it will soon need just to function.

While VIA officials will work hard to minimize the effects of these cuts, there is no question that the lower the ongoing investment in rail passenger service the smaller and less frequent VIA will become. This country is too big to leave the funding of rail passenger service to the marketplace.

If we are to continue to have rail passenger service from coast to coast the Canadian government has a role to play. It is not constitutions that keep this country together but people communicating with each other by radio, by television, by letter and through transportation that is affordable and accessible.

SHIPS COMPANY THEATRE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the Ships Company Theatre was established several years ago in the town of Parrsboro, Nova Scotia. Its impact has been felt throughout the Parrsboro shore as it attracts people from several provinces nearby.

It is established in a dry-docked ferry boat called the Kipawa which creates a unique atmosphere and is very conducive to the setting and appropriate to the productions.

The Parrsboro shore area is now experiencing a small boom in tourism and this theatre group was the main original building block which helped to attract many of the other tourism facilities under construction.

The Ships Company Theatre is now applying to the federal government, the provincial government, and the municipality for assistance in funding to allow it to continue to survive and prosper.

Canada Employment has recently announced a section 25 grant to help it upgrade its facilities, which is a start. Applications will be made to ACOA and the Department of Communications, as well as to the province, to assist with a relatively small amount of funding to ensure this continues.

I strongly support the Ships Company Theatre in its efforts to resolve its financial challenges and will be endorsing its applications whole-heartedly.

THE BUDGET

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's budget was good news for senior citizens in my constituency and across Canada. Currently an individual must remit quarterly income tax instalments if both their prior year and current year federal tax liability is more than $1,000 and less than three-quarters of their current year's net income is subject to withholding tax at source.

Effective September 15, 1994, an individual will be required to pay instalments only if the difference between the tax payable and the amount withheld at source is greater than $2,000 in both the current and either of the two preceding years.

This means that some 300,000 people, a great many of them seniors, will no longer be required to make quarterly income tax instalment payments. That is great news for seniors.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, Canada's economic future is in grave doubt. Since 1984 manufacturing productivity has grown at only two-thirds the rate of the G-7 and under this government our high-tech trade has fallen from a surplus of $1 billion to a $30 billion deficit.

Since 1989 we have fallen from fourth to eleventh place in the world in terms of our ability to compete. We have lost 16 per cent of our manufacturing jobs and our unemployment rate is stuck at 11 per cent.

Yesterday the government's challenge was to offer policies to help Canada compete as a high-wage nation and create jobs. It failed to address our deficiencies in education, training, numeracy, literacy, science and technology, and research and development.

It offered nothing to help small businesses expand, to assist manufacturers with productivity, exports and quality, or to help our primary industries add value here in Canada.

This budget is a prescription for our continuing economic decline. This government continues to fail us miserably.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada for its innovative and dynamic approach toward the safety of older consumers during this National Consumer Week.

We should keep in mind that each year over 3,000 seniors die and over 67,000 more are hospitalized as a result of an injury. In 1986 injury related expenditures were estimated at $11 billion and injuries are currently the second leading health care problem. Injuries involving consumer products are of particular concern to seniors because of the severe impact they have on their quality of life.

As the Canadian population continues to age the number of injuries and related deaths and associated health costs will significantly increase.

The department has introduced initiatives to reduce product related injuries suffered by seniors in their homes. It is working with industry and seniors' groups to make industry aware of the product and packaging needs of the seniors.

The Canadian Seniors Packaging Advisory Council, CSPAC, was established to address seniors' packaging needs. A national working group was formed to promote products of universal design. Such consumer products will make life easier not only for seniors but also for all Canadians.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, in Monday's budget this government announced that it will not renew the federal-provincial economic and regional development agreements in the areas of forestry and mineral resource development. This is bad news for Canadians who rely on the mining and forestry industries.

In Manitoba this announcement means the loss of $5 million in federal funding for mineral development and $15 million for forestry. How does the government think that Manitoba and the other provinces will make up this difference?

Although the federal government has not given up its constitutional obligation to forestry and mining these cuts reduce any federal influence in these important areas. The federal government has a role to play in the forestry and mining industries. The government's decision to pull out of these areas is disgraceful and will hurt thousands of working people and hundreds of communities right across Canada.

CONSUMER CREDIT

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to mention National Consumer Week. This year the federal government is highlighting the importance of consumer credit during National Consumer Week so that consumers can act with full knowledge when they use the credit options available to them.

It seems clear that the marketplace conditions affecting the use of credit have undergone fundamental changes and that these conditions are likely to persist. For example, while some types of consumer debts have declined from their recent peak level the use of consumer credit is still more common than it was a decade ago.

Another change involves the misuse of credit and particularly credit cards. To address this problem, there is a need for more informational and educational initiatives which will reduce levels of serious indebtedness and, in some cases, prevent personal bankruptcies.

As this is a complex and serious matter, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is communicating his concerns to the provinces and credit grantors. He is asking them to provide their ideas on how problems of excessive indebtedness can be prevented and how the importance of the wise use of credit can be effectively communicated to consumers.

In addition to co-operative action with provincial governments and credit grantors we will continue—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but the member's time has expired.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the government failed to cancel the $5.8 billion helicopter purchase and replace it with a cheaper alternative more in keeping with Canada's post cold war role.

The government failed to initiate necessary base closings through discussions with local communities. The government failed to respond to a UN call for a 3 per cent per annum cut in defence spending so that the world can tackle Third World development problems and global environmental issues.

Instead, the do-nothing, no-change Minister of National Defence carries on as if the cold war never ended, as if the Berlin wall still stands. Surely it is time for a peace dividend. Surely it is time for this government to go.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate Premier Robert Bourassa of Quebec and his party leadership.

Last weekend Quebec Liberals gave Premier Bourassa the green light to allow English on commercial signs at a policy convention. The sign law in place for the past 15 years has banned languages other than French on most signs and obviously has strained relations between Quebec and the rest of Canada.

The law could be scrapped by the Bourassa government as early as June. This should help ease relations between New Brunswick, Canada's only officially bilingual province, and the province of Quebec.

This is obviously a move in the right direction and Premier Bourassa has to be commended.

THE BUDGET

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, this government hates Newfoundlanders.

That is one of the clear messages in yesterday's budget. How else can we explain that onslaught on forestry, the fisheries and the mineral agreements?

The government has done enough over the last eight years with its high dollar and its high interest rates which have caused the loss of jobs by the thousands in Newfoundland, in the mining sector, the forestry industry and the fishery, but there are still a few jobs left down there.

It had one more go at it yesterday in that budget to see if it could wipe out the few remaining people down there who are still working for a living, who have survived so long despite the despicable policies of this government.

Newfoundlanders have had enough from you fellows and they will let you know when the election comes.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's budget was an abominable insult to Canadians and a pathetic attempt at deficit reduction.

In fact the budget will increase spending by $13.4 billion over the next three years, if the Conservative Party is around after the next election to implement the necessary legislation.

Are Canadians supposed to get excited about the fact that there were no new taxes? This is little consolation for the average working man and woman who have seen their taxes rise by 26.7 per cent since these deficit dragoons took power in 1984.

What Canadians need is not a stay the course, do-nothing cop-out but a real deficit reduction budget from a real government. The Reform Party's zero in three plan offers the only real alternative for deficit reduction and a secure future for our social safety net. No other party in Canada as witnessed by yesterday's budget takes the deficit crisis seriously. Let us hope the government never gets the opportunity to put its lack-lustre bankruptcy plan into practice.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, provincial transfers are not affected by the cuts announced yesterday.

To force transfer cutbacks on the provinces would interfere with their own efforts to deal with the debt and deficit problem.

With the 1993 budget, the government is responding to Canadians who have been requesting that governments work together to tackle the national debt and deficit problem.

The Minister of Finance has convened his provincial colleagues to a special finance ministers' conference to be held on May 30 and 31, to start working on a common strategy to deal with the national debt problem.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, the budget tabled by the Minister of Finance yesterday is a useless and meaningless budget which does nothing to remedy unemployment or poverty.

Again, the minister is attacking the old and the poor. The GST credit is currently paid four times a year but, come January, families expecting to receive their cheque as usual from the government will have to wait another three months.

Such a measure is nothing more than an accounting trick and it unfairly penalizes low-income families. The government had promised that the GST credit would be paid often, sometimes even ahead of time to help those in need.

I think this measure is unfair and I ask the Minister of Finance to withdraw it.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

After years of double digit unemployment and with 1.5 million Canadians still looking for work the best the government can do in its budget is to have 11 per cent unemployment this year and about the same level next year.

I ask the minister: where is the plan for economic growth and job creation that would bring unemployment down substantially this year and next? Will the minister admit the reason he does not have a plan for jobs in his budget is that it is designed to help the political needs of the Conservative Party and not the economic needs of Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is a realistic, responsible and achievable budget. It builds on the initiatives of the December statement to bolster growth and to invest in people and infrastructure. I draw attention to the economic statement wherein it indicates that in fiscal year 1993-94 some $1.1 billion will be spent on bolstering the economy. In 1994-95 there is another $1 billion.

The personal income tax reductions and the child benefit credit inject $1.7 billion into the economy this year. We have in place a special two-year home buyer's plan. We have reduced the manufacturing and processing tax rate. We have increased the capital cost allowance for manufacturing and processing. We have streamlined research and development. We have removed the withholding taxes.

We announced an infrastructure program that is generating 15,000 person-years of work now and another 15,000 in the future. We have provided measures to assist small business. We have increased the business loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act. We have provided UI premium relief for new jobs. We have a small business investment tax credit.

All of these initiatives are taking hold and have created 200,000 new full-time jobs since August.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): And after all this, Mr. Speaker, the minister in his own budget says that unemployment will remain at the tragically high level of 11 per cent this year and 10.6 per cent next year. Is that not an admission of failure?

My supplementary question to the minister is this: today the Prime Minister's office announced a detailed plan for the Prime Minister's farewell tour of Europe. Why is it possible for the government to design a detailed plan for this farewell tour and impossible for the government to design a detailed plan in its budget to quickly put 1.5 million Canadians back to work?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will give you an idea of the seriousness of the ideas on the other side of the House.

As Prime Minister of Canada, I have accepted an invitation from President Yeltsin to visit with him in Russia in respect of the G-7's attempts to contribute to the stabilization of the former Soviet Union. Canada's per capita contribution is second only to that of Germany and our arrangements for the Vancouver summit have been with that in mind.

Our meetings with Chancellor Kohl deal principally with the reignition of the GATT talks and their importance to Canada. The new Prime Minister of France, Edouard Balladur, has invited us, given the importance of France to Canada, particularly in regard to our foreign policy. These are important and significant steps to take.

I find it difficult to understand that my hon. friend, as a Privy Councillor and a member of a former government whose Prime Minister in 1984 took trips to Romania, East Germany and half-way around the world, would seek to trivialize an important initiative on behalf of the Government of Canada.

If my hon. friend has some better ideas in regard to the budget, let him bring them forward but he should not try to trivialize Canada's important initiatives in foreign policy in this manner.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister seems uncommonly sensitive about this point. I am wondering if he is going to take Mr. McCutchan with him. That would be some proof that it is a serious trip.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my third question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In its budget, the government plans to spend $5.8 billion to buy military helicopters while at the same time making drastic cuts in social housing and regional development. I want to ask the minister why this government has such a distorted sense of priorities? Why?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member looks at the expenditure cut projections, he will find that there are some $5.9 billion worth of expenditure cuts to the Department of National Defence budget. If that is taken over the period from 1989-90 right through until 1997-98, it will be found that there have been cuts of some $14 billion in the defence budget. I think that is pretty substantial.

Clearly with respect to social housing, we are still going to be supporting social housing at the level of some $2 billion. Any new housing initiatives will have to be funded out of expenditures that are available for that given year. We cannot continue to provide the 35-year subsidy provision that layers up the cost exposure and establishes a liability for future generations. Every $40 million worth of investment in social housing works out to about $1.5 billion worth of exposure.

These are some of the things we have had to deal with. We have to live within our means and we have to adjust the mechanisms and the institutions available to deal with the reality of severe fiscal restraint.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Everybody recognizes that small and medium-sized businesses are the main vehicles of growth and job creation in Canada. This budget was the last chance for this government to make a concrete proposal to our business people but it failed to seize that opportunity.

Once again, why did the Minister of Finance refuse to suggest an action plan allowing Canadians and small and medium-sized businesses to develop new products, export them all over the world, and win the global economic battle?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is quite aware of the initiatives we took in the December statement.

I repeat that this budget builds upon the efforts in the December statement both in terms of policy and in terms of expenditure reduction. I might add that those expenditure reductions enunciated in the December statement have been enshrined into law. What we are doing here is extending those expenditure reductions and indeed deepening them.

• (1425)

With respect to small business, I think the best news for the small business sector is that there are no new taxes or no tax increases. I know that my hon. friend is disappointed about that because they are the party of high taxes, high spending and high deficits.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: What we have are a number of initiatives to assist small business. The Small Business Financing Program is extended. We have increased the maximum loan limits and changed the Small Businesses

Loans Act so it can be more effective. We have increased the labour-sponsored venture capital corporation credit, the UI premium relief for new jobs, new small business investment tax credit and assistance to the small oil companies which is really having a very positive effect. Indeed, there are steps to further reduce the compliance burden with respect to the GST. All of those things are very welcome in the small business community.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, if the minister really believes that, he has been away from the small business sector for far too long. The problem with his budget is that it does not just build on last December's statement, it builds on nine years of failure.

The minister talks about what the government is prepared to do for small business. The minister ought to know from his own background that the biggest problem small businesses face is the lack of capital. What is the government's response to lack of capital? Let me quote from this great document. The minister says: "We will explore ways to develop mechanisms to encourage investors," whatever that means. After countless studies and commissions, the Porter report, the prosperity initiative, that is a sentence riddled with clichés. Is exploring mechanisms the best thing this government can do to encourage small business?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the small business federal tax rate is the lowest tax rate applied to small businesses in any country in the world. That in itself is a very important element.

We have the lowest interest rates in 20 years and the lowest inflation rate in 30 years. That is helpful. The Small Businesses Loans Act was indeed overhauled through an extensive consultation process. Indeed members opposite, his own colleagues, helped in that process. We got a good package, one the banks have responded to positively. For example, the Royal Bank, the Bank of Nova Scotia and the Toronto Dominion Bank have all responded very positively by providing extra premium rates for the Small Businesses Loans Act. They are also suggesting that more than $1 billion of new capital will flow to the small business sector in 1993 and that is good news.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Listening to the answers so far today, it is clear this is a pretty tired government in need of a period of long hibernation. The next election should provide that.

When it comes to the most serious economic issue facing Canadians, the job crisis, the government has chosen to do nothing but to accept 11 per cent unemployment this year and double digit unemployment next year. We see that one in four Canadians is unemployed, underemployed or has given up hope in this country. Hope is desperately needed.

Europe, Japan and the United States, major trading partners, have come out with jobs plans for their countries. In the case of Europe it is a jobs plan for countries of the European Community. This is a jobs plan for economic renewal.

Why is the government content in this budget to simply ride on the coat-tails of other governments? Why has the government not come out with a positive jobs plan that will give Canadians hope?

• (1430)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is in place right now an expenditure of $1.1 billion in this fiscal year and $1 billion plus in the next fiscal year to help bolster the economy from infrastructure to training and skills upgrading, to incentives for small business, to encouraging more trade and in particular to ensuring that the trade initiatives that have been so successful in creating more export demand are carried out and transformed into jobs.

I should advise the hon. member that since November employment growth has been growing at an annual rate of 2.8 per cent. That is higher than we had expected in this budget in which we predicted 1.7 per cent this year and 3 per cent next year.

I remind my hon. friend that we have had 200,000 new full-time jobs created since August, 48,000 new jobs last month and 26,000 new jobs in the manufacturing sector. There are clear signs of pick-up both in the manufacturing sector and in the export sector and hopefully soon in the domestic demand sector.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I remind the minister that the unemployment rate remains at 11 per cent. That is the official unemployment rate. The unofficial rate is much closer to about 19 per cent and youth unemployment is close to 20 per cent.

I say to the minister that he can stand in this House and say that his policies have created more jobs, but his policies have created more devastation in the last nine years in this country and we needed to see a budget to change that.

The government has addressed the issue of the deficit many times, although in this budget projection the deficit will not even decrease in the coming year. One of the major causes of deficit, in addition to the bad trade policies of this government, the high interest rate policy of this government and the GST, is high unemployment. Of course we have declining revenues with a declining number of people working.

Why does the government refuse to acknowledge that the deficit is simply a symptom of an economy that is not working? Why does it not recognize that for a country to work the people of that country must be working?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I agreed that a healthy economy and lots of jobs is really the ultimate. That is what we are really trying to do.

We do have a recovery that has been slow in coming, but we have facilitated that recovery by the measures that we have taken. At the same time we have to deal with the deficit. We have tried to strike a balanced, responsible, realistic and achievable position, not to be bloodthirsty or Draconian, not to tackle the provinces, not to tackle senior citizens or veterans. We have attempted to adopt a responsible course of action, one that is achievable.

I can tell my hon. friend that I believe what we have laid out in the five-year program is achievable and will get us to a level of zero cash requirements at the end of the five-year period. Our deficit as a percentage of GDP will be .9 per cent. That is down from 5.1 per cent as it is today. We will have the lowest expenditures of government in more than 30 years at 13.9 per cent.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. The projections of the minister for the future rival those of the psychics in The National Enquirer. Indeed, I think they have actually had better success with their predictions than the minister.

[Translation]

I have a question for the Minister. The government has made choices. It chose to ignore unemployment; it chose to attack programs which were important for ordinary people, such as subsidized housing, regional development, transportation subsidies, the CBC, and organizations assisting the underpriviledged. Instead, the government could have ended private family trust exemptions and deductions for business entertainment expenses.

Why does the government keep asking sacrifices from ordinary people rather than from the rich?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the NDP takes issue with our projections.

Mr. Riis: Everybody does.

Mr. Mazankowski: Her House leader says: "Everybody does." I just received a document from New York entitled "High Frequency Economics," which is distributed around the world, issued today, April 27. This is what it has to say about the budget: "We think this is an achievable budget. We like this budget. There is a medium term plan of deficit reduction here. Growth assumptions and revenue projections seem to us to be realistic and even conservative."

• (1435)

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I think the finance minister had to go a long way to find that clipping.

My question is for the same finance minister. In this do-nothing budget that he put out last night projections for high levels of unemployment over the next few years confirm the human tragedy of this Conservative administration. The only recovery this government seems to be committed to is a jobless one.

Why have this minister and this government refused to include any new encouraging job creation programs in this budget?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member suggests that I had to look high and low for that quote. I will give her another one that came out of The Financial Times this morning.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: Of London.

Mr. Tobin: You had to look far for that one.

Mr. Mazankowski: It reports—

Mr. Tobin: How about The Globe and Mail of Canada? How about The Toronto Sun?

Mr. Mazankowski: It reports on the latest forecast of the IMF. Will that interest you now?

It points out that for 1993 the growth forecast for Canada is 3.2 per cent; for the U.K. it is 1.4 per cent; for Italy, .3 per cent; for Germany, minus 1.3 per cent; for Japan, 1.3 per cent; and the United States, 3.2 per cent.

I could go through the same litany for 1994 which means that Canada will have the best growth rate in the G–7. Surely they are interested in that. That fully supports the projections I made in the budget.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, if the finance minister looked at some of the Canadian headlines maybe he would get some idea of what people are really thinking.

Let us stop all this talk. Governing is a matter of choices. This government and this Minister of Finance had a choice. This government and this Minister of Finance chose to do nothing except to utter empty phrases and to accept unacceptable double digit levels of unemployment.

How can this government ignore the desperate need of Canadians for jobs?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker, governing is about choices and governing is about making difficult choices. In some cases we have to exercise restraint.

I must say that on every single solitary occasion we brought forward restraint measures to the House of Commons the Liberal Party voted against it and the NDP voted against it. So much for talking about the level of restraint.

Clearly a number of initiatives have been put in place as a result of the December statement. This budget builds on the December statement. It continues the expenditure reductions but it also continues the support in those particular areas of the economy that need strengthening. That is where the jobs are being created. That is why we are optimistic about achieving 7.5 per cent level in unemployment by 1997–98.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday in his budget he predicted a $32.6 billion deficit for the current year. That is up from previous predictions of $16.6 billion in 1991, $14 billion in 1990, and $15 billion in 1989. Furthermore, the minister's projection last year for the year just ended was off by a mere $8 billion.

• (1440)

In a budget devoid of strategy for economic growth and new jobs, how can the minister expect Canadians to take seriously the deficit projections he has put in this year's budget?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I just quoted one economic analyst and I will quote him further. He says: "We estimate that growth alone should push the policy neutral budget deficit down toward $28 billion." That is his assessment.

Some hon. members: Who, who?

Mr. Mazankowski: I appreciate the question of the hon. member. He is always genuine and always offers constructive criticism, and sometimes even some constructive suggestions.

We have just gone through an exchange with his colleagues where they were asking us to spend more money and to further enhance the level of the deficit, to bring it up higher.

The hon. member knows very well that because of the recession and the global economic slowdown we have had a shortfall in revenues of some $9 billion in 1992–1993. We project that similar shortfalls in revenues will be expected in the other years as well.

What we have done here is we have constrained expenditures. As a matter of fact we have brought them down by about $900 billion from where we originally were. We are exercising prudence and restraint on the expenditure side. What we are doing is trying to bolster economic growth—

Mr. Speaker: I think we must move on.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's budget, I am sure the minister taking all those assumptions aside would agree, has some pretty optimistic growth forecasts in it. It projects a deficit of $8 billion five years from now.

The Minister of the Environment says that he can reduce the deficit to zero in four years. The Minister of National Defence says that she can reduce it to zero in five years.

I would like the minister to explain whether his colleagues are naive and unrealistic about reducing the deficit, or is he telling Canadians that this particular budget is a stand still, do-nothing budget just to buy time until the Tory leadership convention is over?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, respecting our goals and objectives with respect to bringing down the deficit, particularly as a percentage of GDP because as my hon. friend knows that is the one that counts, we intend under this plan to bring the deficit as a percentage of GDP down from 5.1 per cent to .9 per cent.

I note that his leader suggests that 3 per cent would be a logical and acceptable figure. In other words he is saying it would be okay to have the deficit as a percentage of GDP running at 3 per cent, which would maintain a deficit of about $25 billion.

That is not good enough for us. Zero cash requirements is what we are after. A .9 per cent deficit to GDP ratio is what we are after and the lowest level of government expenditure in 30 years. That is what we are after and that is what our objectives will achieve.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Most independent agencies forecast unemployment at greater than 10 per cent for the decade and growth at around 2.5 per cent. The wizard of finance conjures growth at 4.25 per cent and unemployment at 7.6 per cent by 1997-1998.

Considering the accuracy of previous forecasts, in the first budget they said there would be no deficit at all by now, and as recently as 1991 they underestimated the budget by nearly $11 billion.

My question is as follows: would it not be reasonable for the 1.5 million unemployed to conclude they are out of work because this government does not know what it is talking about and it does not know what it is doing?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, indeed I think we all have to acknowledge that the recession was deeper and longer than expected.

• (1445)

When we look around the world in terms of the global economy, we see Japan's growth at 1.3 per cent, Germany at minus 1.3 per cent, Italy at .3 per cent and the U.K. at 1.4 per cent. We are a part of the global economy. There is no question about that.

The hon. member says my figures and my forecast are unrealistic. The objective analysts from New York suggest—

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): In the Village Voice.

Mr. Mazankowski: —again that the budget is delivering the fruits of structural change in public financing undertaken in recent years and which were not harvested because of the prolonged recession. There is a medium term plan of deficit reduction. Growth assumptions and revenue projections seem to us to be realistic and even conservative.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a very serious question for the Prime Minister.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will please put his question.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, in the 1988 election campaign this government promised a national child care program. Yesterday's budget was the last chance for the Prime Minister to come through on this promise to Canadian children.

I want to ask why this government and this Prime Minister have broken this promise and why there is no move in this budget toward a national child care program for our kids.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is indulging in revisionism.

This House passed a national child care program in 1988 and it was killed in the Senate by the Liberal Party.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: It was killed in the Senate—

Ms. Clancy: Not a good program.

Ms. Copps: Bring back Mickey Mouse.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Andre: By the kazoo blowers over there.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the member for Kamloops was a member of the House here at the time. He will remember full well that indeed the House of Commons voted for a national child care program in 1988 and it was killed by the Liberals led by the Hon. Allan MacEachen in the Senate. The Liberal Party of Canada killed a national child care program and you will pay for it forever.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's announcement of major cuts to regional development has resulted in the unjustified cancellation of the Forest Development Agreement funding which is a major factor in Canada's goal to attain sustainable forest development.

This irresponsible Conservative government does not realize the impact that this cancellation will have on rural Canada and much more to the forest industry which cannot absorb those cuts. Furthermore these agreements have created 20,000 jobs across this country and have funded the planting of one billion seedlings.

My question is this. Can the minister justify to this House the motives behind his decision to abandon the forest industry?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should clear his question with the hon. member for Ottawa South. He takes a completely different approach and he is sitting right behind him snickering and grinning. He really knows that it is quite an embarrassment.

The hon. member for Ottawa South is a very responsible member. I admire him and respect him very much. So is the hon. member for Timmins. I wish you folks would get together. The issue here is not that the federal government is withdrawing support of the forestry industry. We are there in research and development and we are there in the promotion of exports. A time comes when we have to exercise restraint in many areas and this is clearly an area that falls generally within provincial jurisdiction. Most of the royalty revenues, something in the order of $850 million, accrue to the provinces. This clearly is an area where if the provinces wish to support this sector further they will certainly have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance.

The cuts to regional development funding announced in yesterday's budget continue this government's cynical abandonment of Atlantic Canadians. ACOA, the agency that this government created to promote Atlantic development, has been repeatedly gutted.

The decision not to renew the forestry and mineral agreements and to review the other co-operation agreements signals a further loss of millions of dollars in federal support to Atlantic Canadians' most vital industries down the road.

The latest figures show that 155,000 Atlantic Canadians are officially unemployed. We all know that the real numbers are much higher than that.

Why is this government once again turning its back on the unemployed in Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are certainly doing nothing of the sort.

Earlier we heard in this House questions from the Liberal Party accusing us of not taking enough action on the deficit. Now in the same Question Period they are asking why are we cutting here and why are we cutting there.

In the area of regional development there has been a tremendous amount of growth since 1984-85 in the regional development envelope, $5.6 billion in the last five-year program. That is being reduced. It should also be recognized that what is being put in place is a new program of repayable contributions that will use revolving funds to fund the projects. That has been very successful and we are working toward achieving that goal.

In conclusion, I will remind the hon. member that while program expenditures are growing at a rate of 1.5 per cent per year, the transfers to the provinces will be growing at the rate of 4 per cent per year. We could have reduced transfers to the provinces. We chose not to do it because we recognize the difficult circumstances that many of the provinces are in.

I think that is a clear recognition of the regions and the provinces that what we have got in here is a process and a plan that is realistic and achievable.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the minister is playing a shell game with the provinces.

Yesterday this government announced that it will cancel funding for the majority of social housing programs in this country. This is a withdrawal from the cost-sharing housing programs that the federal government has participated in with the provinces for over five decades.

There are over one million Canadians in need of adequate and affordable housing who depend on this federal national government. There are over 200,000 Canadians homeless.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance why this government is unilaterally withdrawing its responsibility to provide funds for social housing. Does he not realize that good housing policy is good social policy and is good economic policy for this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The hon. member indeed does make a point as did the other two members who asked questions on the Liberal side and as did members from the NDP, concerned about the cuts that I announced in the budget yesterday.

I would hope the business critics out there who saw this budget as a do-nothing budget, as a budget that did not cut enough, watch this performance here today. I hope the bankers watch the performance as well and I hope that the investment dealers watch the performance because the point is very well taken.

As the hon. member's colleague alluded to a little earlier, governing is about making tough choices. We have made the tough choices and we intend to implement them.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. I hope that every single Canadian is here and is listening to you refuse to withdraw the helicopters—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I know hon. members want to address each other through the Chair. I would also ask hon. members to keep in mind that the time is running out. Shorter questions, please, and shorter answers.

• (1455)

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this government has made a choice and its choice is on helicopters. When we ask that other priorities come before this House, we ask this government to abandon the helicopters and stand up and do things for Canadians.

Right now in this project there is not one cent provided for the three million seniors in this country for housing. This government for the first time in 50 years has abandoned housing for senior Canadians.

I ask the minister why he has abandoned the seniors in this country.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what we are talking about in the acquisition of the helicopters is an expenditure of about $300 million a year for a 14 or 15-year period. I should advise the hon. member that a good portion of this is going to create jobs in his own city, the city of Winnipeg.

In addition to that, the defence envelope is taking a substantial cut. In this budget $5.9 billion is being cut. In total between 1989-90 and 1997-98 there will be a total of $14 billion cut out of the defence envelope.

If the hon. member is suggesting that we spend $2.5 billion to repair and fix up the old helicopters for a 10-year life, that would be money that would be poured down the drain and be wasted. We would still have old helicopters and we would have to purchase new ones in ten years' time.

That would be just sheer folly. This is a realistic and sensible course of action.

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): My question is also for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker.

In December 1992 in the budget the minister broke an agreement and cut the Crow benefit to hard-pressed prairie farmers by some 10 per cent. Yesterday he suggested a further cutback of 10 per cent, which is another $72 million to prairie farmers, unless they agree to change the method of payment by which they receive that money. Farmers are saying to me that it is unfair.

Either you change the method of payment or lose another $72 million per year.

Will the minister admit today that this is nothing short of blackmail for the prairie farmers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, I would disagree with the hon. member. I would say that this is a clear incentive to get on with the job. When you have a $720 million subsidy that distorts the marketplace, that results in the provinces having to spend money to overcome that distortion, that is not a wise use of public funds.

We are saying here, as I said in the preparation of this budget, that all Canadians are going to be affected by the measures undertaken here. We can obviously see that they are, that that is the case.

I appeal to the hon. member to work closely with the Minister of Agriculture who has started a reform process. Reform is required. We want to expedite it and facilitate it so that it can serve the long-term interests of the western Canadian farmers.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my supplemental question is to the Minister of Finance as well.

In December 1992 the minister cut regional development programs by 10 per cent. Yesterday the finance minister continued the cutbacks in regional development by a total of $1.4 billion over the next five years. By withdrawing from the ERDA programs Newfoundland would have to come up with over $60 million to continue with the program; Ontario would have to come up with $40 million, not including the cutbacks to FedNor, ACOA and Western Diversification.

My question to the minister is this: why would the minister cut back on these programs which are so vital to developing employment opportunities in areas like northern Ontario, the Atlantic and western Canada? Why would the minister cut off the lifeline to the unemployed?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the very simple reason that we are doing these very unpopular things is to bring the deficit into line. I say yes, we are cutting. Unfortunately we are cutting, but we have to cut. I hope the bankers, the business critics and the investment dealers are listening to this exchange because they will know where we stand and where the opposition stands.

We are committed to bringing the deficit into line. They want to go out and spend, spend, borrow, borrow, tax, tax, tax.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence.

As the minister is fully aware we now have Canadian troops involved in two very active, very precarious and very volatile theatres of action around the world. At the same time I have a copy of the minister's travel itinerary for next week where she will be attending photo ops in Toronto, a stomp and chomp dinner and dance, and other areas.

In all honesty this is a very exceptional, very difficult and very dangerous time. I want to ask the minister of defence how she really believes she can be fully responsible for our troops in the field at the same time she is pursuing her leadership ambitions.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise the hon. member that owing to the miracles of modern technology I am able to be Minister of National Defence for 24 hours a day. I am constantly in contact with my office when I am not in Ottawa. Obviously when I am here I am able to respond directly in the House.

I find it fascinating that hon. member who last week was crying in the House about the absence of the Minister of National Defence can rise in the House today and only ask me a question about my agenda, about my schedule. I think that says a great deal about that hon. member.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and the amendment of Mr. Gray (Windsor West) (p. 18487).

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, what we have in front of us is a budget, as I was saying this morning, which has done absolutely nothing to increase jobs in this country. It contains no initiatives to give us new direction for the unemployed.

I see the Minister of Finance being congratulated by his colleagues. It can only be for having succeeded in putting in 94 pages not a single solitary new thought and for wasting hundreds of thousands of trees in the process. I suspect the colleagues congratulating him must come from forestry regions of the country.

What is so tragic about this budget is not just what is not there but what could have been there. We could have had moves to start to make our tax system fair by closing some of the loopholes at the top, loopholes like those the Auditor General identified last year that let large corporations take over $1 billion out of Canada tax-free, which we the taxpayers of the country have to make up.

We could have had initiatives to take action to make the GST gradually disappear so as to help small business and to help consumers across Canada. We could have had moves to put into effect a minimum corporate tax so that we got away from the scandal of large scale corporations being completely free of corporate tax even when they have made profits in Canada.

We could have had those initiatives. We could have had initiatives to see to it that in this country as in 22 of the other OECD countries the fortunes of people who are wealthy when they die and pass them on to their children and their friends are taxed and make a contribution to making our society better.

We could have taken that money and used it to get people back to work. We could have had initiatives on child care, the establishment of a national child care program such as the Prime Minister has promised for so many years and has failed to provide. We could have had an infrastructure program to give us some real sense of building a base for our economy for the future, a national investment fund to help the small scale and medium sized businesses in Canada that so badly need venture capital. We could in short have had a national jobs plan to put 1.5 million Canadians back to work, to bring the unemployment rate down and to put Canadians in positions where they are contributing to our tax rates instead of taking from our budgets.

Let me conclude by moving the following amendment to the amendment that has been moved:

> That the following words be added after the words "economic recovery":
> "by way of a national child care program, an infrastructure program, a national investment fund, and a national jobs plan".

If we took this direction we would put Canada back to work. We would give Canadians hope. We would give our country a future built not on smoke and mirrors, not on Alice in Wonderland projections, but on solid economic ideas to give us a real basis for jobs in all of this country.

That is the direction in which we have to move. I hope it is the direction in this next election that people in Canada choose to take.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In the meantime, to avoid wasting time, we will move to Questions and Comments. We will hear the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, followed by the hon. member for Longueuil.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask my friend a question about his speech on the budget.

In his speech on page 3 of the budget booklet the Minister of Finance made the following statement:

> Less borrowing, lower taxes, more jobs and more choice: that is the direction in which people want to go. And that is the direction in which this government is going.

• (1510)

Does he agree that this statement is completely false having regard to the fact that the government is borrowing both here and abroad at record levels, that taxes have increased 30-some times since the government took office and in fact now as a percentage of GNP has reached over 39 per cent from a level of about 33.8 per cent when the government took office in 1984, that fewer jobs are available in Canada because our unemployment rate has gone up, not down, and that Canadians are getting less and less choice because of the cutbacks in government programs? Would he not agree that this statement made by the minister is completely false and misleading?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, certainly the statement set out in the speech, as is so much in the speech, is a wild exaggeration in terms of the government's achievements.

To suggest the government is achieving less borrowing when in fact its borrowing has increased is simply wrong. To suggest that it is establishing lowering taxes is wrong. This is the government that put the GST into effect.

These are the parents of the GST across the aisle. Every Conservative who marches out to seek votes in this election should carry with him and her a little sign saying "I am responsible for the GST," just to remind people that is where it comes from.

Turning to more jobs, there have been more jobs for Conservative patronage appointees. There have been more jobs in the Senate for friends of the Prime Minister. There have not been more jobs for Canadians.

They promised 550,000 jobs from free trade. What they have given us is a loss of over 400,000 jobs in manufacturing and an unemployment rate of 11 per cent as of the most recent month compared to an unemployment rate of around 7.5 per cent when the free trade deal came into effect.

Dealing with more choice, this government believes that if it gives things to the market we will automatically get more choice. What Canadians have discovered is that by giving things to the marketplace to rule they do not get more choice; they get less choice.

I have just one small example. Let us look back to 1988 when this government was re-elected and think of the airline industry at that stage. There were four national airlines. We had Wardair operating scheduled services across the country. We had PWA operating scheduled services throughout the country. We had Air Canada. We had Canadian Pacific.

This government said: "Let's deregulate. Let's add even more choice." For a little while we had all sorts of little regional carriers throw themselves up into the air. Very soon they crashed to the ground and were taken over by other companies. We now have just two airlines: Air Canada and Canadian, and both of them are sick. We are not getting more choice. We are getting less choice as a consequence of the ideology rather than the thinking this government follows.

• (1515)

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few comments on the budget. The government says that it cuts or reduces expenditures—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I simply want to remind the hon. member that the period for questions and comments is not the time to make a speech on the budget but, rather, to ask a question to the previous speaker.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I am getting there. Just give me a moment to explain what I have to say.

I was trying to tell the hon. member for Essex—Windsor that the government claims to cut expenditures while in fact it increases them. Indeed, it will increase expenditures by close to $3.6 billion this year, and by $3.1 billion next year. In the following five years, in spite of claiming that it is reducing expenditures, the government will spend $12.5 billion more. In the meantime, the government thinks it will get extraordinary revenue, based on the anticipated growth, which is unrealistic.

I want to ask the hon. member for Essex—Windsor what he thinks of all this. For example, why did the government not think about overlapping and duplication in the fields of unemployment and manpower training? This duplication exists in every department. We know that between Quebec and Ottawa, this duplication costs something like $3 billion. This means that in Canada we could save at least $10 billion if we eliminated this duplication between the provinces and the federal government. We could have saved $10 billion per year right there.

What does the hon. member for Essex—Windsor think of the fact that the government claims to cut while it increases expenditures every year in its own books, that is by more than $10 billion over the next five years? It is absolutely inaccurate and totally unrealistic to claim that economic growth in 1993–94 will reach 4.5 per cent. What does the hon. member for Essex–Windsor think of the fact that the government did not take appropriate measures, such as putting an end to the duplication of government operations?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member. In spite of all its declarations, the government has decided to increase its expenditures. You can see it on page 19 of the English version and on page 21 of the French version. The hon. member is absolutely right.

My colleague also asked if we could not save money and reduce expenses through a transfer of responsibilities to provinces, for example in the field of manpower. Personally, I believe that we must have a national manpower policy. We must have such a policy to create a national economy in which each worker would be able to go from one work place to another and to work anywhere in Canada.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but the time for questions or comments has now expired.

[Translation]

The subamendment tabled by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor is in compliance with the Rules and is therefore admissible.

• (1520)

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think everyone will agree that my colleague, the Minister of Finance, tabled a responsible and decisive budget.

The fiscal plan set out in the budget builds on the action taken last December, by extending and deepening the expenditure reductions. While recent fiscal pressures have resulted from revenue shortfalls, the solution is not to raise revenues. It is to learn to live within our means.

With this action, the deficit target for 1993–94 will be met and there will be no new borrowings by the end of the fiscal planning period. Achieving these fiscal objectives is key to sustained economic expansion and the job and income gains that will come with it.

My remarks will provide additional context and detail on the measures announced in the budget, particularly the reductions in the cost of government. This action will over time have a major effect on the operations of government and the management of the Public Service.

These measures, together with the reductions announced in the economic and fiscal statement tabled in this House last December, will yield expenditure savings of $7.5 billion in government operations over the next five years. This is a major contribution to the total debt reduction effort of $30 billion. These cuts build on this government's ongoing commitment and actions to reduce operating costs and increase effeciency in government.

[English]

As set out in the budget, operating budgets and reserves for contingencies and new initiatives were reduced by $300 million in 1993–94, rising to $1.2 billion by 1997–98. This means that for the last four years of the fiscal framework the operating reserve is being reduced by 50 per cent from an already tight level.

Last December non–defence operating budgets were reduced by $1 billion in 1993–94 and by $1.7 billion in 1994–95. Taking into account the budget measures announced yesterday, the typical manager will in effect face an operating budget reduction of 3 per cent in 1993–94 and 5 per cent in 1994–5, reaching 10 per cent by 1997–98.

The reduction in most grant and contribution programs to organizations and interest groups announced last December will be extended and deepened to 15 per cent in 1995–96 and to 20 per cent in future years. These reductions will be implemented in a prudent and reasonable manner reflecting government priorities.

We recognize that given the magnitude of the reduction a fundamental review of a number of existing programs will be required. Scarce resources will have to be devoted to funding the highest priority programs.

[Translation]

The Minister of Finance also announced a number of other reductions across government: regional funding, the green plan, granting councils, international assistance, defence, social housing, the CBC and VIA Rail. We are far from being alone in a financial crunch. Most countries are facing tough economic and fiscal situations and most are responding to the large revenue shortfalls by taking similar action to reduce expenditures.

• (1525)

Closer to home we have only to look at the recent provincial budgets and statements. These reinforce the harsh reality that restraint is not just the order of the day, but of years to come. In the earlier years, we used restraint in large part to cut the fat that had accumulated from years of steady growth in government expenditures. As time passed, departments and agencies have had to find more innovative ways to deliver programs and services. They have had no choice to undertake productivity-increasing investments, and to make better use of their shrinking resources.

The demand for services increases with population and so do workload. Departments and agencies are pressed even more vigorously to re-engineer their administrative overhead and to deliver services at lower costs. Resources are having to be redirected to the point of service for the client and away from overhead and administrative processes.

Departments have no choice but to seize every opportunity for efficiency gains from investments in training and development and in information technology. This by itself is not enough, however, as we no longer have the means to pay for all the current programs, even less to tolerate duplication of services and other inefficiencies.

[English]

These latest measures will necessitate taking a hard look at priorities and making some difficult choices indeed. As I said in my speech during the debate on the December economic and fiscal statement, it will simply not be possible to do more with less.

In some instances activities will be reduced and points of service delivery closed. As an example, there are currently 64 Canada immigration centres. These points of service are being reduced to 51, of which 22 will be co-located in Canada employment centres. External Affairs is closing nine missions including three embassies. It will also mean getting out of some lines of business.

Reducing the funds available for government operations will have an effect on employment in the Public Service. Currently salaries account for roughly 55 per cent of operating budgets. Assuming this proportion is maintained in coming years, we can expect that the reduction in total employment resulting from this budget will be approximately 16,500 by 1995-98. Indeed, based on past experience, the number of people affected will be significantly higher once the impacts of changing program priorities, service delivery innovations, new information technology and organizational adjustment are taken into account and as the mix of skills and people within a department and across departments continues to change over time.

In the period from 1985 to 1990, while the net reduction in employment was 10,700 it is estimated that approximately twice this number of positions were eliminated while new positions in other program areas were created.

A substantial portion of the anticipated reduction in total employment of 16,500 can be handled through retirements and resignations. We must not forget that some 9,000 employees leave the Public Service each year. However it is not realistic to assume that we will be able to manage all personnel reductions through attrition.

Most of the government's administrative and program operations are being redesigned to increase efficiency and the resultant changes will inevitably produce an imbalance between the skills needed and the skills available in a particular location. This is not unique to this government. It is much the same in the private sector and in the other levels of government.

As a practical matter employment in the federal public sector actually increased in 1992 by about 1,000 to a little more than 235,000 people. This reflects a wide range of increases and decreases across departments and agencies. Five departments and agencies showed employment increases of 300 or more in 1992, specifically Employment and Immigration Canada, Revenue Canada Customs and Excise, Correctional Services Canada, Health and Welfare Canada and Agriculture Canada. Four departments showed a decline of 300 or more: National Defence, Revenue Canada Taxation, Transport Canada and Statistics Canada.

In areas where there were reductions the persons affected did not necessarily have the skills needed in departments that were growing or these employees were not able to take advantage of these new demands because of their location.

The numbers are only part of the story. I do want to emphasize that the underlying purpose of the action we are taking is to secure savings in government expenditure. It is not to reduce the work force.

In the world of the 1990s the government needs employment policies that promote a flexible and more adaptive federal work force. Existing policies, including the work force adjustment directive, must be reviewed. There are aspects of the directive that we can no longer afford in the present economic climate. There are others which severely restrict our ability to modify the shape and size of the work force.

Therefore the government will seek some basic changes to the directive to give managers added flexibility. We will continue to fulfil our responsibilities as a fair employer but we must do so in the context of the economic and fiscal realities of the 1990s. We will invite unions to work with us toward realistic arrangements during negotiations beginning this summer as part of the regular triennial review.

We believe that public servants understand the economic realities faced by the government. I do believe that they understand these realities. I am convinced that they and their unions will want to work with us in finding innovative solutions to the problems we are facing. We are currently consulting with departments on this and are not ready to set out our proposals. Clearly we will be seeking significant changes.

As I see it, adaptability and innovation in the Public Service is key to its long-term effectiveness. This means that the institution as a whole, its organizational units, its management and every one of its employees must be able to adapt quickly to change. We must also continually strive to find better ways to deliver government services more efficiently.

One approach is to use information technology in new ways to improve administrative and program delivery processes. Information technology allows us to provide services to clients at lower overall costs to the government and, in many cases, to the clients.

The government is aggressively pursuing electronic means for conducting many of its routine transactions. This strategy also hinges on the use of electronic data interchange or EDI and complementary technologies such as bar coding.

Over 20 EDI initiatives are now under way, including electronic documentation at ports of entry, collection of remittances for GST and source deductions, electronic filing of GST and personal income taxes, and many, many others.

I am proud the federal government is becoming a leader in implementing EDI in Canada. Indeed I am pleased to note that on June 30, Supply and Services Canada's new electronic initiative FASTRACK will begin directly linking suppliers electronically with federal departments and agencies. This use of EDI for the procurement of goods and services and, in future, for related payments will mean lower costs for the government and for its suppliers. It will also contribute to an EDI-capable business sector, enabling it to better compete in the global economy.

We are innovating in other ways. We have established 12 special operating agencies and four more are on the way: Indian Oil and Gas Canada; the Transport Canada Training Institute; Translation Services; and Surveys and Mapping. The last three were announced in this Budget. They are service oriented operations given added flexibility to apply the best management practices in order to improve service delivery. Many Canadians have seen the improved service provided by the Passport Office, an early special operating agency.

Across Canada, 129 InfoCentres have opened in Canada Employment Centres to provide Canadians with basic information on government services to more conveniently. Twelve departments are working together to make services available to the public through common government, rather than departmental, access points.

Through these InfoCentres clients can receive basic information on more than 50 of the most commonly used government programs like pensions, training and unemployment insurance, and bidding on government cheques replaced. They have access to hot-line services to departments when they require answers to more complex questions. Facilities are also made available for clients to meet with departments on specific matters—income tax advice for example.

We are also changing how we provide services to the business client who is confronted by a bewildering array of federal, provincial, municipal and private sector services.

The Canada Business Service Centres (CBSCs) are one among several initiatives. There are currently three CBSCs in operation, in Edmonton, Winnipeg and Halifax, which provide the business community with quick and accurate referrals to government services, programs and information at a single point of service. They are serving as the pilot for a network of single-windows that will soon extend from coast to coast. Discussions have begun on three others and it is our intention to establish a CBSC in at least one major urban centre in each province.

In Edmonton, the CBSC is a shared walk-in centre operated through a partnership of 15 federal departments and agencies.

[English]

To conclude, I was pleased to see that the premier of Alberta announced last week in the legislative assembly that his government intended to reform the regulatory system. I congratulate him and offer my support to any of the other provinces that choose to launch their own regulatory reviews. They can count on the co-operation and support of my colleagues and myself. We are eager to share the experience we have gained in our own milieu and we will provide whatever assistance possible should the provinces decide to move forward in this area.

In conclusion, I recognize the contribution that public servants have made and will continue to make, as we grapple with these difficult issues at a time of sweeping changes in government operations. Public servants are not afraid of these changes.

Unlike our hon. friends opposite, they are not afraid. These are people who deal with the public. They—and I address this to Public Service employees at all levels of government—must forge a strong sense of common purpose that they are all serving one taxpaying public, and that their well-being is inextricably linked to that of this public. This goes for us politicians too.

• (1540)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a question about the information centres the government has established so that people can inquire about all the various services it provides.

[English]

In my constituency of Kingston and the Islands it has set up one of these places. Seniors have to walk to it because it will not take telephone calls there and it does not give out its telephone number. Seniors have to telephone Ottawa on a 1-800 number, which is busy whenever they call. People wait 30, 40, or 50 minutes, they dial and dial and cannot get through because this line is tied up all the time. When they do they get a different person every time they call and have to provide different information. There is no continuity and there is no co-ordination. People are very angry at the lack of service.

The minister tries to pretend this is all just rosy and that everything is improving. It is not. It is getting worse. In his budget yesterday the Minister of Finance talked about Canadians having more choice with this government. They are getting less choice. They are getting poorer service. They are getting rotten service from this government because of its constant closure and shift to these so-called more efficient systems. This is not more efficient. This is costing Canadian taxpayers a lot of money because they have to make all these telephone calls and repeat themselves time after time when they phone because the person they are dealing with is never the same.

It is a hopeless system. The minister must know it. Why does he not abandon this? It is fine to lump them all together. That may make sense, but then make the office accessible to the public and not on some distant bus route so that people who have difficulty getting out and about are forced into phoning Ottawa or Toronto in order to get information.

It is a ridiculous system. The minister must know it. For him to stand with a straight face and tell us that everything is just great stretches all belief. I can see why he switches languages. He would want to say it in another language so that some of us cannot follow the logic because there is no logic to it.

I would appreciate the minister clarifying this for us.

[Translation]

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands also tried to throw me by switching from French to English, but I think I understood what he meant.

I want to tell him that the experience I have had with information centres is quite extraordinary. You may have heard of a successful initiative in Quebec called Communication–Quebec, for which I was responsible. I dismantled a highly centralized service and established centres in the various regions so that citizens could have support in their dealings with the government. That is similar to what we have been trying to do with federal organizations. In every area, we noticed a proliferation of organizations, representatives, departments, bits of departments and a lack of means. We obviously do not have the means to provide complete services to residents from every region of this country. That is impossible. We need to ensure that the information is stored somewhere and that there is a centre where people can get support when they deal with the government.

Many such centres in Canada are very successful. We are working with Communication–Quebec and other provincial governments and I am sure these centres will get better. I am not saying there are no errors and no problems, but the alternative to these centres is nothing at all.

[English]

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I have two short questions.

The minister talked about reductions in staff. He did not mention reductions in service. Neither did he mention the increase in the use of outside contractors to do the work.

I wonder if the minister has had any studies done or has done any which he could share with us showing that the use of outside contractors has actually saved the government money for the same level of service.

I have another question. Among the departments he mentioned where staff reductions have been considerable was Revenue Canada. Year after year I have heard the Auditor General say that if the department had hired more auditors each one of them would bring in perhaps 10 times as much revenue as it would cost for that employee. I wonder if it is cost effective to reduce the staff in Revenue Canada as much as has been done.

The last Auditor General's report said that some $500 million to $600 million of revenue is being lost because corporations are moving their incomes out of this jurisdiction into others that are more favourable to them. With auditors Revenue Canada would we be able to capture some or all of that $500 million to $600 million?

Mr. Loiselle: We are not proceeding with staff reduction because we want to reduce staff per se. We are just looking for ways to make the delivery of service as efficient and as inexpensive as possible.

I am sure that the hon. member is aware that as of April 1 this year we changed our administrative system to operating budgets. Each department is given an over–all operating budget within which they can move their resources around to get the best mix to deliver services.

Sometimes I have the feeling that the hon. member or the people across the aisle believe that the purpose of the Public Service is to be a big employment agency. We are not here to hire people. We are here to deliver services with people. If we can find a way of doing it better at a lower cost then I do not see what on earth should prevent us from doing it.

I think civil servants understand this. I am convinced that the number of reductions over the coming years will be very light compared to the size of this government's operation, which is close to a quarter of a million employees. Compared to any organization in Canada of a small, medium or large size that has had to get rid of hundreds of thousands of people, we have been very attentive to our work force and have been very protective and we intend to continue to do this.

However the purpose of government services is not to find jobs for people, it is to deliver service professionally, efficiently, with the best possible people and at the lowest possible cost.

If there is a way of doing it with fewer people why should we not do it if we can save money? Why should we spend money just for the pleasure of repeating these mistakes of the past?

As for contracting out, yes, we can contract out when we find that it is a more efficient way of doing things for short-term action or areas in which we do not want to be involved forever. It could be snow removal or things of that sort which occur at certain periods of the year. We cannot have permanent staff just waiting there for winter to arrive so we use the private sector. They compete against each other and in this way we can lower our costs. We recruit excellent, well trained managers. We train them when the need occurs and they are asked to provide the services. They are given a budget and they must account for it. They have to devise ways of trying to do as much and more if possible with as little money as we can give them.

Basically this is the philosophy. It is not a religious approach. It is just a practical approach that Canadians expect from us.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): I see that I have to be very brief.

This budget has repeated promises to reduce the debt and deficit the same way the government has done for nine years. We all know that this has not resulted in a reduction but in an increase in the debt and deficit.

I wonder if the President of the Treasury Board has paid any attention whatsoever to the report of the Conference Board of Canada that commented on the December 2 financial statement. It said that the over-all impact of the measures of the government will be contradictory and will lower the real GDP rate by roughly 0.1 per cent—that is in fact 10 per cent of the expected GDP increase—and by 2 per cent in 1993. It promises that the dampening effect on economic recovery would be even greater if the provinces followed the federal government's example of restraining public sector wages and employment. Does he realize the impact of the decisions of this budget on economic recovery?

Mr. Loiselle: I wish the hon. member would help me reconcile this with the statement of the House leader today in this House who blamed us for not cutting enough and reducing our expenditure enough.

This is the problem that I would like her to address. Who should I believe? Do I take into account her remarks or the remarks of the hon. Liberal House leader? He told us that we have been trying to tackle our expenditure and deficit and that we have not been successful. Each time we cut $1 million it was opposed.

• (1550)

We have been trying and we have been successful. We have brought the deficit down compared with the GDP, which is very important. It is half of what it was. It is not enough and we want to do more. We had a statement in December. There was some slippage. We are taking corrective action. We will continue to fight. It is very difficult to do but we are not going to abandon it.

Our commitment is to put this fiscal House in order. We do understand that we have to keep a balance. If we had taken more out of the economy at this stage—we have taken $3.8 billion from the coming year—it would have had a greater impact.

I think the Liberals should make up their minds which way they want it.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to rise on behalf of my constituents in this House of Commons, especially on this occasion when I am given the opportunity to speak to what is not only a pre-election budget but also this government's last budget. I know that Canadians rejoice that they will not have to deal with this particular government much longer.

I wondered when I sat in this House yesterday, why we went through this exercise. There were so many balloons floated up before the budget came out. All of a sudden the budget came and there was really nothing in it. If one wanted to speak to the budget at all one could only deal with the impact of this particular statement or budget on this particular year because obviously there will be a new leader within 60 days. There will be an election and there will be a new government with very many different faces sitting in this House of Commons. All we can talk about is the first portion. The rest is all conjecture and whatever nice things they want to say.

Let us look at what happens in this budget for 1993–94. The government is saying that it is going to cut things to the tune of I believe $3.8 billion. Let me remind Canadians that in December's economic statement it was cutting by $2.8 billion. Therefore it has only found approximately $1 billion. Of that $1 billion one of the savings, so to speak, is going to be some $625 million in GST refund cheques. It is not really saving that money. It is just not going to give out refunds in January 1994. It is going to wait until the end of its fiscal year, which is March 31, 1994. One will get one's cheque on April 1. In that way on the government's books it can show a decrease in what it is paying out on GST rebates of more than $600 million for the years 1993 and 1994.

There is not really a lot in this budget for 1993–94 in terms of cutting. That leaves maybe another $250 million or $300 million that is going to be cut from a number of other areas such as advocacy groups. The list goes on. I am just wondering why.

Prior to the budget coming out I happened to read an article in The Ottawa Citizen of April 20, 1993 written by Mr. Don McGillivray: "Usually a budget represents the dollars and cents form of a government's agreed policy. This time it is being presented when the governing party does not know who its leader will be in 60 days or who that leader will choose as finance minister or what will be the economic policies of the new minister and future finance minister. In other words, a budget now is a lame duck document, an interim financial statement from an outgoing administration. Mazankowski, since he is in temporary possession of the taxpayers' cash, has the power to issue political pamphlets at public expense."

Is that really the only reason that we have this budget at this time? Is it so that this particular government, at taxpayers' expense, can go out and boast and brag about all of the things that will happen when it is not there any more? As a matter of fact, some of them will happen after a second election.

One realizes there is going to be an election this year. There has to be one. Other projections go as far as five and six years from now. There could be many elections between now and then. I find it very strange to hear those members boasting about how they will cut the deficit by $30 billion and how they will reduce the debt in four or five years.

It is all really a game. I do not believe that Canadians appreciate being used in that fashion. I wonder at the mentality that carries this on because it has built Canadians up to expect some massive cuts. Did it believe that when it did not have the massive cuts that all Canadians would celebrate and vote Conservative next time around? I do not think the government gives much credit for intelligence. It is high time it considers it. On the other hand we do not have to worry about it because it will be gone after the next time.

Before the minister brought in his budget he spoke proudly of the fact that Canadians will get what they want. He clearly stated yesterday that there will be no new taxes or tax increases. Obviously we cannot afford more increases. We have already been taxed to death. This is the government that raised taxes of all kinds at least 35 times in the last 9 years.

As the Liberal leader stated, the tired old Conservative government is obviously showing more concern for its re-election plan than for the welfare of the Canadian people. It is clear that this government is committed to a jobless recovery.

The phrase jobless recovery comes from the The Work of Nations that is a book written by Robert Reich while he was still at Harvard. By the way this Mr. Reich is the Secretary of Labour for President Clinton. Reich took the American context to apply this term.

However unfortunately for Canadians the Tories have transplanted the reality of a jobless recovery onto the Canadian scene. That means that yes, we do produce more goods. Some corporations may make larger profits but it all has to do with increased productivity and no new jobs. That is where the term jobless recovery comes into the picture.

Canadians want to work and they want recovery but they also want good paying jobs. Right now they are underemployed and unemployed by the hundreds of thousands. As a matter of fact we have a figure of unemployment but that does not bring into consideration the large number of people who work at part time jobs and short term contract jobs. It is especially crucial for our younger generation made up of those young people who are now in their twenties and have graduated from university and who are out there looking for work. It is especially frustrating for them.

It leads me to believe that this government has almost decided to write off this generation. We cannot afford to do that with the brilliant minds of our young people and the skills that some of them do possess.

Unless Canada rebuilds the infrastructure that serves its industries and more importantly that provides and improves the skills of its workers, then economic recovery may generate few new jobs. There is absolutely nothing in this budget that will get the economy moving again and put Canadians back to work.

The government is telling Canadians: "Yes, we are coming out of the recession and therefore our economy will be recovering." However it fails to recognize that the economy is undergoing a fundamental restructuring. The government has no detailed economic plan to nurture innovation, training and infrastructure that are the building blocks of a strong and prosperous economy.

Not too long ago Statistics Canada announced that the recession was over. It along with the Conservative think-tanks based their optimism on a selective set of statistics: rising exports, falling interest rates, continuing low inflation and a decline in the rate of personal and business bankruptcies.

• (1600)

Facts and figures that do not fit this cheerful scenario are ignored. I am referring to the still surging tide of lay-offs, the growing number of poor and homeless, the lengthening line-ups at food banks and welfare offices. We are in a state of social distress.

Bankers and business executives say that what counts is the upturn in profits. Prosperity is measured in corporate balance sheets, not in job creation.

Governments have seen to it that in both the public and private sector job cuts and more job cuts are necessary for Canada to become competitive. They tell us monthly that it is part of an economic restructuring process.

Restructuring is the current buzz word in business and government, but what does it really mean? The dictionary definition is "to replace one structure with another." I would like to know where the new economic structure is for Canada. Can we see the old economy being torn down while we look in vain for its substitute? If it exists even in the planning stages, it certainly is not discernible. Neither are the new jobs that the victims of restructuring so desperately need. We do not know where they are coming from.

One of the tragic downfalls or victims of these policies is of course our young people. Generation x is the contemporary way to describe the lost generation, the followers of the baby-boomers. Young people today and generations x, y and z to follow will find it difficult to get jobs of any kind.

This is this year; I am not talking about the future. Young people cannot find jobs now. Many of them graduated from university this year. Many graduated two years ago and are out there in the job market. Many of them are looking for summer work to pay for their studies. Where are they going to get this help? Certainly not from the Conservative government across the way.

I can speak on this because I have children in that age group. Their friends and all of the people I know in their age groups have a very difficult time getting jobs. They are smart, and like to work. They want to work and are well educated. It is a crime to see them not being able to use their skills.

I want to talk about the deficit. It is fine to speak of dealing with the deficit. Let us face it. This government has made it a religion to talk about deficit cutting and debt cutting.

In 1984 the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre, said he had a plan. He warned that if this plan was not implemented net public debt would more than double from its level then rising to over $400 billion by the early 1990s. Imagine how terrible it would have been had we only been at $400 billion for the debt. We are at $450 billion. That is how well this government has looked after this religion of deficit and debt. After nine years they are higher than what was predicted.

In 1985 the then Minister of Finance again said that he was in control. He said it over and over. In fact he was so confident that he subtitled his May 23, 1985 budget speech "Securing Economic Renewal" and told Canadians how he was going to reduce the debt and deficit. This is what he said: "I am implementing a clear and realistic medium-term plan to control our debt. We have put in place a plan that will meet the need for sustained reduction of deficits over the medium term. We have acted to control and reduce deficits in a balanced and careful way that will not tip the economy off its course of growth."

The result was not good. It was a shrinking economy, massive unemployment and line-ups at food banks and the UIC offices. It was what the Conference Board called a made-in-Canada recession.

• (1605)

As recently as the February 1990 budget, the Tories told us that the $30.5 billion would be reduced to $14 billion by 1993. It is now 1993 and the deficit has been clocked at $34.4 billion. Of course now we have been told that it will be $35.5 billion. It continues to be far more than what they have said it would be.

Now the Minister of National Defence says she is going to eliminate the federal deficit within five years. The Minister of the Environment says he can do it in four. But they do not say how because they know it cannot be done without radical cuts to social programs and transfer payments.

Even then we do not know that economic growth would follow. Even the Minister of Finance knows it cannot be done as quickly as what they are saying. He said that if the whole government operation were shut down it would not balance the deficit. We would save $15 billion or $16 billion and the senior citizens and the veterans of this great country would not be receiving their cheques. This was in an interview on CBC Prime Time News in December 1992.

Maybe that is why none of the Tory candidates are talking specifics when it comes to investing in people or helping Canadian firms to get ready for NAFTA. They do not understand that any successful battle against the debt and deficit will require not only expenditure cuts but also a thoughtful plan for economic growth. Only then would we put Canadians back to work and generate the additional revenues to put Canada's fiscal house in order.

I said today in Question Period that governing is about choices. This government is the one in the driver's seat and it makes the choices. It has chosen to do nothing. It has chosen to ignore Canadians and their need for real hope. If hope is not given to Canadians, even those who have jobs fear they will lose them. They hold back and do not buy the things that perhaps they would if they had a little bit of hope and faith in the future.

We then fall into the vicious cycle of restraint and depression. Sales go down. There are bankruptcies and people get laid off. It continues on and on. It would have been a great gift to Canadians if after these terrible nine years of government it had at least tried once during that time to do something for the average Canadian.

The government should have tried to do something for those Canadians who are crying for hope and who want to work. Canadians are hard working and they like to have this independence. They want to share in the wealth of this country. It cannot be done when they are without work and without hope. Young people need a chance to build a life for themselves so that they also can pass on the benefits to their children in the future.

We know any government that takes over will have to deal with the deficit. There is no doubt that we all will. It is not whether we will or we will not deal with the deficit; it is how we will do it. We will do it by redefining government, by refocusing the powers of government to serve the people of Canada. We will not do it by spending more, but by reallocating government priorities.

Canadians know this and we know Canadians are worth while. The more they work, the better it is for this economy. The better it is for this economy, the better the regions of Canada will fare and the more able they will be to contribute to the wealth of this country. All that they ask is to be given half a chance.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to my colleague who mentioned in her speech that Canadians were expecting massive cuts. From what the hon. member said at the beginning of her speech, you would believe that no major cuts were announced yesterday. Yet, during Question Period, her Liberal colleagues spent an hour accusing the Minister of Finance of having made monstrous cuts. They cannot constantly speak from both sides of their mouth. They have to make up their minds in the end: either there were cuts or there were not. Today the hon. member is saying that there were no major cuts and that we did nothing to reduce the deficit, but her own colleagues said the opposite for an hour during question period.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member also mentioned that these policies hurt young people, but the fact of the matter is that they are actually victims of Liberal policies. It is the Liberal Party that let government finances get out of hand, which in turn compromised the future of young Canadians. That is what they are victims of. They are victims of this accumulated debt, while we are trying to be fair and equitable. It goes like this: "We want to have a good time. So what if we get into debt. Let the next generation pay." That is what the young could be victims of if we do not act immediately.

Let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. member that every budget reduction measure taken by this government over the past nine years has been systematically opposed.

An hon. member: This is a speech!

Mr. Robitaille: It is not a speech, just comments I am making as part of this period for questions and comments. Wake up! Take the time to come in, then you will know what to talk about.

A few days ago, we heard how the leader of the Liberal Party would solve the deficit problem. He would bring the deficit down to 3 per cent of gross domestic product. I would like to remind the House—and I am getting to my question—that in 1984, when this government came to power, the deficit as a proportion of GDP was 8.5 per cent, but it is now down to 5.5 per cent. I think this is not a solution in itself but rather an objective.

I am getting to my question. The hon. member is right, some of our predictions were off the mark. Bear in mind however that these previous budget forecasts were off the mark because revenues were down, not because expenditure controls were not fully adhered to.

In this budget, and this is my question, policies to assist small and medium-sized businesses are pursued to create jobs, research and development assistance is maintained and there are no tax increases. Are the hon. member and her party prepared to support a budget that will continue to provide assistance to the small business sector for job creation, without increasing taxes?

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, I have to respond to one of the statements made by the hon. member. He said that Canadians wanted to treat themselves. I can tell you that the Conservatives have been treating themselves and their friends for nine years. They loved those nine years. The prime minister is still treating himself today to a trip around the world. Why? Maybe he is looking for a job, I do not know but he tells Canadians to tighten their belts. It is okay for them but not for him. He has to go and play the big shot around the world because his mandate is coming to an end. Nobody can tell him what to do any more.

Small business owners cannot afford such a trip around the world.

Mr. Robitaille: Answer the questions.

Mrs. Marleau: Small business owners have big problems with taxes imposed by this government. I know the Tories have not raised taxes this time, but have they not done enough to destroy those small businesses? Tell me, it is impossible—

Mr. Robitaille: She is not answering the questions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. I would ask the hon. member not to distract the Speaker who is listening carefully and I would ask the hon. member for Sudbury to conclude her remarks.

[English]

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talked about small business. I can say that when I visit the small businesses in my riding they are dying under the load of increased taxation this government and the provincial government have imposed upon them by the layering of taxes. There is nothing they would love more than to see the delayering of these taxes so they do not have such an horrendous burden.

[Translation]

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I would point out to the Chair that the member did not answer my question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would say to the hon. member for Terrebonne that raising such a point of order is almost an abuse of the Standing Orders.

The hon. member for Rosemont.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, every time a budget is presented, we are given this vision which is very tough, where we are told to tighten our belts because we must be more competitive, reduce the debt and the deficit and take measures for economic growth. On the other hand, the opposition presents the views of the unemployed and concern for social programs. However, everyone listening to us knows very well that the economy must be growing and jobs must be created in order to maintain our social programs.

The member for Terrebonne has just said that the government had met its spending objectives but not its revenue objectives. The question is why these revenue objectives have dropped.

We must strike a balance. It is wrong to say that we can be competitive and have economic growth without looking after social problems. In a modern economy, the two go together. Clearly, what is lacking in this country is a minimum of consensus on clear objectives.

We must remember that the Conservative government in 1984—perhaps few people remember—called a national conference of all economic partners. There was only one, it was a failure and another conference like it has never been held.

Nevertheless, countries which succeed—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I may be distracted, but we are still in the period for questions and comments so I would ask the hon. member to conclude.

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, we are trying today to find a way to have both economic growth and full employment. As the Minister of Finance illustrates in his booklet with many international comparisons, some countries are much more successful than Canada in achieving a total performance, that is, not only economic growth and competitiveness but also job creation and maintenance of social programs, but in all these countries, there is co–operation between the governments and those involved in the economy. This government's failure is its inability to co–operate with the other players.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Time is up. In all fairness, I must recognize the hon. member for Sudbury, because we are still in the period for questions and comments.

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, it is very kind of you to give me the last word. My message to the Bloc Quebecois is this: it is much better for us to work together as Canadians because unity is strength. I think that our problems are in part due to the fact that we are always quarrelling with one another. We spend so much energy, money and time on these issues that we do not concentrate all our efforts on the economy, where we should be working the hardest.

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, before commenting on the new budget brought down by the Minister of Finance, I would like to say that I have agreed to share my speaking time with another member of the Conservative caucus.

Since 1984 I have attended nine budget speeches, eight by Mr. Wilson and the last two by Mr. Mazankowski.

As soon as debate started on the budget, opposition parties would rise to say they were either unhappy about tax increases, because there were some tax increases initially, or about spending cuts. That is what they would say, and later on, when they had to vote on the budget, they always voted against spending cuts and tax increases of any kind.

There were also the reactions of Canadians to these speeches. Some groups felt they were penalized by specific measures in the budget which had a negative impact on them. Other groups said the government was not doing enough to cut spending, at a time when they felt spending cuts in departments should be accelerated. The government kept on gradually cutting back spending and has now stopped raising taxes.

The results in the medium term, and I am not referring to the budget's impact in the media the day after the budget speech, have been such that editorial writers, economists, entrepreneurs, business people and consumers appreciated how our economy has developed and prospered in the process.

During the past 12 months, four major provincial governments brought down their budgets and made certain economic decisions. The most obvious example is the socialist government in Ontario, which now supports spending cuts and is against big tax increases. This is a first, but it is also the first time this party has been in power.

We also have a socialist government in British Columbia. The party's philosophy has been to spend money they do not have. Here again, the party finally realized it was time to live within one's means, and its budget contained more restrictions on spending and tax increases.

We saw the same phenomenon in Saskatchewan, where the country's third socialist government has cut spending and does not intend to introduce undue tax increases. Premier Bob Rae of Ontario told party supporters—the groups that elected him and Ontario's major unions—in order to justify the position he was about to take on major budget cutbacks: we have to be careful, and maybe it would be nice to get some guidelines from the International Monetary Fund. The Premier of Ontario is prepared to abandon the concept of running a government independently by saying they would welcome a statement by the International Monetary Fund that they should apply further restrictions to government spending in Ontario. That is an important point.

We in the Conservative government did not wait for instructions from international organizations. We adopted measures that prevented foreign lenders from calling the loans because we Canadians have a foreign debt of $275 billion to $300 billion. If we did not adopt restricted measures, interest rates would go up, the dollar would go down and inflation would increase. We would have the same problems we had in 1984, after the Liberals lost the election.

Today, our policy is to control spending constantly instead of making a sudden break with the past, which would have been disastrous for the economy. We have always preferred to reduce spending and control tax increases. What has been the impact of this policy so far? The best news is that in every Canadian family, in every household, every single taxpayer is paying interest rates of 5 to 6 or 6.5 per cent. Today people are not experiencing a reduction in the purchasing power of their dollar, as was the case when we had 12 to 14 per cent inflation in 1982. Today inflation is around 1.5 per cent.

The Canadian dollar enjoys respect throughout the world, and that is why every Thursday, when $8 billion changes hands, lenders still have confidence in the Canadian dollar and interest rates are gradually going down.

That is also the message we were given yesterday. We will continue along the same path. In conclusion I would like to quote the opening words of Mr. Mazankowski's speech yesterday: "No new taxes. No tax increases". That is what we heard yesterday. Zero real growth in federal spending on programs and services. We will not spend more than in previous years.

It is the lowest federal program spending as a share of the economy in more than 30 years. Despite sometimes outlandish criticism of our budget, that budget stays the course Conservative budgets have followed since 1984, and it will guarantee a further economic recovery and economic expansion during the next five years.

That is why I am proud to be a member of this government and to take part in this debate on the budget. I hope we will hear at least a few positive comments from the opposition, and I also hope that some opposition members will give the government credit for what it has done and vote in favour of a status quo for government spending and against tax increases for this year.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, could the hon. member for Lévis explain to me how he can be so proud of the financial policy of his government when, on page 15 of the budget, the Minister of Finance tells us that, even in 1998, the Canadian economy will not have regained its full production potential?

Mr. Fontaine: Mr. Speaker, I thank the opposition member for his question. I will take this opportunity to explain to him that, since 1984, international circumstances have definitely changed. More and more, every country of the world is living in a global context. We cannot say that the situation was exactly the same in the previous decade.

We must take this global change into account. Also in the last few years, we went through a period where the Canadian economy experienced some depression caused, among other things, by external factors which led to some stagnation in our industrial process, the production process, and that definitely delayed some tax revenues.

That gave us additional challenges. We asked ourselves at one point if it was better to print money and reduce its value. We decided to go on the same road of restraint, and some are claiming that we are still going in the right direction, although the goal is a little farther away. This claim is shared by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, which comprises 24 European countries, by the International Monetary Fund, and mainly by the holders of Canadian bonds, the foreigners who are holding the Canadians' debt totalling more or less $275 billion. Those people must continue to believe in our fiscal policies and as a result of the budget, they do.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this budget debate. I want to concentrate particularly on one portion of it, which I view as an olive branch being offered by the Minister of Finance to his provincial counterparts. That olive branch involves the transfer payments that are made by the federal government to the provinces in the form of cash and tax points.

These transfers come by way of three programs: equalization, the Established Programs Financing and the Canada Assistance Plan. The budget indicates the intention to continue these major transfers to the provinces to the point where they will grow by 4 per cent over the next five years. The provinces will receive about $9 billion more than they would if these transfers were restrained to the same rate of growth as all other federal program spending, about 1.5 per cent.

For a province like Newfoundland, for example, allowing this higher growth rate in transfers means over $400 million more. That is almost twice the size of Newfoundland's deficit this year and is equal to $700 for each resident of that province.

I think this is an important gesture by the Minister of Finance and I commend him for it. He is recognizing that there is only one taxpayer. Whether we are talking about the municipal governments and their funding requirements, provincial governments or the federal government, at the end of the day all of these governments have only one source of funds and that is you, Mr. Speaker, me and other Canadians: the taxpayers.

For the past eight and a half years the federal government here in Ottawa has waged a lonely war against the deficit and the debt. The national debt was something like $207 billion in March 1985 at the end of the last year of the Liberal administration that was characterized by chronic overspending on programs and the constant building up of debt. That Trudeau-Chrétien administration left behind a situation which has been very difficult for government to cope with ever since.

I think that it has been made more difficult by the distinct lack of federal-provincial co-operation. Before I touch on that I want to point out that as early as November 1984 this government began to address the problems. The Minister of Finance at that time said in his economic statement: "This government is prepared to lead this process of economic renewal. We have set for ourselves four challenges." First and foremost among those was: "to put our own fiscal house in order so that we can limit and ultimately reverse the massive buildup in public debt and the damaging impact this has on confidence and growth."

He went on to say that because he believed deficit reduction is the key to rebuilding confidence and confidence is the key to growth and job creation: "Controlling the deficit must be our priority for this year and for each year of our mandate. The goals of deficit control and increasing job opportunities cannot be separated."

That was Hansard, November 8, 1984. That has been the policy and position of the federal government ever since. I am happy to say we have made steady, solid progress. However, it has not been without difficulty because while we expected every single revenue-increasing measure and every single spending cut and program curtailment to be opposed by the opposition parties in this House, we also found there are difficulties at the provincial level. There is duplication of bureaucracy and overlap in a number of areas such as forestry, mining, tourism, recreation and others where both levels of government are trying to function.

We have seen a disastrous failure to harmonize sales taxes. A simple harmonization of the GST and the provincial sales taxes would assist in administration, reduce bureaucracy, improve border control possibilities and provide a much needed boost for the small business sector because it would relieve it of having to pay tax on production input costs.

We have seen the destruction of some very valuable federal–provincial programs unilaterally. I cite for example the gross revenue insurance program. The federal–provincial agricultural support program was unilaterally gutted last year by the province of Saskatchewan.

We have seen along the way the imposition of provincial payroll taxes. One cannot help but suspect in some cases that the target is the federal payroll, especially in a province like Ontario. We have seen situations where the federal government has attempted to provide some tax relief by reducing income tax. However, as soon as the space was left open it was more than filled by provincial government tax increases, so we have countless examples of frustration and counterproductive activity.

Just two years ago the provincial government of Ontario, the Bob Rae administration, announced to the world that it was going to spend its way out of recession. This was after six and a half years of the federal government doing everything in its power to bring the spending scenario under control and get the deficit in line. Because it was in a deep hole, the Rae government decided it was going to dig the hole deeper and somehow this would solve the problem. Of course that has been shown to be nonsense. It could not help but frustrate the general direction in which the federal government has been attempting to steer the country. That is why I am pleased with the signal the Minister of Finance has given.

I want to say a little bit about off–loading. So often provinces give federal off–loading as their excuse for some of their problems, suggesting the federal government has cut or reduced its levels of transfers to the provinces. That in fact is not so. I found a very interesting editorial in the Globe and Mail of Wednesday, March 24 1993, headed "The facts about off–loading." I would like to quote from it because it sets out very succinctly the new age of enlightenment. It begins by saying: "Now that provincial governments of every political stripe have more or less admitted that the federal government was right all along about the dangers of deficit spending and that they were wrong, we trust they will also confess their error in the ongoing dispute over federal transfer payments."

The editorial goes on to mention the three systems of federal–provincial transfers. It points out that since 1986 the federal government has progressively cut the rate of growth in those payments, eventually freezing them in per capita terms. Since 1984–85 federal transfers to the provinces have increased from $24.6 billion to about $40 billion this year, a 60 per cent increase or about 6 per cent per year. While it may not be enough for the provinces, it is certainly more than other parts of Ottawa's budget received.

It concludes by saying: "No doubt the provinces were disappointed that Ottawa did not increase its transfers quite as fast as they, the provinces, were raising taxes at home, but the only reason that has been a problem for them is that their spending went on rising as if it had. But Ottawa could hardly have been expected to match the provinces in whatever absurd flights of spending they chose to take. If the provinces now find they have flown too high, it is not the fault of Ottawa for clipping their wings."

We have the situation where the provinces that have had the sole responsibility for education and health for many years let the spending run wild, failed to control it and then tried to upload their problems to the federal government.

The Minister of Finance has made a very important overture in this budget by agreeing to continue the increase in these transfer payments to the provinces. It is a very big ticket item for the federal government which it could very easily cut to reach an earlier balancing of the books and elimination of the federal deficit.

• (1640)

As an overture, as an olive branch and as a signal to the provinces, the Minister of Finance has made that significant concession in his budget. Apparently we are going to have a meeting of federal-provincial ministers toward the end of May. We can hopefully look forward to some constructive activity leading to more federal-provincial co-operation in dealing with this very difficult insidious problem.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia is serious when he says that this budget shows openness to the provinces. The member mentioned that the provinces receive payments for three programs, which are called established programs, namely funding for health and education, equalization and shared funding of social assistance. We are told that expenditures will rise 4 per cent in the next five years while government spending is limited to 1.5 per cent.

What programs are we talking about? We know very well that per capita spending on health and education is frozen. There is no 4 per cent increase there. We also know that there is a cap on equalization payments, so what will increase in the next few years? Basically welfare payments. Why? The reason is very simple: because unemployment will rise dramatically.

The federal government's spending on unemployment insurance rose from $12 billion to $19 billion in two years. That is certainly not a 1.5 per cent increase. Since few jobs are expected to be created, people who are on unemployment insurance today will be on welfare tomorrow. Since the federal government has to pay 50 per cent of that, federal transfers will increase 4 per cent on average, but spending on this will go up by 10, 12 and 15 per cent a year. The provinces will have to pay half, so their spending will go up 10, 12 and 15 per cent a year, while transfers for education and health will not increase at all because they are frozen. We know that in tough economic times, spending on education rises because people stay in school or university longer and spending on health also goes up. I would like the hon. member to explain to me how the federal government has made an overture to the provinces.

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the hon. member's question. I remind him that at the end of the day there is only one taxpayer in this country. That holds true whether we are talking about programs and expenditures of the federal government here in Ottawa, the various provincial governments or the municipalities.

It is incumbent upon all levels of government to act responsibly because they are all facing exactly the same pressures. We have gone through a period beginning in the late 1960s where program spending began to exceed revenue. Unfortunately successive governments borrowed at that time instead of raising taxes to commence paying for those programs as a signal to the people of what the cost was. They put it on the credit card and unfortunately the time has now come where this vicious cycle of having to pay interest is compounded to the point where it is a very serious constraint on the abilities of all levels of government to be able to meet the expectations of Canadians.

It is abundantly clear that Canadians from one end of this country to the other are determined to see some progress being made to bring down this treadmill of debt. In fact all of our revenues do not have to be consumed by paying interest on past borrowings.

The hon. member makes reference to problems of unemployment. At this time, I believe employment in this country is approximately 200,000 below the all-time high.

I would remind him that we have been in a stubborn global recession. I remind him of the term global recession because all of the countries of the world have been caught up in this.

It is not a made-in-Canada recession the way the opposition would like to suggest. I can cite the state of California which has lost 700,000 jobs over the past few years as a result of global recession. It is certainly not a made-in-Canada thing.

The fact is that this recession has resulted in less revenue coming in than had been projected. That is unfortunate. What it has done is slowed down the time at which we reach the point where the annual deficit is eliminated. It has been put off for a few years.

I think we would have been there by about 1994. It is going to be a little bit later. The good news is that thanks to the deficit control measures of the government, thanks to the lower inflation that follows and the lower interest rates and to the free trade agreement, we do see job creation.

There have been 200,000 additional jobs created in this country since last August. For nine consecutive months, employment has increased in the country. I think that is proof positive that over the long run these policies of prudence are going to pay off.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak to a budget presented by the Minister of Finance yesterday.

When Canadians await and anticipate a national budget from their national government, they expect quite legitimately that the government will produce a financial blueprint that will address not only their particular economic predicament but the economic reality facing our country.

It is very similar to when families sit down to do their household budgets with their needs and difficulties. They try to be realistic. Governments should be charged with the same responsibility.

From this very simple perspective this budget was an irresponsible cop-out. It was a cop-out because it ran from the challenges and difficulties that are facing the country and that it helped create in the first place.

As a result, it failed Canadians economically in a time of great economic need. Just when our country needed some confidence and hope to overcome these economic challenges we receive as an answer a lack-lustre, leaderless budget document.

There is much that can be said about this document, particularly what it failed to do. I will dwell on five essential areas.

First, this budget as described by government members themselves was a basically stay-the-course budget. I could understand if the course was well received by the country, if the economy was vibrant, if people were satisfied, if the nation felt buoyant and if we were in a time of economic vitality. Then I could understand staying the course and hopefully staying it for a number of years.

The course that this country has been on for the last number of years in my humble suggestion, and I think it is shared by a great number of Canadians across the country because of their own individual lots, has been a very painful course. It therefore speaks to new remedies, to a change of course and new ideas and new assumptions.

Things are not working for all too many Canadians. Is this document rooted in reality? Does this government know or care about the 1.5 million unemployed? Does it care about the three million on welfare? Does it care about the plant closings in my city of metropolitan Toronto? Does it care that confidence is down across the country?

Does the government care that poverty is up every single year since it was elected? Do those members know that in addition to a recession still very much on on the streets of Canada our country psychologically is going through a depression and a state of very much insecurity largely triggered as a result of broken economic dreams and aspirations? The line-ups at food banks are getting longer, not shorter. There were 75 million pounds of food delivered to Canadians through food banks last year.

Talk to businesses Mr. Speaker and they will tell you that the proverbial turning of the corner is a long distance away. This government says technically by definition the recession is over. Ask workers. Ask retailers. Ask restaurateurs. Ask manufacturers. Ask the various entities that make up our national economy. Ask them and then ask consumers if we are out of the recession.

This budget is going to stay the course. What does the budget do for that course? This government and everybody else says that small businesses and medium-sized firms are the engine of jobs and economic growth. There are three lines about small business in this budget: "We increased already our substantial support for small businesses, the prime source of new job creation in Canada, and they are now creating jobs."

It talks about having created 200,000 full-time jobs over the last number of months. I would like to see where those jobs are. My city of metropolitan Toronto alone over the course of the last couple of years has assumed half of the job losses, over 230,000 jobs, of the entire country. It wants credit for having created, unsubstantiated in this document, 200,000 jobs.

Where is the plan, where is the commitment, to finding a new course, a better course, a course that will work for more Canadians and not fewer? Let us abandon the stay the course mentality rather than applaud it.

Point number two, the foundations of this budget are based not on fact and action but rather the foundations of this budget are built on future projections and predictions.

As far as predictions go, all their past predictions about job creation and deficit reduction have been off base. For instance we pointed out today during Question Period that their projections for the deficit for this year were only off $8 billion. They assumed a debt of $148 billion. We are now up to $450 billion.

The second thing about predictions is that they predict in two, three, and five-year cycles. A very courageous government, is it not? Not that it will have anything to say about that particular part of Canada's future because it is going to be on this side after the next election. What does that say to Canadians who live in the here and now, Canadians who are unemployed today, students who do not have jobs today? They are saying: "Who cares what you predict about jobs in 1998 when I do not have a job today when you promised me two years ago that x amount of jobs would be created."

Look what it says about job prediction. Page 14 of the budget: "Job prospects will improve. I expect," the minister says, "employment to increase by about 300,000 jobs this year," can you imagine, "and next year more than 400,000 jobs."

Nowhere does it say how or where these jobs will be created. Predictions, projections, not much comfort for people who live with that economic malaise today and who know that unless things improve, when they wake up tomorrow morning that same malaise will be facing them once again. They know what this government can do with its predictions and projections. In the first words of the budget, the minister said there would be no new taxes or tax increases, and all of them applauded.

Canadians are not stupid. Canadians do not need to be offended anymore. Canadians know that since 1984 when this government regrettably took office there have been 36 different and new tax increases, including the GST. Canadians know the disposable amount of cash in their pockets at the end of the month when they add up the federal, provincial and property taxes at the local level. This government now wants applause because after 36 tax hits it says maybe you deserve a break today. Then it asks why people have lost confidence in their government and institutions.

On point number three, where is the budgetary recipe for economic growth in this country? How will we increase jobs which will increase consumer spending, increase available amounts of cash or disposable income, increase confidence, increase demand, increase production, which will in turn increase government revenues and therefore pay for the services and programs that we have come to admire?

We all have to be fiscally responsible. This government, despite playing smoke and mirrors with the debt and the deficit and cutting has opted perceptionally to cut, cut, cut. How do you address the need to expand the economy and help it become more vibrant? You just cannot do it by cutting and slashing in the extreme and on its own. You cannot expand by constantly contracting. You can cut until you are blue in the face and have no heart left but it will still not speak to trying to expand and grow our economy and to try to make it work once again, rather than contracting, cutting and slashing. You need a balance when you are looking at a national economy. You just cannot hide under one fancy title that we are cutting, slashing and are responsible and the economy will respond to that. You need a balanced approach. Like all things in life you need to have a tempered balanced approach and our economy is no different.

For instance, we know that there is a capital cash crunch for small businesses and medium-sized firms. All of us, including the members on the government side, have said that is where job creation really is at its best. What does it say about helping the capital crunch, the credit crunch for those firms? Again three lines on page 5 and I quote:

> In response to representations on the equity capital needs of smaller, knowledge-based firms, we will also explore ways to develop mechanisms to encourage investors to support local companies—

Explore, develop mechanisms, encourage—pap, after nine years. What has it said in terms of that credit crunch about banks? Banks were pulling back credit and freezing loans. Companies that for anywhere from 15 to 30 years had been good corporate clients of the major lending institutions could not get the time of day today.

• (1700)

Last Friday I had three calls in my constituency office. One was from a restaurateur, one from a food manufacturer and one from a small contractor. Each of them had been a client of the bank for over 15 years. Each of them had projects that would allow them to survive the drought. None of the three was able to get one dime from the chartered bank.

The story goes on and on. The banks have a role to play. I am not saying it is all their fault, not at all. I am saying that when looking at the equation of the national economy a very important variable is the role of the lending institutions. When there is a recession that role becomes doubly important.

Those banks should not be forcing small and medium-sized firms to pay for their lending mistakes to Campeau, O&Y or to South America. Those banks which exist because of entrepreneurship and risk taking should put their money where their mouths are. Take a risk with the small businessman. Allow him to refinance the truck. Take a risk and allow that restaurateur to expand and fill a new niche. Take a risk on that individual to buy a new piece of machinery that could perhaps do the job a little more effectively. Get behind some of those small and medium-sized firms.

We talked to the members of the Canadian Banking Association. When they visited our caucus I asked them of all the business loans portfolios to businesses what the percentage given to small and medium-sized firms was. After having told our caucus that is where the greatest number of jobs are created, less than 30 per cent of their business loans portfolio goes to small and medium-sized firms.

What does this government have to say about the role of our national lending institutions? That constituency is governed by federal statutes. As one important variable in that national economy they should be made to fulfil their role responsibly, not irresponsibly. If they fail to live up to legitimate lending practices that are needed for our times, well then it may be time for us as a Parliament and clearly as a government to revisit the statutes that give the banks the privileged place they enjoy in our country.

My fourth point is that the government keeps talking about the financial deficit. However, as a result of the dogmatic economic stay-the-course approach it has ignored the creation of a human deficit which manifests itself in different ways across our nation. There is a tremendous price to pay for those dogmatic stay-the-course economic policies when talking about a human deficit and sometimes we need to humanize the things we say or the policies that we create and pass.

How would you feel if you had to line up at a food bank for a piece of bread, Mr. Speaker? How would we feel if we had to go to an employment centre, only to see the same little cards indicating "thanks but no thanks" the day before? How would we feel if we were forced to live and exist off welfare? Think of the hurt and the stigma one would feel.

How would you feel if you were about to lose your job and what do you tell your family when you come home? How would you feel if you had to live below the poverty line? What hope would you derive the next day from this budget? What would you feel if you were part of the growing number of one-parent families led by single women, 60 per cent of whose jobs are below minimum wage? What confidence do you derive from this, if you are a senior and you are losing your house because you cannot afford to pay the property taxes after having sacrificed your entire life, or you are a young family and cannot afford to purchase that new house? How would you feel?

That is the human deficit members opposite prefer to ignore. Just like the chairman of the poverty subcommittee who pretends that the problems will go away if we raise the threshold of the poverty line. What insanity. What kind of blinkers are these men and women opposite wearing when they are oblivious to that human deficit? The tab keeps going up, not down. Let us look at that deficit while speaking rhetorically about the financial deficit.

This is my fifth and last point. Where is the inspiration that we are to be providing? When we talk about a budget we talk about inspiration and hope and not losing confidence. Where is that inspiration in this document that says we are going around the corner and together we are going to do it? There is none. There is no inspiration.

The leadership candidates on the other side condone the budget. Where is the newness? Where is the freshness? This really is the last chapter in a very sad Conservative tale. On top of it all, the Prime Minister has the audacity to spend $1 million on his egomaniac farewell tour when every other Canadian is left to make their own plan to get out of their economic misery. What a tale to finish this.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it was an entertaining speech to say the least, but I think it has to be laced with a little reality. None of us could help but listen because it was a very forceful speech.

When the hon. member talked about some of the difficulties he saw in Canada and those aspects of the economy that none of us want to see, I think he ignored a great deal. That is the point I want to make. He ignored a certain amount of reality out there. We are talking about unemployment and about 1.5 million people unemployed. None of us can take much satisfaction in that. None of us can.

I would like to focus on the fact that Canada's economy is moving along nicely. Now it is not growing as fast as we would like it to, but certainly it is not a stagnant economy. It is not stagnant at all.

What we have to do is compare where Canada is today in relation to the rest of the world and it is not doing too badly. In fact the statistics indicate that Canada is doing better than the rest of the industrial world.

In fact the IMF predicts that Canada's growth rates of 3.2 per cent in 1993 and 4.4 per cent in 1994 will lead the rest of the world. One might ask why. It goes back to one of the statements the hon. member made. I will give the answer and the member can respond.

What he was saying in his speech was: "Listen, we can see the Draconian things you are doing in terms of cutbacks and trying to control the deficit." I accept that, but he asks as to what we are doing to enhance the growth of the economy. The words he used were: "What is the recipe that you are proposing? Show us in terms of what the minister delivered yesterday. Show us the recipe in that speech."

The recipe is indeed there. Let me point it out: low interest rates, the lowest interest rates we have seen in 30 years; the lowest inflation we have seen in this country in 30 years; and investment opportunity, the likes of which we have not seen in 30 years. Therein lies the recipe.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, the member says I am ignoring reality. The federal budget has two lines on jobs, zero lines on growth, two lines on small business and nothing about the banks. The hon. member talks about low interest rates, low inflation and great investment.

No one is investing in my province of Ontario. They are going to Dallas and Fort Worth, Texas and Phoenix, Arizona. Low interest rates and low inflation are academic issues because many people do not have jobs. The interest rates could be at 2 per cent but if you are not working, Mr. Speaker, you cannot invest. You cannot buy the cottage. You cannot buy the home, nor would you because you feel very insecure.

In terms of international comparison the hon. member takes great pride in saying: "Well we are going to lead the G-7 in terms of growth." He does not tell Canadians, nor does the Prime Minister, that of all the G-7 countries, we fell the furthest. Of all the G-7 countries our performance was the worst. Despite having dropped the furthest, our rebound according to economics is still not at the level it should be for the depths to which this government has brought this nation.

When the hon. member says that we are going to lead the G-7 countries out of the recession, why not also be honest and mention how deep the government brought this country down and that we were number one in terms of the worst economic performances.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague on an inspirational speech and especially the fact that he put so much focus on small business. We on this side of the House have been saying for the last two and a half years that the greatest hope for new job creation lies with the small business sector in this country. All the larger corporations are downsizing and dismantling. It is just an awful condition.

The thing that really disturbs me is the action the government took last December in its economic statement. In that economic statement it amended the Small Businesses Loans Act. When we came back in February we all worked together to put that act through the House of Commons in record time. We as Liberals stood up and complimented the government, but we did it with one condition, that the Government of Canada would promote the Small Businesses Loans Act in every region of this country and that it would also call in the financial institutions and get them to get into the act.

We can have all these posters at the banks reading: "Low interest loans at 5 per cent or 6 per cent," but if the banks are not going to lend money then what good is it? It is almost like false advertising.

My question to my colleague is a tough one and I have tried to figure this out. What are we going to do to get the banking institutions of this country to wake up and realize that the small business community is crying out for help? Small businesses are our greatest hope for putting people back to work and they are not coming to the party.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from my colleague for Broadview—Greenwood. In his modest way he did not mention that for the last two and a half years he was very instrumental in trying to up the campaign of having all levels of government get behind our small and medium-sized firms and that great network of some 900,000 businesses across the country. If each of them were to create one or two jobs, imagine the type of stimulus we would derive.

I talked a bit about the banks. He talked about the small business loans. It really is a shell game unfortunately. When the government moved from the original $100,000 to $150,000 to the $250,000 small business development loans it would help underwrite, it was academic. Businesses in my riding told me that they could not even get to the first base of $100,000, never mind upping the threshold to $250,000. It was an attempt to try to suggest that somehow it was doing something great for the small business network.

What do we do with the banks? At the first opportunity, I think the first move should be one of co-operation. Have our chief financial lending institutions understand that their role in the national economy is a precious one, that during downturns it becomes doubly precious and that their variable is instrumental in the kind of output the economic equation gives us.

Second, if they are not prepared to have proper lending practices that reflect greater amounts of business loans to the small and medium-sized firms, which receive less than 30 per cent of all business loans from our banks, then we have to revisit the federal statutes that essentially give a monopoly for those chartered banks. I do not say that in a personal way and I do not say that in any nationalistic way. I only say it in order to add some muscle to the words we hear every single time we go back to our ridings.

The third area that I would mention is that of the chief inspector of the banks. I would like to put some teeth in that position to allow that inspector and the infrastructure around that office to actually take a look at those lending practices and see if they actually make sense with the times we are going through.

I would hope that we would first be able to sit down with the presidents of the major banks and lending institutions, which this government has not even begun to experiment with, and say that we are not putting the blame on them but the lenders must be engaged in a partnership in terms of stimulating and fomenting a more vibrant economy, taking risks and becoming the entrepreneurs they say that banks are founded on.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my first remark will be that this budget raises a simple question: why? I think that is the question that comes to the mind of many Canadians and Quebecers when they examine this budget, specially because this finance minister is probably more aware than any other Canadian of the seriousness of our fiscal problems in Canada.

If anybody is aware that strong action is urgently needed to regain control of our deficit and start paying off our debt, it is the present finance minister because the whole situation is known to him and he can get all the information, and because he is a member of a party and a government that was elected in 1984 on a platform that included putting our public finances in order. All Canadians remember that 1984 campaign when Conservative candidates travelled throughout Canada and Quebec telling everybody that the government should be replaced and how terrible the Trudeau government was because it had accumulated a $200 billion debt.

I remember vividly the comparisons that were used and the terror they stirred up in the public. People said, and rightly so, that that cancer had to be removed. They thought it was unbelievable that, in 10 years, we had gone from a more or less balanced budget to a national debt totalling $200 billion. That was one of the factors that helped the Conservatives beat the Liberals nine years ago. The Conservative government, with much stricter requirements with regards to fiscal balance and with a much healthier notion of public finances—at least that is what people thought—was elected on a restraint and recovery program. So nobody knows more than the present Minister of Finance how important it is to deal with a public debt that has jumped from $200 billion to close to $460 billion in nine years. He knows it so much that, in recent months, he was told by the IMF that we had to be careful, that Canada's debt and deficit situation was becoming dangerous. He himself did everything he could so that Canadians would be ready to accept extremely drastic measures in the budget.

Everybody in Canada knew that they would have to make sacrifices after this budget. Everybody was ready for that because the present Minister of Finance managed to convince Canadians that things were going wrong and that the government had to intervene. Virtually no analyst was expecting a mild budget.

However, as the minister knows, the Canadian debt is the second highest in the G–7. We know how this government reminded us, during the constitutional and referendum debates, that Canada belongs to this select club of the seven richest countries in the world. The fact is that Canada is the poorest of the richest countries in the world, or at least the most heavily in debt, second only to Italy.

The Minister of Finance is well aware of the situation, since he reminded us of the fact in the fiscal statement he delivered December 2. There was one important thing he told Canada which the insiders knew but the general public ignored. On page 40 of the background document included with the fiscal statement delivered on December 2, there is a chart showing Canada's international indebtedness.

People, especially government members, talk a lot about the magnitude of our debt, but seldom if ever about the honesty the minister of Finance showed last December, when he told us about the international indebtedness level of Canada.

It is important to note that Italy, whose debt is worse than ours, finances only 5 per cent of its debt on foreign markets. Foreigners account for only 5 per cent of Italy's debt. Otherwise, Italians borrow from Italians.

If the Italian government needs to borrow in order to pay its debt, which is higher than ours, then it borrows from Italian citizens. In Canada, when we need to finance our debt, which is the second highest in the G–7, we borrow at 40 per cent from foreigners. At least, that was the situation back in December, according to the chart provided by the Department of Finance, so, you see, I am not inventing anything, Mr. Speaker.

In matters of canadian sovereignty, when speaking of Canada managing its own affairs, one has to remember that 40 per cent of the financial decisions concerning the debt are taken overseas. That is to say that Canada is essentially at the whim of the financial market and if by chance foreign creditors are not satisfied with anything we do, Canada is at risk and is left with no room to manoeuvre when managing the public finances, the affairs of this country.

If anyone knows how dangerous this situation is and how important it is to maintain a confidence level overseas so that these 40 per cent foreign creditors continue to extend financing to us, it is the minister of Finance.

And what does the Minister of Finance do? The time has come to present his last budget, the last of a series of nine budgets by this government that has received all the snubs and has had many trials and tribulations in the constitutional and economic areas, when he has finally the opportunity to really do something to solve a real problem, that is the public finances problem.

What does the Minister of Finance do? He presents a do nothing budget. Those who have commented on the budget today across the country, editorial writers and columnists alike, have all said that this is not a budget, that there is no budget here, no real measures to straighten the public finances, nothing to deal with the disastrous situation in Canada.

It is as if the Minister of Finance tried to avoid the necessary solutions. We all agree that it was not easy. We all recognize that there will not be a miracle and that the next Minister of Finance will have a lot to do to repair the mess he or she will inherit, that he or she will have to take continuous, aggressive and responsible actions to redress public finances. We all recognize that some decisions are difficult to take, but there are some which are less difficult to take.

For example, I cannot understand why this government did not decide to save money by eliminating waste and inefficiency that result from duplication of programs at the federal and provincial levels.

Recently, the members of the Quebec caucus of the Conservative Party presented to their colleague, the Minister of Finance, a paper in which they strongly recommended the transfer of the jurisdiction over manpower to the Quebec government. Everybody knows that if there is something that makes unanimity in Quebec, it is that transfer. People in the labour, business, cultural and political circles, the provincial Liberal Party and the Parti Quebecois, in short everybody in Quebec reached a consensus never seen before in asking that manpower training and development programs and policy-making be transferred to the Quebec government to make all the services accessible at a single window.

Instead of neutralizing each other's actions, instead of waging a war whose victims are the persons in need, those who lose their jobs or those whose jobs are at risk, let us create that single window everybody is asking for so we can meet the great challenges of our time.

All those people want single-window services in Quebec, including the Conservative caucus members from that province who, for once, did not hide to say this. They wrote it in a report published in the media. I think Senator Roch Bolduc and the hon. member for Joliette, Mr. Larrivée, are the leading figures who signed that report. The Tory members from Quebec also understood that this is an extraordinary way to stop wasting and to save, according to a Liberal minister from the Bourassa cabinet, some $250,000 a year right from the start. This is a lot of money in only one particular sector, and there are all the others.

When he appeared before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, Pierre Fortin, a prominent economist, said that eliminating all duplication between Quebec and Ottawa could probably result in savings totalling up to $5 billion a year. There is one sector where duplication could have been eliminated very easily but it was not, even though everybody wanted that.

Mr. Speaker, whether you are federalist, sovereignist, Tory, Liberal or New Democrat, everybody in Quebec and in Canada knows that we will be the first generation who will pass on to the next one less than was ever passed on between generations in the history of Quebec and Canada. The building of a country is possible because a generation will pass on more than it has received. Slowly a real country is built and each generation passes on to the next one an invaluable heritage that it has enriched a little.

Our generation which perhaps received the most in history, in the whole string of transmissions, will be the first to pass on less than it received, to pass on a mortgaged country, a country that stifles the future of the rising generation, a polluted country, a country without a consensus. We are responsible.

We could have expected from this government that it would show courage, responsibility and some lucidity with respect to the present situation of those who are suffering and with respect to the future of those who justify our working, our struggling, that is our children and those who will come after them.

Moreover one would have thought that the Minister of Finance would spare himself this ridiculous exercise. He could have saved himself this touching exercise to help the two Tory Party leadership candidates save face because they ventured to make impossible and whimsical commitments when they said that if they took over from Mr. Mulroney as Prime Minister they would eliminate the deficit in five years. The Minister of Finance found it ridiculous. As one who for nine years has been part of a government that has been trying to reduce the deficit but only succeeded in increasing it to twice what it was before, he is the first to know that is impossible. He could not say it, but he could at least have kept quiet, but no, out of partisanship, out of electioneering solidarity, he wanted to help those two candidates that had ventured into the realm of ridicule and irresponsibility save face. He went through an exercise to prove that it could be reduced in five years. Indeed, he is saying that when he runs the country's finances, he can have a $32 billion deficit. However his successors will, through the workings of the Holy Spirit, or with the help of an extraordinary turn of events, reduce the deficit to $8 billion in five years, without tax hikes and cuts.

That is not the kind of Minister of Finance we are used to, especially since he indulged in unacceptable intellectual and accounting distortions. Does he not forecast in his budget that in certain years tax revenues will grow twice as fast as our economy, which does not make any sense? Any second-grade kid, who has learned basic arithmetic, knows on the face of it that it is a sham, but we must say that he tried that tack for his party's sake, so that the two poor candidates who said they would work miracles could save face.

After saying that I do not understand what happened, I could perhaps make an assumption, which in fact would explain the very existence of the Bloc Quebecois. First, how did the debt get so big? There are several reasons for it. Of course there are international and structural reasons, reasons related to problems with the economy throughout the world. We are not the only country in debt, but we are among the most indebted. To be sure, it is partly due to external factors and causes.

However a very large part is due to our inability to have a real consensus in this country. For a long time, the federal government threw money at problems in order to tighten its grip on the provinces and create a sort of fictitious Canadian unity. It paid to have duplicate institutions in the east and in the west. If someone somewhere clamoured, that person was paid off, and so it went. Rationality and efficiency were not the governing criteria most of the time or very often, but it was a way to buy peace.

Since Canada is tremendously rich in natural resources, we could go on paying for a long time, but when we no longer had the money required, we started to borrow. We borrowed so much that we can no longer do so now. We have reached the point where it is obvious that Canada cannot go on. This can be seen in the impossibility of finding a solution to the problem of the deficit.

There is a reason behind the Minister of Finance's inability to propose something that would straighten out the country's finances—it can be done, as we well know—in a fiscally responsible and socially just manner, by calling on everyone to accept some sacrifice, it can be done. The Americans will do it with President Clinton. It can be done in a country with a close sense of nationhood. Not here; it is not possible here to convince the east and the west to accept the same sacrifices. This is a country where an aircraft maintenance contract is enough to tear the country apart. A contract for helicopters or frigates is enough to tear the country apart. This is a country with no consensus.

The Canadian political structure does not correspond to reality. Our big problems like the budget and government finance require a fundamental solution. The problem is structural and the solution must be structural too. That is why we believe that since there are two realities in this country, two political, economic and social realities, there must be two political entities.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, while I was listening to the comments of my hon. friend from Lac-Saint-Jean concerning the budget some questions came to my mind.

First, the member for Lac-Saint-Jean, who was once a cabinet member in this government, must surely recall that, when the Conservative Party came to power in 1984-85, the debt was already very close to $200 billion and that this debt had mushroomed over a very short period of three or four years.

My hon. friend will also recall that the government's current account deficit was $16 billion. Let me briefly explain what we mean by the government's current account. It is simply the account into which go all revenues collected by the government through taxes—the income tax, excise taxes and other revenues—minus its operating expenditures. This current account was in the red to the tune of $16 billion, which means that the Governement of Canada was actually borrowing to pay for groceries.

In 1987-88 the member for Lac-Saint-Jean was a cabinet member. After the 1988 election, he realized that instead of a current account deficit, there was now a surplus. I think the member for Lac-Saint-Jean, as a minister of the Crown, had also experienced cuts in his department's operating expenditures.

I remember perfectly when the member for Lac-Saint-Jean presented the green plan with a lot of money to spend. I remember how impatient he became several times when he could not get these sums of money, because this government and this finance minister remained responsible. He could not get all the money he wanted in spite of all the good things that were said about the green plan.

• (1735)

The member for Lac-Saint-Jean will probably recognize, as I do, that this government has tried consistently to put the public finances in order. The member for Lac-Saint-Jean is criticizing the Budget. Would he have agreed, and it is the first part of my question, if yesterday the finance minister had announced massive cuts to transfer payments to the provinces? Would he have agreed if the government had announced massive cuts to transfer payments to those who need them the most, that is the elderly, the handicapped, the veterans? Would he have agreed with that? I think that having been part of the government, he is in a position to realize that there are things that cannot be changed without jeopardizing the very economic structure of the country.

I will ask him a second question to give him the opportunity to answer. The member for Lac-Saint-Jean has recognized, or at least, stressed the fact that training programs should be transferred to the Quebec government. I think that a consensus is emerging on that. Could he tell us why last October he campaigned against the Charlottetown Accord according to which manpower training programs would have been entirely transferred to the Quebec government?

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Manicouagan for these two questions. In response to his first question, I will have the opportunity to clarify once and for all the gossip peddled by government members, in particular the President of the Treasury Board when he goes to Chicoutimi and claims that the reason I broke ranks was that I was not given the money I had requested for the environment. I have written a rebuttal, but the minister never replied to that letter that I have had published.

As a matter of fact, I did get the money I had asked for. I wanted $5 billion to finance the green plan over a six-year period, and I got it. If the funding was later cut to $3 billion, I am not responsible for that. When I was minister, the funding for the green plan was $5 billion. It would have remained at $5 billion if I had stayed in office, because I fought for the environment. I believed that this government should do something positive for the environment, that it should make sure that we leave a clean, unpolluted country for future generations. Do not come and tell us today that we did not look after the environment. I insisted that we do so when I was in office, and we did.

Second, I want to deal with the hon. member's second question. It is obvious that, beyond the partisan sparring—and the quality of the debate has just gone down a notch but let us get back to the actual question being debated—the lack of consensus has been evident, especially since 1990 when the Bank of Canada had to use monetary policy as a club to impose interest rates that were obviously destructive for the economy of Quebec especially, and for the rest of Canada, except Ontario. Because the economy in Toronto was overheated as we must admit, the whole country had to take the drastic remedy of extremely high interest rates which had a direct impact on the interest the government itself owed its creditors. That literally killed business investment across Canada so that much of today's debt is actually due to the Bank of Canada's high interest rate policy, because this country cannot reach a consensus.

Just think that even today, the real interest rate in Canada is still double the real interest rate in the United States. That is not right. We are living next to the largest economy in the world, and we are separated from it only by a border, an imaginary line. Our economies are interrelated, integrated, as we well know; we are united by a free trade agreement. Why is it then that we need a real interest rate—that is, the mathematical interest rate minus the rate of inflation—twice as high as the American rate in order to protect the Canadian dollar? It is because this country has a political problem. Not an economic problem, a political one. The hon. member for Manicouagan is well aware of that. After all, he is from an area where the voters were overwhelmingly against the Charlottetown Accord he just referred to.

Mr. André Harvey (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Lac-Saint-Jean takes great pleasure in defending jurisdictions. In this budget, if there is a sector where we could make drastic cuts, it is in the field of transfers to provinces. These transfers affect education, health, social services, et cetera.

I want to ask a question of the hon. member. Does he not think that it is preferable, as the Minister of Finance said in his speech, to first consult with provinces to arrive at a rational plan for reducing transfers to those provinces? The increases will be 4 per cent. Agreements have been signed and I think they must be complied with. Since the debt and the deficit are a national problem, it is important that all provincial governments reach an agreement with the federal regarding a reduction of expenditures in the field of transfers. This seems perfectly logical, while at the same time respectful of the provincial jurisdictions.

I will conclude by asking a second question to my colleague from Lac-Saint-Jean. We usually make judgments based on results. Since my colleague was the Canadian ambassador to Paris for three years, perhaps he could tell me which budget restrictions he implemented at the Canadian embassy in Paris, where several dozen employees work. I would also like to know if, in all conscience, he applied those budget restrictions objectively.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my natural modesty has always prevented me from reporting on my tight management of the embassy in Paris, but he will let me do so since he is forcing me to do it today.

I was the only ambassador in Europe at the time who suggested cutting the staff in his embassy to the Department of External Affairs. I voluntarily proposed a reduction plan before I was asked. If I am not mistaken, because it was some time ago, I believe that we cut about 20 positions in Paris. I thought that we were overstaffed and I cut about 20.

If people tell me that I did not run a tight ship in the embassy, I was the most highly rated ambassador in Europe at the time for my management, if, Mr. Speaker, you will allow me to boast, since the hon. member mentioned it.

Secondly, regarding transfers to the provinces, is the member for Chicoutimi saying that he would like the federal government, which picked up these tax points during and after the war and must now distribute them back to the provinces, not to do so anymore but to keep this money and continue to impose requirements on the management of social programs in Quebec by saying "If you charge user fees we will stop paying"? Is he telling us that he would like the federal government to withdraw completely from transfers to the provinces for education and social programs?

If so, what does a federal government do? It proves what we are saying: the federal government must be abolished, at least as far as Quebec is concerned. Quebec must become a sovereign country that will look after its own social affairs, education and the rest, without sending over $20 billion in tax payments to Ottawa.

The member for Chicoutimi is just saying what almost all his constituents want: a sovereign government in Quebec City.

[English]

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in the budget debate. I think I will pick up where I left off when I questioned one of the members opposite with regard to their speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Will the hon. member indicate whether he will speak for 20 minutes or will split his time with another colleague?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I am going for the full 20 minutes and I guess that will give me some time for tomorrow's session as well.

Picking up where we left off in debate with the member opposite there is no question today about the direction from which the opposition is coming. Those members are attacking again where they left off and have left off consistently in terms of debate and their structure of the debate when it comes to the finances of the Government of Canada.

I was taken today by the remarks in the House by the Minister of Finance when he talked about the same line coming out of the lips of the members opposite. Basically when it is all sorted out they are not committed to deficit reduction at all. I think if their words are carefully measured over there on that side of the House then the Minister of Finance is absolutely correct. They like to talk about deficit reduction but when push comes to shove they really just want to pay lip service to it. That has surfaced in their remarks continually today. As the minister stated today their words really do not go beyond this. It is spend, spend, spend, borrow, borrow, borrow and tax, tax, tax. That has been a very consistent theme today.

They have been making some headway in this debate. I want to clarify this and step through what we have done. When they go beyond deficit and get off the deficit number then their argument simply is based on, for example, what one is doing to encourage investment in the economy. That is fair game and I think that is fair debate. I want to step through what we are doing because it is important to put it on the record.

What we are doing is pretty evident and it was evident in last year's economic statement which the minister brought down in December. That economic statement spoke pretty clearly in terms of what we are doing. Basically it comes down to this. The basic points of the argument are, and we have to mention this because it is very important the government do so, low interest rates, the lowest interest rates we have seen in this country for 20 years, almost 30 years, and low inflation rates, the lowest inflation rates we have seen in this country for 30 years. They are just part of the basics we have, but we also should fix firmly on crunching that deficit number.

That is where we have the basics right. That is where it is showing up in terms of investment in the Canadian economy. That is what we are doing. We are encouraging investment. We are encouraging growth in the economy.

I want to put on the record some remarks by the International Monetary Fund. The IMF sees Canada on a growth path. The evidence speaks pretty clearly for the Government of Canada in that regard. The IMF projects growth rates of 3.2 per cent for Canada in 1993 and 4.4 per cent in 1994.

What are those numbers really saying? They are saying that Canada is doing very well, thank you very much, in the face of the rest of the world. In other words, when we compare our economy to that of the United States or any economy in the western world, even countries like Japan, we are doing very well. The growth in the Canadian economy will exceed every one of the western European economies this year. As for the far east, we will exceed the growth of the Japanese economy as well. We have consistently done that as a nation since 1984. From 1984 to the present only one country in the hemisphere has exceeded Canada in terms of economic growth. Which is it? It is Japan.

We are doing fairly well, but not as good as I would like because 1.5 million unemployed people are too many for an industrialized country like Canada. We acknowledge that. We have to acknowledge it in the face of reality. We have to acknowledge what other countries are doing in comparison to us. They were caught in a world-wide recession as was Canada.

The members opposite say: yes, but the recession in Canada was worse. I agree it was worse. It was worse because our trading partners were going through that hurt as well. As a result of the fact that Canada is a trading nation we depend on the health of those other nations that buy products from us. Evidence of that, in terms of what we produce and sell to the rest of the world, is very compelling.

Last year Canada exported $157 billion worth of goods to the rest of the world. It was a remarkable turnaround for Canada. As the economies of the United States and western Europe started to speed up they were paying net dividends into Canada's economy. It takes a while for that to work through the economy. If they are buying $157 billion worth of goods from us today it does not mean that all the factories are up and running tomorrow because it does take time to work through the system. However, believe me it is happening.

Some of the numbers indicate that it is happening. Those numbers that have been put out by the International Monetary Fund are pretty clear evidence that it is working. Our economic policies are starting to work. Why? They are starting to work because our companies will invest in economies where there is security. They will invest where there is security.

When they look at Canada they will say: "Listen, your interest rates are the lowest they have been in 20 years. I like that. I think I will invest in Canada. Inflation is the lowest it has been in 20 or 30 years. I like that. I am going to invest." They have and it is paying dividends for us.

That is the recipe and that is the course we set out in 1984. We have applied that formula consistently in every one of these budgets from 1984 to the present day.

Mr. Keyes: It is scary.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. member opposite says: "It is scary." The only thing scary in the House is the thought of that party coming over here and governing us again.

Now that he has mentioned the word scary, I have some numbers here which are pretty scary. We always talk about the combined debt in this country and where it came from, how we arrived at this huge mountain of debt.

Mr. Keyes: Here we go, the 10-year old story.

Mr. Thompson: It is a 10-year old story and I think it has to be put on the record very clearly. I have done it on a number of occasions and I will continue to do it.

I want to mention some of the difficulties we inherited as a government. I am not going to prolong the agony. Between 1968 and 1984, and incidentally those where the years when Pierre Trudeau was the Prime Minister of Canada, he took the country from a zero deficit position to a deficit of $32 billion. When we are talking about the deficit, just to remind the folks back home, the deficit is a yearly number. That is the amount by which the Government of Canada overspends on a yearly basis. He took it from a zero position—in other words in 1967-68 it was a balanced budget—up to the point where they were borrowing $32 billion a year to pay their bills.

What is really astonishing about that is that when they left office in 1984 the gross domestic product of Canada was just slightly over $400 billion. Today it is around $700 billion. That is just an example of running up a deficit of $32 billion in 1984, and there were revenues of only $71 billion.

By way of passing, our revenues this year will be somewhere around $122 billion to $125 billion, and the economy is around $700 billion. Remarkably we have kept our deficit down to that $35 billion number.

Mr. Thorkelson: What about the debt?

Mr. Thompson: The combined debt. When any government inherits a yearly deficit of $32 billion and the government of the day in 1984 was spending $1.33 on programs for every dollar it took in the door, it is in a very difficult position with regard to cash flow.

Today we have—and I know they take a great deal of pleasure in this—a combined debt of over $400 billion in which none of us can take any pleasure because it has doubled.

Mr. Keyes: $450 billion.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. member opposite says: "$450 billion." It is not quite $450 billion. The exact number as we speak is around $416 billion. Again, it is not a number any of us can take pride in.

From 1984 to the present day the combined debt of the country has doubled. What they do not like to talk about is the stranglehold they had on the government, that is the previous government when it left office. They put us in a cash crunch situation.

The hon. member opposite chuckles. The point I would like to make is that between 1968 and 1984 the debt did not double under their government. The debt increased 10 times; it increased tenfold. We are guilty of doubling it and we accept that. However, it is the compound interest on the debt we inherited. We have not put one single nickel on to that debt load. It is all combined interest. It is the killing effect of compound interest on a debt that we inherited.

Let us go beyond that because it is an old story. Nobody wants to talk about it anymore, especially the opposition. How do we get beyond that? The minister told us yesterday to get beyond that by encouraging investment and not stifling it. We cannot stifle investment because if we do we are going to kill the economy. We must have a balance.

We on this side of the House acknowledge that we cannot do it. In other words we cannot pay off the debt simply by taxing Canadians more because there is not a single Canadian out there who is going to buy into that idea. I am one of them.

If we cannot tax the folks any more, and I think most of us would argue that we cannot, what do we do? We can do a number of things. We can encourage investment, which we are doing. We can encourage growth in the economy which is happening and that is good.

We can also reduce the cost of government and size of government. That is something we have done consistently since taking office in 1984. We have reduced the cost of government, the size of government. On every single measure in every budget that we brought into this House to do that, the opposition consistently voted against it.

What it comes down to is talking out of both sides of your mouth on any particular issue because when you are elected, you do. Your feet in a sense I suppose are held to the fire because that is the price of governing.

The price of governing is making those tough decisions. They do not make you particularly popular with the folks back home or in the polls but at the end of the day the government of the day has to make the tough decisions and we have made those, made them consistently and they are starting to pay off.

Before I sit down I want to talk about the budget and who it has impacted on in terms of the cost of doing business or the reduction in the size of government and government spending. Who has it impacted on?

I am very proud to say we did not touch any of the social programs in yesterday's announcement. The minister as he stepped through the budget papers indicated that there are going to be total savings in this package of approximately $30 billion in the next four years.

We did not touch seniors or their pensions. We did not touch any of the support payments for veterans. We did not touch any of those programs which are important to a province like my home province of New Brunswick. We did not touch transfers to the provinces. In fact the growth of the transfers, the federal dollars to the provinces is going to grow, particularly for the poorer provinces like my home province of New Brunswick.

Why is that important to me? The province of New Brunswick depends on 40 per cent of its revenues from the Government of Canada. This year that will amount to about $1.5 billion. Obviously a small province like New Brunswick cannot afford to lose $1.5 billion. The good news is that it will not. That is extremely good news for the provinces back east.

To sum up, Canadians want to see an end to the deficit and they want to see it achieved through spending cuts and growth in the economy. They do not want to see it through higher taxes.

When those folks get up across the way and pretend to be in favour of tightening up government, reducing the cost and the size of the government, listen very carefully to what they are saying. At the end of the day I am reminded by the words of the finance minister today in the House during Question Period. If we sort out everything they say it basically comes down to the same three words: spend, borrow and tax.

• (1800)

The Canadian people have had it with taxes. They have had it with borrowing and they have had it with spending.

Mr. Keyes: And with the Tories.

Mr. Thompson: I will just comment on the comments coming from across the hall.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATIONS) ACT, 1992

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Friday, April 23, 1993, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992, be read the third time and passed; and the amendment of Mr. de Jong (p. 18396).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to order adopted Thursday, April 22, 1993, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion for third reading of Bill C-93, an Act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992.

The first question is on the amendment.

Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the amendment lost.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think there has been some discussion among members of the House with regard to subsequent voting.

There may be a disposition in the House to apply the vote which has just been taken in reverse to the motion for third reading of Bill C-93, to apply the vote on the amendment of my colleague in the New Democratic Party to the report stage amendments to Bill C-109, and then to apply that in reverse to a motion to concur at report stage of Bill C-109.

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, ironically there have not been discussions, at least with me. I would like to put on the record that if there is agreement in the House to let this go through I would like it known that I will be voting yea on Bill C-93, the main bill. Then on Bill C-109 I will be voting yea for all the amendments and yea for the main motion.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I think there may have been an omission in the opposition House leader's list. Motion Nos. 4 and 7 are Liberal amendments which should be included in the package for the votes on this side of the House.

Mr. Kindy: I rise on a point of order. There is no unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan that all amendments are Liberal amendments.

Is there unanimous consent to proceed as suggested by the hon. opposition House leader?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to order made Wednesday, April 21, the next question is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, April 26, consideration of Bill C-109, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radiocommunication Act, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at report stage of Bill C-109, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radio Communication Act.

The first question is on Motion No. 1. A vote on this motion will also apply to Motions Nos. 2 and 3.

The House divided on Motion No. 1, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare Motion No. 1 lost and I therefore declare Motions Nos. 2 and 3 lost.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been further discussions and further consultations with my learned and distinguished colleagues, and you might find disposition in the House to apply the vote just taken on Motion No. 1 to Motions Nos. 4 and 7, and that same vote would apply to the motion to concur at report stage of Bill C-109.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. There have been consultations here in the power corner and there was also the mental telepathy with the opposition House leader. In this corner where there were not consultations beforehand there is agreement that the vote on the motion we just disposed of will apply to all their motions and the main motion on division.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, we are now part of the establishment. They have spoken to us today so we support the positions taken by the NDP and the Liberals.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair has received two suggestions: one from the Opposition House Leader and one from the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants.

[English]

May I suggest that it is carried?

An hon. member: Carried on division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Negatived on division on the motions and adopted on division on the main motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Agreed and so ordered.

Motions Nos. 4 and 7 negatived.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, for weeks Canadians have been led to expect a federal budget filled with significant measures to address the mounting number of casualties from the Tory voyage to the bottom of the economy.

The document received Monday will be remembered as an April fool's budget, a sad hoax with nothing new and nothing now. This budget is more a prophecy than a plan. Virtually no new measures are included for 1993-94, nor is any improvement in unemployment or the deficit promised for the coming year.

Rather than assist growth this government assumes growth and assumes that Canadians will wait until 1998 for new jobs. Each Canadian who is out of work needs a new job, not the snow job offered by this government.

Canadians are tired of a regime that finds ways to be more mean with less means.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, in the budget that was presented by the Minister of Finance on Monday there were provisions for the privatization of a number of Crown corporations and other bodies. Among these was a commitment to study the feasibility of privatizing Transport Canada's helicopter operations.

• (1405)

Transport Canada operates a fleet of 44 helicopters whose chief responsibilities are navigational aid calibration, resupply operations, aviation inspector training, ice reconnaissance and pollution control.

Many of these responsibilities of Transport Canada's helicopter fleet are critical to save marine operations off the coastlines of Canada, including the Bay of Fundy which is partially in my riding of Fundy—Royal.

I would urge the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Finance to ensure that fiscal responsibility does not take precedence over the safety of mariners because no price is too great when human lives are at risk.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the President of the Treasury Board announced the government's plans to cut at least 16,500 jobs in the federal Public Service over the next five years and to review its work force adjustment policy. These measures are an obvious attempt by the Conservatives to blame public servants for their own incompetence in managing the economy.

[English]

According to Treasury Board officials these cuts could mean a loss of $825 million to the national capital region's economy. If it is wise management the government wants, why is it not listening to the public accounts committee and the Auditor General's recommendations instead of cutting services that are provided to Canadians?

What Canada needs is not more unemployment or more people on welfare. What it needs to get the economy moving again is jobs, jobs and jobs.

S. O. 31

NATIONAL DAY OF MOURNING

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, on a sombre note I rise to pay tribute to victims of work related accidents on this National Day of Mourning.

In Canada work place fatalities and injuries cost about $9 billion each year for direct compensation to individuals, retraining and lost productivity.

No amount of dollars can replace a human life. Occupational health and safety is everyone's concern. Safety and health efforts must be both preventive and proactive.

Education and training are required to nurture the kind of awareness that will minimize work place accidents and illnesses. While governments and laws serve a useful regulatory function, it is still the workers and employers who must work together to create safe work places.

On this sombre occasion, it is not enough to mourn those who have died. We must encourage everyone, labour or management, to rededicate themselves to improved safety programs and to making safe and healthy work environments a reality.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, the bond rating agencies and the national media claim that this government has not made enough cuts.

That depends on who people are and where they live. Young people in Prince Albert—Churchill River and other far away places in this country will pay for the deficit with their futures.

Their futures depend on training, experience and research and development but my riding alone will lose over $1.5 million in training funding because of the effect of UI changes on the CJS program.

The government put control over student loans in the hands of the Royal and Commerce banks. Students who do not have a local branch or come from low-income families can go to the end of the line.

As MPs we all know the government cut the SEED program, which means fewer summer jobs. It cut funding for friendship centres which provide support for aboriginal youth. It cut federal-provincial forestry and mining agreements which are the only source of research and development in my constituency.

Shame on the government for making young people pay for the deficit with their futures, and shame on the national media for not reporting what is really going on this country.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to mention the impact of the budget on transfer payments to the provinces.

The message from the Minister of Finance is that it would be irresponsible to penalize the provinces by reducing transfer payments at a time when they already have trouble making ends meet.

In fact, our government has decided to act responsibly by urging the provinces to join us in seeking concrete solutions to the debt problem.

There is only one taxpayer, and the only way to deal with our tax problems is to cut spending on government operations, be better managers, in co-operation with the province, and reduce the tax burden on Canadian taxpayers.

[English]

We must secure the integrity of our country first.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make it clear at the outset that I speak as a private member and not as the labour critic for the Liberal Party.

We are now in the process of revamping the Canada Labour Code. Among the suggestions I make to the House is one which would affect workers when they reach the final bargaining stage of a given work conflict.

I urge the House to consider the interest of the employees in allowing the employees to have a say in their future through a vote on an offer made by the management.

• (1410)

This is a feature which is already built into the constitutions of some unions but not all of them, which means that in some cases a significant number of employees may want to vote on the offer.

This feature might be of particular benefit when work conflicts last for an inordinate length of time. It should be noted that three provincial NDP governments, in Ontario, B.C. and Saskatchewan, already have this as part of their labour laws.

EMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I would like to applaud the government of the province of Alberta for its initiatives to get people off welfare and into the labour market.

In 1990 the province began its Supports for Independence Program. The pilot projects have been a success and the minister of family and social services has announced a three-year plan to channel resources to provide support and incentive so that people on welfare complete their schooling, acquire job skills and find work.

Costs are recovered through a redistribution of welfare dollars. The focus has shifted from simply covering immediate financial needs to looking at the needs of each individual in order to get back on his or her feet.

It is a positive effort with the long-term goal of providing a path for people on welfare to a future of economic self-sufficiency. It is working because many on welfare want to be self-reliant.

This initiative is one that the federal government should encourage all provinces to follow.

THE PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my constituents have been phoning my office with a very serious question. Namely, with one million children living in poverty and 1.4 million unemployed how can the Prime Minister proceed with a $1 million farewell tour of Europe?

This leaves a bitter taste in the mouths of those who live hand to mouth, and further betrays the taxpayers who will be footing the bill for this extravaganza. These Canadians can never dream of spending thousands a night for hotel rooms for themselves and hangers-on. Many count themselves lucky to have a roof above them and a pillow on which to lay their heads.

A word of advice to this government on investing. Take the $1 million and send it to food banks like Winnipeg Harvest. For every $1 donated $20 worth of food can be gathered and distributed. Or take the money and put it into job training for the unemployed. That is investing in the future of all Canadians, not just in the future of the Prime Minister.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, those who criticize the federal government's intention to buy EH-101 helicopters never acknowledge the positive impact of this purchase.

The cost of the helicopters is projected to be $4.4 billion in 1988 dollars with a positive impact to the Canadian aviation industry in the amount of $3.2 billion. The contract would be spread out over 13 years and have a continuous benefit to all of Canada.

Recently an aerospace industry in Nova Scotia was forced to lay off workers and in its press release stated that the lay-off would not be necessary if it had the projected work from the EH-101 helicopter contract. In fact, instead of lay-offs it would be hiring more people for long-term, quality jobs.

To those who question the price of the helicopters I say that they must also consider the tremendous positive impact. To purchase a lower quality helicopter with no benefit to the Canadian industry would be worse than to buy a more expensive EH-101 when there is such a significant impact on our economy.

NATIONAL DAY OF MOURNING

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, today, April 28, is Canada's National Day of Mourning for workers killed and injured on the job. It marks the third such official memorial since my NDP colleague, the hon. member for Churchill, succeeded in persuading Parliament to officially recognize this important day of reflection and commitment.

On this day thousands of Canadian workers and others have gathered in hundreds of communities across Canada to remember the approximately 1,000 of their workmates who have died in the work place during this past year and the roughly one million who have been injured on the job.

We particularly remember the 26 miners who were killed suddenly in the Westray coal mine explosion of May 9, 1992 and the nine who died at the Giant Yellowknife mine. However, it is not enough to remember.

Let us commit ourselves to improving the safety, health and related legislation which protects those who produce and distribute our wealth.

• (1415)

In particular, I urge this government to proclaim immediately the health and safety part III of the Parliamentary Employment and Staff Relations Act which this House passed in 1986 and to enact Criminal Code amendments to protect Canadian loggers and mill workers from those who would seriously endanger their lives by the spiking of trees.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in the House on this third day of National Consumer Week to highlight the importance of consumers in our marketplace.

Under the theme "It's Everybody's Business" National Consumer Week intends to heighten public awareness of consumer and marketplace issues. Every day millions of Canadians all across the country step into the national marketplace to choose from a sophisticated array of goods and services.

Individually, consumers might feel that their purchases have little impact on the businesses that serve them and less effect on the economy. Collectively however their decisions have an enormous effect on Canada's national economy and its ability to sustain itself against increasing competition.

That is why competent, well-informed and demanding consumers are a vital link in the chain that leads to prosperity. National Consumer Week is an invitation to all Canadians to work together in order to maintain a fair and efficient marketplace.

National Consumer Week will provide Canadians with an opportunity to become better informed on marketplace issues that concern them as well as their own rights and responsibilities in the marketplace.

THE BUDGET

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

The minister has been trying to make excuses for the market's negative reaction to the incompetence and mismanagement shown by him and the Conservatives when it comes to the handling of Canada's financial affairs. Speaking about his budget he said: "I think there were hyped up expectations—I guess there is disappointment in that regard". Disappointment is an understatement.

Why is the minister blaming others for this sorry state of affairs? Did he not create these hyped up expectations himself? Why did he do this if he was not able to follow through in his budget both on the deficit and with a strategy for strong job creation and growth?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the December statement and the budget were dedicated to creating the environment for economic growth and the creation of jobs while at the same time dealing with the fiscal problems of the nation. They also set in place a process to deal with the deficit problems faced not only by the federal government but by the provincial governments as well.

If the hon. member were to recall the position of the business community on the budget back in 1985, it criticized that budget when we were going to take $13.8 billion worth of expenditure cuts over a five-year period. It found that budget to be too tough, too mean-spirited and withdrew support for it.

It is that same business community that today is saying we did not go far enough when we are providing for expenditure cuts of $30.7 billion over a five-year period.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, are we seeing the end of a love affair between the Conservatives and business?

The Minister of Finance has also been reported as excusing himself and the Conservatives for the mismanagement and incompetence I have spoken about when it comes to handling Canada's financial affairs as shown by his budget because of the leadership race and the forthcoming general election.

I ask the minister why in his budget did the political well-being of the Conservative Party turn out to be more important than the economic well-being of Canada and the need both for the right action when it came to fiscal management and a strategy for strong job creation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, clearly the well-being of Canada, Canadians and the Canadian economy was on my mind when I put this budget together. That is why, despite the resistance of the opposition who have refused to support the expenditure reduction initiatives, every single one of them since we have been in office, we continue to move forward.

The budget sets out to achieve the deficit targets for 1993-94. It provides zero growth in public expenditures. That is the lowest rate of growth in 40 years, since 1952. Program spending will come down to a 13.9 per cent share of the economy. That is the lowest in 30 years. That is a far cry from the close to 20 per cent share that was achieved during the time the hon. member was in government.

• (1420)

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the minister is proud of the targets set out in his budget, but Canadian Bond Rating Service Limited explained its decision to lower the credit rating of federal government bonds by referring to the fact that since 1988 this government had been systematically off target in meeting its deficit projections.

I therefore ask the Minister of Finance how he can challenge the agency's decision, considering certain facts that clearly demonstrate the incompetence and poor management of his Conservative government. How can he do that?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member was following market trends, it appears quite obvious that international investors have totally dismissed and disregarded the CBRS announcement because it was based on erroneous information.

Today, Moody's Investors Service issued a statement saying that it has no plans to cut Canadian debt ratings. Canada's foreign currency rating was affirmed at AAA and was reaffirmed at AAA on January 28 after a three-month review period. Standard & Poor's also says it has no plans to lower Canadian debt ratings. Of course the hon. member knows these are the most prestigious and most followed international credit advisors and credit rating agencies.

The CBRS statement can only be dismissed as being erroneous and not having much impact.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

The U.S. budget director said that NAFTA in its present form was dead in the water. However, this government is using its remaining weeks in power to try and force ratification of the NAFTA agreement as is.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: Why will the government not renegotiate an agreement that would be more in line with Canada's interests and why is it so anxious for Parliament to adopt an agreement even before it has been negotiated at the international level?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, first of all the President of the United States and the trade commissioner of the United States have rejected the comments of Mr. Panetta. As a matter of fact I was watching with great interest last night when the President commented. I think I am quoting him correctly when he said that Mr. Panetta had a bad day when he made that statement.

The President of the United States, the President and the Government of Mexico and the Prime Minister and his government in Canada are dedicated to having the free trade agreement passed to become effective on January 1, 1994 and we are proceeding in that direction.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand why the Conservative government always thinks it is better to cave in first and negotiate later which is what it is doing in this particular initiative.

I ask the minister to respond specifically to the fact that the Mack truck plant in Oakville, Ontario is being closed in a power play by the American company and the American union, even though it was the most productive of the Mack truck plants across North America.

Instead of ramming the NAFTA through Parliament why is the minister not renegotiating the deal to close the trade loophole through which the Americans right now are driving a Mack truck? What is the government afraid of?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows full well that any decision made by Mack truck has nothing to do with the free trade agreement. It has absolutely nothing to do with it whatsoever.

Companies rationalize and of course the Liberal Party in living back about 30 or 40 years does not understand that. There is a great deal of rationalization in the private sector. There is a great deal of rationalization in the public sector as well and we will see these types of things happen. We are also seeing rationalization taking place where companies are coming back and consolidating in Canada and closing down plants in the United States. It works both ways and the hon. member knows that.

• (1425)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who has accomplished the impossible. He has brought in a budget that has caused outrage in virtually every part of the Canadian economy and right across Canadian society. Even his own corporate friends have said the government has brought in an inappropriate budget.

For the first time this country's credit rating is going down. The dollar is dropping. Interest rates are going up. Will the Minister of Finance now admit, with the condemnation that his budget has received across the country, that what this government is doing is wrong and not in the best interests of the Canadian economy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who gets up and asks the question with glee had better wipe the smile off his face because what the budget has achieved is it has driven a wedge between the federal NDP and the provincial NDP.

Imagine this, Mr. Speaker: "Federal New Democrats are sharply criticizing Ontario's Bob Rae for what they call the provincial NDP government's Draconian attempts to cut the deficit. In an unprecedented break in party unity, federal NDP finance critic Steven Langdon says Rae is on the wrong track".

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to my hon. friend what a member of the House has stated about the Rae government is not supported by this federal caucus. This federal caucus is strongly behind the Rae government in its actions in Ontario.

I noticed that the minister chose—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops has the floor.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I want to go back to the Minister of Finance and point out that he refused to answer my question. I will repeat it for him. The budget that was brought in did absolutely nothing to assist those four million Canadians who are either unemployed or underemployed. Those who were calling for serious deficit and debt reduction have been ignored.

Will the Minister of Finance not acknowledge the fact that his budget, after eight and a half years, reflects the mismanagement of this particular government in dealing with the economy? Should he not do the honourable thing for Canada and Canadians and offer his resignation to the Prime Minister?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Liberals do not agree with that. However, I am sure the Liberals are as concerned as I am about what the hon. member has just done. We have now discerned more division within the NDP ranks and he has just repudiated the party's finance critic. He has literally fired him on the floor of the House of Commons. What a shameful, shameful gesture.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Some hon. members: Resign.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in the media today there was reference to the budget and this government as being a lame duck government. It is not a lame duck; it is a dead duck government and this budget reflects that.

Forget the Minister of Finance, I want to ask my friend the Prime Minister: Will he not acknowledge the fact that after eight and a half years of fiscal mismanagement, after eight and a half years of being in office, this country still has the same levels of debt and deficit and that nearly four million people are either unemployed or underemployed? Will the Prime Minister not do the right thing, send hope to the people of Canada and ask the Minister of Finance to step down from that position?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is indeed an historic day. There has been the repudiation of the finance critic of the NDP. There has been further division between the federal and provincial NDPs and now, in terms of what has just transpired, they are going to have to get rid of that national anthem of Solidarity Forever because it is gone.

I do not want to hurt Mr. Rae, but I think most members of the House would indicate that the premier of Ontario is on the right track in deficit reduction. He is trying to contain the cost of government expenditures. I regret that this finds disfavour with the federal NDP because it is the same policy that Mr. Romanow is pursuing and that Mr. Harcourt is pursuing.

The leader in this has been the Minister of Finance. I point out to my hon. friends one fact only, and they can make up their minds whether they think it is valuable. In 15 years program expenditures in Ottawa increased at a rate of 13.8 per cent a year, every single year for 15 years. In the last nine years this rate of increase has been reduced to 3.8 per cent. I think that is a remarkable tribute to this Minister of Finance as well as his predecessor.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

It is obviously very embarrassing and unfortunate for a government to have the Auditor General of Canada point a finger at it. It is unfortunate and embarrassing to see a Conservative government, especially after nine years in power, trying to hide the whole truth about the increase in the budget deficit.

In an article in today's Globe and Mail, Mr. Desautels, the Auditor General of Canada said and I quote: "This is not the first time it has happened. There is very little information in the budget explaining why we are off target by so much this year".

I therefore want to ask the Minister of Finance why he can provide no clear justification for a deficit that will be $8 billion over his own 1992 projections.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to provide that information to the Auditor General because it is public knowledge.

I outlined that in detail during the December statement. I indicated that the slippage in the deficit was caused totally by the slippage in revenues which I estimated at $8 billion at that time.

In the budget I explained a further deterioration that had occurred since that time to the tune of about $1.1 billion. It has been the slippage and the deterioration in revenues that have caused the slippage in the deficit.

That is indeed public knowledge. I would be very glad to provide it to the hon. member and certainly send it over to the Auditor General.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, for two years the Auditor General has called upon the government to publish a score-card with the budget to compare results with projections. Obviously the Tory government does not want Canadians to see the score-card of the tired old government that has lost control of the budget reins.

The Auditor General suggests that unless the government explains in detail why it so widely missed the mark on the deficit this year, last year and the year before, Canadians should be sceptical about the projections of this year's budget.

I ask the Minister of Finance: Why should Canadians believe his projections or those projections this year when he has missed the mark in the last four years?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of questions posed there and I hope I can answer them all.

First and foremost that is precisely why I made a statement in December, to lay before Parliament, indeed the public of Canada, the state of the financial affairs of the nation. I did it very openly. I did it again in the course of the budget. That information is all public knowledge.

The hon. member questions my figures. I am projecting a growth rate this year of something under 3 per cent. The IMF, in its latest forecast just issued yesterday, said that it sees Canada's growth rate for 1993 at 3.2 per cent. Next year, 1994, it says that the growth rate for Canada will be 4.4 per cent, much in line with what we are providing.

I repeat and I say to my hon. friend who has been a long-standing member of this House and has seen Liberal years and Conservative years that he will know when we assumed office in 1984 the deficit to GDP at the time was 8.7 per cent. We have cut it in half. It will be 4.5 per cent this year and going down to .9 per cent at the end of the fiscal framework presented in this budget.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the budget presented on Monday resulted in a decline in the value of the Canadian dollar, a rise in the bank rate, Canadian debt being downgraded by the CBRS and unprecedented criticism of the budgetary process by the Auditor General of Canada.

The minister's budget does not meet the expectations of two of his cabinet colleagues when it comes to deficit reduction. It is clear the international markets have declared a lack of confidence in the minister as a result of their reaction.

In light of the lack of confidence in the minister and his budget, and given that confidence in the Minister of Finance is of vital concern to all Canadians, does the minister not have to choose between presenting a new budget and offering his resignation to the Prime Minister? Which will he choose?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that yes, there have been some jitters in the exchange market that have been overcome. The market is strengthening. The dollar is going up and interest rates are moderating. The spreads are moderating.

I think the statement made by the Canadian Bond Rating Service has been largely dispelled by the action—

An hon. member: Discredited.

Mr. Mazankowski: —and, as my hon. friend said, discredited by the action of the major credit rating agencies, namely Standard & Poor's and Moody's. There are a number of other international financial organizations that have expressed similar scepticism about the rather curious action on the part of the Canadian Bond Rating Service agency.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): I should think, Mr. Speaker, that the minister would be more concerned with the judgment of the markets which have been quite clear.

I would also like to ask him about the opening premise to his budget in which he said that there were no tax increases, yet by reducing by $625 million the amount of the GST rebate payable to low income Canadians in the current fiscal year he has effectively increased the net GST return for the current fiscal year.

Why did the minister try to pass off his budget as one that did not contain tax increases when he raised this year's GST burden on the poorest Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the hon. member's first question he was criticizing me and the government for not cutting enough. Other members have been criticizing me and the government for not cutting enough. He cannot suck and blow at the same time.

The fact of the matter is that there are $3.8 billion worth of real cuts in 1993–94. There are $5.8 billion worth of real cuts in 1994–95. There are $7.9 billion worth of real cuts in the end of the fiscal framework, for a total of $30.7 billion, the largest expenditure reduction in the history of Canada.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The news out of the U.S. is that NAFTA is dead. It is not only the opinion of Mr. Panetta but the majority of Congress. Death usually brings mourning, but the Canadian people will rejoice the death of NAFTA.

President Clinton and the U.S. Congress have indicated they will only support NAFTA if the side accords have teeth. Yesterday in committee we learned that the side accords will definitely have no teeth whatsoever. The obituary will read: NAFTA is dead.

Why is this government continuing to ram NAFTA through committee and subsequently through the House of Commons?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to answer that question. The larger question though is: Where has the NDP gone? They have left the House to have a special caucus on unity and—

• (1440)

Mr. Mulroney: On behalf of the Liberals, ourselves and others, may I just express the hope that this break-up, this lovers' quarrel, can be patched up between Toronto and the federal NDP. I think we all would like to see a return of affection.

Mr. Mazankowski: They are looking for a marriage counsellor.

Mr. Mulroney: They are looking for a marriage counsellor.

Mr. Peterson: Bob White is mediating.

Mr. Mulroney: I will not touch that one, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend mentions it was indicated that NAFTA was dead in the United States, and he took some pleasure in that.

This of course has been repudiated by the President of the United States, by Speaker Thomas Foley who said the treaty will be approved, by Labour Secretary Robert Reich, by U.S. trade representative Mickey Kantor, by Senate majority leader George Mitchell and by the spokesman for the White House.

My hon. friend may have want of a different question. My hon. friend says: "Maybe Brian Mulroney is on his last legs". I will tell him I will be gone before NAFTA is.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Why don't you take it with you?

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): I am somewhat impressed, Mr. Speaker, with the Prime Minister's list but I can assure him I could provide a much longer list of congressmen opposed to NAFTA. I suspect in a vote that NAFTA will be dead.

This government strategy to ram NAFTA through is creating a legislative nightmare. Other legislation before the House will be impacted by NAFTA and will have to be changed later. Errata, which means mistakes and that is not surprising, are already being issued. Significant aspects of this bill will not be debated in the House but will be covered by regulations.

How can what amounts to an economic constitution of Canada be handled so quickly and so incompetently?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the matter is being handled carefully and thoughtfully by the government, by members of the opposition and by others in the House. It is an important question that is in the process of being debated and considered by the House, and the House will render a judgment, a yea or nay on this. That is the way democratic institutions function.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Closure.

Mr. Mulroney: Closure. That is a good suggestion. Could we consider that?

BOSNIA

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

For the last two days we have been raising questions with the minister and the Minister of National Defence about the precarious situation of our troops in Bosnia. We have been told that in fact everything is under control.

This morning we learn that French defence minister François Léotard has said this about French peacekeeping troops in Bosnia, and I would like to quote: "If questions as simple as the definition of mission, the clarity of command and the sufficient finances are not resolved, we will withdraw our troops".

Clearly the French defence minister is deeply concerned about the situation of their troops. His decision puts in real jeopardy our own peacekeeping operation in Bosnia.

I want to ask the minister: Have they had discussions with the French to discuss these concerns raised by the French defence minister? How does it impact upon the security of our own troops who are presently facing renewed fighting around Srebrenica? Is the minister finally going to do something about clarifying the role of our troops in that very difficult theatre of operations?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quoting the French minister out of context, but let me say that all of us have concerns.

There is no country which has troops in Bosnia and indeed many which do not have troops in Bosnia which is not concerned about the situation there on the ground and the kinds of actions that we can be looking at in terms of how to resolve this very difficult situation. I have never suggested that we have not had concerns.

What I have said is that by working closely with our military and all of the allies which are involved in the theatre in Bosnia, we feel that everything is being done that can be done and should be done to accomplish the mission. Our commanding officers in the field and our three officers in headquarters at the United Nations obviously reflect the realities back to us as to what they feel the situation is. We will continue to have those concerns.

If we did not feel that our Canadians could accomplish their missions, then we would raise it with the United Nations. When we have concerns, we do that and we will continue along the path we are taking now.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the minister well knows, the French have over 5,000 troops. They are the best equipped contingent within the UN arrangement in Bosnia.

If the French follow through with their threat to withdraw their troops, it puts our contingent in a very serious and very precarious situation.

It really points out the unresolved issue that we have sent troops to handle humanitarian missions. They are now being asked to protect enclaves and to protect civilians but there has been no clarity from the UN or from our government or anybody else as to exactly what the rules of engagement or the terms of that operation should be.

I want to ask the minister: Is it not time that we had a serious debate in this House of Commons about the role of our peacekeepers in Bosnia and that this government seek to ensure that if we are going to be asked to protect civilians in Bosnia that our troops are properly equipped and properly given the kind of support needed to complete that mission?

Mr. McKnight: It's an opposition day tomorrow, Lloyd.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, quite aside from the fact that tomorrow is an opposition day, and I am sure the hon. member could raise whatever he wishes to raise in this debate, I would certainly be interested in knowing from him what he thinks we should be doing.

Does he think we should withdraw the people that we have there? Does he think that we should abandon the humanitarian effort? Does he think that we should abandon the United Nations on the ground and all the people we are assisting?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): What is your position?

Mrs. McDougall: I have made my position and the position of the government very clear in terms of our troops both in Srebrenica and in other parts of Bosnia.

As the hon. member knows, I am hoping to go there next week. I will meet with our people on the ground. In the meantime we have excellent communications with our people there. We will continue to take their advice and to work closely with our allies.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Minister of National Defence acknowledged on Monday that there is a concern over secrecy and that the public has a right to be informed about the difficult events in Somalia.

On the other hand, the minister set up a behind closed doors inquiry whose report she can censor and continues to refuse to answer very specific questions about what she knew, when she knew it and what she did about it.

My question to the Prime Minister is this. If the government is so concerned about not prejudicing the investigation which will take place, why will the Minister of National Defence not have an open public inquiry that will review the situation of our troops in Somalia and also review very carefully the role of the Minister of National Defence?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as the minister said on several occasions and indeed as the Judge Advocate General has indicated, it would be most inappropriate to go into the details of the case while the investigation is going on. The hon. member knows that. He knows that details cannot be discussed.

In terms of the inquiry, the inquiry was announced by the minister on Monday. The mandate of that organization and the people will be announced by the chief of defence staff this afternoon at 3.30 p.m. There will be civilian individuals on it. Obviously the inquiry has to be in camera because the kind of information adduced could be prejudicial to the investigations under way and make it impossible for justice to occur.

The intent of the government is to seek the truth and not to ascribe motive or lay blame. It is absolutely false of the hon. member to claim that the Minister of National Defence will censor the report before it is released.

• (1450)

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows very well that there are many unanswered questions still to be discussed and answers to be provided.

For instance, why did the senior military commander in Somalia try to conceal one of the four deaths as the minister claimed? Why was the minister not told it was a homicide for two weeks, so the minister claims?

Now General MacKenzie, a retired general of the Armed Forces, said: "I am very concerned for the morale of our troops in Somalia".

Mr. McKnight: And he said the Liberals and the NDP are causing the downfall of the morale.

Mr. Dingwall: The inquiry announced by the minister of defence is being held from the point of view of a person who had to find some way to deflect or to delay.

My question to the government House leader is why is the government trying to whitewash this matter? Why not have an open public inquiry and give everyone an opportunity to participate?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, again the hon. member has made false statements.

He indicated that the minister of defence did not know about the situation and did not take the appropriate action. That is false. The situation was brought to her attention immediately and an investigation was done as per the regime in the military.

That led to the requirement to send out an investigating team from Ottawa. That investigation is under way. Again I repeat, I wish the hon. member would have respect for our legal system and recognize that the kind of thing he is asking for would be prejudicial to the individuals involved.

In terms of former General MacKenzie's comments, what he was saying, the kinds of questions asked in this House by the Liberals and NDP have been damaging to the reputation of the Armed Forces. That is precisely what he has been saying.

What we seek through this board of inquiry is an independent board with civilians on it who can look into the situation, report back in a relatively short timeframe. In the meantime, I wish hon. members of the opposition would show respect for the men and women in the Canadian Armed Forces who are doing outstanding work in Somalia and other places around the world.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming—French River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Last Friday, central Timiskaming was dealt a major blow with the provincial government cancelling 200 job relocations by the ministry of natural resources. There was the closing down of the agriculture college involving 50 jobs.

The area is now facing 35 per cent unemployment. Over the past 20 years, 127 townships have been under a land caution with no development. Both the Ontario and the Supreme Courts have ruled but the province insists that the federal government should be at the table for negotiating settlements.

Can the minister tell my constituents if the province is correct that the federal government should be at the table?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I wrote last week to the minister of native affairs for the province of Ontario and Chief Potts of the Teme-Augama Anishnabai band arising out of the finding of the Supreme Court of Canada in 1991 that the treaty rights of the Teme-Augama Anishnabai had been adequately dealt with by way of the Robinson-Huron treaty which was signed over a century ago and that any further disputes between the province of Ontario and the Teme-Augama Anishnabai could be dealt with by the negotiation of a treaty between those two parties and that the federal government would deal with any outstanding claims against us through our specific claims policy.

Those negotiations should proceed between the two other parties.

OZONE LAYER

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of the Environment.

Canadians are extremely worried about the disappearing ozone layer. There are record high levels of ozone depletion. It is 24 per cent over Ottawa today.

I ask the person speaking for the Minister of the Environment how much money this government has allocated to research the impacts and adaptation to ultraviolet B radiation.

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in the House on Friday there are a number of initiatives that this government has taken with respect to the ozone layer.

That is not only in ensuring that Canadians are aware of the changes that potentially could impact on them but on the broader research side and in the leadership position with the Montreal protocol dealing with ozone.

Our continuing efforts to work collaboratively with the provinces is not only to get rid of the existing substances which cause the depletion of the ozone layer but also to ensure that we are not adding to that.

This is an ongoing activity under our green plan with a number of departments in the provinces and we, indeed, intend to meet our targets and in fact hopefully even better them.

• (1455)

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): My supplementary is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I ask the same question I asked this time last year.

Right now tens of thousands of Canadians are developing skin cancer and cataracts because of exposure to cancer-causing ultraviolet radiation. I ask the minister again this year if he will finally introduce legislation to rate and test UV protection of both sunscreens and sunglasses.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the member knows that the Minister of the Environment in collaboration with the Department of National Health and Welfare made a declaration last year and strengthened the sun exposure regulations.

In terms of the legislation we are still working with the Department of the Environment and when there is reason to believe that the legislation is necessary we will pass the legislation. So far the Minister of the Environment has worked in a way that we believe it should work in terms of the necessity at the time and that which we still have.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works and it is my standard question about the fixed link.

The fixed link remains a key to transportation and development in Atlantic Canada. I see where the public works department has begun public hearings for the second time. Could the minister outline the future of the fixed link and if it is approved by the panel when can construction begin?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to respond to my colleague on this very important private sector initiative.

Public Works Canada is presently conducting a section 12 determination pursuant to the recent Federal Court decision. Public meetings to give residents on both sides of the strait an opportunity to become familiar with this specific environmental evaluation documentation and provide their comments will be ample. These comments will be taken into consideration when the section 12 decision is made.

In addition and according to the environmental assessment review guidelines order, public works will continue to invite comments on the section 12 decision.

The premier of Prince Edward Island and I have had recent discussions and we can count on her co-operation on the constitutional issues.

I am surprised to hear my colleague from the Annapolis Valley who was part of this House and who can attest from long experience what is required to help the region and to help transportation and economic development take such a short-sighted and counter-productive view of this important project.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, in last year's budget this government projected an unemployment rate of 9.5 per cent. Now it is projecting an unemployment rate of 11.1 per cent for this year. Clearly the economy is getting worse.

The absence of an economic plan in this budget clearly reveals that this government is exhausted, lacks ideas, and the political will to bring about positive change in Canada.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. When will the minister realize that his stay the course, do-nothing approach has devastated the lives of millions of Canadians? When will this minister change the course?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, once again may I simply point out to the hon. member that based upon the latest IMF forecast we are projecting Canada to have the fastest growth in the G-7 countries at 3.2 per cent this year and 4.4 per cent next year.

I remind the hon. member that there were 200,000 new full-time jobs created since last August, 48,000 jobs created last month. We are expecting 300,000 new jobs created from the fourth quarter of 1992 to the fourth quarter of 1993 and over 400,000 jobs in the next year.

We expect to bring unemployment down to 7.5 per cent by the end of the fiscal framework.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, for nine years this government has asked Canadians to sacrifice themselves to build a strong economy for future generations.

This do-nothing budget however gives no hope to the over 420,000 young people who are presently unemployed and the hundreds of thousands of students who will be looking for summer employment.

Why has this government turned its back on Canadian youth?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that since we have come to office Canada has had the second best rate of growth in the G-7 and the best rate of job creation of all the G-7 countries.

• (1500)

The February 1992 budget, the December statement and this budget provide the basis and foundation for long-term sustained growth and price stability, job creation and a growing economy and at the same time contain the deficit.

Yesterday they were raising Cain with me because the budget was cutting too much and was not satisfying the needs of the big business community. Today they are taking a different approach and I can only concur with the findings—

Mr. Speaker: We must push on. The hon. member for Willowdale.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the finance minister's prognostications, we know how wrong his forecasting has been in the past.

The legacy of this government as it leaves office is a $30 billion high-tech trade deficit, a fall from fourth to eleventh place in our ability to compete, 16 per cent of our manufacturing jobs lost in the last four years and 11 per cent unemployment, the highest in the G-7. This is the Tory economic legacy.

Why did the government not use last Monday's budget, its last chance, to introduce a comprehensive economic strategy, a means to get rid of the deindustrialization of Canada and get Canadians back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I disagree fundamentally with the hon. member. He knows that we have had the second best productivity rate in the G-7. That is showing up in our ability to compete and our ability to achieve exports and that does create jobs. Our exports to the United States have increased by over 21 per cent which is the highest in history.

Here is the legacy: Let us look at Canada's industrial production over the last three months compared to other countries and I know the hon. member will really take this into consideration. This shows the trend. Canada's industrial production is growing at the rate of 4.3 per cent, the U.S. at 4.1 per cent, Japan at minus 5.3 per cent, Germany at minus 11.2 per cent, France at minus 3.7 per cent, U.K. at 1.7 per cent, and Italy at minus 2.9 per cent. I can say that I am proud of that legacy.

TRANSPORT SAFETY BOARD

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2) and on behalf of the President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada it is a pleasure to table, in both official languages, the annual report of the Transportation Safety Board of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1993.

Pursuant to Standing Order 32(5), this report is deemed permanently referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT RETIRING ALLOWANCES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-425, an act to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, this bill is one in which there is some duplication with some other bills of members on the whole question that irritates the public more than any other one thing about members of Parliament both in the national House and in many provincial houses. It concerns our pensions.

This bill would amend the pensions act to make sure the vesting no longer occurs after six years but at 60 years of age, six years is rather obscene, and eliminate the double-dipping provisions of members obtaining a pension and a government pay cheque in other forms. This is also very irresponsible.

I think, knowing full well that this bill may not pass before this House is dissolved, that more members who can focus attention on this will have to be accountable with the electorate in the election and make sure that in the new House this bill can be revived and changed in conformity to the public interest in something that is so sensitive and so wrong at the present time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Nowlan moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION AND HEALTH CONTRIBUTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-426, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-secondary Education and Health Contributions Act.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to ensure that there is a standard school leaving age across Canada and the federal money that is contributed to the provinces for post-secondary education is used solely for that purpose.

The reason for this is because a lot of the money that the federal government gives to the provinces for education is not being used by the provinces for education but for something else.

As well, the standard school leaving age across Canada varies from one province to the next. Therefore this bill will have a uniform standard school leaving age. It will also ensure that money given to the provinces for education is used for education.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Harb moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

Routine Proceedings

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-427, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (public safety occupations).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, this bill would permit registration of the pension plan allowing nurses early retirement on the same basis as is currently permitted for public safety employees. Early retirement would be available as early as age 55, for 25 years' service, a combination of age and service totalling 75 or total and permanent disability.

Currently the early retirement rights of public safety employees are governed by the income tax regulations and cover fire-fighters, police officers, corrections officers, air traffic controllers and commercial airline pilots.

• (1510)

This bill places the right to early retirement in the Income Tax Act and adds nurses. The amendment would be effective for 1993. It seems to me that the demands being made on nurses in today's society warrant such consideration. Income security is important, not only to them but to all Canadians and we have the responsibility to provide it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Duhamel moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

CONCURRENCE IN 83RD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, you will recall that the week before the Easter recess of the House, I had the pleasure, on behalf of the Committee on House Management, to table the 83rd report of the Committee on House Management, which deals with parliamentary reform.

The time has come, after consultation with the other parties, for concurrence in this report.

[English]

Today I would like to move that the House of Commons concur in the 83rd report of the House Management committee, a report dealing with parliamentary reform.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I just want to understand this correctly.

The parliamentary secretary made reference to the 83rd report but I believe it has to do with the broadcasting of various standing committees of the House of Commons. I do not believe it refers to the subject matter of parliamentary reform which is for another document.

If I am in error I hope the parliamentary secretary will correct me. If I am not in error I hope he will do the honourable thing.

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, I am sorry, the 83rd report of the House Management committee deals with broadcasting.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent to present the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL CARE

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, this petition is signed by many of the senior citizens who live in my riding of Ottawa Centre.

They call on Parliament to take all the necessary measures to enshrine in the Constitution the obligation of the government to provide universal, publicly-funded hospital and medicare to all citizens.

TRADE

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by several residents of the province of Alberta, most of whom reside in Edmonton.

They argue that the current Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement sharply reduces the power of all Canadian governments to develop the Canadian economy. They argue that more than 400,000 Canadian manufacturing jobs have been lost since the FTA became law in 1989 and that if implemented the North American free trade agreement will cause even more Canadian jobs to be lost.

They call on the House to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and recommend to the government that it use the FTA's termination clause to end the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of many Canadians who call on Parliament to amend the Canada Labour Code to prohibit the use of replacement workers by employers during a strike or lockout in federal jurisdictions.

SERIAL KILLER BOARD GAME

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition from 27 very conscientious and serious citizens of my hometown of Wolfville, Nova Scotia in regard to outlawing the serial killer board game which I know has come up in this House before.

Quite frankly I think it is appropriate because of the repugnance of this game to read the first whereas of this petition. The petition reads: Whereas the parents and grandparents seek a ban of a new game to be introduced in Canada called the serial killer board game; whereas this game comes with a body bag, 25 babies and four serial killer figures, the object of which is to commit murder and the person with the highest body count being the winner. The petitioners further state that this game is not in the best interest of children and in the wrong hands could become dangerous and they suggest it could easily impress young people.

Therefore my petitioners humbly pray, as I think all members in this House agree, that this type of obscenity should not be allowed in Canada. I hope the government continues to proceed to ban it.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the privilege of presenting to Parliament the signatures of hundreds of Greek Canadian citizens from my riding.

The petition states that the Government of Canada has decided to amend the Canadian war veterans act so that effective March 2, 1992 persons are no longer eligible for benefits under the war veterans allowance program based on resistance service only.

Therefore the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to accept legislation designed to rescind the above mentioned amendment in order to stop the discrimination between Canadian veterans of the resistance movements and veterans of the formal military capacity since all were fighters against the enemy of Canada, stop the discrimination between Canadian citizens who should all have equal rights in terms of where they live and receive their rightful benefits and deal in a humane manner with senior citizens who after many years of work and service to Canada are now forced to again move back under often very difficult conditions.

TRADE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from constituents in the Wynyard—Quill Lake area who point out that if the North American free trade agreement is put in place the agreement will cause Canadians to lose more good jobs. They point out that it places restrictions on the ability of future federal, provincial and territorial governments to assist Canadian industry, conserve natural resources for Canadian benefit, and advance needed social programs.

They therefore call upon the House to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and to recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I have two sets of petitions. Over 2,000 people signed the first one which recognizes that treaty rights entitle Indians to preserve their traditional way of life, including hunting, fishing and gathering, but express concern that completely unregulated hunting interferes with good conservation and sound wildlife management.

They call upon the government to conclude an agreement with Canada's treaty Indians regarding sound wildlife management, including a restriction on native rights to hunt, fish and gather for personal consumption needs and a prohibition on the sale for profit of wildlife meat or parts obtained by treaty rights.

SEXUALITY INFORMATION RESOURCE CLEARING HOUSE

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition signed by a number of people from central Alberta who are expressing their concern that Planned Parenthood is asking for government funding for a project known as sexuality information resource clearing house, the funds for which would come from the tax money of the citizens of Canada.

They are expressing concern that this is an unnecessary duplication of services already provided, and call upon Parliament to withhold all financial support for the Planned Parenthood project.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I would like to table a petition from the golden age club of Dubuisson in Abitibi, which says that violent movies on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable, because they incite more violence.

The petition says that all toys which incite violent games are unacceptable and should not be made. Also, freedom of the press in reporting acts of violence should be limited and information on violent acts which is repeated too often on all television networks and on radio can incite others to commit the same acts of violence.

Therefore these petitioners humbly ask Parliament to legislate on the above points, in order to eliminate violence in our society so as to better protect our children and give all our fellow citizens a better quality of life.

[English]

CANADA POST

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present additional petitions from residents living on Bloor Street, High Park Avenue, Pacific, Quebec Avenue, Oakmount, Mountview, Pinecrest, Glenlake, Gothic, Glenavon and other nearby streets who state that they are very satisfied with the service and location of sub–post office No. 166 located in the High Park Pharmacy.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon this Parliament to urge the government to keep post office No. 166 located in the High Park Pharmacy operating in its present location and with its present service.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 with 20,000 signatures which is part of a total of 50,000 in memory of all children who have suffered at the hands of others.

We have formed this petition to stress our beliefs that the penalties in respect to child molesters and child murderers are far too lenient in this country. We strongly request that this petition be heard as a people's vote to reinstate capital punishment for child murderers and to stiffen penalties for child molesters.

If we do not protect our children from the people who commit these heinous crimes, who will? Your petitioners call upon Parliament to enact legislation against these types of offenders. I support this type of petition.

SENIORS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition. The signers of this petition say that pension indexing in no way meets the financial needs of seniors.

They also point out that general indexing, even with the supplement, is insufficient. The petitioners mention as well that poverty is increasing rapidly among the elderly, many of whom live at or below the poverty line. In closing, they add that these seniors are experiencing serious income problems.

[English]

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I have another petition from people in Manitoba.

The petitioners ask Parliament to ensure that appropriate language is used on radio and television. They also condemn violence that is used on radio and television. They point out that violence is not necessary to inform or entertain in English, French or any other language. They say it goes against some of the principles they use to raise their families.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 320 and 448.

[Text]

Question No. 320—Mr. Gardiner:

With respect to the television ads relating to the report of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, (a) which department or agency assumed the costs (b) what were the costs of production and placement (c) what persons or companies received contracts for these ads and what were the dates and amounts of these contracts?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): The television ads for the special joint committee are budgeted for under the Department of Supply and Services Canada. This was done on behalf of the cabinet committee on communications in support of communications requirements of the Federal-Provincial Relations Office. Advertising expenditures were $3,335,869.18 and the advertising firm was Publitel.

Due to the time of year, the contract was divided over two fiscal years: 1991-92, $970,582.00; 1992-93, $2,365,287.18

Question No. 448—Mr. Manley:

For 1991 and 1992, how much has the federal government spent on city core revitalization and how were these funds allocated?

Hon. Elmer MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Public Works Canada (PWC) manages a number of properties located in city core areas. Those buildings, as they grow older, often require important renovations in order to respect increasingly stringent health and safety standards. Such renovations do not show up in the numbers related to city core revitalization projects.

Public Works Canada manages a major capital project program under parliamentary vote 15—real property program capital expenditures.

This vote involves the construction of new federal buildings and the renovation or redevelopment of existing federal buildings. Some of these projects are located in city core areas. The Pacific-Western regions of PWC had three such projects and there were two in the Quebec region, as follows:

Victoria—Custom House (816 Government Street)—Renovations

This project, at a total cost of $4.4 million, involved the conversion of a portion of the lower two floors from government office space to commercial retail and the installation of a new heritage exterior facade on the 1957 addition. The project was undertaken on the urging of the city of Victoria and the downtown business community to contribute to the revitalization of Government Street and the inner harbour/Empress Hotel/provincial legislative precinct. The project was substantially complete in the spring of 1992 with capital expenditures of $2.5 million in 1991-92 fiscal year.

Whitehorse—"Elijah Smith" Federal Building (308 Main Street)—Redevelopment

This $24.7 million project involved the phased demolition of the old federal building and the construction of a new Government of Canada office building. The Elijah Smith building is a four-storey, 9,500 rentable square metre office building occupying an entire city block on Main Street. The project was substantially complete in the spring of 1992 with capital expenditures of $10.8 million in 1991-92 fiscal year.

Winnipeg—MacDonald Building (344 Edmonton Street)—Renovations

This project, at a cost of approximately $6 million, involved a major upgrading of all floors of the building to give it an economic life of 25 years. The project was completed in 1992 with capital expenditures of $2 million in 1991-92 fiscal year.

Chicoutimi—Old Port of Chicoutimi

1991—$186,850—fitting up of cycling track, surveys and other legal conveyancing documents, soil decontamination, river bank management

1992—$97,959—fitting up of cycling track, surveys and other legal conveyancing documents, soil decontamination, river bank management

Trois-Rivières—Old Port of Trois-Rivières

1991—$369,265—reimbursement to the city for operating and maintenance costs for the previous calendar year

1992—$424,576—reimbursement to the city for operating and maintenance costs for the previous calendar year

The following two projects were carried out under parliamentary vote 20—crown corporations program:

Montréal—Old Port of Montréal

1990/91—$14,363,000—operating and capital expenses

1991/92—$42,232,612—operating and capital expenses

1992/93—$13,457,000—operating and capital expenses (Apr.—Dec.)

Toronto—Harbourfront

1990/91—$3,648,932—operating and capital expenses

1990/91—$3,700,000—loans to cover capital asset expenses

(Apr.—Dec.)

Toronto Harbourfront was the only project done in conjunction with a city/region.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Tuesday, April 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and the amendment of Mr. Gray (Windsor West) (p.18487); and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Langdon (p.18534).

Madam Deputy Speaker: When the House rose yesterday, there were two minutes left for the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte. After that we will proceed with questions and comments.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I will continue where I left off yesterday and will conclude by saying that the Canadian economy is moving along well.

It is probably not moving as fast as we would like but as I indicated yesterday, most economic think tanks and the International Monetary Fund have predicted that Canada's economy will outpace those of all other industrialized countries in the next couple of years.

There are a number of reasons for that and not just the major ones that were introduced two days ago by the Minister of Finance. It simply builds upon the consistent sound fundamental management of the economy by the government since 1984.

It also builds upon our economic statement last December in this House. As evidence of that we have had a tremendous turnaround in the economy. In fact as the minister noted in the House today, 200,000 jobs have been created in Canada since August of last year and 48,000 new jobs were created last month alone.

In addition to that, we can go back to the heart of many of these budgets introduced. In fact 148,000 Canadians took advantage of the housing program announced a year ago regarding the use of RRSP contributions toward the construction of a new home. That is one indication of what we have done on this side of the House in recent months. There is the reduction in personal income tax and changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act.

Those things are all adding to the base that we set in 1984. I am quite proud of that record. I will entertain questions and comments from the other side of the House.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, once again I find myself having a difference with the member for Carleton—Charlotte. This has been a repeated exercise over many months. I must tell him that I have a lot of respect for the member when he talks about this approach to the fundamentals being in place. I understand where he is coming from. I recognize the lower interest rates and I recognize practically no inflation in this country. However, in our communities now because of this obsession with zero inflation we have between the welfare rolls and the unemployment rolls well over three million people out of work.

We agreed on both sides of the House in the last four months that the key to creating new jobs really did lie with the small business sector. All parties put the Small Businesses Loans Act through the House. I am sure that Canadians have heard more about the Small Businesses Loans Act in the last 90 days than they had in the previous 15 years.

The problem I have with the government on the Small Businesses Loans Act is that it is not honouring the commitment it made in this House just two months ago. The Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism stood up in this House and said that he was going to have a promotional package so that the small business community would be aware that this particular instrument was out there for small businesses to use. That has not happened.

I know that Scotiabank has taken out some ads in the paper and I commend Scotiabank for that. I commend the Bank of Montreal for coming in at one point under prime for loans under $100,000.

Does the member not really believe that this recovery cannot happen unless the banks are aggressively promoting and utilizing the Small Businesses Loans Act? If the member does believe that is necessary then what will he and his government do to make sure that happens?

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, there is no question that small business is the backbone of the Canadian economy. That is where most jobs occur. The biggest single employer is the small business sector.

We have done many things on this side of the House as a government and with the support of some members opposite in that regard. Of course, the changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act to which the member refers is an example of that.

I did in fact put that question to the minister responsible for small businesses, as the member acknowledges, not too long ago in this House because that has always been a concern of mine. We do what is necessary in this House but we expect co-operation from those lending institutions outside of this House to really make it happen on the street. I acknowledge that that has not happened in previous years up until these changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act.

There are provisions within the Small Businesses Loans Act that make it more lucrative for the banks to become involved with small business. There is an indication that is happening but rest assured—and I will say this to the member from Broadview—Greenwood as well—I will continue to press the minister to make sure it does happen.

I know the Minister of Finance was a small business owner at one time and is very sensitive in this regard. I am going to continue to hold the banks' feet to the fire and make sure it does respond to legislation brought into this House because it is very important.

• (1530)

There are many small businesses out there that are cash starved. They are not asking government to do anything for them. They are simply asking the banks to respond in a positive way and I hope they will. Rest assured I am going to do my best to make sure they do.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I want to ask my colleague two questions.

He indicated there has been some management on the part of the government and the basics are in place. How can he say that, and I do not say it unkindly, when right now well over 1.6 million Canadians are without work and 2.7 million Canadians are receiving social assistance? Over two million Canadians will be fed at food banks, the deficit is well in excess of $30 billion and the debt has surpassed $450 billion when it was less than $200 billion when this government came into power.

My province of Manitoba has taken five major hits. Regional development has been cut and there have been cuts to VIA Rail and CBC again and again. Mining and forestry agreements are no longer going to be in operation. There will be jobs lost in all of these areas.

How can people have hope? How can people from Manitoba and other regions think that this particular budget will help sustain what we have now and make it grow? I just do not see it.

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, I hope I have time for my response.

There is no question, as I mentioned yesterday in my speech, that 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed. None of us can take any satisfaction from that no matter which side of the House we sit on.

The point is that the Canadian economy is moving in the right direction. As evidence of that let us take a look at some of the numbers. I quoted the numbers in regard to the IMF and the predicted growth within the Canadian economy, sustained growth over the last number of years and the projections they are putting forward for next year and the year after. That is all encouraging but I go back to some of the numbers on which we can hang our hats.

For example our exports last year were at an all-time record high of $157 billion. What does that do? It translates into jobs. As I articulated earlier, 200,000 jobs have been created since last August and 48,000 jobs were created last month alone. That is an improvement. The difficulty is that when the economy is moving along the impact of the growth will not be felt this afternoon or next week. It takes time.

Obviously the fundamentals have to be put in place so that movement continues and we have done that. I think we have to emphasize that because all of us would like to pick up the magic wand, wave it and cause unemployment to cease but that is not the way it is.

I go back to the heart of the matter. The fundamentals are in place and I think that is what the member has to take a very hard look at.

With regard to the situation in Manitoba and all the provinces, the transfers to the provinces, particularly the poorer provinces and we include Manitoba in that, have not been touched. For example the transfers to the province of Manitoba and my own home province of New Brunswick have not been touched and they will actually increase beyond increases in other sectors.

In fact the finance minister in the province of New Brunswick was very positive in his response to the budget introduced two days ago.

• (1535)

He said: "Listen, how can I criticize the federal government because we do have a cash crunch in this country. We do have some problems but the transfers to our province of New Brunswick are increasing as they will to Manitoba". We recognize that those provinces depend on those transfer dollars.

We are being criticized in some quarters for not having cut back on those transfer dollars but coming from one of the poorer provinces, I would say the government did the right thing in that regard.

For example, the province of New Brunswick depends on direct cash transfers from the Government of Canada for 40 per cent of its revenues. Those have been left intact and this year will amount to approximately $1.5 billion. The government can take some encouragement from that.

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, I want to say a few words about this non-event that is called the budget.

I have seen a number of budgets in my day in the House of Commons and I cannot recall a budget that has been such a non-event, non-existent one composed of smoke and mirrors as the budget we have before us today.

There is scarcely a budget in this country either federally or provincially that does not have a tax change, that does not have a program change, that does not have some new initiative. Yet we have a budget here that accomplishes basically very little.

It is really a continuation of the same statement we had last year in the December economic statement. Of course, as a result of the budget, nobody is happy.

I am not happy because it does not tackle the big problem of job creation in this country. It also makes things more difficult for the farmers in the prairies, particularly in Saskatchewan. Even the friends of the government are not happy. The business community and the investment community are not happy with the government.

A bond rating company in Montreal lowered the credit rating of the Government of Canada yesterday from an AAA rating to an AA rating. I think that may be the lowest credit rating the federal government has had in history. An AA rating is very low for the federal government of this country.

The Canadian dollar went down as a result of that. The minister across the way knows that the Canadian dollar value went down. Yesterday the Bank of Canada boosted the central bank rate significantly to try to prop up the Canadian dollar. We have already had short-term immediate consequences of this budget presented by the government across the way.

There is no vision in the budget. There is no plan. There is no direction as to where this government wants to go. Despite nine years in office, 11 per cent of the Canadian people are unemployed. Another huge percentage is on welfare, working part-time, has dropped out or is underemployed.

The Canadian Council of Bishops said two weeks ago that over three million Canadians are either unemployed or underemployed in this country. What a shame for the wealthiest country in the industrialized world to have such human waste and human devastation.

We have had nine long lean years of the Conservative Party and yet 11 per cent of our people are unemployed and over one million people are on welfare.

Let me talk about the deficit. That is like putting the skunk in the hen house. The Conservative Party talks about the deficit but what has happened to the deficit in this country? This year it is still going to be over $32 billion. Last year it was about $35 billion. In 1984 when this Prime Minister came to office the debt was about $160 billion. This year it is going to be $458 billion.

It has gone from $160 billion to $458 billion and that comes from a Conservative Party that says: "Look, keep electing us and we will control the debt and the deficit in this country". Now the leadership candidates, in particular the Minister of the Environment and the former Minister of Justice, are going around this country saying: "Look, we have some ideas on how to control the deficit and eliminate it in three years".

That is like the chicken voting for Colonel Sanders. If they have these ideas about how to get rid of the debt and the deficit, why did they not say something when they were sitting in the cabinet for the last five years to eight years? They are misleading the people of this country as the Conservative Party has historically done. The Conservative Party has destroyed this country economically. It has driven people on to the unemployment rolls by driving up the interest rates. It brought in a GST which slowed down the Canadian economy, strangled small business and made more paper work and more bureaucracy for the small business community. It brought in a trade deal with the United States that has given away our sovereignty and that is now resulting in hundreds of thousands of people losing their jobs in Ontario in particular. This loss is not temporary like in the last recession but it is permanent this time.

• (1540)

Mr. Heap: Two-thirds of them.

Mr. Nystrom: Those jobs are moving south of the border to the United States and more recently they are starting to move south of that border into Mexico.

As my friend who is the member for Trinity—Spadina in Toronto says, about two-thirds of those lost jobs are lost permanently in the province of Ontario. It is because the government has given away too much. It has given away the store and destroyed this country. It has destroyed this country economically and is destroying many of the other institutions that we have in this country as well.

An hon. member: It calls it economic management.

Mr. Nystrom: It gave cutbacks to CBC, VIA Rail, and the post office system. There is the destruction of rural post offices. In fact even in my small city of Yorkton with about 18,000 people, by no means a small town or a village, we lost our post office two years ago because of this government.

The government is destroying the very institutions of this country that bind us together east and west with the trade deal with the United States. Now of course we have NAFTA, which is the North American free trade agreement with Mexico and the United States.

Even the President of the United States is not happy with NAFTA. He wants to negotiate side agreements and parallel agreements. Yet we have a government now that is trying to force NAFTA through the House of Commons, dissolve this country even more in terms of north and south and to play the tune once again of large multinational corporations.

That is not good enough. Regardless of who wins the Conservative Party leadership in about six weeks, the Canadian people will know that a Conservative is a Conservative is a Conservative and this is the kind of economic policy that has been set by this government for the last nine years.

In this budget, even though it did not change very much, there were a few changes that are going to hurt ordinary people. The GST for example now has a tax credit that is paid out to the poorest Canadians four times a year. I know people in my riding who get that cheque every three months. So what is this government going to do? Instead of paying it out every four months, it is now going to pay it out every six months to the poor people. This will make it more difficult for the poor to provide for the needs of their children: food, shelter, clothing and their own lives. By doing that the government is going to save $7.5 million.

If the Prime Minister would cancel his fancy farewell tour to Europe we would probably save about $1 million. That would be more significant than stopping the payment of those cheques every three months to the poor people so that they have some money on a regular basis to feed their families.

It is $7.5 million a year. That is important but in the over-all budget it is a very small drop in the puddle. It is a very small drop and it helps ordinary people when they need it the most. These ordinary people are going to spend that money right away. They are going to pay some of it back in taxes. They are going to stimulate the economy by buying goods and services.

Second, another change in the budget, perhaps most significant of all, is the change to the Crow benefit for prairie farmers. I think that is probably one of the only, if not the only, announcement of a legislative initiative in the budget. Look at page 53. The government says that it is going to cut back the Crow benefit by another 10 per cent. The Crow benefit was an agreement signed by the federal government to last in perpetuity to provide $720 million a year for the farmers to pay the railways to subsidize the movement of grain.

A year ago the federal government decided to cut it back by 10 per cent, some $72 million, unilaterally. That is not co-operative federalism. That is not going out and saying to the provinces and the farmers of this country: "We want your input and involvement before we make an important decision". That is the Minister of Finance reaching into farmers' pockets in my riding and in ridings across the prairies and taking out $72 million.

Now the government is saying that in the next fiscal year it is going to increase it. It is not just a 10 per cent cutback but a 15 per cent cutback. The year after that there will be a 20 per cent cutback and that will go on in perpetuity. A 20 per cent cutback is over $140 million a year. This is unless the federal government negotiates an agreement with the provinces and the farmers to change the method of payment from the railways to the farmers. If the money goes directly to the farmers then there goes the grain subsidy. There goes some orderly transportation in this country.

The wheat pools in the prairies have said to keep the money going to the railways. The National Farmers' Union has said the same thing. The Saskatchewan government has said the same thing. The people of my province have said the same thing. Yet the government across the way wants to change the method of payment to satisfy some of their wealthy friends, particularly the large grain growers of southern Alberta and the cattle producers of the prairies.

That is nothing short of blackmail by the federal government and nothing short of a bribe. It is saying to the prairie farmers that if they do not agree to the change in the method of payment then another 10 per cent will be cut off the Crow benefit and they will lose another $72 million a year.

That is not good enough at all. We want to build a strong country and create jobs for our farmers and our people right across the country.

There is a third part that I want to mention about the budget in terms of some of the changes that are not really seen as that significant overall but in terms of people who are affected directly this is extremely important in addition to the GST and the Crow benefit. It is the announcement of further cutbacks in regional development.

My guess by looking at page 53 of the budget is that the cutback in regional development is going to amount to approximately $500 million a year. Maybe we should cut back on some things. We have a deficit problem. Why not cut back on military helicopters and save $5.8 billion rather than cut regional development in New Brunswick and Saskatchewan and northern Quebec and save—

Mr. O'Kurley: That is over 14 years. What are you talking about?

Mr. Nystrom: I did not say for a year for military helicopters. Please listen.

Why not cut back by $5.8 billion on military helicopters instead of cutting back by $500 million per year on regional development? If one comes from Atlantic Canada, northern Quebec, northern Ontario, parts of the prairies or B.C. one realizes how important it is to have money going into regional development.

The unemployment rate in Newfoundland and New Brunswick is criminally high. Yet the government is now saying we should take $500 million a year out of regional development so it can spend that money on military helicopters that we do not need.

It is a question of priorities. Sure we have a fiscal problem and a deficit. We have a debt that is the highest of the G–7 nations. It is a matter of priorities. Take the money away from military helicopters. Bring in a fair tax system so the rich pay their fair share and so corporations pay their fair share. Plug some of the loopholes in the tax system. Get rid of capital gains exemption of $100,000 except for farmers and people with their principal homes. It will then raise more money and there will be more revenue for people to spend. If we have more revenue we will tackle the debt problem. If we have more revenue we will save our social programs.

Finally the most important thing of all is a jobs plan. We are one of the few countries in the world that does not have a jobs plan. If one looks at Europe, Japan and the new administration in the United States they are talking about how to put people back to work and how to create more wealth and how to actually get people producing something and paying taxes for the benefit of the country and society.

The only way to reduce the debt in a real and meaningful way is to create jobs so that people are off welfare and unemployment insurance and are contributing taxes to the government of Canada and taxes to the provinces.

If we put another half a million people to work the debt will go down. We will have more cash for the social programs and the other programs that are so desperately needed.

Our party said about two months ago that we had a plan and strategy for full employment. It was announced by our leader. It is a plan that would see our country investing more money in research and development. We are among the worst in the industrialized world in terms of the mere pittance we put into research and development today. We are also among the worst in terms of the money we spend in training our workers for the new challenges that lie ahead.

There are a lot of areas in this country where we could be investing money in terms of infrastructure. There are a number of things we could also be doing well, things that are natural for our country to do well if we spent more money on them.

We could be investing in things like transportation, communications, agriculture, mining, forestry, resources of that sort and investing more in the environment, an issue that is becoming more and more important every day. We could put more money into social housing, co-op housing and things of that sort. These are things that should be done but are not done by the government across the way.

If we are to solve the debt problem, if we are to get rid of some of the human misery we see today, we are going to have to put every single ounce of our energy into a national job strategy that involves not just the federal government but the provinces and the territories, the trade unions, the farm sector and the private business sector as well.

There should be an assault on unemployment and poverty like the assault we had during the Second World War. If we were able to mobilize our resources for combat in the First World War, the Second World War or other wars throughout history, surely to goodness we can mobilize this country's resources to fight unemployment and put people back to work. This would give them some dignity and pride in their own lives and help them make a contribution to their own economy.

I do not have too many more minutes left but before I finish I would like to say that Saskatchewan is a prime example of what Conservatives have done to this country in the last eight or nine years. We are a province that is now losing people. We now have the highest unemployment we have ever had in the history of our province. It is up about 8 per cent or 9 per cent. We are a province in which more and more people are on welfare. More and more people are dropping out. They are disillusioned. We are a province now that is losing farmer after farmer each and every single day. We are losing our small towns and villages.

Despite that the federal government in the last few years has been cutting back every year, except this year, on transfers to the provinces in terms of health, education and equalization. It has cut back on the increase. It has cut back in my province by some $500 million over what it would have been if the formulas had not changed. These are the changes in the formula for equalization and the changes in the formula for transfers under the fiscal arrangements we have in this country.

We now have a province that is worse off than it was in the 1930s. For nine years we also had a Conservative government with Grant Devine as premier. The province when he took over in 1982 had a debt of some $3.5 billion. Nine years later, our debt is now about $15 billion, the highest per capita debt anywhere in this country, including Newfoundland and Labrador. Nine long, lean years of Conservative government and the debt goes from $3.5 billion to some $14 billion in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. O'Kurley: That's just not true. Talk about the operating surplus.

Mr. Nystrom: I invite the noisy member from the Conservative Party across the way to come to Saskatchewan and make some of those comments. He would be driven out of town.

We are now in a position where because of Conservative governments hospitals are being closed down, rural communities are being destroyed, the province is on the brink of bankruptcy. That is the Conservative legacy. A Conservative legacy is one where there is no vision, where there is no dream about what this country could be.

We need a change in this country. We need a change badly. We need a government that will put jobs first, a government that will put people first. We need a government that will rescind the trade deal to regain some of our sovereignty we have lost because of the free trade agreement with the United States. We need a government that will get rid of the GST and bring in a fair tax system based on the ability to pay.

These are things the Conservative Party has done to destroy this country. Another four years of the Conservative Party and I fear for the future of Canada.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, it is quite amusing to listen to a member of the New Democratic Party speak of the difficulties in Saskatchewan.

Those members forget that their own party formed the Government of Saskatchewan. Who do you blame? When he is laying blame and pointing fingers in Saskatchewan I think he has to point fingers at his own party and his own premier. But let me take him up on some of the other points in his speech.

• (1555)

One of the things he mentioned was that this country would be a lot better off in terms of debt if we had half a million more people working. Well, if he would just watch the Canadian economy grow and if he looked at the statistics which are there for everyone to see, he would be quite pleased. Since August we have created 200,000 full-time jobs and last month alone there were 48,000 new jobs in Canada. So with that kind of a track record he will not have to wait too long to see an extra 500,000 people employed in Canada.

Sorting through what he has said and one must examine it very carefully, for example, the free trade agreement with the United States of America. In the last year alone for our trade component we have had $157 billion in exports, 80 per cent of which were exported to the United States. That is the largest total in the history of Canada. It is working very much in our favour.

If we want to see the Canadian economy grow, let us continue with what we are doing. Let us not throw out some of the policies that are working. We can always come under scrutiny on anything we do as a government, but examine the facts and examine them very carefully. Do not forget who is the premier of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Nystrom: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased that my friend across the way said not to forget who is the premier of Saskatchewan. The premier is Roy Romanow. He took over from Grant Devine, who in nine years drove the debt in our province up from $3.5 billion to $15 billion. That is without precedent anywhere in this country, including during the 1930s and the Great Depression. Nowhere in this country on a per capita basis, perhaps nowhere in North America, has a debt gone up as quickly as it did in Saskatchewan during the Conservative years of Grant Devine.

After 17 months of government Premier Roy Romanow has cut our deficit in half and he has done that without the help of the federal government. He has done that despite the fact that the rate of increase in transfers to the province has gone down, which has cost us over $500 million in the last year. He has done that despite the fact that the federal government across the way has promised time and time again a third line of defence to help prairie farmers, but yet has reneged on that promise, so that money is not there and many farmers are living in poverty.

No, I have not forgotten who is the premier of Saskatchewan. The premier of Saskatchewan is cleaning up the mess the Conservative Party left our province in over the last nine years, as had to be done a number of years ago after the 1930s. I say to my friend across the way that when the debt goes from $3.5 billion to $15 billion in nine years something is seriously wrong.

The people in my province will not vote Conservative again for at least another generation because of the legacy Grant Devine has left behind. There is no party in this House that has less credibility in the debt issue in Canada than the Conservative Party sitting across the way.

In the 1930s it was Prime Minister Bennett, a Conservative prime minister, who brought us the Great Depression and brought us debts right across this country. In the 1980s it was Prime Minister Brian Mulroney and Premier Grant Devine who did the same thing in this country and in my province. The people of my province will not forget.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I appreciated listening to the comments of the member for Yorkton—Melville. He speaks very passionately about the province he represents, Saskatchewan, a province where we farmed for 22 years. We had to leave our family farm because it could not support a family of eight.

My son did the opposite. He got married and moved to Saskatoon, had a job, bought a home, had two children, and now finds himself unemployed. He is looking for another province to move to. When the hon. member says that Saskatchewan is a good example of what this government has done to this country, I know exactly what he is talking about.

He also mentioned that his party had an excellent jobs plan, as to how we can put people back to work. I am very interested in that. I think all Canadians are. The hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte keeps tossing out the figures of 200,000 jobs created since last August, 48,000 jobs over the year, et cetera. But he does not say what the net gain is in job creation. Big deal: if 200,000 jobs are created but 300,000 jobs lost, what has been accomplished? We are in a losing mode.

• (1600)

I know the premier of Saskatchewan and the premier of Ontario are trying to create jobs. We heard in Question Period today that the finance critic of the New Democratic Party is disagreeing with the approach taken by the premier of Ontario.

I am wondering in fairness, and I ask this question very seriously, whether he supports the approach the premier of Ontario is taking or does he support the finance critic and the approach his finance critic is taking?

Mr. Nystrom: Madam Speaker, the finance critic of our party speaks for himself and only for himself. He does not speak for our party caucus on this particular issue.

Premier Rae in Ontario is doing what he can do in a very difficult situation. He is in a situation now where if nothing was done the deficit of that province would be $17 billion. Premier Rae is now in the process of consulting public service unions which is the proper thing to do.

I am glad the member raised this point. There will certainly be difficulties in the province of Ontario when a lot of things have to be done that are not very easy and not very comfortable. At least in Ontario he is consulting the trade unions and the public sector trade unions in the province.

In Manitoba with Conservative Premier Gary Filmon there was no consultation whatsoever with the public sector when he decided to dock the public servants several days of work. In the province of Manitoba the workers are going to lose. There will be about 10 or 12 days without pay. It is a unilateral decision by the Conservative Party that the workers will have to take time off without pay in Manitoba.

They did not consult the public sector unions. They did not negotiate with them. They did not do anything at all with them in terms of a consultative process. All of a sudden they just announced it: "You take days off without pay".

That is not the way to run a country. At least in Ontario Bob Rae is sitting down with members of the public sector, negotiating with them and talking with them about the very serious problem facing the province of Ontario. He is doing the right thing. In principle I believe he is doing the right thing. I cannot comment on all the details in Ontario as I am not familiar with them.

I know in my own province of Saskatchewan that the premier has done a commendable job in a very difficult situation. The people of our province are behind the premier in terms of trying to get control of the economy once again. If we do not get control of our own economy, it is going to be run by the bankers and the international investment traders and we are going to have even less flexibility in terms of protecting our social programs and doing what we should be doing as Canadians.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, when our colleagues from the government side talk about the jobs that are created it seems to me they forget to talk about the jobs that have been eliminated. When they talk about job creation they forget to talk about the kinds of jobs. Are they long-term jobs? Are they well paying jobs? Are they part-time jobs that lead to nowhere.

I wonder if my colleague would care to share with us his insights on that particular point.

Mr. Nystrom: Madam Speaker, no government in the history of this country has lost as many jobs as the Conservative government across the way. There has been a tremendous job loss in this country since 1984, despite the fact that we had some pretty good economic times in the mid-1980s.

A lot of the jobs that are now being created are low paying part-time jobs. They are not unionized. There is no job security. There are no benefits for the workers. They are the lowest of the low in terms of jobs and in terms of providing some money for the worker and her family or the worker and his family.

We need an all-out attack on unemployment and on poverty. We need more money put into research and development, more money into training, and more strategic investment in the things we can do well as Canadians. Other countries around the world are doing it and there is no reason we cannot as well.

[Translation]

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, there are times when circumstances dictate a change in course for the ship of state. That is what we had to do in 1984. At that time, as everyone will remember, we were headed straight for the rocks.

At other times the course is maintained because only some minor adjustments are needed to continue to make progress. No one should be surprised that my colleague, the Minister of Finance, did exactly that in the budget which he tabled on Monday and which I support without reservation.

• (1605)

In the past eight years, our government did the right thing at the right time for our economic strength. We should not be surprised that not everyone was pleased with this. Some think that the budget should have provided more drastic spending reductions. Others think that their favourite program should have received more funding from the government or that we should have adopted the solution that they advocate.

The money market had certain expectations and some credit rating agencies had others.

[English]

Some wanted short-term solutions to immediate problems and others wanted nothing that was not directed to long-term gains. In each case it was the task of the Minister of Finance to find the balance and do the right thing for Canadians, and that is exactly what he did.

All the comments we have heard about last wills and testaments and the labelling of existing programs as instant job creation projects is the height of irresponsibility. It is easy to become a 10-second hero by delivering clever second guesses with the principal objective of getting attention from the camera and headline writers. Perhaps some people are impressed with those who complain of government spending in one breath and who present a long wish list for spending increases in the next.

It is like St. Augustine's famous prayer: "Lord give me chastity but not just yet". Those would-be finance ministers from whom we have heard need to understand that countries are strengthened by serious reflection and wisdom, not by loose tongues craving quick attention.

Fortunately the Minister of Finance has met the expectations of most Canadians by placing before the House a budget that is realistic, responsible, coherent, achievable and right on course.

I believe that Canadians got what they learned to expect from this government: effective policies and long-term strategies that attack problems at their roots in order to find lasting solutions.

All Canadians agree that governments at all levels must get their finances in order. Canadians therefore recognize that the Minister of Finance has presented them with a budget that will maintain the same direction for five more years, so that Canada will be quite ready for the next millennium, the 21st century.

In his December economic statement the Minister of Finance emphasized the importance this government attaches to reducing the deficit so that we can attain our objective, which is to lay the foundation for lasting economic growth. Canadians want an end to the deficit and the debt which are irresponsibly mortgaging our grandchildren's right to decide their own future for themselves. They want the deficit to be reduced the right way, by reducing spending not raising taxes. That is what the Minister of Finance did. They want public spending to be restricted, but not so much that the government can no longer do its job. That is why this government has increased the efficiency of the Civil Service since 1984.

In real terms—and very few Canadians, even in this House, seem to realize it—the cost of administering the federal government is less today than it was eight years ago, although our population has grown by 10 per cent.

It is thanks to this kind of management that we can cut more than $30 billion over the next five years in this budget and overspending will not endanger the country's future prosperity. Of course the budget must be seen in the light of the many other long-term initiatives taken by the government because they are all part of a complete mutually supporting package of measures to put Canada's economy in order.

The people opposite seem to tamper with the truth about the economy. I will remind them that our ability to maintain social programs, establish environmental enterprises, be responsible members of the international community and maintain prosperity depends on a solid economic base. If this base is neglected, as they always tend to do in their simplistic, one-dimensional, magical proposals then none of these important objectives will be achieved.

Remember that since 1988 every budget cutting measure that we presented in this House was opposed by the opposition members of all parties. How can they get up with a straight face today and criticize the government which is trying to get public spending under control by presenting a proposal that will nearly eliminate the deficit in five years?

[English]

I resent some of the comments we hear. They talk about the unemployed. I feel deep compassion in my heart for people who are jobless. There is a recipe to help those people.

Mr. Kilgour: Oh, sure, we know all about your compassion. Tell us about your compassion.

Mr. Mills: You support the banks and the way they treat small businesses.

Mr. Valcourt: These people argue that it is by throwing more money at them. They would increase taxes. They would throw more money at them. They did that for a long while. They had 16 years of doing that. Program spending increased at the rate of 13.8 per cent a year on average. That is their record. That is their legacy. They have not changed. The proof they have not changed is that they have opposed every measure to cut expenditures in the country.

An hon. member: Like hell.

Mr. Valcourt: They have opposed them.

Mr. Harvard: What a disgusting performance.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I beg the hon. member's pardon. This was an unwarranted comment. It is the duty of the Chair to be able to hear what someone who has the floor says. When there is screaming in the House of Commons—

An hon. member: So was he.

Madam Deputy Speaker: —that would not be proper even in a back alley. It is totally inappropriate.

An hon. member: It is frustrating.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Yes, I can understand that it is frustrating for everyone on all sides of the House, but screaming is certainly not warranted at this time. The comment made by the hon. member from Edmonton was certainly not warranted either.

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Speaker, I was trying to say that as a government we did not choose to accept the suggestions of the opposition to inject additional new funds or to worsen the deficit. We definitely did not choose that route proposed by the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party.

They may have succumbed to the temptation in past election years but we took the responsible course of action. It is my firm belief and that of my colleagues in this party, along with many Canadians, that creating jobs is the task of the private sector. No amount of government spending of tax dollars will equal the drive and productivity of small business in creating jobs.

We did what governments should do. We have created an environment conducive to job creation by reducing the deficit. This means less borrowing, lower interest rates and lower taxes. These are all conditions that stimulate economic activity leading to more important, satisfying jobs.

In my own area of responsibility we have taken the initiative to use unemployment insurance to provide new opportunities for workers. Understanding that we find ourselves facing relentless and strong competition in the changing, knowledge-based global economy we have moved to increase work force skills so that in the years ahead Canadians can enjoy long-term rewarding employment which contributes to the prosperity of Canada.

These are times in which we simultaneously see unemployment of workers in older sectors while employers in the new sectors complain they cannot find enough workers with the necessary skills. That is the reality out there. We hear that every day.

We have shifted funds from their traditional passive use as temporary income support to active measures which will make future income support less necessary. Based on recommendations of the Canadian Labour Force Development Board we have invested $2.21 billion to help over half a million unemployment insurance recipients to renovate their job skills for the labour market of tomorrow.

That is a 19 per cent increase over the 1992 expenditure and a 400 per cent increase over the 1990 expenditure. We have increased to $110 million funds for the self-employment assistance option which helps qualified workers to become entrepreneurs running their own businesses.

For those UI recipients who wish to arrange for their own training support will be increased to $455 million this year.

[Translation]

As Minister of Employment and Immigration, as I was just saying, I know how tragic unemployment is. I am aware of the suffering the unemployed go through. Imagine a man, woman or a young person anywhere in the country who wants to work and is looking for a job and is qualified to hold a job but unfortunately, due to weak market conditions, is unable to get work. The measure announced in December pays special attention to these experienced workers who for years contributed to Canada's prosperity but suddenly lost their jobs as a result of technological change.

Some skilled people held the same job for 15 or 20 years but suddenly lost it because of technological change and then they do not have the skills needed for other work. We have allocated $300 million to help these people acquire the skills that will again enable them to be productive workers. In all, we have directed $3.8 billion to labour market programs that will affect more than a million workers. Canadians will appreciate that we are working on this with other interested parties. Federal government funding has acted as a catalyst to provide the appropriate infrastructure for employers, labour, community groups and provincial governments to implement economic initiatives commensurate with their own requirements.

Pooling all sectoral resources is the only way to proceed if we want to create a society in which all Canadians will have a chance to succeed, at any stage in their lives.

I have said repeatedly that we are investing in mechanisms to help workers quickly get back on their feet and develop their full potential. We do not want to provide lifetime safety nets that keep people in a state of dependency and make them lose all initiative. That was the result of the policies developed in the 1960s and 1970s.

We want to use our social programs to help people who have found effective solutions, who make the right choices and who are promising. I have to analyse this budget from the perspective of my department, but also from the perspective of the Atlantic region which I represent in Parliament.

In fact I can assure the House the Atlantic region has not been overlooked in this budget because in the past we in the Atlantic region have been through some difficult times, and we have always come out on top.

People in the Atlantic region have always been willing to shoulder their fair share of the burden and to adapt their expectations and institutions to meet new challenges. We knew that in the end we would be better prepared to meet the challenges of the future.

This year the federal government will spend $5.2 billion in the Atlantic region, or $2,250 per capita. I submit that the decision to exempt these transfer payments from spending cuts reflects the federal government's understanding of the fiscal problems in the Atlantic provinces due to the recession and economic restructuring.

Transfer payments to the provinces will continue to increase at a rate of 4 per cent annually, although all other government spending will be capped at 1.5 per cent, which is below the rate of inflation.

[English]

While this budget's proposals on the deficit are alone enough to earn its commendation it goes much further. It goes much further in advancing the government's long-term agenda. The finance minister has set a goal of zero cash requirements by 1997-98, at which time net new federal borrowing will be eliminated completely.

That is the way it was in Canada during our lifetimes before we got blown away by thinking that there is no day of reckoning. Once we have put ourselves back on course the government can then begin to pay down the debt which continues to sap our reserves.

Inflation has been beaten back. Interest rates are at a 20-year low. Exports are surging, as my colleague from Carleton—Charlotte pointed out earlier. Business has become increasingly competitive in Canada. Small businesses are doing much better. In both new and old marketplaces trade agreements are opening up more markets for quality Canadian goods and services.

For the first time in decades Canadians can now clearly see the solid foundation which we have been building and on which we all can successfully compete in a very different world than the one which existed before this restructuring started.

In this and other ways this government has not shirked from any opportunity to make positive adjustments to help Canada confront these new global realities.

We know some people in this country want to wish away the challenges but that is not what we have done. The issues that everyone else has been afraid to touch were put at the top of the public agenda by this government rather than hiding them away as others have done for fear of controversy.

• (1625)

We did not shy away from attacking the underlying causes of problems, even at the price of popularity as measured by fickle will-o'-the-wisp polls. We had faith that over the long run Canadian men and women would see that we have done the right thing. The budget the finance minister has tabled before this House is in that category of principled action.

[Translation]

I agree, there is not much to rejoice about in the budget. There may be nothing to rejoice about, but there is no reason for despair either. It is a firm budget. It is a realistic budget that indicate we have a long way to go. It makes no unreasonable demands but continues to deal gradually with the consequences of past excesses. It reflects the fact that Canadians understand there is no easy, quick solution to our problems, although there are still politicians proposing the so-called quick fix. This budget states the facts clearly and honestly.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I do not believe for one second that the Minister of Employment and Immigration is happy presiding over this nation's current condition of unemployment. Under his reign we have the highest rate of unemployment in the history of Canada. We have over three million people now looking for work in this country.

Whether it is 3.1 million or 3.2 million the bottom line is that we have a crisis of unemployment in this country. I believe the hon. minister wants to fix this problem as much as any other member in this House. He must want to fix it.

However I believe there is a very important point that the government is missing. As Liberals we stood up in this House of Commons over the last three months and supported the government's initiative called the Small Businesses Loans Act. We supported it, we did not criticize it. We worked together and came up with amendments. Last year I think it cost the Treasury $29 million from the float in write-offs to small businesses but if we take into account the benefits in employment measures it cannot be criticized. It is a good piece of legislation.

The problem is that the financial institutions of Canada, the banks, the credit unions and others that could be eligible to lend money under the Small Businesses Loans Act are not making that act work. So when we come to the floor of this House of Commons and try to bring attention to this problem but do not seem to get any reaction we get terribly frustrated.

My question to the minister is a very simple one: Is he satisfied with the way the financial institutions of this country, the banks and the credit unions, are treating small business? Is that why we hear nothing from the government in terms of chastising, pushing or motivating banks? Is he satisfied? If he is satisfied that is fine. It is a simple yes and I will sit down.

However if he is not satisfied, could he commit on behalf of his government, the small business community and the unemployed that he will take a message to the cabinet of Canada, the Prime Minister of Canada and the Minister of Finance and say: let us do something to move the financial institutions of this country to honour an act of Parliament that was passed by all parties in this House?

• (1630)

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Speaker, I do not know if this has ever occurred to the member concerning these financial institutions and banks but it is Canadians' savings that these financial institutions and banks are using to lend to small businesses. Maybe if they did not have such a good lender in the federal government there would be more money available for small businesses. I am talking about interest rates here.

How can the hon. member stand up in this House and complain? I know the member and I think he is a good member for a Liberal. He is concerned about his concitoyens in this country and small business. He cares about the economic prospects of his constituents and other Canadians just as I do.

He must accept the fact that we have to pay for this deficit because we pay interest on that debt. We know what the impact of this is on interest rates. One does not have to be a rocket scientist to figure it out. If all the money required to finance government activities is used to pay interest on the deficit then it leaves much less in the coffer for those institutions to lend to the private sector and to small businesses and it drives the cost up.

We need a Small Businesses Loans Act to create incentives for those institutions to help the private sector and the small businesses grow.

How can they on the one hand want to have that capital accessible to the private sector and small business and at the same time in a consistent way oppose every measure proposed by this government to try to reduce and eliminate this deficit? How can they do that? How can they argue that we should have such an economic climate because he may want to rely on the Small Businesses Loans Act. I cannot wait for the day when we do not need the Small Businesses Loans Act and when the private sector and market forces will allow a business person in Canada with a good idea and product to go to the private sector market—a bank or financial institution—to get his or her loan. It makes sense to go ahead and succeed. That is what I would want.

However, before we get there we are going to have to pay our way as Canadians and that means we must stop borrowing to do everything we do every day.

We are now borrowing to pay the interest on the debt. When one gets to that point one has a serious problem. Now the Minister of Finance has put in the window a fiscal framework that sees Canada without a borrowing requirement of .9 per cent by the end of this fiscal framework.

I think if we want to help small business then it is by what the Minister of Finance has shown us.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I suggest the minister change his speech writers. I suggest that the minister should come to my Toronto riding and walk with me to visit the seniors, the unemployed and the small businesses. Then he will write his speeches himself rather than come into this House and read what some bureaucrat has written for him.

He talks about how this government increased efficiency. Just last week my office was flooded with calls from seniors who are receiving Old Age Security, government income supplements and other assistance from the government. They were calling my office because they cannot get through to the government number. I had my staff in Ottawa and in Toronto phone this same number. It took over 100 calls to get through to this number. This is what this government calls efficiency. It is cutting back on the Public Service for the sake of efficiency and that is frustrating people out there. People are having mental breakdowns because of this government.

I called the number myself and finally got through. After listening to nine minutes of beautiful music I got to the right person. I investigated the problem. The problem is that this one telephone serves the catchment area of greater Toronto, Oakville, and a WATS line to Peterborough. It is a catchment area of four million people under one number. This is the government that preaches efficiency. He wonders why there are frustrations out there, why people want to commit suicide and why people are having mental breakdowns. I urge the minister to come out to my riding. I will show him what the efficiency of this government has done.

• (1635)

The minister mentioned employers who cannot find workers with appropriate skills. I would like the minister to table the employers who are looking for workers today so all members can have it. Yesterday I had appointments all day in my office and I was talking to people who are unemployed, exhausting their UI and do not want to go on welfare. They are frustrated.

In the Parkdale CEC, if someone wants to phone in and have an appointment for retraining it takes six months before he or she gets an appointment. That efficiency means six months for an appointment. I would like to hear the minister's response.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is one minute left.

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Speaker, If I have only one minute left then I will use the minute to point to all Canadians. It is too bad they are not all listening to that kind of statement because that is only proving one thing. The Liberal Party has not changed.

Mr. Mills: Point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am not deaf. The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood on a point of order.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I apologize for raising my voice. I rise on a point of order and in the interest of trying to communicate our message. I share every syllable that the member for Parkdale—High Park has just uttered in terms of what is happening in the greater Toronto area.

Maybe in the interest of being constructive and looking out for those people we could get unanimous consent to extend the minister's time in answering questions seeing as we have him here.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there consent to add to the period of questions and comments with the minister?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is agreed for an extra five minutes. The hon. minister.

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Speaker, I was trying to make a point. In a serious debate about the economic future and the budget the hon. member stands up and talks about a phone line in his riding. I am not diminishing the importance for seniors accessing a phone line to get some information from the Government of Canada. I guess the way he put it was as if we had a really long cabinet session. You should have been there, Madam Speaker. The cabinet sat there. We spent almost two hours trying to decide whether it would be one line or two in that part of Ontario.

They are trivializing the debate by not pointing to the fundamentals of the economy.

Mr. Mills: I cannot believe it.

Mr. Valcourt: This is about trying to set the fiscal framework and the finances of the taxpayers of Canada on a course where Canadian taxpayers are going to get value for their money from government services.

Ms. Blondin-Andrew: Why did you not do it when you took over in 1984?

Mr. Mills: Talk about your tax increases.

Mr. Valcourt: The people who are yelling are the Liberals who were spending $1.23 out of every dollar that Canadian taxpayers were sending to Ottawa when we took office in 1984.

Mr. Kilgour: What is it now?

Mr. Valcourt: For every Canadian taxpayer who sends a dollar to Ottawa this government does not spend $1.23. It spends $0.96 for program spending.

• (1640)

Look at those Grits, those Liberals. They have the gall to stand up in this House and tell Canadians how offended they are that this government has doubled the national debt in eight years.

Mr. Kilgour: It has more than doubled.

Mr. Valcourt: Is that not terrible? We doubled the debt in eight years.

What those members do not add is that they took a debt and increased it 11 times in 16 years. That is what they did. Now today, they do not even have the honesty to tell Canadians: "Listen, take the debt that the Conservative Party inherited in 1984 and look at the compound interest on that debt. The total compounded interest is larger than what the debt was in 1984".

Mr. Keyes: How much short-term money did you borrow abroad?

Mr. Valcourt: That is the reality. Today they stand in this House and complain.

Mr. Flis: Madam Speaker, I have a point of order. In all honesty I ask the minister if he could table the list of employers who claim they cannot find workers. This would be such a great help to the 1.5 million people unemployed. Please, Mr. Minister.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member who is an experienced member knows that this is not a point of order. We are getting back into debate.

There is a minute and a half left for the hon. minister.

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Speaker, we were talking about the importance of this budget in the future.

The hon. member wants to talk about unemployed people. He is arguing that there are no jobs out there. It is true that we have a high rate of unemployment.

Mr. Flis: Would you table the employers?

Mr. Valcourt: No, I do not have a list of private sector people who are looking for people for jobs.

An hon. member: You said you did.

Mr. Valcourt: The hon. member could talk to small business people right in this city—

Mr. Flis: I do every day.

Mr. Valcourt: I met a small businessman last night in Ottawa who is looking to hire four persons. He is looking. Out of respect for the individual, who does not want his name made public, I will keep his name private but I will give it to the member, so that he can send those poor unemployed people who want to work right there.

Mr. Kilgour: One and a half million.

Mr. Valcourt: It is all right to try to score political points on the misery of people. However, what we are proposing to Canadians is not magic or an instant solution as with the Liberals where they spend more of the taxpayers' money and increase the deficit. Tax people. That is their way.

This is what we believe. To really help Canadians one must have the fundamentals right and in place. That is what we have been striving to do. Canada is poised for recovery like never before.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to join in this very quiet debate this afternoon. There is a friendly discussion going on.

I rise today to make a few comments about this budget that I feel is a terrible effort at financial management by this government. This is another long string of inept fiscal and other measures that have been pushed upon Canadians by this present government. It is a measure of ineptitude which fortunately we will soon have an opportunity to change.

We have endured incredible hype about this budget in the past number of weeks as story after story circulated about the Draconian cuts that would be coming. Of course it is the classic manoeuvre of governments in the pre-election period to heighten the worst expectations and then try to show the voters what good people you really are.

In this case the government has not succeeded. The people have not been fooled and they will soon be able to pass judgment upon this government.

• (1645)

Thankfully, this is the last budget this government will bring down. It makes this an opportune time to review the government's record with regard to its fiscal management and forecasting ability.

This government has paid lip service to the concept of deficit reduction ever since it was elected. What we have seen, however, is not debt reduction but a massive increase in the public debt which now stands at record levels.

The promises of this government have never been matched by performance and we have no reason to believe its forecasting ability is going to improve at this late date.

The present finance minister missed on his projections not by thousands, not by millions, but by billions of dollars. There has been a mistake of $1.1 billion since December. He now tells us that the deficit in the coming year will be $35.5 billion. How do we know if this is correct? What is there in the government or the minister's track record that could possibly inspire any confidence?

Let us examine how we have arrived at where we are today. Jobs, jobs, jobs was the cry of the present Prime Minister before he was first elected. Jobs as a result of free trade was the promise in 1988. Deficit reduction was a priority throughout the past nine years. We now have the sad spectacle of the Minister of Finance of a government that made jobs, jobs, jobs its rallying cry standing before this House and saying, in effect, that an unemployment rate of 10 per cent is quite acceptable and will continue in double digits into the foreseeable future.

What does the future hold? I believe the government does not know. It does know how to attack hard-working Canadians and has gone out of its way to create a two-class system in this country: the rich and the poor. Sadly enough, during these past nine years the government has put middle-class Canada in a vice and slowly tightened the grip, forcing a wedge between the haves and the have-nots. This action is reprehensible and the government will feel the result of it in the near future.

Since the day it was elected this government has applied a double standard to the governing of this country. The Prime Minister at the outset appointed a huge cabinet to make sure as many MPs as possible shared in the spoils of victory. He appointed extra senators to impose an unpopular tax on Canadians and raised the art of patronage appointments to a new high.

On the other hand this government provoked a bitter strike with some of its lowest paid workers and now attempts to justify further slash and burn tactics by blaming government employees and programs for its financial ineptitude. The fact is that the economy has shrunk because of the government's mismanagement and therefore the deficit continues to grow.

To me, this is a government at war with itself. It is still talking and acting as if it was an opposition party. The Conservatives have been in power for almost nine years. It is their policies that have failed this country. It is their policies that have prolonged the recession so it now rivals the Great Depression of the 1930s. They must take the blame.

There are now food banks in every major city in Canada, more Canadians are living below the poverty line than ever before and the government has stood idly by and watched this happen. The institutions which have bound this country together have been destroyed and what was once an open and generous society has been threatened.

The government has also turned on the poorer regions of this country and is, in essence, cutting them off. It was noted in this House yesterday that the VIA Rail cuts will soon mean that only the corridor from Quebec City to Windsor will be serviced by passenger trains.

This is only a surface symptom of what is happening. Can you imagine how the people in my region where unemployment reaches 20 per cent feel when they hear that regional and industrial development will be cut and funding through ACOA will be cut by 25 per cent over the next few years?

We have just lived through this government's mismanagement of the fisheries and its total failure to act on behalf of the Canadian potato producers during the devastating PVY-N crisis and now we are told that more cuts are coming.

My province of Prince Edward Island will be the first affected by cutting the forestry agreement.

• (1650)

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I wish to apologize to the hon. member for Hillsborough.

I would like to formally designate Thursday, April 29 as the second allotted day for this supply period.

Mr. Proud: Madam Speaker, as I stated, my province of Prince Edward Island is the first that will be affected by the cutting of the forestry agreement. A one-year extension of the current federal-provincial forestry agreement which expired March 31 has gone up in smoke.

If I might for a moment quote Prince Edward Island's minister of agriculture, Walter Bradley, he said:

> This announcement was completely unexpected, officials of both levels of government were in the process of finalizing priorities on a work plan for the coming year.

He went on to say that the non-renewal of the agreement will cost 250 direct jobs. He further stated:

> The unilateral announcement by the federal government will impose serious hardship on wood lot owners, sawmill operators, and silviculture workers, not to mention the economic and environmental impact on the province.

These figures may not seem big to a government which is oriented toward big business and multinational corporations but they are significant numbers in a small province like mine. This government still has not learned after nine years in office that it is there to serve all Canadians of all social and economic levels and not just the big interests and the stronger members of our Canadian family.

It is interesting to note that despite the fact the government feels it has to close down a large segment of the forestry industry in Prince Edward Island it has chosen to leave the golden helicopter deal intact in an obvious ploy to help the leadership aspirations of the Minister of National Defence. We may not be able to afford pilots but we will have the choicest helicopters that money can buy.

The minister may have thought he was delivering a message of hope when he read his budget speech. What he did say was that he hopes things will get better. There is a distinct difference. He presented a budget that he said would restore confidence in Canada. Instead, the dollar has dropped even more as his friends in the financial markets have passed harsh judgment on his performance and that of his government.

This is a pre-election budget with no clear direction and no blueprint for the future. Our young people are facing another summer with few employment prospects. There is no job creation program for youth or for those millions of other Canadians who are out of work.

There is no clear plan to improve Canada's infrastructure. There is a lot of the minister's hope that things will get better and his wish that the economy will improve. He dreams that private businesses, at least those that have not moved, will be able to turn the economy around. Obviously he has given up trying himself.

The people of Canada will soon have the opportunity to pass judgment on this budget and on the nine years of this government's rule. They will remember nine years of a government saying one thing and doing another. This government talks of restraint and deficit reduction yet the deficit has increased beyond our wildest fears. It talked of jobs, jobs, jobs, yet joblessness is at an all-time high.

It talked of tax reform yet the goods and services tax has failed to make even a dent in the deficit, while at the same time causing Canadians undue hardship every day.

The government has managed the economy of this country with ineptitude and incompetence. It is my hope that when it is gone others will be able to pick up the pieces and return Canada to some of the glory it has seen in the past.

The fortunate thing about this budget is that people will not have time to forget it before they go to the polls. The government's fear of the electorate has forced it into a corner and it must face the judgment of Canadians soon.

I believe that judgment will be harsh, and deservedly so. This government has done much harm to this country. This is a bad budget and I urge my fellow members to vote against it.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I certainly have spoken on budgets before in this House, although perhaps not on the budget debate but often on the borrowing bill the government normally introduces subsequent to a budget.

• (1655)

This year we had the borrowing bill first because the government was so disorganized it could not make up its mind about what to put in a budget. Having seen the one it produced the other day we can understand why. There is a complete lack of any ideas on the part of the government to try to ameliorate the economic situation it has created in this country and which has brought ruin to thousands and thousands of Canadians.

We have had record bankruptcies for the last few years, thanks to the government. We have had record unemployment for the last few years, thanks to the government. The Minister of Finance and his cabinet colleagues have really made a terrible mess of the finances of Canada. That is not unusual in my own experience because the last time we had a government that made such a mess of the national finances was the Diefenbaker government in the 1950s and early 1960s. I can still remember the clean-up job the Liberal Party had to do when it took office after defeating the Diefenbaker government in 1962. I will not dwell on that today.

What I wanted to talk about was the fraud that is being perpetrated on the Canadian public by the Minister of Finance and the government in the budget that has been presented. We have got this very fancy little booklet that the government has produced en masse for people to read and it is full of statements that are utterly misleading and false.

I would like to quote one of the statements the minister had the nerve to read in the House during the course of his budget speech. It was so patently false I was amazed. If he had been on oath he would have been accused of perjury. He said: "Less borrowing, lower taxes, more jobs and more choice. That is the direction in which people want to go and that is the direction in which this government is going". He was all wrapped up in these words.

Let us look at the record, let us look at the facts that back up that statement. First of all, he said less borrowing. The deficit has increased for the last four or five years. It has gone up consistently every time and the minister says there is less borrowing. Where? Who is borrowing less as a result of this government's economic mismanagement? Certainly not the Government of Canada and certainly not the people of Canada who are having to pay the interest on the public debt. The less borrowing statement is patently false.

He said lower taxes. Where are the lower taxes? He told us there were no tax increases in this budget. That statement is also false because taxes are going up in this country because of the deindexation of deductions which this government has done in its past budgets. The government knows it is going to get more money this year as a result of the removal of the indexation provisions on all the deductions in the Income Tax Act and the removal of the indexation on the rates of tax on various levels of income. Those have all been taken out, so taxes will go up this year.

The government says there are no tax increases. There are not any in this budget but there are tax increases coming into place as a result of previous budgets. We have had something like 35 tax increases in the last eight years already. He said lower taxes are what Canadians want. If they are what they want and that is the direction in which the government is going, where are the tax decreases? Where are the lower taxes? There were none in this budget.

Then he said there are more jobs. Where are the job creation schemes in this budget? There are not any. The government announced with some pride that it was laying off 16,000 public servants. The President of the Treasury Board spoke in the House yesterday and shed crocodile tears at this loss, but he is party to the government that is doing this. He is letting these people go.

The minister said this is job creation, more jobs. What is it? Is it job loss or job creation? Why does the minister not tell us? Why does the Minister of Finance not tell the truth to Canadians instead of these falsehoods? Why does he not tell them that there are not more jobs but fewer jobs as a result of this budget. It is a do-nothing budget. It is worse than do-nothing. It is damaging to the Canadian economy.

Then he said more choice. I do not know what he meant by that. I do not think he did either. I think he ran out of words with more in front of them. He had to think of words that he could put more in front of to make it sound as though something was better. He stuck in the word choice. I do not know what choice he meant. If he meant that one has more places one can go for help from the government that is false because it is closing offices right, left and centre in an effort to save money. The government makes us make these long distance telephone calls that cost more and tie up Canadians more in their efforts to get answers from the government. There is not more choice. There is less.

He said this is the direction the government is going in. I would like to know where he got that idea. I suspect somebody, some Tory hack in his office, wrote that statement and stuck it in because I notice it is on all the little budget summaries the government is handing out, the one card deal. I notice that is on there in heavy print almost word for word, though not quite the same. I suppose he said it in different places in different ways, but it quotes him as having said it that way on April 26. That is something that is wrong.

The other thing I wanted to refer to was the minister's incredible statements about the reduction of the deficit. Every year for nine years we have heard about deficit reduction in Canada. It is always just around the corner. We remember the former Minister of Finance, the member for Etobicoke Centre. He is long gone from that job and everybody has forgotten him. He used to talk about holding the course. He used to say that we are going to hold the course. We did not hear that expression in the budget the other day, did we?

Mr. Ferguson: That is what the Titanic did.

Mr. Milliken: It is like the Titanic, but he did not use the expression. I guess the Minister of Finance realized that being in charge of the Titanic one ought not hold the course. Maybe he has realized that the ship of state he has been running on icebergs for the last few years is really coming to ground. He did not use it.

We did not hear about the fundamentals either. We used to hear how we always had the fundamentals right. I do not think the government ever knew what the fundamentals were, let alone whether it got them right or not. It has them all wrong. Everything is wrong in this budget.

Let us go back to these figures on deficit reduction. This is an unbelievable set of statements. The government says that its budgetary deficit this year will be $35 billion. This is the fourth or fifth straight increase in the deficit. Every year the government says it is reducing the deficit, it has control, it has the fundamentals right, it is doing everything right and everything is working. Yet the deficit has gone up again for the fourth or fifth year. The projections are that it will go down next year and the year after that until in 1996–97 it will be down to $14 billion, according to page 62 of the minister's budget.

He has nothing in here to back that up. The minister has the credibility of Mother Goose.

Mr. Loiselle: I'll tell him.

Mr. Milliken: Tell him. I urge the President of the Treasury Board to go and tell him and get out his Mother Goose books to see if they have any more credibility than this budget document. It is absolutely unbelievable. I have here an old budget just to prove my point. It is dated November 8, 1984, and is from the former Minister of Finance, the member for Etobicoke Centre. It was not actually a budget but an economic statement. This was his first effort.

Mr. Keyes: There was one of those last December.

Mr. Milliken: That was not the first economic statement but it was the first Tory economic statement in a number of years. The Tories told us that with their projections everything was just going to be terrible because of the awful state of affairs they inherited from the previous government. They went on and on about that for pages and pages. I quote from page 97 of Hansard from November 8. He said:

> With this set of projections—the deficit for this fiscal year would be $34.5 billion, almost $5 billion higher than projected last February by the previous government. That is bad enough but that is not the worst of it. Current projections show the deficit increasing next year to more than $37 billion and remaining between $34 and $38 billion in every year for the balance of this decade.

That was to take us up to 1990. Remember he was talking in 1984. He continued:

> This is in marked contrast to previous projections that showed the deficit declining over that period.

The former Minister of Finance was very upset about these projections and he decided he had better do something about it. He said he would take action, and so he did. He took action and introduced all kinds of tax breaks for his wealthy friends and various other benefits that he said were going to help solve this problem. Of course they did not. He said:

> But move we must.

This is from page 100, so we can see how long he went on about this stuff. He said:

> Our goal is to reduce the projected level of annual expenditures by 1990 by $10 to $15 billion, inclusive of the measures I am announcing tonight.

He already had other cuts but we know that the expenditures did not decline by $10 billion or $15 billion by 1990. They never got down anywhere near that far. Now they have gone up by a lot more than that, and those were good times. They were growth years, record growth years. One would have thought the minister could have salted away a bit of money for the rainy day the way Conservatives are always saying we have to do. They always blame the Liberals in Ontario for not salting away enough money for the rainy day. Now we hear the same song and dance from the socialists.

That is what the minister did, and of course his deficit projections were all wrong. If those figures were accurate I think we would find that the deficit by 1990 would be down to about $15 billion. It never got anywhere close to $15 billion in 1990 or any other time since this government took office. It has always stayed in the $30 billion range. It has never been able to get out of this, and now it is up as high as $35 billion.

We had these awful projections that if something was not done the debt was going to be something like $415 billion by 1990. It is way over that. It is going to be $500 billion very shortly according to the minister's own projections and his own budget that he introduced.

The national debt will hit $500 billion in early 1994. This was considered a national catastrophe in 1984. For that reason the Tory government said it was going to take action, solve that problem and make things work. Every year in every budget it has told us that the actions it was taking were saving us billions of dollars and it was going to solve this deficit problem. Yesterday was the latest example and now the deficit is worse than ever before. This government is hopeless. It cannot organize anything. Its projections have the credibility of Mother Goose.

The Minister of Finance should withdraw this budget. He should get out of office and call an election. He is incompetent and the whole government is incompetent to govern this country. It has made a terrible, terrible mess of it. Even Jeff Simpson in The Globe and Mail wrote an article entitled "From a tired government, a budget without inspiration or conviction".

Everybody knows this is a tired old broken down Tory government that is breaking the whole country down by hanging on to office. My colleague from Hamilton West says he cannot withdraw because there is a leadership campaign. Call an election anyway. Let the people make a decision. We do not need a new leader in the Tory Party. Putting a new label on the old bottle will not do any good.

There are two things that we have suggested that I would like to draw to the minister's attention as something he could have done to improve this mess.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I am very interested in what my colleague from Kingston and the Islands has to contribute to this debate. As we are dealing here with the budget, I am most interested in his suggestion that we tell the Minister of Finance to just withdraw his budget, resign his job and let us get on with an election.

I wonder if he can really do that because what he was really doing was probably giving us a pre-leadership budget. Really, what can the Minister of Finance do when Campbell and Charest are running against each other?

Maybe the member for Kingston and the Islands can explain this to me, but as I recall was it not Campbell who said the deficit was going to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Again I have to say to the hon. member that he is speaking of the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of the Environment. Please.

Mr. Keyes: I will respect that wish of the Chair. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for correcting me. I just wanted to make it clear to my constituents who I was referring to. They may not follow all these positions quite as closely as the member for Kingston and the Islands and I do. They change so often who can keep track?

The Minister of National Defence told us we could get rid of that deficit—and the member for Lincoln can tell me as I think she is co-chairing her campaign—in five years, I believe. We are not going to have a deficit any more after five years. Then the Minister of the Environment said we can get rid of it in four years. As a result we are going to end up with individuals who can produce plans for us that say we will not even have a deficit.

Now wait a minute. The Minister of Finance gave us a budget that said we are going to be about $8 billion— It is five minutes for questions and comments, right, Mr. Speaker? I am taking a couple of minutes just to ask my question. I will cut off now so I can listen to my colleague from Kingston and the Islands who may explain this pre-leadership budget which could develop into a pre-election budget in another month or so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands will have at least one minute.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to respond to my very distinguished colleague from Hamilton West as quickly as I can.

It is clear that the Minister of National Defence thinks the deficit can be solved in five years and I think the Minister of the Environment said four years. They are influential ministers in this cabinet so one would think that in the years they have been there they might have done something to bring this about. But clearly the deficit has gone up and not down with them in the cabinet. They have been utterly useless as far as deficit reduction is concerned. I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs has done more to reduce the deficit than either the Minister of the Environment or the Minister of National Defence. I think neither of them has any idea how to solve the problem.

An hon. member: Well, she is not flying first class anymore.

Mr. Milliken: And unfortunately she is leaving public office. They are losing the people who could help and they are gaining—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired. I really regret that because he always comes up with a very good speech.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to follow the member opposite who is certainly quite capable of telling many nursery stories. I was amazed at his presentation because he seemed to have such a strong interest in reducing the deficit and yet his party's policy on that particular issue is so vacuous.

• (1710)

I understand that his leader has announced he wants to reduce the deficit to $25 billion. That of course would mean that the debt would continue to rise. Our policy is to reduce it to less than 1 per cent of the gross domestic product by 1997.

Clearly the opposition members of both parties are only interested in spending and continuing to spend. The level of restraint that has been indicated in this particular budget is certainly far beyond anything they are considering.

The only party in Canada aside from our party that is prepared to tackle the deficit is the Reform Party and I think its method of tackling the deficit is just unacceptable to Canadians.

I feel very confident about what Canadians think. I participated in this budget process and I consulted my constituents. I sent them out a "You Be the Finance Minister" pamphlet that many of them took the opportunity to fill out. Many of them went through this exercise and a vast overwhelming number balanced the budget.

My people are going to be very disappointed that the finance minister did not cut further. I was initially quite disappointed but in considering it I think we are quite right, this is a pre-leadership budget. Certainly this is going to be the main issue in the next election. I am absolutely confident that the vast majority of Canadians want to see the deficit cut further. They want to see the national debt paid down.

The only programs that my constituents wanted to increase or remain the same were health and welfare, the environment and agriculture. With respect to transfers to persons they cut everything but seniors' benefits. Transfers to the provinces, health, education and job creation were the only things they did not want to cut.

It is clear to me that the finance minister followed the wishes of my constituents and Canadians across this country. He cut everywhere they suggested with the following exceptions. He did not cut other transfers to persons. My constituents were not aware who these other persons were. I am sure they would not want to cut funding to veterans or the disabled.

Similarly he did not cut payments to less wealthy provinces, the EPF funding and the CAP. As he has stated this has to be negotiated with the provinces. It has to be done together. These programs are too important and clearly my constituents want health and welfare to remain. They wanted cuts made to the Canada Assistance Plan but I think we must all agree in this House that the least able Canadians must be helped and that must be treated in a very sensitive fashion.

Similarly the minister did not cut funding to Indians and Inuit. All of the other areas that my constituents wanted to cut were in fact cut and those they did not want cut were not cut.

An hon. member: Wow, that is great.

Ms. Greene: I think the member is quite right. This is a pre-leadership budget and an election is imminent. There is no new legislation possible so the finance minister had a dilemma. The problem in the 1992-93 budget was that the revenues anticipated did not appear. Spending is under control. This government has a very tight control over spending in this country.

The problem was the revenues and some of that can be addressed administratively looking at some of the slippage. For the rest of it we have to have an improved economy. In looking at this budget he had to balance the two objectives of restraining spending and controlling the deficit as well as stimulating the economy.

He needed something credible and achievable that was sensitive to the public's wishes. He was also constrained because he could not touch $41 billion in debt payments. The programs he did not touch cost about $52 billion and the debt payments are $41 billion. That meant only about $60 billion worth of expenditures could be tackled and over the five-year period that section of government spending will be cut by $30 billion.

The 1993-94 cut is $3.8 billion rising to $5.8 billion in 1994-95. Those are very substantial cuts given the fact that these departments have been under restraints since 1984 and the demands of the population are not diminishing. It is going to be a tremendous challenge to those departments to maintain the quality of services that Canadians are used to.

We had a remark earlier by one of the members about a particular incident that occurred in Toronto. My office was also flooded with calls. The fact is that was not a reduction in service at all. There was a major computer error and a lot of papers went out that were inaccurate. They were followed very quickly by a second series of computer runs. The elderly people were very confused. These were the statements regarding their OAS benefits.

At the same time another office was transferring to a different location so calls were being rerouted to the Toronto office and the phone lines were jammed. I think that is very peculiar. Usually my office finds that the Department of National Health and Welfare does respond. We do occasionally have to intervene but we are able to get through and resolve those problems. I think there will be a real challenge.

We also deal with immigration a lot in my particular office. I am pleased with the new measures which will result in greater efficiency and greater uniformity in the treatment of people. The calls will be centralized to one location. Of course there will be reductions in the cost. A 1-800 number is going to be open for a much more extended period of time with a whole bank of switchboard operators and a computerized system where people will be able to access information quickly. It is going to be a tremendous improvement.

We have had to deal with many immigration inquiries and I think that by centralizing and upgrading the service tremendous amounts of money will be saved. The total amount of savings in the immigration budget is $1 billion. The legislation that went through will result in that. That is something my constituents are very much in favour of.

I think the minister has presented a very realistic attempt to continue on course at this time. It is a thoughtful and strategic approach that will help Canadians compete and help our economy grow. It will help to drag us out of our fiscal sink-hole.

The members opposite said there is nothing in the budget about jobs. I listened carefully to what my constituents were saying. I attended many of the prosperity sessions. The business community wants us to provide a stable economic environment. They want low inflation and low interest rates. That is what this budget is trying to do. They do not want new taxes. Many of the items in this budget will help them in terms of their business loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act and other measures will improve the taxation system for business. These are nitty-gritty things, the kind of things the Grits opposite never think about.

There are very real cuts in this budget. Those constraints on the departments will result in very real cuts. The departments will be challenged. They will have to come forward. I think we will have ministers delivering a succession of bills to accomplish those goals. There have been tremendous improvements. It will be a manageable means of cutting that will give proper consideration to various alternatives.

Certainly as far as the provinces are concerned we have to work together on those programs because the Canadian public value them. We have to talk about efficiencies in the health care system and in our social spending.

I think the Reform Party has been very aggressive. Many of my constituents who responded to my questionnaire are leaning toward the Reform Party because they are so deeply concerned about the deficit. However they clearly do not want the cuts that the Reform Party wants to make. One of their suggestions is to base the OAS tax-back on family income rather than individual income. My constituents oppose cuts to seniors' benefits, health, education, job training and agriculture. Shifting the tax back in that manner would mean that couples would be very unfairly treated. Right now seniors receive their benefits based on individual income. Requiring women in a significant majority to lose their OAS benefit because their husbands have a high income I think would be most unacceptable to my constituents and indeed I think very unfair.

• (1720)

We have the tax back in place for those who are quite wealthy and who are not receiving the OAS. I think any further tampering with the seniors' benefits would have to be something that would be considered very carefully in conjunction with the seniors.

As a baby boomer I am concerned about what is going to happen to our benefits when we get to retirement age. I do think that retirement benefits for seniors have to be looked at. I think we have to secure the retirement income of Canadians who have lived and worked in this country. That I think is an undertaking that our members are very concerned about as is the general public.

I have already mentioned that the Liberal target for the deficit is $20 billion to $25 billion. I think that is far away from what we are talking about. We are talking about eventually a zero deficit, but in terms of the five-year approach we are talking about it being 4.5 per cent in 1993 and .9 per cent by 1997. The Clinton budget in the U.S. has a target of 2.5 per cent by 1997.

Actually we have done a lot better than every other G-7 nation. When we look at our particular situation and the international statistics we have confronted a world-wide recession. The latest revised forecast from the IMF indicates that we are projected to lead the G-7 nations with respect to economic growth.

We have mortgages with the lowest interest rates in 35 years, inflation at the lowest level in 30 years, government spending at the lowest level in 33 years, productivity and unit costs that have gone down 6.6 per cent and the highest exports in history. In terms of managing this economy I think we are doing very well.

Obviously it is a very difficult period for many Canadians. However, when we actually look at the job statistics that have been churned out there has been a tremendous amount of movement. We have a very dynamic economy. There are new jobs being created and other jobs being lost. We are facing a revolution in terms of technology.

What is the answer to that? Is the answer to put up fences to attempt to control what is a natural occurrence in a dynamic economy or to try to help Canadians to adjust by giving them better training, better education and creating an environment that encourages businesses to expand and to locate in Canada?

We now have through the efforts of the finance minister the best tax regime in the world for research and development. I am proud of that. I think that is something business really wants.

Of course the Liberals have opposed every single cut that we brought forward and so has the NDP. The only cut that they would like to see that we would not like to see is the helicopters. This amount of money is $4.4 billion over 13 years in 1993 dollars. That averages $340 million per year. They have spent this at least 10 times over.

There are a number of people who are talking about day care versus helicopters. They say we should do this or do that and reduce the deficit. This would not make any kind of significant reduction in the deficit because it is too small. It is not even $1 billion. It is $340 million a year.

• (1725)

We know it is a tremendous boost to a great number of industries in Canada. In terms of job creation and retaining the kinds of jobs that we need to move into the future it is excellent.

It is something that the companies are now delivering, having receptions for and recognizing. I think more Canadians will realize that this is an expenditure that is important to Canada and a good way to create good long-term jobs.

The NDP of course offers a full employment strategy. As the chair of the poverty committee I have had a great deal to do with the NDP's full employment strategy. I have been trying to find out what it is for four years. We kept asking the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing for specific examples. We kept asking him to bring forward his suggestions. None were brought forward.

I have however seen an NDP job strategy in Ontario. It has devastated Ontario. It is clearly something that is really smoke and mirrors in the strongest sense of the word. It has resulted in devastating consequences in Ontario. It has exacerbated the recession, scared the hell out of business and really contributed to the situation we are in currently. I am pleased however that Premier Rae seems to have learned a lot lately and is attempting at last to tackle some of the serious problems.

I attended a Conference Board session out west where I met with various leaders from across the country in the business sector, the government sector and the education sector. It was a very stimulating experience. Their concerns were much the same as the concerns of my constituents and I think that our government is certainly on the right track.

The Conference Board predicts that all Canadian governments will be constrained in spending for at least the next 10 years. I think we need to stop joking around in this Chamber and start looking at this in a serious fashion.

The challenge will be to make better use of scarce government dollars and yet treat Canadians fairly and allow these scarce government dollars to be given to those who need it most. That is exactly what we are trying to do at the poverty subcommittee. We have been examining the issue of poverty measures and the use thereof with a view to providing a means of identifying and monitoring the welfare of Canadians at the bottom end of our society so that governments will be held accountable and we can actually see whether or not programs have in fact worked.

We are looking at this situation and I think in terms of policy it will be extremely important. We do not now have a poverty line. Statistics Canada has repeatedly told people that the low-income cut-offs are not a poverty line and in fact they make a very poor poverty line.

I will mention one little item to illustrate what a poor poverty line they make. It includes taxes in the current numbers. If one takes taxes out one reduces the number of poor in Canada by 3 per cent. If one looks at the elderly population one reduces it even further. This is because under our taxes we transfer considerable amounts of income to low-income Canadians. Surely when we are looking at poverty in Canada we should be considering the impact of what in fact we do through the tax and transfer system.

I have been accused of playing with the figures for the benefit of our party. The fact of the matter is that this is historical data. The Liberal Party will be pleased to learn that it makes them look better too because many of the tax measures that were introduced were introduced under the Liberal Party. One can see the pattern that has occurred through the tax transfers.

However, in looking at poverty, we need national standards. The amount of money one needs to live in Toronto is not the same amount of money that one needs to live in Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg or Montreal. We know that through very accurate data now collected by Central Mortgage and Housing on every single community in Canada and Statistics Canada with respect to Agriculture Canada. There are tremendous variations.

• (1730)

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, will the member tell us whether there is one person in Canada other than on her side of the House who has had anything positive to say about the budget? Second, I would like to know the name of the person or the organization.

We now have 10,000 people a month visiting our food bank in Edmonton. I am wondering if she has any thoughts of that in view of the budget.

Ms. Greene: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the budget all the international agencies that are used to monitor this sort of thing have given it very high ratings.

Those are delivered across Canada to businesses and so on. That is why we have seen stock market activity in this country that shows quite clearly that the business community has confidence in this government and not in any other group.

With respect to the food banks, Edmonton is in a province with welfare rates that are probably inadequate to cover basic necessities. I feel that food banks are a humiliating and degrading way to give people basic necessities.

I very strongly believe that we should have welfare rates in this country that are sufficient to cover basic needs such as food, clothing and shelter along with all the basic essentials.

I think we should work toward eliminating food banks. Indeed, when people working at the food banks appeared before our committee they said exactly the same thing. They want to eliminate the need for food banks.

I know that in Ontario and in Toronto in particular we had many discussions about this when I was on the community services and housing committee for 11 years. We attempted to get proper rent supplements and so on. We felt that the incomes of poor people should be sufficient to cover basic necessities.

There have always been agencies that have given out food. I think we have to talk about a system in which the self-esteem of people in low income situations is considered and they are helped in a very positive way. They should be given the basic essentials and also pathways out of poverty.

Our recommendation in the poverty subcommittee was for welfare to be at a basic needs level and for the child benefit to be on top to ensure an adequate discretionary income for children. I think those are very excellent goals.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak to the budget that was brought down by the Government of Canada on Monday of this week.

In listening to the last speaker in this House I am wondering if I am in the House of Commons of the right country. The words I have just heard do not reflect to any degree what I have to say about the budget that was brought down on Monday. They do not reflect the opinion that is widespread in my own constituency.

The motion we are debating is from the minister who wishes us to agree in general with his budget statement. I have to put on the record that I could not do that. Instead I would totally support the motion of non-confidence put forward by my own party which says that this House condemns the government for presenting a shop-worn copy of last year's budget.

It fails to present a realistic and comprehensive program to create jobs and an economic recovery to permit the millions of Canadians whose lives have been crushed by Tory policies to regain their hope and livelihood.

This government fails to offer a credible and fair plan to control and reduce public debt. It fails to provide Canadians with a true and accurate account of the eight and a half years of Conservative government mismanagement.

This government is in serious trouble. This country is in serious trouble. The credit rating of this country is in doubt today. The markets are volatile.

Canadians, including constituents of mine in Northumberland are very concerned about the future of this country. They no longer feel that they live in the Canada they grew up in, that they prospered in, that offered them the opportunity of a bright future. Canadians do not know that vision of their country today. They long for it and hope it will return, that prosperity will return. However they were devastated with the budget as it was presented on Monday.

• (1735)

The most important fact is that the budget does nothing to get our economy moving forward again. We see a stand-pat budget, one that talks of further cuts, cuts into the future. It is a very safe budget for a government that is going into a federal election this year, a government that postpones to three years hence words about cuts. It has been promoting and selling to the Canadian people that the only policy and the only problem of any significance and any importance in this country is the debt and the deficit and the deficit in financial terms only.

People in this House recognize that the deficit and the debt are very serious problems and must be addressed, but this party would do something to help this economy recover. The economy must be helped to grow. The budget we were presented with on Monday does absolutely nothing to encourage that. Instead it deadens any spirit of optimism and hope people might have had.

During the tenure of this government Canadians have had their taxes raised 36 times. Consumer spending is presently down because of the fear experienced by Canadians. When members on the other side of the House speak it sounds like another country. Instead of a recovery however in my constituency there are still more and more jobs being lost as companies close and leave, as more and more people close up shop and go into bankruptcy. Just yesterday we heard of the difficulties of the Mack truck company. It is closing its doors and is purported to be moving south.

The government says that we have an unemployment rate of around 11 per cent and that we have to expect that to continue well into 1994. In the constituency of Northumberland that is not a believable figure. A census was done in a neighbouring township to my riding of Northumberland. It was found that in fact the unemployment level was 14.6 per cent. Over 6 per cent of the population said that they were grossly underpaid. They were working but did not derive enough income to support themselves in any lifestyle that way not just survival.

Recovery in this country with no jobs is no recovery. We must have a recovery that provides jobs for Canadians. We have over one million people unemployed in Canada and the government wants to know what the Liberal Party would do that is different. We would create wealth in this country. We would put people back to work. If we put one million people back to work we would save $20 billion and that would go a long way to reducing the deficit.

In the budget we heard the finance minister talk about what was going to occur in Canada next year, the year after that and five years hence. So many of the things he said were just absolutely unbelievable. If we consider his prognostications about the deficit itself, it is interesting to look back to last year where in his budget speech of February 1992 he said that the deficit for 1992–93 would be $27.5 billion. In December he changed his mind. He regretted that his prognostication was out and that it would rise to $34.4 billion. Monday he said that since December he had to change his mind again and that now the deficit was going to be $35.5 billion. That is a difference of $8 billion in his prognostications for one year, the year we have just gone through.

How can we possibly believe a finance minister who says that in the year 1997–98 our deficit will be only $8 billion? In 1988 the deficit for 1992 was to be $19.5 billion. Monday it was changed to $35.5 billion.

This government has no credibility whatsoever and it is very obvious in all of the economic measures it has brought down, which I believe we have debated against very honestly and forthrightly. We have tried to point out the problems with the cuts, cuts, cuts this government has brought forward. We have tried to show that they were not good for this country. Obviously the government has not come up to its own predictions about its policies. It is way off track which is not just causing a lot of consternation for individuals in Canada but for people around the world.

The Liberals would follow a two-track policy for economic recovery in this country. One track would deal very specifically with the deficit and the debt, knowing that those are very serious problems. There must be expenditure reductions by streamlining processes and eliminating duplication, while continuing to deliver the basic services that Canadians need. This must take place in consultation with the provinces.

We have done an analysis in doing some economic union work with the western provinces. We have shown that in one year, if we could do our government purchasing together, work more efficiently together, we could save $5 billion. Working more efficiently and streamlining our systems and processes does not mean cutting, it means saving billions of dollars.

Our government would also do many things to foster economic growth, investing in people, investing in research and development and infrastructure. People must be put back to work so that they are paying taxes rather than collecting unemployment insurance or welfare payments. As I said before, we have to remember that one million Canadians are unemployed and that is costing our country $20 billion a year.

To my mind the deficit that is more important than the financial deficit is the human deficit. We can work with monetary policies to reduce the deficit and we will do so. But the human deficit is going to be long term and will be very hard to cope with.

I recommend to everybody the report put out by the Senate Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology in January 1991, which talks very clearly about the long-term negative effects of poverty on people in Canada. We know that the joblessness and consequent poverty in this country have been very much responsible for family breakdowns, stress, abuse against women and children, violence and crime, the breakdown of society. We need to get Canadians back to work and this budget is no solution to that end.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, we are talking about a government that has set itself a priority. The priority this government has set itself is the reduction of the deficit, the reduction of the national debt. That is the yearly amount of money we spend and the collection of all those different years of budgets.

The Minister of Finance should take a moment to walk in his riding. I invite him to come to my riding of Hamilton West. If he were to sit in the local coffee shop or to take a walk around the downtown market or streets for just a few minutes, he would quickly realize that he has his priorities wrong, that the Tory Party has its priorities wrong.

That is because most people today are talking about jobs: "Give me a job. Give me the opportunity of a job". Then everything else will look after itself and we will not have to worry about whether there is enough money in the kitty to pay for social services. We will not have to worry whether there is enough welfare money in the kitty.

My constituents are telling me: "Stan, get into the House of Commons and will you just repeat it again and again and maybe, just maybe one of the new leadership candidates will understand that the priority in this country ought to be jobs. Let us create jobs".

• (1745)

When was the last time we heard about jobs from this government? Well, as many of my colleagues have already said, it was in 1984. The Prime Minister of this great country said: "My priority is jobs, jobs, jobs". That is a direct quote.

What do we have? Today we have 1.6 million people who are unemployed and over three million who are underemployed. That means people with some kind of a job, part-time jobs here or there, who really want to be employed full-time but cannot because the jobs just are not there. What do we have? We have around four million people who are unemployed or underemployed.

I ask my constituents this simple question: Are you any better off today than you were in 1988? Are you any better off today than you were back in 1984 when this government took office? Chances are you are going to say that you are not. How can we not be when we are in the greatest country in the world, Canada? With all our opportunities, with all our advancements in education, with all our natural resources, we sit here with close to four million people either out of work or looking for full-time jobs. Horrible, it is just horrible.

My constituents would have something to say about it if I did not get specific with this government about the problems in Hamilton West. In Hamilton West the unemployment rate is higher than the national unemployment rate which is 11 per cent. In Hamilton it is 11.7 per cent. Hamilton has 38,000 people unemployed. It is inexcusable.

Let me talk about youth unemployment. Hamilton West and the city of Hamilton and area is proud to have McMaster University, which is one of the major employers in our area. Youth unemployment in Hamilton is at 19 per cent. Nineteen per cent of students cannot find jobs.

Let us jump over to bankruptcies in Hamilton. We are talking about consumer and business bankruptcies. In 1988 there were 508 consumer bankruptcies and 102 business bankruptcies. In 1992 that number has jumped to 1,504 personal bankruptcies and 201 business bankruptcies.

I do not have to convince my constituents in Hamilton West of that. We all walk around downtown. We see how many stores in Jackson Square have masking tape over the glass. They are all shut down. It is now free rent for a few of the stores still there that use it for storage space next door. It is a horrible situation.

Regarding welfare statistics, the case-load in Hamilton has increased since 1990. In November 1990 the general welfare assistance case-load stood at 9,836. By March 1993, just last month, the case-load for general welfare assistance was 17,011. That is an increase of over 40 per cent.

But this government keeps telling us: "Stay the course. We know where we are going. We are going to build on what we have in this country". What we have in this country is a hell of a mess. There are people looking for work. We have to create the jobs.

Like all the budgets of the Tory government since 1984, this budget provides no hope for Canadians and it is filled with the usual empty rhetoric. Most of all it is laden with all those unrealistic projections. The budget is silent on a whole range of issues including, tragically, solutions for the 1.6 million Canadians who are unemployed and the over three million Canadians who are underemployed or have part-time work and are looking for full-time jobs.

Not only did this government promise jobs, jobs, jobs back in 1984 but it also promised the most generous retraining programs for workers laid off because of that Mulroney trade deal back in 1988. I have to be honest. There were more than a few friends of mine in Hamilton West who said the trade deal had a chance and they were going to vote Conservative because it just might be the ticket. Part of the reason they did so was that this government promised them "the most generous retraining programs this country has ever seen". Those were the words of the Prime Minister.

Have they developed? There are constituents sitting in Hamilton West today who had good jobs, a wife, children, a mortgage and maybe even a cottage or a boat. Tragically eight years later some of my constituents who were married are no longer married. They are divorced. They no longer hold a mortgage because they cannot afford to pay the mortgage. They no longer have the luxury of a cottage or a boat. That went long before the mortgage went.

This was because of the stress put upon them by the inability to have a job that was not there. The government promised they would be retrained. They lost their jobs because of the free trade agreement. They lost their jobs because that company went south. They did not get retrained. They could not get retrained. There was nothing to be retrained for and if they could be retrained this government was not going to help them get retrained.

Ten minutes go very quickly. I will conclude my remarks in the same manner in which I began, with a question. Why did we have this budget in the first place, if that is what we call a budget? It is a total failure. In the end how does it all matter? It is another tired piece of guesswork from a lame duck government which within just a handful of months will not have the mandate to carry through with any of it.

Canadians are the lucky ones. After all, this is a pre-leadership budget that may be discarded anyway in the next couple of months to make room for a pre-election budget which probably will be brought in by the minister of defence, the Minister of the Environment or whoever wins that leadership contest. God knows that this thing called a budget lacks the economic plan to produce R and D, training and most of all jobs to turn this country around, to instil a new confidence in the Canadian people. That is what a budget has to do. That is what this budget did not do.

The Prime Minister and the finance minister should hear the people when they say: "Give me a job. Give me the retraining that is needed for that job". Everything else will look after itself.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and to Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance on Monday.

First of all, I would like to congratulate the minister on his realistic approach to the difficult choices he had to make. In this budget the government is staying the course set in 1984 with a view to reducing the deficit and, within a reasonable period of time, to eliminating it altogether.

• (1755)

As we have said repeatedly, these difficult decisions must be made and implemented now because the deficit, and especially the interest on the debt it generates prevents us from introducing new social measures.

A government's budget at whatever level is no different from a family budget. Of course there is a difference in scale and complexity, but in both cases, if we continue to spend more than we earn, we are soon faced with a crisis.

We all know there are not umpteen ways to cut the deficit. We either increase revenues or cut spending. Increasing revenues would have meant increasing taxes. The Minister of Finance wisely preferred to cut departmental spending.

Canadians already bear a heavy tax burden, and announcing new tax increases would have had a disastrous impact on the economic recovery.

Both business and individuals pay their fair share of taxes, and I think their resources are stretched to the limit. Raising taxes would have been the easy way out but unrealistic in the circumstances. That is why the Minister of Finance preferred to make further cuts in government operations and departmental spending.

Like any business faced with revenue shortfalls the government has decided to cut operating costs and program spending. For instance, the federal Public Service, where the number of positions has already been cut by 90,000, will be expected to reduce the number of public servants by about 16,500 over the next five years. However, despite these cutbacks the government's intentions are clear. It wants to do, and will do, everything in its power to prevent any reduction in services to the public.

As the Minister of Finance pointed out, and I quote: "The government will continue to streamline its operations and improve the cost-effectiveness of its service delivery. We will make government smaller, simpler and more accessible to Canadians."

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate members of the federal Public Service on the excellent way they are doing their jobs. They are all doing everything they can to help us improve the way government responds to the needs of the public and they have every reason to be proud of their record. It will not be easy for them to manage these new cutbacks, but we are asking them to co-operate because they must realize that the government has no choice and that as responsible administrators we must stay the course on reducing the deficit.

They will all have a major role to play in this process, and I am convinced we will again be able to rely on their efficiency, competence and dedication to help us in this difficult task.

As part of its policy to cut costs and improve service to the public, a commitment made in 1984 and reiterated subsequently, the government has adopted a number of measures aimed at simplifying communication between business, individuals and government. For instance, the minister announced a simplified GST system for small business. I am referring to improvements in the quick method for computing GST which would simplify procedures for hundreds of thousands of small businesses.

These are not necessarily headline grabbers, but based on my conversations with business people, I can assure you these measures are most welcome because while reducing the cost of government operations they also reduce administration costs of Canadian businesses.

Less paper burden means businesses have more time and money to spend on improving and expanding their operations.

• (1800)

These are very simple little measures that have a big impact, directly and indirectly, on the cost of management for our Canadian businessmen and women.

We must also be pleased that social programs were not affected by the announced cuts. In fact, aid for seniors, the program for the disabled, veterans' pensions and benefits, some programs for native people, the national employment strategy and famine relief in the world are all exempt from restrictions.

We thus ensure that those most in need will not be penalized and I think that is a very wise choice, because in these difficult economic times, it would be irresponsible to cut more from the resources for the most disadvantaged. More than anyone, they feel the impact of Canada's financial difficulties. Someone earning $60,000 a year can support a $10 cut, but for someone living below the poverty line, this same $10 cut has frightful consequences.

We must clearly understand that Canada's financial situation cannot be seen in isolation. Canada is strongly influenced by the world situation. In this increasingly international world in which we live, when the market economies are more and more interdependent, we benefit when the world economy is well but we suffer when it is doing badly.

There is no use hiding our head in the sand. For several years we have been living through a worldwide recession which Canada, as a major industrialized country, could not escape. However because of the spin off benefits generated from the wide range of initiatives for economic renewal taken by this government since 1984 the Canadian economy is improving and is in a very good position to perform well in the coming years.

For example, according to the OECD's predictions Canada will have the highest growth rate of the G-7 countries this year and next. In the past few months we have witnessed an encouraging turnaround in economic growth, employment, retail sales and several other important indicators. The most vigorous growth was in our exports which are mainly responsible for the economic recovery.

Strong exports were made possible by a spectacular improvement in our cost competitiveness as well as greater access to the American market under the free trade agreement. This strong performance of our exports will continue to support the economic recovery in 1993–94.

As I said earlier, Canada either benefits or suffers from the global economic situation, but we must also promote trade and encourage policy harmonization on the domestic market.

If the federal, provincial and territorial governments shoot in all directions chances are that nothing great will come out of it. That is why I again applaud the Minister Finance's commitment to working and co–operating with his provincial counterparts.

The money comes from only one source the taxpayer. That is why it is essential that a national cure be found for the national debt problem, as Canadians want. In that sense the federal and provincial governments must work together toward achieving this goal. If the federal government reduces its debt at the expense of the provinces that solves nothing. It simply shifts the taxpayers' burden from one level of government to another. That is simply juggling the books.

Knowing that, the Minister of Finance preferred to play it straight by not cutting provincial transfers, a decision applauded by the provincial finance ministers, including the Quebec finance minister, Gérard D. Lévesque. After the federal budget was tabled, he said: "The federal minister is tackling the deficit with measures that will benefit Quebec and Canada's economy in the medium and long term. For the immediate future, like all governments, he was forced to maintain a delicate balance between the need to sustain the economic growth and his desire to fight the deficit. Some will say this is not enough, but as Quebec Minister of Finance, I am satisfied with these measures", concluded Mr. Lévesque.

Following the tabling of the budget some said that the proposed measures were not sufficient. I believe that we have to be realistic. On the one hand it is interesting to note that our message finally got through and that the public is now aware of the negative impact of a large debt. Now that the citizens of our country are convinced like us of the importance of our efforts, this will certainly help us keep going in the same direction.

For a long time we had the impression of preaching in the desert. However, our tenacity and the firm belief that we were right succeeded in making Canadians more responsible and understand that the debt is not only the government's problem but also their problem as taxpayers. Canadians now realize that the services which they have been enjoying are not free and that it is they who in the end must foot the bill one way or another.

This new awareness explains why some now say that we are not going far enough. To those people I say that based on the realism which has always guided our government, the implementation of drastic measures at this point would have adversely affected economic recovery and consequently federal revenue. As the minister of finance in Quebec said, and I quote: "Every time there are cuts, it affects the economy and this does not help government revenue".

As a responsible government we must take realistic measures which will not affect recovery and especially job creation because this is the way, and it is the only way, that we will be able to reach our goals, namely the reduction of the deficit and the growth of our economy in co–operation with all our partners.

I am therefore very pleased to see that the Quebec government is willing to co–operate with us to harmonize its fiscal policies, and I do hope that all the other provincial governments will follow suit. It is not through confrontation but rather through dialogue that we can make great things happen, and this is very true in the case of the economy.

This budget is tabled at a time when the public has never been so concerned with the expenditures and borrowings of our various governments. This concern is justified. Canadians know that they cannot indefinitely let the debit balance of their credit cards increase and then borrow just to pay interest. They saw what happens when a government behaves as though it was not subjected to the same basic rules of common sense.

What happens then is that taxpayers have to pay more and more for fewer and fewer government services because the interest takes an increasing portion of each dollar in tax revenue. Increasingly heavier taxes slow down the economy, which in turn impedes job creation. Owners pay higher mortgage rates because government borrowings result in higher interest rates on loans. And higher interest rates have a deterring effect on investors and consumers, which also contributes to slowing down growth and job creation.

Finally, in order to maintain a standard of living which no longer matches our revenue, we rely more and more on foreign lenders. Our country becomes less and less in control of its economy, and an increasing part of our revenue must be used to pay interest to those foreign lenders.

Canadians want to remain in control of their future. They want their government to have the means to maintain essential social services as well as some fiscal flexibility when faced with new priorities.

To reduce borrowing and taxes, increase employment, and expand possibilities; those are the goals of Canadians. It is in this direction that our government has been going since 1984 and we will stay the course. More jobs, a strong and growing economy, and more choices.

First and foremost, we must maintain, and we will maintain, our strict and responsible policy regarding expenditure control.

Since 1984–85 we have made very real progress in an uncertain, changing international climate. We have reduced the annual growth in federal program spending from 13.8 per cent to 4.1 per cent. We have cut the federal deficit as a proportion of national revenue from 8.7 per cent to 5.1 per cent. Thanks to tight spending control, we have changed an operating deficit into an operating surplus, which means that the government is now spending less on its programs and services than it collects in revenue, and this has been the case for six years.

In the past few years a persistent painful economic slowdown throughout the world has forced governments, businesses and households, both in Canada and abroad, to change their future plans. This has accelerated the fundamental restructuring of our economy in the face of global economic change.

To help Canadians deal with the economic slowdown and adjust to world competition, we took resolute measures in the 1992 budget and last December's economic statement. We reduced the income tax on individuals. We improved and restructured the child benefit plan so as to help low and middle income families. This will put $1.7 billion in the economy this year alone. We established the home buyers' Plan to help Canadians buy or build a house with funds in their RRSP.

As I have repeated so often, as responsible individuals we must not leave our children and grandchildren with a poisoned heritage. We have a responsibility to build a strong and prosperous society in which future generations can develop and fulfil themselves when it is their turn to take over.

I will conclude by saying that despite the energetic spending control measures taken by our government since 1984, Canada is still faced with the serious problems of rising public debt and the very high costs of servicing it. If we do not control the deficit we will suffer the consequences. The economy will be weaker, jobs will be even more scarce and it will not be possible to maintain the programs to which we are attached.

Our government has taken difficult but necessary measures. It has the situation under control. It has a concrete way to achieve its objective and, as we see light at the end of the tunnel, I trust that everyone will co–operate to help us so that together we can manage in a reasonable time to reduce and, why not, eliminate this weight that each of us is dragging, namely the deficit.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I could not let the member go without making a couple of short comments.

The way this government has mastered the art of propaganda is unbelievable. This is a government that was elected nine years ago stating that it was going to be the champion of focusing on deficit and debt reduction. Yet here we are nine years later with a debt that has at least doubled in the last nine years.

What is amazing about these speeches this afternoon, and I listened to the Minister of Employment and Immigration as well, is that things are being said like no tax increases, no increases to the deficit and no cuts to the provinces. The member just said that the government has reduced taxes to individuals. Does this government think that Canadians are stupid?

We have had 33 personal tax increases. Does the government think that Canadians have forgotten about the GST? What does it think when it says no cuts to the provinces? It cut out program spending which helps create jobs and now the welfare payments in this country are ballooning in every province because there are no capital works projects or special recovery projects for people to work at.

• (1815)

The government cut here but there is a welfare expense to the province and then it wonders why there is a provincial debt. This government has systematically dismantled the national government in the last nine years. It stands up all day long and throws out this con job, this propaganda, that all of a sudden it is focused on deficit and debt.

I cannot believe for a second that the member really believes her own speech. If she were to compare what she just said to what the Ministers of Finance have been saying on behalf of this government over the last nine years she will see, and I think Canadians realize, that there is absolutely no consistency and no trust left in this Conservative government from the people of Canada.

Mrs. Duplessis: Mr. Speaker, I will tell my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood that I am quite confident this government will be re-elected. When people are in the voting booth and compare how the Liberals ran the country when they were in office and the way we have done, how we had the courage to take tough measures, I am not worried, people will know where to put their X on the ballot.

By way of explanation I will tell the hon. member that, when we came into power in 1984 we were left with a poisoned legacy. If we had run things the same way as the Liberals did in the previous 15 years the national debt would now be $800 billion to $900 billion. Because we reduced program spending and administered judiciously we were able to limit the debt growth to $450 billion.

I want to tell the hon. member that we made every possible effort. I would therefore like to give him a few small points of comparison with the former Liberal government and show him how we governed, despite all the constraints we had, like a growing Canadian population and a whole lot of other things.

First, let us compare the two recessions. In the 1980–81 recession the deficit was $14.7 billion. In 1984–85 it was $38.5 billion. It more than doubled in that period; it grew 160 per cent. In 1989–90 the deficit was $29 billion and in 1992–93 it was $35.5 billion. This is an increase of less than one–fifth 20 per cent.

Now let us compare the deficit as a percentage of gross domestic product. In 1984–85 it was 8.7 per cent of GDP. In 1993–94 the deficit will only be 4.5 per cent of GDP, a reduction of 50 per cent. If we compare the growth in spending, the average under 15 years of Liberal rule was 13.8 per cent a year. Since 1984–85 it has averaged 3.6 per cent. Comparing Canada with the United States, in 1992–93 Canada's deficit was 5 per cent of GDP compared to 5.1 per cent in the United States. It is expected that in 1997–98 Canada will have a surplus equivalent to 0.1 per cent of GDP, while the United States will still have a deficit of 2.5 per cent of its GDP. Does the member want me to continue?

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to see you in the chair although I am sorry to afflict you with what I am going to have to say. You never know, I might convert you.

I have been through a number of these budget debates since 1968. I have listened to Conservatives kicking the heck out of Liberals about what they were doing in their budgets. Boy, the whole country was going to grind to a halt over what they were doing, to hear them tell it. They were very specific.

• (1820)

When they got through with that, I will be darned if they did not get elected. The next thing we know the Liberals are in opposition and the Conservatives are in the government.

As one might expect, the Liberals asked the Conservatives exactly the same questions.

Mr. Heap: The Conservatives gave them the same answers.

Mr. Benjamin: Yes. They were doing exactly the same things.

I rushed over from the committee meeting and got some notes which I am not going to use. While I was in my office I had the TV on. There was a member from the government side talking about food banks. If there is anything a Tory should never talk about, it is a food bank.

Mr. Heap: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benjamin: He was complaining about how the Liberals caused them. They both caused them. As a result of the economic policies of consecutive Liberal and Tory governments we have been afflicted with food banks. The member who spoke from the government side said they are being closed down. I would sure like her to find me one. If she can, it will only be closed because it could not get enough funds and supplies to keep it open. It would be for no other reason.

Government cabinet ministers have talked about 200,000 new jobs created but I still do not know where they are. A whole bunch of my constituents have not been able to find them and it is not as bad in my city as it is in the cities of both of my colleagues here.

Let us go into this business of deficits and debts. Any government of any political stripe that becomes so hypnotized, terrorized and mesmerized by the size of the current deficit and the accumulated debt becomes immobilized.

If we learned nothing else from the dirty thirties it was that it was the time one spent money one did not have. The current taxpayers and their successors, their children and grandchildren, would have to pay it off.

For a fundamental civilized Christian reason we do not treat people that way in tough times. We just do not do it. Much fuss has been made about the $450 million or $480 billion of the current debt of Canada and the current deficit of $35.5 billion that will get added on to the national debt.

What else is new? I want to say something. I am a child of the dirty thirties. Successive Conservative and Liberal governments in my poor begotten province did not pay their bills. They lost the store. In fact, they bankrupted the whole province.

An hon. member: Why?

Mr. Benjamin: They did not pay their bills that had accumulated from previous years. They should have borrowed some more money, put people to work and then they could have paid their bills.

I am just an ordinary prairie country boy. I am not a fancy economist or financier but it just seems to me that it makes common sense.

• (1825)

Some of the national debt goes back to 1930 because governments in those years could not make their payments and they piled up. They would put out another bond issue to pay off the previous one. If we took that and all the debt that was accumulated during the war at the end of 1945, added up the total national debt and translated in 1993 dollars it would be just as high or higher than it is now. What else is new? We have been through this before. We have to rely on the people, put them to work and the national government has to provide the leadership.

The hon. member for Vegreville, the Minister of Finance, is a good friend and an easy fellow to like. He and I are colleagues from the class of '68. He looks a heck of a lot younger than I do and I am not sure if he is. I never thought I would live to see the day when my hon. friend from Vegreville, the Minister of Finance, would sound like R. B. Bennett and Mackenzie King of 1935 or 1938. The government has not learned anything in 60 or 70 years, in fact it has never learned anything from experience. It does not have to believe me. It does not have to listen to the NDP. It does not have to listen to those terrible socialists.

In country after country in Europe it was the socialists who bailed them out of their economic and financial mess. In 1944, when members of the old CCF—bless their hearts—formed the government led by Tommy Douglas the accumulated debt went back to 1930. In fact two issues of bonds were defaulted upon as the Tory and Liberal governments could not make the payments and the federal government had to step in and pick them up. There were those debts from the dirty thirties plus what happened in the Second World War. Most of the taxation ability went to the federal authority for the war effort which nobody complained about and the provinces starved.

From 1930 to 1945 the deficit of the province of Saskatchewan was as big as it is today. Today thanks to the beautiful blessings of one Grant Devine, the late unlamented premier of Saskatchewan, our debt is now bigger than it was then. When Liberals and Tories talk to me about running governments according to sound business practice, the only kind of business they are in is misleading the people of this country and ruining the economy of this country.

I will not be here much longer. This is my last term but I have listened to the same damn thing every bloody year since 1968. I do not ask anybody to believe me, listen to me, pay attention or do anything about anything I say. I ask them to look at what has happened while they were here. If we do not learn from history and from our own actions we are condemned to repeat them and the government is repeating these in spades.

This budget does nothing about the deficit or debt. Why? Because in the traditional old-line party practice in tough times everybody has to be careful and cut back.

I look at the financial pages. I inherited some shares in a company that was supposed to be going great guns. It is in a resource industry. I think they should call it "the dry hole drilling company". It has gone from $10 a share down to I think 13 cents now.

That is what has occurred under private enterprise governments. Their friends who have those shares made a bundle. They bought them at ten bucks. I refuse to buy stocks. I inherited the ones I have, a whole 100 shares. I have fun looking at the financial pages. I have begun to look at other issues of bonds and stocks.

There is the whole issue of privatizing. It is terrible for the government to own anything. It is going to privatize Air Canada for example. It conned 4,000 employees, even though I told them not to, into buying shares at ten bucks a share. It told them of the glories of free enterprise, profits, dividends, ad nauseam. You will be lucky, Mr. Speaker, to get three bucks for those shares. If you can get three bucks for them and if anybody in this place has them get rid of them quick.

We have been in the hands of incompetents. When they talk about governing according to sound business practices I would not let them manage my chicken coop if I had one. I am not just criticizing the government. I say the same thing about the Liberals. They were masters at it.

When the Liberals got excited about the deficit and the debt they made some cutbacks. Not as many as we have today but for those days there were quite a few. You should have heard those stories. They were up screaming their heads off about those cutbacks. They raised hell. They moved want of confidence motions. The cuts were as welcome as a skunk at a garden party. That is how they acted.

Then the Tories defeated the Liberals, as if that was a big deal. I will be darned. The next thing I know the Liberals are getting up raising heck about the Tory cutbacks. Talk about pots calling kettles black. That is a little much. They sure did not fool us fellows down at this end of the Chamber. I do not think they fooled many people in the country. When I go to Gopher Gulch and Grasshopper Flats and when my colleagues go back home to their people or when they travel around this country, we find it is not being swallowed. It is not being believed.

We have moved a subamendment. It is not only to try to defeat the government. That is a minor detail. That is going to happen anyway, if not this year then next year, whenever. It is not long for this world. We moved on a basis of some kind of principle and policy. We are having a little difficulty with the Tories enunciating policy because they are victimized with the present government, especially Tory candidates for the leadership. They are a little bit hard put to announce policies. However I do not hear any nuts and bolts policies from the Liberals. I have listened to them for, God knows, 45 years, my membership in the NDP. In fact, the Liberals forced me into joining the NDP. They forced me. After I got out of the Armed Forces after the Second World War, I said: "My God, it's the only place for me to go". They drove me out, and they still drive me out.

There is nothing so obnoxious as a reformed sinner. If the hon. gentleman had just told me to come back, I would ask come back to what? He did not mind telling me to come back to what. If it is different from what we have got now I will be glad to listen to him.

It was no great move philosophically for somebody to move from the Tories to the Liberal Party, and vice versa. In the years I have been here I have seen a whole bunch of them do that. They can do it without even blushing. They do not even know how to do it the right way. The first thing you do is tell your leader, your caucus and then your own membership. Then you resign your seat and run for re-election with whatever new party you have chosen. That is called honour in politics. You wonder why Joe Citizen says "those damned politicians". That is one of the reasons. You have got the ethics of a tomcat that just came out of a back alley.

If I ever had to part company with the NDP—I do not think it will happen, I hope it never will—I would let the party know ahead of time at the national, provincial and federal levels. I would have the courtesy to tell it and then I would quit and get out of the way. Let it do what it wants to do because it would not listen to me before. That should apply to every member of any party.

Some people say we need a two party system. If it were a choice between the Grits and the Tories that would only be a one party system. The communists could take lessons. There is no fundamental basic philosophical difference between them. One wants to do "open for business, free enterprise, marketplace" quicker than the other.

Somebody should tell me what the difference is. When I said that those governments of any political party are hypnotized, I meant it. When they become so hypnotized, so mesmerized and so terrorized that they become immobilized then they have lost sight of the fact of why they are there, what they are there for and what they are there to do.

When the good times come is when to put money in the bank through taxes and whatnot. "Save for the rainy days", my mother always said. When it is bad times you share with all your fellow Canadians what it costs in order to have all of them live decently, in a decent home, with enough money for food and full opportunity for their children. We share that. If we are not going to share it we become the old 19th century jungle.

This budget puts us and keeps us in the jungle. I would be glad to pay an extra 1 per cent or 2 per cent or whatever on my income tax if I knew it would go toward that purpose. Nobody objects to the amount of taxes they pay if they know what they are going for and who they are going to benefit.

Today at a committee meeting there were a couple of individuals who make more than $250,000 a year. The poor fellows. When I see them I see corporations that make a profit. Even after their write-offs they do not pay any taxes. Now that is not totally unjustified and unfair. It was not just done by this government. The Liberals were saddled with it. In fact I think they started it.

An hon. member: 1974.

Mr. Benjamin: It goes back farther than that. They started giving those kind of benefits to corporations in the late 1930s and the early 1940s.

We are not going to be a party to this by either party. For all I know the Liberals are going to vote for our subamendment. I hope they do not because then I will worry about what we are doing wrong.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired. I will let him have another 30 seconds to wind up.

Mr. Benjamin: I implore Canadians to bring down this government and prevent a Liberal one from taking its place.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise today with pleasure to participate in this budget debate for a number of reasons. Hopefully, over the—

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I understand there should be a 10-minute question and answer period. Is no one going to ask me any questions? I would love it if they would. If they have any curve balls they would like to throw.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry, but there are no questions or comments.

Mr. Soetens: The reason I am participating in this debate is to talk about some of the good things in this budget, some of the things that have probably been mentioned by some of my colleagues and some of the things that have been opposed by some of those on the other side of the House. I would like to very briefly run through what I think are some of the highlights of the budget.

• (1845)

One of the first highlights in my opinion is the fact that there is no tax increase. I believe this is our third budget in which we have been able to do so. I have been here for five budgets. I feel quite comfortable in saying that we did not raise taxes in this budget, we did not introduce any new taxes in this budget and this is the third year we have managed to do that. In fact last year we reduced taxes in a number of areas. I wish we could have done that again this year.

For those who might say there were no tax changes simply because it is an election year, I can only refer back to last year and the year before and point out there were no tax changes in those years either.

Basically there are no tax increases in this because we on this side of the House understand what our constituents are saying and that is no tax increases. I am happy to say there are none.

There is another very positive aspect about this budget. There is no real growth in spending. I sent out a questionnaire to my constituents called "You be the finance minister". I asked them to tell how they would spend money if they were the finance minister.

Consistently the responses that came back to me were to freeze spending. In some cases they would have a little more in one area, offset by a saving in another, so that the bottom line remained the same. I am happy to report that this budget does exactly that. It freezes spending, the total amount, at what it was last year so there is no real growth in spending. Personally I think that is a very positive situation.

It goes a little further than that though as far as my view on this budget and why it is positive. There are some real important changes in this budget. There is one change that is in here that I might point out. If some member would like to ask me a question in a few moments about the helicopter contract, I would be happy to respond as to why I think it is such a good idea that this budget does not touch the helicopter contract.

Over and above that there are things it does touch and I would like to really emphasize those, such as the need for provincial co-operation. The deficit and debt of the Government of Canada are not just a problem of the federal government, but a problem that all the provincial governments have as well. What we have done with this budget is to say look let us bring everybody together, discuss the areas where we have a problem and see if we can arrive at some common solution between us. I think that is very positive.

There have been some cuts unfortunately but some of the cuts I do not have a problem supporting. For example the ERDA agreements. We hear the business community all the time talking about cutting grants to business. Lo and behold what did we do? We cancelled, we stopped funding the forestry economic agreements, the mining economic agreements. These are agreements which put taxpayer funds into private enterprise. We have cut them. It is interesting now that the business community affected by those cuts is complaining but that is the way life goes. Everybody expects you to cut, just not in their area.

More important, we have also signalled to all the provinces affected with the various economic development agreements that when their particular agreement comes up—there is a list of 10 or 12 of them—for renewal those in fact will be looked at and discussed and simply not automatically renewed. I think that is very positive.

We have talked about Public Service reform. I note Bob Rae in Ontario is talking about how he is going to cut 10,000 employees out of 900,000. He says Tories in Ottawa do not know how to do it. Well, 10,000 out of 900,000 versus our proposal for 16,500 out of 250,000. It seems to me Bob Rae has not got it quite right. To have the same equation he ought to be looking somehow at finding 50,000 or 60,000 jobs in the public service in Ontario that are not needed.

In fairness they may be needed and maybe Bob Rae cannot find more than 10,000 but if he is going to criticize our cuts he ought to look at the actual numbers to determine whether we are doing our share. I am happy to report that we are.

There are some other changes. There are the changes in the freight rate system we have in this country such as the Crow rate. I appreciate that does not affect my constituency. It is a very important benefit that we have established in this country for western Canadian grain farmers. We have said we are going to review that, we are going to see if there is some better way of helping grain farmers. That is a very positive thing to do.

Right now all we do is give that money to railroads. Maybe we ought to give it to the farmers to let them figure out if there is a better way of them bringing their product to market than using the railroads, That is healthy and puts a little competition against the railroads. I bet there are some trucking companies that would be quite prepared to say that they can haul the grain for less than the railroads. That benefits everybody if one can create some real good competition.

What does the end result of this budget bring forward? It brings forward a very important aspect of the debt and the deficit in this country. Deficits are of course a function of one's ability to pay. Our ability to pay has been improving. When we were elected the deficit as a percentage of the gross domestic product was over 8 per cent. This budget foresees that at the end of the next period of fiscal responsibility, which is a five-year phase, we expect that to be down to less than 1 per cent. That is a very positive step toward getting rid of the deficit that we have in front of us. We can better make the payments.

What is the opposition's alternative to that 1 per cent target? Its alternative is that we should have a 3 per cent target. That is certainly better than it is today. Today we are approaching 4 per cent. They think it ought to be 3 per cent. I commend them for that but why do we stop at 3 per cent? Why in this country should we be happy with a deficit of $25 billion or $20 billion a year? It was that mentality of the 1970s that got us into the 1980s and into the 1990s with this huge debt we have. There is this idea that it is okay to have 3 per cent of the income as a deficit. That is unacceptable.

I see in this budget that the Minister of Finance is very clearly saying that as we go out for the five-year period we are not only going to be below 4 per cent, the 3 per cent Liberal target and the 2 per cent target, we are going to have it down to less than 1 per cent.

What do all of those things do to the Canadian economy? We have had some discussion in this House about the forecasts that exist by various monitoring agencies about growth in Canada. I am happy to see that the International Monetary Fund is forecasting a growth in Canada of 4.4 per cent next year, which is the highest rate of growth of the seven major countries that they compared us to: United Kingdom, Italy, France, Germany, Japan and the U.S. None of them have a 4.4 per cent growth. We are number one next year in the forecast and of course for 1993 we will continue to be number one.

There are two other areas that I would very briefly like to touch on which emanate from last year's budget and that in a sense were responded to in this budget. Last year the finance committee did a review of the issue of quarterly instalments that people would have to pay if they owed income tax of $1,000 a year or less.

We recommended that level be raised. Now Canadians who owe $2,000 a year or less in income tax do not have to file quarterly instalments. That is a very direct recommendation that went to the Minister of Finance from the finance committee and, lo and behold, he delivered. It is very positive and very good for a lot of Canadians whether they are seniors or low income Canadians. In Canada it affects an awful lot of people very positively.

The second thing he dealt with was regulatory reform. In last year's budget the Minister of Finance asked the finance committee to review the process of regulatory reform in this country because it impacts on Canadian business and ultimately in the cost of everything Canadians buy in this country.

The finance committee set up a subcommittee that I chaired. I am happy to say that we issued a report back in September and filed it through to the House. The President of the Treasury Board today responded to this as a direct result of the previous budget. People will find that the Government of Canada has again listened to the problems and concerns of Canadians and the impact that they can have on business. Today we have a very positive response about changes they can make to the regulatory process.

Those are some of things that have caused me to be very positive about this budget. There are really many others. The ultimate feeling I have on this budget is to emphasize that the Government of Canada said no to spending increases, no to tax increases and yes to fiscal responsibility.

That is what I believe in and that is why I am here. I am glad to be able to support this budget because of that.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I was very much impressed with the presentation of the hon. member. We were listening carefully to those very good factual comments he was making. He mentioned that he does favour the purchase of helicopters. This has been very controversial in Canada. Personally I also agree with it. Could he perhaps enlighten us further as to some of these very valid reasons why the Canadian government should proceed with the helicopter purchase?

• (1855)

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that question. Right through my years of political involvement and in advance of that, I have always had the opinion that Canadian forces should have some of the most modern technology available. Part of the reason I had that opinion was because there were spin-off benefits to Canadians by having them supply modern technology.

I would just like to share a letter I received from one of my constituents in a business in Whitby called Andrew Canada Inc. It employs 154 people and has been located in the town of Whitby since 1953. It provides, among other things, communications technology to the helicopter program. It says, to be very blunt:

> We are currently negotiating a contract to design, develop and manufacture airborne radar antennas for the helicopters. Through technology transfer agreements related to the program we will acquire new, specialized skills and know-how which will not only enable us to fulfil the helicopter contract, but will also allow us to become recognized participants in the future airborne antenna market world-wide. The benefits of the program to us are potentially long term in excess of 15 years.

I should point out that there is a further benefit because I know that that is great for my riding. The letter goes on to say:

> Technology benefits will also flow down to our intended subcontractor in the maritimes, who will acquire new techniques for the fabrication of antenna reflectors.

I am happy to see that my concept of government buying technologically advanced pieces of equipment has the benefit of first giving our forces the proper modern equipment they should have, but secondly and more importantly, providing spin-off benefits. Very clearly here is a case in point where there will be spin-off benefits that will enable Canadian companies to be competitive world-wide with technologies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. The hon. member for Cambridge. They have split their time, just for the benefit of the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to participate in this year's budget debate.

I believe that the budget presented a couple of evenings ago is a credible fiscal plan with very realistic objectives. I think in recognition of the need to further enhance Canada's competitive position and the economic recovery, as my colleague mentioned just a few moments ago, the budget included no new taxes.

Another benefit I thought in the budget was that the fiscal plan features tight control over program spending with the growth held to the rate of inflation. In other words there is no growth at all in real terms.

My colleague, the member for Ontario mentions the finance committee. Two years ago our committee work included the development of the Spending Control Act. That resulted in a 3 per cent cap on the growth of program spending. This meant if expenditures on a program rose above the projection that it would have to be offset by reductions elsewhere.

The Spending Control Act did not allow increased borrowing or increased taxes to fund spending that was higher than planned. That was two years ago with a 3 per cent cap.

Of course we all know that as a result of this government's policies inflation now is below 2 per cent. I thought it was probably a good idea that maybe we should take a look at lowering this cap. That was my main recommendation to the Minister of Finance in the discussions leading up to the preparation of the budget. I am happy to say that he did listen.

I believe the new target that will be established will be 1.7 per cent. If we were to take a comparable figure from the U.S.A., it is 3.3 per cent. By putting controls and more caps on spending this will result in a savings of almost $3 billion by 1995.

People will ask whether this is a realistic target. I believe it is. The proposed spending control limit last year was $100.1 billion for the 1992-93 fiscal year. For that fiscal year the Minister of Finance presented main estimates of $99.1 billion. As such the 1993 budget presents a fiscally responsible plan that will deal with the federal deficit.

• (1900)

As acknowledged by the Minister of Finance there is only one taxpayer to foot the bills. The fiscal problem is a national problem that must be addressed by all levels of government working together.

Passing the federal fiscal problems on to the provinces would not have been productive especially from a taxpayer's point of view. Therefore the 1993 budget could have cut deeper and more quickly but this inevitably would have required substantial cuts in the major transfers to provinces.

However, in recognition of the fiscal difficulties that provinces are confronting the federal government chose to exempt transfers to provinces from further restraint. Instead of cutting transfers to provinces the budget laid out a process that will lead to a combined federal-provincial approach to our national debt problem.

Why has the Minister of Finance in recognition of Canada's collective fiscal problem asked his provincial counterparts to attend this special meeting? The purpose is to begin working with the federal government on a co-operative approach to developing practical solutions to the national debt problem.

I want to put a few facts on the record. In 1984-85 the federal deficit was $38.5 billion. In this year's budget it is $35 billion. In essence it stayed the same in dollar terms. The total deficit of all the provinces in 1984 was just slightly over $8 billion. Today the deficit of all provinces is $24 billion, which is a 300 per cent increase.

The message is that the provincial administrations now show the same symptoms that plagued the federal Liberals in the early 1980s: a combination of large deficits, growing debts and rising debt charges that mutually fuel each other.

Let us look at some of the pressures that were on governments to spend prior to today. We know for example that between 1975 and 1990 the combined health, social services and education sectors represented a large and growing source of spending pressure.

Relative to total program spending between 1975 and 1990 these health, social services and education costs rose by almost 5 percentage points as a percentage of gross domestic product.

What other factors have resulted in an increase in the GDP share of spending? First, we all know and recognize the growth in interest charges on the public debt. A second one is the growth in health care spending primarily reflected in the growing per capita demand for medical services.

When we talk about health care spending, what are some of the factors that are causing health care spending to increase? First, we have the aging of the Canadian population. We are seeing new medical technologies which result in new treatments. We are also seeing the growth in the number of services per physician within a system that pays physicians on a fee for service basis.

That is the past and we all recognize those pressures on spending. What about the future? Where are we going to see the future pressures on spending? One will be because of changes in demands for existing programs. For example, the aging of the population will continue to increase and as a proportion of the population the demand for medical care and age care facilities will clearly increase.

At the same time there will be a drop in the age of university students that will result in lower university enrolment. We are seeing the same pressures, because of the economic restructuring, on unemployment insurance, in the Canada Assistance Plan and in labour market training.

People want to see more money spent on environment and justice issues. We have some things that are going to lower the cost to government such as falling interest rates, falling inflation and certainly the increased public concern on the over-all level of taxation.

What I want to do is quickly summarize. The spending pressures I have mentioned on health care, education, employee retraining, environment and justice are all issues that are a joint responsibility between the provinces and Ottawa. In many cases Ottawa is just a silent financial partner. It makes sense to me that if we are going to deal with these spending pressures, does Ottawa do it unilaterally? Does the finance minister just say that this is the way it is going to be and download the problems on to the provinces? Or do they want to work together?

I congratulate the finance minister who has demonstrated the desire to give co-operative federalism a chance to work and an opportunity so that all governments at all levels can move in the same direction in reducing the debt and encouraging economic growth.

I trust that in that forum the moral suasion of the taxpayers will encourage the federal and provincial finance ministers to succeed together.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, one really has to wonder why the finance minister brought in his spring 1993 budget. It is completely lifeless. It has no imagination, no ideas, no strategy to address our pressing economic problems and no hope for the 1.5 million unemployed Canadians.

It shows beyond all doubt that this government has run out of gas. It is old and tired. The only thing left is for this government to be put away into the history books. I am confident Canadian voters will do just that in the coming election.

This budget must be particularly galling to the few remaining supporters of federal Conservatives who believe the government was serious about attacking the deficit. The budget does nothing about deficit reduction. In fact it forecasts an increase of over $1 billion in the deficit.

To many of us, however, that comes as no surprise. This government has talked big about deficit reduction, almost from the first day it took office in 1984. Consider the fact that the deficit is $8 billion over its 1992 projection, a projection given by the finance minister. Right now it stands well over $30 billion. In the meantime our debt under almost nine years of Tory rule has shot up well over 100 per cent, from about $169 billion to almost $460 billion.

This government has howled long and hard about the deficit it inherited. That may well have been fair at the time it took office, but the government cannot avoid its responsibilities. It has had nine long years to deal with our deficit and debt problems and in that regard it has failed miserably. Blaming politicians from another time just does not wash.

The 1993 budget does absolutely nothing to address the severe problems of unemployment. There are at least 1.5 million Canadians out of work and I suspect the real figure is well above that. There is no hope for the unemployed in this budget. There are no attempts at job creation, no strategy to get people back to work. Let us face it. Until we dramatically reduce unemployment there is no hope of returning to prosperity and attacking the deficit in both absolute terms and as a percentage of the gross domestic product.

Over and above the pain they inflict on workers and their families the huge unemployment figures are damaging to the economy. It is estimated the cost of one million unemployed Canadians is somewhere between $20 billion and $25 billion annually. A big chunk of that is the payout through unemployment insurance, $19 billion a year right now. That is a huge cost to our economy. Think what we could do with $19 billion if the unemployed were working. I should say here that the $19 billion does not include welfare payments.

Moreover, if we create jobs for the unemployed they in turn will regain their rightful status as productive citizens. They will pay taxes on their earnings. That is how the government will be able to reduce, if not totally eliminate the deficit.

• (1910)

Economic growth and creating jobs are the essential tools in attacking the deficit. Another tool is controlling government spending and eliminating waste is part of that. This government believes only that cuts in government services promise a return to prosperity. That is not true. Without economic growth, without creating jobs, this economy is not going anywhere. It can talk all it wants about increased productivity but if we do not get economic growth and we do not get more jobs, the economy is not going anywhere.

Canada needs a new vision. Canada needs new fiscal management. The old Tory crowd does not have it. They are over their heads. At a time like this my advice to the government is quite simple: Stand aside and let someone with ideas and vision take over.

We have a vision. We have proposed, for example, an infrastructure program to pump some life in the short term back into the economy. A renewed physical infrastructure is one of the building blocks of a new prosperity. We have proposed a national apprenticeship program. This would involve the co-operation of senior governments, the private sector, labour and educational institutions.

The private sector needs trained young workers. Many students grow disillusioned with the traditional school system. I should point out that Germany graduates about 600,000 apprentices a year while we graduate only 24,000. An apprenticeship program would be a challenging alternative for many of these students. It would help them make the transition from school into the work force.

We also propose a Canada youth service. This program would enable young people to give service to their country and develop essential skills and work habits in the process.

We would build a value added economy. That is the way of the future. We are far too prone in Canada to market raw materials. When we ship raw materials out of the country for processing, we are shipping jobs out of Canada. That is why we assign so much importance to value added activity.

We would revitalize the small business sector. While the government has been cosying up to big international business, small business has been neglected. When the government was killing the economy with high interest rates and the high dollar, the pleas of small business were ignored. Ask small businesses about their problems in getting financial assistance from banks or other financial institutions. We are committed to addressing that problem.

We are also committed to a global trade strategy. I emphasize it is a global trade strategy. Beyond our difficulties with the free trade agreement, our trading interests transcend the United States. We must look for trade growth in Latin America and the Pacific Rim.

Another move we Liberals would make, and this perhaps is the most important of all, is that we would forge new partnerships with all stakeholders in Canada. That includes the provinces, the private sector, labour, the municipalities and volunteer agencies. We have thought long and hard about this new approach to our problems because the Tory approach has been a disaster.

Leaving it to the big boys does not work. Trickle down does not work. It did not work in Britain. It did not work in the United States, where trickle down took that country from the greatest creditor country to the greatest debtor nation. That took only eight years under that dreadful actor from Hollywood.

Perhaps the most disturbing aspect of the finance minister's budget is its central message and that message is this: Tory economics work, everything is okay and the government is not changing a thing, it is staying the course. It is that message that tells us just how out of touch this government is.

I want to remind everyone that there are at least 1.5 million Canadians unemployed. Almost 400,000 manufacturing jobs have been lost, lost forever. There have been over 200,000 business and personal bankruptcies since 1989 and about one million Canadians depend on food banks every year. Despite the havoc wrought by Tory policies the finance minister pays no attention to them. If he had admitted to even some self-doubt perhaps his budget would have received more understanding.

Marshall Cohen, the chief executive officer of the Molson companies, recently questioned the standard faith of neo-conservative economics. That faith says that the current economic restructuring will pay off, that ultimately for every job eliminated two will be created. Mr. Cohen says it is time to question that faith and it is time to think that Canada is not heading for a jobless recovery but a jobless economy.

I think Mr. Cohen is in touch with reality. This government's finance minister is not. His mind is elsewhere. There is no indication that he will ever come to his senses. There is only one remedy for this. All Canadians know what that remedy is and I think they are more than eager to apply it at the next election.

I want to finish by saying that the budget cuts about $90 million from regional development in the current fiscal year and another $100 million in 1995. To me that is madness. Regional development has been a unique Canadian way to develop the economy from coast to coast. It has been of particular help to the have-less regions. I come from a have-less region.

In Winnipeg we have called for a new core area agreement. This budget is not going to give us that. We have called for a new cultural industries agreement, something like the one we had a few years ago, one that created a lot of jobs and provided a lot of spin-offs in the economy. It looks like we are not going to get it. This budget does absolutely nothing for the port of Churchill, a port that must be preserved and if preserved would be a great help to prairie farmers.

I will conclude by adding one comment to a remark made by the member for Ontario. He boasted about this budget taking 300,000 Canadians off the list who until now have paid quarterly income tax instalments. He is right that far. What he neglected to say is that while the government is proposing to take 300,000 people off that list, the government has added 500,000 new names to the list of those who have to pay quarterly tax instalments. I wanted to mention that in order that his remarks are put in their proper context.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to put a few comments on the record about employment.

The manufacturing sector in Ontario has begun to see the recovery. Since October manufacturing employment has risen by 2.5 per cent or 42,000 jobs in Ontario. Since August 1992 in Canada full-time employment has increased 200,000. So far this year full-time employment has increased 66,000 across Canada. At this pace that would represent a 260,000 job increase. I wanted to put those comments on the record.

I would also like to put this comment on the record. This comes from Conestoga College. It is a release indicating its graduates are doing well in securing employment. It says: "The 1991-92 graduates of Conestoga College did well in locating and securing employment within six months of completing their program of study. Of the 838 graduates available for employment, 694 almost 700, or 83 per cent were successful. In spite of the economic uncertainty employers continue to demonstrate their confidence in our program by hiring Conestoga College graduates. Eighty-two per cent of our graduates found employment, 62 per cent of them directly related to the their programs".

This is excellent news in these times of high unemployment. Conestoga College in Kitchener is doing an excellent job in producing graduates. I wonder if the hon. member wants to congratulate the students in their success, but also all those companies that are starting to grow, making employment for these graduating students.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I am always prepared to offer my congratulations to anyone who is able to prosper in this country, to do well despite Tory economic policies and that is what is happening. A lot of people out there are showing plenty of resourcefulness and industry despite the disastrous policies of the government.

Let me just say that this member and all other members on that side of the House can crow about certain success stories. That is fine in itself, but we are not going to have true prosperity and success in turning the economy around until we get people back to work. It is a Pyrrhic victory. That is what it is.

The member for Cambridge mentions those figures. They are happy figures. I am happy for them, but we have to address unemployment. Until we get the unemployment figures down we will not get the deficit down, we will not get the debt down, and we really will not have a return of prosperity. That is where the government is wrong. It does not seem to understand that until it attacks the unemployment problem this economy is never going to go anywhere.

Having increased productivity and increased trade figures is only a partial answer. It does not answer the misery people are feeling out there. There is a lot of despair because they do not have jobs and they lack confidence in the future.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, this budget is nothing more than a stale leftover from last December's failed economic statement, twice warmed over and reheated. In fact in the dying days of this Conservative government I cannot help but think of this budget as one of the first signs of rigor mortis setting in.

There is absolutely nothing in this budget that will get the economy moving again and will put Canadians back to work. Canada's 11 per cent unemployment is the highest of any G-7 country. There are 1.5 million Canadians still looking for work and suffering hardships in society that they should not be suffering in this day and age.

On page 21 of the budget the Minister of Finance says:

> The medium-term projection underlying the fiscal plan is based on the assumption that some excess capacity in labour and product markets will remain through 1998.

That is little hope for the unemployed. In plain English this has made it clear there will not be enough jobs for Canadians five years from now if this government stays in office.

Studies have confirmed that unemployed Canadians cost the federal government more than $20 billion a year each and every year this government remains in office. These unemployed people are not able to contribute to society, contribute to our economy and feed back through the system.

In 1991, 1.4 million Canadians were out of work and last year 1.5 million were out of work. If over the last two years half these people had been working, the government would have saved close to $40 billion. That is $10 billion more than this budget proposes to cut mostly four or five years from now.

Nor is there anything in this budget for Canadian youth who already face dismal summer job prospects. Youth unemployment is currently at 17.6 per cent. With this budget the government is now telling Canadians that it is going to solve all of its economic problems by assuming strong economic growth. Yet the government has no detailed economic plan to nurture innovation, training and infrastructure, the building blocks of a strong and prosperous economy.

However the government's own budget document states that projected growth "will not bring the economy to full capacity utilization for 1998". In other words, Canada is still in for five more years of recession-like conditions with economic activity at levels well below that of the 1980s.

There are no economic priorities in a $5.8 billion face-saving gesture for the Minister of National Defence. The budget keeps Canada's helicopter program intact, and meanwhile the Tories are stealing from the poor by postponing their January GST tax rebate.

The 1992-93 deficit is $8 billion higher than the Minister of Finance said it would be in the February 1992 budget and $1.1 billion more than he said it would be in his economic statement last December.

No wonder the dollar is dropping. No wonder there are questions about our credit rating. Not even Bay Street believes this government any more.

• (1925)

In 1989 the government forecasted a national debt of $440 billion in 1993-94. Now it is forecasting a debt of $491 billion. That is an increase of $51 billion over the last three years in its forecast. In fact the $35.5 billion deficit for 1992 is the highest deficit ever reported in the House of Commons. In 1984 when the government was first elected there was an accumulated debt of $168 billion, accumulated in the 117 years since Confederation.

However, after only nine years of this government's mismanagement, the debt ballooned to $458 billion. So much for fiscal management and the Conservative 1988 election slogan of "managing change".

This economy is not a gambling table. We need solid forecasting. We need solid projections. We need solid growth in this country. It cannot be achieved through the roll of the dice. So much for fiscal management.

The government claims the budget will deliver $30 billion in spending cuts and other measures. Only $3.8 billion is forecasted to be delivered in the upcoming fiscal year. Out of that $2.8 billion was already announced in December and $615 million is only a shift in the timing of the GST credit. Calling that a saving is like skipping December's mortgage payment and claiming in January that money has been saved.

The projections of the Minister of Finance confirm that the Conservative leadership candidates, the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of the Environment, were out to lunch when they promised to eliminate the deficit in four to five years respectively. Either that or the leading Tory leadership candidates are saying the Minister of Finance does not know what he is talking about.

More than the Minister of Finance do not know what they are talking about. The candidates do not know what they are talking about. Unless they come out with some creative new programs that will stimulate the economy it is going to get even worse.

There are no positive viewpoints. I should say that perhaps one of the things that might be close to being positive would be that there are no additional cuts to the federal-provincial transfer payments. Three hundred thousand Canadians, mostly senior citizens, will no longer have to pay income tax in quarterly instalments. I was pleased to see there were no further tax increases.

However, after 38 consecutive tax increases by this government, this commitment is a case of too little too late.

Since 1984 revenues collected from persons have increased by 126 per cent while revenues collected from corporations have increased by only 1.8 per cent. This budget does not improve that. It offers yet another series of measures designed to save corporations $400 million over the next five years and no similar tax break for ordinary Canadians.

I do note in this budget document the government finally recognizes that since 1984 Canada has been buying more goods and services from other countries than we have been selling and thus we have had record current account deficits. I have spoken about this in the House before on at least three or four different occasions. Last spring Canada was running a record current account deficit of $29 billion. In 1984, before this government was elected, the current account deficit did not exist. There was a current account surplus of some $2.7 billion.

We have not had a single quarter, let alone a single year, in which we recorded current account surpluses since this government came to power. Arthur Donnor, a prominent economist, argues that each $20 billion worth of current account deficits equates to roughly 500,000 jobs lost. Now we know where the jobs went. It is the current account deficits.

The interest payments and the dividends going out of this country are draining our economy, a haemorrhage that must be stopped.

In terms of agriculture I was shocked to read the budget papers because I saw what was happening to the method of payment of the Crow. I am going to put on record a letter from Prairie Pools Inc. It says that the federal budget is a coercion. It is dated Monday, April 26, 1993. I quote:

> The Federal Government's plan to cut an additional 10 per cent from its expenditures on western grain transportation assistance unless there is a change in the method of payment amounts to coercion of western grain and oilseed producers.
> "It appears to us that since the government has not been able to get agreement from farmers to change the method of payment through consultation, it has decided to force the issue with spending cuts," said PPI Chairman Ken Edie.
> The federal budget indicates that on top of the 10 per cent cut announced for 1993–94—another 5 per cent will be cut in 1995–96 and another 5 per cent will be cut in 1996–97. However, it also indicates that these cuts could be reallocated to support a change to a producer payment for the federal assistance.
> The 10 per cent cuts announced in the December economic statement will remove $73 million from the prairie agriculture industry in each of the next two crop years. The additional cuts announced in the budget today would take another $65 million out of the prairie farm economy. "These are cuts that farmers who are already suffering from depressed prices and rising input costs, can ill afford, " said Mr. Edie.
> "Prairie farmers have always tried to work with governments to develop policy and programs in the best interests of the industry and the national economy," said Mr. Edie. "We believe that changes should be made through negotiation and agreement by all major stakeholders, not through strong arm methods".

• (1930)

To include such coercion in a budget that completely circumvents the consultation process is unacceptable to society. Where is the trust this country is built on?

We need something positive. We need to rekindle the spirit of pride that built this nation. We need to rekindle the spirit of positive programs, programs that those on this side of the House are prepared to deliver.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex. He talked in terms of billions and I would like to put it in simpler terms.

Being from Ontario, when Bob Rae took office 12 cents of every tax dollar went to pay the debt. If he does not get his social contract with the 900,000 public servants in Ontario, by the end of two years 26 cents of every tax dollar will go toward the debt.

I mention this because people can understand it. Back in 1979 the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans stood in the House and proposed a budget of 18 cents a gallon, and the voters turfed him out because everyone could understand 18 cents.

In 1967 when the Liberals were in office, centennial year, 11 cents of every dollar went toward the debt. That left 89 cents for program spending. By 1983 as a result of Liberal fiscal management, 32 cents of every tax dollar went to pay interest on the debt and that left only 68 cents for programs plus what had to be borrowed.

Instead of talking in billions would the hon. member, my colleague from Ontario, please explain to me in simple terms how going from 11 cents of each tax dollar to 32 cents has not caused a hole, exactly the same hole that Bob Rae is causing for the next government in Ontario?

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I really appreciate the question. The member raised a very good issue. Over 24 years, from 1960 to 1983, the increased cost of servicing the debt amounted to 21 cents. Then in the Tory years that followed it ballooned to 43.2 cents.

I cannot speak on behalf of socialists in Ontario. I understand there is a difference of opinion between them and socialists here in Ottawa and I do not want to get into that today.

I point out that one thing that really concerns me is that a lot of those public debt charges are going out of the country. They have borrowed outside Canada. In 1984, 92 per cent of all federal government borrowings were from Canadians: Canadian banks, lending institutions and Canadians themselves.

That has dropped off dramatically. That is one of the things that is wrong with this government's policy. It is not borrowing the money from Canadians who want to reinvest in Canada. It is borrowing it offshore and the interest is all going out of the country. Is it any wonder we are in deep trouble? It is going out of the country. It is not benefiting Canadians. It is not giving them a chance to invest in their own country.

• (1935)

That is why I say that with positive programs we can rekindle a sense of pride in being Canadian and rebuild this country. We have done it before after both world wars and we will do it again. Just watch us.

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate on the April 26 budget, but above all I would like to send a message to my constituents in Hochelaga—Maisonneuve.

First of all, there will be no tax increases.

I would like to go on to the measures announced in the budget and provide some background as well. There will be no new taxes, less government borrowing, lower taxes, more jobs and more choices for the future. That is what people want and that is the direction in which this government is going.

Spending cuts, together with other measures in this budget and combined with the cutbacks announced in the December 1992 statement, will yield savings of $3.8 billion in 1993–94, rising to $7.9 billion in 1997–98. Over the five-year period the total savings will be more than $30.7 billion.

Between 1993–94 and 1997–98 the average annual growth of program spending will be maintained at 1.7 per cent. This means that, allowing for inflation, there will be zero real growth in program spending.

Reducing the deficit means less government borrowing, lower interest rates and lower taxes, all of which will stimulate economic growth and job creation.

The budget reinforces the action taken in the February 1992 budget and the December 1992 statement, both containing measures aimed at supporting economic recovery.

Specific measures include a one-year exemption from unemployment insurance premiums for new employees of small businesses; a 10 per cent investment tax credit for small businesses; an increase in the loan limit under the Small Businesses Loans Act to $250,000, and a two-year extension of the Small Business Financing Program.

Cuts in personal income taxes and enriching and restructuring the child benefit system will inject $1.7 billion into the economy this year alone. However, we are not the only ones facing financial challenges. These are difficult times and many countries are carrying a heavy load. In fact most are introducing spending cuts similar to our own.

Measures to promote job creation are also included in this budget, which reinforces the measures introduced in the February 1992 budget and the December 1992 economic and fiscal statement by focusing on a sound monetary and fiscal policy, streamlining government spending, upgrading the skills of Canadians and encouraging the private sector to expand and create jobs.

It is essential to restore the financial health of the private sector and thus restore its confidence and facilitate the investment that is essential to economic growth and job creation.

• (1940)

The home buyers' plan helps Canadians buy or build homes using funds from their RRSPs, and last year 148,000 Canadians took advantage of this plan.

The government has made accommodation more affordable for Canadians, thanks to lower interest rates, the possibility of using RRSP funds for the initial downpayment on a home, and the availability of 95 per cent mortgage insurance for first home buyers.

The federal government, operating through the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, will no longer fund housing through 35-year subsidy commitments which impose most of the costs on future taxpayers.

However CMHC will look at ways to increase efficiencies in the financing and delivery of its programs and resulting savings will be reinvested in social housing to maintain existing housing stock in good repair and provide some scope for new commitments. Increased efficiencies will be obtained as a result of direct funding.

CMHC will maintain its current funding level of about $2 billion a year. Similarly, special purpose funding for shelters for victims of family violence, the National Strategy for the Integration of Persons with Disabilities and for native housing on reserves will continue.

Considering the overriding need to restrain spending increases and control the deficit and the national debt, the federal government cannot afford to let new social housing commitments accumulate as it did in the past.

The government, through the Canada Housing and Mortgage Corporation, will be able to maintain its housing stock by spending $2 billion annually and thus meet the needs of 650,000 low income families seeking accommodation. Quebec's subsidy share will remain more or less the same, at $685 million annually. Furthermore, a safety net including the cost of shelter for the indigent will still be provided under the Canada Assistance Plan.

To help control unemployment insurance costs and protect the integrity of the unemployment insurance account the average benefit rate will be maintained at 57 per cent of average weekly insurable earnings after 1995.

For the sake of comparison, in the United States the benefit rate is 50 per cent for a period of six months, while in Japan the rate is 48 per cent for a maximum of 7 months. Canada, with its rate of 57 per cent for a maximum of 12 months compares very favourably in this respect.

In the December 1992 statement we announced that funding for regional development would be reduced by 10 per cent for both 1993-94 and 1994-95.

As a result of measures introduced in the present budget, funding will be reduced by a further $90 million in 1993-94 up to a total of $415 million in 1997-98.

As for repayable contributions, by 1997-98 regional development funding will be reduced by $100 million per year, based on the pool of funds expected as a result of the contribution repayment policy announced in the 1990 budget.

I see you are signalling, Mr. Speaker, but I have not quite finished.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have a couple of minutes left plus 10 minutes for questions or comments when the budget debate starts again.

It being 7.45 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings, pursuant to Standing Order 84(4), and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the amendment to the amendment that is now before the House. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

CONCURRENCE IN 89TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, with leave of the House, I move:

> That the 89th report of the Standing Committee on House Management, tabled earlier today, be concurred in.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent to put the motion?

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, in view of what has transpired on previous occasions I wonder if the parliamentary secretary would just give a brief description of the contents of the report as he did yesterday with regard to the 88th report.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: With great pleasure, Madam Speaker. The 89th report of the House Management Committee recommends changes to the list of members at large to serve on committees in the Departmental envelope. In a few moments the Clerk will read the changes proposed in this 89th report.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: If consent is given and since the report has been presented, I will ask the clerk at the table to please read the text of the report so that members may know its contents. I will then put the question on the motion.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, in this first instance I have petitioners who ask the government to remove the GST on books and learning materials. They point out that it has hurt students, artists, publishers and the industry generally. They also point out that it does not contribute to increased productivity of our society in general. The petitioners feel it is counterproductive to the development of Canadian society.

RADIO AND TELEVISION PROGRAMMING

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, in this other petition the petitioners ask Parliament to ensure that the CRTC carefully regulates the use of foul language in radio and television programming.

The petitioners also ask that the whole aspect of violence be examined carefully. They point out that it is not necessary to do that in order to entertain or inform, whether it be in English, French or any other language.

[Translation]

In the latter case, I have petitioners who are asking Parliament to ensure that proper language is used on radio and television. They also ask Parliament to ensure that acts of violence are not allowed on radio and television because they say it often goes against what they are trying to do in raising their families.

[English]

TRADE

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I also have the honour to rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 and present a petition signed by numerous Albertans, principally from Calgary but from Edmonton and other centres as well. I just noted now one person from Helena, Montana. It must be the first time that person at least has ever petitioned the Canadian House of Commons.

In any event, the petitioners point out that if implemented the North American free trade agreement will result in further restrictions being placed on the ability of Canada's federal, provincial and territorial governments now and in the future from assisting Canadian industry, conserving Canadian natural resources for Canadian benefit and advancing needed social programs.

Therefore the petitioners call upon this House to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement. They recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

CRIMES AGAINST CHILDREN

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I have here 10,000 signatures on a petition in memory of all children who have suffered at the hands of others.

We have formed this petition to stress our belief that the penalties in respect of child molesters and child murderers are far too lenient in this country.

• (1015)

The petitioners strongly request that this petition be heard as the people's voice to reinstate capital punishment for child murderers and to stiffen penalties for child molesters. If we cannot protect our children from people who commit these heinous crimes, then who will? The petitioners call upon Parliament to enact legislation against this type of offender.

I also have a series of petitions from thousands of other petitioners in memory of Shannon Dawn Morrissette-Bird and all children who have suffered at the hands of others. This petition is also a request for capital punishment for child murderers and stiffer penalties for child molesters.

I have another series of petitions from thousands of petitioners in memory of Corinne "Punky" Gustavson and all children who have suffered at the hands of others.

The petitioners have formed this petition to express their beliefs that the penalties with respect to child molesters and child murderers are far too lenient in this country. They strongly request that this petition be heard as the people's vote to reinstate capital punishment for child murderers and to stiffen penalties for child molesters. If we cannot protect our children from the people who commit these heinous crimes, then who will? Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to enact legislation against this type of offender.

Again I present petitions from thousands of petitioners in memory of Corinne "Punky" Gustavson. They strongly request stiffer penalties for child molesters and capital punishment for child murderers.

All those petitioners are from Calgary, Alberta.

These petitioners request that convicted sex offenders be housed with the general prison population and not be given special treatment.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, Question No. 455 will be answered today .

[Text]

Question No. 455—Mr. MacWilliam:

With respect to the "Canada, Buy Into It" campaign, (a) what was the total cost of phase I of the campaign (b) what is the projected cost of phase II of the campaign (c) how much of the cost of phase I on the campaign was attributed to paid advertising?

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): With respect to the "Canada, Buy Into It" campaign, the breakdown is as follows:

(a) $4.45 million total cost phase I

(b) $.672 million total cost phase II

(c) $3.864 million attributed to paid advertising phase I.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, would you be so kind as to called starred Questions Nos. 428 and 446?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Questions Nos. 428 and 446.

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, I ask that starred Question No. 428 be printed without being read.

[Text]

*Question No. 428—Mr. Nowlan:

With respect to Hollis Harris, president of Air Canada, is he (a) a Canadian citizen and, if not, what is the status of his immigration (b) is he qualified to work in Canada under the Designated Occupations List for Immigrants (c) is he working in Canada under any section of the free trade agreement and, if so, what section?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The Privacy Act prevents the Minister of Employment and Immigration from discussing the details of immigration cases. Therefore, the government cannot provide the details of Mr. Harris' status other than to say that the Minister of Employment and Immigration is responsible for ensuring that all foreign workers working in Canada meet the requirements of the Immigration Act as it pertains to foreign workers; that responsibility has been fulfilled in this case; and, Mr. Harris' employment does not come within the auspices of the free trade agreement.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, if starred Question No. 446 could be made an Order for Return, that return would be tabled immediately.

[Text]

*Question No. 446—Mr. Duhamel:

Since November 21, 1988, what has been the total procurement by the federal government (a) in the province of Manitoba (i) per year and (ii) by department (b) in the United States (i) per year and (ii) by department?

Return tabled.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Point of order, Madam Speaker. Before the parliamentary secretary asks that all questions stand I want to indicate to you, Madam Speaker, and to the parliamentary secretary that time on the clock is running out. The House is due to close on June 23. There was Easter break when the House was adjourned for approximately seven days.

However, when one looks at questions on the Order Paper I just want to bring to the attention of the Chair something I think is quite important. Questions Nos. 307, 317, 318, 326, 386, 387, 404, 406, 421, 422, 423, 446, 448, 464 in the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and question No. 465 are well over a year old.

As the appropriate identification to the question so states, the response is to be provided within a 45-day period. We have gone well beyond that on many of the questions. I raise this point along with other questions Nos. 467, 472, 475, 484, 486, 488, 493, 502, 503, 504, 505 and 506. I raise these matters while keeping in mind that we do have a short period of time. Members wish to have answers to those questions. The government is grossly negligent in not responding to those questions, which within the purview of the Standing Orders it must do within 45 days.

A number of the questions that I referred to, and I want to be fair to the parliamentary secretary, have just been asked in the last number of weeks by members on this side of the House.

I wish to serve notice to the parliamentary secretary that I will raise this subject matter again on Monday of next week. I would hope that at a bare minimum the questions that have gone well beyond the 45-day limit will be responded to by the appropriate ministers or the appropriate action pursuant to the Standing Orders will be followed by the parliamentary secretary.

I realize the parliamentary secretary is a very active, learned and experienced colleague. He has done a superb job as a parliamentary secretary. However he better start talking to those members on the front bench who have been ragging the puck. I would hope that he would get some answers forthwith from these ministers who have been grossly negligent, unlike previous ministers of the Crown. I refer to the former Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am glad this was a point of order and we did not enter into debate.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, briefly on the same point because I am sure the hon. member from Winnipeg would like to get on with the opposition day motion, and we would all love to hear him.

The fact is this matter that is raised by the opposition House leader deserves more attention than it has been getting. I would remind the Chair and hon. members that the 45-day limit was put in place at the time of the reforms of the House and the Standing Orders in the mid-1980s as a kind of trade off in return for members not being able to ask as many questions as they used to be able to ask.

There was a time when members were able to ask an absolutely limitless number of questions and the government at that time felt this was putting a burden on them. The trade off was that members would not be able to ask an infinite number of questions but in return the questions they did ask would be answered within a defined period of time.

What do we do about a government that shows routine contempt for the Standing Orders in this respect? These questions are to be answered within 45 days. That is what the Standing Orders say. It poses a problem for parliamentary reform when we run into a situation in which the government simply ignores not only the spirit of parliamentary reform, it has done that, but the letter of parliamentary reform. It is actually required to answer these questions within 45 days and it is routinely not doing so.

I would ask the Chair to take this matter under consideration and perhaps at some point consider making a comment as to what the House should do to protect itself from a government that so blatantly neglects and acts in contempt of its own Standing Orders.

[Translation]

Mr. Kindy: On the same point of order, Madam Speaker. I have a few comments on the same topic. I think it is unacceptable for the government not to answer within the prescribed period as ordered by Parliament. I would like to know whether the Chair could perhaps explain to the government that there is no double standard. If the Standing Orders apply to individual members, they should also apply to the government.

• (1025)

Ministers are members of Parliament, and if they want Parliament to respect them, they should obey the Standing Orders as ratified by Parliament.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair takes this very seriously. In fact, the matter was referred last week to the Standing Committee on House Management, and I expect we will get a reply very shortly. Meanwhile, the parliamentary secretary has enumerated a list of questions which have been answered today. Regarding question No. 446, which happens to be one of the questions referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, if the House agrees to have this question made an Order for Return, that return will be tabled immediately.

As for question No. 428, with leave of the House, it will be printed without being read. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) moved:

That this House condemns the lack of leadership, the evasion of accountability and responsibility and the inadequate credibility of the Minister of National Defence that have exposed members of the Canadian forces on difficult and sensitive peacekeeping missions to unnecessary vulnerability and that contribute to the gravity of national fiscal problems by her persisting in the acquisition of enormously expensive equipment designed for missions no longer contemplated.

He said: Madam Speaker, one of the phrases that I have long remembered was said by Thomas Paine, the American revolutionary. He said: "We have in our power to begin the world all over again. The birth day of a new world is at hand". It is probably the ultimate axiom of our time when we see the incredible changes going on. I have thought of those words many times when I have watched the change in the cold war, the major progress we have made in reducing nuclear weapons, the enormous sense of human aspiration as it breaks out around the world to establish new democratic market economies and political systems. It has been a really exhilarating time.

History has a way of playing cruel games. This new freedom has also brought with it some tragic and gut-wrenching events. We have added the awful words "ethnic cleansing" to our vocabulary. We have seen scenes of genocide and massacres we thought we would never again witness in this world.

There is no question we are living in a time that has to bring out the best of leadership in defining a new world order, in defining a new sense of the rule of law, and redesigning and rethinking many of our basic premises and policies and ways of doing things.

Canadians have been right at the epicentre of these changes. As a result of our past experience and the reputation that was won by a variety of diplomats and governments and peacekeepers we have been seen as a country that is able to respond to these new challenges and has been asked to do so.

It also means that some very tough choices have to be faced. The world is not the way it was. The kind of interventions that are taking place in Bosnia, Cambodia and Somalia have created a brand new generation of peacemaking requirements. We really are living in what the historians would call a defining moment when there must be a new set of judgments, ideas, and directions formulated. It must be done in openness, in a democratic way, with the full consent of the governed so that people will understand what those changes mean, the implications for them, so that they are able to support and provide a consensus in terms of moving into this area, at times a treacherous but fascinating world, and so that Canada can play a role of distinction, honour and integrity.

What have we received instead? We have received paeans of praise to the old way of doing things, retrenchment in the status quo, evasion, arrogance, indifference, and sometimes downright lying and misleading.

It has been one of the worst moments for Canadians in terms of looking for leadership and getting instead a ducking, bobbing, weaving, hiding attitude from the Minister of National Defence. She is not prepared to face up to either the responsibilities of office or the greater responsibilities of leadership.

Consider the case of the fundamental priorities of our defence security system. It did not take analysis of great depth to recognize that increasingly the responsibilities of peacemaking will hit the centre of our security strategy and the ability of Canada to respond in a multilateral international way to a variety of conflicts, both military responses and responses of our aid workers and others to help build societies, which is very much at the centre of our foreign policy requirements.

That means a basic rescaling of where we spend our money, where we put our priorities, how we train our people, and where we allocate our resources. Look at what has happened. In the defence policy announced a short while ago we cut our ground forces by 35 per cent to the point where we do not have adequate people on the ground to supply and maintain a peacekeeping presence.

At the same time as we were cutting our peacekeeping commitments, as we were slashing our capacity and ability to meet these new demands, what was the government doing? It was committing $5.8 billion to a helicopter program that was designed 10 years ago, when the cold war was at its height, to chase Russian subs across the north Atlantic. Probably the only thing Russian subs are carrying these days is grain from port if they can get the fuel to move.

Have we made any attempt to rethink that problem? Have we made any effort to reanalyse that kind of priority to determine whether there should be a more effective and more realistic contemporary way of spending our defence dollars? Not a bit.

The defence minister, the apostle of the new politics, has been most vociferous in saying that we shall not change, to the point where she has become ludicrous and absurd.

The other night on television in an interview when asked why it was that we were now spending $5.8 billion for a piece of military equipment that no longer had a use she said that we have to be concerned about those subs the Iranians have.

That really made Canadians shudder. All of a sudden we are going to spend $5.8 billion scarce defence dollars, because the Iranians may be buying a sub or two and Canada must stand on guard, as opposed to all of the other defence demands around the world which are crying for it. What is the defence minister doing? We are having to call up reservists and quickly put them into precarious situations with 90 days' training and without the proper equipment. These helicopters have become the sacred cow.

This apostle of the new politics who has said that we must open up our eyes and ears to listen refuses to listen to the majority of Canadians who in the majority say that we should stop that program and do something better with the money.

This is the new politics? It is a kind of inbred arrogance that says: I do not have to listen to anybody because I know what is best. Is that the new kind of new politics we can expect? See no evil, hear no evil, think no evil. Do not think at all is the byword of the new politics.

It is far more serious because we are putting our reputation and our capacity on the line because at the present time we have not undertaken any kind of open debate in this House about the new peacekeeping priorities. We have not had any kind of position paper from the government on what it means in terms of reallocating defence expenditures. We have made no effort whatsoever to involve Canadians in a series of debates about Canada's international role. We must ask ourselves tough questions about how far and in what way we want to commit our troops and under what kind of rules and under what kind of mandate.

• (1035)

Look at the result. We commit troops in Bosnia into a highly vulnerable situation with a confused, ambiguous mandate, mission statement, rules of engagement, in effect making our troops a trip-wire for some possible attack. We say we will respond then, instead of ensuring that in this horrible, nasty situation taking place in Bosnia with the massacre of thousands of people, we are not prepared to invite Canadians to become part of the debate, to say we have some tough choices. The old humanitarian peacekeeping mission is not working.

What is the point of bringing supplies to people if they are going to be bombarded the next day and massacred in their beds? Everybody is ducking that responsibility, the Europeans, the Americans. Everybody is shying back.

It is shameful we are not prepared to engage Canadians in a serious debate about these crucial issues. Nothing has been brought into this House. The minister has refused to come to the committee. It has been a total stonewall.

An hon. member: That is not true. She is coming to committee on May 5.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Next week. We are told she is coming to speak on the helicopters and not on peacekeeping.

We are in a situation where the minister of defence has to be on top of the job 24 hours a day because our troops are in the most vulnerable, precarious position that they have been in since the Korean war, and where is the minister?

How often is she in the House, a day or two a week maybe? She says she is on the end of the phone. Members opposite should have heard the chief of defence staff yesterday when he was announcing the terms of the new board of inquiry. He said: "I have been thinking about things I should have been doing for the last couple of weeks".

When he was asked: "What does the minister think?", he said: "I don't know. We did not have a chance to talk about it." Is that continual examination and brainstorming and responsibility? The minister was off stomping and shopping somewhere, getting those photo ops out.

I have no quarrel with the minister running for the leadership. That is her business and she is welcome to it. But if it means that you avoid the responsibilities of your office in the meantime, you are not living up to your oath of office. That is something I do not think Canadians are prepared to accept.

Now we have a board of inquiry which will be looking at things like training and preparation for our peacekeeping troops. We were asking questions in this House several months ago of the same minister.

The minister at the time said: "Observe. There is no need to do that. Absolutely ridiculous. We are all set. Don't worry about it." Now we have a board of inquiry examining those very same questions because the minister was negligent in addressing those issues right at the beginning before the troops were sent. She neglected to establish rules of engagement, mission objectives and proper and adequate information for those troops to make sure the decisions are the right ones.

We have to go through this board of inquiry and all the information and problems that it has given rise to because the job was not done when it should have been done.

This brings me to the issue of Somalia which has been an ongoing matter of real concern to the troops themselves, the Canadian people and Parliament. All it needed was honesty. All it needed was being forthright. All it needed was to be up front. All it needed was to say: "We have got problems here. Here is how we are going to handle it."

Instead, what do we get? We get evasion, misdirection, negligence and now as we found out yesterday, being downright misled. I want to make sure that people understand this, that there can possibly be no greater sin committed by any minister than not telling the truth.

• (1040)

Mr. Andre: Evidence?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Here comes the evidence. Yesterday in the testimony of the chief of defence staff he said that on March 18 the minister of defence was informed that an investigation looking at the criminal aspects of a death in a Somalia camp was under way, that is a homicide. The minister denied categorically in the House that she knew anything about any homicide taking place.

Mr. Andre: That is untrue.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): That is not untrue, we have the records to prove it.

Mr. Andre: When did she deny that?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): That is exactly the case. For two weeks the minister said she knew nothing about it but she knew there was an investigation going on. The investigation report says, and the House leader probably is not aware as he is not about most things, of the exact statement that was being made—

Mr. Langlois: You are wasting the time of the House. If you think you will be elected on that issue, you're gone.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): We are gone, sure. We are really gone, that is right.

The minister said deliberately that she knew nothing about any homicide investigation. The chief of defence staff said yesterday that on March 18 the minister knew that an investigation had been requested to look at the criminal aspects of a death in Somalia, homicide in other words. There are two different versions, the minister's and the chief of defence staff's. From my point, I believe the chief of defence staff, not the minister.

This motion is specifically on the question of whether at a very precarious, sensitive time in the history of this country we are getting the kind of leadership that we need and deserve. Canadians deserve honesty from their ministers, but the government is seized by what I would call the Al-Mashat disease. When in trouble, duck. When put to the law, hide. When asked to live up to responsibilities, evade. Those are the real issues that are at stake.

How do we ensure that our forces that are valiantly and courageously performing their duties around the world are getting the leadership at the top that they need? We know the House leader and others have attempted to characterize this as an attack on the troops. They are trying to say—

An hon. member: That is what it is.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): But they are wrong. Clearly it is an attack on the lack of confidence, leadership and forthrightness of the minister who should be on top of that portfolio.

The primary responsibility of the House is to make sure that the decisions being made are the right ones, so they can be carried out the right way; that we do not have people put in vulnerable positions and have no one at the other end of the phone; that we have a serious debate in the House so Canadians know what is going on; and that we do not have a serious question about where we put our defence resources to get the most effective use, all which have been denied, all which have been turned back. Canadians deserve to have an open system of government, an honest system of government and a democratic system of government.

We have received none of those qualities of leadership from the present minister of defence. Instead, the problems were made worse and the kind of a clear mandate has not been given to our Armed Forces to make the changes that are necessary, to prepare themselves for the new world that we are in and to make sure that Canadians are in agreement with that. It would seem to me that even at this very important time with all the political sky-jumping going on around us we cannot afford to have these sins of omission on the part of the minister. We cannot afford to have absentee leadership. We need to have people who are working, thinking and reacting on a full-time, effective basis.

• (1045)

Members opposite said that this was all because there was a leadership campaign. They are wrong. The only problem with the leadership campaign is that apparently it distracts the minister from her real duties. However, it does not mean to say that at any other time the same minister would not be under the same questioning by members of this House, by members of the public and by members of the media because of a lack of performance of duty. It is just that the opportunities to raise those questions are so seldom and infrequent. That is also part of the problem.

The resolution we have put forward is an attempt to open up that debate, to start raising a series of questions on the following: how we can redesign our defence and security policy to meet new conditions; how we can begin to try to focus the minds of this government and this minister on the real responsibility, which is this important defining moment in the history of this country in terms of the role we play around the world; and how we can provide a significant leadership and direction to the United Nations and to the peacekeeping forces in a way that will continue the honour we have won in the past.

However, we cannot do it and it will not happen unless Canadians are involved, unless this Parliament is fully apprised and unless we have a government with something serious and significant to say.

We hope the debate today will just be the beginning of other debates. We can open this question up for a full-scale examination so that ultimately we can define for this country an effective defence and security role in a way that will enjoy the consent of the government.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I would like to make two comments with respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and then pose a question to the member.

First, let me comment on his remarks respecting the EH-101 helicopter contract. For those who do not know, in 1982 and 1983 the Liberal government of the day considered the Canadian Patrol Frigate Program. Very much a part of that program was the addition of a helicopter component once the ships were operational. The decision was made then that the Patrol Frigate Program and the acquisition of helicopters went hand in hand. That is simply an extension of the equipment of our Canadian naval force.

There are important industrial spin-offs to places like the Halifax shipyards. Across this country workers will benefit from this contract. More important, it is endorsed by every military official in the country as far as I am aware. My question is for the hon. member. Does he stand in contradiction to our military experts who have requested this additional equipment to make the Canadian patrol frigate operative and effective as a defensive force? Does he stand in contradiction to those officials?

Let me make this second comment and ask an additional question with respect to the control of the Canadian forces. For decades, for generations, we have had in force in Canada the National Defence Act enacted by this very Parliament of Canada. It is the governing law with respect to the Canadian Armed Forces, as my friend the admiral is well aware. That is a code of discipline and conduct different from that which prevails in civilian lives across this country. For generations as part of the British parliamentary tradition we have used legislation to control and govern the Canadian forces.

Is the member now suggesting that we throw out the processes and procedures of the National Defence Act, that we forget about the code of military conduct and discipline and that we apply a totally different code of conduct to the activities of those who are in extremely difficult situations in places like Somalia at the request of the Government of Canada and for the benefit of the Canadian people? Does he want them now governed by a different code of conduct? Is he going to simply throw out the rules and introduce ad hoc judgments in light of what he sees as a difficult situation not for him but particularly for the Canadian Armed Forces?

• (1050)

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I would be glad to reply to the questions. In part the answer was contained in the member's opening statement.

The decision on frigates was made in 1982, 11 years ago, when there was still a cold war on and when the priority objective for our security under the NATO arrangement was to provide anti-submarine patrols in the north Atlantic.

I want to inform the hon. member that things have changed since then. The Berlin Wall has come down. The Soviet empire has disintegrated. Russian subs are tied up in their home fleets, not moving. We just announced a month ago a new program of aid and assistance to the very Russians whose subs we thought we are going to try to chase. Yet there has been no attempt whatsoever in the meantime by this government to come to grips with that new reality. It is still looking back 10 years ago. It is looking through the rear-view mirror.

All we are asking is for the minister of defence to say that there is a new reality. Let us open it up. Let us review it. Let us see how we can reconfigure what we have. That is what is called leadership, not sticking one's head in the sand, not looking through the rear-view mirror, not having some nostalgia for the old cold war but saying it is time to make some change. Let us do it in an open, honest, analytical way, especially at the same time they are cutting substantially from the ground forces so that they cannot provide the proper operational complement to meet the new requirement under the peacekeeping challenges that we face.

The government under the Minister of Finance is slashing away at the defence budget, which he has a right to do, but instead of saying let us cut back on equipment that is obsolescent in terms of today's reality what do they cut back? They cut back on the very component of our defence establishment that is in high demand: our capacity to provide peacemaking, peacekeeping troops. That is what was cut by this government, not the helicopters. That is why we are saying it is about time we had a minister of defence who understood those questions.

On the second question, yes, the National Defence Act is the basic law that governs our armed forces. If the hon. member read section 45 in terms of setting up boards of inquiry, he would see there is nothing in section 45 that says they must be secret. Nothing whatsoever says that a board of inquiry must be secret. It is at the discretion of those who set up the board as to whether or not it is secret. There is nothing in the act that requires it. It is at the discretion of the minister and the minister decided to make it secret.

We have heard the defence from the minister and the House leader that it had to be secret because it might impinge upon criminal investigations. The chief of the defence staff in his statement yesterday said it would not involve criminal investigations. It is going to involve questions of training, deployment and preparation. It has nothing to do with the criminal aspects of it.

Why is it not going to be open so that Canadians can understand the preparation, training, development, lack of discipline and so on that is there? That argument was simply shot out of a silo by the admiral. The government is going to have to find another reason to defend why that inquiry must be secret.

When we look at the statements made yesterday by the two military men from Somalia who have raised these charges publicly we realize they have put their careers on the line. They have taken a very courageous stand because they saw something they thought was wrong. They deserve an open inquiry. They deserve to have the open forum in which their testimony can be properly looked at without fear of a closed door intimidation occurring. That is the basic principle of justice.

The Supreme Court has said it is publicity and the glare of the public that make for good law and good judgment, except, it appears, when it comes down to investigating this very serious matter, when the apostle of the new politics says it is better to have an inquiry behind a closed door.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the hon. member seems to think this inquiry will somehow not do its job, will somehow be corrupted and will produce irrelevant results by having its inquiries in camera.

I wonder if he would identify which of the members of the inquiry he feels would be involved in these inferred partisan inappropriate activities. He is suggesting it cannot be done honestly.

Is it Major-General de Faye, Brigadier-General Addy, Brigadier-General Emond, Professor Harriet Critchly or Mr. Stephen Owen? Which of those, or all of them, is he in essence accusing of being incapable of conducting a proper inquiry because they would keep it in confidence?

I could not believe he would stand and say that it is appropriate for physicians who have made observations in respect to the homicide to discuss the details in public while a criminal investigation is going on. I find it absolutely astounding that the hon. member would say such a thing. Does he not understand the criminal justice system, the presumption of innocence, the fact that people might at the end of the day have to face a court and have rights? The hon. member's partisanship is a little extreme. Attacking the minister is understood in partisan rant but he is going after the credibility of these individuals.

I heard him say that the frigates are irrelevant today. I wonder how he would patrol or exercise sovereignty over the largest coastline in the world. The frigates are irrelevant without helicopters.

Finally I wonder why he said the Berlin Wall came down. It came down in 1989. In 1990 a committee of this House on which his party had two representatives unanimously recommended that the Sea King helicopters be replaced as planned and as soon as possible to avoid costly stop gap measures. Is the Liberal Party in favour of costly stop gap measures? Has it denounced the members of its party? This decision was taken after the Berlin Wall fell.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, first let me point out that I do not have the same paranoid personality as the hon. House leader who always thinks that somebody is up to no good. That has been the hallmark of this member in his career in the House. He always looks for the worst in individuals.

What I do believe in and what I do insist on is an open process. We should make sure that it is a open democratic process. I thought the minister of defence felt the same way. I read with great interest her opening statement when she announced her leadership. "This is going to be new politics: open, democratic".

An hon. member: Transparent.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Transparent. On the very first test of that commitment she shuts it down and goes back to the old Tory way of making decisions behind closed doors and trying to manipulate the process along the way. It has nothing to do with the individuals, but I will let the hon. minister worry about that because he enjoys that kind of ad hominem attack. That is his style. It is not mine.

Second, let us talk about the position of the doctors. Apparently the minister still does not understand that the terms of reference released yesterday do not include the criminal investigation. It was deliberately excluded. The chief of defence staff said they were looking at training, problems of discipline and potentials of racism. Those were the issues the chief of defence staff identified as needing to be looked at. Presumably the gentlemen who had the courage to speak out were not allowed to do so through official circles. They wrote to their wives and spoke out to the media. They would still like the same forum.

One final answer in completion. I never said the frigates were irrelevant. I said the defence policy of the government was irrelevant. That is what I said. There is a very big difference. Instead of trying to come to grips with the transition and required changes to adapt and respond, to have better coastal patrol, to have better drug interdiction and these kinds of things, and instead of re-equipping and redesigning the logistics of our defence forces and training to meet that, there has been nothing said.

We are still buying 35 helicopters to intercept Russian subs tied up in port waiting, I suppose, for the Prime Minister's assistants to get to them so they can buy some fuel. That seems to be a total contradiction of what the government is about. It does not know what the left hand is doing or what the right hand is doing.

• (1100)

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity afforded by the motion being put by my colleague to the right to have a discussion in this House about defence policy in general. For the last 10 days or so we have been hearing a lot of specifics and we will have further opportunity for discussion, perhaps during this debate and certainly during Question Period.

The debate gives us an opportunity to discuss in more general terms the conduct of the defence department and the way in which it is being administered by the government and the current Minister of National Defence.

Several of my colleagues from the defence committee are in the House. Sometimes I do not agree with them, but I do want to say it is a very valuable committee of this House and I think it is working hard to try to get at some of the issues. As this Parliament is in its final days, one of the things that might be reflected upon for the next Parliament of Canada is that the committees could be made far more valuable and useful and could be consulted by the government much more effectively. I have noticed that many of the decisions of the committee are simply disregarded by the government and it proceeds to make decisions without the benefit of the work done by the committee and the members on the committee.

The recent events in Somalia reveal however some very serious problems in the administration of defence policy and the operations of the defence department in this country. It reveals that the Department of National Defence and the minister first of all have completely mishandled the public information side of the issues that have emerged recently in Somalia.

Earlier my friend gave some details. We have had some in Question Period. The fact remains that the information has come out in dribs and drabs. There clearly has been a cover-up and I suppose that is a pejorative term. What it means is that the public of Canada and the government itself and conceivably the minister, and certainly Parliament, have not been given information that is critically important to the various functions that we have, including the overseeing of that very important and very difficult job that our peacekeepers are doing there.

Even now we are not sure we have all the information and the inquiry that is being set up is not going to get at the heart of the matter as I see it.

The department and the minister have also, as is revealed in the Somalian affair, failed to impose effective discipline on our forces there, putting the Canadian peacekeeping reputation at risk and at jeopardy.

It was very clear from last night's television that the soldiers who were interviewed did not understand the rules of engagement and the rules applying to the use of force as described yesterday in Ottawa by the chief of defence staff. Right on television they were misstating the rules. They do not understand them. From all accounts the discipline in that area has probably fallen apart simply because the government failed to act, starting as early as February 17 when it had information that it should have moved quickly to deal with and that appears to have led to at least two or three tragedies that followed. There is the failure of the government to impose discipline and the failure of the Department of National Defence.

The department and the minister have also clearly failed to train and prepare our forces for that very difficult assignment. That is coming out in the information we are hearing day by day.

General MacKenzie and other witnesses coming before the defence committee, including the chief of defence staff, have tried to suggest to us that there is no need for training beyond combat training. I will talk about that a little more extensively in a minute.

It is now clear that that is a complacent, misguided policy which has led to tragedy in Somalia and has led to a blot on the reputation of our peacekeepers. This government and the Minister of National Defence are specifically responsible to Parliament and to Canada for that failure.

What we have seen with the Minister of National Defence since she took on those responsibilities in January is something which we in British Columbia had seen before.

• (1105)

Contrary to the image that has appeared in certain photographs of the minister, she is cautious, inflexible, conservative, rigid and defensive in her approach to her duties.

In the last four months we have not seen one significant initiative toward change in the administration of the Department of National Defence at a time when the change facing the world, particularly the defence forces, is dramatic.

When she took over her office the very first statement she made was to adopt the policy of the purchase of the $5.8 billion EH-101 helicopters. She did not blink for a second. She adopted that and has rigidly defended it ever since in the face of mounting evidence that not only the Canadian people disagree with it but it is a misguided and stupid policy.

There has been no change in the spending patterns of the department. It talks of cutbacks but the reality is what is being cut back are hopes and expectations of additional spending. The Department of National Defence is one of the few departments which has continued its spending unchanged through all the recent budgets of this government.

There has been no review of defence policy initiated by this minister. There has been no change in defence policy, defence structure in face of reports of the Auditor General, in face of clear change. Of the other countries throughout the whole western alliance and throughout the world, this is the one Department of National Defence which, under this administration, is staying rigid and unchanged in the face of changing world conditions.

We hear nothing, not a word about base closings. The government has had a report from the defence committee and from a special task force established by the previous Minister of National Defence to set out a system for closing bases. It is universally conceded that we have far more bases than we need now in the face of changing conditions.

Yet the government and this minister have failed to make one single step in the direction of closing bases and rationalizing expenditures in that area. All sides of this House at least as evidenced by the defence committee agree in a non-partisan way on a system that should be used. That is, communities should be consulted. Communities should be supported where bases are to be closed.

There should be a logical step-by-step process that we all agree to for closings to happen in the interests of the Canadian taxpayer and rationalizing defence. We agreed on a system to take it out of partisan politics but the Minister of National Defence has done nothing. Not a step has taken place under her administration.

There has been no restructuring whatever of Canadian defence forces under her administration, not even a start. We are still living with a structure of defence forces established in the Second World War and probably its antecedents go back to the First World War. There is not a change.

There have been no changes in purchasing policy despite a savage attack by the Auditor General on the system within the Department of National Defence. This has cost Canadians billions of dollars in wasted money. There is no change in the reserve program.

There is not a sentence of change in the reserve program despite an equally savage attack by the Auditor General on that program. He said that it is misconceived, the training is hopeless, the purchase and planning of it is hopeless and the product at the end is not what we are supposed to be getting for the billions of dollars.

In face of evidence before the defence committee, he said that a reserve program conceived during the period of the cold war makes no sense in a period in which our primary role of our defence forces is peacekeeping. We have quite different requirements. There is no sense of innovation or change. If it is happening internally, we are certainly not hearing about it and the products are not different.

What we say is that the government must move. Let me try in the limited time that I have to indicate some areas where I think we need change. Let me first focus and take a little time on peacekeeping training. What it appears has been happening is that within the Department of National Defence the line is we do not need any changes in peacekeeping training, that we have these wonderful peacekeepers who have done a good job for the last 40 years and we do not have to change and try to understand in a new way what training should be.

Yet we also have within the Department of National Defence some voices which have tried to get across a different perspective. We also have had voices from outside, such as General Clayton Beattie who has come before our committee and come before the Senate committee and made a powerful case that there must be a new approach to training and orientation of our peacekeepers, that combat training alone is not enough, that the limited orientation that we give to our defence forces when they go overseas in difficult situations is not enough.

As I said earlier, the Somalian events have demonstrated the tragedy that has occurred because of the rigid, inflexible and complacent approach of the Department of National Defence.

Let me quote the minister herself in what I am afraid is a rather typical arrogance of the minister that she knows better than anybody else, the put-down of those who might have a different view. She said when interviewed in Halifax in February on the issue of peacekeeping training: "The idea of a peacekeeping training centre is a wonderful idea for most people who do not know anything about peacekeeping. But I have had discussions with senior members of the Canadian military who are a bit perplexed as to what you would teach people but the normal skill of a good combat-ready military".

She apparently did not talk to General Beattie, she did not talk to General Urquhart, she did not talk to—and I might be confusing his rank—Colonel Houghton. If I do him a disservice I apologize to him. Let me quote from a July 1991 report that should have been in her hands and she should have asked for and she should have read. It says as follows: "However, with peacekeeping as a high profile task of the Canadian Forces it is essential that the wishes of the United Nations now expressed in their training guidelines and in the SOPs for various missions be met as completely as possible".

I have been informed that in fact even now the UN training guidelines and the guidelines such as they are in Canada have not been complied with.

The member went on to say: "There has been in the Canadian forces a prevailing attitude that we need do very little in the way of preparation of our peacekeepers because of the basic military skills already learned. Unfortunately, this attitude is causing difficulties in competing with other peacekeeping contributors which are paying attention to the expressed wishes of the United Nations and which are gradually upgrading their peacekeeping skills. The result is that a Scandinavian reserve officer who receives a grounding in the subjects listed in the UN training guidelines could easily be a more knowledgeable, more sophisticated peacekeeper at the start of his tour of UN duty than his Canadian counterpart. If we resist acceptance of the guidelines for refresher training as well as for knowledge specifically related to UN staff work such as mission orientation and negotiating skills we will begin to fall behind. Training must be given and appropriate authority."

In light of what we have been learning in the last week or so about Somalia, it is also fascinating to note the conclusion and recommendation includes that an understanding of the use of force be part of the training manuals and training program.

A further point: "The above subjects, including the understanding of the use of force, are not covered in any Canadian army military training".

Earlier the department had the benefit of a memorandum which also was highly critical of the level of training and made a series of very specific useful recommendations.

The key point here is that our peacekeepers, who are clearly person for person among the best in the world, have been let down by the administration of the Department of National Defence.

• (1115)

It was very revealing when they came before the defence committee. Many of the senior officers did not even seem to understand the kind of training or what training was all about. They did not understand the idea of working with the development assistance workers who have been in the field to give them some serious idea of what needs to meet. They have learned to deal with culture shock and the difficulties imposed by being dropped in the middle of a different culture with different ways of doing things and trying to understand local customs in a systematic way so the mission can be fulfilled.

In the course of all the excitement over the last week about what has happened in Somalia I got a call from London from the African rights group which monitors human rights. It will be issuing a report on Friday which will outline its findings but I was given a summary.

In the summary it notes that Operation Restore Hope had the stated aim of creating a secure environment for the delivering of humanitarian relief. It notes that there has undoubtedly been an improvement in the delivery of bulk food aid while extortion rackets and looting of food convoys have dramatically declined. This improvement is offset by a general decline in security throughout southern Somalia. The security for international relief areas has markedly worsened, restricting relief operations in rural areas.

It goes on to note how the Somalis themselves have been marginalized and how the whole program of development of an agricultural system there has been set back. It notes how many areas of importance to the ultimate success of Operation Restore Hope have been undermined.

They have been undermined in my view and I think in the view of African rights because our government and other governments have not approached the mission there with an understanding of its total impact. It has been treated as a military intervention. The broad long-term objectives of that mission have been forgotten.

Certainly from all accounts our peacekeepers have been very valuable in terms of building schools and hospitals and so forth. But in the broader picture we and other countries neglected the area for years. It appears that there has been almost no consultation with experts in development assistance to turn the experience we have had there into a positive long-term benefit for the people in that community and country.

Let me quickly touch on other areas. In the area of equipment it is very important first of all to note that the evidence we have had before the defence committee is that our equipment for our peacekeepers and for those who are undertaking their roles in Canada is more than adequate.

The government has in fact provided good equipment for our forces. It is the height of folly to pay for billions of dollars of extra equipment, not for peacekeeping but to fight a war in Europe that is not going to happen. NATO has now recognized that war is not going to happen and is no longer preparing for it.

We need to look at a whole new approach to the reserve program. We have to follow the guidelines of the United Nation's development report which said that every member nation must cut its defence spending by 3 per cent a year to release funds to deal with the new security problems created by poverty around the world and the environmental difficulties the globe faces.

We need to shake up headquarters. We have more generals than we have tanks. We have more senior officers than we need. We have a senior officer structure than would cover more— Madam Speaker, you are indicating that my time is up.

Let me just say in conclusion that we need a new structure in government to integrate the work of the Department of National Defence, the Department of External Affairs, CIDA, the Coast Guard and the RCMP. We need a new National Defence Act. We need to recognize that the proud tradition of our forces must now be served by a constructive and positive approach to change. I would ask the government to work with all sides in this House, listen to the approach taken by the defence committee and begin to build a new defence policy that is in keeping with the changes in our times.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, far be it for me to bring up anything in the House of Commons pertaining to partisan politics or relationships between federal and provincial organizations. I can understand why members of the New Democratic Party are very tender about the relationships at the federal and provincial levels considering the difficulties they now have associating themselves with Premier Rae in the province of Ontario.

I want to remind the member that there is an election taking place in the province of Nova Scotia and we have an opportunity to review the policies of the New Democratic Party as they pertain to Nova Scotia. I do not know if he is aware of all of them, but one of the policies advanced by the New Democratic Party in Nova Scotia is the insistence that CFB Cornwallis remain open as a military base. It has taken the position that it must be maintained in the interest of the area.

I can understand why many people, including myself, have a great deal of sympathy for that position but the member made it clear in his address to the House today that he believes there should be a non-partisan approach to the matter of closure of defence bases. He indicated very clearly that defence bases have to be closed in a fair and meritorious manner and the government intends to judge all this objectively.

I wonder if he has any advice for the New Democratic leader in the province of Nova Scotia on the issue of defence closures. Does he thinks she should insist on the maintenance of CFB Cornwallis regardless of meritorious or objective assessment that should be made?

While he is giving advice to the leader in Nova Scotia, could he comment again on the EH-101 helicopter contract? I have not heard anybody in the labour movement in Nova Scotia or in the New Democratic Party say to cancel the EH-101 helicopter contract, forgo the jobs at the Halifax shipyards and forgo the industrial benefits to IMP Limited that employs over 2,500 people in Nova Scotia. I have not heard a word about cancellation of the EH-101 helicopter.

I can understand why the member wants it cancelled. He has explained himself, as has the Liberal Party. They are against it and I understand the reasons. I want him to stand in this place and give the advice to his friends in Nova Scotia so we will not have the kind of conflict we have over discrepancies in the views of the Ontario New Democrats and the federal New Democrats. He should tell the leader he wants the EH-101 helicopter contract cancelled and CFB Cornwallis closed.

Mr. Brewin: First of all I am glad the hon. member has given me the opportunity to speak about Alexa McDonough. I think she is one of the most outstanding political leaders in our country. She has taken great leadership in Nova Scotia on behalf of ordinary people in Nova Scotia. She is an outstanding person. I know the people of Nova Scotia recognize that and will elect her and her colleagues in the election coming up. She would give Nova Scotia the kind of leadership it deserves and has not had from its current government.

I would add that Alexa has been at the forefront of the effort to ensure that CFB Cornwallis be a peacekeeping training centre. That proposal is endorsed by all parties from Nova Scotia, as I understand it, although the government's approach on that was less than enthusiastic when it came up before the defence committee. We could hardly hear the words peacekeeping centre get out but I understand it is endorsed by all. It makes a lot of sense. We have endorsed it. I have worked for it in the defence committee and continue to do so. It is very clear to me that we should have a peacekeeping training centre at Cornwallis. It is admirably suited for it.

There are also a lot of bases across this country which should be rationalized and closed. There is a process we have recommended for doing that.

We have made our position clear on the EH-101 helicopters as the member has indicated. I think the idea of holding out jobs for people in Nova Scotia as a result of this is a mirage. Those jobs are never going to happen because this project is never going to happen. This government is wedded to it but even the Minister of National Defence is beginning to give off little signals that she is not for it.

• (1125)

If the people in Nova Scotia think that project is safe they should think again. It is a misconceived project. If the people in Nova Scotia want good jobs the first step should be to cancel that project and develop effective job programs for the people of Nova Scotia and the rest of the country. That is one of the most inefficient job creators one could ever want and there are relatively few jobs in Nova Scotia provided for under it.

We have proposed a number of projects and programs which will provide a much more solid base for the long-term economic future of the people of Nova Scotia. I am very proud of what Alexa McDonough has been saying to the people there.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I would like to make some comments on peacekeeping.

I was on the defence committee in a former sitting of the House and I would like to say that the world has changed recently. Peacekeeping has changed. We have performed peacekeeping in a very outstanding way in the past but I do not think what is happening right now in Bosnia-Hercegovina is peacekeeping. A holocaust is taking place there. The United Nations forces are there and they cannot prevent this holocaust from happening.

The whole question is whether the United Nations has been efficient in the former Yugoslavia. The answer simply is no. The war has gone on for some time and we have witnessed atrocities of the worst kind. They have certainly been compared to the holocaust that happened during the Second World War and the world sits by and watches.

I think the peacekeeping question is a paramount one. Should we be peacekeepers or peacemakers? President Clinton and even the Prime Minister of Great Britain are now saying that we have to be more aggressive and be peacemakers. Are our forces prepared to do that job? At the present time, as we can see, they are not prepared because they are not sufficient in numbers and they are not protected. They will be the first victims if there is peacemaking in Bosnia.

Another question that I would like to raise is the function of the former General Lewis MacKenzie who was the Commander-in-Chief of the United Nations' forces in the former Yugoslavia. Since he retired I see that he travels around the world. He has been in Somalia and recently in Bosnia.

I have a question for the Minister of National Defence that she should be able to answer. Who is paying for Mr. MacKenzie's trips? Is he a lobbyist? Is he a lobbyist for the Serbian side? These are questions which I think are very legitimate. He has been meeting with Serbs. He has had a special relationship with a Serbian leader in Bosnia. So these are questions that should be answered by the Minister of National Defence. What is Mr. MacKenzie's function? Is he in a conflict of interest situation? He was a commander of the United Nations and now he is a consultant apparently to the Serbians in Bosnia. So these are the questions that arise.

As far as what the member for Victoria was saying, I agree. He mentioned for instance that the defence committee is not being listened to by the government. I think that is somewhat of a tragic situation. Maybe the minister can tell me how she sees the defence committee working in the future to be effective and listened to by the government.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Victoria, there is one minute left.

Mr. Brewin: Madam Speaker, it will not take me very long. Change the government.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I rise to respond to what appears on its surface to be a very serious indictment of the conduct of the Minister of National Defence. In another place and time and from a different source, accusations of lack of leadership, evasion of accountability and responsibility and inadequate credibility would be pretty weighty stuff. But in this place, at this time, from the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, as well as the hon. member for Victoria, I know there is not a member on either side of the House who attaches an atom of significance to what is said transparently as nothing more than a partisan rant.

• (1130)

That is what we have been involved in here, a partisan rant. The polls have them petrified so they are off on a partisan rant. That is okay in the sense that this is a partisan operation, except to the extent that innocent third parties are being damaged and important legal proceedings may be prejudiced by the demands being made.

I sat and listened to the hon. member from the New Democratic Party speak but now the New Democrats have deserted the House. Perhaps they are out reading The Globe and Mail. I hope they are. If they do they will see this morning's editorial. It puts very concisely what the minister of defence has been saying and why she has been saying that in answers to the questions from the members for Winnipeg South Centre and Victoria and the hon. member from Newfoundland, the defence critic of the Liberal Party. It reads:

> If Parliament is often theatre, it is rarely the improvisational kind. When questions arose in Parliament this week over a series of mysterious shootings by Canadian troops in Somalia, MPs reacted with all of the spontaneity of old troupers in the 1,567th performance of The Mousetrap. The usual opposition role in such cases is to demand an inquiry and, when the government agrees, say that it doesn't go far enough—
> On Monday, Defence Minister Kim Campbell announced a full military inquiry into the conduct of Canadian soldiers in Somalia— The opposition immediately charged that the inquiry lacked the power to look into the real question: whether Ms. Campbell covered up the shootings. "This is a smoke-screen, and it's hiding the major issue," said Liberal MP Fred Mifflin. "The only thing that has to be investigated is the conduct of the minister. She had information that she didn't give."
> A nice line, skilfully delivered, but quite wrong. There are, in fact, two major issues in this case, neither of them connected to what the minister knew and when she knew it. They are: 1) What actually happened in Somalia? Did soldiers of the Canadian Airborne Regiment shoot two Somalis in the back as they fled from a military compound on March 4, as an armed forces doctor has alleged they did? Should the soldiers face murder or manslaughter charges? 2) Do the shootings fall into a wider pattern? Are there, in Ms. Campbell's phrase, "systemic problems" such as racism or poor training in Canada's Somalia force?
> The first issue is the responsibility of the military police who are investigating the case. The second falls to Ms. Campbell's inquiry. The difficulty is keeping the two apart. Court decisions in Ontario's Patricia Starr affair and Nova Scotia's Westray mine disaster have established that it is unconstitutional for government inquiries to assign criminal responsibility. That, the courts say, is strictly the role of the courts.

In other words the accusation by the member for Winnipeg South Centre that not having this in public is somehow a cover-up or a smoke-screen is not just absurd from a common sense point of view, there are actually two court decisions verifying it. Two court decisions say that it would be unconstitutional to do what the member for Winnipeg South Centre said should be done.

Small wonder his credibility is sinking as rapidly as it is and that people are looking at any alternative as a preferable one. He engaged in a 20-minute partisan, irresponsible, distorting rant about what in fact is happening and what should happen. He knows it and honest hon. members know it. He stood up and said that what we need is a debate. A debate is an opportunity for people to put forward ideas, ideas to be heard, challenged and exchanged.

I listened to his entire speech and did not hear any suggestions, any ideas, any positive proposals from the Liberal Party critic on what in fact should be done. Well, maybe one. He said: "No helicopters". I will look into that.

• (1135)

Then he said that we need more permanent troops and that the reserves should not be used in peacekeeping forces. Where should the reserves be used and what have we got reserves for? He says that they are not supposed to be used and that they are inadequately trained. On what basis would he make that assertion? On what basis would be make the assertion that Canadian reserve troops are inadequately trained and cannot do the job that is asked of them? No experience of mine or of anybody I know would verify that bold accusation made by the hon. member.

He criticized DND policy in a general way by saying it was totally inadequate to today's needs, but he did not say what was inadequate about it. I do not know if he knows what the policy is generally. He certainly did not offer any constructive suggestions.

Fundamentally, in terms of DND's operations, its budget is allocated by this House and moneys are appropriated each year for its operations. It has been trying since long before this government came into office to follow a policy of roughly 75 per cent of the annual appropriation to be used for the operations of the military in terms of personnel, operations, maintenance and so on, and about 25 per cent to be used for capital equipment.

The equipment acquisition programs are long scale. There is a tremendous amount of planning. It takes many years to design and develop, to issue contracts and have the equipment built. Goodness knows, Canada has not been exceptionally extravagant in the purchase of military equipment. In fact, we spend as a percentage of our Gross National Product on defence, less than any of the NATO countries, with the exception of Iceland and Luxembourg. I do not know how accurate it was but I read a quote from former Major-General Lewis MacKenzie who said that we have the 125th largest army in the world. It may be an exaggeration but not that much. We do not spend anywhere near as much on defence as do most countries.

Clearly, what we do is very important and it is necessary for our military to have the proper equipment. The military has looked at the needs and there are needs everywhere. There are needs for new tanks and for new equipment for the army, navy and air force. Every arm of the forces needs new equipment.

In the military's own priorities it has said the important thing to do now is to replace these 35-year old Sea King helicopters because they are no longer adequate to the task. To continue them in the air without tremendous investment in upgrading could, in fact, be dangerous. What is the use of having equipment that absorbs a whole lot of money in terms of maintenance but does not do what is required?

As indicated in an earlier debate, a number of years ago it was decided that the Canadian Navy Maritime Command would acquire frigates. Frigates without helicopters are like aircraft carriers without planes. The helicopter is an absolutely essential ingredient of the frigate. It is its eyes and gives it range. It allows it to patrol much larger sections of the ocean. We have the largest coastline in the world.

Certainly not in my lifetime, hopefully in the lifetime of my kids or grandkids, but even then we do not know that we will reach a situation where countries do not need that. But we do need the capability today to patrol our shores, to exercise sovereignty, not just in terms of Russian submarines, but in all foreign operations within Canadian territorial waters and off our shores. Whether it is for security, fisheries, drug interdiction, or simply for the political reality that if we cannot exercise jurisdiction over our land, our geography, then we cannot really claim to have it.

After careful examination the EH-101 was decided as the way to go. That was approved unanimously by a committee of this House. Members of the committee included two from the Liberal Party and two from the NDP. They all agreed unanimously that this was the way to go.

• (1140)

The opposition says: "It costs too much. It is going to cost $5.8 billion". That is wrong, wrong, wrong. The helicopters will cost $2.4 billion and the additional spare parts, training and so on of the whole program will add another $1.6 billion. That is in 1992 dollars. It can be stretched out over 13 years so that if there is inflation in the time predicted the total cost in these inflated dollars would be $5.8 billion.

If you want to really distort it, why not just talk about the helicopters and what they might cost in terms of dollars in the year 2043? You could probably come up with a figure of $20 billion. On the other side, if you want to make the number low, talk about what it would cost in 1950 dollars. You would probably get it for less than $1 billion.

Are those numbers meaningful in terms of the kind of intelligent debate we are being asked for in this House? Of course not. Those are distorted, warped, ridiculous numbers. What is the alternative?

The Liberals at one time although they do not talk about it now said: "Re-do the Sea Kings". The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, having spoken, is not here to listen to the rest of the debate but I hope he is reading the Winnipeg Free Press of Monday. If he read it he would see—

Mr. Mifflin: Madam Speaker, I have a point of order.

The hon. government House leader of all people knows that he really should not make reference to those members who are not in the House. I would ask him to take note of that, please.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair does agree with the hon. member and would appreciate the minister taking notice as well.

Mr. Andre: The article in the Winnipeg Free Press, the home town newspaper of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, states:

> No one really knows what Axworthy would do except that he would not buy 50 EH-101 helicopters. He might buy fewer of a different helicopter or might refurbish the Sea Kings and Labradors we now own. Either way, he would not be acting in Canada's best interests. Nor would he be saving us much money—Without proper helicopters many more frigates would be needed to do the same work. Helicopters are cheaper than frigates, both to build and operate—It is simply not true that the new machines cost $100 million each. The $5.8 billion represents the cost of the program, spread over 13 years. About $2.06 billion will be spent on the machines themselves, making the unit cost $44 million. The cost of refurbishing the 31 Sea Kings we own would be $25 million each.

Therefore, the Liberal Party policy is that we do not buy EH-101s. What we do is refurbish the Sea Kings for $25 million each. They would last about 10 years. They would then be 47 years old. Who would drive a car to Toronto that was 47 years old, let alone fly in a helicopter 47 years old for goodness' sake?

What the Liberal Party would do is spend this money now. The Liberals would spend that money over seven years. The net result is that for the next seven years the annual cash flow whether you go for EH-101s or refurbished Sea Kings is the same. There is hardly any saving at all which is the intellectual dishonesty of the members of the Liberal Party.

I saw the leader of the Liberal Party on budget night when he said on being asked how he would cut the budget: "I would get rid of the EH-101s". If they followed that policy, there would be no savings, zero, none for the next seven years on that policy.

At the end of it all, we would have ancient Sea Kings incapable of flying and the necessity to buy new helicopters. Does that make economic sense? Only to a fool does that make economic sense, let alone the intellectual dishonesty of claiming that this is how you balance the budget.

What absurdity, what childish absurdity this is. They say: "Take us seriously. We are ready to govern this country". Heaven forbid.

If there was any intellectual honesty in this debate, and I welcome in an election honest debate about what the armed forces should do and what our policies should be, we would not be making silly statements like: "We are going to balance the budget by eliminating the EH-101". We would not be making those kinds of silly statements. It is hard to take anybody seriously who commences his debate on defence policy by making that absurd statement.

• (1145)

The Canadian Armed Forces are doing a magnificent job despite the fact that we have not been excessively generous in terms of their financing. We spend less on defence than most countries of the world, as I indicated. This is so for all the significant NATO countries. They are respected world-wide. Canada has participated in every single peacekeeping action since it started in 1948 or whenever it was.

We are respected because we do a good job. We do a good job because by and large until very recently defence has been a fairly non-partisan thing in this country. By and large there has been a respect on all sides of the House of the role being played by the military and the necessity for us to rise above partisanship when it comes to looking at this important role with respect to the country.

Unfortunately, that partisanship was put aside in the context of a leadership convention in our party and the fact that one of the candidates is the Minister of National Defence. Unfortunately that led to wild exaggeration and extravagant arguments. More dangerously, it has led to suggestions by the hon. member for Victoria for example, and others, that in fact we put aside our long tradition of fairness in criminal examinations and the necessity for the assumption of innocence and allowing the process to proceed in confidence so that reputations are not unnecessarily damaged.

The suggestion is to put all of that aside and that when the Minister of National Defence proceeds in what is a proper way—everybody knows it is a proper way—that that should not be allowed to stand and she should be attacked as covering up and as somehow derelict in her duty because she does not stand up in the House and give all the details of what is going on in respect of that criminal investigation.

It is most disturbing that hon. members would do something like that. Our Standing Orders in this House and the practices say that it is against the rules of the House to ask questions about subjects that are sub judice meaning they are under investigation. No one in this House would ask the Solicitor General to stand up and give the details of a case being investigated by the RCMP knowing that that would deny the rights of those being investigated. Yet that is exactly what the opposition is asking for here. That is exactly what the opposition is asking for in this particular case.

Mr. Brewin: I am not.

Mr. Andre: Maybe it is not that hon. member but his colleague from Winnipeg South Centre has been saying exactly that over and over and then again this morning.

He stated, for example, this morning—he came as close as one can without breaking the rules—that the Minister of National Defence was misleading the House in respect of what she said regarding the March 16 incident. It is incredible. The Minister of National Defence said all she could say as everybody knows. She said she knew about the incident, that an investigation was under way, and that any further comments about it would be in violation of her duties, which resemble those of a judge in respect of this investigation.

She said all she could say. That is established. That is taken by the member for Winnipeg South Centre as somehow being derelict in her duty and for not coming forward and not being forthcoming in all of this information that is asked by him in his pursuit of knowledge and information only. That is absurd. What he is pursuing is an attempt to damage the reputation of the Minister of National Defence and nothing else. That is the pursuit of the member for Victoria and nothing else.

The member for Victoria talked about a report he had on the situation in Somalia and said that the object of that exercise was to create a secure environment. Stripped of the niceties, it was to try to get food to those starving kids we saw on television. That is what it was all about. The situation there had broken down entirely. After a UN resolution, an American-led force went in to try to establish a secure environment so that in fact food could be provided for those who needed it.

He said they did not do it perfectly. His comments are interesting. I have not read that report but he said that in southern Somalia things are not going that well. It is interesting that the Canadian operations are in northern Somalia. Presumably that study did not have anything critical to say about the Canadian operations and that must disappoint the hon. member in that regard.

Madam Speaker, I see you indicating that my time is up.

Let me talk about any objective observer. Indeed an editorial in The Globe and Mail this morning establishes that in regard to the incidents in Somalia the Minister of National Defence's posture and demeanour have been exemplary. It is exactly what is required as established by precedents in the courts. With regard to the Canadian Armed Forces they are behaving properly as they always have. This side of the House disputes absolutely those criticisms levelled directly and indirectly at the Minister of National Defence and the Canadian Armed Forces.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, the government House leader has read an editorial that he seems to like.

He has misquoted it. Of course it did not say anything about how the Minister of National Defence has handled this in an exemplary way but I guess we will leave the editors of The Globe and Mail to deal with the minister and defend their reputation. He seems to have a propensity to exaggerate when it suits him.

Mr. Crosby: I have lost track. We have had debate. Has the period for questions and comments not expired?

Madam Deputy Speaker: We are just starting the question or comments period. The hon. member for Victoria has the floor.

Mr. Brewin: The member should recognize that what he just heard was a speech but it did not sound like it. It was a ramble.

In any event in the course of his ramble the government House leader quoted one editorial. I would like to quote another because I have a certain affection for this particular editorial as the government House leader had for the one he quoted.

This is The Edmonton Journal of April 23, 1993 under the heading: "A cover-up in Somalia?" I will not read the whole editorial but the part I especially liked went something like this: "The military never did bother to issue the same press release in Canada. If an observant small-town Ontario newspaper reporter had not been on the base at the time Canadians still might not know that five soldiers are under investigation for the fatal beating. Ottawa abuses the public's considerable regard for Canadian peacekeepers with this sort of duplicity. To add insult, government House leader Harvie Andre criticized New Democrat MP John Brewin this week for daring to raise the allegations in the House. 'I am absolutely astounded that the member would malign and slander the Canadian Armed Forces in the way he has just done,' Andre said indignantly. Brewin did not slander the entire peacekeeping operation. He only questioned the professionalism of a minority of soldiers involved in the two events. This is his right as a citizen and his responsibility as a member of Parliament".

I first brought to the attention of the House a report about the March 4 death being called a deliberate homicide. We have since had some further corroborative evidence presented that that was in fact the case. There is an investigation going on. I did not mention the name of anyone who was involved. I certainly made no general maligning, insulting or slanderous comments about our Canadian Armed Forces.

In fact I have the highest admiration for the professionalism of our armed forces in Somalia and elsewhere.

• (1155)

I am quite satisfied the Judge Advocate General's branch is proceeding efficiently with respect to the investigation. My complaint from the beginning has been with the neglect by this government of its duties in respect of this, the speed with which it responded to the facts it had available and to the way in which it has handled. This in my view has led to the damage to the reputation of our peacekeepers.

Let me ask the minister to comment on the board of inquiry. I have here in my hands the speaking notes for the chief of defence staff issued yesterday that limits the board of inquiry to looking at the issues respecting the Canadian Airborne Regiment there and further limits the inquiry from looking into the incidents themselves.

In view of that how does the minister justify the approach he had taken that, first, this is properly private? The board is not going to be looking into the issues that led to the criminal investigations at all but rather into something completely different.

Second, how does he justify his verbal assault on members of this side of the House for raising issues which surely he would have to concede are the duty of the members of this House to put before the House?

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, let me first deal with The Edmonton Journal editorial because they have it wrong just as the hon. member has it wrong. The incident in question occurred on March 16.

Mr. Brewin: The one I raised was March 4.

Mr. Andre: I am sorry. The incident in question occurred on March 4 in Belet Huen. The press release was posted in Mogadishu on the bulletin board. Listen to this. It was first reported by Radio-Canada and not by this reporter from Pembroke. So the Edmonton Journal in its zeal to criticize this government has the wrong facts as usual. It is not considered a newspaper of record.

Mr. Mifflin: You will be sorry for that Harvie.

Mr. Andre: No, I live in Calgary. The hon. member is leaving before I get a chance to give him his answer. He asks me a question and then he leaves. For goodness' sake. Gee whiz. The hon. member asked me the question. Then he says: "Treat us responsibly because we are asking information. We want the answers". He asks a question and then he leaves the room.

I think my case is proven. This guy does not give a darn for the truth. What he cares about is maligning the government. The evidence is there. It is self-evident. He asks me a question and then he leaves the room.

Incidentally the answer to his question is that two courts have said that government public inquiries cannot go on when criminal investigations are going on. That is why the inquiry cannot look into those matters and cannot be held in public. It is dealing with aspects of the military with the Canadian Airborne Regiment if you will. Some of the soldiers who are the subjects of the investigation are members thereof. The segregation would be very difficult.

Again I go back to say that it is something improper to suggest that the members of the in camera inquiry cannot be trusted to do the right thing. As I asked the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, I ask him which members of that inquiry are the ones who cannot be trusted to do the right thing if they inquire in camera?

What justification is there for suggesting that we cannot trust their results unless they are done in public? If they are done in confidence without the glare of the cameras why can they not be trusted? I dispute absolutely that these individuals cannot be trusted to carry on a fair, impartial, in-depth and proper inquiry in camera. I dispute absolutely the implied accusation that these people cannot do the job they are asked to do.

• (1200)

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I want to ask the hon. House leader a number of things I have trouble understanding since he is here, has spoken and it is relative to the subject.

On April 2 I asked him when the minister had been informed about the March 16 incident that he recalled. This was not a partisan question. I just wanted clarification. I have forgotten and I am not going to quote what the minister said. He knows what he said. He did not answer the question and suggested the minister was doing her job and there was no problem.

The House recessed for Easter and then on April 19 the hon. member may recall the minister responded to a question and said that in fact there had been an unforgivable error, I think were the words she used, in communications within the Department of National Defence. In other words she did admit there had been something that was not usual.

She went on to say it was: "an unacceptable mistake and that this information"—that is the March 16 incident—"was not communicated to defence headquarters".

The minister's own staff said the next day that the minister was briefed on the subject on March 17. How could it not have been sent to defence headquarters when the minister was briefed? I have trouble with that. Maybe the minister has an explanation that would satisfy me.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I understand the nuance here. The incident occurred on March 16. A press notice was posted in Mogadishu the next day and the Minister of National Defence was informed the next day. The local investigation was held, the report came in, headquarters decided this needed a more in-depth investigation and a team was sent out.

What the Minister of National Defence said was not that DND had not been communicated with but that DND had not received the press release that was issued in theatre. She has issued instructions that from now on when there is a press release in theatre it be communicated to National Defence.

Some 290 Somalians have been killed as a result of the total UN action. You can well understand that if there is an incident and we post a press release, sometimes nothing happens. It could be a news judgment that in view of everything else happening it is just not reported. Sometimes it is not reported. If the press release is sent to DND then DND can judge whether this is adequate public notice of the situation or not.

Yes, DND knew about the incident. Yes, the minister knew about the incident the next day. What the minister and DND did not have, which the Minister of National Defence said, was the press release itself. They did not have a copy of the kind of information issued in theatre.

The change in procedure is that from now on whatever is issued in theatre will be transmitted totally to DND so there is no longer that lapse where headquarters in Ottawa and the minister do not really know what has been communicated to the media in theatre because there has not been that kind of direct consultation. That is the situation.

There was no attempt to suggest that she did not know about the incident. What she said was that DND did not have a copy of the press release.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I rise to address this subject which the hon. House leader has said is a very serious indictment of the Minister of National Defence. In all seriousness it is addressing the credibility of the Minister of National Defence. I know members on all sides of the House take the motion very seriously.

I also want to say it is not in a light manner that I stand here this morning and discuss this subject. I would not be here representing my party discussing this issue if I was not convinced that there are pieces of evidence, gut feelings and intuition on my part together with spaces in the credibility of some of the answers I have received this morning and some gaps in the chronology. I will be very clear on that. While I am a member of a team and participate in all my party's activities, I would find it impossible to stand on my feet this morning and discuss the credibility of a Minister of National Defence if I were not convinced in my own my mind as a result of my background, what I have seen in the House and my careful analysis of the issues. I want to set the record very clear on that.

I do not intend to participate in partisan debate. I will not speak for others and I want to make that clear as well. I also want to make clear one other very major point. There is no member of this Official Opposition, and I hope no member in the House who does not have anything but the greatest respect for our men and women who serve in uniform. I can assure you, Madam Speaker, this House and anybody who is watching this debate this morning that nothing that is being said here, and certainly nothing I am saying, questions the credibility of the Canadian forces. Over its lifetime it has had a credibility that has never been successfully attacked. I am very proud of that as a Canadian and I believe all members of the House are proud of that.

I would ask you to remember these three caveats, Madam Speaker, and put them in perspective as I launch into my address this morning.

I would like to remind the House that in the recent past we in Canada, like the rest of the world, have been subjected to change in very important issues. It is very difficult for any government, individual or groups of individuals to cope with these changes.

Relevant to the responsibility of the Minister of National Defence the first issue is that the cold war is over and it ended abruptly. The nature of peacekeeping operations in the world has changed significantly in scope. The range of peacekeeping verges on peacemaking or almost war. A large number of peacekeepers are participating in peacekeeping throughout the world from a number of countries. That is the trend we see.

We have seen significant changes in how these issues have been addressed and what the public perceives in how response to these changes has taken place.

The two issues in question today involve peacekeeping and the acquisition of a major capital program, the EH-101 helicopter. Let me address the peacekeeping issues first and how they relate to the motion on the credibility of the Minister of National Defence.

In the general sense I believe the whole issue relates to how we have participated in peacekeeping in the recent past. In the specific sense it is how the four incidents in Somalia have taken place: the chronology, the logic, the gap and what this all means.

Madam Speaker, I want to tell you that I need to discuss the four incidents not in detail of the legalities or the justice involved. I just want to talk about their chronology. I am going to take the March 16 incident first. Anybody with any grain of sense, any sup of intuition and any knowledge of how things occur in a sequential manner would have great difficulty following the chronology of that incident of March 16. What I am giving you is factual and not conjectural. It is objective and not partisan. On March 16 an incident happened in Somalia. The incident took place and in accordance with Canadian forces' orders, national defence headquarters was informed—we had some trouble getting that information—and the Minister of National Defence was briefed the next day. So on March 17 the minister was briefed.

• (1210)

Nobody in Canada nor members of the Canadian media who were in Somalia at the time knew about the incident. The minister knew about the incident on March 17 but nobody in Canada knew until an investigative reporter broke the story toward the end of March.

A question was asked in the House of Commons on April 2 on the subject, which is the subject of a question I just made to the hon. House leader. His response was not clear. He did not answer the question and he referred to ministerial responsibility. He certainly created the impression that nothing was wrong, everything was right and was being done normally.

I questioned the minister the first day back after the Easter recess. The minister in response to my question about when she knew and why she did not tell the Canadian public, turned to the department and said: "A bad mistake was made; an unacceptable mistake was made". The minister went on to say: "This was not communicated to defence headquarters".

I just questioned the hon. House leader of the government on this subject and his explanation to me of what the minister meant when she said the incident was not communicated to defence headquarters. I find that very strange. The House leader says the minister meant that the so-called press release, which was a piece of paper tacked in an area hundreds of kilometres away was not communicated to headquarters and therefore did not get out to the Canadian public. He suggested it was all inadvertent.

Members of the media in Somalia on the very site where this happened asked questions of the military unit there and were denied information. The Minister of National Defence was briefed on March 17. She said she knew, in accordance with one of her statements. She told the House on April 26 that she was not aware the case had serious criminal overtones until much later on March 31. Yet she did not tell the House anything about it until April 19.

The chief of the defence staff, in his press conference yesterday said very clearly that the Minister of National Defence knew about criminal overtones on March 18. Now the hon. House leader tells me the minister meant that headquarters did not know because it did not get the press release.

My goodness, the minister knew something serious was going on in Somalia. Did she not think it strange when she read the newspapers the next day and did not see anything there? Did she not concern herself about the public information aspect? Did she not ask herself the question: What are we going to tell the Canadian public about this? What was her reaction when there was no media coverage of the incident? That went on for days and weeks and I do not know how long it would have gone on if an investigative reporter had not broken the story.

The chronology just does not fit. It does not make sense. That is the issue from the Official Opposition of the Liberal Party. The issue is not the details of the case nor the criminal aspects. What is wrong with the chronology? Why will the minister not make it clear why she did not make this information public the day she knew instead of expecting the House to believe it was all because of the press release that was not issued.

• (1215)

There was no press release. Something happened. There was a notice put on a board. Now she is blaming the department for not having a press release sent to the proper channels when she knew about it. She could have ordered a press release herself. Why did she not order a press release?

Why did she not order her department to make a release? Why did she not ensure it was released? The Minister of National Defence is charged with the management and direction of the Canadian forces and the Department of National Defence. Why did she not direct the information to be made public? Why did she not manage the information better? That is the issue.

I want to take another issue on March 4. March 4 was apparently an oral briefing. It certainly was not reported in Canada. It was not until April 19 or April 20, almost two months later, that an investigation took place into the incident.

When I say an investigation, I mean a proper investigation. Why did it take two months for this to happen? Why did the minister not inform the House if she knew, which I presume she did? If she did not know, why did she not know? What did she do about it when she found out?

These are very legitimate questions. These are questions that the opposition is paid to ask. The Canadian public is asking those questions. People are not asking to know about the details of what is happening in the cases. They want to know why they were not informed and had to find out through the back door. Every day we are finding out things through the back door. That is the issue.

Regarding the credibility of the minister, we are participating in 18 peacekeeping operations if you count them all, 4,700 troops at a time when the cold war is over. The army has been reduced by 4,000. The Department of National Defence is being reduced in operating and in over-all expenditures and capital outlay. Yet we have never debated this issue in the House of Commons. Why? Is it not important enough? Should the opposition not be involved? Had there been a debate, perhaps we would not have 4,700 peacekeeping soldiers committed.

Perhaps we may have had different units in different places. Perhaps we would have said no to some of the commitments that we were asked to respond to. Why do these questions arise? Whenever you have questions they are red flags that tell you that there is something wrong.

The red flag in the case of the incidents in Somalia is very clear. I have just spoken of them. The red flags that we were doing something wrong in peacekeeping were two serving generals in uniform speaking out about the way we do business. This is unprecedented. The minister of external affairs tells the standing committee that we are being stretched very thinly. Two military doctors speak out at their own risk. This is unprecedented.

Member after member with expert knowledge expressed concern to the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs about the number of troops, the mix to reserves and to regulars. I want to correct something that the government House leader said.

There was no suggestion that the opposition does not want reserves to participate. The point made is that 55 per cent of a unit to participate in the kind of peacekeeping operations at the end of peacekeeping, more like peace making post to war, is out of whack by all the standards. Maybe it should be 10 per cent. Ten per cent has been recommended. That is what the experts said in committee. Twenty per cent maybe but 55 per cent, there is a red flag. There is a signal that the control mechanisms in place are telling you to stop and look at what you are doing. Question after question from the opposition, speech after speech, the adjournment debate, asking the government to stop. There is a red light and it is still on. It was amber but now it is red.

They ask what is the relationship of this to the Somalia incident and the credibility of the minister. If somebody had watched the red lights, maybe these incidents would not have taken place. The whole point is we need to debate the issue of how we peacekeep, how we respond to peacekeeping requests, the force structure and the detail of why we do what we do.

I want to address one more subject. I am not very happy to hear the government say that we are only addressing and raising these issues because the Minister of National Defence is involved in a leadership race. I do not have a problem with that. We are interested for the reasons that I have just suggested. There is a break in the chronology, things do not make sense. There are too many red flags. That is why we are raising the issue.

If we were to raise the issue because the Minister of National Defence is running for the leadership of this country, do you not think the Canadian public have a right to know if the Minister of National Defence, charged with the management and direction of the Canadian forces and the Department of National Defence, can do that properly before they go on and judge whether she can run the country? Is that not a legitimate concern? I do and I do not take any objection to that accusation being made by the government.

I have absolutely no remorse for saying yes, maybe we are attacking the minister because she wants to be the leader of the country. Let us find out how she is doing in national defence before we give her the responsibility of the country. I would like to know that and I know other Canadians would like to know that. I bet there are some members on that side of the House who would like to know that. I make no apologies for that, although in the first instance my concern and the concern of my party is based on the legitimate difficulties that we observed from looking at this case in detail, the case of peacekeeping and the incidents in Somali that have shown less than good, strong leadership, the kind that we need in this country.

On the helicopter issue I want to say that there are as many red flags on the EH-101 as there are in peacekeeping. I just want to make one comment in response to something that was said over there. My good friend, the member for Halifax West talked about the number of jobs. I have a report from an expert organization that says for every billion dollars spent on military procurement, 28,000 jobs are generated. If you spent it on public transportation you would get 32,000 jobs. If you spent it on infrastructure you would get 57,000. If you spent it on education you would get 71,000. Whatever arguments are put forward, do not put that one forward because it does not make sense.

In conclusion, my point is the issues are raised about the credibility of the minister for good reasons. I say they are not partisan reasons. They are certainly not from anything I have said this morning. We need a public debate on peacekeeping and how we do business because of the changing factors involved. We need a public debate on how we acquire major equipment for the Department of National Defence again because of these changing issues.

• (1225)

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I have a comment and a question for the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. Let me say to him first that we all come to this House of Commons from different backgrounds. I appreciate that his background is in the defence field and that he has had a very important career in Canada's military. But when he comes to the House of Commons and says "nothing I say today, none of my remarks, reflect adversely on the credibility of the Canadian Armed Forces or the officers, men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces", that is a caveat that does not wash.

The member must know, as we all know, that the Minister of National Defence acts upon the advice of the military officers. The chief of the Canadian forces, the assemblage of high ranking officers are continually advising the minister and nobody has suggested that the Minister of National Defence in any of these areas has acted on advice other than the advice of the military.

While it is generous of the member to announce to the House of Commons that nothing reflects adversely on the military in his remarks, he knows and the military knows that that kind of criticism does reflect adversely on the Canadian forces when it is suggested that the policies being followed have dire results. He knows and we all know that those policies are based upon the advice of the military, including the chief officers of the military.

Because he only had 30 seconds to deal with the EH-101 helicopter contract, he confined himself to a remark about the industrial spin-offs in employment. I want to remind him that a billion dollars in unemployment insurance would keep a lot of people happy. What we are trying to do as a government is balance government expenditures to produce the services required for the Canadian people as well as create employment. It is not to create employment that the EH-101 helicopter contract is being promoted and implemented. It is to serve the Canadian forces and the national defence interests of Canada.

If the member wants to make a comment about the helicopter contract and other matters he should simply state what his view is on that particular contract on the equipment of the Canadian forces, whether it is necessary. Does he agree, for example, with his colleague from Winnipeg South Centre who says we must change the policy, that we do not need helicopters, we may not even need patrol frigates because we are not going to be attacked.

That is what I want to ask the member, not whether he quarrels with the industrial spin-off, not whether he quarrels with the quality of the contract, the nature of the equipment, but whether he believes we do not need a Canadian navy any more and we do not need patrol frigates and we do not need helicopters. What is his position on that issue?

I would like also to deal with the matter of our policy in Somalia. I simply want to say this, and perhaps the member might want to comment on it.

On the highways and streets and roads of Somalia we cannot judge our Canadian Armed Forces' members by Canadian standards that prevail in the cities and towns of Canada. We cannot simply expect them to behave exactly as they would on Wellington Street or the streets of St. John's, Newfoundland or Halifax, Nova Scotia. Our laws do not have extraterritorial application. We simply must judge them and exercise jurisdiction over them in the manner endorsed by law, and that law is the National Defence Act and that law has been followed in this case.

I also want to know whether the member quarrels with that. Would he have the Ontario Highway Traffic Act apply on the streets of Somalia to Canadian Armed Forces' drivers? Is that his intention? I want him to understand and I want everybody to understand that we cannot judge our forces by prevalent urban city standards in Canada.

Mr. Mifflin: Madam Speaker, the hon. member who is normally very cogent seems to have fallen out of the track this morning. He has covered a wide range of issues, from the responsibility of national defence to the highways act in Ontario, to helicopters and the responsibilities of the minister.

Before I answer his questions, I want to tell him that I presume he has misunderstood what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. He did not say that we did not need patrol frigates; he did not say we did not need a navy; and if the hon. member had had a difficulty with what the member for Winnipeg South Centre had said, I wish he had put those questions to him when he was in the House and not to me after the hon. member had to leave to keep an important appointment in Winnipeg.

• (1230)

The other thing I want to say to the hon. member—

Mr. Epp: He left right after his speech.

Mr. Mifflin: It is a distortion anyway, that is my point.

I want to address one aspect of what the hon. member for Halifax West said. It is absolutely incredible that he suggested that the Minister of National Defence does what the minister is told by the department. That is absolutely incredible. The minister, under the National Defence Act, is charged with management and direction. That is her responsibility. How can one give direction if one always follows what one is told?

I happen to be aware of one Minister of National Defence who was briefed on the acquisition programs of the Canadian Armed Forces. He was told by the senior members that Canada could not afford nuclear submarines. That particular minister directed the Canadian forces to conduct a study to determine whether nuclear submarines were possible. That is the kind of direction I would expect the minister to give. That is the kind of direction we would expect any minister to give, including this minister.

If the hon. member closely looked at the point he raised, if he is suggesting that the Minister of National Defence parrots everything that is said to her by the department then we may have some evidence to support the suggestion in the motion that she suffers a lack of leadership and direction.

I am going to be kind to the member and suggest that any minister worth his or her salt in any department would not just follow the information given to that minister by the department. Presumably it is a two-way conversation, a two-way exchange of information.

I still find it incredible that the minister on March 17 would have been briefed by national defence officials about the serious incident and not have been briefed on the public relations aspect, on whether or not there should be a media release in Canada. That I do not understand. I do not credit the department with that. Whatever advice was given, whether it was positive or negative, the minister should have said that this is a serious incident, and I believe I am on firm ground here. If she had known about the incident on March 4, which was an equally serious incident, she should have at least said: We have not heard too much about the March 4 incident but we had better now do something about this incident because it is similar.

Whatever happened, whether the minister directed that media release be given, whether she directed that the Canadian public be informed, it did not take place. She did not inform the Canadian public until the news story broke. Everybody was kept in the dark and the information leaked out.

That does not show good leadership, in the evidence or the results, no matter what went on. I suppose we will never know the story about what happened exactly.

Did the minister do what was recommended by national defence or did the minister give direction that (a) it not take place, that Canadians not be informed, or (b) that whatever direction was taken she agreed with national defence?

I have no problems with a board of inquiry being conducted by any officer in the Canadian forces. With a major-general conducting a board of inquiry no Canadian would have any difficulty in believing, and rightfully so, that the information would be anything but objective. However that inquiry, by the very nature of what sparked it in this House, goes outside the military. How can we expect a major-general to inquire into the conduct of a minister? It does not happen.

• (1235)

We are suggesting that there be a public inquiry where these facts will be brought out to the public, not at the end of July but as they occur. We need to know now. This is not going to die. The media will continue to probe and the Canadian public will continue to ask questions.

My response to the hon. member is that I believe he has some of his information wrong. He has certainly distorted the information that was given by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre in his speech. If what he believes about the minister is true then he is agreeing with the motion.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, when I was informed last night about this debate today I found myself in a very difficult position.

It is no secret in this House and in other places that these days I am quite closely associated with the Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs in her quest to become Prime Minister of this country.

My initial reaction to this particular motion and the way it was put forward was anger. I wrote eight or nine speeches in my mind over a period of three or four minutes and realized that was probably not the best approach to take.

In considering whether I wanted to participate in this debate I worried very much about bringing the campaign and process that so many very capable people in my party have offered to participate in, and for which they have offered themselves to this party and this country, into this House. That would not be a good idea either.

I did not want to take advantage of this opportunity to promote my particular choice over the others. I feel very strongly about the choice I have made. However I also feel very strongly that every one of those candidates from this institution would make a tremendous leader of my party and my country.

I thought about it more in the context of what is happening here politically and what it means for us as a government to support the Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs in the job that she does. I debated with some of my friends and my colleagues in the minister's office and in the House leader's office about whether I would participate.

By this morning I had calmed myself down. As I started to think about this debate and about the process that has been going on here in terms of the way this House has been forced to deal with this issue, it became perfectly obvious to me that this House has not been asked to deal with the issue in terms of national defence and the management of a government department. It is about the desire of some people to make political points, and not just on the back of the Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs or the House leader but potentially if there is an environmental issue, on the back of the Minister of the Environment, et cetera.

This is on the backs of the people caught in the middle of this, the soldiers, the men and women, the regular forces and reservists who are serving not only in Somalia but in Bosnia and 17, 18, 19, or 20 other theatres around the world. To some extent they accept some of these risks. It is also on the backs of the families.

There are about 1,100 men and women from this country in Somalia. I have not been to Somalia. I have spent a fair bit of time in Ethiopia, Eritrea, Sudan and 16 or 17 countries to the west of that. I can imagine what Somalia is like. I have not been in a war situation. I have been in some civil war situations in which there have been firings and shootings. I have been in military operations in Central America.

• (1240)

To a family that is sitting in Petawawa or St. John's, Newfoundland whose mother, sister, father, brother, son or daughter has gone off in a plane to a land people have no concept of, to a situation that people can only imagine, where there have been incidents—and sure there have been incidents. There are 1,100 people there, 845 of them from the airborne division. It is a very tense situation in a very hostile land with a very hostile environment and a very hostile political climate.

The men and women who are left here to worry about their loved ones are all of a sudden confronted with the perception out of this place that every single one of them over there has been involved in some sort of violent or untoward incident. In the process of trying to attack this government and the Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs we have completely forgotten those people.

Day after day outside this place, when the minister is not here, when the opposition is attacking the military generally from Colonel By Drive to the last buck private in Somalia there is no recognition that those people left behind make as much of a sacrifice and contribution in their own way. That is the shame of it. It is not the attacks on the Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, the House leader, the Prime Minister or the Deputy Prime Minister. After the last eight years they are used to it in this place. However the abuse that is going on here is being heaped on top of those who are scared to death.

Preserver was over there. We remember the gulf war and Protecteur and Preserver. Thirty per cent of those people were Newfoundlanders. A lot of them had addresses that said they were from Dartmouth but many of those men and women serving on ships were Newfoundlanders. I was quite close to one family. I know what that mother went through every single day watching the television with her hands over her eyes but her fingers open because she did not want to miss anything. She knew in her mind that her son was okay and was going to be okay. The risks were there but they were minimal, but in her heart she did know what was going to happen next.

We get this resolution today. We get this opposition day motion clearly attacking the Minister of National Defence on her performance and what has gone on here and what has gone on there. I hear my friend, a former senior officer in the military, talking to me about credibility, about the credibility of the minister and the government. I want to address some of those points because they are important.

The minister, the House leader, the Prime Minister, the chief of defence staff, and a variety of spokespersons for the Department of National Defence and the Canadian Armed Forces have repeatedly put forward the incidents as they happened and the responses that went with them. Nobody has denied there have been problems.

I go back to Somalia and what we are dealing with there in a big international organization. Nobody has denied there have been questions about communications. What we have to put in context is what went on and what did not go on, and what gets said in this House about nobody knowing. I am not going back through it. It has been gone through already.

We are talking about credibility. We get a statement in this House that after the incident on March 4 nobody said or did anything. On the morning of March 5 it was on bloody Newsworld.

• (1245)

With all due respect, even for somebody like me who still remembers Don Jamieson doing the news with a Chevrolet car in the studio, I recognize that Newsworld is the news. Do not talk to me about credibility.

My colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception was a commanding officer on more than one ship. He had very serious responsibilities in terms of maritime command and a number of different things.

Imagine that if every time there was an incident—I am not making this one seem smaller than it may be—the minister was on the phone to him saying: "Admiral, get the press release out. Admiral, I am going to be talking in the House of Commons this afternoon about what happened on the bridge of your ship last week or on the lower deck of your ship last week".

The Solicitor General of Canada does not come into this House every time there is an investigation conducted by the RCMP. The Minister of National Defence has never and should never come into this House to talk about every time there is an investigation, particularly of this nature, going on where the military is functioning.

It is clearly the responsibility of the Department of National Defence to ensure that people are kept informed. The process has been followed. The minister addressed it in her statement earlier this week in terms of the action that the department undertook to keep people informed.

In most of those cases people were kept informed. Incidents were reported. The minister quite clearly acknowledged that she knew there had been an incident. She did not know that there had been a homicide. How did she find out? The department instigated an investigation as the department should do.

We talked about management and direction. The minister has quite clearly said that there have been some problems with communications. She has ordered that they be fixed and that whatever information can be made public be made public.

Why would I say something like: "Whatever can be made public should be made public"? If there is a criminal investigation under way then first one wants to be able to finish it. Second, one does not want to prejudice the investigation and those who unfortunately may be subject to that investigation.

Perhaps we have a problem in that the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Veterans Affairs used to be the Minister of Justice. She knows how the justice system works and must work. She understands her responsibilities within that.

There was an inquiry. It was a military inquiry with public participation. How did we get public participation in that sort of inquiry? The minister ordered that the regulations be amended. This is the sort of management and direction that my friend talks about.

The results of that inquiry will be made public as the chief of defence staff explained yesterday. The people will know what has gone on through that process. People will know that this sort of thing happened for a particular set of reasons. They will also know that the investigation that as I say unfortunately must go on will not be prejudiced by the inquiry.

I am very worried as I said in the beginning that my friends opposite have lost totally the focus. I heard some of the comments this morning of the member for Winnipeg South Centre. I have heard that sort of thing before: the desperation, the personal attacks and the bitterness. We have come to expect a little bit of it from time to time.

We have had to make some decisions in the process that the Minister of National Defence has pursued. She found herself spending more time on the telephone dealing with national defence matters, as she should and she must, that made it practical at the end of last week to continue conducting her political business that is part of her responsibility as a minister.

She returned to Ottawa and met on Friday and Sunday I think with officials of her department. She appeared in this House and with the Secretary of State for External Affairs took questions in this House. In areas related to the United Nations the Secretary of State for External Affairs rightly responded to these. In the areas that pertained to defence the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Veterans Affairs responded to these.

She was again in this House on Tuesday. This opposition that wanted her so badly in this House to bring her to account asked one insipid, stupid question about her schedule. She sat there prepared to respond. She did interviews and responded to the media but there was not one question in the House.

When she is again out of town we come beating on the door. These great, valiant troopers are defenders of the people on whose backs they have tromped to make trite political points. When they really want to do some business and they have the minister here they are scared to death. They will not stand up in front of her and say:

"Minister, account for yourself" because she will bury them like she buried them on Tuesday afternoon.

The minister and this government, with the help of the House leader and the Prime Minister and all of her colleagues, have respected the military in this country and the role that we ask them to play, which in many cases is a bloody awful role and one that a lot of us would not do ourselves. One leaves one's family. We have some experience with that when we come to the battlefields of Ottawa. They are in deserts in Somalia and the heat of the Middle East, Pakistan and India and around the world. We impugn every one of them and we impugn their senior officers. Those who have been at fault in this will be found out, as well they should be, and dealt with fairly, equitably and justly within the criminal justice system of this country and the military.

However, let us not forget those who they have left behind and let us not leave them behind in our attempt to make some points as we go along.

I am tempted not to talk about the helicopters but I have not talked about the helicopters except on the late show. I have to say that I had some concerns about the helicopters like many others and like my friends across the way. I will say that I will continue to watch as it plays itself out because there have been some commitments made. I am very intrigued to know that we should get 15 per cent of the economic benefit of the helicopters in Atlantic Canada.

Frankly, I am most concerned about the capacity of Canada to protect those who make their living and make their income from the sea. A number of us, and none more than my friend from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, have been confronted with the tragedies that happen at sea where people need to be protected and people need their lives saved. It is the nature of what we do.

The capacity of the current equipment simply is not there. What we are offering today is not good enough, particularly when there is better equipment available that is made in this country and will be made and sold from this country.

• (1255)

This is perceived to be some great Tory plot. I think we have to recognize that what we are doing is replacing our rapidly aging fleet over a period of more than 13 years within the context of the shrinking national defence budget. These are decisions that have been made by the Department of National Defence.

This is something that is not simply supported by us. I have a letter here from the mayor of the town of Gander, His Worship Doug Sheppard. I am not sure of his political persuasion and I certainly would not want to assign any unjustly. He quite clearly supports the helicopters and there are others.

I simply want to say in closing as it relates to the helicopters that it is not as cut and dried as everybody thinks. It is not $4.5 billion next year and that is it and we have helicopters. As we analyse both these issues we have to be open and fair and remember from where we have come. My biggest concern is for those who serve in the military and particularly their families and what we put them through. They are doing jobs that I, like many of my colleagues, probably would not do. I am very sad to see this day come where we have taken this type of advantage.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I have listened with great interest to my colleague opposite. I must say that in the time that I have spent in this Chamber, which has been going on in excess of 10 years in this great institution, I have never heard such gobbledegook and such distortion of the facts and the truth.

I have respect for the hon. member and what he has said. It does not necessarily mean that I agree with what the hon. member has said. The first point that the hon. member must recognize is that it was said clearly and unequivocally earlier this day that no one on this side of the House would dispute the fact that the Minister of National Defence has the right, and maybe the obligation, to seek the highest office in this land. No one has argued with that.

Equally so, the hon. member stands in his place and casts aspersions on those of us who sit in opposition to this administration for raising questions and for asking for debate only to be turned down at each and every opportunity. The purpose of today's debate is simply to discuss the issues and obviously the major issue of the day is the incompetence persistently and consistently of the minister responsible. This could have been avoided if clearer heads had prevailed and particularly if ministers opposite had taken the subject matter seriously and come into this House under ministerial statements—not after the fact but well before.

This hon. member from Bonavista—Trinity has been calling repeatedly and consistently for debate on the subject matter with regards to the training of our peacekeepers. That member over there has the unmitigated gall to question and to impugn the motives of that hon. member and this opposition party. I say to that hon. member that there is not a bone in his body that will not testify to the fact that the only reason he is here today to speak to this motion is because he happens to be the co-campaign manager for the Minister of National Defence and he is trying to protect that minister. That is the only reason the hon. member is here.

Madam Speaker, I am coming to my question. The hon. member said that on Tuesday we only had one question. It was the day after the budget, as the hon. member knows. The hon. Minister of National Defence had our resolution last night when she was here for the vote. I asked my colleagues to return to Ottawa to participate in this debate. Why?

I ask the hon member, why is it that no minister of the Crown is here, particularly the Minister of National Defence, nor the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Associate Minister of National Defence to stand for the Armed Forces and give us more details with regard to the situation? I will tell you why, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will calmly wait until after Question Period for an answer to his question.

It being one o'clock p.m., I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock p.m.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

FORESTRY

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it was with great regret that I and the people involved in the forestry industry in Prince Edward Island heard the Minister of Finance announce that our regional development agreement for forestry would not be renewed.

The agreement, which expired on March 31, 1993 was worth over $24 million to the forestry industry in P.E.I. and was responsible for the creation of over 500 jobs in planting seedlings, harvesting and hauling the logs. In addition it fostered the growth of forests, management techniques and silviculture in general.

The industry had been negotiating in good faith to get a renewed agreement and was left with the impression that the only issue to be resolved was the length of the agreement. To suddenly find it was cancelled was, to put it mildly, a shock. Other provinces have had their agreements renewed. P.E.I. will be the only province negatively impacted by the budget decision.

I remind the minister of a statement made by him at the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries in November 1990. He said:

> I remain committed to the continuation of the development agreements as an essential instrument of the sustainable development of our forest resource.

After having met with the minister in committee and privately and discussing the situation with ACOA, I have every confidence that the minister's sense of justice and fair play will prevail and he will not allow P.E.I.'s forestry industry to be sandbagged in this fashion.

ALLERGY AWARENESS

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform hon. members that the week of April 26 to May 1 has been declared Allergy Awareness Week and May has been declared Allergy Awareness Month.

Every year the Allergy Foundation of Canada chooses a week to highlight the problem of allergies and to show what can be done to relieve them. This volunteer-led organization provides information and support for people suffering from this problem.

The cost of allergy-related illnesses, in terms of health care and lost productivity, is huge and growing all the time. In addition, the social cost is incalculable.

I wish the Allergy/Asthma Information Association every success for Allergy Awareness Month.

CANADA HEALTH ACT

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the departure of the Minister of National Health and Welfare opens a vacuum of leadership on medicare in the Tory ranks. Despite his bungling of some key health issues the departing minister was at least on record as supporting universal medicare and he spoke out against user fees.

Where do the Tory leadership candidates stand today? In the shade. They have not come forward to back the Canada Health Act and the five principles of medicare, the most loved of all social programs.

I fear they intend to end universality and will continue to cut medicare funding to the provinces, even though from Manitoba and beyond the medicare system is in crisis.

I fear they will impose user fees as they voted to do so at the last Tory convention. I fear they will allow privatization of medicare.

Why do the Tory candidates, the defence minister, the environment minister and others, not tell us the real plans for the Canada Health Act, the underpinning of our universal medicare?

Keep it or kill it, which will it be?

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I met recently with a group of aviation workers from the riding I represent who have expressed concern for the future of Canada's airline industry.

Recognizing that the airline industry in Canada is at a crossroads with the proposed alliance between Canadian Airlines and American Airlines, the aviation workers expressed concern that Canada will be viewed by U.S. mega-carriers as a secondary market. As a result, service will suffer and jobs will be lost.

I believe that the best interests of Canadians are served if our country has a fully Canadian airline, not an airline that is an offshoot of a foreign-owned mega-carrier.

The Canadian market can support one viable internationally competitive carrier. As a result, jobs in management and reservations, aircraft maintenance and support services could be preserved.

Gemini Corporation has the technology to provide reservation services and we have skilled workers in every area of the airline industry.

I believe that Canadians should be served by one Canadian airline owned and operated by Canadians.

THE LIBERAL PARTY OF CANADA

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, Liberals say one thing when they are in opposition and did another when they were in government. The Liberals have joined the New Democratic caucus in calling for open public hearings on the tragic deaths in Somalia.

The Liberals have acted outraged that the government should be so undemocratic as to reject a full public inquiry into this matter. The Liberals want Canadians to believe that they would be more open about dealing with scandals than this shameful crop of Conservatives.

However the Liberals did not feel so strongly about openness when they were in government. Ten years ago in this House of Commons I asked the Liberal government to hold public hearings into the Atomic Energy Control Board's decision to increase the allowable level of radiation exposure to pregnant women by five times the current rate. The Liberal energy minister repeatedly refused to allow public hearings into this matter. Who was that minister? None other than the current Liberal leader.

NEW LISKEARD AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming—French River): Mr. Speaker, in a move that showed no heart or understanding for the people of the tri-towns last Friday, the provincial NDP government saw fit to slash at the already crippled economy of Timiskaming.

One of the casualties of the NDP that makes no sense is the closing of the New Liskeard Agricultural College.

This 26-year old institution has 120 students and over 50 employees at the facility. In the last three to four years about $12 million worth of new buildings has been added. It is no secret that New Liskeard's college greatly contributes to the province's agricultural advancement.

The research centre and laboratory, which services from Parry Sound through to the Manitoba border, focuses both on crop and livestock technology. It is also a research facility for sheep and beef in Ontario. Programs at the college, through an outreach program, are offered across the north and range from engineering and business management to horticulture and crop science.

This facility has a tremendous impact on our community, injecting $1.3 million into the economy. I say to Bob Rae, on behalf of the residents of Timiskaming, that this facility should be saved. Its continued service is essential for the region and for Ontario farmers.

SENIOR CITIZENS

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, Canadian seniors are fighting back. In a column in The Ottawa Citizen Madeleine Honeyman says: "Political abuse of the elderly is making Granny grumpy". She goes on to say:

> It is far from proven to my satisfaction that the over 70s use more of the health-care dollar than the very young—It is also questionable whether the old take more from the social system than they pay to support our overloaded education system, welfare for young people who haven't been able to find jobs and mortgage payments for their middle-aged children and grandchildren who are out of work.

Perhaps it is time all Canadians remember who started our medicare system, who built and paid for our hospitals, who paid to educate our doctors, our nurses and our researchers and who paid to put in place our pension system. Who else but seniors are charged 100 per cent on their income in taxes?

Madeleine Honeyman concludes by saying, and she means this: "Beware, Granny is getting leaner and meaner".

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF WESTERN QUEBEC

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on February 19, 1993, I had the opportunity to visit the new premises of the Federal Office of Regional Development (Quebec) and Forestry Canada in Val d'Or. At a time like this when all departments must reduce their spending, I wish to congratulate the management of these two departments on this initiative of combining and sharing services.

This new government service centre will save large amounts in operating expenses, will improve customer service and promote synergy between these two organizations.

In conclusion, I want to point out that the presence of these two departments is essential for promoting the economic development of western Quebec.

THE BUDGET

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the finance minister dealt more blows to western Canada in his most recent budget. Unfortunately westerners have come to expect this from this particular government but it is particularly painful when it comes from a fellow westerner.

Fully $27 million was cut from the Western Economic Diversification Fund, something that is vital to the development of products, technology and industry in our region. The Crow benefit was cut last December and now further cuts are promised. Another $250 million is scheduled to be cut from the CBC by 1998. It is clear the present government's intent is to kill the CBC slowly. That would spell disaster for many westerners who watch the CBC in order to have valuable information.

VIA Rail also faces a $250 million cut by 1998. This is also of concern to westerners. Will we end up having VIA trains only between Windsor and Quebec City? Is that the intent of this government, this unloved government? It is ironic that railway passenger service was what united this country initially and now those opposite are trying to destroy that along with so many other institutions in Canada.

MINISTER OF FINANCE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, in typical NDP fashion the finance minister of British Columbia has condemned the federal budget. Mr. Clark is the only finance minister in Canada who has not seen the light and moved to reduce spending and cut the cost of government.

While everyone else in the country is attempting to reduce costs and hold the line on taxes, Mr. Clark and the NDP Government of B.C. have increased their budget by 5.6 per cent. He has increased taxes, increased the size of government and the complexity of government. He has hired hundreds of new civil servants.

• (1410)

At the same time the minister is whining that he should be getting more money from the federal government. My constituents tell me that we should not give him any increase at all until he recognizes the economic facts of life and mends both his own and his government's profligate ways.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, today's Globe and Mail quotes statements of East York Councillor John Papadakis in a context that implies that any refugee claimant may be bogus, any immigrant may be illegal and persons who commit crime on our streets may be refugees or immigrants from certain countries whose people appear in Canada as visible minorities.

This is unjust, since he does not show evidence that refugees or immigrants have a higher crime rate than those who are Canadian born. He is also quoted as objecting to refugee claimants receiving welfare.

In fact, municipal authorities and both opposition parties urged the government in recent amendments to the Immigration Act to allow refugee claimants to work. However, the government insisted on forcing them onto welfare to survive. Maybe the government will reconsider that unfortunate decision.

THE BUDGET

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, in my view one of the most important measures in the budget announced by the Minister of Finance on Monday is the strong commitment to collaborative financial planning with the provinces of Canada.

It is my hope that the consultations which will take place at the meeting of finance ministers in May will not only deal in broad terms of debt and deficits, as essentially they must. It is also imperative that their deliberations touch on matters of fundamental political policy and principle.

For example, there is insistent pressure to change and diminish transfers to provinces, which the minister has thus far resisted in this budget. This subject requires great care because it concerns the very essence of economic balance in Canada, a fundamental condition of the concept of Confederation. We in Atlantic Canada do not consider equalization payments to be handouts but dividends legitimately earned as founding partners in the creation of this country.

As federal and provincial authorities plan together for the financial future of Canada let us be sure that their vision always remains focused on the grand original design of our country.

PROVINCE OF ONTARIO

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, Premier Rae's budget announcement yesterday will reduce conservation lands in Ontario.

The Ontario government is reducing funding for conservation authorities and removing a tax break to conservation authorities that keep these lands natural. This would encourage conservation authorities to use conservation lands for development, increase logging and even sell some of these lands in order to produce some revenue. Local conservation authorities will be unable to pay taxes on these lands and thus valuable wetlands, Niagara escarpment lands, flood plains, conservation parks and forests are threatened by these proposals.

The people in Ontario should write to Premier Rae and urge him to reconsider this unwarranted decision. The environment in Ontario is not for sale.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my personal support for the ongoing conviction of the Minister of Employment and Immigration to maintain the federal government's role in manpower and training.

Effective training and human resource development are not about control but co-ordination and co-operation.

Governments must act together to remove the disincentives in the current system, eliminate the inconsistencies and pursue a national strategy which readies all Canadians to meet the challenges of tomorrow.

To pursue the efficiencies of an open and integrated market within Canada we need a training strategy which transcends provincial boundaries. That means a national approach with national standards and national input.

Provincial and local participation is important and necessary. However, let us not fool ourselves. To be successful we require a commitment and willingness to work together at all levels and not against each other.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, many times before the budget I asked the Minister of Finance whether or not he would consider closing certain tax loopholes, most notably the business and entertainment tax deduction, and some of the other tax loopholes the Auditor General identified in his report.

At one point, I even thought that the Minister of Finance was considering doing something like this, particularly given that changes have been made south of the border which have eliminated some of the excuses he had given before.

I was very disappointed to see in the budget that none of these tax loopholes were closed, not a single one. It is not just a question of not having tax increases. It is also a question of not closing any of these tax loopholes thus giving the lie once again to the real intention of the government, which is not deficit reduction but an ideological agenda by which it keeps doing things to institutions like VIA Rail and the CBC under the cover of deficit reduction.

NATIONAL CONSUMER WEEK

Mr. Michel Champagne (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I want to draw to the attention of the House one of the themes which the federal government will consider closely during this National Consumer Week.

This year the federal government will stress the theme of consumer credit so that consumers can make decisions with full knowledge of the facts when they use the various credit instruments at their disposal.

The use of credit remains high and consumers can sometimes overextend themselves because of the falling interest rates. Some credit problems can occur if consumers do not make appropriate use of the information already available on how to use credit wisely, since they too often have easy access to credit. As a result they can draw too heavily on their credit and consumers can end up with too much debt.

Consumers are the key to a dynamic economy. This is why they must be well informed before deciding on the type of credit to use, and they must also be demanding about the quality of services provided by their lenders.

I am confident that National Consumer Week will enable Canadians to be better informed on issues which concern them, as well as on their rights and responsibilities.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Finance.

Today the Minister of Finance is quoted by a Toronto newspaper as saying about his and the government's budgetary policies: "We have been fighting this lonely battle, this lonely mission, without the support of the business community".

The efforts of the Minister of Finance to portray himself as that lonely Maytag washer repairman in the television commercial simply will not wash.

Does the Minister of Finance not realize that unlike that repairman on TV he has a poor product when it comes to his budget and budgetary policies, a poor product that has not worked for the past eight and a half years?

Why did the government not present a budgetary plan on Monday for real action on the deficit and especially on jobs and economic growth?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised that my hon. friend would describe the Minister of Finance like that because the Minister of Finance is a very popular fellow and a very busy fellow. The fellow at Maytag seems to be very lonely. Our Minister of Finance is anything but lonely, and the hon. member knows that.

Second, I must tell my friend that our government from day one in 1984, from the financial statement which was given in the fall of 1984 straight on through in every subsequent budget, has placed the deficit as a major problem. One thing that was happening was that the provinces were spending at a rate well in excess of inflation while the federal government was keeping its spending under the rate of inflation year over year.

What has happened now is that the provinces, no matter what their political stripe, all of a sudden realize that what the federal government has been doing is right and they are now following in our footsteps. That is good. I think the Minister of Finance has set the stage for good co-operation among the provinces with this budget.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I invite the Acting Minister of Finance to read the quotation of the Minister of Finance when he cried about his "lonely battle". I was not making this up; it is the minister's own words.

Also in the same interview with this Toronto newspaper the minister said:

> "I can't help it if they can't read it", he said, slamming a copy of the budget on the table in his office.

Why will the Minister of Finance not recognize that Canadians including the business community do not need any literacy lessons from him? They have read the budget. That is why they do not like it. That is why they consider it a failure on the deficit, jobs and economic growth.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to respond to my hon. friend with regard to his question.

I think the Minister of Finance was referring to fact that for 15 years the average rate of growth of program spending in Ottawa under the Liberals was 13.8 per cent a year every single year. For the last nine years that percentage of 13.8 per cent has been lowered to 3.6 per cent. This is a remarkable accomplishment by the Government of Canada over the last nine years which is why the deficit as a percentage of GDP has been cut in half, by 50 per cent, under this government.

• (1420)

I think that is what the Minister of Finance was referring to. This is what the business community has been asking for. This is what the business community and investors have achieved, which is why inflation is so low and why interest rates are so low. I think the Minister of Finance was saying to the business community: "We have acted in the national interest. We think it is perhaps time for you to stand up and say indeed those policies defend and enhance the national interest of Canada".

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, in August 1983 the present Prime Minister said: "To be content with an unemployment rate of 10 per cent is just short of criminal".

[Translation]

In August 1983 the present Prime Minister said, and I quote: "To be content with an unemployment rate of 10 per cent is almost criminal". Yet the budget tabled this week will keep unemployment above 11 per cent this year and next year.

Is the Prime Minister prepared to admit that—based on his own comments—he and the Conservatives are guilty of keeping unemployment so high? Is he prepared to do something right now to launch a real recovery and truly lower an unemployment rate which is way too high?

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is quite properly deploring an unemployment rate of 11 per cent as being too high, forgetting of course that when he turned over the government to us under the Liberals the unemployment rate was 11.7 per cent. We then reduced it to 7.3 per cent.

Mr. Gagliano: It has gone back up.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says: "It has gone back". Indeed it has as a result of the recession. Because of what I think is generally acknowledged to be prudent management, the unemployment rate will decline to something in the neighbourhood of 7.2 per cent or 7.3 per cent pursuant to the budget.

Mr. Gauthier: A change in government.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friends say: "A change in government". No, a change in prime ministers but the same government, which may explain the fact that the Leader of the Opposition has not been seen since the budget was tabled.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): He has certainly been seen, Mr. Speaker, but he does not need to be seen by the Prime Minister. He does not expect his vote.

[Translation]

As mentioned yesterday by Michel Auger in the Journal de Montréal, the Minister of Finance and his predecessor have done a very poor job of predicting the deficit for the 1993–94 fiscal year. Indeed, the former Minister of Finance was off by $16 billion in predicting the deficit for 1994.

My question for the Acting Prime Minister is this: How can the minister believe that the Canadian people and the international markets will have confidence in the Minister of Finance and in his budget, given such a record of incompetence?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member took the time to examine the projections made over the period of the last nine years he would see that indeed the Minister of Finance missed some deficit projections. They were much lower than he had projected in his budget. If he checks the 1987–88 and 1988–89 budgets he will find that the deficit was lower than he had projected in his budgets. As a matter of fact the record of projections of this government was very good up until the recessionary period.

If the hon. member was fair and compared the projections of the 1992 budget, for example, with the projections of all the other forecasting groups both in Canada and internationally, he would find that they were all off. Every single one of them was off. Our Minister of Finance made a mid-term financial statement and corrected the record. Every one on their projections was off. He cannot lay that on the finance minister.

• (1425)

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, one out of nine is not even good in baseball.

Yesterday the minister acknowledged, and I use his words, market jitters that followed his budget. Analysts are now saying that these jitters were largely caused by the strength of the minister's own pre-budget rhetoric and resulted in a rise in the Treasury bill rate and the bank rate on Tuesday.

The minister's mistake in raising expectations is not free of cost. Will the government please reveal to the House an estimated cost of the additional interest charges faced by the government as a result of the need to defend the dollar on Tuesday?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, my friend has been around a while. He understands that at budget times financial markets fluctuate somewhat. He will be pleased to know that the Canadian dollar has in fact stabilized, that it is trading at a very narrow margin right now and has maintained its strength. The hon. member should not be worried about that.

This budget has set out a clear program of deficit reduction, of cutting expenditures of the federal government to assure that taxpayers' dollars are being wisely spent, but at the same time reducing the deficit so that interest rates and inflation can remain low and the private sector can get to creating employment, creating work and creating wealth which is so desperately needed.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, one would hope that a government's budget would contain some vision of what the future should be. This week's budget certainly does tell something about the Conservative vision of the future, but in many ways it is a very negative and going back to the past kind of future. As in previous budgets the government has decided not only to ignore the job crisis but to continue dismantling institutions and programs that define who we are as a people and to implement cuts to transportation, VIA Rail and the Crow subsidy for farmers.

My question is for the Acting Minister of Finance. In just looking at transportation we see a record of privatization, deregulation, cutbacks to VIA Rail and cutbacks to airlines which have created a crisis both in number of jobs lost and in service to Canadians. Does this government have a vision of the future of transportation in this country, and what is it?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows that the National Transportation Agency is completing a review as has the royal commission on transportation requirements in the year 2000 in Canada. Therein are contained a number of very important ideas for transportation which the House will be called upon to consider.

More important, perhaps, my hon. friend has just described the tough cutbacks in transportation, the tough cutbacks in regional development and the tough cutbacks throughout the budget, making precisely the point the Minister of Finance indicated the day before yesterday. There are $3.8 billion worth of real cuts in 1993, $5.8 billion worth of real cuts in 1994, $7.9 billion worth of real cuts at the end of the fiscal framework, for a total of $30.7 billion in cuts over the five-year period, which is the largest expenditure reduction in the history of Canada.

We are not denying that; we are affirming it as a fact. We think this is a signal of confidence we are sending to the international markets of the seriousness with which we embark on a program of deficit reduction.

My hon. friend is quite right. I am not trying to hide behind commas or paragraphs. The cuts are there. They are serious. They are meaningful and they are historic. I wish we had the money to do otherwise, but we do not and we have taken our responsibilities in a manner unprecedented by a Government of Canada in modern history.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is right on one thing, that is that these are historic, because this government is history and that will make Canadians pretty happy.

The cutbacks in transportation are not just a reduction of jobs. They are cutbacks to an economic basis in a country. If we do not have a good transportation system, how can we transport goods? How can we in fact build the economy the government professes it wants to build?

• (1430)

I want to ask about the government's vision in another area and that is cultural institutions in this country. We have seen cuts to the CBC, Telefilm Canada, cultural groups, the Canada Council budget cut last year and the promised important film distribution legislation has never happened.

Cultural groups not only employ hundreds of thousands of people but they really give expression to and help define who we are as Canadians. I want to ask the government what its vision is of culture in this country. What vision for the future of culture in this country does it have?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has passed the new Broadcasting Act here in Canada. It passed the Status of the Artist Act recognizing the professional status of artists for the first time in Canada, implementation of major initiatives in film, video and sound recordings, establishment of the Baie Comeau policy to protect cultural sovereignty in the book publishing and distribution industry. Our commitment has been considerable. Consider this: We supported the creation in 1988 of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's all news channel and we built a state of the art CBC broadcast centre headquarters in Toronto.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Closed down the station in Windsor.

Mr. Mulroney: Closed down the station in Windsor he says. He wants us to close down the headquarters of the CBC in Toronto but we are so committed to the CBC as an instrument of national unity that we prefer to keep that rather than the station in Windsor.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, clearly the government's vision of culture is to cut back and cut back those voices which give expression to culture in our country. The government does have choices and many of those choices simply have not been taken.

[Translation]

The vision which the Conservatives have of Canada is that of a country in which there is not only a wider gap between regions, but also a wider gap between the rich and the poor.

On Monday, the Minister of Finance received a lot of praise from his caucus when he announced that there would be no tax increase in his budget. Some groups should pay more taxes; not the poor, not the middle class, but the rich and the profitable large corporations.

Why does this government refuse to close tax loopholes for the rich and to impose a minimum tax on profitable businesses?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I find it rather amusing that the NDP member would suggest a tax increase when the governments of Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia say just the opposite. In these jurisdictions it is claimed that Canadian taxpayers are overtaxed right now and that we should avoid imposing new taxes.

As a government, we eliminated more tax shelters than any other government in years. My hon. friend can check it out. I believe this is an important step in the social development of the nation. We are always open to some suggestions, but we do not want to impose new taxes.

SOMALIA

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the chief of defence staff directly contradicted the version of the facts that had been given to Canadians by the minister of defence. He told reporters that the minister of defence knew from the very start that the March 16 beating death in Belet Huen involved criminal intent.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I have some difficulty with the question. The motion today which is being debated is broad and it most certainly covers the point which I think the hon. member is raising.

Mr. Dingwall: He wasn't making reference to the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Well, he may not be making any reference to the motion but questions should not anticipate an order of the day, although this does not apply to the budget process.

We have a full day of debate on the very issue that the hon. member is raising. I must say that unless the hon. member can form his question appropriately I cannot allow it. It seems to me that this is an urgent question involving—

Mr. Rompkey: If I could have the floor, Mr. Speaker, I would say this is an urgent question involving the credibility of the minister in the carrying out of—

• (1435)

Mr. Speaker: I'm sorry. That is exactly what the debate is about. That is not a matter for me to take into account. The hon. member may wish to put a question which comes within the bounds but I cannot accept that.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, I want to quote to the Prime Minister the words of the chief of defence staff yesterday when he said that "on March 18 the unit reported that evidence indicating that criminal intent might be linked to the death had been uncovered. That same day the unit requested a military police investigating team and legal counsel as soon as possible. The request was received by NDHQ on March 19".

I want to quote to the Prime Minister what the Minister of National Defence said in the House on April 26:

Mr. Speaker: I'm sorry. I listened very carefully and I tried to give the hon. member for Labrador every opportunity to put his question in such a way that it would be acceptable. There may be another place to raise it but it is not now.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, a significant incident is defined in Canadian forces orders as "any occurrence, minor or major, that will or may create public interest".

My question is to the Acting Minister of National Defence. When the briefing took place on March 17 on a significant incident in Somalia why was it not recognized that public interest was involved? There was a delay of six weeks of rumour, speculation, phone calls, letters and questions in this House before the Canadian public was informed.

Mr. Speaker: That is all within the debate which is going on in the House. That is another matter, a matter for the debate itself.

I am going on to the next question.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Indian Affairs.

Recently a number of New Democratic Party MLAs and myself inspected the water and sewage system in the reserve at Bloodvein, Manitoba. Since the federal government has refused to contribute money to pay for the hooking up of this system to native households, the $7 million that the federal government spent only provides service to teachers, nurses and the RCMP, the very people who had water and sewage systems before the $7 million was spent.

Can the minister explain how the $7 million expenditure from the green plan is helping the environment, the native people and how it was a good investment by the federal government?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with all the figures relating to my colleague's specific concern regarding the green plan but I will certainly make inquiries and get back to him on this.

[English]

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I gave a specific example but it is a problem right through the federal government's general policy. The federal government, as part of its green plan, will pay for water and sewage systems in native communities. But it is asking unemployed people, 95 per cent of whom are on welfare in a number of communities, to pay for their own water and sewage hookup to their houses. Those people do not have the money.

Therefore, right across Canada we have the federal government spending money to put water and sewage systems in native communities without any native households being hooked up.

What is the government policy?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I disagree with the last part of my colleague's remarks. We know that the Department of Indians Affairs has invested considerable amounts at every level to meet all the needs of the native communities across the country and we will continue in that direction.

GST CREDIT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, this government has decided to defer paying the GST credit due next January until April 1994. By reducing the refunds payable this fiscal year by $625 million, the government has in fact inflated its own revenues and used accounting methods that are rather difficult to understand.

• (1440)

I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he would care to come and visit my riding to tell the people who live in retirement homes or subsidized housing and have an urgent need for such regular payments why they will not be receiving their tax credit cheques in January, why they will have to wait until April to pay their Christmas bills, the children's boots, coats and the like, and explain how come government is allowed to do something the private sector would likely be prohibited from doing?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier is dead wrong. First of all, the people in question will continue to receive the exact same amounts, not one cent less. Furthermore, he should have mentioned that payments will be made in April and in December. They will certainly have the chance to meet their obligations when they get their cheques at that time.

Again, it is extremely dangerous—and I hope this was not the hon. member's intention—to suggest that seniors or other citizens will receive less money than they normally did. That is not true. They will receive the same amounts except that sending the money in April and in December has made the budget tabled by the Minister of Finance even better. I want to reassure all Canadians who receive the GST credit that they will receive exactly the same amount, but twice a year, and will have the opportunity to meet their obligations.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, if I understand the budget correctly, payments would be made in April and October not December.

[English]

In his recent meeting with the International Monetary Fund the Minister of Finance told the directors of the fund that compliance with the unpopular GST had been surprisingly poor.

Instead of penalizing the poor why is the minister not attacking the GST cheaters, the ones that cheat the system? Why is he not attacking the underground economy estimated by one of his own colleagues to be in the realm of $40 billion? We are losing $9 billion a year in taxes because of the underground economy. Why does he not go after the crooks instead of the poor?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance said no such thing to the International Monetary Fund.

It is true at the outset we projected prior to the introduction of the tax that we would be lenient in the first few months so that businesses could get accustomed to the change from the old unacceptable tax to the new modern and fairer tax.

I can assure this House and the hon. member now that we have our compliance programs in place, for example last year we had 100,000 audits and a very large majority of those audits showed that whatever mistakes did take place after the assessments was as a result of honest mistakes and not a growing underground economy.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works and it concerns the $735 million lease for the ICAO building in Montreal.

I want to ask the minister about the negotiations with the present developer that were abandoned and the two calls for new tenders that were let out, thereby increasing ultimately the cost to taxpayers by $175 million.

I want to ask the minister why the bidding rules were changed mid-stream and in such a way that Brookfield Development eventually ended up being the winner? I want to remind the minister that Brookfield Development just happens to be part of the Carena Company which is owned by the Brascan empire which just happens to be chaired by a member of the other place.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased and delighted to entertain this question from my colleague in view of the importance that this organization has had to the city of Montreal which is the capital of avionics in Canada. This organization has been here for 40 years or more and is very important to the city of Montreal.

I thought he would be congratulating Public Works for the scrupulous way it has maintained the negotiations and the tender calls which were completely open and transparent. I would invite him as I think my office already has for a briefing.

This process began last June and has been carried on to the point where we are now looking at and analysing the bids that were submitted on April 19.

• (1445)

This organization, as he must know, has required more space for some time to meet its obligations. It asked for 36,000 square metres more. Treasury Board reduced that. Nevertheless if this single use facility is not modified and adapted to meet the use of ICAO, we could even risk losing this international agency.

I am surprised. He should speak to his colleague, the hon. member for Saint-Léonard, who will tell him that about 800 jobs are involved. I cannot understand why the hon. member would be misled by this prurient article by a journalist named Cameron who, unlike the member, I think was a bit of a quidnunc.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the minister has to understand these are not just reports by reporters. There is a lawsuit against the government and against the minister himself in this regard. I have a copy of it in hand.

[Translation]

I would like to ask the minister a supplementary question. The minister must surely know that we are talking about an overpayment of $175 million, financed by Canadian taxpayers. At the risk of displeasing the Prime Minister, I would like to ask the minister this: How can he justify such an expense? Why does the minister accept negotiating and reaching agreements in this way, at a time like this when the Minister of Finance is telling us we have no money? Why this overpayment of $175 million?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, there are so many fallacies in that question, I am surprised that a member of the calibre of my friend opposite would even ask it.

These negotiations have been going on for about two years. They have not yet been completed. They are completely transparent. I repeat that this is a single use building. He talks about a lawsuit. What is new about a disaffected developer suing the Government of Canada? This happens all the time.

I tell my colleague opposite that this particular transaction is squeaky clean. The more he looks into it the more I will welcome his questions.

CENTRES OF EXCELLENCE

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of state for science and technology.

As he is probably aware, the parliamentary committee on industry, science and technology is completing a report that will express strong support for the national centres of excellence. Yet there is information coming out of his department that the $250 million five-year funding for that very successful program is about to be cut to $125 million for the next five years.

I would ask the minister to confirm or deny that.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, we are not going to confirm or deny anything when a study and total review of the centres of excellence are being conducted.

I am glad to hear that the hon. member likes this program. It was introduced by this government. It received no thanks from the hon. member when it was introduced, but it has been a tremendous success and we are going to maintain it at the level of funding. However, it will depend upon the review that we receive.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, this hon. minister talks a great deal and very often fails to reflect the facts. To this new minister of science and technology who has a lot to learn about science and technology, the fact is that this member supported that program.

The minister will recall that about one month ago when I was posing a question to him about the failure to provide increases for IRAP, he indicated that tremendous funding increases were being provided by this government for research and development.

Within that context I would ask him whether his statement at that time is not called into serious question by the fact that instead of increasing the granting council budgets by 4 per cent as was promised in last year's budget and instead of cutting back that 4 per cent now, the research council fundings have been cut back for the next five years. Is that consistent with a commitment to research and development of the sort he indicated when I last asked him a question on the subject?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is twice wrong with his question.

First of all, on the IRAP funding we are increasing it substantially and he knows that. In fact the numbers I gave him over a month ago of $13 million have been confirmed. It is a $13 million increase. When it comes to the granting councils, we are not cutting them back. They will be growing at 1.5 per cent more than most other federal spending programs except for our transfers to persons and to provinces.

• (1450)

This government stands behind science and technology and stands behind research by the preference that it receives in the budget over most other categories of federal government spending.

SINGLE-WINDOW CONCEPT

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. This week the Minister of Finance had two pieces of depressing news for taxpayers: the deficit last year was $35 billion and this year it is expected to be $32 billion. He also confirmed that the government is powerless to control the deficit, because he did not even take measures to eliminate federal-provincial overlapping, which is wasteful and inefficient.

I therefore ask the Prime Minister why his government rejected the suggestion of the Quebec Conservative caucus, which asked him to establish a single window in Quebec for labour force programs.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that my friend is mistaken. The reality is that in 1992-93 the deficit was 5 per cent of gross domestic product in Canada, compared to 5.1 per cent in the United States.

In 1997, Canada is expected to have a surplus equal to 1 per cent of GDP, while the United States will still have a deficit of 2.5 per cent. So I think it is recognized that we are making remarkable progress compared to the United States.

I want to give the member another example if I may. In 1984, when we took power, the deficit as a percentage of gross domestic product, which is vital as the internationally accepted standard for measuring the deficit and its impact on an economy, was 8.7 per cent. The deficit this year will be 4.5 per cent, a reduction of 50 per cent in eight and a half years.

My friend will surely agree with me that, although not a miracle, this is very significant progress for Canada. We accepted many suggestions from the Quebec Conservative caucus to reach this point.

Mr. Speaker: We must go on.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister. I will point out to him that he did not answer the question about overlapping.

His Minister of Finance told the House that he had begun discussions about establishing in Montreal a pilot service centre for business clients, called a single window, in co-operation with public and private partners. After checking with contacts in the city of Montreal, the Chamber of Commerce and the Centre de commerce mondial, it appears that these organizations were not consulted. However, we know that such a service centre already exists at Montreal's Centre de commerce mondial.

I therefore ask the Prime Minister: does this mean that in addition to duplication of services, we will have duplication of single windows? Has the government's slogan become "let everyone have their own single window?"

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, has my friend received permission from the head office of the Parti Québécois in Quebec City to ask such a question? Has it been approved by Mr. Parizeau, because he controls the Ontario branch of the PQ? So, do you have Mr. Parizeau's permission?

Mr. Duceppe: Answer the question.

Mr. Mulroney: All right, then the boss has given you permission to ask the question. The reason is that the single-window concept was favoured by the yes supporters in the referendum and you voted no. If you had voted yes, you would have your single window, because the federalists proposed it and you were opposed.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister answering for the Minister of Finance.

In this budget the Minister of Finance has set out a five-year program of operating subsidies for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, not the kind of predictable five-year funding the corporation was looking for.

As I detect the plan, it calls for a maintenance of the existing funding through 1993–94 and 1994–95 with the operating cuts to start in 1995–96.

I would like to just reaffirm with the minister that this is a form of five–year predictable plan for the CBC. I would also like to ask him whether the recommendation for a limited borrowing authority to provide financial flexibility for the CBC during this transition is also to be forthcoming.

• (1455)

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I might remind the hon. member that the December statement the Minister of Finance delivered in the House applies to Crown corporations as well. Therefore there is a discipline on the Crown corporations for this fiscal year and next. The major cuts will take place as he has enunciated in his question.

As far as the borrowing authority to the CBC, Crown–dependent corporations do not normally have the power to borrow. However, this suggestion has been made by a standing committee. I know that it is now being considered by the Department of Communications and we look forward to its plan when it is brought forward to cabinet.

EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, the Minister of Finance repeated his boast that 200,000 new jobs were created since August. The minister was careful not to mention in which country these jobs were created. In Canada there were 480,000 fewer people working and covered by UI in January than there were in August, according to Statistics Canada.

I ask the Prime Minister to explain why the only job he offers unemployed Canadians is a snow job?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can only conclude that that question must have taken the combined brain power of the entire Liberal caucus. No wonder half of them are not here; they are exhausted by the intellectual exercise. I do not know what I am going to do. There is a lover's quarrel going on in the NDP and there is sudden mediocrity in the Liberals. What am I going to do?

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is obviously in deep–freeze because his government is out of touch and his ministers' numbers are out to lunch.

In January, the month of Maz job demolition, 354,000 Canadians initiated or renewed UIC claims, raising the total number of beneficiaries to over 1.5 million for the first time since last April. For these Canadians, the minister's rosy pronouncements are more tragic comic relief than economic relief.

I ask the Prime Minister why his government's so–called recovery is as jobless as his government is hopeless.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a little affectionate advice to my hon. friend. The next time the Liberals try to get her to ask a question like that, she should say her dignity stops her from doing it.

Mr. Speaker: Given the hour, if the Prime Minister wishes to respond then he should do so, but I am watching the clock.

Ms. Guarnieri: How patronizing.

Mr. Mulroney: Oh, it is patronizing. Is that not awful, a Liberal being patronized.

The Minister of Finance pointed out that full–time employment has risen by 202,000 since last August. It rose by 46,000 in February. In March the Royal Bank noted: "A 48,000 person increase in employment is very, very encouraging. There have been 1.4 million new jobs created since this government came to office. The rate of job creation in percentage terms is the highest in the G–7".

Everybody knows that we and all other industrialized countries lost jobs during the recession. Jobs were lost in the recession around the industrialized world. We are now making them up at what appears to be a rate of almost 50,000 a month; 300,000 this year and 400,000 new jobs in the year thereafter. Surely this ought to be enough to encourage my hon. friend modestly.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

We all know that approximately 600,000 war veterans, many getting along in years, depend upon the government through veterans affairs for medical services, pensions and other types of health care.

With all the proposed cuts and the talks of cuts that are happening right away and into the future, could the minister assure these veterans, these people who served the country so well, that none of the benefits or programs will be cut by this department?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we in Canada have the most generous program of veterans benefits of any country in the world, and we intend to maintain them.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, in view of what the minister just said, will he assure the people who deliver these programs that none of their jobs will be cut?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member was interested in veterans. Now I find out he is interested in his constituents' jobs.

Let me assure the hon. member that veterans affairs will continue to operate in Charlottetown and as long as veterans are still alive we will have public servants there providing the services they need.

JUSTICE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, my question is with regard to the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice. A coroner's jury in Regina recently recommended that police officers be equipped with pepper spray as a means of non-life threatening control in dangerous situations.

Are there currently any federal obstacles preventing police forces from acting upon this jury's recommendation?

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member the Criminal Code already contains an exemption that would allow for this.

I should point out as well, though, training and equipping of police officers come within the jurisdiction of the provinces and the RCMP. If devices like this can help save lives and help in the enforcement of our laws, we certainly have no objection to it.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS BY MEMBER FOR LÉVIS

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, today we read in Le Soleil that the hon. member for Lévis said he enjoyed the support of members of the three main parties in Ottawa.

Without any intent of prejudicing the fair trial of his court case, I think the hon. member was indulging in some wishful thinking. Liberal members in Ottawa support the Liberal candidate in Lévis, and they certainly do not intend to support the Conservative MP in that riding.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising from a question put by the member for Windsor—St. Clair. That member and I are members of the industry, science and technology committee which has been conducting a study of the future of the network of Centres for Excellence Program.

We have agreed to a report which has yet to be tabled in the House of Commons. Until it is tabled the report and its contents and conclusions are privileged to members of the committee.

In a question the member for Windsor—St. Clair referred to one of the conclusions of the report, and I believe this is a breach of my privilege and that of the other members of the committee. If you find I have a prima facie case of privilege I am prepared to move the appropriate motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member would let me check the "blues". There is some considerable merit in the argument that has been put forward. I should, though, check the "blues" and I will report back to the House.

• (1505)

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege my colleague raised, when you say you will check the "blues" and will report back to the House, will there then be notice and time given to hon. members, particularly the hon. member from Windsor as well as my colleague, for further debate if debate is indeed necessary? My colleague has raised a very serious point.

Mr. Speaker: I want to say to the hon. House leader for Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition the Chair recognizes it is a serious matter. We have had to deal with these things in the past.

If I feel it is necessary to have further argument or further comment I will give sufficient notice. I may be able to deal with it very quickly. I will check the "blues" and I will be in touch with the hon. member.

I just might add, and I am thankful to my Clerk for pointing this out, I may have to wait until I see the report. It may or may not be available this afternoon, but I will move expeditiously on the matter.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government House leader. Would he indicate to the House what tomorrow's business will be, what it will be for Monday and Tuesday, and what he sees for the remainder of next week?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we will complete the second of the eight allotted supply days for this supply period.

Tomorrow we will proceed with Bill C-117, the Borrowing Authority Act. I am hoping we can come to some agreement about the completion of that bill.

On Monday we hope to complete third reading of Bill C-118, the Export Development Corporation Act, after which we hope to complete third reading of Bill C-109, the bill dealing with privacy provisions for cellular phone use.

Depending on our conversations, Tuesday is likely to be the third allotted day for this supply period. I will be discussing with the House leaders of the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party the business for the rest of that week.

In every confidence, we will come up with an agreement that will make sure this will be a very productive institution serving the people of Canada well.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, every time I hear those words I can see that closure is not far off.

I am wondering if the government House leader could give us some sort of assurances, for the purposes of Monday at least when members will be returning to the Chamber after spending time in their constituencies, on the order of debate of the various bills. Will it be Bill C-118 that he will lead with, or will it be Bill C-109?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, my intention now is to lead with Bill C-118. I will not change it before discussing it with the House leader of the opposition.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, on government House business, the government House leader is moving out but his parliamentary secretary may be able to answer.

In view of the fact the electoral reform bill in part was ushered out of the House in a most unusual way by a closure motion after many hours, and we have the complicity of the Liberals and the NDP in this matter, I was wondering where that stood in terms of business for either Friday or the upcoming week and, second, when we are going to get back to the budget.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House, and I am sure I speak for the hon. member who has just spoken, do not wish to be argumentative.

Thursday is the typical day on which members of the opposition, particularly the Official Opposition, ask the business question. There is no one on the government side. In fact, the Prime Minister had to cross the floor to join with us and support us in finding that his members opposite are holding Parliament in contempt.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, you would speak directly and firmly to the right hon. Prime Minister so that when he goes back to that side of the House he will speak to his minister and have him in here to answer the questions raised by my colleague.

I think it is appropriate, because it is only once a week we have an opportunity to put questions to the government House leader with regard to government business.

• (1510)

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): I rise on the same point, Mr. Speaker. Just ordinary courtesy would dictate that the government House leader and his parliamentary secretary not walk out of the House before this particular period of House business is over.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the question. The reason I left was that I thought the Thursday question was over. I looked over at the New Democratic Party and did not see anybody standing so I left.

It was not an affront, but if the member has another question I am prepared to answer it.

Mr. Nowlan: That is part of the problem, Mr. Speaker. With all due respect we understand there are organized parties here, but the government House leader has been here long enough in the last two years to know there are some other persons in the House who do not necessarily belong to registered parties.

He had his back turned to me while I was asking a very legitimate question. I do not take umbrage with that. I agree with others that this is an insult to the House. I am glad that the opposition House leader raised the point. I will give the government House leader the benefit of my Irish generosity that he did not intend to slur.

In view of the fact my question came about when the government House leader, with all due credit to himself, used the rules in a most conniving way to exercise the Standing Order 78(1) allocation to kick out the electoral reform bill in that phase to a committee and get it out of the House, I was wondering where we were in terms of the electoral reform bill since the government House leader did not mention it and then, coming back to the budget, whether we are going to get back to the budget debate.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I have just been informed by casual conversation that it would appear the committee looking into the second phase of electoral reform has reached an agreement. We are expecting a report, I think next Tuesday.

I have alerted the Privy Council Office in charge of drafting legislation to get its pens in hand so that the changes can be put in. I hope we can get it through the House prior to adjourning for the summer, because we are not likely to be back to pass it before the next election.

I will not get into a debate about the first phase but frankly, if we are going to talk about behaviour, et cetera, it is a double-edged sword as the hon. member knows.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to place a question before the government House leader. As he will remember last week I asked about Bill C-7 dealing with the status of the artist.

The Prime Minister in Question Period as well mentioned that this piece of legislation was passed by the government. Indeed it was and it received royal assent in June last year.

Again I would like to ask the House leader when they plan to proclaim the bill.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that information. The Minister of Communications probably will. After a bill is given royal assent a period of time is required to put the administrative apparatus in place to administer the bill, things that fall from the bill, if it is a bill of that sort. When things are ready the Governor in Council acts to bring the bill into force.

As I say I do not know what is holding things up, if anything, but the Minister of Communications would have that answer. I will talk to him and get back to the hon. member.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, on the same point. A couple of moments ago my Nova Scotia neighbour asked a second part to his question about when the next two days of budget debate were. I think this is substantial enough that we could be given notice.

Mr. Andre: Yes, I am endeavouring to schedule the bills and business on the Order Paper to get them through. There are certainly two days of budget debate on the Order Paper. I have been discussing with opposition House leaders how we might schedule things.

My interest quite frankly is in getting as much passed and into committee in terms of this House and passed and into the Senate so as not to back them up and to schedule six more opposition days as well as two budget days within a very limited period of time. The more co-operation we get, the better I am able to schedule things in advance but we will keep trying.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—NATIONAL DEFENCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) (p. 18639).

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I just had a few moments left in my observations of the speech given by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East. I believe my colleague from Davenport will be following in debate.

I wish to conclude in the two or three minutes I have with the observation that not only did I find the substance of his remarks to be totally out of whack with what was going on, I found the tone of his remarks to be most unsatisfactory as far as those of us in the opposition are concerned.

The hon. member has tried to paint the picture that somehow those of us in the opposition are being very unfair and mean-spirited by raising this subject matter on the floor of the House of Commons.

If ministers across the way would only assume responsibility for their dossiers, take the House of Commons into their confidence and share the issues, facts and various information they receive with us, I am certain this particular motion would not necessarily have been put. However we believe we have a fundamental obligation to raise these serious questions on the floor of the House of Commons as they relate to what is taking place in Bosnia, Somalia and the role of the Minister of National Defence. I must say she has been less than candid with the members of the House of Commons when the chief of staff has said one thing and of course the minister has said another.

I guess the point we were trying to make earlier this day, which was found by the Chair and the Table to be out of order was that we wanted to know who was telling the truth. Was it the Minister of National Defence or was it the chief of staff? I think it is important that we ascertain who was telling the truth with regard to this particular issue. That is the first point I want to raise with my colleague from St. John's East.

I also want to raise the issue of the comments of the government House leader earlier, which I believe have been picked up by the hon. member for St. John's East about this inquiry which is going to take place under the auspices of section 45 of the National Defence Act and the fact that the minister responsible was precluded from having an open public inquiry.

That is not the case at all and the hon. member for St. John's East ought to know that. The minister has full discretion under that section. We know the Minister of National Defence does not know that but I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs knows. The government can have an open and public inquiry if it decides to do so.

No one on this side has asked about who did what in a criminal way. It was the minister who made observations and suggestions about that. We believe it is important to have a public inquiry so Canadians can continue to have confidence in our Canadian Armed Forces.

The suggestion being made by members opposite that somehow they are more Canadian, more supportive of the Armed Forces than those of us on this side of the aisle is absolutely false. To quote the words of the government House leader, it is absolutely false. I and in particular our colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception who is very distinguished and has served in a great capacity in the Canadian Armed Forces, as well as all members of this caucus have great support for the Canadian Armed Forces. I know the Secretary of State for External Affairs will want to pick up the phone later this day to call the Minister of National Defence and say: "I do not believe you enjoy the confidence of the members of the House of Commons, therefore you ought to do the reasonable and responsible thing and step aside. Continue with your campaign to become the next leader of the Conservative Party but step aside so we can appoint a full-time Minister of National Defence who thereafter can do as the Minister of External Affairs has said she will do and travel to Bosnia and visit all of these various communities, which a full-time Minister of National Defence would have availed herself of the opportunity to do, but unfortunately is not going to be able to do".

I hope all members of this Chamber will support not only the substance of this great motion which has been put down but indeed the spirit in which it has been given. In view of that, I thank you for allowing me to make these observations. I know my colleague, the hon. member for Davenport, will want to enter this debate in a full way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If there are no further questions or comments, the next speakers are from the Liberal side and I believe the hon. member for Davenport is splitting his time with the hon. member for Papineau—Saint Michel.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, for Canadians who are viewing this program let me state again, as my colleague the member for Winnipeg South Centre did at the beginning of this debate, that our motion today has really three very specific purposes. The first is to criticize the Minister of National Defence. The second is to express the deep concern on the part of the loyal opposition for the members of the Canadian Forces who are engaged in difficult peacekeeping missions. The third is to remind the government that since the cold war is over a shift in the expenditures for military purposes along the lines that have been already suggested so eloquently by the member for Winnipeg South Centre this morning would be extremely beneficial for the economy of Canada.

I would like to briefly review these three points in the time allocated to me. I would start very briefly by putting on record the statement made by our leader in Ste. Foy a month or so ago. He outlined the Liberal policy for a shift in our approach to defence matters and emphasized the fact that in his announcement the leader of the party indicated we would gradually convert military bases to new and appropriate uses. We would promote diversification of our defence industry and help it reorient toward civilian production as other western industrialized nations have already done.

In buttressing this approach the member for Winnipeg South Centre indicated that the Liberal government would use the existing $200 million federal government grants program for defence production to help companies switch to products such as environmental clean-up technologies and other technologies that have the potential for future expansion, job creation and the like.

The basic criteria is still that all the defence policies of the Government of Canada would be reviewed with peacekeeping as the core purpose for the army, as indicated by our defence critic, the member for Labrador.

We are raising this issue today with a number of concerns in mind. One is about the Somalis who have lost their lives in recent weeks as a result of measures that are the object of an inquiry at last.

• (1525)

We would like to reinforce, as it has been done frequently and quite effectively during Question Period, the notion that since civilians have lost their lives in these incidents the inquiry must be carried out openly and not behind closed doors.

The minister has the power to order an open procedure if she wants. The minister should not be afraid of an open inquiry. We must remind the government of the promise it made for an open government in the 1984 election and repeated in 1988 by the present Prime Minister.

This is an opportunity for the Government of Canada and the Conservative Party to demonstrate that it means what it promises, which alas it has done very rarely over the past nine years.

The object of this motion is also to raise the situation in the Republic of Bosnia-Hercegovina. There are names that come to mind when that part of the world is mentioned such as Dubrovnik, Tuzla, Srebrenica and Sarajevo which are deeply ingrained in the collective memory and consciousness of the world community.

There is a growing sense of profound collective guilt in the civilized part of the world at least for having failed so many innocent lives. The persistent question is: What could we have done in order to prevent this immense human tragedy? With the benefit of hindsight perhaps some of these questions can be answered but even so in an incomplete manner.

The first answer that comes to my mind is that when Yugoslavia began to break up, and for that matter the former Soviet Union as well, an unconditional and hasty recognition of the new nations took place. This was led by Germany in particular with its immediate recognition of Croatia.

One cannot help but think that had this recognition been given more slowly with conditions attached to it such as a commitment by the western nations to adhere to the United Nations Human Rights Covenants and other major United Nations declarations of that kind, a more orderly process would have taken place in Europe. The behaviour of these new emerging nations would have been better and the transition would have been better managed. Therefore we all share a responsibility in the manner and speed in which the new nations were recognized by the west.

There is another possible answer and that is the slow and disorganized reaction particularly by the western European governments which were expected by the world community to develop a united response as the crisis began to emerge in the former Yugoslavia in particular.

Here we can definitely see that a number of decisions were made in bilateral ways or in a disjointed non-consultative manner which led eventually to the disaster we are facing.

• (1530)

I can only conclude by saying that what is happening in the former Yugoslavia has led to a gradual emerging of a new role on the part of the United Nations. We have moved from the well-known and fairly successful phase of peacekeeping to entering slowly and reluctantly the phase of peacemaking. As we do that we will have to be guided by a tremendous amount of wisdom and historical knowledge of the area to which we send troops. We will have to use a considerable amount of cunning and astuteness in ensuring that the safety of our troops is taken fully into account.

I regret that time does not allow me to continue.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I realize the Secretary of State for External Affairs is in a hurry to speak to the House, but I would ask her to be patient for 10 more minutes. Perhaps she could use her speech to explain the situation of Canadian troops based abroad, in a manner that is clearer and far more specific than could be done by her colleague, the Minister of National Defence.

We on this side of the House are particularly concerned about the safety of Canadian troops, who are committed on several fronts at this time, because the government does not seem to be able to explain satisfactorily the reasons for a Canadian military presence abroad.

Canada has always supported peacekeeping operations throughout the world. Canada has always been in the forefront of UN peacekeeping missions. Lately, however, the UN seems to be taking initiatives that are not necessarily peace initiatives. When we intervene in regions where we are more or less welcome, the question that should be asked is this: Can we really make a contribution toward bringing peace to this region at this time? Of course our party supports the decision to send troops to Bosnia. Our party entirely agrees with any valid peace initiative taken by the United Nations, in the context of a UN initiative to deal with the problem. However, when we see European countries becoming reluctant and questioning the presence of their troops in that part of the world, we in Canada can start asking the same kind of questions.

Not long ago I heard the French Minister of Defence ask on French television whether it was useful and essential, considering current developments in the part of the world we could refer to as former Yugoslavia, for French troops to keep playing a role in that region. I maintain that Canada has an important role to play on the international scene but cannot be expected to help out in every conflict. It cannot be everywhere at once when the government asks the Department of National Defence to cut spending and restricts the department's financial resources. We cannot do more than our resources allow us to do.

• (1535)

I also wonder about the relevance of maintaining a presence in so many parts of the world where our presence may be challenged. Closer to home, we have a conflict still going on in Haiti. The Canadian government said it wanted to play a role in restoring democracy in that country. I know the new President of the United States is considering the possibility of sending troops as part of a UN peacekeeping mission. Has the federal government considered that possibility? After all, democracy will never be restored in Haiti without a force to counteract the military regime in that country.

At a time when we are about to spend fantastic amounts on helicopters whose usefulness is being questioned and the government insists on spending that kind of money, we may well ask whether the Department of National Defence has its priorities straight.

The Canadian government has over the years maintained its own foreign policy. It has always been very advanced in this respect, and I would say that successive prime ministers forged a foreign policy that was uniquely Canadian. However, under the present Conservative government, Canadian foreign policy has increasingly become a carbon copy of U.S. foreign policy. We have lost to a very considerable extent our unique outlook and our freedom to act independently. More often than not, the federal government has aligned its foreign policy on the dictates of the White House. It is high time we reverted to decisions made in Canada, by Canadians with Canada's interests in mind. I trust the Minister of External Affairs, who is due to speak a few minutes from now, will be able to tell us why her government has consistently followed the U.S. lead on foreign policy. In recent years, not a single clearcut personal initiative reflecting Canada's interest was taken by this Conservative government.

This morning, now that the Prime Minister is getting ready for his farewell tour, I read an article in La Presse by Marcel Adam in which he recalled that well before Prime Minister Trudeau actually resigned he had decided to visit all countries which had nuclear arms to suggest ways to deal with the threat of nuclear war. The cold war was then at its peak. Soviet air defence had just shot down a Korean aircraft with all passengers on board. U.S. President Ronald Reagan had decided to revive the arms race to restore the balance of power, which included the installation of nuclear missiles in western Europe and the star wars program.

Those were the circumstances at the time, when the Prime Minister of Canada went on his trip to persuade the superpowers to stop this crazy arms race, to Moscow, to tell the Russians to stop this frenzied arms race and to the President of the United States, to tell him his policies were a real threat to world peace. He wanted to talk to the leaders of the superpowers as a Canadian, with Canada's interests in mind and above all in the interests of world peace.

• (1540)

In concluding, I hope that very soon we will have a new government—not a Conservative government—that will at last be able to give Canadians a genuine foreign policy and defence policy we can be proud of, by and for Canadians.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is too bad that the hon. member from Papineau, who broached some very serious issues and has a reputation for saying the things that count when the issues are very serious, turned this into a very partisan speech and said a number of things that were patently false.

[English]

In terms of the kind of leadership provided by this Prime Minister as opposed to the previous Prime Minister, I would like to point out that we have in Canada today one of the great leaders, one of the great statesmen of the world.

Let me just point out, for example, that in the recent summit in Vancouver it was the Prime Minister of Canada—and I was there to witness it—who actually paved the way for a very positive meeting between President Clinton and President Yeltsin in what was a new and very significant relationship for Canada. It was our Prime Minister who led the way in moving forward with aid to Russia among the G-7 countries and indeed to other countries of the former Soviet Union.

I also want to say that the other side talks a lot about our Prime Minister and his capacity to visit with other leaders around the world and a trip that he is taking.

A former Prime Minister, whose name as I recall was Trudeau, did a lot of hopping around the world to visit various countries which may or may not have had anything to do with Canada's strategic interests. I do know on the last trip he took that he spent five days on the shores of the Aegean. I am sure he was contemplating the future of Canada as he did so and cavorted on the beach.

This is very much in the interest of our country. I am very proud to be associated with a Prime Minister who has the leadership and statesmanlike characteristics that have been so evident over the last eight years. He has built a great reputation for this country. He has built on some of the things that have gone before and is carrying us forward into a post-cold war environment in a way that is sensitive, imaginative and very much in Canada's interest.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, to respond briefly to the minister's comments and her admiration for the present Prime Minister of Canada, I will not hold it against her, but I think she should read the text of my speech.

I was very careful not to criticize the Prime Minister, who is getting ready for a trip. She misunderstood if she thought I was questioning the right and in some cases the duty of a Canadian Prime Minister to travel abroad.

I simply mentioned in this connection a statement I read this morning in the papers, which recalled why Mr. Trudeau made his trip at the time. In a way it was a response to the criticism levelled at his trip at the time.

My point is that, against the background of the cold war as it existed at the time, Prime Minister Trudeau's visit to these countries was very important and very useful. Now I wonder—and the minister did not tell us but I hope she will have a chance to do that, or perhaps the Prime Minister will—what kind of message he is supposed to bring, after announcing his resignation, to Moscow, Paris, London and Washington, if he goes back there again?

• (1545)

In any case, with Canadians across the country, I was delighted to see a meeting between Mr. Yeltsin and Mr. Clinton. I think she gives the Prime Minister too much credit, however, although I am prepared to allow her that indulgence.

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to point out first of all that I was very pleased to hear from the hon. member for Davenport who I thought for the first time produced a serious note in this debate from the other side of the House.

[Translation]

I am also confident that I have some answers to questions about Bosnia and other countries in that war-torn region. The hon. member raised that point in the short speech he just made.

[English]

One of the reasons I am very glad to be in this debate, despite the fact that the motion itself is ludicrous and makes no sense in any official language, is that it does allow a continuation of the national discussion on peacekeeping that I and this government launched earlier this year.

We welcome a penetrating discussion of the new and less predictable environment for peacekeeping that we face today. We want a widespread public discussion because this really is indeed one of Canada's major contributions to peace and security in the world.

Let me ask then about the role the opposition has played in this national debate. What we get from the Liberal opposition critic is a cynical and partisan motion that indicates really a very superficial interest in matters of substance. He has repeated again and again his tired old assertions that the mandates of our peacekeeping forces are confused and that our professional peacekeepers are badly equipped and badly instructed.

Nothing could be further from the truth and it is an absolutely contemptible distortion. Opposition members cannot be doing much serious thinking about this subject if that is the best they can come up with.

Further, to suggest that peacekeeping mandates are confused and unclear not only is disturbing for the families and for Canadians who care about these people, but is also totally inconsistent with the careful consideration that has been given to each and every one of our peacekeeping commitments. It is also inconsistent with the sustained diplomatic efforts we are making to ensure other governments understand those mandates as we do.

Throughout the many years during which Canada has been sending peacekeepers abroad, including under Liberal governments, successive governments have had to face the question of risk and of the role which Canada believes it should play in the world. In so doing we have developed guidelines that are weighed carefully before a decision is made to respond to a clear and precise request from the United Nations to send Canadian troops to a trouble-spot.

There has to be a threat to international peace and security. That is the first determinant. Major parties to the conflict must accept the peacekeeping mission and accept Canadian participation in it. The operation has to be linked to an agreement by the parties to work toward a political settlement. The operation must be accountable to a political authority, such as the UN Security Council. The operation must have a clear and realistic mandate and it must have a sound logistic and financial basis. Those are the tests we put forward before any of our troops are sent on any peacekeeping mission.

[Translation]

These guidelines have guided this government's decisions to send peacekeeping troops to Croatia, Bosnia and Somalia. As I have indicated on many recent occasions, in particular at the seminar on peacekeeping which I hosted in February 9, the circumstances under which peacekeeping is conducted have changed dramatically since the end of the cold war.

Our peacekeepers today take on new tasks, especially those of a humanitarian nature, which are particularly evident in Bosnia and Somalia. In other cases, they work alongside civilian election monitors, humanitarian agencies and policemen, as in Cambodia, to alleviate suffering and pave the way for the reconstruction of shattered societies.

• (1550)

The world has changed considerably in the past four years. A familiar world has suddenly disappeared, a new one is being born among uncertainties, a resurgence of ugly nationalism and religious hatreds. We could well choose to ignore this new reality or take a comfortable back seat. This has not been the choice of this government. Our vision is to enhance Canada's reputation as a nation of experienced and trusted peacekeepers and to build upon it with thoughtfulness and imagination—as well as with a sense of compassion and care—care for the victims of conflict, and care for our soldiers.

Canadian peacekeepers are deployed when the international community has decided that they are needed and that Canada's contribution will make a difference. This must be emphasized. Support for the United Nations and the multilateral system is a pillar of Canadian foreign policy. Given our history and place in the world it has served us well.

Six years ago the United Nations was responsible for 10,000 peacekeepers and today is managing close to 50,000. That number may well double soon. It is therefore critical for Canada to ensure that the United Nations be better equipped for the task placed upon it by member states. This has been recognized by the Secretary-General who launched an urgent appeal to the international community in his agenda for peace. Canada has responded because the efficiency of the United Nations is as critical to the enhancement of peace and security in the world as it is critical to the safety of its military and civilian peacekeepers.

Moreover, Canada has provided some of its most qualified staff to the United Nations' Peacekeeping Office, including the military adviser to the Secretary-General, General Baril. Canadian officers have taken the lead in providing expert studies designed to strengthen the ability of the United Nations to do its job. One study on providing stand by forces to the United Nations has just been completed. If implemented it will enable operations to start earlier and under optimal circumstances, thus enhancing the security of troops and civilians.

Our pleas that the United Nations establish a 24 hour seven day a week situation room have been heard. The facility is being set up.

My work as minister requires full consultation with my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, and with Canada's highly professional military leaders. I assure the House that this consultation takes place on an ongoing basis.

[English]

I want to ask the Liberals if they understand how peacekeeping forces are mandated and instructed because I do not think they do. Do they seriously believe that a peacekeeping mandate is a little manual that addresses every contingency a commanding officer is likely to encounter in the field? Does my critic on the other side so misunderstand the relationship between political decision makers and military professionals that he thinks nothing can be left to the good judgment and professional competence of our peacekeepers?

It appears to me that if there is confusion and a lack of clarity, it is in the minds of those on the other side. On this side of the House, we understand the responsibilities that weigh on commanders in the field. We understand the difficult decisions they have to make in changing circumstances. Together, my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, and I go to considerable lengths to ensure that both their mandate and the resources available to them in their own estimation are appropriate to the task they have to perform.

• (1555)

That does not detract from the difficulty of the task, nor from the risks. However it is no service to our commanders, our peacekeepers around the world to suggest that the job of the government, let alone of the opposition critic, is to second-guess their every move.

That is why I energetically pursued discussions last week with the United Nations, the foreign ministers of the United Kingdom and Greece and the External Relations Commissioner of the European Community. It is because we recognize the partnership and the need to ensure the environment for our people on the ground. That is why I am also in frequent touch with U.S. Secretary of State Christopher. His country is looking at the role it might play for the first time in this troubled region.

I am working to ensure that our peacekeeping activities are co-ordinated with those of other governments, for example and in particular, in the case of our allies' promise of support to Canadian troops in Srebrenica.

I also constantly remind other governments that the planning of any further military action in the former Yugoslavia must take into consideration the safety of peacekeeping forces and humanitarian workers already on the ground.

Those are the kinds of diplomatic efforts our peacekeeping forces require from government. What I find most offensive about the Liberal Party's attack is that it undermines the efforts we are making in concert with many other countries to try to move the Yugoslav conflict to the stage of negotiations.

I want to assure the people of Canada, particularly our people on the ground and the families of our peacekeepers, that we went into the former Yugoslavia with our eyes open. We joined UNPROFOR in Croatia to help monitor a ceasefire and to prevent massive bloodshed. The international community's efforts there, and I want to underline this for the House, have met with success. The so-called Sector West where Canadians are deployed is tense but it is quiet and it is the most stable in the region.

Next week I am going to visit our troops there and tell them how proud Canadians are of them. Despite difficulties in fulfilling the mandate of UNPROFOR due to distrust and hatred on both sides, there is no alternative to renewing the mandate. UNPROFOR I, with Canadian participation, has saved countless lives in Croatia and Canadians are proud to share this success.

Canada joined UNPROFOR II in Bosnia for a compelling humanitarian mission: to escort convoys of food and medicine, and to protect refugees from attack. Again this has saved thousands of lives but has tragically not resolved the conflict. No one is more aware than I of the terrible personal tragedies, the rape of women and girls, the agony at the loss of homes and loved ones.

We are in constant touch with UNPROFOR and with the United Nations in New York to ensure that our soldiers have the support and guidance they need to discharge this very difficult mandate. We have ensured the appropriate participation of Canadian military officers in the over-all command structure.

I want to reassure Canadians particularly about Srebrenica, a place where all the world is focused at the moment. On April 6 the Security Council decided to establish a UN presence and a "safe area" there to avoid a mass slaughter of some 30,000 besieged Bosnian Muslims.

UNPROFOR decided to send a company of Canadians and brokered a demilitarization agreement between Serbs and Muslims. The mission, I want to point out very proudly, is a major barrier to further tragedy in that town.

While it is not without risks, we have examined thoroughly the safety of our troops. We are satisfied by our consultations with the United Nations and with key colleagues such as the United Kingdom and France that have offered their support and assistance if necessary.

• (1600)

I want to clarify the mission because, despite mistaken assertions that our 194 soldiers are there to defend thousands of unarmed Muslims against thousands of well armed Serbs, this is not the case. This is a peacekeeping situation where UN peacekeepers are asked to monitor an agreement signed by both parties. It is not their mandate to become a party to open warfare.

There is some kind of mythology that soldiers in peacekeeping missions are not well equipped. They are not well enough equipped to resist a major attack, but they are better equipped than the public has been led to believe by the sceptics opposite.

The soldiers can defend themselves and they can protect villages against rogue elements. They are trained to do so and they are equipped to do so. Should there be a massive onslaught, of which there is no indication as we speak, the peacekeepers would be backed up or they would be pulled out.

My visit to Bosnia next week may well provide me with additional insight which I will be happy to share with this House once I return. Once again I shall be in a position to personally tell our troops of our great pride in them.

I want to spend a few minutes talking about Somalia. When Canada decided to join the initial peacekeeping operation it was also in response to concerns expressed by Canadians about an appalling human disaster. Should Canada have decided to ignore the reality of starvation and banditry? This government said no. Our soldiers there, our peacekeepers there, have once again committed themselves in a way that Canadians can be proud of.

Early on it became apparent that traditional peacekeeping would not work. We agreed to join a peace enforcement operation mandated by the UN and led by the United States. We did not take this decision lightly. Once again my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, and I consulted closely to ensure that we were satisfied with all aspects of the proposed operation, its objectives and the rules of engagement. We agreed that the requirement for troops was urgent and that the concept of operations was sound.

Canada played a critical role in ensuring progress in establishing a secure environment in Somalia. Our troops fed thousands of starving women, men and children. Canada insisted—we were in the forefront internationally of insisting—that priority attention be given to disarming the gangs that preyed on the unfortunate population. Enough progress has been made that a United Nations commander can now take over from the Unified Command. When in Somalia in about 10 days, once again I shall reassure our troops there of our continued admiration and support.

My final point in this debate is that there are constructive possibilities too. The opposition has paid no attention to some of the things we are engaged in and some of the things in the Secretary-General's agenda for peace referring specifically to preventive diplomacy. In many respects that is another new frontier, a frontier in which this government has played a strong role internationally, a role that has been acknowledged by many other countries.

We have a long way to go when we talk about preventive diplomacy. We have a long way to go before we understand how to recognize signs of impending conflict, how best to cut conflicts off and how they affect national sovereignty. Some of these things can blight a generation and destroy a country as the tragic circumstances of the former Yugoslavia show if they are not headed off in advance.

Canada is represented in CSCE monitoring missions in Kosovo and in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. There, so far, we have seen greater stability because of those efforts. Likewise we have participated in preventive deployments as when we sent several hundred troops to the same region of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia earlier this year.

There is a lot more to be learned about how to perform this kind of role. What kind of monitoring techniques reduce tensions and restore calm? What addresses the underlying causes of conflicts? That is one direction in which I would like to see discussion in this House and in the country. So far we have not seen much constructive debate or much constructive contribution from the other side.

• (1605)

Early warning, preventive diplomacy and preventive deployment are tasks that do not always require the same kinds of massive forces and resources as are needed after the fact. However, they do need special sensitivity and they need to be tackled with discretion and expertise.

Those are two attributes that have marked our international reputation throughout the post-war period. However in the post cold war era, we are heading into a new environment. We are able to advance our capacities in that direction. Indeed we have a chance to add further lustre to our reputation and provide leadership for other countries that perhaps do not have the experience and the same sensitivity to ethnic differences, to self-determination and other things that Canadians really know something about.

As I said, next week I will be in Croatia and Bosnia followed by Somalia. I will meet with our people on the ground. I will have a lot of questions to ask because I believe that in sensitive operations such as these, clear and effective communication requires constant attention. We are breaking new ground. If the opposition chose, I think it could have a real contribution to make to that. So far it has not chosen to.

I will return with a livelier appreciation of the problems. I know I will not be disheartened by the attitude of our people in the field. They are facing an enormous challenge. We are fully supporting them and we are being innovative in how we do so. Peacekeeping in the nineties is a different proposition from what it was in the early days when we did lose some of our peacekeepers, but it remains an aspect of our international activities to date through which we rediscover our national purpose and makes us even larger than the sum of our parts.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to welcome back on more than one occasion to CFB Chilliwack people from 1-CER, the Combat Engineering Regiment. I must say I have been very proud of our people and the roles they have fulfilled as they have taken on the responsibilities of United Nations peacekeeping force. Actually it was in a war-like situation, certainly 18 months ago or whenever they were in Iraq and Kuwait.

I am also pleased to know a date is looming on the horizon, in the not too distant future, when our troops will come back from Somalia.

In Croatia, Bosnia, and I do not know how many other areas that are part of the former Yugoslavia—we are in several areas there—does she have any guestimate as to how long our troops might have to be there? Does the United Nations have any timetable of how long Canadian forces would be required to fulfil their role? Maybe the minister could give us an outline of how many different places in former Yugoslavia Canadian troops are at present.

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have that question from the hon. member. One thing we have not been able to do very well as a member of the United Nations or as part of the collective in the United Nations is find ways to easily end the engagements we enter into.

We can see that from Cyprus where we have been engaged for 29 years. As a result we are bringing people home because we feel that has been a major contribution to stability in the region and that others can assume those responsibilities. More important, the parties should get together. It is their own responsibility to bring that to a conclusion.

In terms of Somalia we were in for a limited period of time. As part of the enforcement mission which was obviously a bit outside the normal guidelines for peacekeeping but well within the guidelines and the charter of the United Nations, we did say we would only go in for a limited period of time.

I cannot give the hon. member a specific date but our troops will be leaving Somalia very shortly. Perhaps we will have some leaving at the end of May. We are just looking at how that should happen or whether there will be a need for a continued deployment for a very short period afterward.

• (1610)

In the former Yugoslavia we have a slightly different situation. We have peacekeepers, as I pointed out, in Sector West in Croatia, we have some unarmed police who often get forgotten about who are keeping the civil peace and we also have our troops in Sarajevo and Srebrenica and other parts of Bosnia. As I suggested we have participated with a troop deployment in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and we have had observers in that region in Kosovo.

Obviously under the current circumstance it is very difficult to put a conclusion on that in terms of a date. We are urging an end to the dispute through negotiation and through trying to bring the parties together. These are all the things that are needed in order to resolve at least the dispute or the conflict or at least the tragedy even if we cannot end the hatreds and divisions that are driving the region in the foreseeable future. I understand the hon. member's concern for the timing of these missions.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): I wonder if the minister would be kind enough to tell us how much she expects the operations in Somalia to cost the Canadian taxpayers.

Before she does so I would like to quote from Dr. Mahbub ul Haq. He is the head of the UN development program who said I believe in Ottawa not very many months ago: "The threat to you Canadians will come not from ideological differences but from poverty. Your 5 per cent of the world's people will have to deal with the 95 per cent in developing countries. You can stop poor people at your borders but you cannot stop poverty from spreading in the form of drugs, pollution and terrorism".

The government has cut our ODA enormously. There has been no public or even parliamentary consultation on it. It was an update, in fact a memo, entitled "An update" that decided which countries would live and which would die, so to speak.

I do not think the minister, with respect, understands that Canadians feel very strongly about these issues. Canadians feel it is moronic to spend a billion dollars in Somalia trying to relieve tragedy there when at the same time we are cutting off Uganda or a host of other countries for reasons that have never been adequately explained. I wonder if the minister might explain them today.

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, I assume that the hon. member was serious in his intent in the first part of his question. I do not have the figure with me on the costs in Somalia although at one point we did go through them. The mission has had several changing concepts. I would be glad to get him the figure on the cost if he would like.

Mr. Kilgour: Just an approximation.

Mrs. McDougall: I know roughly what it is but I thought the question was serious and that he might want to actually have a precise answer in which case I would be happy to get it for him. However, it sounds like he is not interested.

I would like to point out that our aid program has not been cut drastically. Indeed, it went up faster than government expenditures for quite a number of years and has really only been subject to cuts very recently.

In terms of any changes that will come to our aid program, there are a number of changing demands on it. It is not just Russia and the former Soviet Union and countries such as that. It is environmental concerns. It is whether or not we should maybe concentrate more on particular countries and have a greater impact in certain regions. There were some decisions made by CIDA last year in its own programming made internally about how to deploy its funds within Africa.

However, I want to assure the House and the Canadian people that first of all the funding remains for famine relief and other emergencies. There is no change in our policy on that. That money is there when it is required.

Second, any changes that we have been looking at internally will be brought to the Canadian people for consultation. There is absolutely no intent to not do that. I understand the significance of aid. The hon. member has said that it does not make any sense to cut out funding to one country and to spend a billion dollars in Somalia. Let us look at what happened in Somalia.

Without going in and creating an environment where we can feed people there is no point in having an aid budget. Obviously that is another change.

Here is one of the things that was discussed in the peacekeeping seminar that I conducted and hosted in February where we had a number of aid people. They suggested that instead of our aid program being quite independent of our peacekeeping program that we should look at providing aid following an exercise such as the one we are engaged in in Somalia. There should be greater integration between CIDA programming and our peacekeeping, peace building and democratic institution building operations. That is a point that is very well taken. It is one that I have asked our people to look into. When we are in a position to do so we will be bringing forward a discussion on what our aid budget should look like in the future. I think the hon. member will be satisfied.

• (1615)

Many of the non-government organizations were quite alarmed early on when they heard all these rumours and all the speculation about changes to our aid program. When they actually sat down and talked about what our approach was going to be they said that that is something they could live with and looked forward to being a part of the discussion.

Mr. Kilgour: Name one.

Mrs. McDougall: CARE.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, may I say at the beginning that the intention at this time is to divide the 20 minutes that have been allocated to the NDP caucus between myself and the member for Trinity—Spadina. I will speak for the first 10 minutes and the member for Trinity-Spadina will have the remaining 10. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that you will let me know when my 10 minutes are up by giving me the appropriate signal.

I am pleased to speak to this motion by the Official Opposition.

> That this House condemn the lack of leadership, the evasion of accountability and responsibility and the inadequate credibility of the Minister of National Defence that have exposed members of the Canadian Forces on difficult and sensitive peacekeeping missions to unnecessary vulnerability and that contribute to the gravity of national fiscal problems by her persisting in the acquisition of enormously expensive equipment designed for missions no longer contemplated.

The words "inadequate credibility" make an interesting phrase.

It is a wordy motion but I think the merit of it is that it provides us with an opportunity to debate a number of things that the House I think has been yearning to debate for some time because of the prominence of the role that Canadian troops have taken in situations in the former Yugoslavia and in Somalia.

I think it would be a mistake for people who are watching or for people on the government side to think that somehow this concern is only manifested because the Minister of National Defence happens to be a candidate for the leadership of the Progressive Conservative Party and therefore for the job of Prime Minister, however briefly.

It is something that would have come up anyway. It may be a misfortune for the Minister of National Defence to hold a portfolio in which there are pressing issues at the same time that she would like to devote herself full time to the leadership race. The fact is that no matter who the Minister of National Defence is at this time I think it is fair to say that the opposition would be wanting the same kind of answers and having the same kind of concerns as we have now.

I think the Minister of National Defence did play a very dangerous game for herself and for the House of Commons when she basically tried to avoid the House on these issues. I think the opposition was quite within its rights to complain and to protest that the Minister of National Defence ought to have been in the House. The opposition was right when it objected to the fact that for a while anyway she was not here to answer our questions and to give an account of her own involvement in these issues particularly of course with respect to the situation that developed in Somalia.

The minister did come to the House. I think she would have done herself irreparable damage had she not. Maybe we need to think about some rules for the future about the role of ministers if, as and when they become leadership candidates. Maybe there should be some obligation on their part to step aside and allow someone to take their place.

• (1620)

Frequently I am sure that this is not a big deal. It may be that the particular portfolio that a leadership candidate has is uneventful during the term of the leadership race. In this case—perhaps the exception here should dictate the rule—it did not turn out to be that way. We found out the inadequacies of having people on the road doing party things, ministers in particular, when they should be here in the House answering for things that were happening in their own departments. These are things that were obviously of concern not just to members of Parliament but to Canadians, to the families of Canadians that are on duty in Somalia and in the former Yugoslavia and to people who are concerned everywhere about Canada's good reputation as a peacekeeping nation and one that provides peacekeepers.

I mention the problem of reputation because one of the things that disturbed me immediately was that the minute the opposition began to ask questions about events in Somalia the first reaction of the government was not to say: "Yes, we share your concern about this", but to try to smear the opposition by implying we were trying to bring the Canadian Armed Forces into disrepute. We were guilty of innuendo and everything else.

I remember very well the difference in the attitude of the government House leader from one day to the next. When the hon. member from Victoria first raised a matter concerning Somalia he was accused of all kinds of things. Then when the letter from the Canadian Armed Forces person to his spouse was released subsequent to that then all of a sudden the tone changed.

Why could the question from a known and responsible member of Parliament not have been treated with that kind of seriousness in the first place? Why did we have to go through all these kinds of playground antics about that member or any other member having an attitude toward the Canadian Armed Forces?

It seems to me that one can be a friend of the Canadian Armed Forces or the people who serve in the Canadian Armed Forces and still be a critic of government policy and still be interested in seeing that justice is done with respect to particular events or particular actions that may be taken by particular individuals in the Canadian Armed Forces.

I thought that was why we went to war on a number of occasions in the first place. It was so that we would have that kind of freedom to stand up in this place and ask honest, forthright questions not just about what bad guys do but about what sometimes the good guys do. It is sometimes the case that one gets bad behaviour even within groups and institutions that one might otherwise respect. That is all we were doing.

I think the early response by the government members was quite despicable in that regard. They were the ones who tried to turn it into an exchange of cheap shots.

We were the ones who were concerned about the reputation of the Canadian Armed Forces and the reputation of Canada as a peacekeeping nation and as a country that has a reputation for providing competent, reliable and professional peacekeepers around the world whenever they have been needed.

I have had the opportunity personally as a member of Parliament to visit a number of Canadian peacekeeping operations. I have always felt good about the work that people were doing whether it was on the green line in Cyprus that I had an opportunity to tour at one time or working directly with experienced Canadian officers with peacekeeping experience during my time on the special committee on the peace process in Central America or visiting peacekeepers in other contexts as well.

We have a great deal of respect for the work that Canadians do. It is because of that respect that we raise these issues with trepidation. No one enjoys raising these kinds of issues.

The government should have been more forthcoming and the minister should have been more forthcoming. Now that there is some evidence of a real discrepancy between what the minister told the House and what her own chief of staff said was the case with respect to who knew what, when and where, I think that the call for a public inquiry that has been made by a number of people is a legitimate request. It is not enough just to have a military board of inquiry because a military board of inquiry is a very secretive thing. I had some experience with them in the early 1980s. One of my constituents was killed in a militia accident. It took us a couple of years to get the transcript of the board of inquiry. When we did get it a great deal of it was blotted out. We only got that through the freedom of information process. I approach this issue with a certain amount of scepticism about boards of inquiry.

We do need more debate in this House about the changing role of peacekeeping. The minister acknowledged this. She had a conference on it. There needs to be more engagement of members of Parliament and of the Canadian public in general in debate about the changing role. We used to be peacekeepers and when we were peacekeepers there was a peace to keep.

Now we go into situations in which we are also involved in humanitarian aid while the bombs are falling. We are also involved in something that might be called in some cases peacemaking and in others peace-enforcing. There are a lot of ambiguities and new risks and dangers that attend these kinds of activities.

I would certainly recommend to the government that it provide some of its time for debate on these issues. Perhaps we could even have a special debate to enable more members to express themselves on these issues which are such a strong concern for a lot of Canadians.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am also pleased to have an opportunity to make some comments on this issue. I do not wish to reiterate comments my colleague has just made or comments my colleague from Victoria made before lunch. They covered those very well.

I wish to address another aspect of the problem. We have had acknowledgement, not just in this House but in other parts of the establishment, that there are some problems with regard to Canadian peacekeeping. I am going to refer to that briefly.

What I want to do in my time is to go a little bit deeper into the problems that come to us from the situation in the world and which have given the Canadian government, the Canadian Armed Forces and the Canadian people a different situation with which we are not accustomed to dealing.

The way the problem has appeared in the first instance is that our Canadian Armed Forces seem to be not as well trained as they might be or should be. I do not want to belabour it but I just want to reiterate briefly that is the opinion not just expressed by certain members in this House or certain members of the public but by the military, the Armed Forces establishment.

I am referring partly to a report that came out a couple of years ago. It states:

> From the Canadian Forces Staff School, through the CLFCSC and the CFCSC, PKO——which stands for peacekeeping operations—

> receive little if any attention. The only formal class taught is at the CFCSC where a one-period lecture on PKO is followed by a one-period syndicate discussion.

• (1630)

There is another report, also from the Armed Forces, and it is dated July 1991. I will come back to the question of date. It reads:

> There has been in the Canadian forces a prevailing attitude that we need do very little in the way of preparation of our peacekeepers because of the basic military skills already learned. Unfortunately, this attitude is causing difficulties in competing with other peacekeeping contributors which are paying attention to the expressed wishes of the UN, and which are gradually upgrading their peacekeeping skills.

That is the end of that quotation. I want to add another one from a 1991 staff paper prepared for General de Chastelain. It reads:

> The concept of a national centre for peacekeeping is sound. It would be cost effective if there is to be any dramatic increase to the number of peacekeeping missions to which Canada contributes.

What I want to say is that although those reports are two years old this comment, which is dated in 1991, indicates a recognized need for some remedy.

I have another comment. It is from General Clayton Beattie. He says:

> If you want an important job done well, do it the way Canadian forces have routinely done it for their other priority tasks: develop a training centre. We have land combat training centres, maritime training centres, basic training centres, flight training centres, engineering schools, schools for administration and logistics, and so on. It is time DND developed a peacekeeping training centre.

It has been recognized that we need upgrading and improvement in our peacekeeping training. I believe the matter has not been dropped by the Armed Forces but I do not want to go into the details of what may or may not be done since those comments were made within the Armed Forces.

My point is that events in Bosnia and Somalia in particular have changed the need. Peacekeeping is not what it used to be. The question arises particularly because of attempts to deal with situations that peacekeeping did not deal with on previous occasions and which do not seem to have been envisaged by the late Prime Minister Pearson, who initiated this.

With the Moscow–Washington cold war gone the old fashioned peacekeeping operation has to be reconsidered. There was a negotiation, including the small and the great powers and the superpowers, and an agreement that a certain line would be honoured and then people were sent in as honest brokers from the most neutral countries that could be found or the most willing countries that could be found to observe, monitor and report, and by that means they would try to maintain the integrity of that demarcation or peace line.

Out of that, over a period of several decades, grew the general concept of peacekeeping which concentrated on humanitarian relief, election monitoring, civil administration, observation, fact finding, early warning, mediation and arbitration. All of those are not really military functions but they are close to military functions. They do not involve the direct use or even a serious threat of armed force.

• (1635)

Now we are being asked to consider preventive deployment, perhaps in Kosovo, and peace enforcement, such as a blockade on the sea and a blockade on the Danube. No plans for this have been laid down by the United Nations.

Secretary–General Boutros–Ghali is trying to lay down rules but it is not really settled yet. It is not really clear among Canadians. We are no longer locked into a fixed situation, an obligation to the United States. We are asked to do many things and we cannot do them all.

There is a strong feeling that we should select one that we could do well, which is the peacekeeping operation. That would be Canada's independent way to serve the world.

With respect to the peacekeeping operation, I want to say that we have to look to where the main conflict is and not be completely obsessed with immediate examples. The main conflict now is between the north and the south, particularly the countries of the Atlantic community that used to control most of the other countries by military conquest and as colonies. Since World War II those other countries have achieved at least nominal political independence and are members of the United Nations. That also happens to be the division between the richest nations and the poorest nations.

In that respect I want to refer to the United Nations report on development by Dr. ul Haq. He says:

> In 1960, the richest 20 per cent of the world's population had incomes 30 times greater than the poorest 20 per cent. By 1990, the richest 20 per cent were getting 60 times more. And this comparison is based on the distribution between rich and poor countries. Adding the maldistribution within countries, the richest 20 per cent of the world's people get at least 150 times more than the poorest 20 per cent.

That is obviously a recipe for trouble, and not just for the poor people. Some of them want to change their status. Dr. ul Haq pointed out when he met our committees that his opinion is that future wars will not be so much between countries as between peoples so that peacekeeping rather than policing will be what is needed.

Policing is for governing a territory. Handling disputes between peoples requires a different approach and a different technique. What we therefore need is an inquiry that is an exploration within Canada and within the United Nations on just exactly what things need to be done for peacekeeping and how to get them done.

I am not at all sure that enforcement should be part of peacekeeping. I agree with a Globe and Mail editorial that once said that this peace enforcement looks like war enforcement. This peacekeeping looks like war–making.

We do not have the clear boundary line between peacekeeping and war that we thought we had for several decades. Part of what we have to decide today is that this subject of what is peacekeeping in the new situation between the richest peoples and the poorest peoples, wherever their territorial boundaries are, is where we have to look at making our contribution toward world peace.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my colleague from Trinity—Spadina.

I took to heart his comments about the divisions in wealth prevalent on our planet. I think particularly of the fact that we are now involved in peacekeeping operations in Somalia, which surely must rank among the poorest territories on the planet. In terms of the internal troubles besetting the Canadian forces it seems to be generating more than its fair share, at least in terms of troops dispatched about the planet.

I would like to ask the hon. member if in his opinion that which Canada is now attempting to achieve in Somalia at least to some degree by force of arms could not in the long term be better sought through the use of generosity of spirit.

• (1640)

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I think the direction in which he is looking is spot on.

I have no particular knowledge of Somalia but I would like to speak about a roughly similar example, El Salvador. I visited it in January and several times before. Guatemala is another example.

The United Nations has gone far beyond peacekeeping in El Salvador. It has helped to monitor a cease-fire in which not one shot was fired on the combatants in a year, which is remarkable. It then supervised and validated about a year of negotiations for the peace accord, signed in the presence of the outgoing Secretary General of the United Nations. He would not let them go until they had finished the job of signing it.

Under his successor, the United Nations with strong Canadian participation has remained present in El Salvador. It is now committed to remaining until at least a month after the elections which will be held in early 1994. That will ensure, as far as international action can, the peace accords, the economic rearrangements, the human rights rearrangements, the juridical rearrangements and to cap it all off, a peaceful, clean election in March of 1994. The United Nations has committed itself to that.

There was precedent for that when the Government of Nicaragua invited the United Nations into its election. It is not the same in Somalia because it is not a state, so I am told, because it was destroyed. I think that kind of peaceful intervention by the United Nations is likely to be far more productive for all concerned than leaving it until there has to be shooting and bombing to resolve a situation that was allowed to go too far.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs) Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the opposition motion as presented.

I want to address the claims by the opposition that members of the Canadian forces who are now on peacekeeping missions around the world have been somewhat exposed or would be exposed to some sort of vulnerability. I think that is of concern and it is important to talk about it.

The situation, of course, is dangerous. It is obvious to anyone who watches TV or reads a paper that our peacekeepers are exposed to certain dangers. To wantonly question the efforts of the men and women of the Canadian forces when they really need unity and support is on the edge of being shameless and is a concern of mine.

Before moving to the actual situation on the ground in former Yugoslavia I want to first outline for the House how the men and women of the Armed Forces are prepared for peacekeeping. I think the member for Trinity—Spadina had some concern about how we should be preparing our peacekeepers and it is important to speak to that.

There is a false impression in some quarters by other people, not the hon. member, that we can simply walk in off the street and become peacekeepers by donning berets. Of course this is not possible.

• (1645)

The general purpose combat skills of the Canadian forces have become more and more essential for most of the personnel we are deploying, especially those who are going to the Balkans. Not surprisingly it has been said that peacekeeping is not a job for a soldier but it is a job only a soldier can do. This is only too valid a point today.

In fact on the basis of 44 years experience on five continents the Department of National Defence rightly believes that the best peacekeeper is a well-trained soldier, sailor, or aviator who knows his or her trade.

The suggestion that the government would recklessly send a poorly trained or improperly equipped contingent on any mission around the world is absolute nonsense. If everyone here really thinks about it they know that.

The basic military training of our forces training for the defence of Canada or to meet the collective security obligations is the source of their flexibility, their ability to respond to critical situations and of course their discipline. These are all key attributes required for peacekeeping.

I should not go further without taking the opportunity to talk about training because the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina has concerns about that. Members of the Canadian forces believe it is the training they get that makes them the kind of peacekeepers they are.

To ensure that high quality training the Armed Forces continually evaluates the methods the hon. member was concerned about and makes needed improvements as a matter of course. Some studies have identified the need for specialized training focusing on environmental, cultural and administrative preparation. Such training is decentralized and normally tailored to the very specific missions that our peacekeepers are going on.

For example a battalion selected for duty receives mission oriented training at home and before departure. Officers to be posted as UN military observers normally receive eight days training to prepare for their duties. There is a concern about training and the hon. member is certainly right in that we do constantly train. As the hon. member mentioned there must be a kind of flexibility so we can adjust to changing times.

Even the United Nations regards basic military training as a source of many of the skills required for peacekeeping. I do not want to suggest that there is not some concern about how those in the military who are fighters become peacekeepers. They are certainly trained to be flexible and there are training schools to do all that.

The Department of National Defence also endeavours to work with, receive information from and dialogue with the United Nations with regard to training.

There is a one week indoctrination and training process conducted at CFB Montreal every quarter for all those who are designated to serve in places like the Golan Heights and Syria.

• (1650)

An eight day training program is held once a year at CFB Montreal for the officers warned of possible postings to existing missions as military observers. There is a three day intensive training session which is held at National Defence Headquarters in Ottawa for officers warned of immediate departure for peacekeeping operations.

Obviously, training of Canadian forces for peacekeeping is appropriate for the tasks at hand. This has been borne out by the fact that for more than four decades 90,000 Canadian men and women have been involved in keeping the peace around the world and less than 90 personnel have lost their lives. Certainly the record has been excellent. We have a tremendous reputation and considering the number of people, over 90,000 men and women, who have been involved in peacekeeping it is quite a record.

The Canadian peacekeeping experience is the collective result of our people and our Canadian forces being involved in patrols along the green line in Nicosia, clearing mines in the sands of Kuwait and patrols in the jungles of Indo–China. It is an experience which is sought after by a growing number of United Nations member states.

It is not surprising that Canada is asked to share its peacekeeping experience with other nations and has provided briefing teams. The success of our peacekeeping abilities has been noted by other countries. Canada has provided briefing teams to more than 20 different countries around the world. Members of the Canadian forces returned just late last week from such briefings in Egypt and Pakistan. We are helping other countries around the world.

Canada is a respected member of the international community and it is one of the reasons why we are always being approached by the United Nations to provide our experience and our excellence to peacekeeping missions. Other countries know this and are eager to know what makes Canada and Canadians such able peacekeepers.

Time and time again they are told that it is basic training as the hon. member from Spadina stated. It is discipline, combat skills, suitable equipment, good communications and able logistic support. All those things are part and parcel of the success of our forces.

These qualities of course are also why we are approached by both the European Community and the United Nations to provide personnel for the international efforts to bring peace to the former Yugoslavia. In fact Canada was among the first to call for international action to resolve the crisis. Canada took its place among the members of the international community and agreed to do what it could to help end this horrible conflict.

Even though experienced peacekeeping personnel were required in the former Yugoslavia, the government carefully considered the conflict in light of the criteria or guidelines which have evolved in Canada to assist the government in deciding whether or not Canada should participate in peacekeeping missions.

Besides the training and military aspects I think the opposition will be reassured to know there are also important criteria that are considered before deciding whether we will go with the mission or not.

While these criteria are clearly not absolute they have served Canada well and include a number of areas. There must be a threat to the international peace and security of the country. The mission must be linked to efforts to obtain political settlement. The mission must have a clear and enforceable mandate. There should be agreement by the principal antagonists to the presence of Canadian troops to a peacekeeping mission.

• (1655)

The mission must have a clearly defined concept of operations and an appropriate command and control structure. The size, equipment and international composition of the forces must be appropriate to the mandate. The mission must have an appropriate logistics concept to support the force. The mission should be accountable to a single identifiable authority competent to support the operation. The mission must have an appropriate funding arrangement. The mission must have clear rules of engagement. The risk to Canadian forces personnel must be acceptable. The mission should not jeopardize other Canadian forces missions.

There is a good long list of very important points in the criteria of making the determination to be involved.

It was only after considering all the implications that the decision was made to join the international efforts to bring a measure of peace and security to the Balkans. I am sure all members of the House will agree that we as Canadians should not condemn the brave men and women of the Canadian forces who are in the former Yugoslavia for trying their hardest in other places in the world to help.

Many Canadians, indeed several members of Parliament, have asked why Canada has even become involved in efforts to bring peace to other parts of the world. The answer is simple. Successive Canadian governments have argued that a safer, more secure international environment is key to Canada's continued security and prosperity.

That is why in addition to defence and collective security, and efforts to promote arms control and disarmament, the peaceful resolution of disputes has remained one of the key pillars of the Canadian defence policy.

That is why Canada is a strong supporter of peacekeeping and related operations. We are concerned with threats to the larger international community which might occur as a result of spill-over from more localized conflicts causing us a great international problem.

Some 4,300 Canadian forces personnel are now participating in more than a dozen peacekeeping and related missions world-wide including the European Community modern mission and the United Nations protection forces, both of which are now operating in the Balkans.

As we all know Canada is currently making a significant contribution to the ongoing international efforts to bring peace and security to the region by contributing more than 2,100 members of the forces to these two countries.

Mr. Speaker, I want you and all Canadians to know how very proud I am of our Canadian forces military personnel in the work that they are doing throughout the world. I am very pleased that we as a government are in total support of them wherever they have been as in so many key parts and countries of the world as they are today. Also as a government we are firmly convinced and behind them supporting them in the kind of equipment they need.

The other thing those peacekeepers, the military and Canadian forces need to know is that they are solidly supported by Canadians, by the people back home when they are doing this work. Yes, they go into this line of work knowing they are going to be in dangerous positions, but they want to know that we are going to continually provide the best in equipment for them. Really what they would like to be provided with is solid support by their people back home.

Our government and I totally support them in their endeavours. Trying situations and problems arise sometimes but with the number of people we have sent abroad, the number who have remained unmaimed or unhurt and have contributed so greatly to the world, I applaud them and I applaud our government for the total support shown to our Canadian forces.

• (1700)

Mr. Bill Domm (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, one thing I have noticed over the past few weeks in the House of Commons, is there has been a great deal of concern expressed by opposition members over the acquisition of equipment. In fact, I think that probably motivates part of their motion today which talks about the acquisition of enormously expensive equipment designed for missions no longer contemplated.

I would like to speak just for a moment on Ontario's position on the acquisition of these EH-101 helicopters. The industrial benefits to Canada with this acquisition will total 113 per cent of the purchase price of the EH-101s. This means more money will flow into Canada over the lifetime of this project than the Canadian government will spend on the purchase of the EH-101s.

Let us take Ontario as an example. I am quite impressed with the job creation this will afford us. Ontario will receive 27 per cent of the total industrial benefits from this national program. Among those companies from Ontario that will benefit from the program are Fleet Industries of Fort Erie, West Heights of Kitchener and Spar Aerospace of Toronto.

Including the helicopter's electronic systems more than 50 per cent of the Canadian aircraft's components will be made in Canada. Thirteen major components of the EH-101 helicopter will be built in Canada. More than 10 per cent of every EH-101 sold world-wide will be Canadian made.

We have the frigates. We have the aircraft. Now we are going to get the kind of equipment we need. It does represent a commitment over a 10 or 13-year period of some one point so many billion dollars a year, but it is within the framework of the budget. It is in the restraint cutbacks given to the defence department to spend. It is the choice not only of the chief of staff and all his people but it is also the choice of cabinet that in order to complete the frigate program and give added safety to our shore patrol we need this to couple with the frigate to do the kinds of missions needed.

I wonder how the member feels about the acquisition of this equipment and the jobs that it might mean in his area.

Mr. James: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Peterborough. One thing that never fails to amaze me in this House is the hypocrisy that goes on here. If next week we had some of our search and rescue people go down with a piece of old equipment, the hue and cry would be massive. Therefore we are in the process of buying new equipment for our search and rescue and for our Canadian forces and now we are having fault found with that.

I was asked today by some young school children what I thought of this when money is in such short supply. I told them that I was raised in an environment where we did not have a whole lot. I can remember when I was quite young we had to borrow money and the question was whether to fix up the old car or buy a new one. The latter certainly was probably the more intelligent way to go and that is what we are into here.

The industrial benefits—

An hon. member: Baloney.

Mr. James: Well, I am not going to convince the other side. This is the other thing that happens in this place. I sat here very quietly when they spoke and I expect the same to be done for me across the way. Canadians do not appreciate this kind of thing, especially from a close colleague like I have in Kent. That really gets me a little concerned.

• (1705)

The industrial benefits to Canada will total 113 per cent of the purchase price. The spin-off is absolutely fantastic. It has rolled across the nation. Ontario will benefit a great deal with the industrial benefits.

The Liberals want to spend all sorts of money on make-work projects. Never mind using all the Canadian taxpayers' money on make-work projects that only lasted until the people left town and closed up the place. There were years and years of that. So do not tell me about providing our Canadian forces with something needed. The kinds of thing that were mentioned in here today in this oddball motion that was even difficult to read. Now we want to give them up-to-date, modernized equipment and not have to spend all sorts of money on equipment that ends up being 40 years old. It also provides work and jobs across our nation as a spin-off from that very important purchase.

No, the hon. member would rather just take the Canadian taxpayers' money and for every dollar collected send it back out on a make-work project where 50 cents of it falls off the table before it gets out there. Canadians have had far too much of that sort of thing.

Mr. Kilgour: The country is broke, Ken.

Mr. James: We will have the new modernized equipment that took six years of study to provide to our Canadian forces, our search and rescue people and our military the kind of equipment needed, which they seem to be concerned about in this goofy motion that was put forth.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, we have heard some awful kinds of logic in this debate but we just heard one of the worst.

Other people have estimated that if the $6 billion were used in other ways such as on education and training or on infrastructure it would create as many as 70 times more jobs than this bonanza would.

Why does the member not get up and say that the real reason this project is going ahead is because it is in the riding of the hon. member for Frontenac?

Mr. Crawford: Right on.

Mr. James: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should take a little time and look at the amount of dollars that are spent by the federal government in the areas he mentioned. Education is very important and rightly so. It is a great concern of mine, as is the whole area of human resource development. Certainly we have to be spending money there and doing it more intelligently.

However, this government spends over $42 billion annually in the whole area of human resource development, in health, in penitentiaries, on the education of our aboriginal peoples and moneys that go back to the poorer families to help them and so on. It is very important and we do spend substantial moneys. I hope we can get better and more efficient at it. At the same time it is broad based.

I again say that the first time a piece of antiquated equipment goes down when we are attempting to save somebody off our shores, the hon. member will be on his feet—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired for questions and comments.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, on Monday the Minister of National Defence reacted to the budget by saying: "All of us would like to get out of this ethos where the dominant ethos is deficit budgeting". No wonder there is a communication problem in national defence.

We all know that the minister loves to make pronouncements from on high, but after reaching this new height of bafflegab, we can only assume that she was dominated more by ether than by any ethos.

The motion before the House draws into question the credibility of the Minister of National Defence. I am sure the minister herself would be the first to point out that credibility comes from the Latin credibilis, meaning worthy to be believed.

• (1710)

How can someone be believed if she cannot be understood?

Just the other night on national television the minister was searching for an international threat that would serve to justify her incredible expenditure of the EH-101 helicopters.

I am certain that being as erudite as she professes she would know that incredible also comes from the Latin word credibilis. To her credit she was able to stretch reality far enough to identify Iran as possibly having a submarine that could one day potentially pose a threat to Canada. Perhaps it would travel halfway around the world to sink some of our Canadian cod.

This is a minister and a government that are still stinging from the sinking of their $8 billion nuclear submarine program and now want to spend nearly $6 billion on helicopters designed to sink someone else's submarines. I guess the minister thinks that if she cannot have any subs then why should anyone else.

Curiously enough the Minister of National Defence is in a pitched battle with the Minister of the Environment whom I am sure would be aware of the perilous crisis that now faces the North Sea nations because of a cold war sub that has sunk off the coast of Norway.

This nuclear submarine is already leaking radioactive substances and threatens to release sufficient plutonium to cause catastrophic damage to the marine environment.

I am sure the Minister of the Environment would be the first to say that the last thing Canada needs is a nuclear sub to be sunk off our coast. This begs the question: Why is this government spending $6 billion to do just that?

Wait, however. The incredible Minister of National Defence tells us that we need these helicopters for search and rescue. They are perhaps to search for her beliefs and rescue her leadership bid.

What she does not readily admit is that only 15 of these 50 helicopters are earmarked for search and rescue. She does not like to mention that Canada has recently purchased 100 utility helicopters for the very same purpose. Nor does she mention that the ferocious turbulence caused by the EH-101 engines may well drown anyone the helicopter may be trying to rescue.

The minister likes to talk about the politics of inclusion. True enough, she has included in her leadership bid at least one prominent lobbyist for the EH-101 contracts. Canadians understand what governs the priorities of members of this government. They understand whose interests come first. They know it is not the interest of ordinary Canadians but that is okay because the Minister of National Defence says she really likes ordinary Canadians although she finds them as boring as she thinks they would find her.

Canadians wonder what kind of cabinet leadership they can expect after the June convention. Are there enough Tories who have read Dostoevsky for the Minister of National Defence to form a cabinet that she would be willing to talk to. Maybe that is why she talks about reducing the size of the cabinet.

With regard to the grim events that took place in Somalia we have now learned that Admiral Anderson repeatedly stated during the course of a press conference that the Minister of National Defence knew that criminal intent might be linked to the death of a Somali man as early as March 18. Yet the minister told the House of Commons on April 26 that she was not aware that the case had criminal overtones until much later: March 31. That was the reason for her delay in informing Canadians.

Because her own chief of defence staff said she clearly knew the seriousness of the incident on March 18 we must ask the Minister of National Defence whether the only things she does not always cover up are her shoulders.

Perhaps this is her idea of open government. It is to treat Canadians like mushrooms. That means to keep them in the dark and feed them intellectual doo-doo.

Just as harmful to Canadians was the budget tabled earlier this week that had as one of its principal objectives to clear the way for the Campbell helicopters to take off with $5.8 billion Canadian tax dollars.

• (1715)

The Minister of National Defence cannot divorce herself from the Tory record. This is a marriage that cannot be put asunder. Even the Prime Minister today in Question Period said that there may be a new Prime Minister but it will be the same government.

The Minister of National Defence says that she has seen the stone tablets that reveal how to cut the deficit to zero in five years. We wonder why she never revealed this wisdom to her obviously inferior colleagues who despite their best efforts could not stop the deficit from rising during their term in office. Perhaps there was no interpreter. What a shame.

The desperation of this government is only matched by the desperation of the unemployed Canadian families whose needs are once again ignored in yet another jobless budget. This is a budget that the Minister of National Defence supports and a budget which in large measure is a consequence of her flawed defence policy.

There were 382,000 more UI beneficiaries in January than there were in September. While aware of this imminent tragedy in December this government refused to make any serious effort to reduce the UI burden by putting Canadians back to work.

Instead this government preferred to back failing European helicopter manufacturers. Back home all this government decided to do was reduce payments to those Canadians who lose their jobs by an across the board 5 per cent cut in payments. This was the government's response to its failure to create jobs.

To fully appreciate the impact of this cut which was supported by the Minister of National Defence it must be understood that the average weekly payment to an unemployed person was $264.30 in January. Unemployed Canadians may well offer the Minister of National Defence a penny for her thoughts because that is all they have left after nine years of this Tory regime.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the government House leader had loud protestations this morning.

Where are the Conservatives? There is not a single one in the House. Surely in a debate on a government motion there should be a cabinet minister here and I see there is not even one here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member knows better. He should not reflect on who is or who is not in the House. There are television monitors. There is business being done behind the curtain and I do not have to reprimand the hon. member because he knows better. There will be members coming in here because he is such a great debater that I am sure they will be coming in here to ask him questions and comments.

Mr. Milliken: That may be, Mr. Speaker, but there is an obligation on the part of the government on a government motion to have a minister of the Crown in this House. I know the Secretary of State for External Affairs was here earlier. She made a speech that was delightful.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am going to say to the hon. member that I do not want him to reflect on who is and who is not in the House. He can carry on with his debate but he knows better.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, you know too that there is a convention in this House that there be a cabinet minister present during discussion of government business. I am within my rights to point out the fact that there is not. I have done that before and Your Honour usually knows that that brings cabinet ministers running. They should be here. This is a government motion. This is an important motion and the ministers should be here to hear the debate but they are not.

Anyway, Mr. Speaker, I will continue with my remarks in deference to your ruling.

This morning in his speech the government House leader ranted and raved apparently ad nauseam about the fact that we were bringing this motion only because the Minister of National Defence is seeking the leadership of the Progressive Conservative Party.

I want to make it very clear that in bringing this motion to the House that is not the only reason nor is it the principal reason this motion was brought.

A minister has arrived. That is great.

Indeed the motion itself makes it very clear that the criticism being levelled at this Minister of National Defence is because she is not doing a good job as Minister of National Defence. The evidence that supports that position I think is very clear. I want to go over in some detail the allegation that has been made by my colleague, the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, who put it forward very ably in this House and by the member for Winnipeg South Centre. This was denied so flatly and so hotly by the government House leader. He huffed and he puffed because he did not know what else to say. We have him on the record on this too and I would like to read what happened in this case.

• (1720)

We will recall that the first incident that was complained of took place in Somalia on March 16. We now know that the Minister of National Defence received a briefing on this matter on March 17. She was given this briefing. Her own officials have admitted this and it was clear from the evidence that was subsequently given by the chief of the defence staff that the briefing was comprehensive. It made it clear there was an investigation with possible criminal overtones underway in Somalia.

On April 2 in this House the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception asked a question. I would like to read his question. He said at page 17989 of Hansard:

> Madam Speaker, Canadians and members of Parliament were shocked and disappointed to learn of this incident involving the death of a Somali and four Canadian peacekeepers through the media three weeks after the event.
>
> I want to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. As a previous Associate Minister of National Defence he would be aware that the commanding officer is required to send a significant incident report to the chief of the defence staff.
>
> When was the Minister of National Defence briefed on this issue and when does she plan to inform the House? If she was not briefed, why was she not briefed?

Then we had the government House leader stand up and start spouting fire and brimstone:

> Madam Speaker, the hon. member as a former military person would well understand that in the military as in civilian life individuals who may be suspected of having committed a crime are entitled to the normal safety measures, are entitled to be presumed innocent and so on.
>
> In order for investigations to be conducted in a fair manner it is necessary that they be done outside the glare of publicity and done in confidence. That is what is happening.
>
> The Minister of National Defence continues to fulfil her responsibilities as she always has. The question of what her officials have said to her and when they said it, as the hon. member will know, is really not a matter for disclosure on the floor of the House of Commons.

In other words it was a stonewall answer. The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, being the diligent and capable member that he was, put the question again to the minister:

> When did the minister expect that members of Parliament and Canadians should find out? If it was not through the media how were we to find out? It is a significant event. I remind the minister that we have a size and scope of peacekeeping operations unprecedented in Canadian history. We have 4,800 Canadian peacekeepers involved in 18 different locations around the world.

I will not read the whole preamble to the question. He then said:

> I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he will appoint a full-time Minister of National Defence who will show leadership in the conduct of these operations and who will implement immediately a formalized regular series of briefings on these operations to the Parliament of Canada.

We had another blowhard answer from the government House leader basically saying that we were trying to discredit the Minister of National Defence and giving no answer. Nothing happened on April 2 when we adjourned for Easter. When Parliament resumed on April 19 the very diligent and very capable member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception was on his feet again and this time the Minister of National Defence was back from her leadership forays to answer his questions. He asked her this:

> Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago, the government House leader stood in the House and defended the government's handling of the unfortunate incident in which the Canadian public learned through the media about the death of a Somali involving five Canadian peacekeepers three weeks after the event.
> My question is for the Minister of National Defence. Why did the minister not inform the House of this incident as soon as it happened?

The minister rose in her place and said:

> Mr. Speaker, the incident was made public the day after it happened by a press release from the Department of National Defence in theatre. I have here a copy of the press release that was issued on March 18 of this year.
> The event was made public immediately. There was some confusion because a copy of this press release was not communicated to the Department of National Defence in Ottawa and I have instituted a revision of our communications policies to ensure that does not occur again.

Although I have not actually seen this press release, I am told that it is about five lines. This is not a significant document but it was not communicated to National Defence headquarters and that is what the minister pointed out to the House.

• (1725)

The member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception rose on a supplementary question. I will leave out the preamble. He asked:

> My supplementary question is for the Minister of National Defence who should know it is ultimately the minister's responsibility, and the minister's alone, to inform Parliament and the Canadian public. Why is the minister allowing departmental officials to take flak over this issue and why does she not admit to exercising poor judgment in this case?

The minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, events of this sort are always communicated in the same way directly to the press. There was another event that happened at a similar time that was picked up by the press. This one was not. It is not the custom to always announce these things in Parliament as that hon. member knows well from his experience in the military. As I have said, it was an unacceptable mistake that this was not communicated to defence headquarters and I have taken steps to ensure that error would not happen again.

She was suggesting to the House by this answer it was the fact of this mistake in communication with national defence headquarters that perhaps resulted in a lack of communication in this country.

Whether or not the press release had arrived in DND headquarters she had been told all about it. There had been an incident report filed and she was fully briefed the day after the incident, on March 17. Yet on April 19, over a month later, she was trying to suggest to the House that somehow it did not get out because something did not get to national defence headquarters.

She had full knowledge. A full report had been sent to national defence headquarters and she had been informed of it. Yet she gave this kind of answer to the House. Is this the kind of person who should be Minister of National Defence? It was deliberately designed to create a different impression than was the case. I suggest not.

I want to go to the question put to the government House leader this morning by my friend, the very diligent and very capable member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. The government House leader ranted and raved—and I am glad to see a second minister has arrived—about the problem.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Again I am going to ask the hon. member to please not do what he is doing.

You have been doing it since you started your debate. You know by convention, or whatever you want to call it, that you do not say who is, who is not, who is coming in or who is not coming into the Chamber, please.

Mr. Milliken: Now that we have a full house I do not need to refer to presence or absence any longer.

What I wanted to say was that the government House leader, in answer to questions this morning put to him by the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, was asked why it was the Minister of National Defence gave an answer which was very close to misleading.

In his question he said: "How can it have been sent to defence headquarters when the minister was briefed? I have trouble with that". The government House leader said the thing that had not come to defence headquarters was this five-line press release.

Who cares whether the press release got to national defence headquarters? Why would the minister think that was significant when she had all the facts given to her on a silver platter? They were put at her fingertips.

If this is the way she runs the Department of National Defence, how is she going to run the Government of Canada? As an opposition we have a duty to point out the shortcomings of ministers in this House. That is part of our responsibility. This is a major shortcoming. This is a major blunder on the part of the minister. It is an answer which frankly should not have been given in the House.

She gave this answer, thereby suggesting that the reason this was not out in Canada was that she had not received a copy of the press release when she had been fully briefed and was fully aware of the matter. If she was not, if she did not know and did not ask the right questions, should she be Minister of National Defence?

She is engaged in a race not to be elected Leader of the Opposition or leader of a party. She is going to be elected Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party and will thereupon become Prime Minister of Canada. If she cannot run the Department of National Defence, she cannot run the Government of Canada. That is the problem.

We have a right to know what is going on in this case. We are right to raise this matter in this House and have debate on it. Frankly she should be saying something about what she said the other day. It is nice to have the government House leader here to make a speech defending her as he has to do in Question Period so often, but unfortunately he is not fully briefed on these matters.

We can see it from the bafflegab we were given on April 2. If he was not briefed then he was talking gobbledegook and was stonewalling. If he was briefed he was stonewalling completely and not even bothering with the gobbledegook. It was absolute nonsense that he was speaking. That is why we have raised this in this House and will continue to press the issue.

• (1730)

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand in the House to condemn the lack of leadership, evasion of accountability and responsibility, and the inadequate credibility of the Minister of National Defence that have exposed members of the Canadian forces on difficult and sensitive peacekeeping missions to unnecessary vulnerability. We on this side of the House believe that contributes to the gravity of national fiscal problems by persisting in the acquisition of enormously expensive equipment designed for missions no longer contemplated.

We believe the responsibility of government actions lies at the feet of the Minister of National Defence who is responsible for the management and direction of our troops.

On April 26 the minister announced an inquiry into incidents in Somalia under section 45 of the National Defence Act. The inquiry will centre principally on whether any of the concerns arising from the Canadian forces operation are the result of systemic problems, particularly in the Canadian Airborne Regiment.

On April 28 Admiral Anderson, chief of defence staff, announced the terms of reference and the members of the inquiry.

The board has the broad mandate of investigating the leadership, discipline, operations, actions and procedure of the Canadian Airborne Regiment battle group. It will also investigate aspects of the training, discipline, effectiveness and appropriateness of professional attitudes and values of the regiment.

The inquiry will not investigate the incidents under military police investigation. It will not examine the conduct of the minister in the incidents.

We on this side of the House have criticisms. The inquiry will centre unfairly on one regiment without looking into the over-all conduct of the Department of National Defence and the minister.

If the Minister of National Defence knew there had been four killings of Somalis by March 17, why did she wait five and a half weeks to announce her inquiry?

The inquiry's proceedings will not be public and it will only report at the end of July after, I might add, a Conservative Party leadership convention.

For the conclusions of the board of inquiry to have any significance, we on this side of the House demand the board investigate what the minister of defence knew and when she knew it.

Moreover we in the opposition party demand that the board of inquiry conduct its investigations in public so that Canadians know we are getting the full story. Nothing in the National Defence Act prohibits a public inquiry.

My colleague, the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, a retired admiral, a few days ago in the House said:

> I can understand that perhaps the minister does not want to address the details, but that does not avoid the major point, that the minister in her responsibility for the direction and management of the Canadian forces as a corollary of that is responsible for informing the Canadian public, the House of Commons and Parliament on the conduct of these operations. This was not done and perhaps would not have been done for some time unless the questions were raised by the Official Opposition in the House to cause the minister to return and attend to her job in a full-time manner so that the issues could be dealt with properly.

• (1735)

These comments were made by a man who spent a career in the armed services and achieved a very high rank during that period of time. Obviously he knows what he is talking about.

To leave the question of Somalia and move on to the question of defence in a more general manner, I find a general frustration with the policies of this government. It has been weakly articulated by the Minister of National Defence. The minister has seemingly failed to recognize the need to move forward and to develop a defence policy which addresses a post cold war era. The minister has said nothing in this regard during her lacklustre performance, I might add, as the Minister of National Defence.

There are several areas we on the opposition side of the House believe she should be looking at that have never been addressed by the government. Support for Canada's commitment to providing such things as the military structure for the United Nations peacekeeping, monitoring, verification and peace enforcement operations has never been addressed; a force structure to contribute to NATO's capacity to provide support to the UN and possibly other regional organization's operations; peacekeeping training, supply and staging centres at Lahr, Germany, CFB Cornwallis, and possibly other Canadian sites; and adequate resources to fulfil NORAD obligations but with an eye to fundamental review in 1996.

On a national basis the Minister of National Defence has not looked to what we should be doing in our nation. Should we be developing a continued role in maritime and aerial surveillance and control, with a particular emphasis on enhancing northern and Arctic capabilities?

Should we be looking to improved co-ordination with civil authorities on the use of military resources for constabulary and disaster relief functions?

Should we be looking to increased visibility and a role for the reserves, including provision to allow for longer leaves of absence from work?

The Minister of National Defence owes Canadians answers to those questions. She should look at the proposals to see if they merit consideration for a defence policy at the national level.

I believe my time is almost up. I am standing in the House today speaking on behalf of a constituency that has expressed concern over the lack of action by the Minister of National Defence on the particular issue regarding Somalia. I am not speaking on behalf of myself. They are very concerned over the minister's lack of response.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I too have the pleasure to take part in the debate today which has been going on since this morning on an opposition day and is focused on a motion tabled in the House of Commons by the Liberal Party which represents the Official Opposition.

We have had the opportunity to listen to hon. members from every political party about this Liberal Party's motion which, under the disguise and the pretent of holding a debate on the position of our Armed Forces in different parts of the world, and also under the disguise of discussing the purchase of defence equipment, is aimed particularly at casting or trying to cast the blame on the Minister of National Defence who is, as everybody knows, a candidate in the leadership race for our party.

• (1740)

The very wording and concept of this motion is of a totally partisan nature and is aimed exclusively and specifically at attacking and discrediting the Minister of National Defence both before this House and before the Canadian public. All the speeches that were made, particularly those of the Official Opposition members, were focused on that objective. It was clear that was the ultimate and crucial objective of the Official Opposition members.

For two or three weeks the opposition has been raising in this House issues on events that occurred in Somalia involving the Canadian military. It also has been raising concerns about the safety of our Armed Forces in Yugoslavia, particularly in Bosnia, under the auspices of the United Nations.

Of course I recognize that the opposition has the right to raise these issues, but it should be done in a totally non-partisan manner and with the sole purpose of expressing concerns about the running of our military operations under the United Nations in these two countries, Somalia and Bosnia. But it always has this political drive to attack particularly the Minister of Defence.

In the last few weeks we gave full and complete answers, without hiding anything to all the questions that were asked by opposition members. All questions that were asked received very clear answers, both from the Government House Leader and the Minister of Defence, and from the Minister of External Affairs and the Prime Minister.

In order to give even more details and to clarify further the situation in Somalia, earlier this week the Minister of Defence came to this House and read a statement outlining all the relevant details that could be given at this point on the situation in Somalia. Members will recall that following the investigations conducted by the Armed Forces in Somalia into the various events referred to, the minister informed the House that she was going to establish an inquiry commission with the mandate to report its findings to her or to the person who will be Minister of National Defence when the report is tabled. This commission will have to report its findings to the government and to the House of Commons.

Of particular concern to me is the fact that the opposition is questioning the commission's integrity and ability to look thoroughly into the incidents in Somalia. Why question the integrity of the persons who will be part of this commission when the inquiry has not even begun?

Remember that the Minister of National Defence has indicated that civilian members will be named to the commission in order to make the process more open and so that the public can have a better access to information. The Minister of National Defence—and I stress this—has had to change the rules to allow civilians in an inquiry commission on military events.

The Minister of National Defence has nothing to apologize for. She did what was expected of her. She assumed her responsibility in a professional manner, adequately and as openly as possible. She made the facts surrounding the events that occurred in Somalia known as soon as she learned about them.

• (1745)

We must realize that the situation in Somalia for our Armed Forces in no way resembles any situation we might find on the streets of Canadian cities. Our service people in Somalia are working in extremely difficult conditions to which they must adapt in a country that is completely foreign to them, in an extremely volatile situation where, as we know very well, various groups and factions in Somalia have been at war for years now.

Our troops, our service people serving under the United Nations, of course, have gone to that country to try to bring food supplies to people who are dying of hunger in the remotest parts of Somalia. We noticed that the action in Mogadishu did not take very long, because Mogadishu is a big, well-organized city where it was easy for our service people to get set up and organized. Then they went out to more remote regions and places where people really needed their help.

What did our service people do in Somalia? They performed their assigned tasks professionally. They did so with all their experience and with all the attention and sensitivity they need in a country where the situation is volatile. We must realize that the slightest thoughtless action by our troops or their commanders in Somalia could have caused a great slaughter. It could have resulted in the death of thousands of Somalis and perhaps of many of our soldiers and service people as well. But with their experience and professionalism, they have done their job professionally so far, I repeat.

All day, and even all week, we have heard in the questions and comments of opposition members in the House allegations tending to discredit the work done by our service people in Somalia, and I find that hard to accept. Even if they say they are addressing the minister and the government not the troops, they are discussing painful events that occurred in Somalia under extremely difficult conditions, we must admit.

Since our troops have been in Somalia, with all they have done there, I think that the few deplorable events are not out of proportion. We must absolutely deplore it when people die, but we must realize that Somalia is a country at war. A civil war is going on in that country to which foreigners are sent to try to restore peace and at the same time send food to needy people.

I would ask the opposition members once and for all to consider the difficulties that our service people have to go through in Somalia and to think of their families here in Canada. I would ask them to have a little compassion and understanding for the work our people are doing in Somalia and for the hardship they now experience living apart from their families, because they are in hostile territory on an extremely delicate operation.

Mr. Speaker, that is why I tell you again that the motion presented by the Liberal Party today is aimed strictly at the Defence Minister. By attacking her, this motion cannot help but tarnish the reputation of our forces and we on the government side are prepared to stand up and defend our forces, our soldiers who are abroad, be it in Somalia or in the former Yugoslavia.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs will be travelling soon. She will visit our troops and again convey to them the support of the party in power and of the members on this side of the House, to encourage them to continue their work. Since the United Nations started sending peacekeeping troops in the world to maintain and restore peace, Canada has been there. Canada is always one of the first to be invited to participate in these peacekeeping operations by the UN, and it is to the credit of our Armed Forces. Today, I want to pay tribute to the Canadian Armed Forces and, on behalf of our government and our party, encourage them in their efforts.

• (1750)

The motion of the Liberal Party also refers to the acquisition of enormously expensive equipment designed for missions no longer contemplated. Again, this motion shows the near-sightedness of the Liberals and how they overlook the reality. The reality is that our country is one of the largest in the world. It has a lot of coastline to protect and control, as well as the largest fishing zones in the world.

The Liberals, when they were in power, authorized the construction of frigates and it was agreed and known at that time that the implementation of this project would mean that the helicopters would have to be replaced, modernized or adapted to the new frigates. Without helicopters, these frigates are powerless and have a very limited scope of action. A captain at the helm of his ship has a very limited field of vision on the ocean. However, a military patrol in a helicopter with a range of hundreds of miles in the case of surveillance operations, whether linked to fishing zones, the drug trade, or search and rescue missions, literally becomes a radar and completes the work done by the frigate itself. This is why it is important to provide new equipment, new helicopters for our Armed Forces.

The decision was made to buy the EH-101. Why? First, let me say that this decision was not made lightly. My colleague, the member for Portneuf, who sits on the defence committee, told me this morning that this committee hears both military and civilian experts who come to discuss the new equipment required by our Armed Forces. I believe my colleague from Portneuf also said that the discussions on the new helicopters go back to 1988 or 1987. The Standing Committee on Defence, which is made up of members from the three parties, namely the two opposition parties and the government, took the time and made the necessary efforts to look at every alternative. My colleague from Portneuf also told me this morning that a report of that committee had been unanimously endorsed by the members of the three parties, including the members of the two opposition parties. Therefore, these members approved the type of helicopter that the Canadian forces are in the process of acquiring with the approval of Parliament and the Government of Canada.

I want to thank my colleague from Portneuf for providing me with a copy of this report published in November 1990, which is entitled: Maritime Sovereignty. On page 29 of the report, it states clearly that "The Committee recommends that the Sea King helicopters be replaced as planned and that this be done as soon as possible to avoid costly stop gap measures".

An hon. member: Unanimously.

Mr. Langlois: Unanimously.

Mr. Speaker, what do the Liberals recommend now?

An hon. member: Which date did you say?

Mr. Langlois: November 1990. I repeat for the hon. member that the report was tabled in November 1990.

What do the Liberals recommend now?

• (1755)

They recommend that we abandon the program and invest astronomical sums of money to repair our old Sea Kings and Labradors, which have done their time. These aircraft have been in service for 30 years or so. They have been repaired and re-equipped, and now they have done their time. If we were to do as the Liberals suggest and spend hurge amounts, in excess of $2.4 billion, to repair 30 years-old helicopters, by the time the work be completed, the youngest of these helicopters would be 47 years old and the oldest 57 years old. Mr. Speaker, I would like you to give me the name of one person who is still driving a 47-year-old car in this country. And that is with all four wheels on the ground! The normal life of a car is ten years. Would we be prepared to let our service men and women, whose job it is to make Canada secure, work in 47-year-old and even 57-year-old aircraft? That make no sense.

Another point that was not mentioned I think is that even if we were to refit our old helicopters, the Sea Kings and Labradors, we could not incorporate new technology. It is impossible to fit old aircraft with new defence and communications technology because the helicopters have to be designed to receive the electronic equipment used for navigation, communications and satellite links as well as all the latest sophisticated search and rescue and radar equipment.

When we sent troops to the Persian Gulf during the Gulf War, I remember some Canadian newspapers and some circles saying that our troops were leaving for the gulf in leaky boats. Our troops will be equipped with brand new frigates, just starting to come out of the shipyards. Would we put helicopters that are not intended for those frigates on them? After considering all the facts for many years, the government came to the logical conclusion that the EH–101 helicopter was the best option.

I would like to take the few moments I have left to touch on the economic benefits that the helicopter acquisition program will have for Canada, and particularly for Quebec, because that interests me as a member from Quebec. I have heard the Liberals on the other side and my hon. friend from the Montreal area complain constantly for a year and a half about the Montreal economy being in decline. My colleague knows who I am talking about. What is happening is that 30 per cent of the industrial benefits of this helicopter acquisition program will accrue to Quebec and companies such as CAE Electronics Ltd., a dynamic business which is not in my riding but in the Montreal area, specifically in the riding of the hon. member for Saint–Léonard. So that will create jobs. CAE Electronics, Paramax Electronics Inc. and Canadian Marconi will enjoy industrial benefits flowing from the helicopter acquisition program for years to come. My colleague from Saint–Léonard will no doubt agree and he should be thrilled as I am about the economic benefits of the program not only for the Canadian economy but also for the economy of Quebec.

CANADIAN BILL OF RIGHTS

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe) moved that Bill C–395, an act to amend the Canadian Bill of Rights (right to property), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I want to say how pleased I am to be able to stand here today and talk to this particular bill. I want to thank my seconder, the member for Peterborough, for supporting me on this particular bill.

There have been a number of other individuals, such as the member from Markham, the member for Durham, and the member for Red Deer who seconded it originally who have all been very supportive of this bill.

When we look at a bill that relates to property and the right to own property I think most of us think this bill should properly be in the Constitution. I was one of those people who was disappointed that in all the discussions that took place recently throughout this country the right to property did not become part of the Canadian Constitution. I was also disappointed about other things that took place in that debate and discussion and that we were not able to make some changes.

When it was initially suggested that property rights be put into the Constitution I thought that was a good idea. I felt it was important for the Canadian public. When that suggestion came before my York—Simcoe constitutional committee which was studying the proposals it had some difficulty with it. It was made up of a cross–section of 20 to 25 people from my riding who really felt that the protection of property and property rights should properly be in the domain of elected officials.

They felt the elected officials should be responsible for making a decision. If the public were not satisfied with that decision then in the normal process of elections the public would have the opportunity to remove them or express their displeasure at their situation or the actions they took.

I recognized that and I agreed after some discussion with my constituents, with this group of people, and I did not pursue it any further at that time.

As a result, and things have changed considerably in this country as it relates to the Constitution, I started looking into a particular situation that has arisen in my riding and looked at the history of property rights and their importance in Canadian history and the very evolution of this country.

The historical precedents in favour of property rights are really overwhelming. Philosophically, societies were initially created to collectively protect this right.

When I as an individual cannot protect myself society will do it for me and in return I will respect and protect other member's rights to property.

The right to property could be traced back to the Magna Charta of 1215. This document did not originate the right to property. It merely recognized its existence as an inherent sacred right. The Magna Charta, through its recognition of the inherent right to property, its specific rules for compensation and its commitment to protect this right at all costs, enabled all people to build a better society.

Our Constitution fails to protect property rights. The Canadian Bill of Rights, which affirms the right to property, fails to provide a method for compensation. We as a society are obliged to not only respect this right but to ensure that it is secure.

Security of this basic right is vital for a prosperous society. The right to property provides a sense of purpose and confidence. Protecting the ability to own what we make, work for or purchase is at the very heart of our market system. It drives the economy and helps it grow.

• (1805)

For those unable to hold intellectual properties such as patents and copyrights, owning a house, farm or piece of property allows and encourages individual Canadians to live their lives independent of the state.

Societies which deny this right do not prosper. They do not have the freedom to enjoy the fruits of their endeavours. Inevitably, as we have witnessed in the Soviet Union and other eastern bloc countries, if the state controls what should be owned, operated and enjoyed by the people the whole economic and political system will collapse. Citizens will fight to keep the right they entrust society to protect.

Therefore not only is its protection paramount but procedures for compensation and dispute settlement must be clear to Canadians for their innate sense of security to avoid financial ruin just to protect this right.

We must continue the traditional respect for these rights which Canada affirmed internationally when it signed the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948. It states that everyone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others and that no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of this property. But it does not go far enough. Other countries strongly protect the right to property, recognizing it is essential for a free and democratic society.

We are all aware of the fifth amendment of the United States Constitution which protects property, life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Nor can property be taken away without providing just compensation. The important point here is that the fifth amendment provides compensation should it be deemed in the public good to infringe or deny the right to property.

Italy, Germany, Denmark, Finland, Sweden and many other western democracies realized the need to compensate for property loss. The Canadian Bill of Rights affirms the right of the individual to the enjoyment of property and the right not to be deprived of it except through due process of law, yet there is no mention of just compensation.

The absence of procedures for settlement of disputes when the right to property is infringed upon renders this right meaningless. A right without means for compensation allows for that right to be removed, even through the due process of law, without any system to repay affected groups or individuals for the property loss.

At present my right, which existed long before the Constitutions which should protect it, must be defended in court at my cost as an individual. The burden of cost and proof should, in my view, rest on the level of government not on the individual property owner. It is only just that the society which has been charged with protecting this right must prove itself legitimate when it proposes to limit or deny this right.

Did you know, Mr. Speaker, that if I do not challenge the infringement of my right to property, if I do not have the financial wherewithal to take part in that legal process there is no guarantee that a government must compensate me fairly for my loss? This is a travesty and a mockery of a most sacred right.

I am certain that most Canadians would find it appalling that their right to property really holds no true strength. Without any dispute settlement or rules for compensation during an infringement of this right it is really nothing more than a motherhood statement protected at the whim of a particular government.

Those who are going to have the most difficulty defending this particular right, the individuals who do not have the capital to go to court, are the people who are going to be most affected by this type of legislation if we do not make these changes properly and do it now.

• (1810)

This came up most recently in my riding over a landfill issue where the provincial government quite frankly is making a land grab to build a huge mega-dump to service the needs of metropolitan Toronto. It has set the rules for compensation. It has set the guidelines. It has said to the people: "Here is how we are going to do it. Here is how we are going to make the compensation and you are going to have to live with it because we are the government and we have set up this process. We have set up this group called the IWA and it is going to set the rules for compensation".

Are those rules going to be fair? I talked to the farmers who are involved and they are not very happy with the rules that have been brought down by this particular government.

On the other hand, they are not going to be satisfied. We are suggesting that they have a right to own this property, but they are going to have to mortgage their farms and their families' future simply to hire lawyers to take on the provincial government in this particular case. That does not make a lot of sense to me if we accept that individuals have the right to own their properties.

On the other side of my riding in New Tecumseh we have a similar situation as it relates to a hydro corridor. Again the people who are going to be affected are going to have to go to court to get fair and proper compensation and they are going to have to pay the bill. They are going to have to mortgage their lands and properties. That does not make much sense to me. That is their right. They have worked for that land. I do not think we should be taking it away from them without giving them proper compensation.

It is not just the provincial Government of Ontario. A few years ago the federal government confiscated 25 per cent of the land assets north of the 60th parallel. There are probably some members in this House who remember that. It handed it all over to the state-run Petro-Canada company at that time. There was no compensation offered or given.

Guaranteeing compensation gives the citizens the bargaining power against arbitrary laws that may deny their property rights. I think there would be a totally different situation in my riding and other ridings affected right now if the government of the day knew that an individual who was going to be affected would have the right to go to the Supreme Court and get fair compensation.

It is clear that no right, including the right to property, has absolute priority over all other rights at all times. I am not suggesting that for a moment. It is important in light of this to ensure that any infringement on property rights is not arbitrary.

When the government has proved to the court that a law infringing on my right to enjoy property is legitimate, then I must be allowed to apply for compensation to the Federal Court so I can replace, at least to some degree, the loss of this right.

These amendments to the Canadian Bill of Rights will provide a mechanism for Canadians to apply for compensation to the Federal Court if their property rights have been infringed upon or denied. This is something that is not offered to Canadians now.

Section 122 relieves the individual of financial burden and the personal hardship that may occur when attempting to prove a law infringes on their right to enjoy property. The new sections that I have proposed to the Canadian Bill of Rights recognize the most basic principle of property rights. The right belongs to each individual citizen of Canada. It is theirs inherently. No further claim to it needs to be made.

Canadians should therefore not be placed in a position of having to defend this right from attack. It is the government who must be responsible for proving its law does not infringe on a property right or that the legislation is a reasonable limit upon personal rights and freedoms justifiable in a free and democratic society.

By providing specific procedures for compensation and requiring governments to prove a law does not infringe or deny a right to enjoy property, a proper balance is reached between the property rights of the individual and the legitimate needs of the state.

• (1815)

Any arbitrary nationalization or expropriation of property by the government would be deterred. Any unilateral decision would have to be justified, not by the individual as is presently the law but by the government wishing to expropriate and infringe upon those rights.

I will just conclude by saying that Canadians' rights must be more properly protected from the imposition and unilateral authority imposed by a government maybe to meet a political agenda or a political position without due regard or fairness for the individual affected.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak generally in favour of what we are dealing with today.

Back in 1215 when you and I were just boys, Mr. Speaker, a group of English barons got together and presented King John with a list of demands. It was the Magna Charta, one of the most important constitutional documents in the British Isles.

Chapter 19 of the Magna Charta stated that no man or woman of course shall be deprived of their property except by the legal judgment of their peers or the law of the land. That was the first historic statement of property rights and the right to due process. It is part of the common law of Canada today.

The common law can, however, be superseded by a statute at any time. For example, the government of the relevant jurisdiction could pass a law requiring that all houses over 100 years old be surrendered to the state and no compensation be paid. If you owned one of those houses you would have no recourse under the Magna Charta.

Property rights are protected in the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights. However, that Bill of Rights applies in theory only to federal statutes and has to my knowledge been applied in very few cases, most notably that of Regina v. Drybones. Areas within provincial jurisdiction such as property and civil rights are clearly not protected.

There is a rule of statutory interpretation which says that when property is taken under statute, the statute in issue is to be read as implicitly requiring that compensation be paid to the private owner. This is only a rule of statutory interpretation. Any valid statute can expressly say that no compensation is payable when property is taken. The situation was eloquently stated by Justice Riddell of the Ontario Court of Appeal in a 1909 decision: "The prohibition, thou shalt not steal, has no legal force upon the sovereign body".

Our Charter of Rights and Freedoms which is the fundamental expression of Canadian law guarantees the right of everyone to life, liberty and the security of the person. The charter does not contain the right to hold property. The contemporary version of our fundamental law lacks the provision which free men and women have considered of primary importance since time immemorial.

The admission of the right to enjoy property means that there is no guarantee of compensation if property is taken by the government, no guarantee of due process or fundamental justice and no guarantee of fair treatment by the officials with power over the economic interests of individuals or corporations.

While the right to property is expressed in various other places in our law, it is nowhere to be found in the Constitution. Section 26 of the charter recognizes that there may be rights other than those articulated in it. However, if a right is not in the charter not only does it not have the same force and legitimacy as say, the right to life, liberty and security of the person, but someone who feels wronged cannot use the enforcement section of the charter which says that laws inconsistent with it are of no force or effect.

I believe we should entrench the right to property in our Constitution. I would refer anybody who is interested to the excellent and sound brief prepared by the Canadian Real Estate Association in preparation for the renewed Canada. It was heard in November and December 1991.

The right to hold and enjoy property provides one of the checks against undue concentration of power in government at any level. When the Americans drew up their constitution, the right of every individual to acquire and enjoy property was included. It was felt that this would give the ordinary citizen both the independence and responsibility necessary to the success of government of, by and for the people.

One way to demonstrate the significance of the right to enjoy property is to compare countries in which it does exist to those in which it does not exist and is considered to be anathema to the prevailing political philosophy.

• (1820)

In countries where such rights are weak or non-existent, the arbitrary power and special privileges of the elite increase and the power of the common man and woman is diminished.

Without the protection of due process, the ordinary citizen is powerless in the face of the state that exists only to perpetuate and strengthen itself and/or its elites. For example, in the former Soviet Union the individual could never say to the state or its officers: "This is mine, you cannot take it away from me". Due process and fundamental justice are but dreams to residents of the former Soviet Union.

Even in countries where the right to hold property is well accepted and understood there are of course limits on that right. Sometimes the needs of society as a whole prevail over the needs of one individual. Even if it is necessary for an individual to surrender property under the charter, that property could not be taken except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

Section 7 of the charter, where the right to property should be included, makes that requirement. Furthermore, all statutes must be measured against section 1 of the charter which recognizes only those limits on the rights guaranteed in the charter as are demonstrably justified in a free democratic society. It is the courts that decide the balance between the private and public rights.

It is important to have a check on unlimited property rights if only because so many things can be included in the concept of "property". Property can be said to include not only land and real estate but also the fruits of one's labour, financial return, saving investments, tools of one's land, and the facilities to make these possible. There are cases in the United States where property has been held to include government benefits.

One expressed concern is that the entrenchment of property rights in the charter would undermine matrimonial property legislation providing for the division of family assets and marriage breakdown. For the most part of course it is women who struggled hard to have this type of legislation enacted, particularly that which recognizes the economic contribution of the homemaker to the family.

I believe it is in response to the inevitable challenges of division of property legislation that section 1 will come into play.

There is a firm commitment in the courts and legislatures of this country, thank goodness, to the equitable division of property in the breaking up of marriage. To use the United States as an example once more, in that country their constitution has not precluded their assemblies from enacting legislation empowering the courts to divide and compel transfer of assets on the dissolution of marriage.

That authority is considered part of the state's concern for the protection of its citizens because family assets are only divided after a full judicial hearing, that is if the parties cannot agree to what the division should be. There is a full compliance with the due process provision of the American Constitution.

I believe our courts would consider matrimonial property legislation to be a reasonable limit demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

It is vital to the health of our country in my view that the right to enjoy property be entrenched in the Constitution. What is needed is an amendment to our Constitution. As we know, the amending formula requires the House of Commons and the Senate to approve an amendment plus the legislatures of seven provinces consisting of at least 50 per cent of Canada's population. This means that at least either Quebec or Ontario must approve such an amendment as we are talking about today as well as six other provinces.

As of several years ago, only B.C. and New Brunswick had expressed a firm commitment to the entrenchment of property rights. But I would remind members that the present Prime Minister in a letter to David Humphreys of the Canadian Real Estate Association stated: "I want to assure Canadians of my government's full support for the inclusion of property rights as an item for discussion at the next round of constitutional discussion with the provinces".

Finally, and this is where all of us come in, the legislatures must all become convinced that the Canadian people want property rights reasonably protected in the Constitution. Without a push from Canadians generally, this issue can never really go anywhere beyond the talk we are having here today.

If we believe in it we should talk to MPs, MLAs, MPPs or MNAs. We should convince them of a need for action along the lines of the motion we are discussing today. I would salute again the member for bringing this matter before Parliament.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in the debate tonight on the motion of the hon. member for York—Simcoe, Bill C-395, an act to amend the Canadian Bill of Rights (right to property).

I want to say at the outset that I do not support the bill and I will outline those reasons in a moment. I think it is important. I apologize in advance if I did not quite catch all the member's speech. I do not think that he read into the record the elements of the motion. People who are reading the transcript of this or watching either now or on the repeats would like to know exactly what it is we are debating. It reads:

• (1825)

> Whereas a garbage dump imposed upon a community by government to resolve another city's problem will negatively affect the right of citizens to enjoy their property and farm their land;
>
> Whereas the right of property is the foundation of society;
>
> Whereas its protection is one of the obligations of government and its security is necessary for the existence of civil liberty and free institutions;
> And whereas a law is considered a deprivation of the right of property if it deprives owners of one of the essential attributes of property, destroys or impairs its value, restricts or interrupts its common, necessary or profitable use, hampers owners in the application of it to the purpose of trade or imposes conditions upon the right to hold or use it and thereby seriously impairs its value;

The bill goes on to detail it, but that is sort of the raison d'être the member has offered. I can understand from previous comments he has made in the House his concern over the possibility of a garbage dump being located within his constituency as a result of a due process that has been entered into by the Government of Ontario. I can understand his concern. It is fair enough. I do not dispute that.

However, to suggest that a solution is to place in the Bill of Rights a right to property that will in effect make permanent the old belief about a man's home being his castle, that he can do whatever he bloody well pleases within his boundaries, I do not think is acceptable. I can cite a number of occasions where there are real valid reasons why individuals should not be able to do what they feel is appropriate on their property.

I will give an example. In a flood plain, a watercourse is coming through your four or five acre parcel of land and you decide to fill it in. It is your right under this bill. So what if it blocks the flow of water, so what if it disrupts the flood plain and the management of that by the conservation authority creating flooding on your neighbour's property down the road or downstream? Another example is the right to burn leaves on your property. It is your leaves, your property, your matches. That is the ultimate result of a resolution like this one.

Had the member come forward with a bill to change the Bill of Rights to say that every Canadian has a right to a job, that every Canadian has a right to be able to afford to own his or her own home and that every Canadian has a right to education, those would have been highly appropriate goals and highly appropriate things to place in a bill of rights. However, to say that a man's home is his castle and he has the right to do whatever he pleases is not acceptable.

It is also erroneous to suggest there are no protections for individuals who, I guess in the legal sense, have the right of fee simple to occupy land. There are protections. I have gone to bat for people who have had land expropriated by the province of Ontario for public purposes such as the expansion of a highway.

The process is twofold. One is whether or not they need the land and they, the public authority, have to prove they need the land. Second is the question of fair value. There are processes built in, at least in the province of Ontario—and I cannot speak for any other provinces—that when land is expropriated and if you can prove in terms of market value what other properties in the general area have gone for, you will get that fair amount. You will not necessarily get what you think it is worth, but you will get what the benchmark says it is worth, what other properties have sold for at that point in time. So there is a process out there.

We also have to recognize that governments, regardless of stripe, have not gone on a wholesale expropriation of land anywhere in the country. There are probably two exceptions: one was the decision to create the Pickering airport and the land grab there. There is no question that it was an abuse of the powers of the federal government to take action like that and not follow through, displacing the farm community and creating a real dislocation of a lot of people. That was a misuse of power, there is no question about it. I do not think this kind of amendment would in any way change that from occurring.

As for the other one, this member's government is currently doing it. It is called vesting at Canadian airports. I wonder if the member is aware that the Department of Transport, on the instructions of Treasury Board, has applied the policy of vesting so that any tenant on federal airport land, meaning somebody who has a building or has improvements, is required to give up that building at the end of their lease with no compensation whatsoever and no due process. They can extend their life there if they reinvest in it. I am overly simplifying the process but that exists today. Treasury Board has been unwilling to move beyond that policy. It has been a bit flexible, in terms of transport, of working through the rules so that it is less onerous but it still comes down to expropriation without compensation.

There is an area in which the member can do some good work to try to bring some justice to that. We do not need a hard and fast rule in the Canadian Bill of Rights that says property cannot be touched. We have to recognize that there are times when the public good is paramount, whether it is with regard to environmental laws, labour laws or just social justice.

In the preamble of the bill it says:

> —a law is considered a deprivation of the right of property if it deprives owners of one of the essential attributes of property, destroys or impairs its value, restricts or interrupts its common, necessary or profitable use, hampers owners in the application of if it to the purpose of trade—

I might want to turn my lot into an automobile junk yard. Under this bill, any rules that prevent me from doing so would be a restriction on the profitability I could make from the land, a restriction on trade. Conversely, we have seen this NIMBY approach, not in my backyard, in community after community.

After years we recognized that putting people with special needs in large institutions did not work. As we evolved from large group homes in isolated areas of our community to smaller group homes that were integrated within our community we have heard people in neighbourhood after neighbourhood say: "Not in my backyard, not in my neighbourhood; we do not want those people with special needs; it will lower our property values; it will make our ability to turn a profit on this piece of land and house impossible". That is why I cannot support a bill like this. The ramifications go way beyond anything that I think this member was anticipating when he put forward this bill. There is no way in good conscience that I could provide the Bill of Rights with that kind of power.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. James): There being no further members rising for debate, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being 6:34 p.m., the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I think that you will find consent for the following motion:

[English]

That notwithstanding any Standing Order, at the completion of the debate on second reading of Bill C-117, but no later than 3 p.m. today, the Speaker shall put all questions necessary to dispose of the remaining stages of Bill C-117, including Committee of the Whole, without further debate or amendment, to complete consideration of this bill today provided that if a recorded division is requested, it shall stand deferred until Monday, May 3, 1993 at 6 p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), at which time the remaining proceedings on the bill shall be completed.

That, one additional opposition day shall be allotted for the Business of Supply for the period ending June 23, 1993.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, in a spirit of co-operation and for the sake of the smooth operation of this place we give our consent to this motion.

[English]

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, in trying to put it more eloquently than the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, we agree.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I understand there is unanimous consent for the motion.

Motion agreed to.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1993-94

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Friday, March 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-117, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1993, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I want to use the remaining minutes I have in this debate in a general way to talk about my home province, Saskatchewan.

• (1010)

The New Democratic Party is often getting hit with the label of not knowing how to manage an economy; that it cannot take care of business. In fact I remember back in 1982 when there was the Allan Blakeney New Democratic government in Saskatchewan. At that time the Tory leader, Grant Devine, said that we could afford to totally mismanage Saskatchewan and still break even.

After 10 years we find that the province is some $15 billion in the hole with something like 400,000 taxpayers. It is a monumental problem. This is by a Tory government that knows how to manage an economy. It has put Saskatchewan so far in the hole that it is going to take many decades for us to recover. It has been left to a New Democratic government to correct that error.

I think that the people of Saskatchewan, if you look at the history, are in good hands. I believe it was Diane Francis or one of the right wing columnists who wrote that back in 1981 the Allan Blakeney government was the best-managed government not just in Canada but in North America. That was from a right wing journalist. The record shows that.

Back in 1944 when Tommy Douglas took over Saskatchewan, the province could not borrow money. Tommy Douglas came in and built Saskatchewan to where we were in 1982. Talking about fiscal responsibility, Tommy Douglas wanted to introduce medicare but waited some 17 years until the province could afford to do it. In those days the province did it on its own but it was not done until it could afford to do it.

The New Democratic governments in Saskatchewan certainly come from a background of being sound managers of the economy, very conscious of the economy. It actually galls me that people on the other side of the House and elsewhere say that New Democrats cannot manage an economy.

The Romanow government, faced with a huge debt which makes the national debt pale in comparison on a per capita basis, came in with a budget. In the last year of the Devine regime there was something like a $1 billion deficit. In the first year the Romanow government cut that deficit in half to $500 million. It is cutting the deficit in half this year to $300 million. It will have a balanced budget within three years.

That is already a better record than the federal Tory government has had. I have been in the House for the last five years. Every year I hear the same budget speech that this year our deficit is $32 billion, $34 billion, or $35 billion but next year it is going to be $29 billion and the year after it is going to be $15 billion. I think it was the former Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre, who said three or four years ago in the House that this year we were going to have a deficit of $8 billion. What do we have? We have what I believe is the largest deficit in the history of the country, $35.5 billion.

Mr. McDermid: Check back to 1984. It's not the largest.

Mr. Laporte: It was not $35.5 billion? The minister announced $35.5 billion. The $35.5 billion deficit, whether it is the largest or the second largest, is not something to be proud of.

Saskatchewan has a government that is cutting the debt not on the backs of ordinary Canadians but with a mind to keeping existing social programs. It is cutting that deficit with a view to causing the least harm to those who can least afford to have harm inflicted upon them.

The approach taken by the Saskatchewan government is different from the one this government has taken. This government has used blackmail. It has used blackmail in the area of the Western Grain Transportation Act, the Crow benefit. What has it done? In 1983 the Liberals took away the Crow rate and put in the Crow benefit. That payment was going to be in perpetuity. To me, perpetuity means a long time and not 10 years.

• (1015)

Last December we lost 10 per cent of the Crow benefit for two years. This year in the budget the finance minister said that we are going to take away in two years 15 per cent of the Crow benefit and after that we are going to take away 20 per cent of the Crow benefit and it is going to remain that way.

However, and this is where the blackmail comes in, the finance minister said if they agree to pay the producer the government will give them back that 10 per cent. That is negotiating with a gun to one's head. The Crow benefit and the Canadian Wheat Board are two of the most fundamental mainstays of agriculture in western Canada today, and this government is tearing them apart.

At the agriculture committee yesterday we were discussing the removal of barley from the Canadian Wheat Board under a continental market dual system. Government members refused to allow representatives of the Canadian Wheat Board to appear in front of the committee. I cannot believe it. They were scheduled to appear, they were on the list but the government said no.

If we were going to dismantle Air Canada we would surely have the chairman of Air Canada in front of the appropriate committee, but the government said no to the Canadian Wheat Board.

What is even more outrageous is that the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board is not going to be allowed to appear in front of the committee either. The advisory committee is a committee made up of farmers who are elected by farmers to advise the Canadian Wheat Board. It is the only elected body in the country that represents farmers with respect to Canadian Wheat Board issues. It is being denied access to appear before the committee.

We are going to have one more committee meeting on this issue. Who are we going to have? They took away the Canadian Wheat Board and they are going to bring in UGG, United Grain Growers. This is a company that agrees whole-heartedly with the government's position.

Who else have we had in front of the committee? We had the Western Barley Growers Association. It is an association that has 214 members and receives 90 per cent of its funding from the government. That is a really unbiased group to bring before the committee. At the same time we are disallowing the Canadian Wheat Board and the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board from appearing before us.

The other thing on this issue is that there have been a number of studies come out but the government has ignored them except for the ones that agree with its position. This is the kind of government that has been inflicted upon us in this country.

If that is called co-operation, if that is called trying to find a consensus, then it is looking at a different dictionary than I look at because nothing is further from the truth. They are heavy-handed tactics.

They are exactly what the finance minister used in his budget address a few days ago by telling people in western Canada that they are going to lose 10 per cent of their Crow benefit, that $72 million is going to be gone unless they do things the government's way, unless they play ball with it.

That is not going to go down very well in Saskatchewan. I can tell the government right now it is going to have an issue on its hands, certainly in the province of Saskatchewan, because I do not think the producers of Saskatchewan are going to buy that.

There was a poll commissioned by the Government of Saskatchewan that showed 88 per cent of the producers in Saskatchewan want to at least have a vote. That has been our position.

Talk about openness, talk about a consensus. Surely to goodness allowing the producers, the members of the Canadian Wheat Board, to have a vote on what should happen to their Wheat Board is only fair.

It is unbelievable that a government can talk about consensus and openness and at the same time come down with the heavy fist and iron glove on the people in the prairies. That is exactly what this government is doing.

The government side is saying we are having a plebiscite because the producer will decide whether he wants to deliver to the Canadian Wheat Board or to the open market.

• (1020)

That is nonsense. What we have under the Canadian Wheat Board is a pooling system so that when people deliver to the Wheat Board they get the average price that was received by the Canadian Wheat Board during the whole year. Studies done in areas where they tried dual marketing systems show that the pooling system will fade away, it will fail. That is because during times when prices are higher, if the spot price is higher in the U.S., the Canadian Wheat Board will not receive any grain. If the price is low the grain will come to the Canadian Wheat Board. The only time the Wheat Board will have grain is when the price is very low.

To say that is a plebiscite is nonsense. The other factor is that in the government's so-called thorough study of this issue it has not done any study of the effects of the Canadian Wheat Board in a dual marketing system and the impact on the Canadian Wheat Board. That has not been studied.

The same holds true for the Western Grain Transportation Act. For the finance minister to stand up in this House and blackmail producers in western Canada is outrageous.

The other point is that the grain transportation system in this country is responsible for thousands of jobs, probably tens of thousands of jobs, and hundreds of millions of dollars to the Canadian economy. If we do not produce a strong Canadian transportation system we are going to lose those jobs in the ports and rail crews and in rural Saskatchewan.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to my hon. friend pontificate on the wonderful job the Saskatchewan government has done in cutting spending. I would like to ask him a question directly. Since he is so impressed with the spending cuts of the Saskatchewan government, including closing hospitals and so on, doing what it feels must be done, why have he and his party voted against every single spending cut proposed by the federal government in trying to get its deficit under control?

Mr. Laporte: Madam Speaker, the answer lies in the way that governments are cutting. It is true that these days as a social democratic party it is very difficult to implement many of the things that we as social democrats would like to see implemented and maintained. It has been very difficult. Certainly when the government in Saskatchewan is having to cut back in the areas of social welfare, health care and so on it is hard to do. However that is the reality we face.

The minister will know better than I that there is a big difference between a province managing its economy and the federal government doing so. The federal government has many more economic levers than a provincial government. The interest rate is controlled by the federal government. There are a number of levers the federal government has at its disposal which a provincial government does not.

The Saskatchewan government and many other provincial governments find themselves on a precipice. We have had transfer payments to the provinces cut back at an unprecedented rate. Thank goodness there were no transfer cuts this time. That is very much appreciated. However the minister will know that Saskatchewan does not have the economic levers the federal government does. We also do not have the room to manoeuvre in Saskatchewan that this government does. We have something like a $15 billion debt. We have interest rates in Saskatchewan of over $800 million a year and there are something like 400,000 taxpayers. The province only has 950,000 people in it.

It is a very tight situation. What the finance minister, Janice MacKinnon, has done in Saskatchewan, and I know the minister agrees, is to say that if we do not make cuts now we are going to lose our social programs. It is also true on the federal side. We have to get the deficit down federally. This government has been tinkering at the edges. We have had a deficit of over $30 billion every year since this government has been in place. I agree we have to make cuts. We have to lower the deficit, but we have to do it in a way that will benefit all of us and not hurt those who can least afford it.

• (1025)

That is the attitude the Saskatchewan government is taking. That is the attitude this government should be taking. There are other areas where this government could be cutting: the $6 billion helicopter purchase that will take place.

Mr. McDermid: Is it $6 billion? It keeps going up.

Mr. Laporte: I believe with inflation it is going to be $6 billion or $5.8 billion. The government is saying that it can either repair the helicopters or buy new ones. It has that choice. The government is buying 50 helicopters. It is not saying that it could buy those helicopters without the anti-submarine equipment on them. I do not know the exact figures but that alone would save billions of dollars. Some 35 of those helicopters are going to be able to chase submarines attacking this continent. The old Soviet subs are rusting in port. It should send over a tourist to take a photograph of them so that it would know where they all are instead of spending that kind of money on anti-submarine equipment.

That is an area where the government could cut. That is an area where it would get support from this caucus. If it came in with a plan showing that it would keep helicopters for search and rescue, that would be great. However I do not think we need the extra equipment, the sophisticate computers and so on that are designed to attack submarines. There is a whole host of added equipment on them. I have seen the figures. I forget exactly what they are but the cost of the helicopters could be cut considerably. If something like that was brought in the government would certainly get the support of this caucus and of this member.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I would love to get into a debate on the helicopter situation with my friend. We are talking of an expenditure over 13 years. We are talking about job creation in Canada in a high-tech industry.

That particular party, the New Democratic Party, wants us to take money and throw it at short-term jobs, at three-month and six-month make work projects, not the meaningful employment, not the high-tech employment the helicopter purchase will provide. That has to be taken into consideration. If we cut there then the member can tell the aeronautic workers who are union members.

I believe their leadership supports his party. I do not believe the workers do but the leadership does. He can tell them that this is going to be cancelled and we will not have these helicopters. He can tell fishermen that we will not have helicopters that are able to go out in storms when they are needed out there. The helicopters we now have cannot do that. The new helicopters will have a longer flying time: five hours compared to three hours now. They can fly in all kinds of weather. He can tell them that the sophisticated tracking equipment will not be put on them so they can find lost fishermen or people in trouble off our coast. He should tell them all these things and then we will see where the New Democratic Party stands.

Right now its members are saying: spend here, spend here and spend here on short-term work; not meaningful jobs, not full-time jobs, but in fact make work projects. At the same time they want us to cancel a project that will provide 48,000 person-years of work in the high-tech industry.

Mr. Laporte: Madam Speaker, the minister has skewed my remarks. I have said very clearly we need a search and rescue factor in our armed forces. That is for sure. I have not denied that.

I am talking about the anti-submarine equipment. I do not think we need that unless we plan to shoot down American fishing boats. I do not think it is required.

The minister asks who is going to protect fishermen. There will be no fishermen out there because this government has allowed the fish to be removed from the sea. Newfoundland has 5 per cent of the fish it used to have. The cod fishery has been destroyed by this government, a government that is supposed to manage the economy.

Since being elected I have received representations from the maritimes, from Newfoundland, saying that the way they are fishing will destroy the fishery. That is a fact.

• (1030)

Mr. McDermid: Here is one of the prairie boys from Saskatchewan who thinks he knows all about fishing.

Mr. Laporte: I do not know an awful lot about fishing but I have had my ears opened since I have been here. The fishermen have been telling this government that it is going to destroy the fishery. By God, it has destroyed the fishery. That came true. We do not need helicopters off the coast of Newfoundland to protect fishermen because the government has already solved that problem. No fishermen will be fishing out there because there is nothing to fish, unless they want to sightsee and maybe look at the icebergs.

That is what this government has done. That is called economic management by the Tory government.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak briefly on the responsible and far-sighted budget tabled this past Monday by the hon. Minister of Finance. Regardless of what those on the opposition benches say or would have the Canadian people believe, this budget aims to build on efforts outlined in the 1992 budget and the December 1992 economic statement. In the case of all three the objective is to position the Canadian economy for more growth in job creation by steadily reducing the burden of deficits and debt.

Since the budget was tabled many media critics have gone into high gear, producing a stream of so-called in-depth analyses of why the budget has failed the Canadian people. I figure this is fair game, for that is how the scribes earn their living.

However I find it galling to hear criticisms from the back benches of the Liberal Party. To me those in the Liberal caucus are unwittingly admitting that their memories are as lacking in substance as their alternative economic policies for dealing with Canada's fiscal problems.

To refresh those blocked memories let me say that it was the shortsighted, irresponsible policies of successive Liberal governments from 1968 to 1984 that provided fuel for the present fiscal crisis which threatens to burn away Canada's tomorrows.

Beyond a doubt it has not been an easy road for our government to travel in an effort to grapple with an inherited deficit that stood at more than $38 billion in 1984, the year we took office. Dealing with the problem has been far more difficult and complex than any of us could have imagined.

Many Canadians have not been particularly receptive to the brand of medicine we have been prescribing since 1984. However we have persevered and taken the slings and arrows of adverse public opinion in stride.

I believe some comparisons or results speak well of our approach to date. For example, during the recession of 1981–82 under a Liberal government the national debt increased by a phenomenal 160 per cent. During the recession we are now coming out of, the debt increased by only 19 per cent under our government.

In 1984 the deficit was 8 per cent of our Gross Domestic Product. Today the deficit has been cut to 4 per cent of the GDP. The increase in the national debt presently is not because of unbridled spending but rather the result of a significant decrease in federal revenues due to the recession.

When the election is called later this year and the people of Canada have the opportunity to really consider our medicine and compare it to the voodoo remedies of the opposition, I am confident they will make the right choice.

• (1035)

Let us face facts. There is no magic elixir. The debt crisis did not happen overnight and it most certainly will not be solved overnight. The reality of the situation is that there is no quick fix and there is certainly no magician who can wave a wand and proclaim, presto the debt is gone.

Although I admit the budget was not warmly received initially by the international economic community, the budget lays a solid base for a Canadian solution to a Canadian problem. Some of the high priced experts criticizing the budget were advocating an increase of 2 per cent in the GST and raising other federal taxes.

Yes, Canadians want to see an end to the deficit but they want to see it achieved through spending cuts and not higher taxes. We acceded to the wishes of the Canadian people and there are no new taxes or tax increases in this budget.

The budget cuts more than $30 billion from federal spending over the next five years. It builds upon the restraint measures introduced in the December 1992 economic statement. These measures will yield savings of $3.8 billion in 1993–94, rising to $7.9 billion in 1997–98 for a total savings of $30.7 billion.

These measures will also see the number of jobs in the federal Public Service reduced by 16,500 over five years. With further cuts in the federal departmental operating budgets, together with the December economic statement wage freeze, the total savings over five years in this area alone will be $7.5 billion. By holding defence spending to zero real growth starting in 1994–95 combined with the 1992 restraint measures there will be a total savings of $5.9 billion over the next five years.

These measures are only the tip of the iceberg as far as the significant savings this budget will see accumulated over the next five years. This budget will see the deficit reduced to $32 billion this year, which is the target set out in December despite lower than expected revenues. It also aims to end new borrowing and begins the process of reducing publicly–held debt over five years.

Drastic cuts in spending are not the only budget measures. Building on the streamlining actions contained in the 1992 budget, 12 federal organizations will be eliminated, merged or restructured. For example the taxation and customs and excise departments will be amalgamated. In addition our government will be pursuing the privatization and commercialisation of a number of federal organizations and services to reduce the over–all size of government while improving the delivery of services.

There are areas left untouched by the budget. Although this is a tough budget it is also a fair one. Two major areas of public policy are exempt from the budgetary measures. Benefits for the elderly and veterans are again excluded from spending cuts. So are programs specifically geared to the disabled, certain native programs, the Canadian Jobs Strategy and famine relief.

• (1040)

In recognition of Canada's common fiscal problems, no additional restraint is being imposed on major federal transfers to the provinces. These will grow by almost 4 per cent a year, more than twice the rate of other federal program spending.

While we are speaking of the provinces, if it has not been abundantly clear in the past it certainly is now that the deficit and the debt are not the federal government's problems alone. All governments share responsibility for their creation and an equal responsibility for their reduction and eventual elimination. Frankly, the taxpayers of Canada want all governments to work together to find solutions to the national debt problem. That is why I believe the most important aspect of the budget was the invitation extended by the Minister of Finance to all provincial and territorial finance ministers to attend a special meeting on May 30 and May 31 in Ottawa to begin the process of developing practical, co-operative solutions to our common fiscal problems.

I believe the planned meeting at the end of May is a significant step in the right direction. The federal government can slash spending from now until the cows come home, but unless all legislative jurisdictions in Canada pull together this problem will not be solved. Something concrete must be done to reduce the debt so succeeding generations will not continue to have a mortgage hanging over their futures. I do not believe for one moment that anyone wants to leave behind such a dismal legacy.

In conclusion, there are many who believe our government did not go far enough with the measures outlined in the budget. I disagree. To my way of thinking the budget provides a realistic approach to Canada's current fiscal problems, although the approach is gradual rather than radical. I believe it is both sensible and responsible. Yes, we could have made immediate cuts instead of phasing them in over five years and we could have raised taxes. However, in light of the fact that our economy is still recovering from one of the deepest recessions in recent memory the medicine is strong enough to do the job without killing off the patient.

The bottom line is simple and clear. Governments do not create jobs or enhance economic performance; the private sector does. I believe that the budget builds on the 1992 budget and the December economic statement by realistically attacking the number one dampener of economic activity, the deficit. In the final analysis less borrowing, lower interest rates and lower taxes are the best possible ways to stimulate economic activity and job creation at this time.

The previous speaker mentioned that one of the all-important reasons for our present financial situation is the proposed acquisition of the new helicopter program, the EH-101. I am aware that a great many in the opposition are giving the impression, probably not saying it so specifically, that the Government of Canada will be writing a cheque this year for $4.8 billion for the helicopter program. I happen to be a member of the Standing Committee on National Defence.

• (1045)

We had a very interesting and important meeting yesterday with the senior officials, the deputy minister and Admiral John Anderson, the chief of staff. I had the opportunity to question officials about this and of course listen to questions from my colleagues on the opposite side. In my remarks I stated that where we fell down badly was in getting the message across to the Canadian people. Even one of my distinguished colleagues on the Liberal side agreed with that.

The EH-101 program will do a job that is necessary. Sure there are no submarines lurking in our waters at the present time. I believe there are about 800 submarines owned by all the countries in the world. We know they are not a danger at the present time. It has not been emphasized enough that the EH-101 is a much superior aircraft and one of its most important jobs will be search and rescue.

It was mentioned in news reports that the new frigates coming on stream are not built to take the new EH-101—there are three frigates in the water now and there will be 12 within a very few years—and this was denied in no uncertain terms. They are built for that. The chief of staff and one of the other officials did mention that three of the Tribal class destroyers were not built to accommodate these new helicopters. There will be modifications made on those three quite old destroyers.

There was quite an article in the Times Colonist paper of Thursday, April 22. This is some information I would like to read into the record:

> The mythical-cum-political version appears to have the following qualifications. Its selection was kept secret and was not debated until after the decision to buy it last summer.
>
> It is an attack helicopter. Its sole purpose is to combat a non-existent cold war Soviet submarine threat.
>
> Its other capabilities are far beyond our needs. It is the world's most expensive helicopter and costs $80-$90 million a copy. The project cost ballooned from $4.4 billion total to $5.8 billion and is unaffordable.
> Moreover, Canadians will receive no significant benefits from this expenditure.

Listen to this:

> It is too large to operate from a ship or to be maintained on board. Its limited range and fierce downwash make it unsuitable for search and rescue.

I could go on and on and on. Yet in answer to those negative remarks let us look into this:

> Its selection in 1987 was highly publicized. In November 1990 the all-party Commons standing committee on national defence called the EH-101 the only contender for the Sea King replacement and recommended the replacement be done as soon as possible to avoid costly stopgap measures. It is a multi-role helicopter with three variants: naval, commercial heliliner and tactical/logistic transport.

• (1050)

The naval variant is designed for the surveillance and control operations against ships, submarines and aircraft and to provide early warning of anti-ship missiles or attacking aircraft. It also will enable its mother ship to conduct SAR, search and rescue, medical evacuation,evaluation, relief airlifts—

The EH-101 has the range, endurance, survivability and all-weather capabilities essential to cope with Canada's extremes of weather and large ocean areas of responsibility and to handle United Nations commitments in foreign seas.

Madam Speaker, I could go on but I just want to emphasize again that this new helicopter which will be purchased will be proven and will be accepted by the Canadian people. It is getting all the adverse publicity now because of a leadership convention which is taking place and also an election which may take place some time this year, if not a little later.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman two questions. I have had the opportunity to sit on the environment committee with this gentleman for a couple of years and I respect him deeply.

I have a private member's bill C-301 which is an amendment to the financial act that is before the committee at the present time before it goes to third reading. I do not know if he is familiar with it but it is a bill on government accountability. I think it is a good bill and knowing the member and his common sense I was wondering if he could give me his views on that bill to help out on such situations as the budget.

My second question concerns the EH-101 helicopter. A close friend of mine in the city of Chatham is a helicopter pilot and owner who was with the United States Air Force and also flew for Jacques Cousteau in South America. He stated just Tuesday evening that the Sea King can be refitted electronically to do everything the EH-101 will do. He explained that the EH-101 is only 20 miles an hour faster than the Sea King or the Bell helicopter. He said when you have a rocket coming at you at 700 miles an hour, 20 miles an hour means very little. It is the electronic system that is the important part of a helicopter. The frame can be replaced, the motor can be replaced, but the electronics is the most important part of a helicopter.

Now, we are getting 27 per cent of the work on this helicopter in Canada. Could we not get 100 per cent work in Canada by refitting our Sea Kings electronically?

I wonder if the hon. member would give his views on refitting our present helicopters as the United States has already done with theirs.

Mr. Dick: We have done ours twice already.

Mr. Crawford: Well, let us refit them again at a very minimal cost. You can refit them indefinitely.

Mr. Dick: No, you cannot; the frame will fall apart.

Mr. Crawford: Are you a pilot?

Mr. Dick: I happen to be the guy on the committee who chose them.

Mr. Crawford: Well, I think you made an awful mistake. But I am asking the hon. member over there for his view.

Mr. Darling: Madam Speaker, I have the greatest respect for my colleague and as he said we have both had the privilege of being vitally interested in the environment and sitting on the environment committee.

With respect to that private member's bill, I must admit I am not familiar with it. But let me tell you that I am in favour of anything that is going to make the government more accountable and I will say amen to that. With respect to the purchase of the EH-101 because of the expenditure to refit the Sea Kings, I am not sure what the Minister of Supply and Service said.

• (1055)

Mr. Crawford: Don't worry about him Stan, he doesn't matter a bit.

Mr. Darling: Well all right. In any event, I am aware that there has been retrofitting of these helicopters in the United States. However the aircraft that are being refitted in the United States are much younger than ours. Therefore, if we spend this money there is still a deadline of seven or eight years, and it would be an expenditure of $2.5 billion.

I think my colleague will agree that the majority of the Canadian people are against it. They are of the opinion that it may be the Minister of Supply and Services who will be writing the cheques and that the cheques will be written for $4.8 billion this year.

As I mentioned earlier in my remarks, when Admiral Anderson and his officials were before the Standing Committee on National Defence I brought up that very question. He pointed out to me that the EH-101 program this year will require a total expenditure of $200 million, rising gradually to a maximum of $700 million a few years from now and then reducing after that. In other words, there will not be a great savings this year whether the program is discontinued or not. Two hundred million dollars is not too much and that is what the program is costing Canadian taxpayers this year.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on Bill C-117 to authorize the government to borrow the huge amount of $31 billion.

The previous speaker mentioned the helicopters. Without getting into the specifics of this project, it should be noted that we are buying a Cadillac and at this rate we will not even be able to afford to put gas in it. That is where we are at. I think we should reconsider this deal.

The deal was approved in 1990 and my hon. colleague referred to the unanimous report from the Standing Committee on National Defence. But the global situation has changed considerably since then and I do not think we need helicopters powerful enough to chase nuclear submarines which are no longer in service, seeing that the nations whose nuclear submarines were threatening us no longer exist as such. So, we should reconsider this whole thing.

Moreover, with respect to the helicopters, when you talk about 45,000 jobs being created, all that is based on getting contracts from foreign countries. But we know that the economy is in a critical state not only in Canada but world-wide. The chances of getting foreign contracts are minimal. So, why take such a risk? Instead of investing $5.8 billion in a project which ultimately will not create that many jobs— actually few jobs will be created—the cost of this project is so high that we should really reconsider.

I notice that it is eleven o'clock, Madam Speaker. With your permission, I would like to conclude my comments on this bill after question period.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Very well. We will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

VOLUNTEER WORK

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Madam Speaker, last Thursday evening, I had the honour and the privilege to highlight the exceptional work done by 43 volunteers in my riding at a ceremony where they received the commemorative medal of the 125th anniversary of the Canadian Confederation.

The riding of Québec-Est is packed with exceptional people and it was very difficult indeed to make a choice.

I want to pay a special tribute to these people who have contributed to improving the well-being of the population while strengthening community spirit.

I applaud these people who have given freely of their time, talen and energy for the education and cultural development of our society.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, Monday's budget clearly proved that this government has no answer to the economic problems which have been with us for several years.

The deficit, unemployment, high and numerous taxes have hit Canadians hard, especially the middle class which pays more than its share of taxes in Canada.

They should have planned a complete overhaul of our tax system to ensure fairness for all Canadians without any special favours for the wealthy, as well as a national technical training service so that our young people can take up their rightful place in our society.

Canadians are looking for a government with unshakable political will, to deal with the crisis we are now facing.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, people in my riding want to see an end to the deficit. I recall the many times this was expressed to me over the past five years. They also want to see it achieved through spending cuts and not higher taxes. Although there are some who would like to see us spend more money on jobs, most agree that the government does not create jobs, the private sector does.

On behalf of my constituents in Wetaskiwin I ask all of our colleagues to commend the Minister of Finance for his persistent and consistent attack on the deficit. This budget cuts more than $30 billion over the next five years. It builds upon expenditure restraint measures introduced in the December 1992 economic statement. That will mean less borrowing, lower interest rates and lower taxes. My constituents agree that is the best way to stimulate economic activity and job creation.

I am particularly satisfied that the Minister of Finance has been able to begin national co-operation on all government debt. This is fundamental to ensuring continued economic recovery. We have to do it jointly with the provinces, and we encourage him and thank him for his continued efforts.

CORNWALL, ONTARIO

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, Monday's budget will do nothing to help bring about an economic recovery for the people of Cornwall. With unemployment at over 20 per cent and 37 per cent of the population relying upon some form of social assistance, Cornwall has received nothing from this budget to stimulate an economic recovery.

Since 1989 more than 20 factories and numerous businesses have ceased operations. In the last two and a half years 3,000 jobs have been lost through plant closures and lay-offs. This is the harsh reality of nine years of Conservative government. This is its economic legacy.

With 1.5 million Canadians out of work, the economic mismanagement of the government has exacted an enormous human deficit which rivals the country's financial deficit. Fortunately Canadians will soon have an opportunity to put this government out of business. This will be one closure that will offer hope to the people of Cornwall for a brighter future.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, the recent budget continues along the path of economic self-determination. Since my election the philosophy of this government has been to guide us gently back toward economic sanity after successive years of Liberal lavishness.

It would be heroic to be spenders. Spending more than the credit card allows, by the Liberals, robbed this past decade and maybe the next of this privilege.

Perhaps the best testimony for this budget has come from what we call an ordinary Canadian, my Ottawa landlady. A lifelong Liberal she concluded a discussion on the budget by pounding her fist on the kitchen table and saying it is a good budget. She said that we have the lowest interest rates in a lifetime and the lowest inflation in a lifetime. There are no new taxes, no tax increases and $30 billion in federal spending cuts.

The budget is everything we asked for. Compare that to what the now disappearing party has done to us. This is a good budget.

CHILD CARE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I had the opportunity to talk with a number of child care operators in my riding in Thompson, The Pas, and also with people from the Indian reserve in The Pas area.

They are very concerned about the fact that there is no national child care program. They are also concerned that the provincial government in Manitoba has cut the actual number of subsidized child care spots throughout the province. That means that women, quite often single parents, who need child care in order to take training to get off welfare and better themselves are not able to do so.

• (1105)

This government promised a child care program in 1984 and in 1988, but it is not following through. If we do not have a national child care program we only encourage more and more people to stay on welfare. That only increases the national deficit.

It is time for a national child care program to help those people who want to better themselves.

TRADE

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, in my opinion, Canadians should applaud this government's efforts to attract investment that generates jobs, whether we are talking about the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement or the North American free trade agreement.

A convincing example of what can be achieved was the announcement on March 1 this year that $160 million will be invested by a Spanish company, Petresa, in a petrochemical plant in Bécancour.

The plant will produce additives for biodegradable detergents that will be sold throughout North America. Five hundred workers will be involved in construction of the plant, while another 75 will be employed in the plant on a permanent basis. The plant will make Canada a net exporter of this type of "green" product.

According to the president of the Spanish company, now that the North American free trade agreement was signed, the location on the St. Lawrence in Quebec will be ideal for shipping their products in Canada and to the United States and Mexico. Now that is free trade!

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, section 35(1) of the Fisheries Act states:

S. O. 31

No person shall carry on any work or undertaking that results in the harmful alteration, disruption or destruction of fish habitat.

Section 35(2) allows a person to contravene this subsection.

I call on the minister of fisheries to put a hold on the leases given in the Annapolis Basin by the provincial minister of fisheries in light of the people in the area having so many questions. The municipality of Annapolis wants to see the scientific studies before aquaculture begins. More important, the traditional fishermen want to see and question the studies. They want to meet with the elusive provincial minister of fisheries to ask him why he allowed aquaculture in an area so highly utilized when there are so many other areas around the coast.

There are many unanswered questions. I call on the federal minister of fisheries to make public the studies that were made in order for him to go against subsection (1) of section 35.

ORGAN DONORS

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Madam Speaker, I would today like to call upon all members of this House, as well as all Canadians, to consider becoming an organ donor.

In Canada there are approximately 1,700 people waiting for an organ transplant at any one time. For some of these people a transplant will not come in time and they will die while waiting. Everyone has the potential to become an organ and tissue donor. The health of the donor, not the age, is the most important thing to consider.

Signing an organ donor card, whether separately or on the back of a driver's licence, is one way of indicating one's wishes to be an organ or tissue donor.

In closing, once again I ask all Canadians to consider becoming an organ or tissue donor. Let us all remember that if we are prepared to receive we must be prepared to give.

TREE SPIKING

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, two weeks ago, Paul Watson, who is the head of the Sea Shepherd Conservation Society, claimed his group had already spiked 20,000 trees in the Clayoquot Sound region of B.C. and intend to spike a lot more. As well, he said he intends to teach a course in tree spiking in Tofino, which is in that region, at the end of this month.

Hidden spikes hit by saws send shrapnel flying indiscriminately and can tear through metal roofs and bodies like a machine gun. Mainstream environmental groups, the forest industry and the provincial government have all condemned Watson's statement. These threats are serious. As of November 27 of last year more than 40 spiked trees were found in one site of the disputed area. As of this time only the province of B.C. has legislation specifically outlawing tree spiking.

It is reported that the federal justice department has been preparing related amendments to the Criminal Code and I urge the government to immediately introduce such amendments, possibly in line with my own Motion M-767. My message to the government is: Nail the spikers now and incarcerate those who deliberately threaten the lives of loggers and woodworkers.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, the 1993 budget is a mess. The Conservatives tell us that if they are re-elected they will add over $100 billion dollars to the debt. They also tell us that the deficit in the coming year will be $32.6 billion.

In reality the deficit would have been $33.25 billion but thanks to a shell game they managed to postpone $625 million in GST credit cheque refunds to low-income Canadians to next year's budget.

When the Tories talk about getting the country's finances back in order after nine years in government they really mean they are going to worsen the situation. When they talk about jobs they mean lay-offs.

What we need to get us out of this economic mess is a Liberal government that would not only look at the balance sheet but also give its attention to stimulating the economy and job creation.

DUTY FREE SHOPS

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, I rise today in support of the representations made by the Frontier Duty Free Association to the Ministers of Finance and National Revenue.

On behalf of the land border duty free shops, the association has sought an exemption from any possible potential reinstatement of the export tax on cigarettes.

Members of this House will know that no study has linked the sales by duty free shops to the tobacco smuggling problem. Departmental officials also have publicly acknowledged that these shops are not part of the problem.

In addition, to remove any doubt the duty free shops have worked co-operatively with our federal officials to ensure that they do not contribute to the tobacco smuggling problem.

Make no mistake about it. I continue to fully support our efforts to combat the problem of tobacco smuggling. However I would insist that the rather unique situation of these land border duty free shops, which employ over 700 Canadians, be given appropriate consideration.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to publicly deplore the actions of an extremist right wing organization, the Heritage Front, along with others that are spreading hate propaganda, anti-Semitism and white supremacy in our community. The people of this city do not support this type of action.

We must protect the cultural mosaic of Canada. Our community requires a proactive approach. I am calling on the government to amend the Criminal Code to ensure effective means are implemented to deter hate propaganda.

Furthermore, I am calling on the government to facilitate the establishment of a working group in order to examine ways to ensure that racist organizations do not continue to flourish in our community.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, the commanding officer of the Canadian Forces Marine Testing Range at Nanoose, B.C. recently announced that Canadian and U.S. Armed Forces have jointly committed to extending the agreement on the base for another 10 years. This fait accompli comes despite the fact that the base agreement does not even come up for renewal until 1996.

The base receives regular visits from nuclear powered and nuclear capable vessels. Documented accidents, including the disintegration of a Soviet nuclear submarine in Norwegian waters last fall, attest to the health and environment risks posed by these vessels.

There have been repeated calls for environmental impact studies to assess the dangers and for conversion of the base. A year ago the B.C. government declared the province a nuclear weapon free zone and earlier this month the city of Nanaimo voted to support conversion of the base to peacetime use.

The cold war is over yet the Canadian military has apparently entered into an agreement to continue cold war operations into the next century.

When is the minister of defence going to take command of the Canadian Armed Forces and follow Canadian priorities rather than—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but the hon. member's time is up.

CONSUMER CREDIT

Mr. Barry Moore (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle): Madam Speaker, this year the federal government is highlighting the importance of consumer credit during National Consumer Week in order that consumers can act with full knowledge when they use the credit options that are available to them.

It seems clear that marketplace conditions affecting the use of credit have undergone fundamental changes and that these conditions are likely to persist.

For example, while some types of consumer debts have declined from their recent peak level the use of consumer credit is still more common than it was a decade ago. Another change involves the misuse of credit, particularly credit cards.

To address this the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is communicating his concerns to the provinces and to credit grantors and asking them to provide their ideas on how problems of excessive indebtedness can be prevented and how the importance of the wise use of credit can be communicated effectively to consumers.

In addition to co-operative action with provincial governments and credit grantors, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will continue to make information on the wise use of credit available. This will help consumers better understand how to manage their credit responsibilities.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, perhaps there is a minister who could answer a question on transport today.

Yesterday Hollis Harris, president of Air Canada, announced that there were more job losses in the works at Air Canada. The deterioration of the airline industry in Canada is a symbol of the government's incompetence.

On the one hand, the Minister of National Defence does not believe there is enough traffic in the industry for two airline companies, as she stated recently on the program aujourd'hui dimanche. On the other hand, the Minister of Transport has said, and I quote: "It is in the best interests of consumers and the travelling public to have two airline companies".

What is the government's policy on the future of the airline industry in Canada? Does the government have any idea what it wants for the future of that important industry?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it must be Friday. We get this question every Friday and the answer remains the same whether the Minister of Transport replies or I reply.

The answer simply is of course that the government is very concerned about the state of the airline industry as we are about the state of the airline industry around the world. Obviously in a recession and as a result of the gulf war airline industries around the world are in a difficult situation.

We are awaiting results of the NTA review of the current application of Canadian for an arrangement with American airlines. The government has got itself out of the airline business. We are waiting for a private sector solution. We are encouraged that one will soon be found.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I do not think the parliamentary secretary heard the drift of the question which raised new information that has come out recently.

He knows very well that in light of the decision of the competition tribunal last week, Canadian Airlines International is struggling to survive by seeking the co-operation of its employees and, most important, its creditors.

In the midst of all this the Minister of National Defence, a senior minister in government, decides to announce her learned opinion that Canada does not have enough traffic for two airlines. What message is she seeking to send to the creditors of Canadian Airlines? Is it that it is time to smash and grab? What message does the government have for those creditors?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, as I said in my initial response, the position of the government has not changed in this regard at all.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): The position has not changed. It does not have one, Madam Speaker.

[Translation]

As I said before, Air Canada president Hollis Harris announced yesterday there would be another substantial loss of jobs at Air Canada. Meanwhile, the government is not charging Air Canada's competitors full landing fees and other taxes payable to the Government of Canada.

Why does the government maintain this double standard for air carriers? Why is the government just waiting for our airlines to go under?

[English]

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I think everyone in the House is aware of the difficult situation of Canadian Airlines and of all airlines in Canada at the present time. This kind of rhetoric does not help the situation at all.

We have been working very closely with all airlines in the country to ensure an ongoing competitive airline situation in Canada. The hon. member knows very well about our efforts, and again I do not think this kind of rhetoric helps the situation at all.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, my question is not directed to the parliamentary secretary because his answers are entirely unsatisfactory. Air Canada has just announced that 2,200 employees will lose their jobs. This is not rhetoric. This is grim reality. We can blame the Conservative government for failing to act in the transportation sector.

I therefore want to ask one of the ministers from Quebec—not many are here today, but I would like to ask one of them—what this government intends to do to help Air Canada deal with its current economic problems, a company that under the Liberals was one of the seven best companies in the world and provided 24,000 jobs. I may remind the minister that today, Air Canada has only 6,000 employees in Montreal.

• (1120)

When will the Conservative government wake up and help this company remain viable, a Canadian company that creates jobs and keeps jobs in Montreal?

[English]

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I think I should respond by first mentioning that the Minister of Transport is a Quebec minister. The minister is very aware of the situation with regard to Air Canada.

However I go back to my response to the member for Ottawa South. World airlines are in a difficult situation as a result of (a) the gulf war and (b) the world recession.

This is not a situation unique to Canada. There is clearly overcapacity in Canada and these matters are being worked out.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, the parliamentary secretary says this is a global problem. We are not talking about problems caused by the gulf war but about Tory policies, including deregulation, which created this problem facing Canadian companies today.

Earlier, my colleague asked some specific questions about Canadian airlines. I am now asking specific questions about Air Canada, and the parliamentary secretary tells us that the minister is from Montreal and he is keeping a close watch on the situation. The present minister may be from Montreal, but four of his predecessors were also from Quebec or the Montreal region and nobody has done anything whatsoever to help Air Canada.

Again, I want to ask when this government is going to get a consistent policy for the air transportation sector in order to save Canada's air transportation industry.

[English]

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, again I can appreciate the member's concern, coming late into this discussion.

On the other hand we have recently received the NTA report. One of the recommendations of the NTA report is on deregulation and how in fact it is working and working well across the country.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I share the concern of the hon. member of the Official Opposition who just spoke, but I would remind him the Liberals were the first to worship at the idol of deregulation under the Liberal Minister of Transport prior to their defeat in 1984.

My question is for the Minister of State for Finance and it has to do with the budget. It concerns the contrast between the rhetoric of the budget with respect to deficit reduction and the fact that no effort was made to close tax loopholes that had been identified previous to the budget and had been discussed in this House.

At least on one occasion the Minister of Finance indicated to me that he might have been considering reducing or eliminating the business and entertainment tax deduction that costs Canadians $1 billion a year. Could the minister say why no step was taken to address that particular tax measure?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, is that a question written by the hon. member from Windsor or is it one from the hon. member from Saskatchewan?

I will answer the question this way directly. The hon. member knows full well, because I saw him wining and dining with the Canadian Restaurant Association at the Chateau Laurier Hotel, that the Canadian Restaurant Association and the Canadian Small Business Association rely on those deductions for business purposes to help them with tourism, the restaurant business and small business.

New Democratic Party members stand and say that they are the great champions of small businesses but they certainly are not supporting them on this particular issue.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I do not know what the minister was consuming at that event but I certainly was not present.

In any event, the minister has given an argument in defence of that particular deduction, but the argument the Minister of Finance has given me in the past has had to do with staying competitive with the United States of America. This is the first time we have heard this particular angle.

• (1125)

Why was no effort made to close some of the tax loopholes that were identified by the Auditor General in his report? Surely, if deficit reduction is important, these kinds of loopholes should be addressed, particularly the ones which have been identified by the Auditor General. Why was no action taken on those particular loopholes?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I am not sure exactly what the hon. member is referring to when he talks about the Auditor General and loopholes.

Recently the Auditor General came out with a report saying that foreign companies were given an unfair advantage, but once the figures were compared with the Department of Finance and the situation examined there was a meeting of minds that maybe that was not entirely accurate.

I am not sure to what the hon. member is referring specifically. Let me say this. This government over the last nine years, the Government of Canada, has reduced or eliminated more tax loopholes, as they are commonly referred to, than any previous government.

The hon. member knows that. We have brought in minimum corporation taxes, large business taxes. We have brought in minimum taxes for banks and financial institutions. The hon. member knows we have gone a very long way. For him to stand here today and talk about tax loopholes and so on is really misleading the House.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I would agree that there were many tax loopholes to close, thanks to previous Liberal governments, but there are many tax loopholes yet to be closed by this particular Conservative government. Many of them have been identified over the last few years, and particularly over the last little while.

In a budget that was allegedly devoted to deficit reduction we saw absolutely none of these tax loopholes closed. I think it gives the lie to what the government is really up to.

Therefore could the minister explain, again with respect to tax loopholes, why the government refused to have anything to do with the proposed draft of the multilateral mutual assistance agreement by the 28 members of the OECD and the Council of Europe, a draft designed to take on the world's largest tax loopholes, preventing both evasion and avoidance of all taxes other than customs duties?

This treaty, more commonly known as Interfirpol, equips national governments to effectively deal with the formidable obstacles that global companies are constantly throwing at our national economies and at our national fiscal systems.

Why is it that the Canadian government has refused to try to create an international context in which one country cannot be played off against the other and on which ministers of finance do not have to constantly rise in this House and say they cannot close particular tax loopholes because it would make them uncompetitive?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I find it interesting that the New Democratic Party and its spokesman today talk about the finance ministers from the IMF, the OECD and the G-7 playing off against one another, when it is just exactly the opposite.

The G-7 finance ministers are in the process of meeting in Washington before the IMF and World Bank meetings this weekend. I thought my hon. friend might be prepared to use some of the quotes such as that of Michel Camdessus, the managing director of the International Monetary Fund, who said: "My impression is that there is a very significant effort to take care of the public debt in Canada. The last developments are positive including the budget which was announced two or three days ago".

Mr. McCurdy: Answer the question.

Mr. McDermid: Co-operation between countries and between finance ministers is ongoing. Thank goodness the NDP is not in there. There would be no co-operation at all.

Mr. Blaikie: What about the question I asked?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The minister of defence claims she did not know that the beating death in Somalia on March 16 involved criminal intent until March 31. Yet statements by the chief of defence staff show clearly that she knew on March 19.

Yesterday the Minister of National Defence called the statement of the chief of defence staff ridiculous.

• (1130)

My question for the Acting Prime Minister is this: Does he agree with the Minister of National Defence or does he, as we do, believe the chief of the defence staff? If he does, would he agree to open up the Somali inquiry to include a thorough examination of the role of the minister?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): To begin with the hon. member has not represented the situation factually in terms of what actually was said by either the Minister of National Defence or the chief of the defence staff.

The chief of the defence staff in his briefing indicated that the unit reported evidence indicating that criminal intent might be linked. He indicated that it might be linked. The hon. member said that the Minister of National Defence therefore knew there was criminal intent. She knew no such thing, nor did the chief of the defence staff say so. He said there might be.

What happens when there is an indication that there might be? An investigation is appointed and it is investigated by the appropriate authorities. That is precisely what the Minister of National Defence indicated was happening. It was being investigated. It is up to the investigation to make that determination.

The hon. member knows, if he attended the briefing of the Judge Advocate General, that the Minister of National Defence has a role in the defence legal system not dissimilar to that of a judge. If in fact the Minister of National Defence had stated explicitly on the 7th: "Yes, criminal intent," the hon. member quite rightly could have stood in this House demanding her resignation immediately for acting irresponsibly.

She said all she could say. She did not misrepresent the situation, nor in fact is there any conflict between what she said and what the chief of the defence staff said.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, there clearly is a conflict. If the minister is in fact correct then she has nothing to hide from a public inquiry then surely a public inquiry would exonerate her.

If, as Canadians believe and we believe, there is a contradiction between what the chief of the defence staff said and what the minister said, they cannot both be right. In order to arrive at the truth why does the government not open up the inquiry to include a thorough examination of the role of the minister? If she is right she has nothing to hide.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): To begin with, what particular accusation is the hon. member making in terms of the Minister of National Defence? Is he suggesting that as Minister of National Defence she should have come out and stated explicitly all the details?

Let me repeat my first answer because obviously he did not hear it: Indicating criminal intent might. Indicating might. Think about those two words, "indicating might". That was concluded.

Mr. Rompkey: She did not say that.

Mr. Andre: Now the hon. member is shouting at me and will not listen to my answer even though he asked the question. Supposedly he treats this issue seriously. If he did he would close his jaw and listen to my answer.

The reality is that the inquiry was set up to establish the truth in respect of the operations of the Canadian Armed Forces units in their peacekeeping role. They are not dealing with a criminal investigation which is going on by the appropriate authorities under the jurisdiction of the Judge Advocate General.

The reality is in order that there be full and frank discussion by the witnesses it is being held in camera. The hon. member is suggesting that unless it is being held under the full light of TV cameras and so on we will not know the truth. Therefore, he s suggesting that the commissioners on this commission cannot be trusted to establish the truth. I would like him to name the commissioners he thinks are untrustworthy.

THE BUDGET

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Today is tax day for Canadians. Since it was elected this government has spent $1 trillion of their money. That is a one followed by 12 zeros. The deficit has grown to $34 billion. The debt is approaching $500 billion. We have been through a three-year recession and 1.5 million Canadians are out of work.

As Canadians write their cheques to the government they want to know this: Just what is going on here? What does this government think it is doing to this country?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): I hope I have the time to answer this.

First of all, some very good news came out this morning. The real gross domestic product rose four-tenths of 1 per cent in February. Over the last three months real domestic product growth has grown at an average annual rate of 4 per cent. I might point out that goods production increased 5 per cent. All those are good signs. Those are signs that the economy is coming back.

• (1135)

This government has placed Canada in a position to take advantage of recovery. We have the lowest interest rates in 30 years, lowest mortgage rates in 30 years and the lowest inflation rate in probably 20 years. As late as yesterday we were being credited by the IMF, by the treasury secretary of the United States and others that Canada is going to have the best job growth and the best gross domestic product growth over the next two years.

That speaks well for the very tough decisions this government, the finance minister and the Prime Minister have had to take over the last few years to bring us to this point. We said this is what would happen. It is happening and we are very pleased to see it.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, when we have hit the depths this government has taken us to there is no place to go but up, is there?

If the minister wants opinions on the budget I will give him opinions on it: "From a tired government a budget without inspiration; a bloodless budget; a phoney budget; and more razzmatazz".

This government that promised Canadians no tax increases has given them 38 new taxes or tax increases. What does this budget promise them? It promises them more tax increases. For the next five years personal income taxes will increase by over 7 per cent. That is 36 per cent in this budget. Just what is this government doing with their money? Canadians want to know why they should trust it with one more cent.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I find that passing strange. We were criticized by the business community and some of the financial thinkers in this country for not raising taxes. Now my hon. friend is coming out and saying that we are raising taxes. The first statement by the Minister of Finance in the budget was that there were no new taxes and no increase in taxes. We are standing by that because we think that will help recovery.

The hon. member should get her facts straight. She made a series of quotes about the attack on the budget and, as my hon. friend said, it was probably the hon. member for Windsor West who said that.

Let me do some quoting from the people who should be listened to because I think it is very, very important. The secretary of the U.S. treasury said: "I am very pleased to see Canada with a strong budget where they are also pushing for growth". I could go on and on with the number of people who are supporting the budget.

Here is another one. The hon. member will be interested in this one because the Liberal Party was gloating about a credit rating decrease by one of the bond rating agencies. "I think Mazankowski was very successful in deflecting the CBRS downgrade by downgrading the CBRS". Well it was not only the Minister of Finance who did that but it was all the other bond rating agencies as well.

We are on the right track. We are heading in the right direction.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for housing.

Off-reserve native housing organizations have learned from the minister's office that as a result of last Monday's budget no new funds will be available after January 1, 1994 for urban and rural native housing programs, for the RRAP program, or for rent subsidies.

Not only will no new off-reserve housing be built to reduce the long waiting lists and overcrowded conditions, but the lack of maintenance funds through the RRAP program will mean that the quality of current housing stock will quickly deteriorate. The additional social costs related to inadequate housing conditions as well as the higher replacement costs which future governments will face as a result of the cutback to RRAP mean that in future Canadians will face even higher deficits than if the government had continued to borrow to finance off-reserve housing for native people.

Will the minister confirm to this House what his office has been saying to native off-reserve housing agencies, that no new funding will be available after January 1, 1994? Will he advise the House whether any studies were done to determine the impact on the deficit in allowing current CMHC housing stocks to deteriorate, as well as the added social costs which result from overcrowded and inadequate housing conditions?

• (1140)

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, social housing has been impacted by the recent budget. I think the hon. member knows, but it should be pointed out, that the on-reserve native housing is not affected by that budget change.

The natives off reserve as well as all other people involved in social housing have been impacted by the cuts made to social housing. The implication of the member that housing would deteriorate and reach unacceptable standards is wrong. The program will continue to maintain in good shape the housing that does exist.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, many aboriginal people leave reserve communities because of the lack of economic and educational opportunities.

With this change in the program they will now be forced back on to reserves where even the department admits that half the housing stock is unliveable and where they are going to face lack of education and economic opportunities. This is as a result of a 30 per cent roll back in economic development money for reserves last year.

Is the minister aware that his cuts to housing programs will force native people to stop seeking employment and education opportunities off reserve, will force them back into the welfare system and overcrowded conditions on reserve where there are serious social problems?

Is he not concerned that the cost to this and future generations in human as well as financial terms will far exceed the short-term savings that he hoped to accomplish by cutting off-reserve housing programs?

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the situation for the native people on and off reserve has been improving steadily over the past two years. There is no other government that has done more to assist the native people of Canada.

Obviously there is more that could be done and more that we would like to do. The situation regarding all the people of Canada, and there is such a thing as dealing fairly with all the people of Canada, is that we are in very tough times. We will continue to be for a short period. We have to take measures that may not be desirable but are necessary.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): My question is for the Minister of Finance. Small business in Nepean and elsewhere is telling me that government and banks are choking economic growth and job creation. They say that banks are uncaring, are calling loans, and cutting back on lines of credit.

We know 80 per cent of jobs in this country are created by small business. Yet government and banks, which are the country's two most powerful organizations, have demonstrated their failure to understand what must be done.

What hope will this minister give today in this House in spite of a do-nothing budget to small business in Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, obviously the hon. member is not aware of the Small Businesses Loans Act changes which are tremendously important. In fact the changes were applauded by her party when they were introduced and they were passed through the House in very quick fashion because of the tremendous hope given to small business.

Here are the changes: We are now guaranteeing 90 per cent of the losses instead of 85 per cent. We are now limiting the personal guarantee that banks can take when we do an SBLA loan. This is a very big step forward. Even John Bulloch who does not usually say nice things about any government applauded that.

What we are also doing under the SBLA is making sure that the banks know about it, that they put it in the window and that they train their staff on it. This has been done. I have already received reports from the six major banks. They are training their branches as I speak and most of them now are ready to use this act.

It is predicted that close to $1 billion worth of loans will occur in addition to what would ordinarily have occurred because of these changes.

I hope the hon. member will applaud us for this program because members of her party already have.

• (1145)

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I am well aware of the new Small Businesses Loans Act. We on this side of the House do applaud it but it would be interesting if he would sit down with the heads of financial institutions and have them advise the heads of their banks that this is actually in effect because banks are turning away business left, right and centre. When is the minister going to sit down and talk this over with the banks?

The biggest impediment is the lack of available funds from the lending institutions. These small businesses are not the Olympia & Yorks of the world. The banks and the government are not even aware that small business exists in this country.

Why has this government ignored small business? Why is it not creating jobs? It has not even addressed it in this budget.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, no government has helped small business more thoroughly than our government.

First of all we have maintained the income tax level for small business at the lowest level of the OECD, 12 per cent. Second, we reformed the SBLA. When her party was in government it did not reform the SBLA in the positive ways we have done it.

More important, all the regional programs we have are essentially for small business. Of course they have been creating jobs. On reserve, for example, the aboriginal economic development program created over 3,000 small businesses in the last five years alone.

I cannot in answer to one question tell the hon. member the litany of things that we have been able to accomplish for small business, but the most important of all is to make sure interest rates are low. The interest rates are now at the lowest level they have been in 30 years and that is important to every small business person across Canada.

I agree with her though that we should talk to the banks and make sure that the banks use these programs. They know about them and we are doing it. I would be grateful if she would assist us in so doing.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works and it concerns the ICAO lease in Montreal.

In May 1991 Public Works Canada attempted to purchase the existing building in Montreal where ICAO is located. Less than 20 months later the government said that the building was so inadequate that it would not even rent it from the present owner.

I ask the minister: What changed in that 20 month period? Why is the government spending $175 million more than necessary?

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I am glad to follow up on the minister's statement yesterday. He took the question and I was quite pleased with his response.

With regard to the situation in Public Works, the way we have opened the process up it is transparent, and in his words, the process is squeaky clean. The situation is transparent. I am glad to know the hon. member is going to take advantage of the briefing the minister offered yesterday.

I would like to quote what one of the other tenderers had to say. The Westcliffe group and other rival developers seeking the ICAO lease said yesterday that the bidding process had been followed strictly. It goes on to verify that it was. The rules of the game were followed all the way through. The member should be satisfied that there was no problem dealing with the ICAO situation.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, the member across the way wants to quote other bidders. I will quote him another one. The Canderel Corporation said: "The dice were loaded".

[Translation]

I would like to ask the minister's representative on the other side to answer the following questions. For one, I want to know why the government, that wanted to buy the building, immediately said that it was unsuitable and did not even want to rent it. Secondly, what will he and his government do to restore confidence in the contract awarding system at the Department of Public Works?

[English]

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I think the public and all members of this House should have absolute confidence in the system. It has never been better. In all of the years that member's party was running the government it was, I would say, less than squeaky clean.

The situation for ICAO for its requirements is this: Public Works in fact deals with customers. The customer was ICAO. It has new demands. It had a 20 year lease on the existing building. Its demands have changed. Its request of Public Works was that we enter a tendering process with those new demands. We have done so. The process is not yet complete. It will be shortly and we will be in a position to provide the customer ICAO with the facilities that it has asked for.

AIRCRAFT SERVICES

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

I have risen in the House before on this issue of Aircraft Services in the Winnipeg area. The result of these interventions is that a study was undertaken and completed to determine the most cost effective location for this transport department.

First, can the minister tell the House the results of the study?

Second, can the minister tell the House if it is true that Aircraft Services, before the study is released, is seeking a new location which may or may not fall within the recommendations of the report?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, this matter has certainly been ongoing longer than either the member or I would have cared.

The situation arose when the Aircraft Services central region aircraft which were originally based at Winnipeg International Airport in an old World War II hangar that was condemned by Labour Canada was abandoned and found temporary accommodation at St. Andrews of which the hon. member speaks.

There is a study ongoing. We have asked Peat Marwick to consider the best location for the permanent hangar situation. The member knows we have been studying the St. Andrews airport as well as Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie. There has been no lease signed. The department has not yet negotiated a new lease. We are waiting for the results of the Peat Marwick study which I expect will be available shortly.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the minister of energy. I ask him to bear with me. I have a touch of laryngitis which is probably not a bad thing for an NDP MP to have this week.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Wrong MP.

Mr. Waddell: We will not go into that.

Imperial Oil proposes to close its IOCO refinery in Port Moody, British Columbia and a number of workers will lose their jobs. These same workers received a zero per cent pay increase last year. These same workers developed ways in co-operation with local management to cut costs and improve efficiency. The refinery is actually making money.

My question is this. What is the government going to do to aid these workers and others who have done everything that the government has been telling Canadian workers to do but still lose their jobs?

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would like to remind my hon. colleague that the government, together with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, is doing a great deal to help the energy sector, and particularly the oil sector. I will remind him of a very important program, Hibernia.

I hear the Bloc Quebecois member laughing at the Hibernia program. Maybe he should not laugh, because a great many Quebec companies benefit from it. It means jobs for Quebec. Maybe that does not interest him, but I would simply say that there are tremendous spin-offs for Quebec.

Getting back to my colleague from British Columbia—and I know it is unfortunate that jobs have been lost—I would remind him that programs for workers have been set up with the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Our funding has increased substantially to redirect them to other work or to upgrade their skills. Our department's main goal is not to try to maintain a company that is more or less in difficulty but to give it the best chance of acquiring expertise and good jobs in a field of activity where we perform well internationally.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for his answer. We have the same situation in east-end Montreal.

[English]

On the west coast we had four refineries in the greater Vancouver area and now three of them have closed; Shell, Petro-Canada and now Imperial. The refined product is coming from Edmonton by pipeline instead of being refined in Vancouver.

I want to ask the parliamentary secretary this.

• (1155)

Given the possibility of an interruption of supply or a cutback by the company, what is the government going to do to protect the security of supply of gasoline for the lower mainland of British Columbia, to keep the prices from rising and to prevent independent gas retailers from being squeezed out?

Will the ministry, the department of energy, conduct an inquiry into the implications for the west coast of the closure of this very important refinery?

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would repeat that the Minister of Energy is extremely concerned about this issue.

Rest assured that he will do all that is necessary for every part of the country—the west coast, the Atlantic region, Quebec or Ontario—to receive its fair share from our programs. We will continue to do so equally, as we have in the past when we helped the west by eliminating the extremely disastrous National Energy Program.

Our government did that, in the interest of companies in western Canada and all Canadian consumers. We will continue to act in that way. Rest assured that we will consider the problem raised by the hon. member and that the minister will give an answer as soon as possible.

MUNICIPAL TAXATION

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, my question concerns the matter of grants in lieu of taxes to municipalities.

I believe it is unconscionable for any government not to pay for services rendered by any other order of government regardless of where it thinks it may be in the hierarchy of life.

The NDP government in Saskatchewan pays zero, naught, nothing for the services it receives from municipalities in Saskatchewan. This is the ultimate form of unfairness.

I fear that the the federal government may be inclined to be lured into this morass. It is my understanding that the minister has twice met with FCM to discuss the 77 per cent increase in cost.

In my city over the last five years we have illustrated some responsibility in that there has been a mere 8 per cent increase during that five-year period of time.

Can the minister tell me if it is the government's intent to approach this as a problem nationally or will it focus its efforts at abuse of municipalities, which I believe should be its thrust?

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, we are aware of course that there are provinces that do not deal with grants in lieu of taxes in the same way we do federally.

There have been, and the member rightly points it out, unacceptable increases in the grants in lieu of taxes over the past number of years. In fact, it has nearly doubled over the last five years.

It is for that reason that the government took the responsible action of freezing grants in lieu of taxes. The objective of the department and the government is to be fair with not only the taxpayers of the country but with all municipalities across the country.

It is for that reason that we have met and continue to meet with the Federation of Municipalities. We will be working out a fairer way of dealing with grants in lieu of taxes. I can assure the member we are not planning to stop paying grants in lieu of taxes.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I direct my question in the absence of the Prime Minister to the Acting Prime Minister.

Two ministers of cabinet, now Tory leadership candidates including the minister of defence, say they will end universal medicare and impose user fees if they become Prime Minister.

Why does the Prime Minister not tell the minister of defence to defend medicare instead of defending the $5 billion helicopter program?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I think you will find that all members of this government defend medicare and want to assure that medicare is provided to every Canadian no matter what their status in life.

Ideas are being discussed now in the leadership race. This happens at leadership convention times. People want to know what individuals are looking at and considering for the future.

If the hon. member was fair to the minister of defence, he would have quoted her a little more accurately in what she was talking about. I think the record will show that the minister actually said that she would discuss this issue with the provincial governments.

I think that is what I saw on television. I believe that is what she said. I think the hon. member should be fair.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I direct my supplementary to the same minister.

The present minister of health defends medicare but the minister of defence and the Minister of the Environment are stabbing the minister of health in the back.

• (1200)

Can the Prime Minister tell the House once and for all whether the Tories believe in the Canada Health Act, in medicare, or is he like the minister of defence who believes that hospitals should check people's wallets before they check their pulse?

Why does the Prime Minister not fire the minister of defence and the Minister of the Environment from his cabinet or does he equally believe in killing medicare?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, that is such a foolish statement by the hon. member.

Let me just read for the record the exact quote of the Minister of National Defence: "There are disagreements over user fees. You know I am of the school, so for medical programs I am of the school of Benoit Bouchard". That is the current minister of health whom the hon. member just praised.

"I have talked to a lot of economists who specialize in this area and who do not think it is the most effective way." This is referring to user fees. "On the other hand it may be that provincial governments who administer the programs would have some latitude to decide how they are going to cover their costs. I want to sit down with the provinces and talk about it."

That is a far cry from what the hon. member who stood in this House said.

Routine Proceedings

PARLIAMENTARY EMPLOYMENT AND STAFF RELATIONS ACT

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council. If I may, I would like to take the opportunity to wish him well in his announced impending retirement, unless of course he pulls a Trudeau in which case all bets are off. It is some 30 years since we first met and I sincerely wish him well.

In June 1986, six and three-quarter years ago, the 33rd Parliament with all-party support passed the government's Bill C-45 and enacted the Parliamentary Employment and Staff Relations Act which, very simply, extended to workers on Parliament Hill the same basic rights to decent working conditions and health and safety laws enjoyed by all other federal employees.

Almost seven years and one election has passed since Royal Assent was given to part I. Still the cabinet has not proclaimed the operative sections part II and part III into law.

Will the government proclaim this important basic legislation before the end of this Parliament and just when will it act to end this obvious and continuing injustice to those who serve us in this place?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, let me thank the hon. member for his compliments. Let me return them and let me take his question as notice.

WAYS AND MEANS

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 83(1), I wish to table a notice of Ways and Means motion to amend the Excise Tax Act, and I ask that an order of the day be designated for the consideration of the motion.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-428, an act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act (annuity following job loss).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Bellemare: Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure of submitting the following bill for first reading, entitled an act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act.

The purpose of this bill is to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act in order to address the plight of federal public servants who lost their jobs since 1988 due to downsizing.

Currently a public servant who has reached the age of 55 and has at least 10 years of service and chooses a pension because he or she is a victim of downsizing is entitled to a full pension. However the same is not true for public servants between the ages of 50 years and 54 years. If pensioned they are penalized by 5 per cent a year until age 60 which means a 50 per cent reduction of their already minuscule pension. My bill would correct the situation by decreasing the 5 per cent a year reduction from age 60 to age 55. These public servants, many of whom cannot find employment, would then be able to receive 75 per cent of their minuscule pension instead of the present 50 per cent in face of the 1993 budget which calls for a further 16,500 public servant positions to be cut.

• (1205)

I hope that I will have the opportunity to debate this bill in the near future.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Bellemare moves the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

UKRAINIAN REDRESS

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise today to present two petitions signed by constituents of mine. They humbly pray and hope that by way of this petition they can bring to light their concern regarding the Ukrainian redress on internment.

I present this petition on behalf of my constituents.

BOSNIA-HERCEGOVINA

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, I have a second petition containing hundreds of signatures of my constituents dealing with the absolute insanity of the war that currently is occurring in Bosnia-Hercegovina.

They hope, following five recommendations, that we can address this matter to rid society of this insanity.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by many of my constituents in the national capital region.

These people would like to draw to the attention of the House that the goods and services tax credit is not available to independent, tax paying Canadians who are under the age of 19. Those constituents, as well as myself, believe that such exclusion is discriminatory.

Therefore, these petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to correct this injustice.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am proud to rise in the House and present a petition on behalf of the members of St. James Presbyterian Church, Chatham, Ontario who cannot stand the violence against women and children.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to accept legislation designed to eliminate violence against women and children, encourage and support women to report incidents of assault or abuse, provide assistance and support for women reporting assault or abuse, provide relief and support to women as mothers to protect their children, emphasize the need for abuser rehabilitation, concentrate special efforts on training of police, lawyers, court workers and judges to become knowledgeable about women and child abuse, and to focus public attention on this very important and long ignored problem.

FIRST NATIONS OF CANADA

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions. The first petition relates to the designation of a day recognizing Canada's aboriginal inhabitants and to honour their native cultures. The date proposed is the 21st as the most appropriate day to recognize our First Nations.

The petitioners therefore call on the Parliament of Canada to enact Bill C-268, an act respecting a national solidarity day for the First Nations of Canada.

VIOLENCE AGAINST CHILDREN

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, my second petition relates to the problem of violence and sexual assaults against children. The petition was submitted in memory of Dawn Shaw, a little girl who was sexually assaulted and murdered in my riding some time ago.

The petitioners call on Parliament to recognize the following: That the present system of justice fails to protect our children in our communities who are becoming increasingly victims of sexual assault; that judges should not be allowed to drop sexual assault charges because of delays in bringing these cases to trial; that jail sentences for sexual assault offenders be lengthened for persons convicted; that the community interest should be protected by permitting police to take DNA samples from persons suspected of sexual assault and that DNA imprints of paedophiles and sex offenders be kept in a national police data base.

There are number of suggestions that are being made by the people both in the Comox valley and throughout Canada. Therefore residents of Canada, in memory of Dawn Shaw, request that Parliament enact legislation to change the justice system to provide greater protection for children from sexual assault and to ensure conviction of offenders.

HIGH PRICE OF GAS

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure of submitting a petition concerning the price of gas in the national capital region. As you are well aware, the price of gas in the Ottawa-Hull region is much higher than in Southern of Ontario, Toronto or Windsor.

Local residents find it unfair to be the victims of such a difference in the price of gas within a province and a region. The petitioners call upon the government to hold an inquiry in order to correct the situation.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a petition on behalf of the citizens of Saskatoon, mostly university students, who have suggested that the GST being the first federal tax ever applied to books, magazines and newspapers, is affecting the reading at their level, and particularly university students.

Since the Prime Minister promised in October 1990 to review the effects of the GST on reading materials after one year, they call upon this Parliament to immediately eliminate tax on reading material.

CHRISTINE LAMONT AND DAVID SPENCER

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by many residents of Langley and Surrey, B.C. and also from some residents in my own riding in Coquitlam and Port Coquitlam, British Columbia.

It points out that two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, are now virtually rotting in a Brazilian jail and that there is a real threat to their health and safety in prison. The only relief available is for Canada to request expulsion in accordance with Brazilian law. For some reason Canada has failed to do that.

Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the Prime Minister to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada in accordance with Brazilian law.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Question No. 421—Mr. Simmons:

> With respect to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, what action has the government taken to resolve the problems as outlined in the 1991 Auditor General's report which cites "significant instances where officials have failed to adhere to the authorities governing the action program", concerning the (a) appropriation of funds (b) treatment of documents (c) evaluations of projects prior to their approval (d) terms and conditions under which the agency was created?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): With respect to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency the government has taken the following action to resolve the problems outlined in the 1991 Auditor General's report:

(a) Appropriation of funds

The primary concern of the office of the Auditor General (OAG) was that the agency was advancing funds before commercial production was achieved. In this regard, the agency reviewed the policies relating to commercial production. It was found that the definition of the date of the commencement of commercial production requires 30 continuous days of production of marketable goods in commercial volume. This left no room for discretion and caused difficulties for seasonal operators and some small entrepreneurs. All references to this milestone date have been removed from the terms and conditions, but retained in the guidelines where the agency has sufficient authority to reasonably deal with problem situations. This amendment to the terms and conditions of the action program was approved by Treasury Board on April 30, 1992 (TB 818236).

(b) Treatment of documents

The concern of the OAG related to two points:

1. Treatment of sector department advice.

The agency has reaffirmed the need for ACOA officers to document all correspondence with sector departments and to ensure that all concerns are addressed and resolved before further processing of an application. Verification of adherence to this procedure will be established as part of the quality assurance audit regime.

2. Treatment of substantive amendments

The agency's practice has been to define as substantive amendents those which increase the financial exposure of the federal government or could adversely affect the commercial viability of the project.

Using these criteria as a guide, a review of substantive and non-substantive amendments, as defined in section 400-1 delegation of authorities, policy and procedures manual, was conducted.

After careful consideration it has been determined that the listing of substantive amendments is appropriate and that no changes are warranted.

It is agreed that in the case identified by the OAG, the amendments to the project should have been considered as significant and therefore should have been approved by the minister. This is a case where the procedures were not applied properly and not a case where a policy change is warranted.

(c) Evaluations of projects prior to their approval

The primary concern of the OAG was that the agency did not conduct adequate evaluation of commercial viability before the project was approved.

In this regard the agency has initiated two steps:

1. The agency is in the process of implementing an automated financial analysis package. Financial and other indicators directly assessing the commercial viability of a project are an inherent part of this package. This will ensure quality and consistency in the evaluation of the applicant's financial situation.

2. A comprehensive training package for account managers has been designed and will be applied to 70 ACOA officers before fiscal year end. Among the topics covered will be the various evaluation criteria which have to be addressed before a project is approved.

(d) Terms and conditions under which the agency was created

The terms and conditions of the action program are under constant internal review and challenge, to ensure they reflect the best practice of combining protection of the public purse while promoting regional development.

As part of this effort, the agency recently completed a full evaluation of the action program. This evaluation included a detailed review of the impacts and effects of the terms and conditions and offered recommendations for improvements. The agency will be announcing the results of the evaluation in the near future and subsequently formulating an action plan to deal with the recommendations.

Related actions

The agency has improved systems, processes, and policies to address the OAG findings. However, the coverage by the OAG indicated cases where, although policy and prescribed procedure is satisfactory, there was non-compliance with the terms and conditions of the action program. To minimize the potential of such cases, the agency has taken the following two measures:

—Project monitoring

The agency has formed a project monitoring committee. This committee is developing the processes and policies for enhanced monitoring of agency projects. The committee will be submitting suggested improvements for subsequent inclusion in the monitoring practices within agency operations.

—Quality assurance audit regime

Audit branch is developing a quality assurance audit regime. By the 1992-93 year end, and annually thereafter, all regions will have been subjected to quality control audits. Adherence to the terms and conditions of agency programs will be the fundamental audit criteria. More specifically, the audits will ensure high quality in the account management. It should be noted that commercial viability, significant changes, commercial production and project monitoring will be an integral part of the quality assurance audits.

Further, this audit criteria will include the testing of project documents to ensure that projects are sufficiently evaluated prior to their approval.

Question No. 485—Mr. Bellemare:

With respect to the lease agreement regarding the Chambers buildings in Ottawa between the National Capital Commission and the firm chosen to upgrade and preserve the architectural heritage of the said buildings, (a) what tendering process was followed for that agreement (b) are there other kinds of tendering process that could have been used in this case and, if so, why were they not considered?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): There are in fact two lease agreements between the National Capital Commission and Chambers Ottawa (1992) Inc. relating to the Chambers site. The first is a 66 year ground lease between the National Capital Commission as landlord, and its tenant Chambers Ottawa Inc., a corporation controlled by Pemik Enterprises Inc. and Le Groupe L.G.L. Ltée. The commission awarded the lease in 1987 on the basis of a two-stage proposal call process: a publicly advertised prequalification call, followed by a proposal call.

The tenant subsequently assigned its leasehold interest under the ground lease to Chambers Ottawa (1990) Inc., a corporation controlled by another of the original tenderers, Perez Bramalea Limited. The new tenant made a further assignment of its leasehold interest to Chambers Ottawa (1992) Inc., a corporation controlled by Perez Corporation and The Standard Life Assurance Company. These subsequent assignment were done in accordance with the terms of the ground lease. As indicated in NCC chairman's letters to the hon. member for Carleton-Gloucester dated November 2, 1992 and December 2, 1992, Chambers Ottawa (1992) Inc. approached the National Capital Commission in November 1991 with a proposal to provide head office accommodation to the commission at the Chambers site. While the commission was considering issuing a proposal call for its head office accommodation in the national capital region, it agreed to review the proposal submitted by Chambers Ottawa (1992) Inc.

The commission's consideration of the proposal was compatible with its mandate, given its responsibility for safeguarding federally designated heritage buildings. The commission was concerned about the possible ramifications to the project from the stagnation of the commercial leasing market, both in terms of the risk of delays and hence damage to the structures in question and the potential delay in receiving participation ground rent under the terms of the ground lease.

The Chambers site was found to be a desirable and justifiable head office location. However it became impossible to proceed by way of a public tender for the site's development due to the existing ground lease. After reviewing the proposal submitted and performing the necessary due diligence, the commission proceeded to enter into negotiations for a building lease with Chambers Ottawa (1992) Inc. on a sole source basis. The decision to proceed in this manner was taken only after a comparative analysis showed that the terms of the lease being proposed were competitive, given the heritage nature of the project and the terms of the ground lease in effect. This decision was endorsed by Treasury Board and received the approval of the Governor General in Council on July 23, 1992.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1993-94

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-117, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1993, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee of the Economics envelope.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, as I was saying before being interrupted at 11 a.m., I am pleased to participe in this debate on Bill C-117, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1993.

The Conservative government is asking Canadians through Parliament for authorization to borrow over $31 billion in order to meet certain expenditures. The Conservative government is responsible for the management of public funds. It wants our trust and the power to borrow over $31 billion, which is an enormous amount of money. Given the sad economic performance of this government during the past decade and its empty budget of this week, we have no other alternative but to say no.

The government claims to be borrowing the amount indicated in Bill C-117 to complete public works and for general purposes. This could mean just about anything. This amount is also roughly equivalent to the anticipated deficit of $32.6 billion for the 1993-94 fiscal year, in last Monday's budget. You can rest assured that if the Conservative government could it would ask us for even more money later to fill the void created by a deficit which is even greater than expected.

That has already happened in the past, that the government comes back for additional borrowing. We know very well that all the budget predictions which this government made in eight and a half years, nearly nine years, and even those in the last budget never came true. Fortunately that party has only a few months left in power, because in the next election the people will change the government.

I would like to take a closer look at the problem of the deficit and the debt. On May 23, 1985 when he presented his first budget, the then Minister of Finance said that if he did not attack the debt problem the Government of Canada would end up paralyzed. At that time the public debt was a little under $200 billion. To solve the debt problem, the Conservative minister proposed tough measures needed to reduce the deficit and thus reduce the growth in the debt.

Let us look at the result of nine years of "tough measures", as the minister called them. The public debt has risen from $200 billion to over $450 billion in just nine years. In other words, the government's measures more than doubled the national debt; that is, the Conservatives are responsible for creating more debt in nine years than all the debt created in the previous 117 years of Canada's history.

The then Minister of Finance said in 1984 that if the debt problem was not dealt with Canada would be paralyzed. Well, the minister was right because today, thanks to his unsound economic policies, the country is in an unparalleled economic slump. Instead of solving the problem of the deficit and the debt, the Conservatives only made it worse. The figures are there and we could talk for hours, days and even months and go over all the budgets the two Conservative ministers presented since 1984.

The government's economic policies were as ineffective in dealing with the problem of high unemployment as they were with the deficit and the debt. In 1984 the Minister of Finance told this House that his policies were meant to "break the vicious circle of unemployment and public debt".

Let us now look at the problem of high unemployment and its harmful effects. Today, Canada has about 1.6 million jobless, and that is just the official figure. I say official because those who have given up looking for a job are not counted as unemployed by Statistics Canada.

The Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops believes that there are now nearly four million unemployed people, welfare recipients and others without work in Canada. According to the Conference, the fact that a quarter of the country's labour force is thus excluded from the labour market undermines society's moral fibre. The bishops blame the economic policies of the last decade for this situation. High unemployment costs us dearly, also in terms of actual dollars and lost production, which is hard to estimate.

Let us take an example. Canada's Unemployment Insurance Plan costs employees and employers about $18 billion. If the unemployment rate were cut in half with job creation programs, $9 billion would be saved. Can you imagine what could be done with such an amount? To these $9 billion add another $6 billion that could be obtained if the government had the courage to cancel the purchase of 50 EH-101 helicopters.

It is an insult to our intelligence when candidates for the leadership of the Conservative Party tell us that they are concerned about the deficit. To solve the problem they say that all spending is on the table, even the universality of our social programs. We must be clear when we talk about social programs. Only one of them is still universal: health insurance. These people talk about abolishing the universality of medicare, a program which is the envy of the whole world.

Instead, why not put the purchase of these helicopters on hold? They are ready to eliminate the universality of Medicare, but they are not willing to give up the helicopter program. It is like buying a Cadillac without having the money to put gas in it.

There would be no limit to the problems which could be solved with a simple readjustment of priorities. Unfortunately, the priorities of this government are totally absurd. This government overlooks the human side of the situation. The first priority of a government should be the people. It may well be that such a priority would help alleviate the suffering in this country. If you want to see people suffering, come to Montreal. The poverty level is simply tragic!

According to Statistics Canada, Montreal breaks every record in terms of poverty for a metropolitan area. Indeed, 22 per cent of Montrealers live below poverty level. Twenty tons of food are now distributed each day in Montreal. What is even sadder is the fact that street children in Montreal know the same fate as those in Rio, according to a report from the World Health Organization. And then yesterday evening we learned that Air Canada intends to lay off 2,200 employees, bringing the total to 7,000 since 1990.

Will the Minister of Transport, who is also responsible for the Montreal region, examine the effects of his laissez-faire policy in Montreal? It used to be said that Montreal was a city with pride. Today, we say that it is the capital of poverty. Such is the sad reality of the Montreal region.

In my area, namely the east end of Montreal, the unemployment rate exceeds 25 per cent. Do you wonder why we refuse to support the government's decision to borrow over $31 billion? Its priorities are totally off. The government did not unveil any job creation program in last Monday's budget. It continues to make helicopters a priority instead of people.

This government showed nothing but economic inertia over the last decade. It has failed miserably. That is why we will vote against Bill C-117. We will vote against this government's budget policy and the people of Canada will vote against this inhuman and incompetent party in the next election.

The budget tabled last Monday is a disgrace. It brings nothing new and, what is worse, the Minister of Finance has given in to the prospect of a jobless recovery. If a small business had handed the same kind of budget to its bank manager he would have cut its credit and rejected any loan application.

There is nothing in this budget. Worst of all, this creative bookkeeping has been going on for years. It started with source deductions. They increased the frequency of source deductions to twice a month so that they could show a lower deficit at the end of the fiscal year. They used the same system for the federal sales tax rebate.

I clearly recall that when questioned on its GST policy and its impact on the poor and the old, the government answered: "We have a program whereby we will send them a cheque every three months." This was meant to compensate them for an unfair regressive tax they would have to pay on consumer goods.

And now, the government announced in Monday's budget that they will no longer get four cheques a year but just two, starting in January 1994. Why not immediately? If these programs save as much money as the government claims, why not apply this measure to the next two payments? First, because with an election coming they are afraid that the people will speak their minds about this government and send it off to collect UI benefits. Also, the first payment will be due in January 1994, and the second would be due in April under the old quarterly payment system but its fiscal year ends March 31. So, what does this government do? It starts by eliminating one payment of the GST tax refund to the needy and uses an accounting trick. This way it can predict that by March 31, 1994 the deficit will have been reduced. There will be no real reduction because the same cheques for the same total amount will have to be sent out during the first week of April, but it will be a new fiscal year by then.

• (1225)

That is how this government has always got around the debt and deficit problem, by increasing our taxes. This needs to be said. A report published this week says that Canadians have seen their taxes increase by 25 per cent since this government took office. That is a 25 per cent tax increase. That is where we are at. That is the present situation. We had a projected annual deficit of about $32 or $33 billion, with a national debt of about $180 billion. But even with a 25 per cent increase in taxes the debt has now grown to more than $450 billion, while the deficit remained at the same level. That is what the Tories' economic policies have done.

I remember in 1983 when the present Minister of Trade who was finance critic at the time said that tax increases would completely stop economic growth. But this Finance Minister has increased taxes more than any other in the history of our country. This is where the Tories have led us after nine years in power.

One other thing. There is nothing in this budget for our young people. What does this government do for our youth? What hope does it give them to find a job after graduating? No jobs are created, thus there are none for young Canadians. Each time we bring up the issue of drop-outs we are told this is in provincial jurisdiction. Why would they pursue their education to be better equipped for the future when they see their brothers, sisters, cousins and neighbours make sacrifices to get an education but find no job when they graduate? That is the situation this government has created over the past nine years. It has doubled, almost tripled the debt. The deficit has remained unchanged. Taxes have been increased on 32 occasions. It has implemented the GST which not only slowed down the economy, but forced a big part of it underground. That is why our young people are discouraged and the future is uncertain.

I have not spoken of the famous free trade deal yet. During the 1988 election campaign, we were told it would bring prosperity. Canada would be open to the whole world, which would bring prosperity to all Canadians. Today we see plants closing and companies moving south where they will continue to sell us their products, maintaining their sales while we are losing jobs in Canada.

Unfortunately, this government cannot be given carte blanche to go out and borrow $31 billion without some reckoning as any good manager would be called on to give. The forecasts the Minister of Finance provided us on Monday are neither realistic nor logical and they continue to lead the country in the wrong direction. Unless we change course, we will have the Cadillac of helicopters but no money to buy fuel to run them.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I have a brief question for my hon. friend.

I could debate with him, as some in the House would say, ad nauseam about some of the facts and figures he brought out. In his statement today he said to the Minister of Finance that the projections in his budget are wrong.

They are very conservative projections compared to those coming from all the economic organizations both within Canada and outside Canada, including the International Monetary Fund and the OECD. My hon. friend knows his government previously and our government now adhere to those projections.

He says they are wrong. Would he stand up in the House and tell the Canadian people what the Liberal Party's projections are and lay them on the table? If he is accusing the projections of the Minister of Finance of being wrong, and they are conservative compared to the International Monetary Fund, the OECD, the financial institutions and think tanks in Canada, then what are his projections?

If the Liberal Party is going to accuse a person of being wrong, it had better come up with its own figures.

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, the minister is giving me a golden opportunity to say what I did not have the time to say during my allowed time in debate. I thank him.

Do I have any proof? I have nine years and nine budgets. In 1989 the government projected that we would have a deficit of $15 billion today and we have a deficit of $36 billion. The projections on the deficit were wrong in every budget. The projections on the national debt were wrong. The projections on job creation were wrong. In nine years we have never had one projection that was right. Why?

He wants to know what the projections of the Official Opposition, the Liberal Party of Canada, would be. I would be glad to tell the hon. minister if he would open the books to me.

Mr. McDermid: All the books are open.

Mr. Gagliano: What books? How can he expect the opposition party to make projections when everything is closed?

I think my leader stated clearly how we would reduce the deficit and the debt. We would do it with a comprehensive policy, not just with simple cuts but by having a monetary policy, a fiscal policy and a growth policy so when Canadians work they earn money and pay tax.

This government had only one policy. It wanted to reduce inflation to zero. It froze all the economy's activity and with the little bit left from the GST it is on the ground. The government is bankrupt because it is not collecting taxes any more.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, before I begin my comments on Bill C-117, an act to provide borrowing authority, I would like to congratulate my colleague from Saint-Léonard who was able to outline the real problems both during his speech and in response to the minister thanks to his thorough knowledge of this issue.

Bill C-117 has to do with the Financial Administration Act.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on questions and comments or on debate?

Mr. Assad: On debate, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I wanted to make sure no other member was rising on questions and comments. Debate. The hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre has the floor.

Mr. Assad: Madam Speaker, Bill C-117 is an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1993 and it deals with the Financial Administration Act.

Over the last few months we heard a lot about the deficit and the damage it spells for our economy.

• (1235)

I certainly do not want to trivialize the fact. Of course the deficit must be kept under control. Common sense tells us we cannot let the deficit get out of control. However, the way this government has been managing the deficit leaves much to be desired.

Some time ago, I was listening to CBC radio, and a professor of economics at Saint John's University in Manitoba was talking about the deficit. After hearing some very interesting comments by Professor Reuben Carl Bellan, I managed to get his home telephone number and we talked for about fifteen minutes about what he said on the radio. Later, I read an article in the paper.

Professor Bellan made it clear that the deficit must be properly managed. He argued that today Canada issues bonds to finance the deficit. It borrows money on the bond market. In recent years, many bonds were purchased by Germany, Japan, the United States, Sweden and other countries. I don't know the exact figures, but we are talking about billions of dollars coming in to be used to cover Canada's deficit.

According to Professor Bellan, that was a mistake, because in Japan, for instance, the government does not allow financing of domestic debt with foreign funds. Japan has an enormous deficit, but it is financed only by the Japanese. No American, Canadian or German funds are being used to finance Japan's deficit.

Professor Bellan argued as follows: Why does Canada allow non-Canadians to buy Government of Canada bonds? It should keep transactions in Government of Canada bonds in Canada, to be made by Canadians, because Canadians buy Canadian products and pay taxes in Canada. The Japanese, Germans, British or Americans who buy Government of Canada bonds do not pay taxes in Canada. His point was that when these funds come from outside the country, we have a real debt.

Let me explain. It would be fine if foreign funds were used to finance infrastructures or were invested in our industry, to make it more productive and more efficient. But that is not the case. This foreign money is largely used to finance our deficit.

Professor Bellan went on to talk about the time between 1939 and 1945, when we were at war. Obviously we had to defeat the Nazis. Canada had to mobilize vast numbers of people across the country. Considering Canada's population that was a formidable undertaking. In 1944 and early 1945 Canada's cumulative deficit was $18 billion. Not impressive, compared with today's figures. However, when we consider the value of the current dollar, our gross domestic product and our ability to pay, $18 billion was just as bad as today's cumulative deficit of $460 billion. In fact, we were in worse shape as far as our ability to pay was concerned. In other words, at the time it was harder to pay back $18 billion than it is to pay back the federal government's $460 billion deficit today. How did we do it?

According to Professor Bellan, in 1944-45 economists were very pessimistic about the post-war period. Canada would be debt-ridden. We would all be dressed in rags and live in shacks. They painted a horrific picture. However, we went on to a period of unprecedented prosperity. Their predictions were all wrong. However, economists have always been better at explaining their own mistakes than predicting the future. We have to remember that.

Professor Bellan made another interesting point. From 1939 to 1945 when Canada's deficit was even worse in real terms than it is today, who financed the deficit? Canadians did. Obviously it was not the Germans who financed Canada's debt during the war in 1939-1945. Canadians financed the deficit by purchasing Victory Bonds.

I suppose we could ask this professor from Manitoba, and someone did: What if Canadians don't have enough money to finance the debt? Good question. We do have enough money. Today, Canadians have more than $300 billion in Canadian banks, ten times as much as this year's deficit.

Canadians have the money, and this government must start by financing its debt with money from within our money. When Canadian money is used to pay off the debt it does not have the same impact as when foreign money is used. I think this is just common sense and I think that perspective could be used for all our problems. It may be one of the alternatives we have today.

It is often said that the government creates jobs. Some people agree and others do not. I tend to disagree. Let me explain. Under our democratic system the government has the power to raise taxes and pass laws. Those are the two most important powers it has in a democratic society. It can raise taxes and adopt legislation through Parliament. If a government has these two fundamental instruments in a society like ours it does not have to intervene in any other sector.

Crown corporations may have been necessary in the past but I think they no longer are today. Personally I think the government's role and I know there are others who share my opinion, is to ensure that laws are just, that the tax system is fair and equitable—which is not the case here in Canada—and that programs and policies are sensible and necessary, which is not always the case either in Canada today.

We do not want any frills. We want the government to provide for programs that meet the needs of Canadians. Those programs are badly needed.

When we hear people say the government is going to create jobs we have every reason to be suspicious. However, the government can create a climate of confidence. It is absolutely necessary if we want Canadians to invest in their country. If we want to have foreign investment investors must be assured of a climate of confidence in Canada, that we have hope and are moving forward.

• (1245)

How can the government achieve this? It is very easy. It must ensure that the tax system is fair and equitable—this is basic, especially in a democratic society like ours. At the present time, it must be said that the middle class is paying more than its share. I have said that many times and I repeat it again. When will we admit in this House that the middle class pays more than its share and that this cannot continue? We need a thorough reform to change this state of affairs.

I just spoke about our accumulated deficit and I added that Canadians alone should pay for the deficit. When I look at what other countries do, I ask myself some questions. When I see that other countries can reform their tax system, like New Zealand, and when I see the tax rate on big multinationals in Germany and Japan, I wonder whether Canada could not do the same. Are we more stupid than they? Can we not find ways to assure all Canadians that we are making a very sincere attempt to correct this shortcoming, that other countries have been able to get back on track by making reforms and that they have gained others' confidence? I think that is basic and we must use common sense. That is all Canadians ask and that is what we must work on.

Let us talk about social programs now. Oh, I have read many times that our social programs are too costly; the big multinationals are always saying that. However, the figures show the contrary. I called the Auditor General, who sent representatives to my office because I wanted to study what has happened to the federal government's budget and deficit since 1972. Yes, social programs are important, but they did not contribute as much to the deficit as some would have us believe.

The accumulated deficit is $460 billion, but social programs account for barely 6 per cent of that. They are not what hurt our economy the most. Social programs as such are not responsible for the deficit.

I believe that I speak for the great majority of Canadians when I say that health insurance is one of the most important assets in our society. Medicare started in Saskatchewan and those responsible for this plan are to be congratulated.

Even for me, a citizen of Canada from Quebec, health insurance is one of the programs that I am the most proud of and it should never be attacked. It can be modified and user fees can be charged. We must not be afraid of change, but it must continue to provide all Canadians with the medical care they need. This program is absolutely necessary and it must never be called into question.

Other social programs, like the old age pension, are a source of pride for our country. I wonder if many Canadians realize that the United States, the richest country in the world—or one of the richest, because we must not forget Japan and Germany—has no old age pension.

This shows that our priorities are different from the Americans'. We are not criticizing them, far from it, but when we look at what we have built together here in Canada, what is our basic philosophy? We are our brother's (and our sister's) keeper. That is healthy and right and good for our country. If my neighbour needs help or medical care, he is entitled to receive it. Is there anything more wonderful in our country than that? Is there anything more wonderful than an unemployed person being able to collect unemployment insurance, when you think about it? Yes, there is abuse, but that is human behaviour. We know that, you and I. Perhaps over time, with more civic mindedness, people will realize that social programs should never be abused. We may not be at that point yet but it is coming, I am convinced.

We hear a lot about the deficit as though it were a bogeyman. I do not want to trivialize the deficit; it is serious. But as I said, corrective action can be taken, funding to begin with, and perhaps also an analysis of present programs. Certainly some programs and policies are out of date and need to be changed. We must not be afraid of change; we need political will. A government with political will can work miracles, I am not exaggerating. But without this conviction and this political will nothing is possible. We waste our effort by finding all sorts of excuses and rationalizing the errors and disadvantages of the various options.

Unfortunately my time is nearly up, but in the few minutes available to me, I would like to talk about youth. All my colleagues in this House are aware that there is a deep unease among our youth. I am convinced that there are answers to it, and I did not invent them, far from it. What we need is a national training service. I am not talking about a military service at all; there is no military connotation. I am talking about a national training service in co-operation with the provinces. This kind of program has been very successful in Germany, a tremendous success. I have documentation in my office and I have gone over it.

Here in Canada, occupational training may be one of the solutions for our youth. Personally, I know that if young people were given training for up to two years in a trade school and given technical knowledge we could greatly reduce youth unemployment and give young people hope. That is fundamental. Think of these young Canadians, be they 16, 26 or 27 years old, whatever, who are no longer in high school, who did not finish secondary school, who have no trade and no technical skill, who are on unemployment insurance or not working. You know as well as I do that they have no future. A national training service would be a solution for them.

At the present time more than 300,000 jobs in Canada are unfilled because these jobs need technical knowledge, basic knowledge of the industry or high technology. University diplomas are not at all required but rather technical schools, apprenticeships, trade schools that will help our young people overcome their difficulties.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your patience. I repeat, there are solutions. Above all, it takes courage to face the real problems and then to have the political will to go ahead and make the required changes, whatever the cost. It is for the good of our country and of every province and community, for the good of our neighbours on the right and on the left and across the way.

[English]

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I cannot find much in my colleague's remarks to disagree with. I particularly appreciate the tone he is putting on his remarks.

I want to ask a question with a little variation from those remarks. After nine budgets, a series of nine projections about what was going to happen and nine projections which were proved wrong, does my colleague feel comfortable with the projections being made in this particular budget in relation to where we are going and what has to be done or what is going to be done?

We have had nine budgets where the deficit was going to be cut. We were going to deal with the debt back in 1984. We were going to solve it in four years back in 1988. We were going to solve it in a couple of years. It is nine years later and we still have not solved it.

Does this member feel comfortable with the projections that were put into this last budget?

[Translation]

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, regarding the projections in last Monday's budget the member asked if I were confident that we were heading in the right direction. I have the feeling that we are going nowhere. As I said even before it was brought down, I see in that budget a stand-pat budget. Because of the coming leadership convention the budget contains of course a lot of wishful thinking to the effect that the future is rosy and that things will get better. I am not convinced, because what we need as I mentioned before are actions and a political will. There is none of that in the budget.

They may have tried to introduce a few restrictions, but above all they are waiting for the new leader to be chosen because the new leader, male or female, will need some latitude to make decisions. Projections were wrong in the last eight or nine budgets. To err is human, but when it comes from a national government that is entrusted with the population's well-being, to be wrong eight times out of nine or nine out of nine is not a very inspiring record.

In answer to his question I would say people have lost confidence, and I think that polls do reflect how Canadians are feeling. They do not trust the government anymore. The member is right; how could you have confidence? That is the reason I am saying that as long as you have no political will, no courage to face up to the real problems, you are going nowhere.

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member delivered a very thought-provoking speech today and I it. I do not necessarily agree with everything he said but I enjoyed it.

I want to ask him about projections because that is exactly what they are. They are projections. They are made by economic organizations; institutions such as banks and trust companies; think tanks such as the C. D. Howe Institute and so on. In discussing the projections that have been made he is condemning the government for being way off in nine years, which is not accurate.

If the hon. member took time to take a look at the projections and the results I think he would find that the Minister of Finance was fairly accurate with his projections up until the recession. As a matter of fact he projected a deficit in a couple of years which was less than he had projected.

In the February 1992 budget the projections that were made by the Government of Canada were again less than what was made by the economic think tanks and the organizations within and outside Canada. The growth did not happen in the world as all those who consider this had projected, including the Government of Canada.

• (1300)

The Government of Canada's projections have been far more conservative than was a compilation of all the projections by other organizations.

I want to ask the hon. member if it is really fair for him to make that judgment when everyone made the same miscalculation at the time? It really has nothing to do with the Department of Finance or the Minister of Finance. He no more than the hon. member, his leader, or the IMF has a crystal ball, and things happen.

The hon. member knows full well that the budget deficit projections, which have been off, took place during the recessionary period. They were based on those projections where everybody was wrong.

In fairness, would the hon. member agree that it was not only the Government of Canada that had projections which did not become factual but everyone else as well throughout the world that made those projections? Every government throughout the world faces the same problems this government has faced because of the lack of growth in the world community.

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, let us assume that I go along with the argument the hon. member made concerning projections.

I realize that the government needs the help of the business community, economists and all the rest of them. Nevertheless I feel that when the deficits were growing through the years and some of the projections were off it did not mean he had to fire the economists in his department.

I know the whims of international prosperity. It is not a cut and dried situation. I think some measures could have been taken by the Minister of Finance such as I gave in my speech about Professor Bellan from Manitoba.

I thought that financing our deficit from within Canada would have been a tremendous measure.

Mr. McDermid: Do you agree with that?

Mr. Assad: I agree partly with what you gave.

Mr. McDermid: With what the professor says?

Mr. Assad: That the debt should be financed within Canada? Yes, I am convinced that is what it is about.

Mr. McDermid: So there is no money left for mortgages.

Mr. Assad: I know the minister's line of thought. He gave examples from the past, such as the period of 1939-45. I have mentioned that there are tremendous amounts of money in deposits. I am convinced we can finance it within our own country.

If we are going to have money from outside it should be invested in capital expenditures to make our industry more productive. Neither he nor I have the complete monopoly on the truth. Admire everybody who is seeking the truth but beware he who says he has it.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I am not professing that at all. The hon. member knows that. What I am saying is just to be fair when we are making these criticisms and when we talk about other things.

I am interested in the professor's comments because that was a part of the speech I found rather fascinating. He talks about $300 billion in savings accounts throughout Canada.

By the way, that money is not just sitting in savings accounts not doing anything. That money is being loaned out by the financial institutions for mortgages. It is being loaned out for businesses. It is being loaned out to create employment and so on. If all the money that was borrowed by the provincial and federal governments was funded from within Canada then that would take away from mortgages and from business investment and so on. It would leave less for that.

1939 to 1945 was a war period when a great number of the countries of the world who are now our allies were our enemies. Then we were talking about far less cost, a far less complicated society and a far less technical society than we have today.

His comparisons are a little unfair. I would challenge the professor to a debate on that. I would find that very interesting. The ideal would be that we finance all our debts but all levels of government do this. For example the Ontario government's last issue was an entirely foreign one. That goes on today not only with our governments but with other governments around the world.

• (1305)

Does the member not agree that if we took those savings, which are being used for other things, it could be detrimental to our economy?

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, the member mentioned that maybe he would like to debate Professor Bellan on the subject. We would all probably welcome the debate going outside this House on this subject. However I remain convinced, and he has convinced me, that Canadians have the capability to finance the deficit along with other needs in our country.

Do not forget that we have tremendous pension funds in this country. The banks have tremendous lending power. Some banks, I will not say they can create money, but they can lend tremendous amounts of money. I am not saying it is an artificial means but they sometimes lend more than what they have in deposits.

I am convinced that we can finance our government operations completely from within our own country.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, in addressing the borrowing authority matter before us there are a number of comments I want to make concerning four specific areas of government activity or the lack of government activity. I want to preface those with a few general comments about the economic direction, or lack of it, which this government has imposed on Parliament and the people of Canada.

The government is very fond of referring to these times as recessionary times. It is my opinion and that of many others across Canada that this has not been a recession like the others. In fact it is open to some question as to whether the term recession has been appropriate at all.

What we have been experiencing for the last number of years, particularly since 1988, is more like a major structural implosion which has been exacerbated by the fall-out of the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States and some of its implications, and looking ahead to the psychology taking root because of the impending North American free trade agreement.

These and other actions have caused a major "restructuring" which has destroyed much of our manufacturing industry base, particularly in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, but also in areas of the lower mainland of British Columbia, those areas that were in the lead in terms of a Canadian manufacturing industry and a resource-based processing industry.

To term that kind of basic restructuring, which has seen not just large-scale lay-offs but large-scale terminations and the creation of rust belts in Quebec and Ontario and other manufacturing and industrial areas, a recession is false. Many of those jobs will not come back.

We recognize that the world is changing and that the global marketplace has different dynamics than it had at one time. However those have been added to by the very kinds of actions that this government in Canada has taken.

Moving from that very general statement, when we look at the so-called economic planning of this government since it was first elected in 1984, and its constant hyping and high-frequency alarms about debt and deficits, some of them justified, that have been constantly forthcoming from the government, particularly from its finance ministers, what have we found?

• (1310)

The over-all debt picture of Canada has been getting worse and worse despite the efforts of this government. While it says with some braggadocio that the percentage of debt as related to the GDP is somehow better or our annual deficit positions are better its projections have constantly been way out. It has been deficit and debt reduction on the never—never plan.

We see almost exactly the same annual deficits now that we saw when this government was first elected in 1984, even with the rather profligate spending versus revenue generation policies of the Trudeau government that preceded it. It has been totally out of whack but it keeps saying things are looking up.

When one is flat on one's back even the bottom rung of the ladder looks high. That is about the only way that one can put any optimism into the economic scenario and the debt and deficit scenario that surrounds all of us, not only the federal government but those provincial governments who have been further encumbered by the cutbacks and the offloading that this federal government has participated in.

I am not going to suggest that it has done that with glee for it has certainly gone to great pains to disclaim its share of the responsibility for the difficulties that many provinces are having.

I would suggest that one of the irresponsible results of that action has been the drastic increase in our foreign debt, which is much more harmful to our long-term planning in this country than the domestic debt. The debts and deficits we had prior to this government taking office in 1984 were largely domestic.

Almost every economist would agree that we are in a much more serious situation as a result of a far higher percentage of our national and provincial debts being owed on the foreign market rather than within Canada's borders.

I said when I began that I specifically wanted to refer to four particular items that both my region and my industry, the forest industry, views with some alarm.

First of all, I want to go back to 1983 and then to 1984 and examine what at that point was the thrust of the former federal government and this federal government with regard to the forest industry, intensive silviculture and paving the way for what we hoped would be a healthier and more dynamic forestry sector. After all it is the major contributor to our balance of payments situation on the plus side and has its roots in every part of Canada in some 300 communities.

I think Mr. Roberts was the minister in the Trudeau government in 1983 when we had the first federal-provincial agreement on funding of intensive forestry and silviculture between the forestry provinces and the federal government.

In the case of British Columbia that worked out to $55 million a year from the federal government, for that one year, and $55 million from the province of British Columbia. It was a good start but it was short term and the government changed.

It was one of the best things this government had done, even though on an annual basis there was a slightly smaller commitment. It dropped from $55 million a year to $50 million a year in the case of British Columbia.

With extensive negotiations they established three-year and five-year forestry agreements between the federal government and the provinces that allowed for some long-term planning and some good co-ordination. It was far more cost effective, there was far more bang for the buck, and it did far more for the forest industry across this country in restocking some of the areas that had been left lying dormant for far too long and beginning to use some of the new technologies in terms of intensive silviculture and practices such as thinning, pruning, fertilization, and many other areas that had long been missing from what had been one of our most vital industries. Starting in 1983 for the first time but especially after this government took office in 1984, we saw some rational planning and significant commitment to that sector in a way that counted. All of us with emotional and financial roots in that industry were very happy to see that take place.

• (1315)

My party and I certainly recognize that forestry falls essentially within provincial jurisdiction, but federal governments for decades have derived large revenues from that industry. Many of us, including the government, I suspect, but certainly the Minister of Forestry when that ministry was established during the years of this government felt that it was long past the time that some of those revenues the federal government had been receiving for decades ought to be ploughed back into that sector. I give him full credit for the part he and his colleagues played in that.

Having that in mind, I was particularly saddened just the other day to hear the federal government, using the excuse of provincial jurisdiction, say that it was getting out. A great deal still has to be done, particularly at a time when we finally have some provincial governments trying to resolve with a great deal of difficulty some of the very emotional and hard nut cases of conflict over resource versus environment and other types of priorities for our forest lands.

The federal government is withdrawing from an area which everybody on both sides of those controversies and anybody connected with forestry agrees is a vital priority. One way we can try to get some of the heat of these arguments subdued is by renewing our commitment to a healthy and vital industry in which we can expect those resources to renew themselves with our assistance. Therefore, I regret that very much and hope the next government of whatever stripe will review that decision and renew what has been our commitment for the last few years to the health of that industry.

Related to that is another item which I raised briefly this morning. It has to do with the issue of tree spiking and the reluctance so far of the federal government to move in a serious way to impose penalties on those eco-terrorists. They threaten the lives of woodworkers whose job it is, whether they are in saw mills or loggers in the bush mainly on public lands and public property, to harvest our forest resource.

In saying that I recognize there are serious and in many cases valid differences of opinion as to what lands ought to be used industrially and what lands ought to be used for wildlife or other preservation or recreational opportunities. However, tree spiking is dangerous to life and is totally irresponsible. Everybody from the forest industry, the mainstream environmental organizations, government, labour and industry, agrees. For example, there is the kind of eco-terrorism Paul Watson was preaching by suggesting that some 20,000 trees in the Clayoquot Sound area had been spiked. We found evidence as early as last November that many of them had been and he can get away with it.

One province, British Columbia, has legislation that tries to come to grips with that and has named it as a serious offence. Reports were emanating from the B.C. Forestry Alliance and the Council of Forest Industries that the former Minister of Justice in this House had a team working on drafting amendments to the Criminal Code to specify tree spiking as a serious criminal offence. I currently have a private member's motion on the Order Paper dealing with that same issue in that same way and asking for minimum two-year sentences for those who counsel, incite or engage in tree spiking.

It is important. We have to send a clear message that that kind of terrorism, whether it is the spiking of trees or putting bombs in mailboxes, whatever kind of terrorism we are dealing with will not be tolerated and that is the will of this place.

• (1320)

I urge Department of Justice officials and the new justice minister to so act as soon as possible. At least declare that is the intention of the government. Hopefully we can find the time to do it before this Parliament is ended, but at least declare we are moving in that direction.

I briefly want to mention, another area in the economic and fiscal statement of last December it was stated:

> Funding of up to $90 million will be made available for projects to relieve critical bottlenecks and improve safety on highly travelled federal highways in national parks in British Columbia and Alberta. These highways are essential components of major east-west transportation corridors which are key to commerce, industry, tourism and personal travel in western Canada.

That is also a public safety issue. For years the city of Revelstoke, many others from that region and I have been urging the federal government to do some widening of the Trans-Canada Highway particularly in and around Glacier National Park with the amount of extra freight and long supertrucks on our highways. Tourist traffic has also increased by the fact that they cannot travel on VIA Rail anymore and this has only added to the congestion on those highways. It is a danger to public safety. I urge the government to ensure that there is not a political bias in terms of which national parks get that funding. Whether we are New Democrats or Tories or whatever, if we die on a crowded highway that is burdened with heavy freight traffic we are dead.

I urge the government to move in that direction and to make that program fair. We are happy to see it. Let us make it fair; let us save lives. While that is being done some of the park maintenance budgets should be increased. Then other park services would not have to be robbed to provide minimum safety and equipment to the Parks Canada highway crews whose job it is to keep what highways we do have safe for public travel.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise today on Bill C-117. It is curious that at the start of a brand new fiscal year the government is seeking permission to borrow $31 billion.

[Translation]

Once again the Minister of Finance measured up to the standards of his government by bringing in a budget that does nothing to boost the economy or wipe out poverty by introducing a job creation policy.

The number of food banks in this country has increased from one in 1981 to 126 in 1988 and 292 in 1991. In the past two years, food banks have become common on campuses across Canada. Statistics Canada reported a 53 per cent increase in requests for help from food banks. In 1990, two million Canadians, including 700,000 children, had to receive assistance from food banks at least once.

What a coincidence! The Tory government has been in power since 1984.

[English]

This time the government prepared everyone for major cuts. We were expecting the axe to fall. Canadians were ready to swallow the pill but at the last moment the finance minister backed out.

What is bleak in Canada is that our ability to respond appears quite timid. We do not seem to have the will to build the kind of support framework that will be required. In the 1970s we led a government that cared about the people, a government that cared about the future and about the lives of individual Canadians.

In 1993 there are voices suggesting that Canada be dropped from the G-7. Do you know why? Under the direction of this government our economy has shrunk to a level lower than Spain's. We are gradually losing economic clout in this world, all under the direction of the Conservatives.

The early statistics paint a very grim picture indeed. Every year this government seems to forget what is important. This is a budget of despair and nowhere does the Minister of Finance offer Canadians a light at the end of the tunnel. Nowhere in this budget does the government address the issue of jobs. Nowhere do the Conservatives even mention the need to get Canadians back to work, to get the economy going so that fewer people will rely on government hand-outs.

• (1325)

[Translation]

To quote the Leader of the Liberal party, the Minister of Finance has brought down a budget that reflects the state of the Conservative party. It has no strength, no design and no plan. The Conservative government is on its last leg and is more concerned with being re-elected then looking after the well-being of Canadians.

Once again, Canadians are being forced to make way for the political interests of a privileged few. This budget does absolutely nothing to reduce the deficit: a few minor cuts, when everyone was prepared to make sacrifices, to get rid of an increasingly crushing debt. Now we are asked to consider a bill that will let them borrow even more.

The government did not have the guts to face facts and act accordingly. Its credit card is worthless and may be withdrawn pretty soon. There is nothing in the budget to get the economy back on track and put Canadians back to work. Unemployment is up to 11 per cent, which does not include Canadians who are no longer looking for work. This is the worst performance of any G-7 country.

To make us feel better, the Minister of Finance said that in 1994 unemployment would be only 10 per cent. That's great. I am sure university graduates, young professionals and others who either cannot find jobs or have been told their jobs have been cut were impressed.

Where is the country headed with this government? So far, it has been headed straight for disaster. It is high time changes were made.

[English]

This government continues to neglect the policies that would help Canada compete. We need long-term investment in our human resources. This budget has no plans to increase investments in education, training, retraining, numeracy or literacy. The Conservatives do not even reaffirm their commitment to their centres of excellence.

One has to wonder if they care about Canadians' welfare or if they are simply letting the country fall apart while the Prime Minister is spending millions of taxpayers' dollars to travel around Europe, beating the bush for a high-paying job. I am sure the Prime Minister will not have any Canadians listed as references on his resumé. I doubt anyone would give him one after what he and the Conservative Party have done to this country.

We in the Liberal Party called for programs to boost our manufacturing and natural resources sectors, a manufacturing productivity centre which would assist small and medium sized Canadian firms get more value added and more high-paying jobs out of our natural resource sector. Of course these practical programs aimed at giving Canadian firms an edge over their competitors were not addressed in this budget. Could it be because Conservatives do not know how to deal with the Liberal Party's positive suggestions?

The Minister of Finance kept repeating the phrase that there is only one taxpayer. We know this. For those of us who served on city councils we know very well the reaction of taxpayers when we are forced to increase the rates because of cuts in transfers.

Since the Conservatives have been in power they have shirked their responsibility. They have passed the buck to the provinces to pick up the slack to finance programs such as health care, education and housing. When the Conservatives cut transfers they are forcing other levels of government to do their dirty work for them.

[Translation]

What about the government's housing initiative? Some initiative. The federal government will not increase its support for social housing through Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and will no longer fund housing through 35-year subsidy commitments.

It also expects to save $600 million over five years.

Fortunately, funding for shelters, native housing on reserves and the integration of persons with disabilities will continue. Unfortunately, that is not enough.

The fact is that before the cuts in CMHC's social housing budget these projects reached only 6 per cent of the population. Today 15 per cent of Canadians need this kind of housing—one million Canadians—and the demand for this kind of housing is growing steadily. Is this government aware of the real needs of Canadians? Sometimes it seems so oblivious to the social and economic situation in this country that you wonder whether it is living on the same planet.

[English]

The government is also cutting back on the frequency it sends out the GST rebate cheques. So far seniors and other people with low incomes look forward to receiving their rebate cheques in order to help make ends meet. Seniors benefit from the cheques as they put them in the bank and any interest they gain helps offset the cost of the GST.

By cutting back from four cheques to two a year the Conservatives are simply picking the pockets of seniors for the spare change they will get from interest on the GST rebate cheques. It is just another example of how the government fails to understand the true needs of seniors across this country.

Since last fall I have been collecting signatures on a petition urging the government to re-examine the mechanism it uses to calculate the cost of living index for seniors.

Thousands of people in Saint-Laurent, Cartierville and Montreal signed this petition. The response from the minister of health has been a joke. The government simply does not get it. It refuses to look at this issue because it knows that an index specifically designed to look at the cost of living for seniors would show that it increases at a rate far higher than inflation.

Seniors want real answers from this government in terms of their problems. They want the federal government to take them seriously and not give them simple platitudes before election time.

[Translation]

Interestingly, at a time when the number of senior citizens is increasing and will continue to increase over the years, the Tory government has decided to reduce their chances of being heard. Is it a coincidence that the same thing is happening to the voice of the neediest in this country? Is the government afraid to face people who have some very serious demands? Is it afraid to face its failure to wipe out poverty and meet its commitment to enhancing the well-being of all Canadians?

By merging the National Advisory Council on Aging and the National Council of Welfare, the government is trying to give the impression it will save a lot of money.

We seriously question the government's judgment especially since savings will be negligible. In its 1991-92 annual report the National Advisory Council on Aging reported a budget of $396,200 and a staff of nine person-years, which represents only half the cost of the Prime Minister's farewell trip.

Both councils have always admirably represented their respective constituencies. Is that perhaps the real reason why the government insisted on this merger? Do the Conservatives really believe that the facts and the problems will go away because they gagged the poor and the elderly? This is one more example of poor judgment on the part of a government that is grinding slowly to a halt.

It is high time we had a new government that knows how to listen and how to act, after as well as before an election.

[English]

The government tries to sell a message of fiscal responsibility but with this budget and the additional borrowing we learn the deficit is absolutely out of control. In 1992-93 the deficit was supposed to have been $8 billion less than it actually was. It is over $1 billion more than he predicted it would be in last year's budget.

• (1335)

The minister's predictions confirm that the candidates for the leadership of the Conservative Party are completely out of touch with reality when they say they can eliminate the deficit within four or five years. If this is the case why are they not telling Canadians exactly how they are going to get rid of the deficit? Will they cancel old age security pensions? Will they cut back on UI? Will they cancel medicare? How about cutting transfer payments to the provinces even more?

The government has to be honest with Canadians. We are not buying this time. It did not tell Canadians about the GST and we are stuck with it. Canadians demand to know from the Conservative Party what it is going to do, otherwise it should call an election and give us Liberals a chance to govern. We know where we want to take this country. We know that we must get Canadians and Canada working again.

[Translation]

Our leader, the future hon. member for Saint-Maurice, is committed to controlling public spending, to suspending programs that do not directly create jobs and contributing to the economic development of this country as well as to reducing our debt in proportion of the GDP.

A Liberal government will not try to reduce inflation to zero percent by maintaining high interest rates that stifle our economy. It will find a fair balance between inflation control and economic growth by maintaining the Canadian inflation rate at a level comparable to the American rate.

We on this side of the House are committed to budgetary responsibility and to strict spending control.

[English]

Here is a suggestion of where to cut. It can eliminate the Canadian Multiculturalism Advisory Committee in the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship. It can roll back the totally ridiculous wage increases for citizenship judges and political appointees of this government.

The Conservative government loves talking about fiscal restraint and budget control but it is clear from its inability to act that it is simply not serious about cutting back in non-essential areas. Liberals understand that the only way to cut the debt is to get rid of the deficit and get Canadians back to work. We must get them off government assistance and UI. We must put the 11 per cent of Canadians who are unemployed and the millions more who are underemployed in situations where they can maximize their contributions to Canada's economy.

Without the two-directional Liberal approach of fiscal responsibility and economic growth, any attempt to tackle Canada's economic problems will be futile.

[Translation]

The Conservative government has been in office for more than eight years now. For more than eight years it has been promising the moon but has reneged on its promises, budget after budget. It has been more than eight years that Canadians, who are generous by nature, have been giving it a chance. Now it is over. The country can no longer afford to be run by a wishy-washy government. Canada needs an economic plan that will stimulate growth, not promises without any concrete implications.

The Liberal Party has proposals to put on the table. It has achievable measures in the short, medium and long term to propose. The most important thing is to rebuild our national industrial base and to restore public confidence.

Our party is committed to stimulating job creation by supporting the development of an economy focused on technological progress by controlling the budget deficit and by reducing the debt. Our party is committed to working in consultation with the provinces in order to convince them to remove trade barriers.

The Liberal Party has the tools that it needs. It has the resource persons. It is ready to work with and for all Canadians. Our party is on course and will steer the country to prosperity after the next election.

[English]

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the previous contributors to this debate for the information they have imparted to the House.

We are here to debate a borrowing bill which will allow the government to borrow the money to meet its requirements over the current fiscal year. I understand that if the bill is not passed rather expeditiously the government will be forced into some short-term borrowing that will result in higher borrowing costs. We do not want to delay passage of this legislation any longer than necessary and force the government into the position I talked about.

• (1340)

There is no question in the minds of members of Parliament in this House and in the minds of Canadians that what has happened with the public debt over the last years of Tory government has been absolutely dramatic and very difficult for Canadians to understand. They know this government came to office talking in grand terms about dealing with the deficit and the debt problem that was created by the Liberals. However since it began its term of office the debt has more than doubled and this Conservative government has failed dismally in its attempts to deal with the problem of the deficit.

Its policies with respect to the debt and the deficit simply have not worked. It reminds me of a previous legislature where I sat for approximately 16 years. It had a little different approach to the way debates and discussions took place. In fact we had a sort of parting of the ways in British Columbia in the early 1980s when the Bennett government of the day decided it was going to embark on what he called the restraint program. One of his advisers was Bud Smith who may be remembered from another situation and one of his major advisers was Kim Campbell. She was one of the backroom people in Bennett's office when the restraint program was being rammed down the throats of the people of British Columbia.

When Mr. Bennett brought in this so-called restraint program he said it was absolutely necessary to cut down government expenditures and the debt. It would make sure we did not pass the debt and deficit problems on to our children so they would not be able to enjoy the kinds of programs we enjoy today at their expense.

In fact the Bennett government in British Columbia and succeeding premiers in British Columbia created more deficit and greater debt than any previous government in the history of the province largely as a result of the so-called restraint program. The restraint program was actually a cover for an ideological program that the Socreds had in mind for the government of British Columbia.

Essentially it was designed to diminish the ability of the government to be a large player in terms of negotiations with labour, citizens groups and corporations. Bennett systematically dismantled the power of the province and created huge debts and deficits which limited the decision-making options of British Columbia. The province ended up being a very weak force in terms of its ability to aid its people, create new programs and develop new employment and opportunities for people.

The goal of the Social Credit Party, which was essentially a coalition of Liberals and Conservatives, was essentially to weaken the government to the point where it did not pose any kind of countervailing threat to the private sector. It was very successful in doing that.

What Mike Harcourt's government is dealing with today in British Columbia is precisely the problem of trying to restore the finances of the province to health so it can deliver the kind of existing programs it is obliged to deliver as well as create new programs that voters in that province are demanding.

I see the same kind of thing happening here in Ottawa where far from setting out to reduce the debt and the deficit of this country in my view the Conservatives have actually increased the debt dramatically based on their spending history. They have increased the deficit dramatically and brought about fiscal and monetary programs that have made this government much weaker in terms of its ability to assist Canadians and play a role in the development of this country for the benefit of all Canadians. In fact this government is now obsessed with the issue of debt and deficit because of the political plan of the Conservative Party on coming to office.

• (1345)

Statistics Canada has provided a great learning aid for the people in this House of Commons. It did a study some time back. First of all the government tried to suppress the study. The study actually analysed the cause of the debt here in Canada.

It found that roughly 55 per cent of that debt was due to concessions to the wealthy and large corporations. These are tax concessions we are talking about and those tax concessions were made to the wealthiest of Canadians, not to the middle class and not to the lower income Canadians. These tax concessions were made, according to the Statistics Canada study, to the wealthiest people in Canada, the people who should be paying their fair share of the tax burden.

In addition the tax concessions were made to large and profitable corporations which should have been contributing positively to the revenues of the people of Canada. In fact those concessions according to Statistics Canada resulted for many years in well over 100,000 profitable corporations paying no tax at all as a result of those policies of successive Liberal and Conservative governments.

According to Statistics Canada that is where 55 per cent of the blame lies for the current debt structure that we face in this country.

Now it says about 40 per cent is due to the high interest policy which was also pursued by the two parties because they are interchangeable it seems when they get into office. The Liberals sound like New Democrats when they are in opposition. They act like Tories when they are in office. The Tories sound like Tories in opposition. They act like Tories when they get into office.

In any case what we end up with in this country, regardless of whether they wear the label Liberal or Conservative, is essentially the same political ideology in office from those two corporate sponsored political parties.

About 40 per cent of the problem with the debt we have in this country according to the Statistics Canada study is due to the high interest rate policy pursued by both Liberals and Tories in office.

It always amazes me to hear the Prime Minister talk about the interest rate levels at the time the Liberals left office, the unemployment rates when the Liberals left office and all of those problems that we were experiencing when the Liberals left office. He is responding to the criticism made by the Liberals that his government is doing precisely the same thing.

The policy pursued by both of them with respect to interest rates has caused roughly 40 per cent of the accumulated debt that we now have to deal with in Canada and that this Parliament is charged with dealing with.

Statistics Canada also pointed out that 6 per cent of the debt problem is due to program over-runs. What does this government do? Does it attack the 50 per cent that is the problem, which is the concessions to the wealthy and the powerful and the corporations? Does it attack that which has been determined by Statistics Canada to cause 55 per cent of our debt problems? No. It increases the number of tax concessions going to corporations. It increases the problem.

Does it attack the problem of high interest rate policies? There is no question about the fact that interest rates have come down but the spreads in interest rates between ourselves and the United States and some other countries are still relatively high and are still a major cause of the problem. I do not think they are 40 per cent because of the reduction in the interest rates but they are still a major cause of the problem.

Fifty-five per cent of the problem is due to concessions to wealthy individuals, high income earners and wealthy corporations which do not pay any tax at all. Why does the government not deal with the major problems? Instead of dealing with those problems, why does the government not turn around and take a look at that 6 per cent of the responsibility and try to attack that 6 per cent which is program funding and over-runs on programming? We cannot solve the deficit problems and the debt problems in this country by dealing with the cause of 6 per cent of it. It simply does not work that way. It is an ideological problem, a blinker problem that this Conservative government has. It is unwilling to challenge the people who supported the Tories and paid their way into office. That is the rich, the powerful and the profitable corporations. They cannot deal with that 55 per cent of the problem because that is where their meal ticket is to get into this Chamber and that is why we are not dealing with the problem.

• (1350)

The gentleman across the way is saying:"Well, what about labour?" Labour does donate to the New Democratic Party and we are pleased to receive its donations. It supports us in large measure all across the country. I think that is because we are understood to be the party that does the most for individual Canadians and are most concerned about the problems being faced by individual Canadians, including individual workers.

The minister does bring up a problem and that is that there is a lack of national consensus in this country. Canadians from every walk of life do not agree with the direction in which the government is going. There is no forum developed in order to bring those people together, in order to get them to agree and to go in the right direction.

It is interesting that just a few months ago the Canadian Centre for Labour Market Productivity looked at some countries to find out why some economies were so successful in economic good times and also in times of economic recession. It identified a number of countries. For example, it pointed to Switzerland. Switzerland has a very strong business oriented national consensus which makes it a very successful country in terms of pursuing its economic goals. It is pointed out that these are business oriented economic goals but labour, the general public, government and business all have the same view of the world and it helps them to be successful.

Australia has a different way of looking at it. When the labour government entered into an agreement with the Australian Council of Trade Unions many years ago, it set up a national consensus based on the labour accords in Australia. Because this accord turned out to be relatively successful, business, while not a signatory, went along with the agreement. As a result a government of national consensus was established in Australia which made it a relatively successful economy compared to the kind of conflicts it it had before. What is lacking in Canada is that national consensus among groups in Canada which need to be onside in order to make this economy successful. The consensus is lacking.

This government has done very little to bring it together. It is a government that has directly attacked labour. In fact, I can recall when there was a grain handlers strike in Vancouver and our members were standing up in the House asking for government assistance to resolve the grain handlers strike. Essentially the Prime Minister said to our speakers on this side of the House:"Well, you go talk to your friends in labour and get them to back off the grain handlers strike".

What struck me is not that we had friends in labour or in the grain handlers union. I do not think we would have been as successful or any more successful than anyone else in dealing with those people at that particular time. What struck me is that the government felt that it had no friends in labour and as a result there was no network upon which to develop a consensus on economic issues. I think it is important that this Parliament consider that need.

When this Prime Minister first came to power in 1984 he convened a meeting representing all sectors of the Canadian economy. I recall that a number of union leaders across the country went to the meeting. I recall he even brought Bob Hawke, the Prime Minister of Australia, who had managed labour accord in Australia. I understand that he brought business people and other sectors of the economy together in the hopes of finding out if there was the basis for a national consensus in Canada. Unfortunately that conference withered on the vine. The idea seemed to flit away from the Prime Minister's mind right after the conference ended so he did not pursue this issue. The problem here is that this country, this government, this Parliament lacks a national consensus as to where we should be going as a country. A country that does not have that ends up wallowing.

• (1355)

What we see with this government in the last budget and in the borrowing bill is that the government has essentially given up the fight on the debt and the fight against the deficit. The government talks about the net public debt in 1997-98 being another $100 billion more than it is today, half a trillion dollars in debt. That is quite a legacy to leave for future governments and this bill is a part of the problem.

What we need is a new way of looking at these issues, of getting all parties together, getting all sectors of the economy together and addressing these issues so that the government is listening to everybody and setting up a plan that represents a consensus of the people of Canada. It has not happened to date. It is unlikely to happen under the current government. I cannot see it happening under future leaders of that party. I am just hoping that at some point in the future somebody will take the advice that has been given to us by some of the more successful economies on earth and take a look at the idea of the need for a government of national consensus around economic issues.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Very simply, Mr. Speaker, the member has given us a good explanation of why in the face of the crisis that we have in Canada, or a virtual crisis or perceived crisis with respect to debt and deficit, there is a need to build a national consensus on how to deal with it. As a member of the New Democratic Party I am sure he is aware of the difficulties being confronted by an NDP government in Ontario in building just that very kind of consensus.

In the last few days we have had really a very direct rebuff of the NDP government by the trade union movement, particularly Public Service trade unions in saying they are not prepared to deal with a government that wants to roll back wages or reduce employment among their particular membership and that they are on that basis not willing to engage in the discussion of what the government has called a social contract.

I wonder in the face of that kind of rebuff of an NDP government by the very people with whom it ought to be best able to build that kind of consensus, how does the member see us building a national consensus in a situation in which the divisions are so acute and so difficult?

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): I would like to thank the member for his very worth-while question.

In British Columbia with the accord that was signed with health care workers over the closure of a number of hospitals in Vancouver, the government was able in that case to sit down with health care workers and to hammer out an accord which now may run into a bit of difficulty with the management of the hospitals. I think that in spite of the public expressions of disgust about the whole process that people now are willing to sit down and are willing to see the accord develop.

I think there is a general feeling among labour, government and the hospital managers in British Columbia that there has to be some kind of an agreement that is going to allow us to continue on with the health care system and to make sure that there is no interruption in service. In the face of a crisis that Bob Rae is dealing with here in Ontario where the government has already announced its stated position as requested by the unions, I think the unions have publicly reacted in a very negative way to the material put forward on the table by the Bob Rae government.

What I see in terms of a silver lining in the cloud is the unions saying they are going to prepare their own proposals to submit back to the Bob Rae government. While negotiations as they appear in the media look like they have broken down or look like they are in a very difficult situation, in fact the unions are looking at their future, the need to sit down with government and the need to come to an agreement. I think they are developing their own proposals.

• (1400)

At this time I am still very optimistic about the fact that a social contract can be reached with the workers of the Ontario government. It is not going to be everything that either side wants. It is not going to be everything that Bob Rae wants. Perhaps he will have to give up on some of his non-negotiable items. It is not going to be everything that the trade unions demand and they will have to give up on some of their demands.

I am very optimistic, and I think the good faith is fundamentally there. Those people will sit down and at some point reach an accord. I am hopeful, for the benefit of Canadians and for the benefit of people in Ontario, that will be the case.

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to make a few comments on the bill debated this afternoon, and also on the budget tabled by the Minister of Finance on Monday.

First, I want to say that I am quite aware of the fact that the Minister of Finance was faced with a difficult task when he started working on this budget. The projections on the deficit in the last budgets, not only those of the minister in 1992 but also those of his predecessor in 1991, have really been inaccurate. An enormous mistake was made in predicting the deficit for the year which just ended and also for the year which started on April 1, 1993.

[English]

The fact that it was a difficult budget to prepare in these times, however, does not excuse what I believe has been a display of incompetence and, to put it mildly, a lack of frankness in the presentation of the budget. Let me begin with the question of whether this budget was competently presented and the circumstances that have followed its presentation.

In recent weeks, amid the rhetoric of Conservative leadership candidates talking about their ability to bring down the deficit, concurrently we had the Minister of Finance talking about the great problem the deficit and the debt had created. We had the acceptance of the enormity of the fiscal calamity by governments of all political colours in Canada. We had the premier of Newfoundland, Mr. Wells, having brought in a very tight fiscal budget, going to the people of Newfoundland in an election campaign and asking for their support to fight the deficit. At the same time we had the NDP governments of Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia talking about the problem the deficit and the debt creates.

In this political environment the minister came forward a couple of weeks back with a document talking about the fact he was going to bring in a tough budget and there was a political acceptance of the need for such a budget. That was the climate created by the minister into which he brought the 1993 budget. He had managed to create expectations among the public, among the investment community and among international bond markets that the budget was going to be one signal that showed Canada was finally going to get its debt and deficit under control. That is what he promised.

The previous speaker or I or others of us may or may not have disagreed or agreed with whether what he was signalling to the markets was the right things to do. That is not my point here.

• (1405)

My point is that when a minister of finance speaks the world listens. The world, not just within Canada, has invested heavily in Canadian debt and the Canadian dollar as security. The Minister of Finance sent a signal. The signal was clear: this budget was going to bring down the deficit. That in itself accounts for what happened to the dollar following the presentation of the budget. It accounts for what happened when the Canadian Bond Rating Service downgraded the debt on Tuesday. It accounts for the crisis of confidence in the government and the minister that followed the presentation of this budget. We have not had a fiasco like this since the budget leak of 1989.

The result is not neutral to Canadian taxpayers. The result has been an increase in the Bank of Canada rate on Tuesday in order to support the dollar and undisclosed spending out of the foreign exchange accounts in order to defend the dollar by the Bank of Canada or its agents. Those we will not know about until some months from now when we know what the level of foreign exchange really is. Those transactions and the rise in the bank rate are not neutral to Canadian taxpayers. The Treasury bills that turned over on Canadian government debt this week and had to be turned over at higher interest rates are costing Canadian taxpayers money. The Minister of Finance is accountable for that and he should be answering for it.

I said that the budget had a lack of frankness. Some might say it was downright dishonest. I am quoting from the minister's speech, the opening lines of his budget speech:

> Today I am presenting a budget that will deliver: no new taxes; no tax increases;

When we go through this document, for the benefit of those who do not often look at these, it is fundamental that we deal with the accounts of the government on an annual basis. We use a fiscal year that starts on April 1 and ends on March 31. It is not that complicated. We need to have some basis for comparing year to year, period to period. All the revenue projections, all the spending projections and all the deficit numbers are all done on a 12-month fiscal year basis.

When the minister says "no tax increases", does he not mean on a fiscal year basis? Would we not think when everything else in the document is based on the fiscal year that he is talking about a fiscal year when he says "no tax increases"? Apparently not. He decided to save money, save administrative costs, by taking the four GST tax rebates and combining them into two rebates. That is going to save costs a little bit, granted, because of the fact the cheques have to be printed, calculated and so on. Guess what? He is combining them so that the January cheque is combined with the April cheque and paid in April.

Let us think about that for a minute. The fiscal year end is March 31. If we take a January payment out of one fiscal year and we combine it with the April payment in the next fiscal year, what have we done? We have taken $625 million of reduced revenue—because it really nets out against the GST—and put it into the next fiscal year.

What effect does that have on the statement of accounts? It works its way through in a couple of items. It works its way into the net revenue from the GST which goes up for the fiscal year by $625 million. It works its way into the debt financing and reduction account—that is another sham account we can talk about in a minute if we have time—for this year because it reduces the debt financing costs by $625 million.

Guess what? The minister said there were no tax increases. What has he done? He has raised the GST revenue by $625 million. How? By effectively reducing the amount paid to the poorest Canadians in the current fiscal year. If it is such a good idea to combine two quarterly payments, I have an idea for him. Why do we not move the October payment to January so that low income Canadians get their cheques in January, just after Christmas when a lot of them need it? It works the same way. The administrative costs are just as much a savings.

That whole $625 million would still be in the current fiscal year. The minister would not be able to play his little game of shifting it into next year. If I have anything to say about it, when this government is tossed out we will give that $625 million back to Canadians. If it is no tax increase what does it matter? It is all neutral, right? That is the way this government has dealt with the numbers on the books of this country since day one.

Going back to November 1984, the government came into office and delivered a financial statement. The former Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre, rose in the House and said: "Here is what we are going to cut. We are going to cut all kinds of things that those wasteful Liberals were doing. If we do not cut them, do you know what? By the end of the fiscal year the deficit will reach $34 billion, if we do not make all these cuts".

By the end of that fiscal year he had managed to run the deficit up to $38 billion with his cuts. He managed to cram every last expenditure he could get into that year. Even this week, those members were arguing that in the last year of Liberal government the deficit was $38 billion. It spent a whole portion of that in the months between September and March when it was in office. This is a budget, like so many other financial statements that have been presented by this government, that is fundamentally dishonest.

I want to raise another question. I do not know the answer to this one. I have looked at how much the government wants to borrow in this borrowing bill and it is a large amount of money. We are looking at a bill which asks for the authority to borrow $31.5 billion.

Last year we had a bill for borrowing too. In that one the government requested $24.7 billion. That is quite a large difference. What did the government have to do? Last year it had to bring in another bill which passed on February 15 for an additional $8 billion. I smell a rat here.

The House cannot sit beyond November 21, 1993. After that an election will have to be called. At least it would have to be called in order for the House to resume sitting some time within the year following. There is a lot of leeway. The House of Commons fundamentally exists to vote supply for the government, to give it the money to operate. If the government had not borrowed enough money in this bill and began to run out, it would have had to call the election early enough. We all hope the government will call it soon, but the possibility with a borrowing bill of $31.5 billion is that the House could continue until some time in 1994 with the government burning up the money it is borrowing today.

• (1415)

It is unfortunate that this government has not borrowed just enough money to get it through a summer election so the people of Canada can make up their minds. Then we will deal with who should be making the decisions that have to do with managing the finances of this country.

A lot of the rhetoric and discussion about debt and deficit somehow misses the point. The fact that we have a debt-deficit problem is analogous to having a high fever when suffering from a disease or illness. During a bad case of the flu one gets a fever. If the fever gets out of control the fever itself can kill. But treating the fever alone is not enough to deal with the underlying disease. The disease is what we have to try to find a cure for. It is true that when we have a high fever maybe a cold bath or drinking fluids or whatever the doctor prescribes is useful. They reduce the fever but we still need to address the illness.

I believe that the deficit we have been suffering in Canada is like a fever. A cutting of expenditures is like a cool bath. It reduces the fever and tries to address that part of the problem, but the fundamental underlying disease that we are suffering from in the Canadian economy is the fact that we have been going through the last number of years of recession and low economic growth.

When we look at the government's records in terms of its spending, revenue and borrowing it is clear that we ran into problems when the revenue dropped off significantly. The revenue dropped off more rapidly than any government could have rectified by cutting expenditures.

We really had a problem of low revenue, not because tax rates where not high enough, but because the economy was not generating enough wealth. The government's share began to decline as did the private sector's share. The fundamental underlying disease we are dealing with is not the debt or the deficit but the weakness that exists in the Canadian economy itself.

That is why to look to the budget for some plan for economic growth is a search that must be performed. If we do not see a plan for where we are going to grow and where we can build the jobs that are going to generate the income that will be taxed tomorrow, then the deficit today which we know is going generate tax increases tomorrow is going to become an insurmountable problem.

Perhaps the greatest failure of this budget, even though it may be an interim budget until the government chooses a new leader, is that it lacks the plan and direction. It gives us no indication of where economic growth and prosperity is going to come from in order to address that fundamental problem which underlies the economy.

I cannot help but take the opportunity to look at that bottom line deficit projection for the five-year forecast contained in the budget and see that after five years we will continue to run a deficit of $8 billion for the year 1997-98 under this minister's plan.

It baffles me how two of his cabinet colleagues can go out on the hustings. The Minister of National Defence can claim that she can eliminate the deficit in five years and the Minister of the Environment can claim that he can eliminate the deficit in four years. The man in charge of it all, the Minister of Finance, brings in a budget that says: "Sorry, folks. After five years we still are going to be $8 billion in the hole".

• (1420)

Why does the Prime Minister not just stop right now and turn the whole thing over perhaps to the Minister of the Environment? I see that the four-year forecast is $14 billion. He is $14 billion better than the Minister of Finance. Why not give him that job today and let him get started at it?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Paproski in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-117, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1993.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On Clause 3—Adjustment of Maximum Amount

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Some hon. members: On division.

Clause 3 agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the wish of the House to suspend the sitting to the call of the Chair for the consideration of Private Members' Business?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 2.26 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 2.37 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there consent to call it three o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being three o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved that Bill C-389, an act to amend the Criminal Code (invasion of privacy), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to bring before Parliament a bill dealing with a matter of public concern over the last two or three years. It has been brought about by an increasing awareness on the part of the public of intrusions into their privacy and a sequence of lower court decisions that have made it apparent that section 183 of the Criminal Code, which purports to protect the telephone privacy of Canadians is no longer effective in protecting that privacy.

The bill which I present to the House would broaden the definition of a private communication as it is now defined in the Criminal Code. It will be broadened to state, and I will just quote the subsection I am dealing with here: "shall be deemed to include any oral communication or telecommunication transmitted through the facilities of a telecommunications carrier, irrespective of whether or not the transmission is both originated and received solely within Canada".

That adds to the definition of private communication and deems that every telephone conversation that takes place in Canada, whether or not it originates here, is protected by the privacy provisions of the code under the sections that prohibit wire-tapping.

This particular section of the code was enacted approximately 20 years ago because of increasing incursions into the privacy of Canadians and at that time it was simply called wire-tapping. At that time all of the normal telephone traffic in Canada and in the western world was carried by wires. At a certain point in time the telephone companies resorted to microwave transmissions to convey telephone transmissions in bulk.

• (1440)

Then at a later point in time we began using cellular telephones, which was radio technology. Those radio telephones, those cellular phones, use particular assigned frequencies in the frequency spectrum that is available to us in here in Canada. They are assigned in various countries around the world just as radio stations are assigned frequencies.

That is an explanation of what this bill does. The difficulty is obviously one of increasing technology. As a result of new and improved technology people who want to eavesdrop are more easily able to intercept private communications of Canadians on their cellular telephones.

This technology goes a little further. I am sure that as I speak there is another technology which we have not heard of yet. It is being used in the security and intelligence field and one day soon we will have an opportunity to read about it in Popular Science or Popular Mechanics magazine. As soon as it has become public the security and intelligence people will move on to a new technology.

I know that the technology is capable of picking up computer-stored data from outside of the building in which the computer exists. A personal computer emits rays and signals on different frequencies as it just sits there. Like a sponge we are now able to simply extract the data from the computer as it sits inside a building from a van or a car outside the building. We are playing catch-up football in this procedure in which we are trying to continue to protect the privacy of Canadians.

There were a number of Canadian cases that dealt with this right across the whole country. It was interesting to look at these cases because of the range they represented. The courts began some years ago, approximately in the late seventies, to indicate that a telephone conversation transmitted on a radio frequency might not be private as defined by the code. The code says: "In order for it to be a private communication there must be on the part of the person making the telephone call a reasonable expectation of privacy".

I would have thought that anybody making a telephone call through a telephone telecommunications carrier would have assumed that his or her phone call would have been private. The courts began back in the late seventies and into the eighties strictly interpreting the provisions of the code and saying that when people use a radio telephone there is not the reasonable expectation of privacy.

Consequently there is a big gap in the privacy protections as a result of those cases. American cases had to deal with the same issues. They came out to approximately the same meanings.

I took a different view in reading the code. I interpreted the section to cover every telephone communication so that if the person believed his or her conversation was private then it was, but the courts ruled differently.

Just shortly after I presented this bill, the government presented Bill C-109 in an attempt to redress that area of concern and other areas of concern, all of which are important. The bill has not yet completely gone through the parliamentary process but it has moved through the House process. In dealing with telephone privacy that bill deals with only two types of interception of telephone conversations.

• (1445)

The first type of phone call the government's bill would protect is a phone call that the interceptor intercepts for malice or for gain. The focus there is on the interceptor, on the wire-tapper.

The second kind of phone call that would be protected under the government bill is an encrypted telephone conservation. That is an encoded telephone conversation in which the signal is scrambled and then transmitted and then descrambled for the receiver of the telephone conversation.

That is all it does. All of the other cellular telephone calls that we make are certainly not encrypted. They remain unprotected.

This causes a problem for Canadians. That is the problem my bill is intended to redress. We accept now that they are not protected. The government accepts that people making or receiving telephone calls on cellular phones are not protected. Simple eavesdropping is not covered under this new government bill. It is apparently okay to eavesdrop on somebody making a phone call on a cellular phone but it is not okay to wire-tap from a wire transmission.

Apparently the only people around here these days who are protected under the new bill by means of the encrypted phone call are the ministers of the government, all of whom have encrypted conversation facilities. Government ministers are protected under the bill but ordinary Canadians are not.

The second problem is that the government says that there are too many scanners out there, too many pieces of equipment that can pick up telephone conversations. There are some 900,000 in the country. What is not being pointed out is that almost every one of them, or the vast majority, are dedicated scanners for ordinary radios, ordinary televisions and other electronic devices. They are dedicated and they are not being used for wire-tapping.

The third problem, and it is one that was pointed out just today in the lead editorial of The Toronto Star, is the inconsistency of the government's position. In its editorial The Toronto Star asks the rhetorical question: "People could be prosecuted for intercepting cellular phone conversations maliciously or for gain even though it would still be perfectly legal to eavesdrop. Does that make any sense?" It has tapped right into part of the problem.

Another problem that evolves out of this is reflected by the U.S. response. The United States government sees the same problem but it has approached it differently. It has banned at a date in the future, some time in 1994, the import and manufacture in the United States of all radio scanners capable of picking up telephone frequencies.

Until 1994 everybody can continue to manufacture, import and use scanners, but after 1994 in theory there should be no more equipment of that nature. People cannot import it and they cannot manufacture it. All of the existing equipment will ultimately, as technology changes, become outmoded. Eventually the easy scanning will die. That is the approach that is being taken in the United States.

There is the Government of Canada's approach, which only deals with malicious and gainful interceptions or encrypted phone calls, there is the U.S. position, and then there is the simple solution offered by my bill.

I want to point out another problem at the same time. The new government bill does not address the apparent problem of an agency of the Canadian government that is currently freely intercepting all of this radio wave telephone conversation. That is the Communications Security Establishment. That agency is now doing it.

Based on the interpretation of the Criminal Code the agency would appear not to be doing anything illegal. It does not get warrants. In fact it does not even tell us what it is doing. I am making certain inferences here from information that is available to parliamentarians and to people who read the media across Canada. Under the new government bill that agency will continue to be free to intercept because it is not doing it maliciously or for gain. I do not know how it is dealing with the encrypting problem but if there is any agency in this country capable of encrypting and de-encrypting it is the Communications Security Establishment. That is its job for the Government of Canada on behalf of Canada's security agencies.

I submit to the House, that my bill addresses this problem of agencies of the government. The problem has also been addressed by the Supreme Court of Canada which says government may not wire-tap. It may not intrude on the privacy of Canadians. There are special rules for the Government of Canada as I understand it and I am always subject to correction. The Communications Security Establishment should come forward to Parliament and explain what it is doing. It is carrying on unchecked and unregulated now by the Criminal Code and apparently even by the government's new Bill C-109.

I submit to the House that what is needed is a bill of the nature I have proposed. The government's current proposals simply do not go far enough.

As I said earlier there is a kind of inconsistency of logic here. One of the reasons the government says it does not want to ban eavesdropping now on ordinary cellular phone calls is because there are too many people out there capable of scanning. There are too many people able to eavesdrop. I think that is what the government is saying and I quote an editorial from The Montreal Gazette which says: "It would be wrong and probably futile to try to ban the scanners because there are so many".

If the government's logic is that it does not want to ban it because there are so many people eavesdropping already then why the heck would we bother to prohibit theft? Why would we bother to prohibit smoking marijuana? I am sure there are a lot more people committing theft in this country than there are intercepting telephone conversations. I am certain of it, although I cannot prove it. I do not know anybody who is a telephone wire-tapper. I know the odd person who has stolen and if I am correct there are people even in this House who have smoked marijuana. Admit it.

The fact that there are many people capable of scanning phone conversations and intercepting them is not a reason for not prohibiting the scanning of phone calls. The privacy of Canadians is at stake. We either have it, are entitled to it and there are laws protecting it, or we do not have it. Right now the government admits that cellular telephone users do not have the protection from ordinary public eavesdroppers or from the Communications Security Establishment, or any other outfit that wants to eavesdrop on cellular telephone conversations.

The government has said that some day in the future—and this sounds like an advertisement for a well-known electronics manufacturer whose name I will not mention—and that day is not now, all or most of our telephone conversations will be encrypted. It will not be an option as it is now; it will simply be there. However it is a bit of an illusion that all telephone conversations will be encrypted and therefore protected because just as the technology of encrypting has advanced, so will the technology of eavesdropping advance.

As the parliamentary secretary for the Minister of Justice pointed out in the debate on Bill C-109, we are always playing catch-up football in this field of technology. I do not really care where the technology is. I submit to this House that the principal concern is not the technology but the privacy of Canadian telephone users.

We all remember the Wilhelmy eavesdropping incident in the province of Quebec during the Constitution negotiations. That was eavesdropping with a cellular telephone. There were others. There was a very prominent one on the west coast. Even Her Royal Highness, the Princess of Wales, was apparently eavesdropped on by means of a cellular phone interception. These all make us painfully aware that our privacy is not protected.

• (1455)

I want to close by highlighting that the assertions of the government that it has moved to protect telephone privacy is only partly true because it has only moved to ban the interceptors who do it maliciously or for gain. It has only been done for its ministers' encrypted telephone conversations.

I submit that does not go far enough. The government could have kept it simple. It could have kept it clean. It could have had this problem rectified with one amendment to one section of the Criminal Code. It chose not to do that. We will see where the future takes us.

This is an opportunity for the government to reconsider that. I submit that my proposal can augment and will not be inconsistent with the half-protections proposed by the government. This bill will simply augment the principle of protection of privacy as it is now in the Criminal Code.

We will close the gap. We will seal it up tight the way Canadians want it and the way they think they have it. I hope the House will look upon my bill in that way.

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to say a few words about Bill C–389, legislation aimed at protecting the privacy of telephone conversations made using the facilities of telecommunications carriers.

This is a very short bill, so short that its purpose is not patently obvious. It consists of a single clause making two changes to the definition section of part 6 of the Criminal Code.

The substantive change is to extend the definition of private communication found in the Criminal Code to include oral and telecommunications transmitted through the facilities of a telecommunications carrier. It would also make it irrelevant that the oral or telecommunication did not both originate and end in Canada. The other change would be to add a new definition. The Criminal Code would now define a telecommunication carrier as a person who provides telecommunications services to the public.

The explanatory note indicates the purpose of the bill is to protect all telephone conversations to ensure that no telephone conversation is excluded by what is somewhat inaccurately termed as the reasonable expectation of privacy, the criterion found in the current definition of private communication. As I have already indicated, that expression is to be modified by Bill C–389.

There appears to be a misunderstanding as to what the current Criminal Code definition of private communication does. I would suggest that we need to be clear on that before we even try to consider Bill C–389.

It should be noted that it is not a reasonable expectation of privacy that is relevant in the Criminal Code definition of private communication. It is whether given the circumstances in which a communication is made, it is reasonable for the speaker to expect that the communication will not be intercepted by someone other than the intended recipient.

The notion of reasonable expectation of privacy is relevant when one considers constitutional requirements under our Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It is important that both be kept separate and apart.

Be that as it may, if the purpose of this bill is to protect all telephone conversations as it appears that is what the sponsor of this bill seeks to do, I would have trouble supporting the approach he has chosen, even if I agreed with the premise that all telephone conversations should be protected.

The reason is that the method chosen to achieve that purpose in Bill C–389 on the one hand goes well beyond ensuring that all telephone conversations are to be protected. On the other hand it may be that some telephone conversations which should be protected and which presently are protected would be excluded.

• (1500)

On the first point, that this bill overshoots the mark, I would like to read the definition of telecommunication found in section 35 of the Interpretation Act. It is directly applicable to the new definition that would be created in part VI of the Criminal Code. We will note it is a very broad concept. It means:

> Any transmission, emission or reception of signs, signals, writing, images, sounds or intelligence of any nature by wire, radio, visual or other electromagnetic system.

While we might be hard pressed to discover just what this covers, we can all readily agree that it goes beyond telephone conversations which to my mind implies two or more persons speaking to each other over the telephone. For example, in ordinary commercial radio or television transmissions, if the station was broadcasting a paid for or even a public service announcement or info program it would be captured by this overly broad concept.

Many more examples could be imagined. I suspect this was not intended. Nonetheless it would be unwise and dangerous to support this bill as presently drafted.

What would be the effect of Bill C–389 on conversations over telephone systems owned completely by non–telecommunications carriers? In–house communications are becoming more and more frequent. It may be that courts might be inclined to the view that Parliament intended only to protect calls carried by public communications companies. I would not want that result because those conversations made over systems not used to provide telecommunication services to the public are deserving of the protection of the law. I would not want new uncertainties introduced in what is already a difficult area of law.

Another undesirable result may occur. Courts might interpret the provision to restrict it to interceptions of communications while carried over the telecommunications carriers facilities. By that I mean while transmitted over the land lines or equipment belonging to the carrier and not while travelling over the air. This would create a larger loophole even if it is an unintended loophole.

I understand that just such an interpretation occurred in the United States. Its comparable legislation had to be changed to ensure that where appropriate protected communications included the radio portion of a telecommunication, that is if carried in whole or in part over the facility it would be protected even while travelling over the air.

In my view this is what we must aim for. It should not make a difference that a portion of a conversation is being carried over the airwaves. How is someone to know that the conversation is taking place over land lines only and therefore the law applies to that conversation but not if the carrier transmits parts of the conversation over the air?

I suspect the sponsor is interested in protecting the over the airwaves link, that is when using cordless phones, cellular phones or the satellite link. This is obviously a very difficult field because of changing technology among other things. This is something that would have to be carefully considered. As I have been trying to show, Bill C–389 does not appear to deal adequately with the issue.

Thus while I applaud the sentiment of this bill I cannot support it. Indeed I think a more balanced and accurate solution can be found in Bill C–109, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radiocommunications Act. As mentioned by our colleague, Bill C–109 is still before this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There being no further members rising for debate, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business is now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being 3.05 p.m., this House stands adjourned until next Monday at 11 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

CITIZENSHIP

CHANGES TO ACT

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should amend the Canadian Citizenship Act to ensure it reflects the evolving nature of Canadian society and considers Canada's commitment to diversity and individual human rights.

She said: Who are we, Mr. Speaker? For many years we tried to define who we are, to define a national identity. We know we are not American, yet we probably have more in common with our southern neighbours than anyone else. We know that we are no longer British, yet we have inherited many of our political traditions and symbols from Great Britain.

• (1110)

Canadians are aboriginal people who were here for a millennia before Canada was settled by Europeans. We are French and British whose ancestors laid the framework for a nation that today is the envy of the globe, a nation where citizens speak two primary languages, live in many different regions, belong to a host of different religions, ethnic groups and races, yet are fundamentally Canadian.

[Translation]

In our northern country, it is our citizenship which unites each member of this House, regardless of our political stripe. Whether federalists or separatists, socialists or conservatives, we are all citizens of this great country.

Citizenship also unites millions of men and women who choose the Canadian citizenship. In spite of that, our citizenship is too often taken for granted. Too often, we think that citizenship has no real value.

[English]

Nothing could be further from the truth. Canadian citizenship is the key to our common future. It is a heritage that reaches back across the ages to our native roots and looks forward to a time when all Canadians will be equal, not simply on paper but in reality.

[Translation]

During the first decades of our existence as a nation, we, Canadians, did not have our own citizenship. It is only in 1947 that Paul Martin senior, a minister in the Liberal cabinet and a great statesman, brought in the first Citizenship Act in the Commonwealth.

[English]

Before any other nation of the British colonial empire Canada acted on its own to bring our own identity.

I believe that the passage of the first Citizenship Act was as a significant moment in history as choosing the maple-leaf for our national flag, the patriation of the Constitution and the proclamation of the charter of rights.

[Translation]

The passage of this first Citizenship Act meant that our community was evolving as a nation and demanding its place among other states, but citizenship, just like Canadianism, is a vague concept. As a country we change and evolve and so it must be with the notion of citizenship. This is why a Liberal government passed a new Citizenship Act in 1977.

The changing nature of our immigration necessitated a review of the original act. It has been 16 years since the last changes were made, and I believe that a review of our Citizenship Act is overdue. We should not merely examine the act as a legal concept, but also in terms of its emotional implication. We must come up with a concept which enables us to take down the barriers between us, so that we can work together to build a better Canada.

[English]

I was hopeful in 1989 that the Conservative government would re-examine Canadian citizenship. I listened with interest to the throne speech on April 4, 1989 when the Governor General uttered the following words: "My government will introduce a new Citizenship Act".

This promise came along with a commitment to establish a race relations foundation and, Mr. Speaker, did you know that neither of them are in place today?

The government is quickly coming to the end of its mandate and after four years has failed to live up to its commitment.

[Translation]

Over the last few years, I tried to bring the matter before the committee, but the Conservative members refused to show up and, more importantly, the chairman of the committee refused to call the meetings. It is frustrating for members of the House to try to discuss an issue in committee. It is simply not acceptable to have a forum but to be denied the opportunity to look into the issue.

These frustrations motivated me to table motion M-731. Because the minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship refused to look at the issue, I decided it was my responsibility to bring it before the House.

• (1115)

I believe every member of this House has the right to address the issue of citizenship, explain what it means for them personally and share their ideas on the possible changes to the present act.

[English]

I believe that by debating this issue and then voting in favour of this motion we would be sending a clear message to Canadians about the value that all of us must place on citizenship, and we must be sending a clear message to the minister that we want the Citizenship Act revitalized.

[Translation]

We want the federal government to promote the concepts of citizenship and Canadian identity in order to enhance our pride in what we are and to build a sense of belonging among Canadians.

As a matter of priority, this policy should develop a sense of pride and inclusiveness. For too long, citizenship has meant equality in our laws only. We must make it an everyday reality for all. I know that such concepts are difficult to translate into legal texts, but we must accept that challenge.

[English]

Despite the difficult nature of attaining this goal I feel that these concepts can be incorporated into the spirit of the legislation. We can create the sense of inclusion by writing a preamble to the act that describes who we are. We can foster a sense of belonging by changing the nature of the oath of citizenship by making it more relevant to those who aspire to the title. We can create a stronger sense of identity by clearly outlining the rights and responsibilities of citizenship.

Finally, I believe that we need to re-examine the criteria for citizenship as outlined in the act.

[Translation]

There are also a few issues pertaining to citizenship that are directly related to the act and that must be addressed. Since they have not been discussed for a certain number of years in this House, I believe it is important to take note of them since they are essential to an active and efficient citizenship. I am speaking here of problems concerning civics courses, second language training and promotion of citizenship.

Canadians have the right to know where we stand on these issues which are fundamental to defining our identity.

[English]

We must realize that citizenship is not reserved for immigrants alone. It is something that affects each and every one of us whether we are first or fifteenth generation.

However, there are some things that affect naturalized citizens and do not touch native born Canadians. People who aspire to obtain citizenship need to have information provided to them as to what is expected of them. They need to know what Canada expects from them to become citizens. In order for people to know what is expected we need to provide material that is sensitive to cultural diversity, and accessible to people who may be either illiterate or visually impaired.

[Translation]

On that point, I believe that learning material in civics could be available in audio and video forms. Written material should also be available in the mother tongue of new citizenship claimants.

[English]

Citizenship education courses should be made more accessible. All Canadians should learn more about their past, learn about their political institutions and be encouraged to participate actively in society. We need to encourage a sense of unity and our diversity, a sense of belonging to a country in whose citizenship we have the right and opportunity to be different. We also need more effective second language training initiatives. If new citizens do not have command of either official language, they become marginalized. People are literally left mute by a country that does not give them the tools they need to be active citizens.

For years the government did not provide all new immigrants with the opportunity to learn one of the official languages. What this did was marginalize many immigrant women who found themselves in a new country with no linguistic skills.

Mistakes such as these should never be repeated and we must do all that we can to give these people the tools they need to become effective citizens.

[Translation]

The minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship must do everything in his power to promote the value of our heritage.

• (1120)

I congratulate the minister on his efforts to help Canadians reaffirm their citizenship. This is something all of us should do as it is a symbol of our faith in our country and its future as a nation.

[English]

The act needs to be changed as well. I believe that an important element in revitalizing Canada's Citizenship Act would be the drafting of a descriptive preamble. We need to consult broadly with Canadians on what should be included in the preamble. Canadians need to tell us how they want to describe themselves. Nevertheless, I believe that certain descriptive characteristics need to be included to foster a sense of belonging and inclusion in Canadian citizenship.

[Translation]

We should define ourselves as a bilingual nation with great pride, and as a nation with a wide variety of cultures. We should also recognize the special place of the Quebec society and native peoples in our country. Moreover, I think we should stress clearly the rights and responsibilities associated with our citizenship.

[English]

We know that we expect citizens to obey the law, but how about a more detailed outlining of our responsibilities? I am not suggesting that people be punished for not fulfilling the responsibilities directly outlined in the Citizenship Act. However, I do feel we can tell people what we expect from ourselves. We should all be expected to respect the environment, to be responsible for the well-being of our family. We should have a sense of responsibility toward the well-being of our community and our fellow human beings.

People know their rights. They should be just as familiar as to what they should do to help Canada and Canadians prosper not only economically, but also socially and culturally.

[Translation]

I want to make it clear that I support the suggestion of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce that we amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

[English]

As the oath currently reads, new Canadians and those who reaffirm their citizenship swear allegiance to Queen Elizabeth and her heirs and successors. I believe it is time for a change. It is time for people to swear allegiance to Canada and Canada alone. This is not a rejection of the monarchy. It is time that new citizens pledge allegiance to something which is more relevant to our and to their experience in this country.

I also believe we have to look at the criteria for those to whom we grant citizenship. I am not convinced that the present day political geography quiz is the proper test. We need to re-examine this issue and perhaps look at different standards.

[Translation]

It might be important to ask them how they will contribute to the Canadian society, why they want to become Canadian citizens, and what the word "Canadian" means to them. Being able to tell the citizenship judge who is the premier of Nova Scotia or who is the member of Parliament for one's riding has nothing to do with being a good and deeply committed citizen.

[English]

These should be the criteria for citizenship. The qualities of a person and their commitment to this country, not some Jeopardy quiz.

[Translation]

A few technical amendments are also in order. There should be a direct link between the multiculturalism and citizenship minister and the act, and the discriminatory section 3(b) on adopted children should be struck out.

[English]

Finally I believe there should be limits on the automatic loss of citizenship. A person must be notified that he or she is being stripped of citizenship pursuant to other sections of the act or if the person decides to renounce his or her citizenship. In this I refer specifically to section 8 where a person born outside of Canada to Canadian parents automatically loses his or her citizenship on reaching 28 years of age unless he or she expressly applies for citizenship. Why should a person not be allowed to renounce it if he or she does not want it?

[Translation]

I think all those points should be examined if we are to make our Canadian Citizenship Act more representative of the Canadian society. We should amend this act to better reflect the evolving nature of our society if we want citizenship to have a real meaning to our Canadian people. I hope all members in this House will join me in sending a clear message. We want a new citizenship act, a more modern act which would better reflect our current reality. I hope they will join me and vote for motion M-731.

• (1125)

[English]

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to participate in this debate.

I commend my hon. colleague for bringing this very important subject before the House. She is very right in saying that it is perhaps overdue that we should take a look at and make revisions to the Citizenship Act. Perhaps the time is appropriate for a more comprehensive set of inclusions within the Citizenship Act.

I know my hon. friend is very pleased to be aware of the fact that the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship has been participating in very extensive coast-to-coast consultations with Canadians which are targeted at responding precisely to what she is looking for.

I particularly find it interesting because five years ago David Crombie, the then secretary of state, the minister responsible for multiculturalism, initiated a process. He was very interested in doing some revisions to the Citizenship Act. I am sure members will recall the paper called Being Canadian that he published as a white paper or green paper. I do not know what kind of a paper it was but I know it was printed on white paper. I remember that at least.

In that paper he addressed a number of the issues that my hon. friend brought before the House today. I personally had an opportunity, as I was mentioning to her prior to the debate, to do a study on behalf of Mr. Crombie. I just found a copy of my paper.

Along with listening to her remarks I was reviewing some of the recommendations that I made in that paper at that time. It is kind of interesting. I would like to read some of them because I know they are things she would like to see in the act. I can read them since I wrote this paper and recommended them. Obviously, I think they are good ideas. Here is just a sampling of them:

> Canadians who adopt the citizenship of another country should not automatically lose their Canadian citizenship though the option of revocation should be available to them.

One of the things we have done in Canada under the current act is to allow people to become Canadians without necessarily having to give up their former citizenships.

When I did this study this was something that was reacted to by native-born Canadians, people who were born in Canada and became Canadian by birth. Some of them reacted to that. It is important to remember that as individuals we are what we are.

There are advantages to Canada in having citizens who can flow freely back and forth between this country and others. Here are some more:

> That persons should not be required to renounce former citizenships as a condition of becoming Canadian, although the option should be available to them.

> That Canadians who voluntarily give up their Canadian citizenship should normally have an automatic right to renew their citizenship if and when they wish.

That is an interesting one. All members of Parliament are faced with this situation from time to time. Perhaps a Canadian marries an American and goes to live in the United States.

Recently I was dealing with a case involving an elderly woman in her early eighties. She had become a widow. She lived in the United States and was no longer a Canadian citizen. That was 35 years ago. Her husband passed away. She wanted to come home to Queen's County, Nova Scotia and all of a sudden, she discovered she was not a Canadian. She would have to go through a complicated process. At one point, it was even suggested that she would have to apply in the normal process. That is ridiculous. Here is another one:

> That Citizenship Act amendments re-establish two original requirements for citizenship. Specifically, that applicants be "of good character" and that they indicate their intention to reside permanently in Canada.

The point being made is that a Canadian passport is not intended to be a passport of convenience but something that is available and is one of the privileges and rights of being a Canadian citizen.

Sometimes one wonders, with all the things going on in the world today, if people are seeking Canadian citizenship not because they want to live in Canada but because they want access to a Canadian passport.

> That the length of residence for citizenship qualification remain at three years.

That is what it still is.

> That the definition of residence for citizenship qualification purposes should normally necessitate the presence in Canada of the applicant for at least 75 per cent of the time required to qualify for citizenship.

• (1130)

That again addresses the whole issue of seeking citizenship for convenience rather than as a commitment to this country.

> That for compassionate reasons the government should grant statutory exemption from the requirements for adequate knowledge of one of the official languages to applicants over the age of 60 who have come to Canada to live with one or more members of their immediate family.

That only makes sense.

> That where citizenship has been acquired through fraud, false representation or concealment of material circumstances that citizenship should be revoked through a process in the courts by a justice in the Supreme Court of Canada.

Here is another one that was kind of interesting. It is a recommendation that the title of the office of citizenship judge be changed from judge to commissioner. When I did this study a number of the respondents indicated that for people coming from countries where there may have been oppression a judge was kind of a terrifying figure. The suggestion was made that to many immigrants the idea of going before a judge was scary whereas if the term was "commissioner" it was a less frightening prospect. That is where that recommendation came from.

The last recommendation that I will mention from this study, which I know my hon. friend will be pleased to hear, reads:

> That the Citizenship Act be amended to include a general preface setting out the fundamental principles of Canadian citizenship.

I think that is one of the main thrusts of her motion. I see there is a certain harmony of opinion with respect to this and, if I do say so myself, it was not a bad paper now that I have had a look at it five or six years later.

One of the things the member mentioned in her remarks that I would fully endorse is this notion that our Citizenship Act tends to be targeted at merely the process of acquiring Canadian citizenship and does not address the whole issue of what it is to be a Canadian citizen because most Canadian citizens did not acquire citizenship by immigrating to this country but were born into it.

I often wonder about the test that is given in the process when a person becoming a Canadian citizen goes before a citizenship judge and has to answer a quiz on Canada. I wonder how people would do if that test were applied to all Canadians. I wonder if they would all be successful on it.

She made reference to the quality of citizenship education and civic education in Canada. We in this place all realize that education is primarily a provincial responsibility, but the diversity of curricula across the country has always been a barrier to effective Canadian studies in my opinion. It is extremely important that there are certain basic pieces of knowledge about this country that should be a part of the fabric of every Canadian. They should know certain things about the country, what it is, what it comprises, how it is governed and that sort of thing.

Whether it is appropriate to address this in the Citizenship Act or not is another question. My inclination would be that it is probably not, but there definitely should be some interest. It seems to me that there is a federal interest in the quality of civic education, particularly in terms of responsibilities of citizenship as opposed to rights of citizenship.

She mentioned that the criteria should be re-examined. Perhaps so. Certainly in the study I did we took a look at that. We concluded that the basic three-year requirement with a residence requirement should be essentially the same.

She mentioned language training. One of the requirements of the Citizenship Act is that an individual should have to be able to function in one of the two official languages, which imposes an obligation on the government to ensure that opportunity is there. She raised the problem particularly faced by immigrant women who tend to be more in the home than out in the community and do not have the same opportunity to learn the language.

There is no question that if people do not speak the language of the community in which they reside they are at an incredible disadvantage, not just economically but socially in every way. It is one of the reasons that immigrant women in many instances, and perhaps more so than other groups, face barriers to full integration and participation in our society socially, politically and economically.

Therefore there is a strong need there, which perhaps is greater than official language training to which we devote a tremendous amount of public resources in this country. Yet one would have thought that it was a basic part of being Canadian to learn to speak both official languages. It is an opportunity that should be there, though it is an opportunity that would not necessarily be taken up by all people.

• (1135)

I see that I am getting the sign that my time is up. I could go on at length on this subject but in closing I will again commend my hon. friend for bringing forth this motion. I assure her that it is a very high priority with the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship. I assure the member I will be supporting the motion when it is put before the House.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I also rise in support of the motion by the member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville and commend her for bringing this forward.

The motion asks the government to:

> —amend the Canadian Citizenship Act to ensure it reflects the evolving nature of Canadian society and considers Canada's commitment to diversity and individual human rights.

I agree with most of the points that both my colleagues have raised. This is certainly a non-partisan issue. This is a question of great importance to all Canadians. The point the hon. member raised about swearing allegiance to Canada rather than to the Queen is again something that we should move to as quickly as possible.

For five years the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship—and I wish we could reverse the importance of those two words—has been proposing amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act. Amendments to the Citizenship Act of 1974 are long overdue. Our population has greatly changed and greatly increased. In 1974 we were a country of 12.5 million people. Now we have over 27 million people. We have maintained about the same proportion of immigrants each year, 16 per cent, but the numbers have greatly increased and the countries of origin have changed.

It is very important that our concept of citizenship and our Citizenship Act must reflect the multicultural and multiracial nature of Canada. It must be concerned to a greater degree than it is at present with the rights and responsibilities and the education of all our citizens, both native-born and immigrants. The present act pertains mostly to new immigrants.

As a country that is rich in cultural and racial diversity we have much to learn from each other as we forge ahead to redefine ourselves as a country and to clarify our goals as a unified nation. Any changes to the act should involve wide public education and consultation, which is in itself an educational process. Canadians should be encouraged to carefully reconsider what it means to them to be Canadian.

I agree with my Conservative colleague that we need more emphasis on civics and Canadian studies in all our educational systems, including adult education.

The Citizenship Act needs to be reviewed and updated to truly reflect the nature of modern Canada. We have come of age. We are a bilingual country that recognizes the two official languages of our founders, but we are no longer a white colonial society that can ignore the rights of aboriginal people and newcomers who are not of English or French heritage.

Canadian society has evolved and changed over the past 46 years. In the 1960s four out of five immigrants were from Europe, the U.S., Australia and New Zealand. By the 1980s two out of three immigrants came from Africa, Asia, the Caribbean, and Central and South America. Inherent aboriginal rights are now recognized by all governments and by most Canadians. Persons who used to be referred to in the Trudeau years as "others" and are now referred to as allophones, have full rights and responsibilities as Canadian citizens, and they should not be seen as an adjunct.

We are all citizens of a multicultural Canada with equal rights and responsibilities. Although our Canadian culture is constantly evolving we have developed a common sense of beliefs and values. Canadians believe in democracy, justice, and the right of individuals to be free of hunger, violence and poverty. Canadians want a caring and compassionate society that cares for children and the elderly, that ensures education and jobs and promotes the universality of health care, the kinds of things that we were proposing in the social charter in the constitutional draft. Our national values are reflected in the pride and participation of our citizens. Last summer's Voyageur program was very successful for young people. It was an exchange between different regions of Canada and should be an annual event to promote friendship and understanding between regions, francophones, allophones, aboriginal people and anglophones.

• (1140)

Our national symbols, our role in the United Nations and our international peacekeepers promote pride. These are the kinds of things we should not be shy about. We should be proud we are Canadian. Certainly those who travel realize very quickly how fortunate we are to be Canadian citizens.

Citizenship requires responsibility as well as rights. Citizens participate in the political process, in strengthening our communities, in eliminating discriminatory barriers and in supporting social justice ideals. The Citizenship Act needs to be revised to reflect these values and to include the commitments under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which states in section 15: "Every individual is equal before and under the law".

New and old Canadians must accept this as a given. We no longer should have to challenge these rights under the charter. We must work vigorously to eliminate the inequalities and injustices that unfortunately exist in our daily lives and in society as a whole. Racism must never be tolerated.

Canadian citizens want to have equal opportunities in jobs, education and training. We prosper as a nation when people reach their full potential, when they are not ghettoized in dead end, minimum wage jobs, when the cycle of poverty is broken and violence in all forms is ended. The Citizenship Act must clarify policies for newcomers, as it has in the past, how they apply for citizenship, what are their rights and so on. It should be available to citizens, as my colleague has stated, in their first language.

There must be an increase in language training opportunities for all newcomers in order that they will be able to participate fully in Canadian life. This is something that has been very lacking. The cutbacks in language training and the cancellation of the SLT program are a real detriment to citizenship.

The Citizenship Act should also be reviewed so that the legitimacy and the integrity of citizenship judges are clear. Judges should not be political patronage appointees. A review of the Citizenship Act must address how appointments are made, what qualifications judges should have and why citizenship judges are different from judges and courts other from the legal courts of Canada.

Amendment to the Citizenship Act must include a responsibility to develop citizenship education programs. This I cannot stress too strongly. I am very concerned about the cuts this government has made to citizenship training. Many new Canadians are better informed as to what it means to be Canadian than are those of us who are born in Canada. We need to broaden citizenship education and make it meaningful to all segments of Canadian society, in the schools, through public programs using modern media techniques such as videos and television.

We must all have a better knowledge of Canadian history, including our ethnic history. The recent referendum showed that Canadians want to revitalize their citizenship and have an active say in public affairs. It is time for a review of the 1947 Citizenship Act. In amending the act we must do away with the distinction between Canadians by birth and Canadians by choice. Every citizen is part of our Canadian family with equal rights and responsibilities. Citizenship is a commitment between citizens with each other and with Canada. It is an active partnership.

I say to the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, let us get on with this important job right now.

• (1145)

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be rising to speak in support of the motion of my colleague from Saint-Laurent—Cartierville. It is a very timely motion and I hope we will be passing this resolution unanimously at the end of the day.

I am happy and proud to be a member of the Liberal Party that introduced the first Citizenship Act in Canada, the party that has given Canadians the right to citizenship. From 1947 till now we have had a number of amendments to this act but it was not until lately that I began to have direct interaction with the act as well as with the system as a whole, only to realize the large number of deficiencies that exist in it.

Currently a landed immigrant after three years is eligible to apply for citizenship. The first step for that person is to call the citizenship office in order to obtain an application. Like any other department, the person phones in and is told to drop by and pick up an application form. This is the first hurdle an immigrant is faced with, the fact that it takes not one day, not two days, not three days, not one month, not two months, but up to nine months to obtain an application form for citizenship.

The act says one is eligible for citizenship after three years but now it is three years plus nine months to obtain the application form. One obtains the application form, fills it out and then submits that form. You would be surprised to learn, Mr. Speaker, that it takes up to one year after having made the initial application, not to obtain your citizenship, but to have an interview with a judge. It is now three years, plus nine months, plus another year or four years and nine months before being able to see a judge in order to obtain citizenship.

I could repeat some of the horror stories I have heard in my riding of Ottawa Centre and throughout the national capital region. If it happened that the applicant was one of those unfortunate ones who had not received an education back in the old country, and had come here 30 years ago from Italy or 40 years ago from mainland China or Hong Kong, then he or she was not really provided with the tools necessary to obtain an education, never mind in English or French, but even in his or her own mother tongue. We are faced with the horror stories I am about to begin telling the House.

An applicant, a 63-year old lady, who had never been in school in her entire life and who had been in this country for over 37 years wanted to have an interview with the citizenship judge, only to be asked—and I will say this in French because I have the question here in French—

[Translation]

"What province produces the most oil and the most electricity?"

[English]

I do not know how many people would know nowadays. The level of production changes from day to day pretty well. Probably Newfoundland now can claim it has the potential to produce more oil than any other province.

[Translation]

Another question is: What province has the most forests?

[English]

It depends which province has cut the vast majority of the trees out there.

[Translation]

Another one is: Name the five Great Lakes between Canada and the United States.

Another question is: Name the three levels of government.

[English]

This one intrigued me: Name the three levels of government.

[Translation]

[English]

I was a municipal politician and I was told, as are Canadians told, that we have, depending on the province you are in, four levels of government: the federal level; the provincial level; and in our case in Ontario we have what we call the regional level; and then we have the municipal level of government. Do not tell that to school-boards because they might get all upset because they consider themselves as another level of government.

I want to share with the House one question one applicant was asked. She was denied citizenship because she was asked: How do you vote? The applicant said she had put a check-mark in the box. She was denied the right to citizenship because she was told she had to put an x.

• (1150)

Mrs. Maheu: That is not true.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, I do not know. Many people vote with a check-mark or an x. Both of them are accepted.

Another applicant was rejected because one of the questions she was asked was: Where does the Queen sit? Innocently the applicant said she sits on a chair. That was wrong. She sits on a throne. Along with a couple of other questions the applicant was denied citizenship.

This applicant is 63 years or 64 years old and has no choice but to apply again. Five years later the applicant will apply and the same story will repeat itself.

I have a confession to make. I challenged all those applications that were rejected when I had had a chance to examine the background of the people. I discovered they are illiterate not only in English or French but also in their own mother tongue, especially those over the age of 55 years. I took their cases to the Federal Court. There again you are faced with a lengthy delay of up to about one year because there is a backlog.

The ministers already know about those difficulties and have not taken any action on them. To add to the agony of all the people in Canada in 1990 we had 114,478 citizenship applications and guess how many judges we have. We have 48 judges to deal with 114,478 applications in 1990. This adds up to about 2,000 applications per citizenship judge. It is highly unfair and cannot be done unless the system is looked at and unless the Citizenship Act is overhauled altogether.

I say this because a Gallup poll has released information indicating that 30 per cent of Canadians cannot pass the citizenship exam or test.

Mrs. Maheu: And foreign Canadians.

Mr. Harb: That is almost one in every three Canadians would not be able to pass the citizenship test.

Mrs. Maheu: Born Canadian.

Mr. Harb: Born Canadian. I am not sure if native Canadians have been taken into consideration as part of the statistics. If not that will increase the statistics by 10 per cent.

Who are we kidding? The citizenship test as we know it, the Citizenship Act as we know it, does not fit the need and does not help to build a better citizen. We have to overhaul it so that we are bringing people into the system and integrating them, not scaring them away.

It is really quite intimidating for immigrants when they are told they have to appear before a citizenship judge. It is well known everywhere that when you go before a judge you are either guilty or innocent, so you go in with that feeling when you make an application or pass a test. To some of these people who are over the age of 60 and have not had a chance to go to an educational institution, it is quite intimidating.

I do not want to be the one who is always going after the department without making some tangible recommendations. I will run down these recommendations very quickly.

We have to acknowledge the problem of illiteracy and ensure the Citizenship Act takes that into consideration. We have to ensure that there are citizenship courses that are equally accessible to all applicants nation-wide.

As my colleague has suggested we have to overhaul the Citizenship Act to reflect the realities of the nineties. We have to ensure that citizenship judges are fully qualified. We have to make sure all references to judges in court have also been looked at.

We have to consult with all levels of government to ensure we have an educational system that in fact is educating the people about citizenship.

Finally we have to co-ordinate our efforts as a whole from the school-boards, the municipalities, the provinces and the federal government in order to find out what it is we are teaching those arriving in this country and what it is we are teaching our children when it comes to real Canadian citizenship.

There is a lot of work to be done. We have not yet begun and this is a chance for the minister to move quickly on this issue.

• (1155)

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I too welcome the opportunity to speak to the motion of the member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville because I agree with the principles contained in it.

Over the last year our government has indicated that it intends to introduce a new citizenship act as part of a comprehensive approach to strengthen the value of Canadian citizenship. The Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship feels that a new act should, to use the words of the member's motion, "reflect the evolving nature of Canadian society and consider Canada's commitment to diversity and individual rights".

The issues covered in the motion before us today are already part of the basic premise of the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship. The department ensures that the evolving nature of Canadian society is well reflected.

This government takes very seriously its commitment to Canada's diversity and individual human rights. We are building a Canada in which our institutions, our laws and our way of life reflect the values all Canadians share.

What are these values? They include a spirit of generosity and compassion, a belief in equality and fairness, a commitment to consultation and peaceful dialogue, and a respect for diversity. Canadian citizenship reflects these values. Canadian citizenship is about promoting a sense of community affiliation, national identity and shared purpose. Canadian citizenship is about building a Canada where everyone feels at home. Canadian citizenship is about making sure everyone participates in building our future together.

Canadian citizenship should also be about responsibility. One of our colleagues has mentioned responsibility: the responsibility Canadians feel toward peace, order and good government, and the responsibility to ensure that true family values are promoted, that law and order are cornerstones of our society, and that we help the less fortunate, especially the elderly, the disabled and the children. There is a responsibility to be productive members of society.

Canadian citizenship ultimately is about full and equitable participation of all Canadians in their communities. We are already committed to diversity. Our multicultural society and its linguistic duality are founded on mutual respect. The right to freedom of expression, religion and culture is enshrined in Canada's Constitution and laws.

Increasingly Canada is drawing strength from this diversity. Newcomers to Canada are welcomed and encouraged to contribute to our future on an equal footing with all Canadians. Canada's commitment to human rights already is well established. The fight for a Canadian bill of rights and later the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Multiculturalism Act and the proposed amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act all indicate that entrenchment of human rights has been a major concern of all Canadian governments past and present.

However the government is not prepared to rest on its laurels. Our commitment to diversity and individual rights is not dormant.

• (1200)

We have an expanded view of Canadian citizenship that focuses on inclusiveness, equality of opportunity and responsible participation by all Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-118, an act to amend the Export Development Act, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There are nine motions in amendment standing on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C-118, an act to amend the Export Development Act, all in the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 will be grouped for debate and voted on as follows:

The vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motions Nos. 2 and 4.

The vote on Motion No. 3 will apply to Motion No. 5.

[English]

Motion No. 6 will be debated and voted upon separately.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 7 and 8 will be grouped for debate and voted on separately.

[English]

Motion No. 9 will be debated and voted upon separately.

[Translation]

I will now submit motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 to the House.

[English]

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-118 be amended in Clause 4 by striking out lines 30 to 33 on page 2 and substituting the following:

"directly or indirectly, exports from Canada to other countries and Canadian capacity to engage in those exports."

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C-118 be amended in Clause 4 by striking out line 37 on page 2 and substituting the following:

"corporation may,".

Motion No. 3.

That Bill C-118 be amended in Clause 4 by striking out lines 38 on page 2 and substituting the following:

"(a) as security for any loan made, guarantee issued or other liability assumed under this Act, acquire and dispose of any interest in".

Motion No. 4.

That Bill C-118 be amended in Clause 4 by striking out lines 41 on page 2 and substituting the following:

"the effect of providing, to any person carrying on business in Canada, any".

Motion No. 5.

That Bill C-118 be amended in Clause 4 by striking out lines 1 and 2 on page 3.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before I begin to discuss the substance of the first group of amendments in my name, I have had discussions with the parties and I would like to seek unanimous consent of the House to make a wording change to Motion No. 1. I would ask if this is the appropriate time to make that wording change.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois)): Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to make a wording change?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): The wording change I propose for Motion No. 1 which has been worked out in the last few minutes, and I will try and be faithful to that change, would be:

That Bill C-118 be amended in Clause 4 by striking out lines 30 and 31 on page 2 and substituting the following:

"directly or indirectly, Canada's export trade and Canadian capacity".

• (1205)

I would like that modification to be noted for the record and with unanimous consent my amendment to be modified accordingly. With that understood, let me say briefly why I have introduced these amendments to this legislation.

First, I am a little uncomfortable in making these amendments at report stage because this work ought to have been done in committee. Unfortunately the speed with which the committee dealt with this bill did not allow for it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The Chair would appreciate receiving your amendment.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I was saying I am uncomfortable to a certain extent introducing these amendments because the work on and the proper explanation of these amendments ought to have taken place in committee. Unfortunately the legislation came forward without the adequate consultation it should have received within the communities of interest affected by this change in the mandate of the Export Development Corporation.

To the extent that it was discovered in committee and too late to make the appropriate changes there, there were some real concerns with the expansion and the degree and nature of the expansion of the mandate being accorded to the Export Development Corporation. That is the rationale behind the amendments I have proposed in this grouping for the House to consider.

I want to make it clear to the House that my party and I support the extension and the modernization of the powers of the Export Development Corporation to provide assistance to Canadian exporters and the Canadian exporting community to carry on business abroad and to facilitate exports that are important to the Canadian economy and to jobs in Canada.

We fully support the principle of modernizing and expanding the mandate of the Export Development Corporation. We realize in order to do so in this new international financial environment requires the legislation creating the Export Development Corporation and going back to 1969 to be updated and expanded for the corporation to be permitted to engage in the various forms of financial support it has now become obvious in our globalized trading environment is necessary for our exporters to compete adequately around the world.

Therefore our support of the principle of modernizing the mandate of the Export Development Corporation remains. However, I think members on both sides of the House would agree that there was a legitimate, heartfelt and realistic concern that the legislation was open-ended and broad. This permitted, to the concern of some of the interested parties, the Export Development Corporation to be involved in activities that were not directly related to the support of Canadian exporters and to Canadian trade.

• (1210)

The open-ended nature of the legislation was combined with the fact that the regulations in which the powers of the corporation were to be expressed were not available to us in the committee or to the interested public. The fact that those regulations had not been specified and that the legislation was so broad was a subject of concern.

One of the concerns had to do with the fact, as it was understood in committee, that the legislation was allowing the corporation to engage in activities that were not, at least on the face of it, directly related to the promotion of Canadian exports.

I think it is worthy of being brought before this House that the legislation should be tightened in that respect to link the mandate of the corporation in the legislative framework more closely to the promotion of Canadian exports, the promotion of the Canadian exporters and jobs related to Canadian exports and investments abroad.

That is the purpose for this group of amendments that I am introducing here. I should say that we have reviewed the amendments with the Export Development Corporation and it has concurred with the modifications that I have introduced to this House. In fact it has helped us with the language.

Since I think all parties in this House are in agreement with allowing the Export Development Corporation to have the kind of mandate it needs to facilitate and support Canadian exports, then it should be known that the change to Motion No. 1 would, in its view, allow it to do that. At the same time it would bear in mind the express need to make it clear that we are really dealing with exports and Canadian exporters.

I hope that introduction explains the motivation and purpose behind this group of amendments.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): This is just to say that the new wording of Motion No. 1 presented by the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso is in order.

[English]

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I want to just briefly thank the hon. member and his colleague for working with the government to try to achieve an amendment that those on both sides of the issue can live with. Motions Nos. 1 and 2, as proposed by my hon. friend, are indeed acceptable to the government.

I want to make a point that I think all members should be aware of. At second reading this bill was supported by all three parties. As my hon. friend said, the committee did its work quickly but it did it with consent and discussion among the three parties that were participating. That is why this legislation is before the House. It is to facilitate and assist Canadian exporters. I think it is important to the Canadian Exporters' Association.

When the association came and spoke before the committee it indicated that it was very anxious to get this legislation through. The government engaged in very extensive consultations prior to introducing this legislation. I think I can say that my hon. friends opposite in both parties are with us for seeing the growth of the Canadian economy through this very important area of trade.

• (1215)

It is important to us that this happens. In order to assist Canadian businesses and Canadian exporters it is important for the Export Development Corporation to have flexibility as well as the authority that this legislation will grant them in order for it to do just that.

At this point Motions Nos. 1 and 2 are the only ones up. Is that right, Mr. Speaker? Motions Nos. 3, 4 and 5 have not been moved. With those remarks I want to thank my hon. friend and indicate that both of those amendments are acceptable to the government.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say very briefly on behalf of my caucus that we are supportive of the amendments brought forward by the member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso. We would join with them and the government in terms of praise for the Export Development Corporation and the work it does.

Mr. McCreath: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I asked if Motions Nos. 3, 4 and 5 were before the House. I believe the indication I had was that they were not. Do I understand that that is not correct? Are Motions Nos. 3, 4 and 5 before the House because I have a brief comment that I wish to make with respect to those. May I do so?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind the hon. member of the ruling made earlier that Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 are grouped for debate and the vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motions Nos. 2, 4 and so on. The debate is on Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, if it would be agreeable to the House I would be willing to split those motions in terms of taking Motions Nos. 1 and 2 together as a group and Motions Nos. 3, 4 and 5 as another group. Could I request that for the purposes of voting?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since the Speaker is the servant of the House, I have no objection, if there is unanimity, to grouping Motions Nos. 1 and 2, having the vote on Motion No. 1 apply to Motion No. 2, and then considering the other three motions, Nos. 3, 4 and 5, with the vote on Motion No. 3 applying to the other two.

[English]

Is there unanimous consent to proceed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The debate is on Motions Nos. 1 and 2.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 1 agreed to.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Therefore the vote also applies to Motion No. 2.

I will now call Motions Nos. 3, 4 and 5 since they have already been moved.

[English]

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, in moving Motions Nos. 3, 4 and 5 let me just say this. The spirit or the purpose for these three amendments to the legislation is to link the expanded mandate of the Export Development Corporation to the work which it is primarily engaged to do. That is to support and promote Canadian exports through the provision of financial insurance, leasing and other related services to our exporters and to the partners that our exporters work with around the world in order to gain access to other markets.

• (1220)

Motion No. 3, if I may explain, has the effect of linking two paragraphs in the revised Export Development Act, namely, paragraph 10(1)(b) and paragraph 10(1)(d). These oblige the corporation, when acquiring and disposing of interest in properties and in leasing properties, to be related to the purposes for which the Export Development Corporation is in existence, namely, supporting exports and the exporting community. That is the main motivation behind Motion No. 3. It is again in support of our interest on this side of the House in order to ensure that the legislation supports the Export Development Corporation in carrying out its mandate.

Motion No. 4 which adds a clause to paragraph 10(1.1)(b) would require that the person who is assisted by the corporation—I refer to a corporate person as well as an individual—would be carrying on business in some way in Canada. That is the motivation behind that amendment and it supports our understanding of what the purpose of the Export Development Corporation is.

In addition, Motion No. 5 means that that particular clause would be rendered redundant if the other motions were accepted.

Nothing in these amendments would be intended to exclude the EDC from entering into leasing arrangements. That is not our intent and that is not our understanding by the changes we are proposing in this amendment. They are intended to facilitate the Export Development Corporation's activities but at the same time to ensure in the legislation that those activities relate to their central concern, which is the promotion of Canadian exports.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I wish briefly to respond to my hon. friend's amendments which the government cannot agree with.

We believe that Motions Nos. 3, 4 and 5 have the effect of removing the flexibility a revised act will give the Export Development Corporation to help Canadian companies in their pursuit of globalization. The government will not stand in the way of any Canadian company going global. This is why these motions are unacceptable.

For example, Motion No. 3 would prevent the EDC from being able to use innovative financing techniques such as leasing to support the international trade efforts of Canadian companies. Our purpose in introducing Bill C-118 was to enhance EDC's ability to offer creative solutions to the trade problems of Canadian firms and not to restrict EDC's ability.

If Motion No. 4 were adopted, for example, its effect would be to prevent the EDC from supporting exports where such exports are financed or undertaken by a person who does not carry on business in Canada. This would mean that if a Canadian company had received financing for an international transaction from a source outside Canada, the EDC would not be able to offer that source insurance for the transaction. The government would not want to see sales opportunities lost to Canadian firms because of the limitations of the Export Development Act. Therefore, these three motions are not acceptable to the government and we will vote against them.

• (1225)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Negatived on division. The same vote also applies to Motions Nos. 4 and 5.

Motion No. 3 negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The next question is on Motion No. 6.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso) moved:

Motion No. 6.

That Bill C-118 be amended in Clause 4 by adding immediately after line 8 on page 5 the following:

"(8) Subject to subsection (9), the Minister shall cause to be published in the Canada Gazette at least sixty days before the proposed effective date thereof a copy of every regulation that the Governor in Council proposes to make under this Act and a reasonable opportunity shall be afforded to interested persons to make representations with respect thereto.

(9) The Minister is not required to cause to be published a proposed regulation if the proposed regulation

(a) has been published pursuant to subsection (8) whether or not it has been amended as a result of representations made by interested persons as provided in that subsection; or

(b) in the opinion of the Minister, makes no material substantive change in an existing regulation."

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion is motivated by the need for greater consultation in the development of any changes to the legislative mandate of a corporation such as the EDC with the other stakeholders which are affected and with which it works in the conduct of its activities, namely the banking community, the insurance community, the exporting community and others.

What became apparent during the course of this legislation was that this consultation did not occur and it was difficult for us to properly evaluate the legislation at committee.

Motion No. 6 would act to require that prior consultation be carried out regarding the regulations that would support any changes in legislation so that when any legislation comes before Parliament the regulatory support is there and the consultation has taken place.

I would also add in support of this change that it is consistent with the recently released report of the finance subcommittee on regulations and competitiveness which recommended in recommendation 7.6 and I quote: "Wherever possible stakeholders should be brought together at the problem definition stage of regulation development to reach a consensus on goals, priorities and allocation of resources for achieving them. Consultation at this stage should be most effective".

I think that is important in legislation such as that which we have before us. We would be giving effect to that report by passing this amendment to Bill C-118. I would hope that the House would agree with that.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, consistent with this government's belief in transparency in the policy development process, this motion is acceptable to the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 6 agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso) moved:

Motion No. 7.

That Bill C-118 be amended in Clause 5 by striking out line 14 on page 5 and substituting the following:

"exceed an amount equal to ten times the".

Motion No. 8.

That Bill C-118 be amended in Clause 5 by striking out line 32 on page 5 and substituting the following:

"shall be taken into account."

• (1230)

He said: Mr. Speaker, we have decided to withdraw these two motions, and I have the consent of my colleague Mr. MacLaren to withdraw Motions Nos. 7 and 8, if need be.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to withdraw these two motions?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motions Nos. 7 and 8 withdrawn.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso) moved:

Motion No. 9.

That Bill C-118 be amended in Clause 8 by striking out lines 35 to 43 on page 7 and substituting the following:

"25. (1) Unless the rights of the Corporation are terminated pursuant to this Act, the right of the Corporation to carry on its business is limited in the following manner, namely:

(a) if Parliament sits on at least twenty days during the month of March in the year that is five years after the year in which this section comes into force, the Corporation shall not carry on its business after March 31 of that year; and

(b) if Parliament does not sit on at least twenty days during the month of March in the year that is five years after the year in which this section comes into force, the Corporation shall not carry on its business after the sixtieth sitting day of Parliament next following March 31 of that year.

(2) For the purposes of this section, Parliament is deemed to sit on each day that either House of Parliament sits."

He said: Mr. Speaker, Motion No. 9 in effect is a sunset clause. It would require that this legislation be reviewed by Parliament within five years and that Parliament reapprove this legislation within five years.

The amendment is motivated by the following consideration. This new mandate which we support in general terms is a much broadened mandate for the Export Development Corporation. We have not seen the regulations which support the mandate so this Parliament is not in a position to evaluate the nature in which this mandate is to be used. We feel it is important that the new framework be evaluated by Parliament at an appropriate time and five years would be an appropriate time to do that.

The review is there in the original legislation but this review would ensure that Parliament actually approves and extends the mandate that we have conferred with this legislation and if events change within the next five years, the Parliament of Canada will have an opportunity to fully revisit this issue.

I think in terms of the government's commitment to transparency which was just articulated by my colleague a few minutes ago it would agree with this rationale, agree with this amendment and with the desire of all members of this House to ensure that Parliament is given the powers and the opportunity to review at appropriate junctures legislation which affects the vital interests of Canada.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows that the Export Development Corporation reports to Parliament on a yearly basis through its annual report and through the tabling of its corporate plan. Of course it could be called before a committee of Parliament every time.

Nevertheless the persuasiveness of his argument is such that consistent with the government's commitment to transparency this amendment and motion is acceptable.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am a bit surprised at the government response because if you look at the existing wording of the bill there is a requirement that there be a formal review at the end of five years.

The motion from my colleague makes no reference to any kind of formal review. Basically it is a sunset clause which means at the end of the fifth year, in March of that year, certain conditions are met and the bill ceases to function.

We have had ample experience in this House with legislation that has an annual sunset clause. With the Unemployment Insurance Act we were asked every December to rush through a bill, all three readings at one time, to extend that aspect of unemployment insurance for another year. There was no comprehensive review. There was no reasoned approach. We just knew that if we did not do it there were going to be a lot of folks out there who were in trouble.

• (1235)

I grant that this kind of legislation is much different. A mandatory review, I would suggest is not perfect because there are some things that could have been done to make it more effective and to give Parliament a greater role in that review. However, to replace a mandatory review with just a sunset clause, what is likely to happen at the end of the five years is the government of the day, because it had other things on its agenda and because we know it takes time for legislation to work its way through, will come to us at the last minute and say: "Look, if we do not pass this legislation the Export Development Corporation ceases to exist. We have got all these irons in the fire and therefore we have to pass it and yes, do not worry. We will have a review".

What would have been more helpful is to take the wording presented by the government in the initial bill which says:

> Five years after the coming into force of this section the minister shall cause a review of the provisions and operation of this act to be undertaken in consultation with the Minister of Finance.
> The minister shall within one year after causing a review to be undertaken pursuant to subsection (1) submit a report on the review to Parliament.

That could have been added, like this House did not too many weeks ago under a transport bill, to require that report to automatically be referred to the appropriate standing committee. That standing committee would be automatically seized with the matter, would review the government's report and would report back to Parliament on the appropriateness of this House continuing with the Export Development Corporation Act. That would have been the better approach.

The other thing we have to keep in mind is even if the government decides that it is going to do an internal review leading up to the five years, that will shift the focus from the administration of the act by those seized with that responsibility to on the one hand make a legitimate review of the act and on the other hand: "How do we keep this act so we can keep our jobs?" That is putting it in a very crass way.

The long and the short of this is I will oppose this particular amendment because I do not think it is in the best interest of the Export Development Corporation and it will hamstring the government of the day as well as this House in terms of providing a legitimate review of a very important element in the Canadian economy.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be short.

I, of course, stand in support of my colleague's motion. I think the member from the New Democratic Party is over-reacting here. I think it is incumbent upon us to take a look at the annual report on a yearly basis. If we are getting a sense that the mandate of the Export Development Corporation is not living up to what we together in this House have agreed to, then I think there is lots of time to react to that.

In fact there is nothing preventing us from putting this bill to committee immediately and there is nothing wrong with putting it back on the legislative agenda.

We are depending heavily on the support, skill and expertise of the Export Development Corporation. If we get a sense that what we are doing here is not really meeting the objectives, there is nothing stopping us from bringing this bill back to the House of Commons right after the report is put forth.

There is one thing that does concern me about this bill. I mentioned it before and I am sure members will remember.

My concern with this bill is not with the actual Export Development Corporation itself. My concern has to do with the small business sector. I find there are many small business people in our country who know very little about the Export Development Corporation.

We have all stated in this House repeatedly in the last few months that the greatest hope for new job creation lies with our small business community and we have also stated repeatedly that exports are the mainstay we are going to be looking to and depending on.

• (1240)

The Export Development Corporation should be sensitized to the fact that it must spread the message to a greater number of small businesses in our country so they can be included in the Export Development Corporation portfolio.

In conclusion, I think my colleague's motion more than meets the requirement to make this a good piece of legislation.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the brief discussion we had on Motion No. 9. I have listened with particular attention to the comments of our colleague from the New Democratic Party. I do not think there is anything contradictory in his approach to that developed in Motion No. 9.

My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood has already explained that there is an annual opportunity to review the workings of the Export Development Corporation. Indeed it could be more frequent than annually at the initiative of a parliamentary committee.

That opportunity stands and will continue to be in place to give Canadians, who ultimately are the stakeholders in this corporation, the opportunity to ensure that it is functioning along the lines we all seek.

The purpose of Motion No. 9 is to add to the opportunity for a thorough review of the corporation and its activities and to assess its mandate in light of changing circumstances. There are few things more dynamic in the world today than trade. We must strengthen the ability of the EDC to ensure that Canada plays a leading role in international trade in full co-operation, of course, with the private sector. This will be enhanced if we proceed with Motion No. 9 in light of the fact that the annual review procedure is already in place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 9 agreed to.

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister for International Trade) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. McDermid (for the Minister for International Trade) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a few very brief remarks on third reading and thank all members of the House for their co-operation in enabling us to deal with this very important piece of legislation.

I would like to take members back to the day when the minister introduced the legislation. This is interesting. I was reviewing his comments at that time. He said:

> Canadian firms recognize that they have to succeed internationally if they are going to stay competitive and keep offering Canadians high income jobs.
>
> Exports in international investment have sustained our economy through a difficult recession. How well Canadian companies perform in the international marketplace will influence our future prosperity.

• (1245)

Those are some of the comments the minister made at that time.

I think it is important to note that the purpose of this legislation is to enable the Export Development Corporation to better serve Canadian exporters. This legislation has come forth because it is in the interest of all Canadians to facilitate exports which lead to jobs and economic growth in Canada. These amendments will provide Canadian entrepreneurs with a more comprehensive array of insurance and other financial support services for overseas projects. They are directly in response to requests that have been made to the government and the Export Development Corporation. It is an important piece of legislation that we are dealing with today.

The amendments are part of the government's overall economic plan to assist Canadian businesses to remain competitive in international markets and to contribute to Canada's future prosperity through the creation and maintenance of high-wage jobs.

Exports are the engine of growth in the Canadian economy and more than one million Canadian jobs depend on international trade. In 1992 approximately 328,000 jobs were created or sustained by Canadian exporters using EDC's services. Canada's exports continue to set a strong pace with January 1993 figures over 18 per cent ahead of the same month a year ago.

We are making progress. Although we all have been through difficult times with the recession Canada has done well in large measure because of the strength of its export sector and the government's strong commitment to support our exporters.

It is critical that the institutions that support exports including the Export Development Corporation be in the position to continue to offer the services that Canadian businesses need to compete in the global economy.

The amendments will level the playing field for Canadian exporters that compete with firms based in countries that have already expanded their capacities to offer financial and insurance packaging. The amendments will bolster the quality of risk management support for Canadian firms currently doing business abroad and offering services that would encourage small and medium-sized Canadian firms to export as well.

This legislation represents a real win for Canadians and a real win for Canadian exporters. I encourage all members of the House to give it their support.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to add a few words to this debate and say that we once again support the new, updated mandate of the Export Development Corporation.

We hope the legislation we are in the process of passing in this House will provide the kind of support needed by the EDC in conjunction with other players in the Canadian financial community to help our exporters in Canada be fully effective competitors in this new globalized economic environment.

It is well known to everyone in this House that with the integration of the world economy, trade and financial matters are becoming increasingly linked. Financial packaging is becoming as important to the success of Canadian exporters in the international markets as the price and quality of the exports themselves.

Certainly much has changed since the Export Development Corporation was created in 1969. There have been changes in international financing and in the instruments that are used such as insurance, re-insurance, guarantees, leasing and a whole range of financial support that was really not used very much 20 years ago. This legislation is an attempt to reflect that fact and make those facilities available to the Export Development Corporation.

• (1250)

I want to raise a caution. The caution is there and it is partly what is motivating some of the amendments I introduced that oblige Parliament and parliamentarians to pay closer attention in the next few years to the responsibilities, roles and activities of this agency.

We realize that the world and the international economy are changing at a blurring rate. The capacity for us to react as legislators to the changes which are taking place now is limited by the very complexity of the kinds of transactions which are occurring.

At the same time over the last few years we have had fierce debates in this House over trade matters which used to be the purview of experts and have now become issues of vital concern to ordinary Canadians. Canadians know that exports and their financing, insurance and support affect the jobs of all Canadians.

In this country all of our players must work together as much as possible: the public sector players, of which the EDC is an important part; and the private sector and mainly the banking community; the insurance community; the exporting associations; the exporters themselves; the trust and trade companies which operate on international markets; the stock exchanges and a whole range of institutions which operate in the support and service of Canadian exports.

The activities of the Export Development Corporation which has been provided with a mandate and a privileged position by the Government of Canada to promote Canadian exports must work together with and not at cross purposes to or in competition with some of the other institutions, firms and businesses which deal with the international community.

That is why with the expansion of this legislation and with the regulations still not fully revealed to this House, we have adopted the position of agreeing to give the Export Development Corporation these new powers and of supporting it in the modernization of the kinds of instruments it uses to carry out its activities. However let us make sure that in the context of what is now taking place on the trade front it works with the Government of Canada and all members of this House to ensure that what it is doing is in support of exports and export jobs.

As my hon. friend for Broadview—Greenwood mentioned it must support small businesses and small business activities and work with the banks and other companies to promote exports and Canada's competitiveness. It must not work on its own. That is the caveat we want to flag before this House at this time with this legislation.

We want to express our support for the EDC and its activities in the role it plays which is a vital one in this climate of globalization. At the same time we want to make sure it is using that very important mandate in the service of Canadian exports and with the co-operation of the private sector in Canada under the monitoring and watchful eye of the Parliament of Canada. I think those points have to be made as we conclude debate on this important legislation. We express our support once again for that.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today on behalf of my colleague, the member for Mackenzie, who has been handling this bill during second reading and in committee but unfortunately is not able to be here today.

I want to say a few things about the bill to indicate that we are supporting it very clearly. I am rising to speak on this bill extending further authority to the Export Development Corporation which I think is a useful thing to do. Crown corporations cannot function when they are restricted and these amendments all add to the ability of the corporation to do its job, which is to assist in the exporting of our products around the world.

The proposals included in the bill provide additional abilities to allow the corporation to meet new competition and new practices that have been developed since the corporation began its operations back in 1944. A lot of practices have changed and a lot of our foreign competitors do have rights and privileges available to them that are no longer available to Canadian exporters simply because we have not brought our practices, laws and rules up to the levels that exist among foreign traders.

My reading of the bill, among other things, suggests that it would permit the Export Development Corporation to take an equity share in some projects that would permit it to act as a catalyst in mobilizing investors, other banks and banking institutions and make it possible for the funding of larger projects to proceed.

Sometimes the ability to take a minor equity position in a project may bring credibility to the whole project that would attract other legitimate investors in the project. The reality is that when we have an equity position we keep a much better eye on where our money or where our line of credit or line of insurance is applied.

As large and long-term projects develop, it becomes more and more necessary for the Export Development Corporation to be involved over a long term and some of the changes that are proposed in the bill appear to facilitate that need.

Another thing that many of the would-be users of the Export Development Corporation have complained about involves the current requirement for setting up a multitude of export development contracts with different countries and different contracts for domestic sales as opposed to export sales so that a company, like a textile manufacturer that exports some of its products, has to keep two sets of accounts, one for its export business and the other for its domestic business. A lumber company that might be doing business both internally and externally will find the ability to offer one contract for 1300 both internal and export business to be quite attractive.

It also has the effect of spreading the risk of the Export Development Corporation in making it less subject to bad collections in the event of a sudden collapse of a foreign country or a foreign currency market.

Many of our competitors are now in the business of making available to their exporters long-term, pre-shipment financing so that the pre-shipment development costs of getting business are being financed in other countries and in other jurisdictions. The proposed amendments to this legislation would allow the Export Development Corporation to provide that kind of service as well, again a laudable acceptance on the part of the government and the corporation.

In order to do long-term business they are in fact going to have to participate even at the planning and pre-export stages of the project aimed at increasing exports to other regions.

The fourth area that appears to provide some change would be the one permitting or enhancing the ability to support export sales through leasing arrangements. It would permit the EDC to act as a lessor or permit it to take direct equity participation in a lease financing arrangement so that a variety of partnerships could be established.

These proposals provide the kind of flexibility that seems to be there for our competitors and should assist somewhat in providing the infrastructure our exporters require in arranging the financing insurance that go with completing an export sale.

The role of exporting in this country has always been an extremely important one from the earliest days of economic activity when we exported fur to Europe, to the days when we increased our exports to include timber, later wheat and now a wide range of commodities and manufactured goods and services. The role the Export Development Corporation has to play can be a very important one.

I am pleased to assist in the passing of this bill today. I know that the folks in the other place will give it quick consideration and allow us to change the operations of the Export Development Corporation.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-118. As I mentioned on earlier occasions I am totally in support of this bill.

• (1300)

A couple of my colleagues asked earlier today if I was out on the golf course or biking on the weekend. I can tell them I attended a funeral on the weekend. I attended an outdoor funeral on the Golden Mile in Scarborough in Toronto. It was a funeral for the most productive, the greatest money generating machine in the General Motors fleet, the Scarborough van plant. The Canadian Auto Workers had a funeral on Saturday and this plant is very close to my riding. The men and women who are employed in this factory are from all over our city.

This was a plant that exported 90 per cent of its product, not only throughout North America but sometimes to different parts of the world. This was a plant that in the last 10 years contributed over $2.2 billion to the balance sheet of General Motors.

My friend from Brampton asked the question and I think it is a fair question: What does this have to do with EDC? This has everything to do with EDC because if we are going to revitalize our export market, if we are going to revitalize our small business community, we will have to be much more supportive than we have been with plants like the GM van plant in Scarborough.

Mr. McDermid: What should we have done?

Mr. Mills: I can honestly say to the member for Brampton, the minister responsible for privatization, I do not stand up here today with a magical solution to this and I admit that openly. However I have to say that when 3,500 people lose their jobs directly and another 10,000 to 15,000 in offsets lose and you are part of the community, you cannot disagree with me that this is sending a shiver of confidence through our community, the community that the hon. member and I share.

I know this is a very tough issue for the government. It is bad enough that we are losing plants that are losing money, but when a plant is closed down that has contributed $2.2 billion to the balance sheet of General Motors, what does that do to the trust factor? This is a plant that has won award after award because of its productivity and its quality of product. All of a sudden this great plant that has been exporting—

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not like it any better than the hon. member, but this really has nothing to do with the Export Development Corporation. This was a corporate decision made by General Motors.

Ford just made a corporate decision to invest billions of dollars in a Canadian plant and hired 1,100 more people for jobs. These things happen. That is a rationalization where 20,000 jobs were being lost by General Motors around the world. It is not just Canada. It has nothing to do with the Export Development Corporation and what we are debating. I would suggest that the hon. member stick to the subject matter of the bill.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The rule of relevancy is the most difficult parliamentary rule to apply. Again, I ask for the co-operation of hon. members on both sides of the House. I did hear the hon. member mention a funeral, but this was in reference to a plant in his riding of Scarborough. I would ask him to keep his remarks more relevant to the debate.

• (1305)

[English]

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that the member for Brampton, the minister responsible for privatization, would talk about Ford. I applaud Ford for adding another 1,000 or 1,500 people but that does not take away from the 3,500 people, plus the spin-offs that are being lost at GM.

We are not here in this House as Her Majesty's constructive Loyal Opposition to let something like this go by without a moment's discussion or debate in the House of Commons.

What does this have to do with the bill? This has everything to do with the bill.

Mr. McDermid: It has nothing to do with the bill.

Mr. Mills: The member for Brampton said it has nothing to do with the bill.

This is where the government has really thrown out the creative process. Part of the role of the Export Development Corporation is to encourage, to support, put packages together that will help expand and develop our exports.

I do not think it is wrong to mention on the floor of the House of Commons that we have a highly skilled force of 3,500 men and women in the centre of Toronto that right now are looking for the creativity that an export development corporation has. They are looking to see if the Export Development Corporation with its reputation and its access to people all over the world could maybe bring someone to this plant and hopefully get it back to work.

I am not ashamed to lean on the strength and track record of the Export Development Corporation to say please look out there and see what you can do.

General Motors did not have the creativity and does not have the wherewithal to hold this plant together. The purpose of government is not for those that are advantaged. We are not here to look out for those companies that are doing well right now. Our role in government is to look for those people in our communities and our cities that are disadvantaged. When considering direct and indirect jobs, 20,000 is a very large number.

I do not think it is wrong for us to call on the skill of the Export Development Corporation to please try and find someone that would help put this skilled labour force back to work. That is why I think this Scarborough van plant has a linkage with the Export Development Corporation.

I remember back in 1981 when the Motorola plant at Steeles and Woodbine in Toronto was about to close down. Through the auspices of the Export Development Corporation and with its support the plant developed a world product mandate for a couple of new products. That helped keep the Motorola plant open. It helped find, create, put in financial support and went a long way in keeping the Motorola plant open and productive and it has a world product mandate.

I am telling the members that I hope the Export Development Corporation could use the same skill and resource to maybe find or put some ideas on the table to help put these people back to work.

I know the auto business right now is a tough competitive business but this was one of the anchors of our manufacturing base in Toronto. This was one of the sectors of our economy that we could always count on but right now we are going through a very tough time.

I think for the member to suggest when we are talking about the Export Development Corporation not to talk about the Scarborough van plant when we are closing it this Thursday is a bit too sensitive.

Getting back to the Export Development Corporation, I think there is something else we have to talk about in this bill. I believe there are very few small businesses in our country that have a complete understanding of what the Export Development Corporation is all about. Would the member agree with that? It is a question of whose fault it is. We are on third reading of this bill. I can tell that this government has finally come to the realization that of the economic policies that it has been implementing in this nation very little is working.

• (1310)

It has also come to the realization that the people of Canada are not going to be fooled for the third time. This government has the greatest record for unemployment, perpetrating welfare, and shutting down manufacturing plants. It is the most incredible thing that it is here today while we are trying to be creative and constructive with the Export Development Corporation and while we are talking about the lives of 20,000 people in the city of Toronto and Scarborough that used to be called the Golden Mile in terms of manufacturing and production.

With this government we still call it the Golden Mile but it is inappropriately named because it is a pretty sad thing when one considers that the General Motors plant is the most productive in the entire fleet. I am going to quote a letter that Mr. Rick Fleming, the president of the Canadian Auto Workers Local 303, wrote recently:

> General Motors has stated in their own admission, "the Scarborough Van Plant has been the most profitable assemble operation for General Motors in the world, bar none! The workers have been scheduled to work two shifts, six days a week, for every year of operation including up to date".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I remind the hon. member that the debate is on Bill C-118, an act to amend the Export Development Act and I would appreciate the collaboration of the hon. member.

Mr. Mills: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have to get back to a tighter focus on Bill C-118 and I agree with you. It is a tough thing when one goes to a funeral of almost 20,000 people losing their jobs. One just cannot let it go.

Let us talk about the bill specifically. We need to give more support to the small business community with these new powers that the Export Development Corporation is about to receive. I stated at first reading and in amendments that I am totally supportive of the Export Development Corporation. I said it in this House of Commons before and I will say it again. I think the president, Paul Labbe, is doing a fantastic job with that particular organization.

However, I have to say that I as a member of Parliament am going to be very frustrated if this bill will not include the small business sector and if there is not an aggressive campaign to reach out and try to bring the small business community into the Export Development Corporation fold.

I hope the government will use the powers it has between now and September to push the Export Development Corporation to explain what the corporation is all about to the small business sector. I believe that if that happens then we will go a long way in creating some new jobs.

I also want to say one last thing to the government. It should not be afraid to call on the creativity of the public servants who are involved with the Export Development Corporation to help us rekindle the spirit in some of the plants that have been closed down because the people over there do not have the creative process left to find anything decent to put into them.

We cannot just ignore these people who are losing their jobs. Get the Export Development Corporation to go out and find joint venture investors. Go to different people who are coming here who could take over a plant that has the kind of facility it has and see if we cannot use the strength of those public servants to get those people back to work.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Marcel Danis (for the Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-109, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radiocommunication Act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak briefly on Bill C-109 and I will do my best to stick to the subject matter of the bill itself in so doing.

It is important legislation relating to electronic surveillance and the interception of radio-based telephone communications. Privacy is the unifying theme of this legislation. It is privacy in two distinct senses.

First, we have privacy as the right to be let alone. This is behind the changes relating to the controls imposed on agents of the state when they are carrying out their assigned responsibilities, which is mainly to detect and investigate crime but also to protect themselves and others from harm. Second, there is privacy as an entitlement to keep secrets. To shield communications from others is behind the changes relating to the cellular telephone.

I would also like to mention two important goals of this legislation as it relates to investigations and prosecutions of offences.

The first is to establish a legal framework within which the courts can fulfil their responsibility for regulating activities of state agencies in their law enforcement efforts when these activities intersect with the right of Canadians to privacy. The second goal is to improve the effectiveness of the investigative and trial process in relation to matters arising out of the use of technologically enhanced electronic surveillance activities.

Bill C-109 amends parts VI and XVI of the Criminal Code to put into place changes arising out of recent Supreme Court of Canada decisions. Many of the proposed changes are aimed at protecting the privacy of Canadians when their private communications activities become of critical interest to the state. Others focus on the procedural regime dealing with the issues of evidence.

A number of other changes are included. One of the most important is that it streamlines the evidentiary and procedural regime applicable to evidence gathered through electronic surveillance.

The bill also deals with privacy and cellular communications aimed at affirming the right of Canadians to be secure in their telephone communications. This is important as a boom of radio-based telephone services is on the horizon.

This bill adjusts the definition of protected private communications to explicitly cover scrambled calls. The purpose is to discourage the development of descrambling equipment. It will also facilitate prosecution for intercepting encrypted communications.

Because radio waves do not respect legal frontiers the bill calls for Canadian nexus for private communications brought within the scope of part VI of the Criminal Code.

The bill also protects the disclosure or use of any intercepted cellular call as well as the malicious or profit-motivated interception of these calls whether encrypted or not. It prohibits the use or disclosing of intercepted radio-based telephone communications and provides a civil right of action which would, among other things, permit an injunction to prevent the use or disclosure of radio-based communications without consent.

Some people are assuming that this bill legalizes listening to cellular calls by the casual scanner. That is not the case. The present law may very well cover the interception of a telephone conversation even if it involves a cellular phone. It depends on the circumstances. What these changes do is to make it clear that some situations are protected even if they do not fall within the current law.

In concluding these remarks I would urge this House to provide strong support for this important legislation. The Canadian law enforcement community awaits it eagerly. It is an important measure designed to better protect Canadians in their communications and against criminals.

• (1320)

It is clearly up to Parliament to ensure that the system functions efficiently and effectively and in a manner that conforms to the requirements of the charter. This bill is directed to that end.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I thank the members on the other side of the House for their warm greeting.

I must say that I have concerns about this legislation. I think that in a lot of ways the general thrust of the legislation is to be commended and is in fact constructive. Nevertheless, I think there are portions of this bill which cause considerable harm and are really counterproductive to what we want to achieve in this country.

The parliamentary secretary discussed privacy and how with the use of cellular phones and cordless phones, which can also be monitored, the government is striving for more privacy. It is legislating privacy where none can of course be reasonably expected to exist.

However, in the other aspect, with the utilization by the police and the authorities of wire-tapping, just the opposite has happened. What we really have is a schizophrenic piece of legislation. The government is striving for the rights of privacy with respect to cellular phones, but in fact privacy may be seriously breached with respect to wire-tapping.

I would like to emphasize that this bill deals with two aspects: the police use of electronic surveillance methods and the introduction of the protection of radio-based communications and cellular phone calls. We have the two different standards for the two different pieces and parts of this legislation.

To underline my concern about the privacy question I want to quote none other than Mr. Justice La Forest who, in a recent Supreme Court case, said: "A society which exposed us at the whim of the state to the risk of having permanent electronic recordings made of our words every time we opened our mouths may be superbly equipped to fight crime but would be one in which privacy no longer has any meaning". This is a concern. Privacy indeed may not have any meaning.

I want to mention a couple of aspects with respect to the first area, which is the police use of electronic surveillance methods, to underline my concern. Under the existing law the prosecutor has to prove that a wire-tap authorization was carried out lawfully, which I think is a good burden of proof. The onus is on the Crown to prove that the wire-tap authorization was carried out lawfully and so it should be.

However, what we have under this legislation is a major change. We have the creation of a reverse onus. The burden is now on the accused. Under this bill the wire-tap would be presumed lawful unless the defence could somehow prove otherwise. It is a major change.

I have a second concern with respect to the wire-tapping part. Under the present situation the police must now satisfy a judge that a wire-tap is absolutely necessary. With this piece of legislation this bill would free police to tap phones if they believe it would prevent a serious crime. This is a massive loophole that could be used in almost any situation. It would allow police to invade personal privacy without any accountability to a judge, prosecutor or superior.

• (1325)

I can understand the need to protect people. I can understand when a crisis arises and the police have to make a decision to stop a crime which is about to happen or protect some person, maybe even a fellow police officer against future recrimination or assault. My concern, however, with respect to the fact that the police can now tap phones if they believe it would prevent a serious crime is that they do not have any accountability. On page 8 of the bill, it says:

> A police officer may intercept by means of any electromagnetic acoustic mechanical or other device, a private communication where:
> (a) a police officer believes on reasonable grounds that the urgency of the situation is such that an authorization could not with reasonable diligence be obtained under any provision of this part;
> (b) the police officer believes on reasonable grounds that such an interception is immediately necessary to prevent an unlawful act which would cause serious harm to any person or property;
> (c) either the originator of the private communication of the person intended by the originator to receive it is the person who would perform the act that is likely to cause the harm or is the victim or intended victim of the harm.

The police need to be able to prevent crime and we do not want to hamstring our police forces. Fighting crime today is not an easy operation. Criminals also have the same technological advances, the same networking and are also very much aware of their rights. We have to allow the police to be able to do their jobs properly. As members of Parliament this means passing laws which allow the police to do this.

My concern with the right of the police to just make this decision is that there is not the accountability as I have said from a judge, prosecutor or superior. We have no specifications as to what is to happen to this wire-tapped information if we do not proceed with it in court.

If we proceed to court with this information, there is certainly an accountability. It will then be determined whether the wire-tap information meets the criteria of the section I just read and if it can be admitted or not. But what happens if the wire-tapping takes place on the basis of the subjective decision of the police officer and that police officer or somebody in the police force decides they are not going to proceed with the matter for which the wire-tapping took place? What happens to that information?

Of course we can say it will be destroyed. There is also the accountability, which is not there, to provide some breach of the law if this information is not destroyed and is subsequently used. I think that is lacking and it is very important that there be some criteria to that effect.

This first part grants police something they never had before which is the ability to obtain a warrant forcing subjects of an investigation to give blood samples or to take lie detector tests, even before they are charged.

Now there is nothing wrong with requiring the police to charge somebody before taking a blood sample or giving him or her a lie detector test, but I am very concerned about abuses here. I am very concerned about the person's rights and that there will be abusive situations and a major increase in the taking of blood samples and lie detector tests which really are not warranted on the facts of the situations. We are giving the police a power here which I do not honestly feel is necessary or warranted.

I have concerns. I admit that most of the provisions dealing with the authorization of the police to gather information are quite satisfactory and will help them in their tasks. However, the three examples I have mentioned give me a considerable amount of concern.

I now want to leave the police use of electronic surveillance methods for a minute to go to the second part of this bill. It relates to protection of radio-based communications which are cellular phone conversations or conversations of wireless telephones which can also be tapped. The suggested amendment to section 184.5(1) that is to be introduced into the Criminal Code says that:

> Every person who intercepts, by means of an electro-magnetic, acoustic mechanical or other device, maliciously or for gain, a radio-based telephone communication, if the originator of the communication or the person intended by the originator of the communication to receive it is in Canada, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years.

The government is saying it is permissible to listen in on a conversation, but it is not permissible to discuss it. We cannot discuss it with anyone. We cannot discuss it with the person standing next to us. If we happen to listen to this conversation we cannot discuss it with our wives or husbands. It is not a question of whether this information is used. It is a question of whether we discuss it with anyone.

It has always been the principle that the airwaves were free and open for any communication. If we wanted to shout to someone across a field or from an open window to the street below, the principle was that the information we yelled was public information.

It also extended to telephone party lines. If we were on a party line and someone listened in to our conversation, that was our fault. We just did not discuss personal matters over the telephone if we were on a party line. That was just the way it was. People who did and had their information received had themselves to blame.

A party line did not allow us an alternative. If we were on a party line we did not have another phone in another room that was not on a party line. Every phone we had was on a party line and probably the fellow in the house next door was on a party line and maybe even the same party line. He may have been the person listening in on our conversations. We had to drive a considerable distance to find a phone that was not on a party line to have a conversation we felt was secure.

Now we have a law which changes not only the principle of the openness of the airwaves, but also the fact that those who talk about a phone call they hear accidentally, intentionally or whatever or who listen in on cellular phone conversations are now liable under the Criminal Code and the Radiocommunication Act as well.

That of course is a major change. Why have we made this major change? I think the government is really using the law for the wrong purpose. It is trying to sell cellular phones by using the Criminal Code.

• (1335)

That is exactly the sum and substance of this part of the legislation. The major communications companies that manufacture and sell cellular phones will be a source of millions of dollars a year in major licensing fees for the government. Also if the cellular phone companies make a profit they are able to pay taxes. Quite frankly, they have quite a bit of clout with the government. The government is telling people they cannot listen in on cellular phone conversations and relay anything that is said or they will be breaking the law and subject to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years.

They are also subject under the Radiocommunications Act on pages 23 and 24 where it says:

> Every person who contravenes subsection 9(1.1) or (2) is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction and liable
> (a) in the case of an individual, to a fine not exceeding $25,000 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year or to both; and
> (b) in the case of a person other than an individual, to a fine not exceeding $75,000.

One may also sue the individual who has listened in on the conversation for an unlimited amount of damages.

Everybody would agree that people should not listen in on cellular phone conversations. The problem, however, is that scanners are in use today. The United States has prohibited the importation and manufacturing of scanners. It has not outlawed the scanners which are in use right now. I think there is a distinction between what the government is trying to do here and what has been done in the United States because the United States recognizes that people will not have privacy as long as there are scanners.

Calls can be intercepted now but with an increase and improvement in technological advances in cellular phones an increasingly sophisticated scanner will be needed to be able to pick up these conversations. The scanner will have to be able to hone in on ever more remote frequencies.

We are told there are presently 900,000 scanners in the country. That is a ridiculous figure. There are not 900,000 scanners that can pick up cellular phone conversations without being doctored or modified. Very few scanners can do that. When we say there are 900,000 scanners we are talking about devices that can open garage doors. We are talking about radios that can pick up ambulance calls, police calls and things like that. The government is lumping these scanners together in this 900,000 figure, but they are not the ones to be concerned about. We are concerned about the scanners, as in the case of the United States, that are able to pick up calls even with improved technology.

The law should be there to handle people who willingly and knowingly break the law. It should not be used as a means of trying to improve the saleability of cellular phones. I think that is a vital distinction.

I think that as people become more aware that conversations on cellular phones are happening via public radio waves that the companies would be concerned and that this would reduce the marketability of these cellular phones. However, we really have to warn people that their phone conversations can be listened to.

Instead of making people aware of the fact that these phone calls can be intercepted and listened to, the government is moving the other way to try to delude the public into thinking that conversations are safe and that there is not going to be any danger. That is wrong. One can make all the law in the world but that is not going to change the technology. If someone listens in on a phone conversation with a scanner—and any scanners are going to be lawful in Canada—then one has to have knowledge of the fact that they willfully or maliciously told somebody about this conversation.

How many phone conversations do we think are going to be intercepted without any knowledge of the interception or where the information came from? There are going to be hundreds. However, the government is going to continue to make the Canadian people feel that they are safe by passing this law. It will make them feel that if someone breaks the law as stated, then that person is going to be punished and that is going to safeguard the information on the cellular phone.

I want to just go back again to the party line example where there was no alternative. With a cellular phone there is an alternative. If one has a phone in one's car or one is using a cellular phone in the home then chances are that one has a phone that is not a cellular phone that can be used. If not, then one is certainly not far away from a phone that is not a cellular phone where one can speak about things privately. It is a minor inconvenience certainly to have to change phones, but the fact is that it is possible.

If the scanners were banned as the technology increases, then the likelihood of that cellular phone conversation being intercepted would be decreased. First, the scanners necessary would have to be more sophisticated as the cellular phone technology became more sophisticated. Second, the fact is that few people would have the scanners that would be able to do it because most people do not buy scanners to intercept phone conversations. They buy scanners to listen to the ambulance calls or just to pick up ordinary things on the airwaves. This is a fact.

We are saying that cellular phones, which the Minister of Communications himself even agreed were radios, for the purposes of the law are not radios. They are ordinary phones and cannot be intercepted.

I think we are taking the wrong approach here. I do not think the government is concerned about privacy, certainly not with respect to the first part concerning the police use of electronic surveillance. I think it is concerned with the operations and the profitability of the cellular phone companies. That may be fine. It is important to have jobs and important to improve the business and the economy of this country but not to use the law to do it.

While there is a good deal in this bill which is good, I feel that there are some provisions that are not so good and should be changed.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today in debate of Bill C–109, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radiocommunication Act.

I do so having participated on the committee for part of the time. I spent a lot of time thinking about the bill and the issues it relates to and thinking about the role that electronic communication has in our society today. We tend to think of this as a cellular phone bill, but I want to remind members that there is more to radio–based telecommunications than cellular phones.

• (1345)

I suspect all of us have hands–free phones at home. The range is probably broader than we think in terms of people in the neighbourhood who can listen in to our phone conversations. We also forget about the new personal phone numbers that are coming with the new mobile phones. I forget the correct term but there are some experiments going on in Canada and some licences have been given for personalized phones. They are sort of like cellular phones but not quite. They are radio–based as well.

This is the point I am making on this aspect. Cellular phones can be scrambled or digitalized or what have you to make it impossible to intercept them at a price. However, it is unlikely that our hands–free phones at home, which can be intercepted by scanners and fixed frequency receivers and other phones that operate on the same frequency, or the new personal phones will have the ability, because of price, to provide the protection of privacy that people would like to think they have.

The dilemma for all of us is this: Do we own our own voices? When we choose to communicate over devices provided by our modern technology do we give up that right or is there some need to provide some additional protection?

It is fairly simple in law to deal with communications that go through what I call land lines. These are copper cables and now fibre optic cables that stretch from one end of this country to the other. Through an electromagnetic device called a telephone we send the signals down through those cables and it comes up at the other end.

We have protections in place to ensure that those communications cannot be legally intercepted unless due process has been adhered to. That due process requires a police authority, whether it is local, provincial or federal, to obtain the necessary authority from a judge under the provisions of the appropriate act and only for a certain period of time and only under certain circumstances.

However, what do we do with radio-based communication? Do we not as well need some protection that works in the 1990s and beyond? We know that our ability as a nation for example to control the airwaves is much more difficult today than it was 30 years ago. I am thinking of full broadcast, television and radio, that knows no boundaries. We were unable to prevent the satellites from sending the signals into Canada from the United States so we put in place mechanisms to ensure that there were some kind of controls and protection for Canadian culture.

However, technology has outstripped some of our abilities. I think the government is trying with this bill to find a way to allow our ability to communicate using radio and telecommunication devices to happen and also to provide some kind of protection for the information sent over those airwaves.

I know that a lot of concern has been expressed around whether or not it is appropriate to prevent, through the Criminal Code, the rebroadcasting of this information.

Someone with a scanner or a fixed frequency receiver and a steno pad and a tape recorder sits down and transcribes the communication between two civil servants in the province of Quebec or a cabinet minister in British Columbia and then publishes or airs that information. That is where we focused a lot of our discussion, but I think we forget that there are more users of cellular phones and hands-free phones than just politicians and bureaucrats. There are business people out there who use them in conducting their daily business; traders, in terms of the stock market and financial analysts. They are business people who are making comments and passing out information on cellular phones. If someone should take that information and use it it may in fact be harmful to that individual and perhaps might even lead to charges down the road. I think we need to keep that in mind when we talk about the protections.

• (1350)

We also need to keep this in mind. Say that one is on a cellular or hands-free phone at home and is ordering something from the Sears catalogue by giving one's Sears number over the phone. If somebody is scanning that frequency then they have your credit card number. While there are other protections in place to deal with the fraudulent use of that credit card, one will not know that it is being used. It is not like one lost the card or one's wallet or purse has been stolen, but that number is out of one's hand and someone is using it.

The same thing applies to telephone credit cards. If one uses that number over a cellular phone or a hands-free phone and somebody is scanning it then they have that number. If it is a Bell card it is fairly easy for them to use it.

Let us talk about our own cards, which is the government line or the calling card. It is not difficult for someone who is in the business to scan the airwaves in our neighbourhoods or around Parliament Hill to catch many of us dialling our 1-800 numbers to get into the government service or dialling the local numbers. They can capture those numbers. At the same time, if we are verbally giving out our calling card number then they have that number too. They can in effect steal access to the government lines.

There is more than just the question of the publication of the conversation at risk here. Legislation particularly in these areas is a matter of balance between the protection of the individual and the rights of society. I think on balance, having thought about it, these particular amendments, although probably going a bit further than all of us would like, are about the only tools that are realistic in today's electronic age.

I want to turn from the telephone aspect in terms of the personal communications that we have to some of the other elements in the bill. I think at the outset I have to say that again we make choices, look for balance and need to balance the rights of the individual with the needs and protections that society requires.

Look at the question of wire-taps where a police force is authorized to go in and intercept the communications either on a land line, radio telephone or what have you. We gave them that tool to ensure that they could do their job to protect us. We also put in place protections for society and the individual whose phone was tapped. Due process had to be entered into. The police could not do it on their own, which is the way it used to be. They could just go in and tap those phone lines and sit there in some dingy basement and listen in to all our conversations.

We as a society stepped in and said that that is no longer good enough. We needed to have some rules in place and that is what we did. We set up a system where they would have to go and get a court order. They were able to do it for a particular period of time and then they had to cease if they did not get the evidence they required.

One of the situations that occurred in the last number of years was that the courts decided that one aspect of that wire-tapping was no longer legal. That is the situation where an individual has agreed to allow his or her phone to be tapped because they were either being threatened by someone else or they were a co-conspirator with another party in terms of a criminal matter. In fact, it could be someone with knowledge of a criminal matter, such as a murder, who wanted to assist the police in terms of getting the appropriate evidence to take that person to court.

There is a specific incident in Thunder Bay where this happened.

• (1355)

A woman allowed her phone to be tapped in order to get proof from a male that he had in fact participated in a murder. Just before that was to go to trial the courts ruled on a separate matter that was no longer legal. Just because one person had given permission the police did not have the right. Therefore they could not use the evidence obtained in that way in the court case.

This bill puts that provision into the law. I think it is a good provision and will assist the police forces where they have been able to get a clear indication of someone's guilt but not the proof, where they find a party willing to have their phone communications intercepted, and they are able to convince the judge of all this information. Keep in mind the judge is the gatekeeper. The judge is the one who decides, not the police, the appropriateness of any of these search warrants, in effect, for telephone taps. That is a plus.

The other one that on balance is worth doing is the one that allows the police in fairly rare circumstances, as I understand the bill, to put in a wire-tap when they believe a serious crime is about to be committed. Again there is due process. They have to destroy any evidence gathered if the police are unable to find that a crime has really happened. They have to destroy any records, such as the transcripts and the tape recording, of that particular wire-tap.

There are some protections that will assist us as a society that do not unduly interfere with the rights of society while at the same time provide the ability to find out whether someone is about to commit a major crime, whether it be a crime of violence or a crime of property. It is an important tool that we need to give to our police forces.

If we look at some of the other legislation we have where the police have been given the right to forcibly enter a home if they believe that a weapon is about to be used in the committing of a crime. I certainly have not heard of widespread abuse, or any abuse for that matter, of that particular power. We have to recognize that our police forces have a sense of public duty and public responsibility. In matters like this we need to have faith that they will do it in the appropriate way and they will not abuse these kinds of powers and seek out individuals for vengeance or harassment by wire-tapping. There is again due process which people can rely on to ensure that no one abuses that particular right and abuses this particular legislation.

In the final minute before two o'clock may I say it is a bill that has had a reasonable amount of study. There are legitimate concerns that have been raised by witnesses. At this point it is clear the government feels that as constructed the bill is a balance. We will need to watch the rest of the debate today to see whether it goes on to the other place today or whether it remains in this House for a while longer.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that we have less than a minute to go I wonder if you wish to call it two o'clock. I would be pleased to resume the right and obligation to speak to this bill at such time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

MINE TAILINGS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, a Quebec mining company called Ressources Sainte-Geneviève is investing $20 million in an INRS research program to extract precious metals from mine tailings, these usually toxic wastes that the original mine operators left behind.

• (1400)

Not only is the process cost-effective but it would stop the contamination of downstream waterways by those open-air dumps of toxic waste. This process, for which Quebec has authorized a first trial on 100,000 tonnes of waste at the Manitou Mine near Val d'Or, is one of the so-called first-generation solutions.

It is doubly important because, while giving a new commercial value to this often dangerous waste, it takes it out and away from the threatened environment, reduces its volume by 80 per cent and could well control the remaining residue through burial under water in the abandoned galleries, in order to completely prevent the release of the toxic substances which occur naturally in such waste. The management of contaminated water seeping from mine-tailing storage yards has become a governmental priority world-wide.

Mine storage yards have contaminated entire watersheds and over the past couple of decades their management has cost governments trying to handle orphan sites a fortune and has been a costly burden for active mine operators as well.

NATIONAL FOREST WEEK

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, during the week of May 2 to May 8 Canadians will be celebrating National Forest Week. The 1993 theme will be Our Common Ground.

There is nothing common any more as the Conservative government is shafting the provinces and the forest industry with the financial burden in the application of integrated forest management. So much for silviculture, reforestation, the protection of wildlife habitats and access roads for anglers and hunters.

Twenty thousand jobs will be lost when the Forest Resources Development Agreements are not renewed upon expiry. This will only fuel the environmentalist movement's efforts to tarnish our international reputation as a nation that neglects its forests.

During National Forest Week the question every Canadian should be asking themselves is: How can I help to make our forests better and more productive? The answer is: By removing this tired Conservative government.

PEACEKEEPERS

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, Canada's peacekeeping soldiers have a long and distinguished history. However a recent spate of accusations by opposition members of Parliament casting shadows on their integrity and ability stem more from concern about the possibility of the Minister of National Defence becoming Canada's next Prime Minister than from the calibre of our soldiers in Somalia.

Lieutenant-General Gordon Reay said on the weekend that he is:

> disturbed by attempts to use my soldiers as whipping boys in an attempt to get defence minister Kim Campbell.

I and other Canadians agree with Lieutenant-General Reay. These fine men and women are doing their best in a very difficult situation, and attacks upon their integrity do not help.

The military justice system is currently investigating the Somali deaths. As members of Parliament we must learn to let them do their job and await the outcome of their investigation before casting doubts upon the capability of our Armed Forces.

PARLIAMENTARY EMPLOYMENT AND STAFF RELATIONS ACT

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, over the past almost seven years numerous questions, statements and speeches in this House by myself and others have failed to elicit any reasonable response from this government as to why it has failed to proclaim its law, the labour standards and health and safety sections, parts II and III, of the Parliamentary Employment and Staff Relations Act, which was passed by all parties in this House in June 1986.

The Prime Minister has failed to even reply to numerous repeated letters from Mr. Daryl Bean, the national president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada. Further, my attempts have resulted only in non-substantive acknowledgements from the PMO and the government House leader only verbally responded with mischievous diversions that were simply untrue.

My Motion No. 743, urging proclamation, comes up for debate on May 11. If the government continues to fail to explain why this basic legislation has not been proclaimed I urge MPs from all parties to give their consent to a renewed vote on this question and grant their support to this long overdue protection to those who serve us and Canada on Parliament Hill.

After seven years it is time.

THE BUDGET

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, it has now been one week since the finance minister introduced his second budget. It promised no new taxes or increased taxes. It also cut proposed spending over the next five years by almost $31 billion.

Our budget will allow Canada to lead the world in economic growth for 1993 and 1994. As Canadians learn more about our plans they will regain the confidence required to invest in Canada and to spend.

Some of our plans were previously announced in December and are already showing benefits. Canadians have invested in shares of business enterprises at record setting rates in each of the last four months. Our February gross domestic product grew at a rate of 0.4 per cent, a post-recession high. Employment has grown each month this year.

• (1405)

Even this past weekend was one of the warmest in many months and the Toronto Maple Leafs won their hockey series. It is amazing what a good budget can do.

POLAND

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, on this date over two centuries ago the Polish Parliament met in 1791 and affirmed the fundamental principles of democracy, freedoms which today we often take for granted.

In the same spirit of the democratic movement which swept across Europe and the Americas the proclamation of the constitution of 1791 came to represent a kind of bill of rights for later generations in Poland.

Tragically, the May 3 Constitution was crushed by invading armies of Europe, mostly out of fear of the liberal democratic movement. However the lessons of the past still hold true today.

[Translation]

The more things change, the more they stay the same.

[English]

For example, in the former republic of Yugoslavia today there is a glimmer of hope for peace. The lesson is that we must always practice freedom of religion, we must always respect basic human rights and worship peace instead of war.

That is as true today as it was 202 years ago in Warsaw.

NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to note recently that the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council has forecast the strongest economic growth in the Atlantic region for the province of New Brunswick.

According to APEC, New Brunswick has regained all of the 12,000 jobs it lost during the recession and is looking healthy in recovery. The labour force is expanding again as new companies begin to open new businesses throughout the province.

The unemployment rate has declined to within one percentage point of the national average. The fixed link and federal funds for road building will help fuel the pace of economic growth in New Brunswick.

In spite of this rosy forecast APEC did point to the provincial deficit as a problem area. This underscores the need for all governments to work together to control deficits and debts.

BATTLE OF THE ATLANTIC

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, this past weekend Canadians in communities across our country observed the 50th anniversary of the Battle of the Atlantic.

Our navy had become the third largest allied power with more than 100,000 sailors, including 6,800 women who served in shore establishments in Canada and overseas as wrens.

Tragically, we lost 59 merchant ships and 32 naval vessels, 24 of them in the Battle of the Atlantic, and over 3,000 lives were lost.

Today, to those brave men and women of the Royal Canadian Navy and merchant marine who returned safely to our shores from the icy cold of the North Atlantic and to those who did not return, to those who went down to the sea in ships whilst serving their country, we honour their dedication and their defence of freedom.

Their service and their sacrifice still inspires us here at home and serves as a noble example to those many Canadians still serving in our Armed Forces in hostile places around the globe.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, because my hon. friends across the floor are usually remiss in reporting good news to Canadians I feel compelled to rise in the House today.

Over the weekend The Globe and Mail reported that the Canadian economy grew 0.4 per cent in February. This is consistent with the economic indicators of the last three months, which show Canada's GDP rising.

That is only part of the good news. The other part is that February's surge in output brings the total value of Canada's goods and services, our GDP, to its highest level since March 1990, when our economy took a downturn. In other words, not only is the recession over but our economy is now stronger than when the recession began.

For many months the opposition has called for an end to our efforts at restructuring. It has said: Cancel free trade, cancel the GST, cancel NAFTA, increase spending.

By rejecting these so–called alternatives and remaining committed to our goals of freer markets, fair taxation and fiscal prudence we have laid the foundation for a higher quality of growth and a stronger economy for the long term.

If I can quote the reaction to Saturday's figures of the assistant chief economist at the Royal Bank: "We are on the right track. Things are—"

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

PARTY LEADERS

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker:

While Brian Mulroney will travel the globe
all decked out in a fancy wardrobe he will spend a million to find a new job won't give a hoot about the loud angry mob

While he takes a jet and the Cadillac tour
all the while scrimping on this country's poor there's a leader who cares and I'll gladly mention that that man is none other than Jean Chrétien

Fresh from a tour in Hamilton/Niagara by bus veejay Erica Ehm made a big fuss over Chrétien at Stelco and Chrétien in Toronto and with a man in touch with the needs of the people

While Kim Campbell says she wants users to pay for a medicare system Chrétien says no way it's a right, he says, it's a right they forget
So don't place your money on that foolish bet

After being promised jobs jobs jobs back in '84 and the only one you've had is to mop the floor ask if you're better off today than you were back then bet you'll say no but will trust Jean Chrétien

You can change the label you can change the name but that can of tuna's still tainted all the same all I want to do, is ask one simple question will you be better off with the same indigestion?

JUSTICE

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the fact that all Canadians have the desire to feel safe and secure in their homes our government has placed justice issues high on its list of priorities.

However only so much can be done with legislation alone. Each Canadian citizen has a responsibility to help the system do its job by being involved in the community and taking an active part in helping local police by being alert and co-operative.

Parents also have a special responsibility to teach their children that police are to be respected and not feared and to instil a belief in law and order.

To be good citizens we must be cognizant that making laws to protect Canadians is only the first step. All of us must help to enforce those laws if they are to be effective in combating crime.

In many cases the greatest weapon criminals have against us is our reluctance to get involved.

TREE PLANTERS

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, they began arriving a short time ago with unique hair styles, pack sacks, shovels and other gear into communities throughout Canada to help replant our forests. It is tree planting time.

Tree planters, a lot of them university students, are the unsung heroes of our forests, out to help the environment and make a few bucks to finance their education.

Yesterday in Prince George, B.C. there was a tree planters picnic to give everyone a chance to say hello and wish them well, and there were events in Ontario and other communities and provinces across the country. Whether it is for government or the private sector tree planting is an important part of the sustainable development of our forests.

We urge the government to reconsider its budget decision that plans to eliminate forest agreements with the provinces. These agreements have helped replant our forests and fund much needed research.

We say to the tree planters: Work hard, be careful, and when you take some time off, go easy. Thank you.

NATIONAL FOREST WEEK

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, this week Canadians across the country are celebrating National Forest Week. The theme this year is Our Common Ground.

The purpose of this theme is to encourage greater public awareness of the ways in which forests affect all Canadians across all of Canada.

No one knows the value of our forests better than the people of British Columbia. Forests shape the beauty of British Columbia's landscape and are critical to the economic and social stability of everyone who lives in our province.

During National Forest Week I hope we will all reflect upon the hundreds of thousands of people who live in communities across the country that are dependent upon the forest resource. For it is they, the people who live in these communities, who truly understand the need to manage our forests in a sustainable manner. They will ensure our long-term health and productivity which will benefit their communities for the future generations.

PROVINCE OF ONTARIO

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, every summer hundreds of thousands of people visit parks, lakes and picnic grounds in conservation land set aside with foresight by successive Ontario governments. These are people who do not have a cottage, access to a lake or even a cool backyard. To them the 38 conservation authorities in Ontario offer a place where they can go with their families and enjoy a day in the fresh air surrounded by nature.

We learn now that some of these lands might have to be sold as part of Premier Rae's austerity program. Budgets of conservation authorities will be reduced, possibly forcing the sale of publicly owned lands. The people of Ontario should tell the premier that these precious public recreational areas are not for sale. His unwarranted decision must be reversed. The 38 conservation sites belong to the people and must be preserved for the benefit of present and future generations.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, many amazing and wonderful, in fact weird things are happening during the current Tory leadership convention.

Ministers who have sat in the cabinet for an entire term are repudiating this government's fiscal strategy which was laid out in last week's budget. The Minister of the Environment and the Minister of National Defence are competing to see who can come up with the wildest plan to repudiate the Minister of Finance.

The Canadian public should look closely at these plans. They tell us a lot about the values and priorities of these aspiring Tory leaders. Let us look at the plan advanced by the hon. Minister of National Defence. She has a plan that would balance the federal budget, among other things, by imposing user fees on people who are sick and in need of medical care. No matter what our income, the hon. minister feels we should pay an extra fee to get access to the health care system we are already paying for through our taxes.

She is dead wrong. A new tax on the health care system will not cut health care costs. The only thing user fees do is make health care harder to get at for poor people. If the minister of defence is really interested in containing health care costs, she should begin by looking at pharmaceutical prices which are going through the roof in large part because of policies of the cabinet in which she sits.

Canadians will not forget this change of Tory policy.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

HEALTH CARE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Some two years ago in this House we had a vote on the universality of medicare, and said that free medicare was for everybody with no user fees. Over the weekend the Minister of National Defence said that she intends to have user fees for medicare.

I would like to know from the Deputy Prime Minister if there is a change in the policy of the government or if the government is still of the same view as expressed many, many times by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, that the policy of the government is to have free medicare for everybody and refuses to bend under pressure to have user fees.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the policy of the government is very clear. It has been enunciated by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and other ministers on many occasions.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition knows very well that this is an issue that is generating public debate because there are cost pressures.

Mr. Fontana: The only debate is on that side.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member suggests that the debate is only on this side. This is an issue that finance ministers have been discussing. This is an issue that health ministers have been discussing. This is an issue that health and finance ministers have been discussing together. It is quite clear that the objective here is to try to provide health services to Canadians consistent with the principles that are outlined in the Canada Health Act.

What we are trying to do is to look at ways and means to contain costs, and we are doing that in a co-operative fashion, with the provinces and the federal government working in concert with the health sector.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, does the Deputy Prime Minister intend to ensure that the candidates for the leadership of his party do not create confusion about this? Because the Minister of the Environment made the same statement about universality a few weeks ago and everyone knows that is the only program now which remain universal, because the Conservative government has taken universality away from all the other programs.

Will the Acting Prime Minister do what must be done so that sick people in Canada do not have to worry that very soon they will have to pay to go to the hospital

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition has had some experience in being engaged in leadership campaigns. He has been through a couple of them in the not too distant past and he knows very well—.

Mrs. Maheu: They are lying.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, did I hear someone across the way say they lied? Are they lying? Is who lying? The leadership candidates. Mr. Speaker, I am not sure but I do not believe that is the kind of language that should be hurled across the floor of the House.

• (1420)

Mr. Speaker: If necessary, I will examine what was said. The hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, obviously this is an issue that should be debated publicly. Leadership candidates are expressing points of view as are many other Canadians, but clearly the policy of the government with respect to adhering to the five principles of the health care system as prescribed for under the Canada Health Act is very clear, and that remains the policy of the government.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): If it is the case I would like to know if the Deputy Prime Minister would tell us when the minister of health and welfare will make a statement to that effect. On March 18 of this year the minister of health and welfare said that he was not going to be a leadership candidate but that one thing was sure and that was that if anybody among the candidates were to attack the universality of medicare, he would attack them.

When will the minister of health and welfare come forward and make a statement attacking the candidates who want to destroy medicare?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare is out of the country on government business but he was here all last week and he is here most of the time. He has expressed the same policy as that of the government time and time again. My understanding is that in the House on April 30 my colleague, the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization, quoted for the record the exact quote of the Minister of National Defence, as follows: "There are disagreements over user fees. You know I am of the school, so for medical programs I am of the school of Benoit Bouchard", that is the current minister of health whom the hon. member just praised.

That can be found at page 18739 of Hansard for April 30.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

There is a great principle at stake here. The government has said time and time again in the past that medicare is sacred. Yet ministers are now saying that nothing is sacred, that medicare is not sacred.

The government has promised a white paper on social and health policy and now it is hiding it during the leadership campaign. Canadians have a right to know: Is medicare sacred to this government?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I just answered that question. The position of the federal government is very clear.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): It may be very clear to the minister but he is not making it clear to the House.

The principle of medicare requires proper financing, proper commitment and the establishment of programs in support of the Canada Health Act. All of these measures are not being followed either by the minister or by anybody in this government. Instead, the Canadian people are receiving exactly the opposite signal.

I ask the minister again: Is medicare still a sacred trust to this government, yes or no?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course it requires proper financing and of course when all governments are faced with extreme pressures on their financial resources they have to find ways and means to do things better.

Every premier and every health minister across the country recognizes that point. The five principles that are enshrined in the Canada Health Act are clearly the basis upon which the Government of Canada bases its policies.

POVERTY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, in an interview this weekend the Conservative member for Don Valley North said, and I quote: "There are many people who go to food banks and who are not there because they absolutely need the food; they are there because that gives them more money to spend on other things".

I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister this: The member's comments are clearly insulting to the two million people whose only choice is to rely on food banks, the one in six children in Canada who live in poverty.

Does the Acting Prime Minister share the views of the member for Don Valley North or does he believe that instead of blaming the victim his government should come in with a program to really address poverty in this country?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, we know that unfortunately there are poor and hungry people in this country. Our approach has been to improve the well-being of all of our citizens. This we have been doing through our economic initiatives and the agenda that has been put forward by the finance minister and Deputy Prime Minister. The best form of assistance is a job. We wish that everybody could contribute in a meaningful way to the building of our society.

• (1425)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. There was no answer as to whether this government agrees that in fact we should be addressing the issue of poverty.

[Translation]

It is shocking, it is incredible that the chair of the poverty committee thinks that the solution to poverty is just to change the definition of the word.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister as well deny that one child in six lives in poverty and that 4 million people are poor in this country? Does he too deny that poverty really exists?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, we have already taken some initiatives. We increased the child tax credit to $2.1 billion and the new "Brighter Futures" program announced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare provides about $500 million.

We are suffering from the current situation in our country, and we want all citizens to have an opportunity to contribute to a better life.

I am working with all community groups, which are doing an outstanding job in this field to help people who need a hand, and I appreciate all they do.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the minister responding should work with the Minister of Finance who has cut many of those community groups that were in fact defining poverty in the community. The reality is that one in six children in this country lives in poverty. The minister says the answer is greater employment. We agree.

My question is: When is this government prepared to bring in a jobs plan for Canadians, when is this government prepared to admit that poverty exists, that employment is the solution? We agree. Where is the jobs plan?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would have to agree that the latest GDP statistics are very encouraging: .4 for the month of February which means if we take the last three months, December, January and February, we have got annualized growth of something in the order of 4 per cent. There have been over 200,000 full-time new jobs created since last August. The employment growth rate since November on an annualized basis has been growing at the rate of 2.8 per cent.

It clearly demonstrates some of the initiatives that we took in last February's budget and the complementary actions that we took in the December statement, such as the investment in physical and human resources, the investment in infrastructure, the investment in more training, the incentives for small business, the initiatives for stimulating the housing sector. All of these things are now starting to pay off and we are seeing some very positive growth and some very positive indicators in the Canadian economy.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

We are all aware that the chair of the subcommittee on poverty has renewed her role as tormentor of the poor. The government's leading poverty revisionist would have us believe that if poor Canadians are taught how to shop and how to cook they would not need food banks.

I ask the minister why he has allowed his poverty chief to tell Canadians that poor people are as stupid and useless as the government that rules them?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I guess the question would be more properly put to the member for Don Valley North who I do not believe said what is reported to have been said about her.

Mr. Marchi: Where is she?

Mr. Fontana: I heard her on the radio this morning.

Mr. Weiner: I am pleased that you heard it. I have not had a chance to read it at this point.

I recognize the situation that there are poor and hungry people in this country. We are attempting to do everything to help all those people. I personally have been involved in my own community in every way possible to be supportive of just such organizations. We hope we will find a way to achieve full employment or to find an opportunity for everybody to participate fully. It starts with a job. It starts with better education. It starts with a good health care program which we already have in this country. We are hopeful we will continue to see progress on behalf of those families at risk.

• (1430)

There have been significant programs put in: the $2.1 billion of increased spending in the child tax credit and the $500 million introduced by the minister for Brighter Futures. Those are all assisting families in need.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, this government may try to hide hunger but it cannot hide its contempt for the hungry.

[Translation]

The government's high priestess on poverty says that many people who go to food banks do not really need to. These are the very words of someone whose experience of poverty is limited to that of a mere spectator who never even visited the largest soup kitchen in the country, which serves her own riding.

I ask the minister why his government acts on poverty with all the sensitivity of a sledge hammer.

[English]

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, as the minister responsible for citizenship I particularly commend all those who contribute both their time and financial assistance to the support of those who are less well off in our communities.

I have tried to indicate publicly my own personal support. I have had long experience with Sun Youth in Montreal, as an example. It is a very noble and fine institution that has been providing the community with the type of help the member would like to see.

[Translation]

It is not easy; times are tough. Many families experience hardship in such times. There is no need to blame anyone, because frankly we all want to make life easier for our fellow citizens. We are continuing to work toward this goal and I am sure that goes as much for members on our side as for those on the hon. member's side.

EDUCATION

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Student unemployment in Nova Scotia stood last year at 24 per cent. Tuition fees in Nova Scotia universities have gone up 50 per cent since 1985. In the same time period SEED job funding is down 44 per cent. Student loans are slashed. No jobs, no loans, equals no education.

When can students expect action from this government to relieve their desperate situation?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is pointing to a very bleak picture of the situation of students in Nova Scotia. Given the fiscal restraints all governments at all levels have to acknowledge and face, the minister of youth increased the amount of money, not by a big amount but by a bit, available for Challenge to allow students to obtain summer jobs.

Under the circumstances we have to highlight the economic steps being taken to ensure the economy recovers so that jobs can be created in the summer for our youth.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the minister is correct when he said it was not very much. In actual fact the amount the funding was increased 3.5 per cent against a 44 per cent cut over the previous six years. It is a drop in a leaky bucket. If that is Tory economics we really need lots of education in the country.

Now the government says that Challenge '93 will favour employers who hire high school students. In my riding of Halifax, Dalhousie tuition is set to rise another 50 per cent over five years.

Why can the government not help all students instead of making high school and university students compete against each other for too few dollars?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is so concerned about the fate of young students she should congratulate the Minister of Finance for not having cut the transfer to provinces for education in his budget.

• (1435)

At a time of fiscal restraint the good news about the budget is that all those funds directed and targeted at human resource development have not been cut. They constitute a net increase relative to other government expenditures, which just goes to show that students are a priority of this government.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the thousands of students who are now leaving university for the year and are looking for jobs will not be very convinced by that kind of answer. They might be attracted to the answer being provided by President Clinton who has borrowed an idea from the New Democrats for a national youth service and has linked that as well with a reformed student loan program and student grant program which will help low income students gain greater access to colleges and universities.

The federal government's new life-long learning policy talks about maximizing access. My question is for the Secretary of State or her spokesperson. Is the government prepared to consider in all programs of that sort particularly ensuring accessibility to post-secondary education among those who are now discouraged by the new policies on student loans and the lack of money being provided for summer student employment?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, the minister has been carefully reviewing the student loan program. I am quite aware, having served in the capacity for a brief period of time, she is attempting to bring forward a plan which will be able to assist those students the member is referring to.

We should not forget some one-quarter million students are assisted by this particular program. It is a very important program that has been ongoing for some 25 years, I think since the mid-1960s. It is a program that has been very helpful to many Canadian students. We look forward to her bringing forward a revised plan which will be helpful to more people who are actually in need.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, let me point out that the federal learning strategy quite specifically says its goal is to maximize access to continuous learning opportunities.

I want to ask the spokesperson for the Secretary of State about the new restrictions on student loans that have already been introduced, the cutbacks in transfer payments to colleges and universities, and the essential cutbacks in funding for summer employment. We heard it, 3.5 per cent when student unemployment rates are at 18 per cent.

Does he think this is in keeping with increasing accessibility, or is there some hidden agenda the government has we are not yet aware of that will reverse this trend to restricting accessibility in the face of a policy that is supposed to expand it?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, the effort at the moment is to make sure that those students really in need are the ones who are deriving the maximum benefit.

If the member is having some difficulty with some of the due diligence that has been put in, I might remind the member this was an area that perhaps lacked some of the accountability some other experiences require in terms of dealings with financial institutions.

There was some tightening of the criteria. There was a need to have those people who take out the student loans be mindful of the need to repay their loans, and that has been instituted.

I only want the hon. member to be patient for a little while longer. They have done a very thorough consultation across this country. They have listened very carefully. I think the member will be pleased with the plan that will be brought forward very shortly.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the United States administration has admitted that Congress would not pass NAFTA if it were introduced today. It does claim that the environmental and labour side accords will eventually make the agreement acceptable to Congress.

• (1440)

Could the minister of trade explain what kind of environmental and labour agreements Canada will accept in the efforts of the administration of the United States to appease Congress?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I should say this is not a question of appeasing Congress.

Canada has been proposing environmental and labour agreements since February of last year. We have been at the forefront of trying to involve labour organizations and environmental groups in developing the types of agreements I think are quite appropriate for Canada and would be acceptable by the United States and Mexico.

We have extensive consultations on the environmental programs under way right now. We are looking at upward harmonization of standards, setting maximum levels for certain pollutants, raising public awareness of the concept of sustainable development, looking at ways we can co-operate with the other countries in the event of an environmental disaster, and the whole question of how to lead to a greater degree of enforcement of these regulations.

These things are being discussed now. No conclusions have been reached, but my hon. friend would be quite pleased with the results of the negotiations when they are completed.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister speaks of enforcement.

He will know that in the U.S. Congress and the U.S. Senate there is a substantial block in favour of enforcement through sanctions. Senator Baucus, chairman of the Senate subcommittee on trade, recently said that he would not support NAFTA unless the side accords contained provisions enforceable by trade sanctions.

What is the position of this government? The minister said recently that this government would not accept trade sanctions as a means of enforcement. Is that still the government's position, or does the government intend to walk away from NAFTA if the United States insists on trade sanctions?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend puts a question and then he gives the answer. The answer is a pretty accurate answer.

We have indicated that we do not agree with trade remedy laws or trade sanctions. We think that can lead to all sorts of difficulties. The requirements of environmentalists and those interested in the protection of our environment can be well satisfied with a type of enforcement that is not dissimilar to what is in the free trade agreement with the United States under chapter 18 wherein there is a broad airing of the problem and a recommendation from a panel. As my hon. friend is well aware, the recommendations of chapter 18 panels have been pretty well accepted by the two countries in this case.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, over the past four years 15,400 or 32 per cent of Canada's steel workers have lost their jobs.

Why is the government bulldozing NAFTA through Parliament without a steel pact in order to end unfair U.S. trade harassment of Canadian producers?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is well aware of the efforts we have made to engage in discussions with the United States administration.

I am sure he is well aware of the efforts that have been made by the Canadian industry to engage in similar discussions with its counterparts as well as efforts made by the Canadian labour movement in trying to engage in discussions with the U.S. labour movement on this very question.

He is also well aware that neither the government nor industry nor labour has been successful in gaining the support necessary for the type of agreement he proposes. We still are working at trying to find ways of raising the understanding of the integration in the steel industry between the two economies. That work will continue and hopefully will have some results that will recognize this integration in a relationship between the two countries in a very important industry such as steel.

• (1445)

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the minister's one big lever is NAFTA. Why does he not use it to get a steel pact?

One of the reasons Canada is losing manufacturing jobs, including steel jobs at more than twice the U.S. rate is the very low labour standards in the United States. Twenty states in the United States have either no minimum wage or else their minimum wage is $4 an hour or less. There are 20 U.S. states that have right to work laws.

Will the NAFTA side agreement on labour conditions look not only at Mexican working conditions but also at unfair U.S. labour practices that will continue to siphon jobs out of Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is being somewhat idealistic when he asks that question.

He refers to 20 states that have certain labour requirements. He might reflect on the fact that the other 30 states have not been able to convince the 20 states of the error of their ways and cause some changes in those labour requirements.

Does he believe that Canada will have more influence over those 30 states when some of the states are some of the most populous in the country? Let's get realistic.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of immigration who received notice of this question this morning.

A woman refugee from Iran, Sima Sedghi, was detained for seven days, tortured and whipped for wearing sunglasses and nylons. Now she is wanted by the Iranian state for peaceful political activity in a country where dissidents are arrested and without trial, tortured and even executed. She has now been ordered deported from Canada.

Ms. Sedghi clearly qualifies under the new guidelines for women refugees. I ask the minister to put a hold on her deportation and review her case under the new guidelines.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that this case will be reviewed under the new guidelines.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's response and I will be anxious to hear how that review goes.

Another 35 or more women refugees are also facing deportation because the old guidelines did not take into account the lack of protection for women from violence or the severe consequences for disobeying laws designed simply to control women.

The Canadian government is now saying it is wrong to deport women in these circumstances. Is it not just as wrong for the women who have already been ordered deported?

Will the minister announce today a moratorium on the deportation of these women refugees and make a commitment to re-examine all of these cases under the new guidelines?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have already indicated that all the cases that come before the IRB are now subjected to the guidelines that Madam Mawani announced in March. Every case before the final review before deportation made at national headquarters encompasses a review under those guidelines.

The hon. member should thank this government and congratulate us on having updated the guidelines in order to give protection to these people. Indeed all those cases are reviewed in light of those guidelines.

MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In its federal budget of last week, the government announced that it would not renew the agreement on economic and regional development in minerals.

Can the Minister tell us today whether the Canada-Quebec Mineral Development Agreement, which was signed in December 1992 and represents costs of $100 million, will be maintained until 1998 in Quebec?

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to reassure my colleague that, indeed, this agreement will be maintained while complying of course with the budget cuts which were announced.

I also want to remind the hon. member that with the Whitehorse initiative, the federal government, the provinces, the company, the workers and all the other stakeholders in the mining industry are presently working to make this sector more competitive again, and this is precisely what we will continue to do in coming years.

FORESTRY

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, yesterday marked the start of National Forestry Week which is sponsored by the federal Department of Forestry.

The purpose is to increase awareness of the importance of forestry to Canada. I participated in the signing of an agreement for the Fundy forest model just last week in my constituency.

I know that many of us are aware of how important the health of our forests are to our tourism sector, our environment and our economy. Our forest sector annually sells $20 billion in exports and supports the economies of hundreds of communities. Yet in last week's budget we learned that the government has decided not to renew the federal-provincial forestry development agreements which have been operating in every province and every territory.

My question is for the Minister of Forestry. Is this an indication that the federal government is withdrawing from forestry? Does the government plan to honour its obligation as part of this government's agenda for sustainable development?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, my colleague points to the fact that fiscal realities have forced us to plan a phase-out of the forest resource development agreements over the next four years.

Fortunately most of the objectives that were assigned to these agreements have been met. In fact the volume of our operating forests has increased by 15 per cent over the last 10 years. The area that has been properly regenerated is twice the area harvested. This now permits the federal government to pursue new priorities such as the ones that we have assigned to the model forest program and to our international obligations.

PEACEKEEPING

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, may question is for the Minister of National Defence.

I think we can all take some small ray of hope from the peace proposal that was initialled this weekend, brought about in some part by the U.S. administration's threat to use air strikes in Bosnia. What is not clear is Canada's position on this very important decision.

On Friday the Canadian ambassador to Washington said he is opposed to air strikes because of the implications it may have for our troops. Yesterday the minister's colleague, the secretary of state, said that we have not ruled out any options, including the use of air power.

Has the minister been in touch with her U.S. counterpart to discuss this very critical issue? In particular, what implication may it have for the safety and security of Canadian troops? Can the minister say which is the position of the government, that expressed by the ambassador to Washington or that expressed by her colleague, the secretary of state?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, discussions are ongoing today in Washington at several levels. Officials from the Department of National Defence are meeting with their counterparts in Washington and the Prime Minister is meeting with the Secretary-General of the United Nations today on this very subject.

Clearly we are encouraged by the statement of the Bosnian Serbs that they will support the Vance-Owen plan. That must be supported by concrete action; a ceasefire and a commitment to uphold the plan. We are in consultation with our allies on a variety of options should the peace plan break down. The fundamental value which we uphold is the safety of Canadian troops in that theatre.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the minister. I think we all recognize we will be faced with some very important decisions in a very short term.

In the past the minister has said that Canadian troops would be pulled out if there was any fighting whatsoever in which we had to use arms.

I want to ask the minister this specifically. In discussions with counterparts in the United States, what is the contingency plan that would be used by Canada in order to evacuate our troops in the case of air strikes? Are we prepared to use our troops in major peacekeeping operations under the Vance-Owen plan if it means that we would have to use force to protect civilians?

Perhaps most important, will the minister agree on behalf of the government that it is time to have a serious, open, honest debate in Parliament before any more decisions are made that will affect our peacekeeping role in Bosnia?

• (1455)

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that is exactly what I said. I did not say that we would pull our troops out if they were fired upon. In fact, as the hon. member will know, we have assured members of this House that should there be a fire situation, our troops are in a position to defend themselves.

We have contingency plans. We are working with our allies on contingency plans. The safety of Canadian troops is uppermost in our mind.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs is in Yugoslavia today through May 5. She is in Croatia today and tomorrow. She will be in Sarajevo on May 5. She is working on the ground to assess the situation. We will participate in whatever operation we can to the extent of our resources where there is an agreement reached through the United Nations.

The hon. member knows that is a very difficult challenge which the international community is grappling with. None of the industrialized countries is in a position to make enormous military commitments to this field. We are looking to secure peace and we are hopeful that the diplomatic process will do that.

We are evaluating the situation on a day by day basis, but I repeat again, the primary priority for the Government of Canada is the safety of our forces in former Yugoslavia.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Since the release of the Carter report on barley marketing, four members of the round table have dissociated themselves from both the process involved and the conclusions reached. As well, many farm groups and economists have expressed serious doubts about the findings and the methodology used by Dr. Carter.

In light of all the controversy created by this report, is the minister now willing to let farmers decide the issue. Can he assure us today that no decision will be made until a consensus is reached among all the stakeholders?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice, Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, since my colleague is not here, I will say that, indeed, this study, which was made public on April 19, is being reviewed by officials of the department and that my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, has had several meetings to that effect.

When we talk about the market for barley, it is important to make a distinction between the national and international markets. This does not at all jeopardize the Canadian Wheat Board and its operations. I believe that, in due course, the Minister of Agriculture will announce how he will follow up on this particular issue.

[English]

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Yes, and we are concerned about that follow-up, Mr. Speaker. We think it will undermine the Canadian Wheat Board.

My second question is for the same minister. If there were a continental barley market we could not discount the possibility of American retaliation. It is feared that the U.S. would slap on import quotas or fees if private entities are allowed to sell barley directly into their market. If the minister does not want to believe me, he just has to check the record.

Is this not one more reason why the minister should be listening to producers and oppose a continental barley market?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as you know, many companies, producers and associations have indicated that they want to have some alternatives to the Canadian Wheat Board. The system we have is good but it is not perfect. What we are trying to do is improve it, as we have done in the past.

We have done a lot with the free trade agreement to bring more competitiveness into the North American market. It is working well.

I remember my hon. colleagues opposed everything we did to have a stronger market in North America and in the rest of the world. I think so far, so good. If we can do anything to improve the system we will do it.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It relates to the government's refusal to conduct a full and proper environmental review of the Kemano completion project, a major water diversion project in northern B.C. Officials from the minister's own department say there are some 83,000 pages of information on this project in the government's possession.

Will the minister release all of this information to the inquiry that has been launched by the B.C. government so that we can get to the truth behind this project?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, we are perfectly satisfied with the agreement that was entered into by the British Columbia government and the federal government several years ago on this project.

We are co-operating with the provincial inquiry that has been launched into the project. We have told them we will give them any assistance that we can and we will give them any information that is deemed relevant from the point of view of our department. We are satisfied that our responsibilities for environmental assessment have been met.

• (1500)

This inquiry that is now under way is entirely a provincial matter. We are co-operating with them and we will continue to co-operate with them.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): The minister and the government may be satisfied with the process reached to approve this project but the people of northern B.C. certainly are not.

My supplementary to the minister is this: The minister knows of the inquiry launched by the provincial government, the final hope that the people of northern B.C. have to have a look into this project. Is the minister prepared to consider changes to the 1987 settlement agreement that was signed behind closed doors which governs flows in the Nechako River? Will the minister consider any changes or recommendations brought to him by the provincial government on this matter?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I have not had one sensible proposal brought to me by the provincial government on this matter to date. If we did happen to have a sensible proposal brought to us by the British Columbia government that was agreed to by all parties which entered into the original agreement—which was the B.C. government and we entered into it because we were satisfied it was a proper agreement and it was at the insistence of the B.C. government—some proposal that we and all parties agree with, then we would be very supportive of it. In the meantime we are giving the technical information that we are requested to give.

We realize that this is a political hot potato for the hon. gentleman's party in British Columbia. It adopted an unrealistic and unreasonable position and it is now stuck with it.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I would like to designate tomorrow an allotted day.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

Routine Proceedings

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

90TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 90th report of the Standing Committee on House Management regarding change in the membership of standing committees.

If the House gives its consent I intend to move concurrence in this report later this day.

BILL C-112

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-112, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Access to Information Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Customs Act, the Federal Court Act, the Income Tax Act, the Tax Court of Canada Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and a related act, with amendments.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-429, an act to amend the Criminal Code (hate propaganda).

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, this bill is very similar to one that I introduced earlier this session. The bill has been debated in the House and was talked out in private members' hour and so was dropped from the Order Paper. It was not made votable. There were some criticisms levelled against the bill by certain government members opposite. I have made some amendments to this bill reflecting the concerns expressed in their speeches which I hope will make the bill acceptable to the other side. If it happens to get drawn for debate and is made votable again I am optimistic it might pass this time.

• (1505)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Milliken moves that the bill be read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

CONCURRENCE IN 90TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, if the House gives its consent, I move that the 90th report of the Standing Committee on House Management, presented to the House earlier this day, be concurred in.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, we will consent to this particular motion, but I do want the House to know that on this side of the House we were not consulted that the government would be proceeding with this particular matter today.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of British Columbia who are very concerned that it appears the government is turning a blind eye and a deaf ear to the call to exempt water in the North American free trade agreement.

They put their names on this petition asking the government to state categorically that water is an exempt category, as has been done for unprocessed fish on the east coast of Canada and raw logs.

CANADA POST

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have here five petitions containing the signatures of over 1,000 persons from Ville St-Pierre in my constituency.

For many years the people of Ville St-Pierre had full postal service but during the last year it was taken away from them. In this respect they say they are being unfairly penalized in that they are not getting the equivalent postal service as neighbouring municipalities.

In this petition the people of Ville St-Pierre ask Parliament to require Canada Post to provide, without delay, a full service postal branch in Ville St-Pierre.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition from people in Val-d'Or, Dubuisson, Val-Senneville and Senneterre in Abitibi who say that violent movies on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable, because they incite more violence.

The petitioners say that all toys which incite violent games are unacceptable and should not be made. They point out that freedom of the press in reporting acts of violence should be limited and that information on violent acts which is repeated too often on all television networks and on radio can incite others to commit similar acts of violence. Therefore the petitioners humbly ask Parliament to legislate on the above-mentioned points to eliminate violence in our society, in order to better protect our children and to give all our fellow citizens a better quality of life.

DEATH PENALTY

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present pursuant to Standing Order 36 a petition requesting the reinstatement of the death penalty for people convicted for the murder of children. It is signed by about 10,000 Calgarians.

SEX OFFENDERS

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): I have another petition, Mr. Speaker, which I will read. It states: We the undersigned call upon Parliament to stop the special treatment of convicted sex offenders and house them in with the general prison population. It is signed by thousands of people.

• (1510)

TRADE

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I am pleased to present a petition from many residents of British Columbia which is certified as being correct.

The petitioners draw to the attention of the House that the proposed North American free trade agreement has resulted in even greater trade concessions being demanded of Canada; that if implemented this trade agreement will result in further restrictions being placed on the ability of Canada's federal, provincial and territorial governments now and in the future to assist Canadian industry, conserve Canadian natural resources for Canadian benefit and advance needed social programs.

Therefore they call upon the House to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and to recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by some 41 signatories from the village of Creston, the communities of Wyndel, Lister, Kitchener, Wasa, Ta Ta Creek and the cities of Kimberley and Cranbrook in East Kootenay and the city of Revelstoke in Kootenay West—Revelstoke.

The petitioners express their concern that the proposed North American free trade agreement has resulted in even greater trade concessions being demanded of Canada and they fear that this agreement will cause Canadians to lose more good jobs.

They also point out that the North American free trade agreement cannot be remedied through negotiation. They call upon this House to reject the North American free trade agreement and to recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 that requests the Government of Canada to revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act with a lowered maximum age of 13 years. It is signed by 1,000 Albertans.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 477, 489, 490 and 491.

[Text]

Question No. 477—Mr. Barrett:

With respect to computer tapes, discs and other electronic records within the Prime Minister's Office and the Privy Council Office, (a) what is the government's policy regarding the archiving, erasure or destruction of those materials, since January 1, 1991 (b) how many computer files have been deleted, destroyed, (i) in the Prime Minister's Office (ii) in the Privy Council Office, and (c) how many of these files have been sent to the National Archives?

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): The response to Question No. 477, part (a), is that the policy related to the disposal of records of government institutions, including electronic records, is prescribed in the National Archives Act.

In regard to parts (b) (i) and (ii), and part (c) there is a nil response.

Question No. 489—Mr. Worthy:

What is the number of people (or families) classified as farmers and how many (a) gain all or most of their income from farming (b) receive most of their income from outside sources?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): In 1991, the number of families classified as farmers was 294,381. (a) 148,088 families; (b) 146,293 families.

Question No. 490—Mr. Worthy:

What is the minimum gross farm sales which are required in order for a person to be classified as a farmer?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): There is no single definition of a farmer or farm. The 1991 census of agriculture defined a census farm as a farm, ranch or other agricultural holding which produced at least one of the following products intended for sale: crops, livestock, poultry, animal products, greenhouse or nursery products, mushrooms, sod, honey, or maple syrup products and did not require a minimum gross farm sales. According to the Income Tax Act, for tax purposes, there is no minimum gross sales requirement to be considered a farm.

Question No. 491—Mr. Worthy:

How many persons are employed by the Department of Agriculture and what is their average salary and cost of the total payroll?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture):

Fiscal Year	Person Years	Average Salary	Total Cost of Payroll
1992–1993 (estimate)	11,477	$52,846	$606,520,000
1993–1994 (estimate)	11,865	$50,638	$600,822,000

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, if Questions Nos. 381, 386 and 450 could be made Orders for Returns, the returns would be tabled immediately.

[Text]

Question No. 381—Mr. Fisher:

With regard to the dollar value of government advertising since January 1, 1992, what has been the value of placement of advertising by each department, body or agency in (a) each daily newspaper or chain in Canada (b) each radio station or network in Canada, and (c) each television station or network in Canada?

Return tabled.

Question No. 386—Mr. Karygiannis:

With respect to the Interstate Unemployment Insurance Claims agreement (a) since 1988, how many non Canadian citizens living outside of Canada have received benefits (b) how much has been received by these beneficiaires (c) how much was collected in U.I. premiums from these people (d) in what states do the recipients live (e) what is the anticipated cost of provding interstate U.I. benefits to Mexican seasonal agricultural workers?

Return tabled.

Question No. 450—Mr. Brewin:

For each year since January 1985, has the Department of National Defence incurred expenses for public affairs and related matters and, if so (a) how much (b) were outside contracts awarded and, if so (i) to whom (ii) when (iii) for what purpose (c) how many person years are involved in such matters?

Return tabled.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House that Questions Nos. 381, 386 and 450 be deemed to have been made Orders for Returns.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. You will recall that on Thursday, April 29, in Hansard at page 18638, I rose on a point of order with regard to Questions on the Order Paper.

I indicated to the Chair that an inordinate period of time had elapsed in which the government did not respond to the questions put on the Order Paper for ministers and departments to respond to.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw to your attention Question on the Order Paper No. 307, which stands in the name of my colleague from Ottawa South. It goes back to April 27, 1992, and 371 days have elapsed.

Question No. 317 in the name of my colleague from Acadie—Bathurst is dated May 4, 1992 and 364 days have elapsed. On Question No. 318, 364 days have elapsed. Question No. 326 in the name of my colleague from Acadie—Bathurst is dated May 14, 1992, and 354 days have elapsed.

Finally, Question No. 328 in the name of my colleague from Egmont is dated May 15, 1992, and 353 days have elapsed.

• (1515)

I would suggest with respect that members of the cabinet are showing contempt of this Parliament, are demonstrating disrespect to the Chair, and are in violation of the Standing Orders of this House. As we know, as all members know, the normal time frame in which to respond is 45 days. There is no excuse for ministers of the Crown to be running off across the country doing whatever they have to do in terms of their departmental responsibilities but thumbing their noses at you, Mr. Speaker.

I find that to be very disrespectful. I want to hear from my colleague and friend who is assuming the responsibilities of parliamentary secretary today as to what he intends to do about this.

We have not raised a point of privilege. I was clear to point out it was a point of order. I gave notice last Thursday morning hoping that the government could give us a full and comprehensive response as to why.

I guess we are being forced to raise this as a point of privilege but we seek the guidance of the Chair about this frightful and unbecoming behaviour and conduct of ministers opposite.

We on this side of the House all know, as I am sure Canadians from coast to coast know, that they have lost the will to govern but surely they should assume the responsibilities and provide the necessary information in accordance with the rules which we are all bound to follow.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond briefly to my hon. friend.

He did bring this point up last week as he said. One thing that is clear is that the rules say that questions are supposed to be answered in 45 days. It would be fair to say that is certainly a fact that is well-known by all ministers of this government. It is certainly the intent of our House leader and I think of our cabinet to attempt to see that all questions are answered.

What my colleagues may sometimes lose sight of is that some of these questions can be very complex and take a great deal of time to respond to. I refer particularly to questions that some might consider fishing expeditions. They start off with phrases such as: Since 1984 have any departments or agencies, et cetera.

Such a question requires consultation with 85 different departments and agencies of the government. It is a very complicated process. It can also be a very expensive process for the taxpayers, because when we set public servants at 85 different agencies to work trying to track down information which my hon. friends opposite feel they cannot do their jobs without and which they are perfectly entitled to, then the time will be taken and the cost will be borne by the taxpayer.

I would hope this is indeed essential information. However I would remind my hon. friend and the House that under a motion of this House on April 19, as a result of the matter being raised not only by my hon. friend the opposition House leader but by the member for Scarborough—Rouge River, this whole matter has been referred to the House management committee. I think it only appropriate that committee be given an opportunity to carry out the request this House and the Speaker have made that it look into this matter. It might appropriately look at the whole matter of Questions on the Order Paper to see that it does always serve a useful public function.

My hon. friend is absolutely right. The rules are clear. Questions are to be answered in 45 days. I will again bring the matter to the attention of the ministries to see if they cannot do their best to see that it is complied with.

Meanwhile I would suggest that this matter be left where the House has already referred it, the House management committee.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the parliamentary secretary who has attempted to provide an answer to this inexcusable behaviour of ministers of the Crown.

I do not wish it to be left or omitted from the record that the purpose in changing the Standing Orders to limit each member of Parliament to a finite number of questions was for the very purposes he referred to in his remarks.

• (1520)

Prior to amending the Standing Orders members were allowed to have an unlimited number of questions which they could put to ministers of the Crown in order that they seek information. We have changed that and reduced that number to four. Therefore the number of questions each member can put is restricted to a finite number.

As the hon. member knows despite his verbal gymnastics today, although they may be appreciated by some of the viewing audience who may be watching the hon. member, the reality is that many of these questions are direct, succinct and to the point. I do not find it to be reasonable that members have to wait in excess of 300 days.

My colleague has made reference to the House management committee. That was a particular issue involving the Minister of Finance and certain documents and obligations with regard to that minister. The text of that subject matter involved a great deal of negotiations, consultations is perhaps a better word, between the two parties. It was thought best that subject matter be referred to the House management committee.

What we are seeing here, Mr. Speaker, which I think you have to take into due consideration is a deliberate action, not only an attempt, by the Government of Canada and numerous ministers of the Crown to frustrate members of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, just a minute. You are signalling me to sit down but this is an important aspect of parliamentary procedure, of the doings of the House and the interference with members of Parliament who quite rightly put questions pursuant to the Standing Orders and have not received answers or responses from the Government of Canada.

This is a deliberate attempt by members of this cabinet to frustrate members of Parliament on this side of the House in a collective way. It is a kind of behaviour that I would hope the Chair would take due notice of and give due consideration to for we as members of Parliament, if the subject matter was worth raising in the first instance through a question, must pursue this on other days at other times in terms of trying to get answers to these important questions.

I want to thank my colleague, who happens to be a distinguished member from our great province of Nova Scotia, for attempting to shed some light on this particular matter. However I would hope that the Chair would give due consideration to the kind of inexcusable behaviour of ministers of the Crown that will force us, as members of the opposition, to get up day after day to raise questions of privilege and points of order in order to get answers to these questions.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, as you, I and hon. members opposite know, the House is due to close for the normal summer recess when members return to their constituencies on June 23. We have been waiting for these questions in excess of 371 days. You can see what is going on. They are trying to rag the puck just as the Detroit Red Wings tried to rag the puck. We know what happened there. The Leafs won.

I suggest to my hon. friend opposite that notwithstanding the inexcusable behaviour of the members of his own cabinet which he now agrees to, they are trying to rag the puck, they will suffer when the Canadian people go to the next general election.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, just very briefly, I share my hon. friend's joy at the great victory of the Toronto Maple Leafs the other night.

I have already made the points that we wished to make. I do want to assure my hon. friend that the motive he attributed to the ministers of the Crown with respect to these questions is certainly not the case with respect to this government. The government will do all it can to see that the questions are answered as expeditiously as possible.

• (1525)

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, Question No. 395 on the Order Paper stands in my name. I would like to seek consent of the House to be allowed to withdraw it.

I have had meetings with the Department of Transport, specifically the Coast Guard, on a matter relating to the B.C. Ferry Corporation and ship safety. I have been provided with a significant amount of material which responds to my question.

I am prepared to withdraw my question on the understanding, which I believe is acceptable to the government, that the material supplied would also be provided on request to any other interested persons. The department has agreed that if I have any further questions arising from the material I can return to it for clarification. Therefore I would seek the consent of the House to allow the withdrawal of Question No. 395 standing in my name.

Mr. McCreath: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there has indeed been considerable discussion with the hon. member and the Department of Transport. An ongoing dialogue has been taking place. The government would certainly agree to his request. If there are other members wishing to receive the same information they need only ask and the Department of Transport would be most willing to go over the information with them. The department would look forward to any further questions my hon. friend may wish to raise.

I want to thank the hon. member on behalf of the Department of Transport for his co-operation and for his interest in the matter which generated this question in the first place.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, in his response the parliamentary secretary indicated that if any other member wanted to receive the information he or she could. I think the understanding was that if any individual wanted to obtain the information he or she would be able to do so.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I therefore take note that this question is withdrawn from the Order Paper.

I would now like to come back to the question raised by the Hon. House Leader of the Opposition. The Chair is not insensitive to the concerns expressed by the hon. member. Other members have already raised the same concerns, in particular the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River.

The more general question is now before the Committee on House Management and I am sure that the Hon. House Leader of the Opposition will follow very closely the representations made to that committee, as will the Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your intervention and we will certainly pursue that at the appropriate time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise on another subject matter.

On April 29, 1993, as reported in Hansard at page 18680, my colleague from Saint-Henri—Westmount rose on a question of privilege concerning comments which were made during Question Period. The Speaker then indicated that he would examine the "blues" and report back to the House.

I supported my colleague in his intervention and reminded the Chair about the seriousness of the issue at hand and that I would duly like the House to be informed. I believe the Speaker said at that time:

> I want to say to the hon. House leader for Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition the Chair recognizes it is a serious matter. We have had to deal with these things in the past.
> If I feel it is necessary to have further argument or further comment I will give sufficient notice.

I have not heard from Mr. Speaker with regard to this question. I am wondering whether or not I could flag that for the Speaker or perhaps for the Clerk who might want to apprise me by telephone of what he intends to do with regard to this particular matter. More appropriately the Speaker could rejoin us in the Chamber to give us his views with regard to the matter that my colleague from Saint-Henri—Westmount has raised.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would like to remind the House that the comment referred to by the Hon. House Leader of the Opposition concerned a committee report which has not yet been officially presented to the House. Therefore the Speaker will not comment before the House is presented with the report to which the hon. member refers.

• (1530)

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, as usual the Chair is correct. The Chair did not receive the report to which my colleague for Saint-Henri—Westmount made reference on Thursday, April 29, 1993.

If the Chair were to check the record, I believe it would see that the report of the committee has been tabled. If that is the case, I am wondering whether or not the Chair would at that time take a look at it and confer sufficient notice to members so that we may take a look at the matter.

If I am incorrect and the report has not been tabled, I suggest to the Chair the report will be tabled within the next number of days and I would like to revisit the particular matter. I would like to have sufficient notice in order that we may pursue the subject matter at the most appropriate time and to deal with the question of privilege my colleague has raised.

I am not seeking clarification from the Chair today. I am seeking from the Chair a clear, unequivocal undertaking that when the report is tabled it will trigger the question of privilege my colleague for Saint-Henri—Westmount has raised and we will be given every opportunity either to buttress or to add further arguments to a lock-stock case with regard to the question of privilege so we can assist the Chair in adjudicating a wrong we believe has been done to all members of the House of Commons.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): This is just to say that I checked and found out that the report has not been tabled in the House. The Speaker will surely be interested to read the remarks of the Hon. House Leader of the Opposition.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C-109, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radiocommunication Act, be read the third time and passed.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak once again on Bill C-109. This bill was tabled by the Minister of Justice and includes Criminal Code amendments as well as changes to the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radiocommunication Act.

My colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys has dealt rather extensively with the wire-tap provisions in the bill, surveillance by electronic methods. I understand from listening to him and hearing his concerns there are some problems with that aspect of the bill.

I understand they relate quite specifically to police rights to tap telephones with no accountability and very little criteria. I also understand the burden of proof within our own system has always been on the perpetrator. This time it is sort of a reverse onus and the police must prove the bona fides of what they have gone ahead and done. I presume it is lawful. They presume the police have been right unless there is a defence that can prove otherwise. That is contrary to the normal procedure. The police must satisfy a judge in present circumstances, the way the Criminal Code reads, that the wire-tapping has been necessary or is necessary.

Now the police can move ahead and do the wire-tapping if they believe or have just cause to believe—and I would presume they would do this with a great deal of care—according to their own subjective standards they will prevent a crime by their interference. I certainly would not want to stop the police from this kind of activity. However, as long as this can be justified even after the fact, it would seem there is no formal accounting procedure in here. I would say it is somewhat worrisome to give the police this much latitude. It is fine but there should be some kind of accountability.

As I am not the major critic in this field, I have just highlighted it. I call on those who have an interest in this matter to read the remarks of the justice critic, the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys. He points out they can now be even more invasive than they were in the drunken driving bill where one could presume the driver was drunk and therefore call for a breathalyser test.

• (1535)

I was a participant in that bill on the opposition benches and I supported the government in that undertaking. As a matter of fact it was the same time we were trying to bring in the amendments that led to the Deschênes commission and the seeking out of war criminals. It was quite an interesting broad stroke.

However, the police will now be able to take blood samples and a lie detector test before they even lay a charge. That is quite invasive. I wonder if there is not enough reason there to revisit the bill to tighten up the criteria found within it.

I would particularly like to focus on the cellular communications and the privacy aspect of the bill. Let me say at the outset Liberals believe we need to achieve greater privacy in communications. I believe we need a number of concerns addressed. The fight continues against the so-called nuisance junk phone calls and others that bother seniors and families at home and often interrupt their privacy. We must find a way to stop the nuisance and the junk fax messages that are now causing trouble for businesses and frankly are quite costly. We finally got telephone companies to agree to block caller identification services which the phone companies at first resisted. Fortunately they have now relaxed their opposition to it.

I highlight all these items because they are an accumulation of the invasion of privacy which more and more is becoming a serious concern. Some of the areas are within provincial jurisdiction, but notwithstanding members of the House are now involved in the gathering of information about ourselves and about citizens out there without their consent and without their knowledge. That kind of invasion of privacy is becoming very worrisome. Personal information is being gathered, assembled and circulated electronically by all sorts of enterprises.

Were you asked and did you give permission, Mr. Speaker? I know I was not asked. Nor did I give permission. We need to look into the matter very seriously. I would suggest these concerns are all part and parcel of legislation and public policies that must be looked at today. We have increased technological access in this information age.

The particular bill addresses the question of cellular privacy, but it is just one example of how the age of technology is making matters of personal information and personal privacy key issues in the nineties. Clearly the communications and information revolution will continue bringing forward new issues into our daily lives that never existed before but which must be dealt with expeditiously before technology essentially runs away with our privacy.

In terms of the cellular telephone and cellular privacy let us take a look at the problem. I addressed it fairly extensively on April 26 when at report stage the government refused to accept a number of the amendments I brought forward. I thought they were enlightened amendments, not because I thought them up but because they came from an experience the Americans had with which I will deal in a moment.

I was trying to point out, and I point it out again, that Canadians have traditionally looked at their telephone as a safe, confidential, no snooping, no drop-in, no eavesdropping kind of exchange ability with a neighbour, with a friend, with the family, with their doctor, with their lawyer and with their stockbroker. They have felt a sense of comfort that no one has been listening in and no one can steal their information.

They could go about deciding how they were going to react to certain information in the stock-market or in the bond-market. They could talk about their financial obligations, what they were going to be purchasing, et cetera, over the normal system. There was a sense of confidence this would remain private within the confines of the two-telephone system they were using.

However cellular telephones are quite different. They are really radio phones as I tried to point out the other day. They pass calls along a whole series of cells out there along the highways and byways of our country called the public domain. It is in the area of the public airwaves. They are not private.

• (1540)

The key difference is that the public generally does not recognize that every cellular phone user is basically using a radio. We even see people in restaurants walking around with their cellular telephones. I personally happen to find that totally abhorrent. If they want to have private conversations or need to talk to someone, let them go and use the telephone or let them go outside. I find it kind of rude in the middle of a conversation in a restaurant around a table. However, I suppose maybe that is a macho new look with a new toy but it is not macho. Whatever it is, it is poor manners in my view.

They are making radio calls on these little devices and it is as if they were shrieking inside that restaurant. Instead, they are shrieking outside on the general airwaves. Their conversations can be picked up by anyone who cares to eavesdrop.

I guess it is the old adage of buyer beware in this new age of information. The other day I said perhaps people who sell cellular phones should have people sign a paper which says: "I am aware of the fact that this is not a traditional telephone. This is a radio phone and I am aware of the fact that I can be easily overheard, that there is no confidentiality that is concomitant with the use of this telephone. I therefore acknowledge that this is free and open air". Maybe if we get people to sign this kind of statement when they buy their telephones they might be a little bit more sensitive to the problems that can crop up.

I do not think we can expect that in the fulsomeness of the measures we need to meet the goals of this particular bill. The goals of this bill are to stop interference and protect the privacy that people have become used to on their wired phones at home or in the office.

Let us recap. What is the minister trying to do here? I am going to go into some detail about the specific provisions which the government has stood by. It has refused to listen in its narrow-minded and very unsympathetic thought to something that could be practical. The puffery here is what it was interested in. From the first reading until today even with the disinformation the Department of Communications managed to give the committee during the hearing stage, the government was not prepared to budge. We want the public to know what the minister is doing in this bill and what the disinformation is all about.

We are amending the Criminal Code to make it illegal to intercept maliciously or for gain a radio-based communication on a cellular phone which is really this radio phone. The principle behind the action is that we as a party, the Official Opposition, support the principle. It is very important.

The problem is that this bill makes anyone who overhears a telephone conversation by accident, not by design, guilty of an indictable offence, liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years and a fine of $25,000. I would say that is a very strong measure. Until we get to that point we have to look at what our options are. Is there any answer other than criminal sanctions with such a serious impact given this new and evolving technology? We all know how expensive it is to keep people in prison and how overcrowded the cells are.

Does this go too far? Does it hit with too big a hammer? In our view after committee study at report stage we still believe the answer to these questions is yes. The minister has taken the wrong step at the wrong time in a bill that is flawed.

This section would create the indictable offence in clause 12 for willfully disclosing the existence or the contents of intercepted radio-based telephone communications without the expressed or implied consent of the originator or the intended recipient of the communications. That is a very weighty move by Parliament. In other words people are used to the ordinary telephone and sometimes, as they are wont to do when they had a party line, they hear something which they might in all innocence pass along. When there were party lines they would have had to pick up the phone deliberately because they knew they were on a party line.

• (1545)

Here people can pick up their telephones and quite by accident because of a crossed wire they can listen to a cellular telephone call to someone else. Or they can be using a scanner which is a piece of equipment that can be used to decode and listen in. It is like those big muffs the television cameramen use to be able to hear what is being said more clearly.

People can use scanners and if they hear some information they are allowed to listen to it in this bill. They are allowed to have this scanner in this bill. If they repeat what they have heard then they are subject to a fine. They can repeat something in all innocence and it can be blown all out of proportion. It can be misunderstood and they can still be called before the criminal courts for a crime.

Without the express or implied consent of the originator or the intended recipient of the communication we get this move by Parliament that using or disclosing the knowledge of a cellular phone call is an indictable offence. Is that the best way? It is questionable.

After serious consideration we still have problems with this aspect of the government's approach. The basic question remains whether it can be reasonably enforced. Is this the most practical approach to solving the problem?

We conclude that the government has acted hastily, specifically following the Wilhelmy scandal. This was a visceral reaction to something that was really to be regretted from many points of view. I am not going to bring back all the history and issues behind this except to say there was not agreement and therefore it was malicious and had a very negative effect.

The government has gone to the Criminal Code rather than proceeding with a more technical means to solve the problem which we all think should be addressed. We know there are encryption methods. We know there are ways of protecting those phone calls. Ministers and senior members of the Crown certainly have access to these encrypters but they are very expensive. There was no reason in the Wilhelmy case for not using an encrypted telephone. I sometimes wonder if there was something more to this whole story than meets the eye.

If we look at the Radiocommunications Act amendments that are in this bill, in principle these amendments that we have brought forward move in the same direction as the prohibitions being introduced into the Criminal Code. Clause 24 would prohibit making use of or divulging radio-based cellular communications unless the originator or the intended receiver consented to the disclosure. The term, making use of, might be interpreted as divulging the existence of a communication without divulging its contents. Section 25 sets out penalties for those contravening the previous section. Section 26 creates a right of civil action for an injunction or damages against persons or corporations who divulge or make use of these cellular communications.

The spirit of the Radiocommunications Act changes is in keeping with the Criminal Code changes proposed by the minister, possibly sending people to jail for even divulging the knowledge that a cellular call has occurred. Again I think this is too harsh a step.

Given the level of concern expressed over this bill, the Official Opposition proposed amendments at report stage. Our amendments which the government rejected reflected the concern we have about this approach. In our view our approach was very balanced and reasonable. While we agree there is a problem there is a way to go about this and the government took the wrong approach.

Our amendment would have removed the provisions for jailing people, at great cost, who intercept cellular phone calls. We did not say, however, to do nothing. We proposed as the most important and fundamental first step the banning of the use, manufacture, importation, distribution, leasing or offering for sale of scanners capable of receiving transmissions in the cellular frequencies.

• (1550)

Mr. Speaker, this is a fundamental and important matter. I know you were in the Chair when we had this discussion and I know you said it was outside the purview of the bill. In my view this should never have been in the bill. There is disinformation about 900,000 scanners being out there. It is an unfounded reality if we are talking about cellular telephones and the ability to unscramble in that area. The minister had the option of banning scanners. He should have brought in a bill to that effect, very much like the Americans have done in the United States. They are removing the right to have a scanner.

The privacy commissioner has made it very clear that he does not prefer this kind of approach. He has said he favours a technical answer if one can be found. If limitations on the manufacture and distribution of scanning equipment is the answer he favours that too.

We are not convinced by those in the Department of Communications who said that a technical approach would not work. I think we have to try it first and it has not been tried. I suggest it would be best to ban the scanners, remove this act from the Criminal Code and remember there are provisions already in the radio act if people misuse telephones.

In conclusion I believe the communications aspect of this bill leaves too many questions for us to have any comfort level. There is serious concern that the heavy hand of the Criminal Code being brought in at this time to improve the cellular telephone privacy is inappropriate. However, we must find answers to the whole serious question of invasion of privacy in all aspects of our daily lives.

I question whether it is even enforceable. I hope the government will give serious consideration to voting against its own bill.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate at this particular time but after listening to the comments of my colleague from Mount Royal I was rather stimulated and feel I should put a few thoughts on the record.

I want to say first of all that when the so-called Wilhelmy affair cropped up last fall during the debate on the Charlottetown accord I was really offended. I was offended as a politician, as a citizen of the country and also as one who spent 30 years of my life in journalism. Most of those years were with the CBC.

A story like the Wilhelmy affair is very titillating. I can understand why reporters got very excited when they heard certain comments that were going to be embarrassing to the premier of Quebec, the Prime Minister of Canada or any particular group of people. I can understand how the reporters jumped on the story with alacrity and enthusiasm and felt they were doing something for the country.

I was offended, maybe because it really was an invasion of privacy. A senior Quebec civil servant was talking to another senior Quebec civil servant. They both believed their conversation was private. They believed as most people do that cellular phones are telephones and not sophisticated CB radios. They are telephones. We find out later and they find out, much to their chagrin and horror I guess, that these are not phones, they are sophisticated CB radios. Believe it or not, people using sophisticated scanners can listen in to conversations and tell the world about them.

• (1555)

I find that an invasion of privacy. I think it is totally uncalled for. I think that the government of the day as reflected in this bill has the right to move on that particular front to solve that problem. I think that when two people are talking on what they believe to be a real telephone they have a right to privacy. It is as plain and simple as that. They have a right to privacy. I do not think anybody has a right to poke their nose into someone else's business, regardless of how titillating it may be to journalists, radio reporters, television reporters, and certainly the public at large.

I think the government was on the right track when it brought the bill in. It saw a problem and felt it had the answer to it and that was to sort of—I am not a lawyer—to criminalize this area. If you are found scanning these conversations, if you report them in a certain way and the matters come to public light, you would be violating under this bill, the amended Criminal Code, and either go to jail or face a fine.

I along with my colleagues believe that notwithstanding the good motivation of the minister in this particular case think he is prescribing the wrong antidote or the wrong solution. There is a better way. It is through a technical answer.

When a problem of this kind faces us, do we go to the source of the problem or do we seek an answer elsewhere? I would humbly submit that we go to the source. If you prevent someone from being able to invade a conversation in the first place, if you can do that with technology, through some technical means, surely that is the best way of doing it. Apparently the Americans as recently as 1992 did exactly that by banning scanners instead of allowing people to snoop, to invade people's privacy. If people hear something that they find rather titillating that they would like to relay and actually do relay, they would find themselves in trouble under this bill.

Why not nip it in the bud? Why not go to the source and stop the snooping in the first place through technology? Surely that makes much more sense than allowing the process to proceed to a certain spot and then have the law intervene and say: "Sorry, you have gone too far; you have gone too far, you have broken the law, you have violated the Criminal Code, and because of that you are either going to go to jail or you are going to be fined".

Let's face it, that is an expensive process. It costs the state money to fine people; it costs the state money to send people to jail. How many are we prepared to fine? How many are we prepared to send to jail if we are really going to be serious about this.

In some ways it is rather impractical and there is a better way. We have proposed the technical solution. As the member for Mount Royal said earlier, our privacy commissioner favours just that, a technical solution. I want to quote him. He says: "I favour a technical answer if one can be found". He went on to say: "If limitations on the manufacture and distribution of scanning equipment were the answer, I would favour that, too".

That is what they are doing in the United States and I think that is what we should be doing here. This government is very fond of talking about a level playing field. In many ways we have turned Canada and the United States into a common market. Well, what about telecommunications? What about this area of using this new technology called telephones? Does it really make sense that the United States of America bans almost all kinds of scanners while we take a different approach?

• (1600)

We say it is fine to use the scanners but if you snoop or go too far then we are going to throw you in jail or fine you. I think this is one place where perhaps the two countries should be moving in parallel lines. They should be moving together.

The United States attacked this problem first through banning scanners. I think we should do the same. Perhaps not all scanners should be prohibited. If we were to revisit this matter at some other time and look at it from a different angle, we may decide that there should be one or two kinds of scanners allowed for particular purposes.

We could discuss that at length. We could really study that. That is something that we could put off to another time. I think right now we have to reiterate and make the point that there is a technical solution. It is there and we should try to take advantage of it.

Let us not forget the United States has gone down this road. Why do we not do the same? One other thing that my esteemed colleague from Mount Royal said was this: "There are already some prohibitions in the Radiocommunications Act." It is possible if we are intent on criminalizing, fining or sending people to jail. Maybe it can be done already under the Radiocommunications Act.

I wanted to put those remarks on record. I hope that the government will take them into account.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, here at this third reading of Bill C-109, it is a useful point in time for me to perhaps reflect on our role in opposition in this place.

We have a bill that addresses several pressing concerns in the public interest. There are elements of the bill that we in opposition have some difficulty with. There are other parts of the bill with which we do not. Therefore one has to address the issue of how one would deal with the entire package at third reading.

I am rather inclined to support the bill at third reading, notwithstanding some of the deficiencies which I would like to note now.

Over the last three or four years there has been a series of decisions emanating from the Supreme Court of Canada which in effect have called upon the state to regularize and create a framework within which the police and agents of the state carry on their work of law enforcement.

In the initial instance, those decisions were interpreted as being a real negative toward our law enforcement officials. One of the either intended or unintended effects of those decisions which were known as Wong, Duarte and Garifoli was the prohibition by the Supreme Court of Canada on our policemen wearing what has been called the electronic lifeline.

This would be a body pack, a transmitter, a recorder that enables the police officer to be in touch on an audio basis with his or her command. That electronic lifeline was used frequently and most notably in undercover operations when a policeman or police woman would be inserted into a crime situation where one can understand there is danger. The support crew for that undercover officer would be able to hear what was going on.

In the event there was a problem, those people could respond appropriately without having to wait for the 25-cent phone call, which would never come in some of these cases. The Supreme Court said that was illegal, even though that was not otherwise prohibited in Canadian law. Even though this House, this Parliament had never said it could not be done by the police, the court said it may not be done.

• (1605)

While I have reservations about the way we arrived at these conclusions I accept that the court has a role in interpreting our charter and in giving direction to Parliament and Canada's provincial legislatures. We now have a provision in this bill which regularizes and creates a framework for the use of that electronic lifeline.

Canada's police forces have been operating without that lifeline for approximately two to three years. I am not aware of any unfortunate implications of it for police forces. It may be that investigations or certain investigative techniques had been abandoned temporarily but in any event we now authorize within a framework the use of that electronic lifeline.

There are other minor portions of the bill that one could question. One that I had noted earlier and I would bring to the attention of the House now for the record is the prohibition section in section 193.1 which purports to prohibit a number of things including the wilful disclosure of the radio-based cellular phone call data. Not only does it prohibit the disclosure of the contents of the phone call, but it also very expressly prohibits the wilful disclosure of the existence of the phone call. It was my sense that that may be going a little bit too far from a practical point of view.

There are a number of people who would in the ordinary course of their work become aware of simply the existence of a cellular phone call, including the people who make up the cellular telephone bills. With regard to this section, wittingly or unwittingly, because really notwithstanding the fact that I attended the committee hearings, I did not hear a good explanation. I will just paraphrase the material words here: "Every person who wilfully discloses the existence of such a communication is guilty of an indictable offence", the communication being not the content of the communication but merely the existence of the cellular phone call. That is an indictable offence.

If I were a phone employee now I do not think I would want to send out a bill and say "Mr. Customer, you made a cellular phone call on March 24", because wittingly or unwittingly this section appears to make that an indictable offence. However, that is a minor flaw. We will see how that evolves in the fullness of time.

The government has taken an approach here in dealing with cellular telephone calls that does not prohibit the interception of cellular phone calls. It does not prohibit the interception. The government decided that it would only prohibit interception where there was malice, where it was made for gain or where the interception was made of a cellular communication that had been encrypted. In those three instances the government decided that would be an offence. I am sure most members agree that those should be offences.

What the government has not done is proscribed and prohibited all interceptions of all cellular telephone calls. My colleagues here today have made reference to that. One of the reasons why the government says it did not want to do that is because, and I think I have got the answer right, there are too many scanners, that is the equipment that intercepts these phone calls. There are too many potential offences, too many potential interceptions, therefore we should not prohibit them. I dispute that logic. I think it would have been most appropriate to prohibit the interception. That is the act we are all targeting here. That is the act we do not want to see.

• (1610)

If the government's logic holds true, which is there are too many interceptions so there would be too many offences taking place, why does it not use the same logic in relation to theft? I am sure there are many thefts going on in society: big thefts, little thefts, thefts of cigarettes, thefts of pencils, thefts of automobiles, thousands of thefts.

If the government says there are too many of these offences out there so it will not bother prohibiting them then why do we not get rid of the offence that is known as theft under $1,000. Why do we not just write it off the books if there are too many out there that we cannot keep up with them all and let them all go? That is not logical.

The government should not have been prepared to abandon all cellular telephone users to fate. I would remind the House of what has been is known as the Wilhelmy affair in which a bureaucrat within the Quebec government had her cellular telephone conversation intercepted and disclosed. What would have happened if either the existing law before this amendment had been interpreted to include cellular phone calls or if there had been a law in place that said people may not ever intercept or disclose a cellular phone call?

If those laws had been in place in that fashion we would never have known about that particular phone conversation because whoever intercepted it would not have made it available to the media. If he or she had made it available to the media illegally the media would not have published it because the existing law says it is an offence to disclose and make public the contents of a private communication.

All the government really had to do here was to prohibit the simple interception of a radio-based or cellular telephone conversation or amend the law, as the private member's bill which I introduced into the House and which was spoken to on Friday proposed, so that we would simply treat cellular telephone conversations the same as regular telephone calls. Ordinary telephone line-based communication is protected and we simply had to do the same thing with the cellular telephone call.

In any event the government chose not to do that. It chose as well not to follow the route chosen by our neighbour to the south in the United States. It has banned at a date in the near future, I think it is 1994, the import or manufacture of all scanning equipment that is capable of intercepting cellular telephone calls.

Presumably the effect of that would not be to outlaw existing equipment which could continue to be used on into the future but over time existing equipment would become outmoded by changes in technology. Therefore the U.S. Congress avoided what would have been confiscation of the existing scanning equipment from its owners.

It has chosen a date in the future to ban the import or manufacture in the United States of all such equipment. Ultimately reality would catch up to the law, technology would overtake the existing equipment's ability to intercept, and it would have achieved its purpose.

In this country the government has chosen to do a fancy foot dance in an attempt to address its perception of the difficulties. It is not the route I would have chosen as a legislator. It is the one that has been put before the House and we will simply have to live with it the way it is.

• (1615)

The defence bar, the body of lawyers across Canada who usually are retained for the defence of those charged with criminal offences, has given evidence to the justice committee and to the legislative committee that reviewed this bill. It has concerns about some provisions in this bill.

Its concern is with reference to provisions that make it easier for the Crown to convict those charged with offences, that make it easier for the Crown to collect and introduce evidence into criminal cases. To be fair to the defence bar it also has a very real concern for the rights and liberties of the subject. The rights and liberties of someone charged with a criminal offence are the same rights and liberties that we all have and the bar has concerns about those.

Throughout all of our history there has been a continuing movement of the line between what our rights and freedoms are, what our obligations are as citizens, and what our crimes are. That line is moving every year around here. It moves back and forth, assisted very ably by the Supreme Court of Canada and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The defence bar has brought these matters to our attention. I for one am cognizant of them.

The provisions of this bill that would authorize certain testing of individuals, all with a judge's order, and authorize the collection and use of evidence, all within a statutory framework, perhaps make it easier for the state to carry on its functions of prosecuting, apprehending, investigating and seeing to the due application of the Criminal Code. However I do note, as do other colleagues in the House, the concerns that have been raised. Hopefully we will not have to look back at this and see that we have made a mistake.

I will close with one item that should be on the record. I have not heard it articulated yet in this debate. In this legislation we are in a sense sending the pendulum back a little bit from the direction it was perceived to have been going in over the last decade or two. That has been in favour of individual rights and liberties and away from some of the collective liberties, some of the collective rights that we had established for ourselves in this country.

As that pendulum now swings back toward the collective rights we place certain authorities and powers in the hands of our police forces, in the hands of our agents of the government. What I wanted to note was that as we do that this House will have to continue to be vigilant on how the state, the police, and agents of the state use those powers. If the authorities granted under this statute are to be used and used properly then we as Canadians will not have difficulty. If there is somewhere out there one agent of the state, one policeman, who unwittingly, foolishly makes a mistake I cannot forgive him or her in advance. They will pay whatever price is appropriate.

I would register for the benefit of the House and for the benefit of the record my concern on the issue and my hope that these powers, these authorities, these mechanisms, these legal devices, the framework which the Supreme Court of Canada has called for and which we are now legislating, which will be put back into the hands of the police for the due enforcement of our code, will be respected in the letter and in the spirit and we will not have cause to reconsider them in the future.

• (1620)

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by reassuring you that I am going to stick to this bill and I am not going to talk about the funeral in Toronto last week at the Scarborough van plant where 3,500 people lost their jobs, direct jobs, which was a direct result of this government's policy over the last four years.

What concerns me about this bill is with regard to the small business person. About eight or nine years ago when the cellular system became very popular many small business people contracted with a cellular company to take up the cellular phone system. There was never any question at that time that the discussions they were having were anything other than private discussions.

For most small business people who use the cellular phone system today it is no different than the regular phone. People actually operate their entire businesses from their cars with the use of their cellular system. Quite often there will be situations in which sales forces will be out in their cars and they will be making reports to their offices, reports on sales calls, prices on sales calls, they might talk about discounts they are giving to their clients, and they will talk about marketing strategies. Most of the small business people I have talked to are not aware that discussion is like talking on a radio and the chances are pretty high that everything they are saying is being picked up by someone else.

This can lead to a type of espionage. As more and more people develop the ability to use the scanning systems then people's efforts to sell their products and services can unknowingly be subverted. Even though we are sympathetic to the fact that the police must have support and access so that they can use electronic surveillance where there is a potentially dangerous situation, and even though we are sensitive to streamlining the Criminal Code, we have to be very forthright with the people of Canada that these cellular phone systems are not what most people think they are in terms of security.

I realize more and more people are buying these scrambling systems but I think that these scrambling systems should almost be a part of the cellular phone itself in order to make these conversations we are having on these phones secure.

If we do not address this notion of privacy and protection for the small business person then eventually the cellular phone companies are going to experience a tremendous backlash. That backlash will not only affect their business but it will also affect the efficiency of the small business person.

• (1625)

Remember, many people started using these phones many years ago to help improve their business efficiency. In my city of Toronto, where there is a lot of traffic, one can get up in the morning, drive to work and use the phone while sitting in traffic. One might be stuck in traffic for an hour but all the time one can be communicating with various business colleagues or customers or making appointments and setting up meetings. This has improved the efficiency of our small business sector which has helped the bottom line and ultimately helps the treasury of Canada. A highly profitable business ultimately is of benefit to all Canadians.

If all of a sudden small business people lose faith in the cellular phone system, it is going to slow down the efficiency of our greatest job creator. It will not just be the cellular companies that will end up being hurt by this backlash, where people will fall away from using the system, but it will also cause the price of the product to go up because the same efficiencies will not exist.

In my view, the way to counteract the current dilemma is maybe to get together with the cellular system and say that we want a system that when a cellular phone system is sold, included in the package is a scrambling device so that privacy will be maintained.

The other thing we are duty-bound to communicate to those people who are using cellulars is that they are in fact highly susceptible to scanning devices that are in the marketplace right now which allow people to listen to all conversations. I really cannot imagine people using a cellular system if they thought that the difficulties they were having with their bank manager were public knowledge.

I cannot imagine people using a cellular system if personal difficulties they were having within their own companies with other employees were public or other people were listening to this in a designed way. They would not continue to have the same eagerness to live on the cellular phone.

I cannot imagine real transactions of a substantive nature, whether they be ideas for selling, or cost of selling product or service, or marketing designs or ideas, or real tactical exchanges that go on within a company in order to have a competitive edge, going on over a cellular system if the people who had these systems realized that their conversations were open to the public, not unlike the conversations you would have with a radio talk show host that would be going out to maybe 200,000 to 300,000 people.

As my colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River said earlier today, there are some areas within this bill to which the government has not been sensitive. I certainly could not support it in its current form.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, again I rise on this matter, having spoken to it both at second reading and report stage, and again draw to the attention of all of us who will be voting on it—and those reading their newspapers—that this bill has a lot of inherent danger.

Bill C–109 is an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radiocommunication Act.

• (1630)

My colleague, the member for Mount Royal, introduced amendments to the bill that would enhance the security of using cellular phones. The general intent of those amendments was to remove the Criminal Code offences and the radio telecommunications act offences because we believe they are the wrong instruments for dealing with cellular privacy.

The point is that the government is using a cannon to kill a gnat. One of our first amendments was to strike out the Criminal Code section, making it an indictable offence with a five–year prison term for anyone convicted of maliciously or for gain intercepting a radio–based telephone communication.

On our side of the House, in our party, we agree with the Privacy Commissioner who said that he would have preferred a more technical means of dealing with cellular privacy. We too believe we should try this approach before charging and ultimately convicting people who overhear a cellular phone conversation.

It seems so simple. Why? I ask this question with the greatest of respect to those drafting the bill on the government side of the House. Why not ban the scanners? Is this difficult? Is this hard to figure out? Is there something we are missing over here?

We have asked this question in committee. We have asked this question in the House. We have asked this question of any number of people on the government side and we have yet to receive any kind of answer, not even an audible one. The question remains, why not ban the scanners?

There is need for the government to take this technological approach to the matter. The Federal Communications Commission in the United States has rules requiring that scanner receivers be incapable of tuning or readily being altered to tune within the bands allocated to the domestic public cellular radio telecommunication services.

This seems relatively simple. This seems relatively sensible. This seems to be the kind of response that you would want to have in this particular situation. Why would you want to bring the full weight of the Criminal Code to bear on this relatively inconsequential situation?

This is interesting. I have just come from a briefing by officials of the Department of Justice on some other legislation. We talked about the fact that the legislation, again amendments to the Criminal Code, was what we call an electable offence. It was one of those offences where the Crown can decide whether to go by way of a summary or an indictable offence.

When I questioned why not go by way of an indictable offence in this area, one of the things that the justice officials reminded me of, and I think is an important thing to be taken into consideration here, with an indictable offence with a five–year penalty, is the added cost to the provinces of pressing an indictable offence charge.

First of all, you must have a preliminary hearing with its attendant cost, the bringing in of witnesses, the Crown prosecutors and possibly the police officers and expert witnesses. If a magistrate decides there is enough evidence to warrant binding over for trial, then you go back and do the whole thing over again at even more cost to the public purse to go through the trial.

How much simpler it would be to ban the scanners. I am really asking. I do not understand this.

The rules and regulations will prevent and prohibit frequency converters being used in conjunction with scanners that receive or can easily be modified to receive cellular transmission and require scanners be incapable of converting digital cellular transmission to voice audio. I do not see the problem with passing this kind of law rather than using, as I said before, a cannon to kill a gnat.

Canada should follow. In so many cases, we blindly follow the Americans. We blindly follow the Americans in policy. We blindly follow them into the OSS. We blindly follow them on this, that and the other thing. Why, for a wonder, when they have done the right thing through their Federal Communications Commission do we not follow their experience and use the proper technological legislative response as opposed to using the Criminal Code? In this respect the government is simply putting the cart before the horse. It is telling Canadians they can have the equipment but they cannot use it. The government also proposes that persons be imprisoned up to two years or fined $25,000 who use or disclose a radio-based telephone communication or who use or disclose the mere existence of such a communication. Although we are not encouraging the interception of cellular calls, we have great difficulty on this side of the House with creating an offence that could jail people unnecessarily.

• (1635)

As I have said before, as my colleague from Mount Royal has said before, as my colleague for Scarborough—Rouge River, my colleague Cape Breton—The Sydneys, my colleague for Broadview—Greenwood and on and on and on, my colleague from Hamilton I am sure will be adding his voice to this when he speaks later in the debate, ban the scanners. Do the sensible thing. Do the simple thing. Do the least costly thing. Do the least intrusive thing.

It is absolutely amazing that the government, which is constantly saying there is too much government, adds another layer of amazing criminal law in an area that could be handled by technological amendments. It is bizarre.

We support the banning of scanners, but at the same time we do not want to fill our jails with people who intercept cellular telephone calls. In the grand scheme of things this certainly may be a manner of breaking the law. It is a form of an offence, but a jailable offence? There are other things in this country with which we should be more concerned. There are other things we should be thinking of putting people in jail for rather than intercepting cellular phones.

I have said it before and I will say it again. Anyone who uses a cellular phone without knowing that half the world could be listening probably should not be allowed to have that kind of technology at his or her disposal. Everyone from politicians in British Columbia to the Prince of Wales have had bad experiences with the interception of cellular phone calls.

When I spoke at second reading on this matter I mentioned the somewhat unhappy experience that the Liberal Party in Nova Scotia had last year during its leadership convention when a senior executive with the telephone company, and who should have known better the ways and means of intercepting cellular phones than a senior executive of the telephone company, actually phoned into the computer centre to find out what the tallies were in our non-existent vote. That was overheard by some young computer expert in Halifax who then sold the tape to the CBC, who then with great glee published the tape.

I can assure you it was not a stellar day for the Liberal Party in Nova Scotia for a variety of reasons. However as most of us were saying at that leadership convention, we all knew this could happen. Most of us in this Chamber have cellular phones in our cars or in our brief cases. Is there any one of us who is not aware of the possibility of interception?

I have said before and I will say again that I have had an experience where I have been speaking to colleagues over the cellular phone and I have had to go home and phone from my own telephone to find out what it was we were talking about because we have become so oblique on cellular phones just to make sure that we will not say something we would not want to read in a daily newspaper or hear on television. We have all had that experience, every one of us.

The idea that Canadians have to be in some measure protected because they do not understand the technology and protected by the Criminal Code of Canada, I am afraid I just find it ludicrous.

I can hear a phone ringing right now, Mr. Speaker. I think it is very interesting. It is obviously an omen. It may be for the Minister of Labour. Does he think so? No, he is shaking his head. It is not for him. The Minister of Labour is far too knowledgeable about technology to depend upon cellular phones.

• (1640)

We support the banning of scanners but at the same time we do not want to fill our jails with people who commit these offences. There has to be a more tangible and more sensible means of monitoring scanners and monitoring and controlling the use of these transmissions. I believe, and the Liberal Party believes, that the technological approach is obviously the best.

We should take steps to inform Canadians. This is really important. I know the Minister of Communications has said this on occasion, but I think it needs to come across more that cellular phones are radios. They are not telephones like the telephones we use in our homes. They are radios. Radio waves are different from telephone communications from house to house and from house to office. It is not a regular phone. It is subject to interception by scanners. Anyone among the Canadian populace who did not know that these conversations are susceptible to interception must have spent the last several years on Mars. However, for those people who did not know that we as members of Parliament and the Department of Communications, the minister and so on, can all bring our considerable abilities in communication to bear to let Canadians know that they are subject to interception on these cellular phones and to act accordingly.

Even as we speak, the technology of cellular phones is being improved. As we move from the current analog system into digital cellulars it will become increasingly difficult to intercept the calls. Yet here we are rushing to judgement and changing the Criminal Code for something that we do not need to do. Until such time as we know that the technology will prevent the interception let us deal with technological means to control the interception. No matter what steps we take people are going to keep on using cellular phones because of their convenience, obviously. This is sensible and we all know this. Some people are going to continue to intercept them.

On the grand scale of things it does not really rate up there with major criminal offences in this country. It does not. If what happened to the Prince of Wales several months ago happened 500 years ago the interceptor might have been decapitated. We have perhaps progressed from that stage to the 1990s and we do not need to use such extraordinary means to deal with what is ostensibly a fairly minimal offence.

Canadians need to be informed of the consequences of using their cellulars. They do not need to be jailed because of their use.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park—National Defence; the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Montreal Economy; the hon. member for Hillsborough—Veterans Affairs; the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands—Trade.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, as always I am privileged to have the opportunity to rise in this place on behalf of the constituents of Hamilton West in my hometown, this time to speak to Bill C-109. It is a bill being tabled by the Minister of Justice. It includes Criminal Code amendments as well as changes to the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radiocommunications Act.

I know my colleagues are dealing with its wire-tap provisions with which we are generally agreed. I want to focus for a few minutes on the cellular communications and privacy aspects of the bill, as have been discussed even as recently as by my colleague from Halifax.

Let me say from the very beginning that I and my Liberal colleagues believe that we need to achieve greater privacy in communications. There is no question of that. We believe there are a number of concerns that need to be addressed. We have attempted to do that, be it at first reading of this bill, second reading, report stage and even prior to that at committee stage. We sat in committee and discussed privacy matters with members of the House from all sides.

• (1645)

The fight against the so-called nuisance junk phone calls that bother seniors in our ridings and families at home continues. How many times have we had to get up? It always seems that these marketing firms always think things through and assume that the most likely time people will be home is at the dinner hour. We are sitting with our family, enjoying our chicken, potatoes and corn and then the phone rings. Who is it? It is somebody selling something. Even more insulting, it is some computer voice that is kicked onto the telephone line.

Then there are the business people and professional offices that are often interrupted. Their privacy is interrupted. We also have to find a way to stop the nuisance of junk fax messages that are now making trouble for businesses and professionals.

In my own constituency office in Hamilton the fax machine kicked in and out came a request to purchase comics books at a discount rate from an American distributor. An American firm was doing the faxing. At the top it said: To MP Stan Keyes. They do not even know what MP means or anything else over in Buffalo.

Mr. Bellemare: How come you are on their list?

Mr. Keyes: How did I get on their list? I have no idea. The list of members of Parliament is a quick list and maybe some of us would be interested in that stuff so they take their chance and fax out their message. Then I looked quickly to find out where it came from. I wanted to call these people and let them know that I was a little more than disappointed that this kind of stuff is sent to my fax machine without my being asked.

Fax paper is expensive. Cling-cling, cling-cling, it just keeps chugging out of the machine for these marketers to attempt to get their message into our offices and to us.

Of course there is no listing of the company that is sending out this material to our offices. It is rather disappointing. I even had a letter just last month from a doctor. I did not check with him so he will not be named. I did not ask him if I could use his name. He is a surgeon at St. Joseph's Hospital at McMaster University. He wrote to the Minister of Communications. He writes:

> I understand—the above bill which was tabled in March 1992 includes the misuse of fax machines for the purpose of transmitting unsolicited information and advertising.
> I am writing to strongly protest the use of fax machines for the above purposes.
>
> The fax machine which I use for my surgical practise is for the transmission and receipt of medical documents, many of which are urgent. In the past few months, this machine has been bombarded with unsolicited advertising from companies offering jobs and computer equipment for sale.
> I urge you to bring about an early resolution to this problem.

It is not a problem that is unfamiliar to anyone in our ridings. Just imagine. A medical practitioner, a surgeon, quickly makes a call to a outfit that deals with something that is important to his practise or what he may be doing in surgery in the operating room in short order and he wants a response. Yet he has to wait for the "Will you buy a comic book faxed from Buffalo?" to finish going through his fax machine before he can get this information that is critical to him and his work as a medical doctor.

A blocking caller ID service was something the phone companies first resisted but have now fortunately relaxed their opposition to. In a very general way we need to take steps, although often at the provincial level, to restrict the flow of people's personal information from being gathered, assembled or circulated electronically by all kinds of these new enterprises, enterprises I suspect that probably originate right out of someone's basement.

• (1650)

What is the cost of putting a fax machine or a piece of equipment on a phone line out of your basement and saying: "No problem, you want your material known to individuals for purchase, I have a list". Maybe this enterprising individual has a master list of thousands of names and phone numbers and he or she may be able to disseminate the information and the availability of a particular product right out of their basement.

These concerns are all part and parcel of the concerns that we as legislators and the public policy-makers face in this information age. So many new questions have come our way.

While the list of issues in this area is quite long, suffice it to say that the bill we are dealing with on cellular privacy is just one example of how the age of high-tech is making matters of personal information a key public policy challenge of the 1990s and in particular of the baby-boom generation, I might add.

What is the problem, Stan? That is the question people are asking. Canadians have traditionally used a telephone that hangs on the wall or maybe in the bar downstairs, the old-fashioned one with the big, black, heavy receiver and the dial on it. This is a wired system and pretty private for the most part. Cellular phones are a very different ball of wax. In fact they are radio phones that pass calls along a series of cells in the public domain on the public airwaves.

The key difference is that this problem is not readily recognized by every cellular phone user. Let us face it, everyone who uses a cellular phone must realize that he or she is in fact making a radio call on that lightweight and very portable phone. Maybe we should adapt the old phrase, "let the buyer beware" to our new information age and let the user beware, cellular calls are radio calls. In short, people should stop expecting the same privacy they achieved with their hard-wired telephone in their kitchen or in their bedroom as they would with the cellular call.

Let us talk about what the minister is trying to do with this bill. I guess it was Joan Rivers who said: "Can we talk", and we are going to talk. We are going to talk about the government that has stood by this bill the way it is despite all the sensible amendments that were brought forward at report stage and prior to this in committee.

My colleague, the member for Mount Royal, put forward all these sensible amendments. We want Canadians to know what the minister is doing with this bill. The Criminal Code, as we have been told by this bill, is being amended to make it illegal to intercept a radio-based communication or cellular call.

The principle behind this action is supported by this side of the House, members of my party and myself. But the problem is that this bill is making anyone who does so guilty of an indictable offence, which is anything over two years in prison and liable to imprisonment for a period or term not exceeding five years. Over two years and under five years is a very strong measure to take, to say the least. Have we tried some other more common sense approaches, maybe a little simpler? Does it go too far? Personally, yes, I think it does go too far. An indictable offence? Does it hit with too big a hammer? Probably in the first instance, yes I think it does.

In our view, after the committee study and the report stage, we have to say this is the wrong step. We gave the government the suggestions on this particular aspect of this bill.

• (1655)

On this issue we concur in fact with the Privacy Commissioner who said at the legislative committee: "I favour a technical answer if one can be found". A technical answer is not such a difficult concept. We can put a person on the moon but we cannot figure out a way to scramble a message off a cellular phone.

If the minister opposite is in his car or I am in my car and we want to call home or we have an important call to make that may have to be private for one reason or another, there must be some technical way of scrambling that signal. There has to be a way and I am sure we could find it. We pride ourselves as Canadians as being advanced in this area. I think we could find an answer to that.

The Privacy Commissioner went on to say: "If limitations on the manufacture and distribution of scanning equipment were the answer I would favour that too". There is an interesting concept, limitations on the manufacture and distribution of scanning equipment.

What if we sat back and asked are we going to put into the court process all these individuals who are listening on their scanners and then jump in on them at home or wherever they are listening on their scanners and charge them with an indictable offence, something over two years, fine them maybe to boot, take up the court's time, fill up our jails? Or, we could say: "Wait a minute let us put the brakes on that for a second. Maybe an easy way of doing this would be to ban the scanner".

You are sitting in your livingroom with a device that listens in on private conversations between two or more individuals. That seems rather odd. Because you have an inquiring mind and you like to have some fun or you enjoy listening in on a scanner, you decide you are going to sit at home and listen in on the cellular telephone conversation between myself and my wife or myself and a minister on behalf of a constituent with a legitimate concern.

Why do we not prohibit the use of that scanner? In other words why go through this process of going through the court system, jamming something else in there and filling our jails with people who are eavesdroppers? Let's ban the device that allows them to eavesdrop. In other words, like the Privacy Commissioner, we are not convinced by those who said a technical approach would not work. I think we have to try it first. After all it has not been tried so let us give it a shot. Should we not try that balanced approach that makes sense before this hasty move into the Criminal Code? It makes a lot of sense to us.

Clause 12 was another interesting section that would create an indictable offence for wilfully disclosing the existence or contents of intercepted radio-based telephone communications without the express or implied consent of the originator or intended recipient of the communication.

A very weighty move by Parliament, to decide that using or disclosing the knowledge of a cellular phone caller is also an indictable offence. After serious consideration we still have serious problems with the aspects of the government's approach. The basic questions remain.

Can it reasonably be enforced? Is it the most practical approach to solving the problem? Having read through what we have attempted to do with this bill, C-109, having heard my colleague, the eloquent member for Mount Royal, attempt to make not outrageous, not even sensitive suggestions to this government by amendments, we concluded that after the committee process the government had acted hastily in resorting first to the Criminal Code rather than pursuing a more technical means to resolving the problem. I think we have just got to say no, it just does not make sense.

• (1700)

Mr. Speaker, I thank you and this House for the time to comment.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I too take pleasure in debating Bill C-109, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radiocommunication Act.

It is interesting how quickly the Minister of Justice is prepared to bring changes to the Criminal Code over something that probably could be prevented, as the member for Hamilton West said, by technology. We have very sophisticated technology and I think we have the technology to probably solve this problem with modern sophisticated technology instead of trying to work it in to the Criminal Code.

It is interesting how after four years of representations in this House by the Official Opposition the present Minister of Justice and the former Minister of Justice would not make any changes to the Criminal Code to make communities safer against repeat sex offenders, against hard core criminals who have served part of their sentences and then are released back into the community. That is where Canadians were asking for changes to the Criminal Code. Somehow all of our representations there fell on deaf ears.

My residents are approaching judges and the police now to even prevent some of the hard core criminals from receiving bail. I know it is the right of every Canadian to receive bail and to be out on bail while awaiting sentence, but there are some criminals who if they are out on bail will repeat the same act whether it is another molestation of a child or another rape of a young girl or even leading to a more severe crime of murder. The residents of Parkdale—High Park are saying: "Your Honour, this person should not be given bail because he or she would be a danger on the streets".

I am pleased to say that some judges are now listening to the residents. Residents can actually make representations in front of judges. I know of a few cases where the judges have listened and refused to allow bail for someone because the community has convinced the judge that by releasing this person the person may be a danger to the community.

Any changes that we bring to the Criminal Code, whether it is protection of cellular phones, whatever, I think we have to keep in mind the safety of the community, the safety of the individual homes, be that home in an apartment or in a condominium, be it a private dwelling. Any changes we make to the Criminal Code must always take into account the safety of individuals and communities.

We have stressed for so long in this country the rights of the individual and that we should not lose sight of. But I think we have come to a stage in the development of our society in Canada where we have to ask: "What about the rights of the innocent victim?" The police and the residents of the communities are complaining that the criminals are given more protection than the community. We made many representations in this House about the minister bringing in changes to the Criminal Code to prevent drug pushers.

• (1705)

Many times I have drawn to the minister's attention how the residents can identify the crack houses. They will give this address in my riding, they will give that address. They know the drug trade that is going on in this 24-hour doughnut shop. They know the drug trade that is going on in this restaurant. Just last week another stabbing occurred in a local restaurant in my riding. I will try to avoid using names for the protection of these businesses in my riding.

For years residents have been saying: "Please close this 24-hour doughnut shop because that is where the crimes are committed". "Please take the liquor licence away from this restaurant because that is where the crimes are committed". It took another act of violence to maybe finally close some of these locations.

How many times, Mr. Speaker, have you heard me talk about the problems of the prostitutes on our streets and how they are wrecking, ruining, beautiful communities because parents are afraid to send their children to school. They are finding condoms on the street. They are finding syringes in the sand-pits. If the children go to play in the sand-pit the parents are afraid that they will get stung with a needle that may carry AIDS. The children from playing in a sand-pit can also pick up AIDS.

I am very proud of my residents in Parkdale because they finally said: "Enough is enough. If you the court system won't do it, if you the police won't do it, if you the politicians won't do it, we will do it". They are taking to the streets and they are doing it.

Five or ten years from now, Mr. Speaker, you will be reading headlines about our community in Toronto, how the community through community involvement is reducing and driving out the criminal element from our community because we got to the stage where the criminal element was stronger than the community element; stronger than the combined businesses, and they are organized under the business improvement association; stronger than the ratepayer groups, because we have ratepayer groups in every quadrant of my riding; stronger than the educational system which works closely with the community. The criminal element was stronger than all of these community institutions and organizations put together. No more. Now the community is getting stronger.

I am very pleased that our party has put forward a position paper on how we intend to reduce crime in our society, how we intend to make amendments to the Young Offenders Act and how we intend to bring standards back. With regard to deregulation, I mentioned in this House before this government seems to have a psychosis about deregulation. It feels that society runs better when we remove all regulations.

An hon. member: You sound like a Conservative.

Mr. Flis: The member said I sound like a Conservative. If the Conservatives practised their ideology and their philosophy then we would have safety in our communities, but they have abandoned governing, they have abandoned management. They said: "We'll just let the private sector do it". The private sector can do it, but the private sector needs rules and regulations.

When we take all these regulations away, what happens? Since I spoke on a similar topic just a week ago, I have received another letter from a constituent, Mr. Sterling. He is very involved.

• (1710)

He is helping people with heart conditions, stroke conditions and lung conditions through CB radios. They have saved lives. Through CB radio they can contact an ambulance and contact the police. They have saved many lives doing so.

They cannot do so now because this government has decided to deregulate CB radios. The Minister of Communications even said that cellular phones, which we talked about in Bill C-109, are not like the regular telephones. Cellular phones are like CB radios. If the government will do to cellular phones what it has done to CB radios, many in my community are going to take up arms or something. They cannot live with what is happening now.

Mr. Sterling wrote to me indicating that foul language, threats, warnings about Mafia, co-ax being cut, echo mikes, roger beeps, music, sound effects and all this are supposed to go against the rules and regulations set forth by the Department of Communications.

When CB radios were regulated and this kind of interruption went on, they soon got a visit from someone from the Department of Communications who put a stop to it. They cannot seem to do this. Someone from the Department of Communications paid some of these abusers a visit. They came back to Mr. Sterling and said: "Yes, we did visit the person who was doing all these interruptions but sorry, we cannot do anything about it". They are the ones who have low respect for others, especially women. I mentioned before in the House how they will curse women, run down women and use foul language on the airwaves.

Unless we get back some regulations the same thing will start happening on cellular phones. Anything that will help clean up the airwaves, be it cellular phones or CB radios, I am all for. As our critic always says we need some regulations that will bring order to our communications system. They will give us certain standards to live by.

In a letter dated April 27 a constituent wrote:

Dear Jesse:

I called the Department of Communications today and I spoke to the inspector I have been communicating back and forth with and once again I mentioned to him about Chicono, the ham licence operator who is still getting on the CB radio and making the noise that he is not supposed to be making. Tony, the inspector, said that he paid this guy a visit and was told to get the f out of here. Tony said that he had to leave as there is nothing else that he could do.

Jesse, this is wrong. Here is a person who paid for a ham licence and he gets away in talking this way to a guy who works for the government. Yet he can still keep his licence. What kind of world are we living in?

Yes, Canadians are asking what kind of world are we living in. What kind of society are we building? We were categorized as the number one country by the United Nations in 1992. If this government continues any longer will we get that distinction again? I doubt it. We will probably be in 25th or 30th place. Let us clean up our act. Hopefully this bill will help us in this regard.

I would like to refer to another issue I am pleased the bill addresses. It addresses the whole area of electronic surveillance used by the police. The hands of the police are being tied more and more.

• (1715)

When I have town hall meetings with ratepayers the police are invited from No. 11 Division and No. 14 Division. I talk to the police individually and in groups with the community. There is no greater co-operation among police, educators, ratepayers and businesses than I have in Parkdale—High Park.

Every time we have these meetings we end up with frustration because the police say: "I lay a charge and I see the offender on the street the next morning". Some say: "I lay a charge and I see the person prostituting the same evening". They know who are the drug pushers. They know who are the purchasers but it is the pushers they are after. They cannot make charges stick. It goes to the courts and there is not enough evidence. The judge throws it out. After a while I am sure the police must throw up their hands and ask: "What is the use?"

I am all for anything in this bill that will allow police to use electronic surveillance where there is a potentially dangerous situation. Anything in this legislation that will allow judges to authorize such surveillance with the consent of one of the parties involved in the surveillance has my full support. I am all for anything in this legislation and in the amendments that are brought in to allow judges to issue similar authorization in other circumstances where it is clear the request for authorization meets the tests prescribed in our Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I have a great concern about our Charter of Rights and Freedoms for which I spoke in caucus. I fought very hard for some items to be included in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Our own party constitution respects the rights of the individual. I joined the Liberal Party so that I could represent the whole spectrum of society. I do not have to take my orders from the multinationals. I do not have to take my orders from the big unions. I can respect the rights of the individual by representing the individual as a Liberal member.

I am concerned whether we have gone too far in granting individual rights to people. Have we forgotten about the rights of the community? Have we forgotten about the rights of the family which is falling apart more and more? Maybe we had better rethink our Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Maybe we had better even rethink our constitutions in our parties.

We cannot look at the rights of the individual at the expense of the poor victims, of the poor children who are being sexually molested as infants. Child pornography is coming into this country. Why are we so helpless? Why are we so gutless that we cannot even stop that literature from coming into our country? Where are the standards of this country? We all have to take blame: you in that chair, Mr. Speaker, my colleagues in my party, my colleagues in the Conservative Party and my colleagues in the New Democratic Party. We all have to share a bit of responsibility. If have we allowed this country to lower our standards to that level then I share some of the blame.

I hope everyone will look at Bill C-109. I hope they will support all the clauses which give the police more teeth. Enough is enough. We cannot send our police out without any tools. Let us give them back the tools they once had and they want. It is not only the police. The community wants the police to have these tools or this authority.

Something I know about Canadians is that they do respect authority. Canadians do respect law and order. Just give them the opportunity.

• (1720)

Canadians do respect others. I saw a wonderful theatre play in my riding in Parkdale on Sunday. Young teenagers and young adults put on a play warning young children how not to become street kids. What an excellent idea.

In this play a girl got pregnant being a street kid. She had nowhere to turn. This theatre group gave alternatives where this girl could turn so if a girl found herself in a similar situation the information given by this theatre group would help her.

Solutions are coming from the children in the community. I know you are telling me to sit down. Thank you for allowing me to again express the concerns of my residents of Parkdale—High Park as well as concerns of Canadians from coast to coast to coast.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Adjournment Debate

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, on April 26, I posed a question to the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the Minister of National Defence.

I asked about the crisis in Srebrenica where 150 Canadians soldiers have put their lives on the line as UN peacekeepers. They have found themselves in a very dangerous situation because the government did not take the advice of the opposition about holding a full parliamentary debate about the nature of the mandate of our peacekeeping troops in light of the changing role of the United Nations and in light of our role changing from a peacekeeping nation to a peace-making nation.

We know that Britain and France refused to send any additional soldiers. We know that additional Canadian soldiers were stopped by the Serb soldiers so they could not come.

I am pleased that today another peace pact has been signed. I hope that all three parties will live up to this new peace agreement. We have had so many signed before but never honoured. It is one thing to sign the peace agreements but it is another thing to honour them.

I hope that the minister is here today because the critic for the Liberal Party asked in Question Period today: "Madam minister, what is the mandate of our Canadian peacekeeping troops?" He also offered a full parliamentary debate on this issue to the government side. As late as today we still do not know what is the role of our peacekeepers. Is it to shoot in self-defence? Is it to protect the inhabitants of Srebrenica from whom all guns were taken and they are left there like sitting ducks?

• (1725)

I agree with the guns being taken away, but I think guns should have been taken away from both sides. Usually in peacekeeping, all arms are taken away from both sides. Our peacekeepers come in and make sure that this is honoured. Any little incident that breaks out, our peacekeepers then through negotiations, not through shooting, try to bring about a settlement. But our soldiers today do not know what is their role, they do not know what is their mandate. We have put them in a very dangerous situation.

I liked the headline I saw in one of the Ottawa newspapers today which read: "Trained to fight, sent for peace". That is true. We train our troops how to be fighters. What do we do with them? We send them to be peacekeepers.

We have to rethink the whole training program for our army. We have to start training them as peacekeepers now. That is why they are so respected even now, because they are peacekeepers. They have self-discipline. They know how to negotiate. But we are sending them into a much more dangerous environment and many of our troops are going to come back with very deep psychological problems, with very deep psychiatric problems, unless we address the situation and address it seriously.

I hope the parliamentary secretary will have some answers for us.

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I was quite surprised to hear that the mandate is not clear. I think the mandate is quite clear. The over-all mandate which stems from UNSC Resolution 819 is to increase the presence of UNPROFOR with a view to monitoring the humanitarian situation in the safe area agreed to by the parties.

Demilitarization of Srebrenica was a step agreed to by the parties, not one proposed by the UN. In order to save some lives, UNPROFOR is helping both parties fulfil commitments made to each other.

Their task includes receiving weapons from the defenders of Srebrenica for the purpose of demonstrating to the attackers that they have no reason to attack. Their task also includes patrolling the safe area and establishing observation posts as a confidence building measure for the parties.

Another problem my colleague raised was the rules of self-defence which are equally clear. Should Canadian peacekeepers be attacked, they would fire back in self-defence. This is to say that they would use force if armed elements attempted by force to intrude into the demilitarized area.

Some 200 peacekeepers cannot be expected to resist a full scale attack. Should this occur, they would take shelter and other measures for their self-protection like everyone else and, as necessary, redeploy.

It should be remembered that the Canadian forces were deployed to Srebrenica in the context of an agreement and that UNSC Resolution 819 called on all parties to treat Srebrenica as a safe area.

Another point raised was training and equipment. The Government of Canada simply would not send a poorly trained and improperly equipped contingent on any mission.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but the hon. member's time has expired.

THE MONTREAL ECONOMY

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on March 22 I asked the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister to consider some new action to stimulate the Montreal economy and in particular to approve the municipal infrastructure program proposed by the Canadian Federation of Municipalities. This would be a tripartite program supported by the federal, provincial and municipal governments to fund the reconstruction of roads, sewers, water systems, bridges, garbage disposal units and so on. Not only would the infrastructure be restored, but in turn business investment would be attracted and create jobs.

• (1730)

The Montreal economy is in extremely bad shape, with stores boarded up all over the city, business after business failing, factory after factory closing. Here are some of the sad facts. The official unemployment rate is at 14 per cent, but the actual rate is 27 per cent if we count those who are no longer looking for work. Twenty-two per cent of families in Montreal are living below the poverty line which is higher than any other city in Canada. Another very sad figure, 25 per cent of Montrealers have less than grade nine education. One in five are living on unemployment insurance or welfare and about 10,000 youths are living on the streets without any homes.

There are 170 agencies receiving help, such as food banks to feed the poor. Last year those fed by food banks in Montreal increased by over 35 per cent. We understand there are 30,000 Montrealers dependent on food banks.

In terms of unemployment, income per capita and participation in the labour force, Montreal is now at the bottom of the list of North American cities with one million or more population. These are shocking figures. The causes are many, some structural, some cyclical, some political. It has been due in part to the free trade agreement, in part due to high taxes, in part due to political instability with the continual threat of separatist politics and the restrictive language laws.

A week or so ago a panel made up of Marcel Côté, Louise Roy and Pierre Pettigrew said that the alienation of the English population in Montreal carries a heavy burden for that city with lost head offices, lost job opportunities and lost investment. More than 200,000 individuals have left Montreal since the passage of Bill 101 a few years ago. The city is not in good shape.

Once again, I ask the federal government to get together with the Quebec government and the city government in Montreal to help the city come out of the sad situation that it is in. In particular, I ask the federal government to participate with the provinces and the municipalities in the municipal infrastructure program. All the provinces are ready to go ahead with it. The cities are ready to go ahead with it. All we need is the participation of the federal government. It would give a great shot in the arm to Montreal and other cities right across this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on the hon. member's question.

This government announced a program of strategic investment in infrastructure that will stimulate economic growth and job creation in the short term and will actually increase Canada's potential economic growth in the longer term.

I remind the hon. member that last December 2 the Minister of Finance announced new investments in public infrastructure of more than $2 billion over the next five years. These investments will directly create from 4,000 to 5,000 jobs a year.

In particular, this initiative provides up to $125 million in new funding for the improvement of Champlain and Jacques Cartier bridges in Montreal. This is in addition to what the federal government has already committed for the work under way on Montreal's bridges.

The investment program also includes funds for establishing partnerships to develop strategic transportation projects with the provinces.

The Minister of Transport is now working with the Government of Quebec to identify to which transportation projects the province gives priority. Good progress has been made in the discussions and construction work should begin this spring.

Although the infrastructure investment program applies to national transportation infrastructure, it will improve transportation systems and make it easier to travel in Montreal and several other urban centres across Canada. These investments will bring the city of Montreal important economic benefits.

TRADE

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my comments tonight flow from a question I put to the minister on March 30 with regard to water exports under NAFTA.

The government pleads that Canada's water policy prohibits the large-scale export of fresh water. But the federal water policy is a paper tiger that is not backed up by tough legislation. Legislation that would have expressively forbid the export of Canadian water died on the Order Paper in 1988 and it is not being revived.

The government also pleads that the implementing legislation for the FTA exempts large-scale water exports. But this legislation is now superceded by the free trade agreement as an international agreement and there is nothing in the free trade agreement that specifically excludes the export of water as it does raw logs and unprocessed fish.

Dr. Frank Quinn of the Federal Inland Waters Directorate admits that the Tory government is now reconsidering its position on water exports. At a recent water export conference Dr. Quinn noted: "There is every indication from comments made that this government is moving toward an export policy for water". The question remains whether the free trade agreement and the NAFTA endanger Canada's water.

Although the government argues there is nothing in either agreement which compels us to sell our water Canada's chief trade negotiator, Gordon Ritchie, concedes that nothing in either of those agreements would prevent the Canadian government from redirecting water to south of the border.

Mel Clarke, former senior trade negotiator for Canada and a strong opponent of the agreements says the FTA and NAFTA endanger Canada's control of its water resources. Noted resource economist Wendy Holm and the Rawson Academy of Aquatic Sciences agree.

It is interesting to note that annex 301.9 which specifically excludes the export of raw logs and unprocessed fish is silent on the exclusion of water from export. Indeed, article 1401 of the draft NAFTA document contained a specific clause relating to non-energy pipelines. Through this provision the NAFTA document extends the possibility of water exports to include transport by pipeline. This is certainly cause for grave concern.

Even though water exports can impact dramatically on the environment, the FTA ensures that environmental reviews will be almost useless unless water is specifically cited as an agricultural good in the FTA.

The chapter of the FTA which defines the use of environmental concerns as justification for trade restrictions specifically pertains only to goods other than agricultural goods. Therefore water export cannot be stopped for environmental reasons.

There is grave concern about water exports. In my own province there is particular concern. The new government in British Columbia has initiated a public discussion on water management and has included water export as an issue. It has specifically asked that the public provide their views regarding safeguards required for bulk water export.

The previous Socred government issued six approvals for bulk exports and twenty more are currently under review. In March 1991 a moratorium was placed on the approval of any more bulk export licences and in May, just a year ago, that moratorium was extended.

Canadians have reason to be concerned about NAFTA and water export. I ask this government to stop the NAFTA deal.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to briefly respond to my hon. friend.

I have to say in all honesty that on this issue of water the NDP is doing what it is doing in a lot of areas with respect to NAFTA. It is trying to see bogymen in the closet and trying to convince Canadians that terrible, villainous, heinous things are going on that quite simply are not, as my hon. colleague has been told in response to questions raised in this House. Large-scale interbasin transfers of water for export would clearly be in violation of the Canadian federal water policy of 1987.

My colleague suggests that agreements signed by this government will allow the large-scale export of water. This is simply not the case and not true. Water in its natural state is not a product or a good capable of being traded any more than trees in the ground or oil and gas in the subsoil.

Only when water is harvested by taking it out of its natural state, allowing it to enter commerce by bottling it or shipping it in tanks for example does it become a good in the rules set out in trade agreements.

Interbasin transfers of water are something completely different as they do not involve the trade of water as a good but rather the diversion of water in its natural state from its existing course. Water in its natural state is not covered in any respect under any international agreement including the NAFTA.

The government is aware of the concerns of Canadians in this question. I note that my colleague's own province of British Columbia has imposed a moratorium on water export that reflects our federal water policy. This government's position on water export is clearly stated in the federal water policy and the implementing legislation of both the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement and the North American free trade agreement. Nothing in these agreements gives either the United States or Mexico access to Canadian waters.

The bottom line is that Canadians governments, both now and in the future have the freedom of action required to regulate the exploitation of our water resources.
