CANADA STUDENT LOANS PROGRAM

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, government investment in education should be one of the most effective ways to build a better future for our country. The student loans program, for example, should be one of our most important initiatives toward creating a more competitive economy.

• (1405)

Unfortunately such educational investments are not paying off for Canada nearly as well as they should. Nothing could more graphically illustrate the reality than the advertisement being placed by students in New Brunswick this week. It says: "Help wanted. We are seeking 18,000 employers to hire a student for a summer job".

As we currently review and revise the student loans program to improve its fundamental mission of enhancing access to post-secondary education for students in need let us also revive the investment spirit of that program. Together with Canada's students let us accept the challenge to use education as an instrument for productive innovation so that we may generate dividends in the form of increased career opportunities.

It is only from such future employment dividends that the financial stability of the student loans program can be assured.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

M. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, economic development in the Montreal area is greatly hindered by the enduring mess in air transportation. In addition, the federal government is reluctant to put in place a policy to make facilities more efficient.

Now a consensus is building in Quebec both at the political level and within the business community around one idea. That is to reaffirm the role of Dorval as a traffic exchange point for regular flights while assigning an essentially industrial role to Mirabel.

As transportation critic for the Bloc Quebecois, I support this idea and hope that the government will ensure that the required changes are made as soon as possible.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the delay in the fixed link project is disappointing to its many supporters in the maritime provinces.

I urge the federal government to react with a two-pronged approach to the recent court decision. I urge that the decision be appealed. At the same time the government should move to meet the environmental requirements by making a section 12 determination in compliance with the court decision. The province of P.E.I. should move quickly to propose a motion requesting that the Constitution be amended, as is also outlined in the court decision.

Having just completed two weeks of legislative hearings on the fixed link process, I am impressed with the high level of environmental assessment work done on the fixed link. Transportation is synonymous with economic development in Atlantic Canada. Without this component being added to our transportation system Atlantic Canada will never achieve its potential.

For these reasons I strongly encourage all parties involved to address the concerns and progress with the project as quickly as possible.

RAMADAN

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, this morning I had the great pleasure of joining with thousands of Muslims from the nation's capital who were taking part in the celebration of Id Al-Fitr, or the Little Feast, to mark the end of Ramadan. I would like to wish all Muslim Canadians and Muslims throughout the world Eid Mubarack.

Ramadan is the ninth month of the Islamic religious calendar and a time of fasting and prayer. It has traditionally been regarded as the month in which the first revelation of the Koran was made by Allah, which was about how he and his people should live.

Ramadan is an equalizer, when both rich and poor experience the feeling of what it means to be hungry. During Ramadan Muslims do not eat or drink anything from dawn to dusk, not even water unless someone is ill. This fast is one of the five pillars of Islam, together with recitation of the creed, prayer, pilgrimage and Zakat.

The celebration of the Little Feast to mark the end of Ramadan is a testament to the freedoms and privileges we all enjoy in our society. On behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada and my colleagues in the House of Commons I want to express my best wishes to all Muslims on this most special day at the end of this most special month. Eid Mubarack.

TAXATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, a column in The Bottom Line, a magazine for accountants, has described the Tory $500,000 lifetime capital gains tax deduction of 1985 as the biggest budget goof in Canadian history. It might also be described as the single biggest act of hypocrisy in Canadian history.

A government that has constantly lectured Canadians on deficit reduction threw away $20 billion, $14 billion of which was totally wasted even by the government's own standards because it was claimed by people who were not engaged in the kinds of economic activity that the government was trying to stimulate. It was basically a windfall for a minority of speculators and others of their ilk who should be driven out of the temple with a whip.

Now after the horse has left the barn we see attempts to close the door, but again only in a way that betrays the Tory bias for the rich. Ordinary Canadians with cottages are being hit, but not so ordinary Canadians with huge family trusts are having their capital gains tax exemption extended.

A government that asks so little of those with so much and so much of those with so little will not be surprised if the many reduce the Tory numbers to a few in the next election.

LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, I have given up long ago trying to make sense of the choice of candidates in the Liberal Party. I think that Canadian people, who are after all financing the activities of the recognized political parties to a large extent, have the right to know on what basis the Leader of the Opposition can make nominations as a matter of course and turn down or forget about others.

For instance, the leader of the Liberal Party has recently prevented his party's president, Don Johnston, from running in Saint-Henri—Westmount. But this week the Liberal Party was welcoming Elijah Harper who has single-handedly and stubbornly blocked the passage of the Meech Lake accord in the Manitoba legislature.

I do not doubt the personal merits of Mr. Harper. What I do question however is the judgment of the leader of the Liberal Party who not only embraced Clyde Wells in Calgary the very next day after Meech died but is now embracing Elijah Harper. It is as if the Leader of the Opposition, having lost any hope of electoral success in Quebec, has decided to run in the rest of the country by siding with those who killed the Meech Lake accord.

MUSIC

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, as the member for Kingston and the Islands I am happy to inform the House that Kingston was the site of the Live Music Lovers' Weekend this past Saturday and Sunday. It was a weekend of great celebration. Dozens of local musicians participated in a spectacular display of musical talent organized by Kingston guitarist Matt Woodward.

Kingston's most famous rock group was away in Australia on tour while it received its second Juno award as entertainer of the year. Rob Baker, Gord Downie, Johnny Fay, Paul Langlois and Gord Sinclair, better known as The Tragically Hip, are winning fans world-wide for their composing and performing skills.

Parliament's acknowledged authority on rock, the hon. member for Windsor West, was heard to remark: "The Tragically Hip? They're terrific". What higher commendation for an outstanding group of musicians?

PARAMEDIC APPRECIATION WEEK

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to recognize one of the most important facets of our health care system, ambulance paramedics.

In British Columbia paramedics are seen as front line health care providers in every type of emergency situation. Every year thousands of people are cared for by this system, by air, land or sea.

For instance, on March 12 of last year paramedics played a significant part in providing assistance to passengers in a collision between a B.C. ferry and a Japanese bulk coal carrier. As a former physician I know the importance of these men and women and the effective and efficient service they provide.

The week of April 4 has been designated by proclamation as Paramedic Appreciation Week in B.C. Please join me and my colleagues from British Columbia in showing appreciation for B.C.'s province-wide ambulance service.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago 15,000 farmers rallied in Saskatoon to protest the policies of this government and support farm families. A week or two later a similar rally was held in Lucknow, Ontario.

Projections for farm income for this year are dramatically worse than last. A cut of over $1 billion in net farm income is projected for this year. In Saskatchewan net farm income is projected to fall 40 per cent from 1992 levels to an average of less than $4,000 per farm family.

Next Tuesday eight farm organizations from across Saskatchewan will make presentations to a televised hearing of the Standing Committee on Agriculture to outline the desperate situation facing farm families in that province.

I call on the government to recognize the failure of its policies and programs and provide more assistance on an urgent basis so that these farmers can survive and stay on their land.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, as a small business person in my private life, I rise to laud the initiative shown by the Bank of Nova Scotia on the small business lending front.

Scotiabank appears to want to lead by example. The bank has demonstrated a much needed aggressiveness in the area that is so important to our economic prosperity. Our small businesses must have access to start-up cash and loan capital to grow and expand.

This initiative carries with it an important message to the federal government, which is that a lot can be accomplished under new management and a fresh, renewed approach.

Sweeping changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act have kick-started the process, but let us not stop there. Others are needed to revitalize this sector. Let us have our departments root out and address our existing inhibitors. These are regulations, policies or practices which actually constrain the growth of our small business community.

• (1415)

Initiatives such as the changes to the SBLA and those of Scotiabank have set the stage. I insist that now is the opportune and appropriate time for us to press forward.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, in the midst of the human tragedy we know as Bosnia-Hercegovina emerge remarkable heroes, men and women from many nations. First there are Canadian peacekeeping forces. Some 1,200 Canadian troops and 45 RCMP monitors are putting their lives on the line every day. We must not forget the family members of our forces here at home. They feel the risks more than anyone.

Just today British helicopters airlifted two Canadians wounded during the massive effort to save the town of Srebrenica.

We have French General Philippe Morillon who took over as the top UN commander from our own General Lewis Mackenzie. He is making a heroic stand to save the 60,000 civilians of that town.

We must not forget Larry Hollingsworth, a former British army officer who is now serving with the UN High Commissioner for Refugees. He arrived in Bosnia directly from Somalia last July.

I call on all members of the House to recognize these brave, unsung heroes today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

TRADE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw your attention to a benefit of the free trade agreement of which many Canadian companies should be made aware.

I cite the case of Gray Tools of Brampton, Ontario. After the free trade agreement this old, family-owned Canadian firm was allowed to join a U.S. trade association, the American Supply Machinery Manufacturers Association. It formerly excluded Canadians and hosts one of the most important trade shows in the North American industry.

As a result of its first trade show last year, Gray Tools picked up 17 new customers. The new contacts and exposure it has gained have boosted U.S. sales to 40 per cent of total sales from just 25 per cent in 1988.

Aleck Gray, president of the company said: "As far as our exports are concerned the free trade agreement is only positive. While our Canadian sales were lagging through the recent recession, our U.S. sales were roaring along".

Now that is good news for the firm's several hundred employees.

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Last night, in a speech to a gathering in Toronto the Minister of the Environment said that Canadians are concerned about the school dropout problem, the unemployment rate which is too high and the increase in poverty. The minister added that young people's problems are due to a sick economy, not the school system.

Does the Minister of Finance agree with his colleague that the economy is sick and that it is hurting young people? Will he correct this situation in the next budget by creating new programs specifically addressing youth?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment never made such a statement about the economy being sick. He pointed out some problems that exist, but indicated the major efforts made by the Minister of Finance and the government that have given us the lowest interest rates in 21 years, the lowest inflation in 30 years, the lowest mortgage rates in 35 years and a growth rate—

An hon. member: What about unemployment?

Mr. Mulroney: Yes, a lower unemployment rate than when you Liberals were in power. That is the reality. That is what the Minister of the Environment said and we are ready to wage an election campaign on our economic record in due course.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister may be able to control what some of the leadership candidates say but in this case I would like to read to him directly from an article in The Toronto Star today. His colleague says he finds it "objectionable that people blame schools for the high drop-out rate". He said many students are dropping out not because of poor schooling but because they feel the faltering economy no longer assures youth they can land jobs after graduating.

• (1420)

I want to ask the Prime Minister, since he has entered the debate, does he agree with the assessment of his colleague that the faltering economy is causing young people to lose hope in this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a far cry from a faltering economy, a far cry from what my hon. friend said in French in her opening question where she imputed something absolutely false to the Minister of the Environment, which he never said.

Some hon. members: Withdraw.

Mr. Mulroney: If there is going to be a withdrawal I hope it would be the member for Hamilton East withdrawing something she imputed to the Minister of the Environment which he never said.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Obviously what Canada and the industrialized countries have gone through in the last two years has not been helpful to our young people seeking employment. We regret that very much. The situation that prevails in France, Germany, England and the United States has taken a toll on all citizens, including the youth. Unfortunately Canada has not been an exception to that.

My hon. friend, the Minister of the Environment, was quite properly pointing out that a faltering economy in Canada, or the United Kingdom, or France or the United States takes a toll on the young. We have to make sure this is not repeated. That is why we are trying to control government expenditures. That is why we are trying to limit the rise in deficits and debt which have brought about the lowest inflation rates in 30 years, the lowest mortgage rates in 35 years and the highest growth and employment growth rates of the IMF and OECD countries in 1993-94.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Nobody has a job.

Mr. Mulroney: I will conclude with this. My hon. friend from Winnipeg says: "No one has a job". He is right that too many people are out of work but it is less in percentage terms than were out of work when my hon. friend and the Liberals were in office.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): We had programs for them. You do not and that is the difference. We put them back to work.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister has already fired one leadership candidate whose opinion he did not agree with on the helicopters. I would like to ask him very specifically: Does he agree with the position taken by his colleague in Toronto that it is the sick economy that is causing young people to drop out of school and not the education system? Does he support that statement?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, how could I support the statement when my hon. friend the Minister of the Environment never made it? This is the unique and delicious interpretation of the member for Hamilton East of what the Minister of the Environment said and it is extremely dangerous for anybody.

We all learn things around here. What we all learn in all parties is never to accept the interpretation of the member for Hamilton East for anything we are alleged to have said.

An hon. member: That is right. Lesson number one.

Mr. Mulroney My hon. friend says remember what your leader said. Brian, remember what your leader said: "Do not be a nervous nelly".

Mr. Tobin: Bye, bye, Brian.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend from Newfoundland says: "Bye, bye, Brian". You are right and I say to you, bye, bye, Brian.

Oral Questions

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Youth.

There are many nervous young people out there who cannot find jobs. I want to say to the Minister of State for Youth that since 1989 the number of Canadians who have never held a first-time job has increased by 51 per cent, from 367,000 to 556,000. Over 500,000 young Canadians are looking for a first-time job and cannot find it.

When will the minister come forward with specific job creation programs to put these young Canadians to work?

• (1425)

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as you will recall, we had the occasion last week to debate this issue following a motion by my hon. friend. Obviously he did not listen to the debate and what we had to say.

We have explained the numerous initiatives taken by the government, notwithstanding the attempts by the opposition to try and stop the legislation that we tried to put in place in order to control the debt, put the economy back in shape so that our young people in Canada, our future, can have all the opportunities they deserve.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, the minister is still talking about inaction. We are near the end of the school year and the minister knows that hundreds of thousands of young Canadians are looking for summer jobs to be able to continue their education. At the same time the government has cut in half funding for summer employment initiatives from $205 million in 1985 to only $101 million today.

Why is the minister, at a time of such great need, cutting this funding in half?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Again, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend either refuses to admit facts or tries to play partisan politics.

The program for summer employment for this summer has been increased by $5.1 million.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It is increasingly obvious that the reason the government is unable to reduce the deficit and the debt is its own policies. It lacks something fundamental: low unemployment.

When will the government decide to do what it must to change its policies in order to achieve what is essential for any economic recovery: low unemployment?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not really following the progress that has been made on the expenditure reduction track.

When the government came into office we had experienced 15 years of annual program expenditure increases of about 14 per cent. We have brought that down to a level of around 4 per cent, or less than the rate of inflation. Putting it another way, when we came into office the government of the day was spending $1.33 for every dollar's worth of revenue that was taken in. Obviously that could not be sustained.

The hon. member should look at what we have done. We have shaved some $118 billion worth of expenditures. Had we not taken that action, instead of having a $34 billion deficit today, we would have had an $82.5 billion deficit.

In conclusion, I must say—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes, Mr. Speaker, if we had not taken the action, if we had gone merrily on our way, spending in the old Liberal and NDP tradition, we would have had a deficit of $82.5 billion today.

Mr. Fontana: What kind of arithmetic is that?

Mr. Mazankowski: I say to the hon. member that the initiatives we took—

An hon. member: There are a lot of nervous nellies over there.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I remind the House and the people of Canada the initiatives we took with respect to expenditure reduction were opposed every single solitary time by members opposite.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, in fact there are many studies to indicate—I have one here by Informetrica, one by Wood Gundy, one by WEFA—it is the government's own monetary policies that have reduced the number of jobs in the economy, that have reduced the amount of revenue to be raised in this economy. If the government had different monetary policies we would not have had the debt and deficit we have.

For example, I would cite a quotation from Wood Gundy which says that the government's single-minded pursuit of inflation has "already blown the government's revenue projections off this year by $8 million".

My question to the minister is this. Will he abandon the failed ways of the last nine years and bring in a budget which addresses the fundamentals of reducing unemployment and getting this country really back on track?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member is proposing is a Bob Rae solution to the economy. I would rather take a Roy Romanow solution.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Once again the federal government finds it impossible to defend its own policies.

I want to point out something that happened yesterday. I think this is really what it is all about. There were 3,000 people lined up for three days in Edmonton for 700 part-time jobs. Surely the government must see that it bears some responsibility for this. Its own policies have contributed to this situation of unemployment.

Just two days ago the Dominion Bond Rating Service said that the main reasons for provincial shortfalls had to do with federal caps on transfer payments, the recession, and the decline in manufacturing jobs.

If the Minister of Finance is really serious about provincial debt and unemployment will he make sure his government stops reducing transfer payments, stops making trade deals that cause unemployment, and brings in a budget that puts people back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are 12,328,000 Canadians who are working in Canada today. That is up from 11 million when we assumed office. There have been well in excess of 1.3 million new jobs created. As a matter of fact—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: They say it is not enough. I agree, but it is still the best job creation record within the G-7 over the last 10 years.

An hon. member: It is the highest unemployment rate of the G-7.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member asks: "Why don't you do something to create jobs?" Since she is speaking about Alberta the hon. member might want to know that since 1987, 80 per cent of the new jobs created in Alberta have been created in the newly emerging economies, those new industries related quite directly to the new economies such as high information-based technology, telecommunications, the communications sector, and primarily exports to the United States.

The New Democratic Party is opposed to the free trade agreement.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: Go out and try to sell that to Albertans, because exports to the United States have increased by 48 per cent since the free trade agreement was put into place.

An hon. member: Albertans aren't the only people in the world.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday President Clinton pledged that he would not introduce the NAFTA legislation until the agreement is made tougher in the areas of the environment and of labour, something the opposition has been advocating all along.

However, the Minister for International Trade stated yesterday that environmental and labour issues "should not be at the core of a free trade agreement".

Is it the policy of this government that the environment and labour questions should instead be peripheral? Or, does the minister agree with President Clinton and indeed with the Official Opposition that the environment and labour side agreements should be utilized to improve significantly the agreement itself?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend has tried to distort what I said yesterday.

The point I was making yesterday, and I will be quite clear, is that the trade remedy laws are at the core of a free trade agreement. The environmental and labour issues the U.S. administration is trying to address, and we have been trying to address since I raised this at the meeting in Montreal in February of last year, are parallel agreements to the free trade agreement that are not a central part of the agreement itself.

Both Mr. Clinton's objectives and the objectives of Canada are of the same nature: not to address the core nature of the agreement but to improve some of the elements surrounding the agreement in relation to the environment and labour.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the situation is now becoming clearer. The President of the United States says that these two matters, environment and labour, are so central to the NAFTA that he will not even take the legislation forward without agreement on those side accords.

What is the Canadian government's position: central or peripheral? The government is introducing the legislation tomorrow.

• (1435)

Let me ask the minister this question. The President of the United States said yesterday that NAFTA is not simply a trade agreement. It is an investment agreement. He added: "the investment provisions of NAFTA will be needed to be used in ways that will raise wages" referring to Mexico and the United States.

Could the minister explain from the recent talks among Canada, the United States and Mexico what the U.S. administration means by changing the way the investment provisions will be interpreted with regard to Mexico and the United States, and does Canada support such modifications and changes?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to give my hon. friend a full briefing on this matter, but the side agreements on labour and on the environment do not change in any way the investment provisions of the NAFTA. Those provisions of the NAFTA stand.

What the United States, what Canada and what Mexico are interested in is precisely the same. We want to see economic activity in all three countries increase and that is going to be a primary result of the North American free trade agreement.

For my hon. friend—I cannot understand why he is saying this—to say that the environmental agreements are central to a trade agreement is simply not true. It is not accurate. It does not bear any resemblance to reality.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who so far, unfortunately, has nothing to show for his efforts to reach an agreement with France on the cod quotas. He will know that St. Pierre fishermen have made no bones about their intention to get a bigger piece of the action. He will also know that France now wants to send the quota issue to another international tribunal.

If France refuses to back away from that particular stand to send it to a tribunal, what is the minister then prepared to do to end the stand-off with respect to the cod quotas so that the Grand Banks based scallop fishery can resume?

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. The question is hypothetical. The minister may want to deal with it.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, most of the questions raised in this House are hypothetical, but they still have to be dealt with so I would like to deal with this one.

With respect to the hon. member's latest hypothetical question, the position is that Canada made a generous offer to France in accordance with our obligations under the 1972 treaty entered into by—I will not even mention the name of the government—a Liberal government.

Under the terms of that arrangement we had to offer to France the opportunity to catch fish within our waters, but Canada has the right to determine what amount it should be permitted to catch based on conservation and the like.

Despite our difficulties we did make a generous offer to France which was not accepted after a number of meetings so any next move is up to France. We cannot go any further. We are not going to go any further when our own fishermen are in desperate straits as a result of a decline in the resource.

With respect to the suggestion by France that this issue should go to arbitration under the terms of the 1972 agreement, our position is clear. We will not put that kind of an issue to arbitration. We are sovereign in our own waters and the question of what amount of fish should be taken by anybody within our own 200-mile economic zone is for Canada and Canada alone to decide. We will never agree to go to arbitration on that issue.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I suppose hypothetically with that kind of leadership and a nice blond wig he should run for leader.

This scallop fishery has been at a standstill down there since last summer. The minister has been quoted in the press the last few days as saying that he is optimistic, that after the French elections this weekend are out of the way we can expect a resolution forthcoming and fairly quick.

What is in store for that scallop fishery in the event that his latest bit of optimism is not well founded? What is his plan b?

• (1440)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am under very heavy pressure these days and that is why I am somewhat nervous. If I could speak two or three consecutive sentences in French I would be already in the race and well on the way to winning, I can assure you of that.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: That might well be hypothetical.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Crosbie: Oui, monsieur le Président, we do have a serious problem with the fishery for Icelandic scallops in the area because the most prospective areas are on the St. Pierre bank controlled by France.

There will be no settlement with France unless we have proper access to those scallops, as the hon. gentleman knows. I am hoping when the election is over in France that we will have some progress in that direction.

TRADE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer probably makes many Canadians very happy that this is an officially bilingual country. My question is for the Minister for International Trade.

Mr. McDermid: Explain yourself.

Mr. Murphy: The government intends to introduce the trade bill for second reading tomorrow for a partial day's debate and to close off debate at second reading after one more day next week.

I ask the minister: How can the government be so outrageous as to limit debate to less than two days on an issue that is so important to so many Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend might ask himself that question because I believe for two weeks now we have been trying to get this bill into the House, and we have been obstructed at every turn in the road by the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Barrett: You used closure.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): In addition to that we have been holding public hearings on the NAFTA starting in late November right through till last month. We have been in nine cities and met with 120 different groups of people presenting their views both pro and con the agreement. It is on that basis we believe it is time we get this bill into the House and into committee where people can study the specific elements of the agreement and get by the posturing of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, most of those 120 groups that had a chance to participate were limited to five or ten minute presentations and he knows that. The government also made it very clear that the committee's role was going to be very limited and very short-lived. Of course the New Democratic caucus said no to that.

My supplementary question is: How can this government accept any responsibility of decent democracy? How can it say that, if it is going to limit debate on an issue of this importance to less than two days?

What is the purpose of parliamentary democracy if we are not allowed to speak for a reasonable amount of time on an issue that is so important to so many Canadians and to so many Canadian communities?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as my seat-mate, the Minister for International Trade, has pointed out, a committee that has been looking at the NAFTA deal since last November toured the country. I have made offers to the House leadership of the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party to have the whole deal referred to a committee a couple of weeks ago so that it could study—

Mr. Barrett: Tell the truth. You used closure. We were lied to in that committee.

Mr. Speaker: I may not have heard what I think I heard, but I do not want to hear it again. The hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. Andre: In fact I made an offer to—

Mr. Barrett: We were lied to in that committee. You tell the truth.

An hon. member: You were not around, Dave. You were in Mexico.

Some hon. members: Out, out.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member who has a great deal of experience, not just in this House but also in the legislature of our province which we care for very much, would know that he has gone too far.

• (1445)

I know he feels very strongly about this and that is why, of course, we have debate. I would ask the hon. member to withdraw the allegation.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I refuse to withdraw that the government lied to us and to me about that—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I might ask the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party whether that position is the position of her party in the House today.

Mr. Barrett: I speak for myself. I do not speak for my party. We were lied to.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could remain in his seat and we will discuss this at the end of Question Period.

CROW BENEFIT

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister who met with the premier of Alberta last week.

There are reports that the federal government is making a move toward a change in the method of paying the Crow benefit. This comes after many consultations involving senior levels of government and farm organizations.

By the way, those consultations did not produce a consensus on how to proceed, if at all, on this issue. Now, however, there are indications that the federal government is prepared to bring in legislation.

My question for the Deputy Prime Minister is this. Are we to assume that all the major stakeholders involved have agreed to the changes and, if not, why is the government proceeding without a crucial consensus?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is no secret that this has been a topic of discussion for a number of years, probably going back at least 15 years. We presently have discussions under way with all of the provinces. Many of the people involved are trying to reach a national consensus around an over-all payment through a NISA type approach.

We said in Alberta on Friday that we would continue with that type of approach in order to try and reach a national consensus and if we could not, we would be prepared to proceed on the basis of a solution that would identify and try to take into consideration as many of the provincial priorities as we possibly can.

We also put a date on it to be effective August 1, 1994. Obviously the discussions will continue with everybody involved to try to reach a consensus. That includes as many of the provincial and the individual concerns as we possibly can.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, so there is no agreement.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. As the minister well knows, the Crow benefit, regardless of how it is paid out, is important to all prairie farmers. Farmers want to know whether any possible change to the method of payment would affect the level of support. That is crucial.

Will the minister indicate to the House now that he has given assurances to farmers that the level of freight assistance under any proposal under consideration will not be diminished, that the level of support will not be diminished?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the discussions are continuing on the basis of a certain amount of money being available identified as the Crow benefit.

If we were having this discussion prior to December 2 last year, the number would have been $720 million. Since then we have had a financial statement that reduced grants and contributions by 10 per cent.

Obviously those considerations will have to be taken into account no matter what kind of a solution is arrived at. On the basis of the financial condition of the government at the time, that will determine the amount of money that is available.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Since the minister admitted yesterday that he has no plan for the airline industry, will he acknowledge that his government's policies have substantially contributed to the serious problems facing this industry and that now he does not have the guts to announce a genuine stabilization plan for an industry that is so important to Canada's economy?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it would seem that, based on his behaviour, the hon. member for Ottawa South is not one of the nervous nellies, but I think he is being less than forthright when he tells Canadians that I admitted yesterday we did not have a plan. I told the hon. member yesterday that the directors of both airlines had officially stated that in their view the only way to remedy their financial situation was to eliminate overcapacity, that they were in a position to do that themselves and that we would intervene only if they refused to act responsibly.

[English]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, after months of tough talk about how he was going to recalibrate the regulatory framework, in his words, of the airline industry, yesterday the minister said that the airlines can address the problems themselves. That was the day after a major carrier had to seek bankruptcy protection from its creditors.

Does the minister have some secret plan stashed away somewhere to deal with the problems in the airline industry or can he not see that the national duopoly that exists right now is inherently unstable and will continue to be so?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have said repeatedly and I will repeat again today that the airline industry knows what the problems are. It has all the means to do it. We are giving it the time to impose self-discipline. If it does not we will come up with a recalibration process.

Oral Questions

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

On March 12 in this House I asked the Minister of Transport if it was the government's intention to pay the Crow benefit to producers as recommended by the National Transportation Act Review Commission and I was told that it was not.

In light of the agreement that the Deputy Prime Minister reached with the premier of Alberta on Friday where he said in part that the federal government will proceed with enabling legislation which will provide for a national solution, et cetera, to that very issue, is it now the government's policy to do away with the Crow benefit and pay it to the producer?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is mixing metaphors. There is a difference between doing away with it and paying it to the producer. I think most producers would want to see the benefit maintained. How it is paid I guess is a question for discussion.

We get this all the time from producers. They say: "If we cannot increase the price of grain, help us reduce our over-all costs". The member should know as a farmer that transportation costs from an elevator beside his farm to a hold in a boat costs about $60 a tonne. In the case of wheat that is over $1.50 a bushel. What we are doing is looking at over-all costs, the Crow benefit being one of them, to see if we can do it in a way that reduces farmers' costs and help them stay in business.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport said there had been no policy decision made on that. We did not get a clear message from the Minister of Agriculture, but we do have a signed statement that was issued as a result of the meeting between the Deputy Prime Minister and the premier of Alberta which seems to make it fairly clear that the government policy has changed. It has made up its mind.

I want to know if the policy which said that this decision would not become final until all of the provinces had agreed has now been abandoned as well. Is the government going to make agreements with one province at a time and get to the solution that way?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, let me read the full paragraph that the member started: "The federal government will proceed with enabling legislation which will provide for a national solution which can include provincial variations in design and delivery of the program".

• (1455)

Clearly what we as a federal government are trying to do is to take as many of the provinces' concerns as we can into account, get everybody to the table to seek an over-all solution and when the solution emerges hopefully to have as many of the individual concerns addressed as we possibly can. That is in the best interests of everybody. We want to make sure that the money that is put up by federal taxpayers is used in the best possible way to keep producers' costs down.

As a farmer who is a long way from any ports, either Vancouver, Thunder Bay, Churchill or Prince Rupert, he should be in favour of that.

THE DEFICIT

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

In its February 1992 budget the government predicted a deficit of $27.5 billion. Last December, the Minister of Finance acknowledged his failure to keep the deficit at the level predicted and that the deficit would exceed $34 billion. Considering current tax revenues, many observers are saying that the minister will be unable to keep the deficit below the $35 billion limit he had announced.

Could the minister give the House the assurance today that for once his predictions will be accurate and that the deficit will not exceed the level anticipated last December?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I covered that in the December statement when I indicated that the December statement was necessitated by a dramatic fall-off in revenues as a result of slower than projected growth. We projected growth in the February budget of 2.7 per cent and that forecast was shared almost unanimously by all forecasts of independent analysts.

Unfortunately world growth was a lot slower than that and as a result we had growth of something in the range of 1 per cent. As a result there was the fall-off in revenue of some $8 billion or more and that will project into the upcoming year as well.

It was for that reason I issued the statement in December. The budget that I am putting together now will be based upon the December statement as well as many of the initiatives that we undertook and advanced in the February 1992 budget.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, this kind of verbal manoeuvring will not sound reassuring to the financial markets and is an even better indication of the reasons for the government's reluctance to bring down a budget that will reveal the extent of the damage.

The provinces were the first to suffer because of the government's failure to act. For the past eight years they have lost nearly $10 billion to cuts in transfer payments.

I want to ask the minister whether he can give the House the assurance that in the next budget he will not further aggravate the serious financial problems of the provinces by offloading an additional fiscal burden.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the hon. member has just said, and this is a very important point, there have been no cuts in transfer payments to the provinces. These payments have been increased by an average 6 per cent annually for the past nine years, and meanwhile, we are keeping government expenditures at 4 per cent below the rate of inflation. I know of one instance where restrictions and cuts were introduced unexpectedly and where this led to the rejection of collective agreements previously signed on behalf of public servants. This happened in 1981-82, at the behest of the Government of Quebec, and I believe the hon. member was one of the players in this sequence of events.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES CANADA

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General and refers to the facility for federally sentenced women in Truro, Nova Scotia.

Correctional Services Canada has been negotiating with the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and P.E.I. to have them join in the project because they do not have facilities for their sentenced women.

Have we offered the provinces the best deal and are we making any progress toward accomplishing the goal?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I welcome my hon. friend's continuing interest in this facility.

Yes, we are discussing the matter with the provinces but whether we have offered them the best deal, I would not want to comment on that.

We want to provide facilities for women and we are perfectly willing to accommodate provincially sentenced women within the facility if it makes sense for both sides.

EDUCATION

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State.

For several months now the government has been considering reforms to the student loans program. As we approach the end of another university year, students across Canada are concerned about the changes which may be coming about, for example, whether loan limits will be enhanced to recognize cost increases that have occurred since they were established in 1984, whether part-time loans to part-time students will be available perhaps on a matching basis, whether there will be provisions for interest relief in the event of unemployment and whether or not the 3 per cent administration charge will be eliminated.

The students of Canada need answers to these questions. Will the minister advise us when the reforms from the student loans program reconsideration will be announced?

Hon. Monique Landry (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I know the importance of the student loans program not only to my colleagues in the House but mainly to the 250,000 students who are receiving assistance on a yearly basis.

I want to assure my colleague that the government is committed to reforming the Canada Student Loans Program to do exactly what he is asking for, enhancing aid to needy students, but at the same time reducing the costs. That is why we have been discussing new financial arrangements with lenders based on risk-sharing as announced in the budget.

I am sure that with the consultations we have had with the different groups, the provinces and the students the program will go on to respond to the needs of those students very soon.

HEALTH

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Witness after witness before the subcommittee on health issues has asked for a public inquiry into the tainted blood tragedy.

Does this not finally convince the minister that today is the day to call for a public inquiry? With over 1,000 Canadians dead or dying, why does this government persist in saying they do not have the basic right to know? Why?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question.

HIV tainted blood has been a major issue for all of us. We have worked very closely with the haemophiliac society and realize the difficulties that they have been suffering.

We provided some compensation to those people and while it might not be enough it offered them some compensation.

My colleague from Delta, B.C. is chairing the subcommittee on health and welfare which is hearing these witnesses. We look forward to the committee's recommendations which will answer his particular questions.

MEMBERS

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could return to the matter that engaged us for a moment or two during Question Period. I asked the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca to remain in the Chamber and I see that he has done so.

I think all of us who are in public life know that there are times when we feel very strongly about issues. That is a good thing, because as I have said many times, this is not a tea party and the long history of this place is that the men and women who vote in our country and in the country from which our institutions came have insisted on sending strong-minded and idealistic people to the House of Commons. We all understand that.

The dispute that took place a few minutes ago no doubt stems from strong-minded views on both sides of the House.

The difficulty is that one could make light of this. I sometimes have said to the many groups of students that come to the House of Commons that the distance between both sides of the Chamber has at least been considered to be two sword lengths. It is an adversarial system, and for better or for worse, we who have inherited it and adjusted it to our own needs have nonetheless maintained it. Because we believe as we do in our court system, the adversarial system is probably as competent a way of getting at the truth and the facts as has been developed by any civilized people anywhere. It is not the only way and it is obviously not perfect but that is what it is.

However, it only works if we respect the traditions of this place and the rules we have set for ourselves. It means that conduct in the Chamber has to have some restraints upon it.

I take nothing away, as I said at the beginning of these brief remarks, on how strongly we may feel about things. As your Speaker of course I am all sweetness and light, and kindness and gentleness, and I am not supposed to have a single thought in my head. Perhaps some of you will remember that there were times when I was sitting there that I may have provoked some anguish on the part of a Speaker myself. Most of us have probably been in that position at one time or another.

The point is that the institution and our country has to take precedence over our own anger or our own convictions when it comes to remarks in this place. I have never said that there had to be some kind of antiseptic, absolute order in a place like this. There never has been and I doubt there ever will be unless we just send zombies here. But there has to be reasonable order. When I say reasonable order I say that because without it there is no free speech and that is the fundamental that this place is all about: the right to speak.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: If we do not abide by the rules that we set for ourselves, that right to speak will be lost.

The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca is well and honourably known to me. When I say well-known that implies many things. I know the hon. member very well. I also know his passion, his convictions and his principles. Along with most decent-minded people in British Columbia, I admire that. I also know that he has had a great deal of parliamentary experience, not just in this place but as premier of my province in the legislature of British Columbia. His contribution to public life has been extensive and no doubt will continue to be.

Now that is as far as I can go in this disputatious place. I think I heard some hon. member say a moment ago: "Just a minute, Mr. Speaker, you are going to get him re-elected". That of course is not my purpose.

My purpose is to ask him upon consideration if he could, in the interests of this place and of our traditions, just very quietly say that he withdraws his offensive words and then perhaps we could end that part of the issue. The issue to which he takes such umbrage continues and there are other places to debate it.

I wonder if the hon. member could assist the Speaker. The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, it is true that I have had a great deal of experience, all of it positive. I have had a great many wounds, most of them self-inflicted. But, Mr. Speaker, I am not talking here about a difference in debate; I am talking about a matter of fact. There is a passionate difference in debate between myself and the government on this issue. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I have asked the hon. member to make his remarks, and I hope that they will be of assistance to the Chair. I want to hear his words. He may have said something which I may not have heard because of comments in the House. The hon. member.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, the rare thing in this experience of being in public life is not being told the truth. In the presence of the member for Etobicoke North I was told that that committee would be travelling to Mexico and the United States to further expand questions that we had about the nature of it. Mr. Speaker, I was lied to. That is what I referred to—

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. It may be that things were said. Whether they were said with the intention to mislead, which is what is necessary in order to amount to a lie, is a matter of opinion. But we cannot use those words here. I am going to ask that the hon. member consider perhaps for a few hours his position, and I hope that he will find it appropriate to withdraw.

The right hon. the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might, as a statesman on his way out, make a comment that my hon. friend might reflect upon.

The Speaker in his very eloquent comments asked the member to withdraw his remarks. Mr. Speaker, if you spoke like that about me I would be ready to withdraw my resignation.

May I just make a suggestion to my hon. friend. I am not aware of the to and fro but may I just point out, out of respect for someone who has emerged as one of the most remarkable and successful Speakers in modern history, and given the point of view expressed by Mr. Speaker, why does my hon. friend, as a statement of respect for the Speaker and for the House not simply withdraw the remarks and we will get on to other things?

Mr. Barrett: I have profound respect for the Chair and for this Speaker in particular. There is no finer son of British Columbia, if that is what is being measured, than the hon. gentleman who now sits in the Chair of this House. This is not a dispute with the Chair. This is not a dispute with the rules of the House. This is not a dispute with the Chamber that I love and the British parliamentary system. It is simply a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot change. I have been lied to. And no number of hours will change that.

Some hon. members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I have asked the hon. member to reconsider his position and I have to take it that he has considered his position and is not going to change it.

This is regrettable, I think. But under the rules which we have set for ourselves, this is a situation in which I think now, and the right hon. the Prime Minister has probably spoken for most of the members in this place, we have tried to urge our colleague to withdraw but he is not going to do so. The only sanction that the Chair has, I think under these circumstances, is regrettably to name the hon. member.

Mr. Barrett, I have to name you for disregarding the authority of the Chair. Pursuant to the authority granted to me by Standing Order 11, I order you to withdraw from the House for the remainder of this day's sitting.

[Editor's Note: And Mr. Barrett having withdrawn:]

POINTS OF ORDER

DECORUM

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In crossing from the other side to my seat—

An hon. member: A point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have no idea who is apparently screaming at someone, but I cannot hear two points of order at the same time. I have already recognized one of your colleagues, if I may. The hon. member for Miramichi has the floor.

Mr. Dionne: Madam Speaker, in crossing from the other side of the Chamber to this side I inadvertently crossed in front of the Speaker. I simply want to apologize.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would simply like to raise for the consideration of the Chair what I consider to be the inappropriateness of what happened from the Chair during the course of Question Period.

In a way that I have never seen in my years here, and as far as I am concerned it has probably never happened before, the Chair saw fit to ask a leader of a particular party to rise in Question Period to state a position with respect to something that a member had said from the leader's party.

This was totally inappropriate behaviour as far as I am concerned on the part of the Chair. I would ask that the Chair and the Clerk consider the appropriateness of this behaviour. I look forward to an apology for the inappropriateness of that behaviour.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have listened very carefully to the hon. member. I am sure the point he has raised will be discussed in chambers and will be brought back to the House if it is considered necessary.

PETITIONS

CROATIA

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Madam Speaker, it is my duty, honour and privilege to present a petition signed by hundreds, probably thousands, of Canadians of Croatian descent.

They ask that the Government of Canada consider recognition of the Republic of Croatia in view of the fact that the democratically elected government of the Republic of Croatia has complied with conditions of resolution 743 of the United Nations Security Council.

The petition is correct as to form and content and has been certified.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN AND CHILDREN

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the privilege of presenting petitions duly signed that call upon Parliament to attend to the issue of violence against women and children. It states: "The undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to accept legislation designed to eliminate violence against women and children; encourage and support women to report incidents of assault or abuse; provide assistance and support for women reporting assault or abuse".

They ask that we concentrate a special effort on training of police, lawyers, court workers and judges to become knowledgeable about women and child abuse and to focus public attention on this very important and long ignored problem.

CANADIAN FORCES BASE NO. 5 SUPPLY DEPOT

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure to introduce a petition with over 5,000 names questioning the decision to close the Canadian Forces Base No. 5 Supply Depot in Moncton.

The petitioners call on Parliament to reconsider this untimely decision and keep these military facilities where they have been so capably serving the troops, the militia and other bases throughout Canada and overseas for the past 52 years.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and pleasure to present a petition from several residents of North York, Toronto, Brantford and Port Dover who are concerned that the North American free trade agreement has resulted in even greater trade concessions being demanded of Canada so that Canadians will lose more jobs and there will now be further restrictions placed on the provincial, federal and territorial governments and even municipal governments from assisting Canadian industry, conserving natural resources and advancing our social programs.

Therefore, these petitioners call on this House to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have many thousands of signatures on petitions here to add to the over 1.5 million signatures that have been presented by all parties in the House. These petitioners feel that there are serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system.

They ask that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society.

• (1525)

They ask the government to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition, duly authorized under Standing Order 36, signed by people from the city of Regina and the community of Raymore, who point out that the proposed North American free trade agreement will erode Canada's ability to do many things and will also erode Canada's ability to maintain its level of employment.

They point out that if it is implemented, the trade agreement will result in further restrictions being placed on the ability of Canada's federal, provincial and territorial governments, now and in the future, to assist Canadian industry from using the natural advantages Canada has through its natural resources for Canada's own benefit. They ask that because the free trade agreement has to be implemented before January 1, 1994. They call upon the House of Commons to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement.

They also recommend that the free trade agreement with the United States be abrogated.

VIOLENCE AGAINST CHILDREN

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I have a petition of 150,000 names in my office being certified, but I have a petition of 600 names here. The petition is in memory of all children who have suffered at the hands of others.

We have formed this petition to stress our belief that the penalties in retrospect for child molesters and child murderers are far too lenient in this country. We strongly request that this petition be heard as a people's vote to reinstate capital punishment for child murderers and stiffen penalties for child molesters.

If we cannot protect our children from the people who commit these heinous crimes, then who will?

Therefore, your petitioners call upon Parliament to enact legislation against these types of offenders.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, it is my honour to present a group of petitions to add to some earlier ones that have been certified correct according to Standing Order 36.

These petitioners recognize that treaty rights entitle Indians to preserve their traditional way of life, including hunting, fishing and gathering, but express concern that completely unregulated hunting interferes with good conservation and sound wildlife management practices.

They ask that this government conclude an agreement with Canada's treaty Indians regarding sound wildlife management practices, including restrictions on native rights to hunt, fish and gather, to personal consumption needs and prohibiting the sale for profit of wildlife meat or parts obtained by treaty rights.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, Question No. 470 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 470—Mr. Proud:

With respect to the Department of External Affairs and International Trade, (a) how many trade missions does the Government of Canada have abroad (b) where are they located (c) what is the cost of running each one?

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Canada has 105 diplomatic missions abroad of which 103 undertake trade-related activities. Shown below is a list of those missions and the estimated costs apportioned to their trade program. The total of these estimated costs for the 103 missions is $86.5 million.

It should be noted that mission budgets integrate all the program costs associated with the conduct of political relations, public affairs, consular assistance, immigration and social affairs, and trade promotion. In calculating the costs of trade-related activities of a mission, the salary and benefits for Canada-based and locally-engaged trade officers have been added to a prorated share of the mission's over-all budget.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, would you please call Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers, Nos. P-23 and P-24, standing in the name of the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur.

Motion No P-23—Mr. Arseneault:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all financial statements compiled over the past five years relating to the operation of the Pointe-Verte post office located in New Brunswick.

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, the financial statements of a post office are data of a commercial nature which is deemed to be proprietary information by the Canada Post Corporation.

However, the present plan of the Corporation for the rural conversion program calls for an annual reduction of about $6.5 million in operating costs, based on some 200 to 250 conversions.

I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Since the hon. member who tabled this motion is not in the House, would the hon. parliamentary secretary agree to allow this motion to be transferred for debate?

Mr. Langlois: Yes, Madam Speaker, I agree. We could do the same in the case of Notice of Motion P-24.

Motion transferred for debate.

Motion No. P-24—Mr. Arseneault:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all documentation, notes, memoranda, reviews, and other relevant information concerning the decision of the Canada Post Corporation on the matter of the announced closure of the Pointe-Verte post office located in New Brunswick.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion is transferred for debate.

Motion transferred for debate.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Barbara McDougall (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-113, an act to provide for government expenditure restraint, be now read a third time and passed.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, thank you for giving me the opportunity to participate in the debate on third reading of Bill C-113, an act to provide for government expenditure restraint.

Since we took office in 1984, we on this side of the House have not ceased to wage a tough battle against the deficit by presenting a very long series of budgets and bills to put the public finances in order and reduce government spending.

Despite all these efforts, the battle is still far from won and the struggle must go on if we want to put Canada back on the road to prosperity. Nevertheless, positive results have been achieved in spite of the constant and vicious attacks from the opposition and the disinformation campaigns and bad behaviour of the opposition parties—the Liberals, New Democrats and the rest. These positive results tell us that we are definitely on the right track and going in the right direction.

Although referring to the historic and very costly errors of the government of Trudeau and Chrétien does nothing to solve the present situation, as the opposition loves to say—and I understand their reaction; they do not like to be reminded of those things and if I were in their place, I would do the same because I would be very embarrassed about it—the fact remains that to have a good idea of the progress made, we must have a good idea of where we started from.

Where did we start from, Madam Speaker? In 1984, the deficit was $38.5 billion, or 10.3 per cent of the gross domestic product. To what was that $38.5 billion deficit and that $200 billion debt left to us in 1984 due? It is worth refreshing our memory and delving a little into the past.

Let me quote some statements made at the time. I will quote something Pierre Trudeau said in the expenditure guidelines statement of August 13, 1969. Mr. Trudeau said that if we did nothing to slow the increase in spending we were headed for disaster. Do you know how much spending increased that year, Madam Speaker? Government spending rose 11.5 per cent.

I now come to 1970 and 1971. The same Pierre Trudeau, at the Liberal convention on November 20, 1970, said: "You know, it is easy to say, Why don't you do more, but the answer to that question is always the same: people expect a lot from the economy and these expectations are often competing and contradictory". At that time, government spending was rising at a rate of 12 per cent.

In 1971–72, Edgar Benson said, and I quote Hansard for June 18, 1971: "We have constantly urged government, business and labour in Canada to moderate their demands on the economy to levels that do not exceed the additional benefits of increased productivity". At the time, the rate of increase in government spending was 15.5 per cent.

In 1972–73, we read the following at page 2011 of Hansard of May 8, 1972, in a statement by the member for Vancouver Quadra: "The bare fact of the matter is that we cannot do everything at once. We simply don't have the resources. There are limits to the scope of fiscal policy. There are limits to stimulus and readjustment". In 1972–73, government spending increased by 15.6 per cent.

In 1974–75, we read at page 7183 of Hansard of July 2, 1975, and I quote the Leader of the Opposition: "We have decided that restraint is necessary. In order to exercise restraint, we had to cut back on planned expenditures". And, Madam Speaker, do you know that at the time, government spending increased by 28 per cent?

In 1975–76, again in a statement by the Leader of the Opposition we read at page 11059 of Hansard of February 18, 1976: "I have continued to state the government's intention to hold the growth of expenditures between 1974–75 and 1975–76 to 16 per cent or less. This has been done through the exercise of great restraint on new expenditures and through actual reductions in previously approved expenditures". Do you know how much government spending had increased at the time this statement was made? It had increased 20.1 per cent.

I will now move up to 1980–81. This is from a statement by Allan MacEachen in his budget speech on October 20, 1980 when he said that to reduce the deficit, it was necessary to introduce drastic spending restrictions. At the time government spending had increased by 16.5 per cent.

We will now move on to 1982–83. I am still quoting Mr. MacEachen, who said in his budget speech on June 28, 1982: "Some say the government should print more money. Others say it should let the deficit rip. But that would fail miserably. Inflation and unemployment would get worse. Interest rates would rise even more. Canada would price itself out of world markets. Recovery would be postponed". Did you know that at the time Mr. MacEachen made his speech government spending had increased by 19.8 per cent?

The result of all this is clear. From 1970 to 1984 the annual average increase in government spending was 15 per cent. The deficit as a percentage of GDP was allowed to rise to 8.6 per cent. What was the situation in 1984 when this government came to power? Interest rates of up to 22 per cent, an inflation rate of 12 per cent and an operating deficit of $16 billion was the situation under the Liberal government. This means we were borrowing to pay the groceries.

Someone said once: When I look at myself, I feel bad, but when I look at others, I feel better. I think those words are particularly apt today. What do we have now? In 1993 we have a deficit of $34.5 billion. In 1993 the average increase in government spending was reduced from 15 per cent to 4 per cent. The deficit as a percentage of GDP was reduced from 8 per cent under the Liberals to 5.2 per cent. In 1980 interest rates had soared to 22 per cent and in 1993 they have dropped to 6 per cent and 7 per cent.

In 1980, inflation was running at 12 per cent, while in 1993 it is down to about 2 per cent. We went from an operating deficit of $16 billion to a surplus of $6.5 billion. Not only do we not borrow a thing to feed ourselves but we produce a $6.5 billion surplus which allows us to absorb in part the cost of servicing the debt.

Our exports to the United States have increased thanks to our policies to a record $122.3 billion, a 13.5 per cent increase since 1991. This is important as we know that on an annual basis, for every additional $100,000 worth of products sold abroad, a new job is created. I could go on like this forever, but I only wanted to show very clearly that we are on the right track.

Basically, why can we now say we see the light at the end of the tunnel? Because the government faced up to its responsibilities, according to the mandate it received from the people and in spite of the vicious opposition from the New Democrats and the Liberals, and introduced legislation similar to Bill C-113 in order to bring public spending under control and to reduce it.

This has demonstrated to the world that Canada is still able to make the necessary decisions to put its finances in order and to live within its means.

The decisions we took had only one objective: to remedy an atrocious situation which in the long run would have jeopardized the future of this country, a situation which we inherited from the Trudeau-Chrétien era. But during all these years, during each and every debate we have had in this House on legislation aimed at controlling public spending, one fact has become very obvious, the disinformation coming from the opposition.

How many gloom and doom predictions, groundless exaggerations and vicious accusations are at the basis of the disinformation campaign carried on by the Liberal Party, the New Democratic Party and the Bloc Quebecois members? It must be said that these people have never hesitated to throw their support behind unions and pressure groups and to back their outrageous statements.

The debate on Bill C-113 is just another powerful example of that, as was the one on Bill C-21, drug patents, free trade between Canada and the United States and so many other instances. But in the specific case of Bill C-113, we heard a wide range of questionable statements of which the intellectual honesty was very doubtful.

What about the action of the Fédération des travailleurs et travailleuses du Québec, the FTQ? First, it caught the attention of the population by organizing a demonstration in the offices of Quebec members and even vandalizing some of them. However, later on it did not even appear before the legislative committee to present its arguments after having confirmed it would do so. No excuses. No explanations. The federation simply did not come.

It is very easy to make all kinds of idle statements during public demonstrations but when it is time to testify before a House committee, to state one's case before a legislative committee, to ship out without notifying anyone, without giving any explanation or excuse. I find such an attitude rather reprehensible. During all that time and since then, these people have instigated demonstrations once again using misinformation. Who in this House would agree with such totally unacceptable actions? The member for Timmins—Chapleau.

In the bill it is said that we will freeze UI benefits by decreasing the rate from 60 to 57 per cent for a two-year period. In the conclusion of the brief it presented to the legislative committee, why did the Confederation of National Trade Unions omit to mention that this measure will apply for a two-year period? Did it forget or was it deliberate? The CNTU also stated in the same document, and I quote:

Bill C-113 retains the absolute disqualification from benefits for people who have quit their jobs or been fired.

Why did it not specify, as the bill does, that the disqualification applies to those who have quit their jobs without cause or have been fired for misconduct? It is a major piece of information to omit and it alters radically the purpose of the bill. Yet the CNTU did not hesitate one second to convey this totally biased and false information. This is one more example of the kind of disinformation used by Bill C-113 detractors to discredit the government.

Let me give this example where they say that Canada is adjusting its social programs, the unemployment insurance program in particular, to the U.S. programs because of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. We have no free trade agreement with France; still the benefit rate is 59 per cent over there and those who quit their jobs without cause are not entitled to any benefits. This in a country that has been run by a socialist government for years.

We have no free trade agreement with Japan. Nevertheless, in Japan benefits are paid at the rate of 48 per cent, not for one year but for six months.

We have no free trade agreement with England. Nevertheless, the benefit rate paid in England is 16 per cent. We have no free trade agreement with Italy and yet the benefit rate paid in Italy is 15 per cent.

Sweden is another country that the socialists constantly quote as an example. Go and see what is going on in Sweden. Let them go and see what is going on in Sweden. Decisions have to be made there too to control the system and cut costs.

As the Prime Minister said even with Bill C-113 our unemployment insurance program remains one of the most generous in all of the G-7 industrialized countries.

An hon. member: One of the most generous, really?

Mr. Robitaille: Yes, one of the most generous. Germany does give a few percentage points more than we do.

Long-standing opponents of free trade making this kind of connection between free trade and this bill is yet another striking example of disinformation.

Let me give you this example of a statement made by one of those who oppose this bill and certain hon. members of this House. I am quoting from the brief given by Mr. Paquette, of the CNTU, before the legislative committee:

> A person may have worked for the same employer throughout his entire life, and if he then quits his job and takes another job for 15 weeks, he would be disqualified from receiving benefits if he were required to have had 16 weeks of insurable employment. With Bill C-113, all the weeks of insurable employment in the first job would not count, even though premiums had been collected during this time.

Such allegations have been presented as the unquestionable truth to the workers in Quebec and Canada. The most telling however is the reply Mr. Paquette, the CNTU spokesperson, gave the legislative committee when asked what section of Bill C-113 he is referring to when making such an allegation. Here is what he said, and I quote:

> This is an interpretation we discussed with Mouvement action-chômage, amongst others.

It gets better. I am still quoting from Mr. Paquette's testimony:

> We consulted some Employment and Immigration employees. They have told us that our interpretation will be corrected by regulations.

On the basis of an interpretation, their interpretation of the proposed section 30.(1), and in spite of having been provided with ample information in their discussions with department officials, they did not hesitate one second to spread information they knew to be completely unfounded. Once again this is a clear case of disinformation for political purposes. The trouble is they did not even think for one minute about all the uncertainty they created among Canadian workers, some of whom are members of the CNTU who pay their union dues and should expect a more professional approach from their union executives.

What about the testimony of Mr. Hayes and Ms. Nancy Riche from the Canadian Labour Congress who said, and I quote Ms. Riche: "Approximately 20,000 penalties have been reversed. That is to say, if they were given an eight-week penalty, it was changed to four weeks or three weeks or two weeks or zero. For 20,000, whatever penalty they had been given was reversed altogether".

In fact, according to the official data from Employment and Immigration Canada, the situation is quite different. Employment and Immigration Canada is telling us that in 1992, 36,003 initial decisions were appealed to what is commonly known as the Unemployment Insurance Arbitration Tribunal. Out of these 36,003 appealed decisions, 26,700 were upheld and 8,800 reversed, a far cry from the 20,000 figure quoted by Ms. Riche.

Where did Ms. Riche, executive vice-president of the Canadian Labour Congress, and Mr. Hayes, senior economist in the same organisation, get their figures? On what official data did they rely to say such a thing publicly in front of a legislative committee of the House? Here is the answer of Ms. Riche and her colleague, Mr. Hayes, and I quote him: "The figures we got initially were over the phone". These people testified on the basis of telephone calls, just like that. This was not very professional and it was one more example of the kind of disinformation they used on the Canadian public. It is shameful.

What about the evidence we heard from Mrs. Suzan Giampietri, vice-president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, and her colleague, Mr. Cres Pascucci, national president of the Canada Employment and Immigration Union, who said assessments made by departmental employees, who happen to be members of their own unions, were more like guesstimates, hence questioning the professionalism of their members who work for that department and prepared the administrative data officially provided to all members of the committee.

Those who questioned the work done and the data provided showed a total lack of respect for the employees of Employment and Immigration Canada. Another fine example of how to knowingly misinform the public.

I have many more examples describing the disinformation campaign aimed at the Canadian population and orchestrated by several union leaders for political purposes, obviously in collusion with members from the NDP, the Liberal Party and the Bloc Quebecois.

Not surprisingly, things got very tense at times and the people responsible for that situation should be ashamed of what they did with full knowledge of the facts.

What exactly is Bill C-113? In reality it is an act to provide for government expenditure restraint following the economic statement made by the Minister of Finance on December 2. This legislation has become necessary in order to restrain the country's deficit and control the deficit in the unemployment insurance fund which is threatening our UI system.

Under this bill, salaries of public servants, members of Parliament, cabinet ministers, judges, the Prime Minister, senators and the Governor General will be frozen for two years; in fact salaries of members of Parliament will be frozen not for two, but for three years. Also, unemployment insurance benefits will be frozen for two years because of a decrease in the UI benefit rate from 60 percent to 57 percent. And I do mean for two years, because opponents and the opposition regularly forget to mention it.

In addition, the bill provides that from now on, anyone who quits a job without just cause or reason, as well as anyone who is dismissed for misconduct, will not be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits.

It is unacceptable for all workers in Canada who contribute to the UI fund to pay for the decision freely taken by an individual to leave his or her job without valid reason or provocation. It is a matter of fairness.

Just because we pay fire or accident insurance premiums does not mean that we will automatically collect if we are responsible for the fire. It must be the same for unemployment insurance, which is and must remain a safety net so that those who lose their jobs can receive support until they find other work.

It is important to mention that there was another way to limit the deficit in the UI fund, namely to increase the premiums of all workers and all employers in Canada by 10 per cent, 20 per cent, 30 per cent or 40 per cent. The government rejected this option knowing that it would adversely affect the economic recovery. A 20-cent increase in UI premiums would cost 30,000 people their jobs in 1993 and 60,000 in 1994. We cannot afford to endanger a recovery that is already well under way.

The bill also increases the number of valid reasons for leaving a job from 5 to 13 and recognizes over 40 situations in which a person can quit and still be eligible for UI benefits.

It is to be expected that the opposition would try to downplay this given their highly partisan objectives. Nevertheless, these reasons for quitting are in the legislation. There is no getting around them and they are a further guarantee for future claimants.

The bill also provides for private hearings and the possibility for a victim of sexual or other harassment to testify without the person who harassed him or her being present. This will help create a better environment for putting a victim at ease and thus encourage the reporting of these unacceptable acts.

It is surprising that the member for Timmins—Chapleau tabled an amendment at report stage that would not allow hearing the testimony of a harasser unless the victim was present.

I think that our bill allows the chairperson of the Unemployment Insurance Arbitration Tribunal, in hearing testimony from the victim or the harasser, not to expose the victim to the harasser's testimony, since the person has already suffered harassment.

The bill also imposes a more objective process for deciding on eligibility, requiring officers of Employment and Immigration Canada to obtain and consider the employee's and employer's versions in rendering a decision.

The commitments made by the minister, Mr. Valcourt, on training programs for the personnel of Employment and Immigration Canada who have to deal with cases of sexual harassment must not be minimized either.

• (1600)

Consider the following breakdown of staff at Employment and Immigration Canada: 85 per cent of front-line officers are women; 71 per cent of tier two officers are women; 63 per cent of claimant services officers are women; 87 per cent of reception and information clerks are women; 64 per cent of supervisors in Canada Employment Centres are women. Together with the training these women have received, this is one more guarantee for individuals who have suffered sexual or other harassment that they can expect to be treated fairly, to the extent that the circumstances of this harassment are recognized as a valid reason for quitting and for receiving unemployment insurance benefits.

Canadians are constantly asking us to put our financial house in order. They no longer want us to mortgage the future of our children and subsequent generations. The government has made a firm commitment in this respect and we intend to meet that commitment.

Canadians also want us to make manpower training and retraining one of our priorities. The unemployed want more than just an unemployment insurance cheque when they lose their job. They want to be given a reasonable chance to get back into the labour market. Thanks to this bill and our previous legislation we will be in a better position to meet their expectations because amounts spent on training will be increased to nearly $3.5 billion annually. This is an important point.

I have seen a lot of people in my riding lose their jobs. They do not want an unemployment insurance cheque. They want to find another job but often must face the fact they lack training and skills. They are willing to take the time and make the effort to acquire those skills provided we give them the tools to help them do what it takes to re-enter the labour market as quickly and effectively as possible. That is one of the positive aspects of our unemployment insurance policy.

Canadians will no longer let their future and the prosperity of Canada be jeopardized. They no longer want the interests of Canadians to be subordinated to partisan considerations, something the opposition has failed to understand, which is why it will remain the opposition for a long time.

Since I have some time left, perhaps I will quote the list of reasons that constitute just cause for quitting one's job: sexual or other harassment, you can quit your job and receive unemployment insurance benefits; obligation to accompany a spouse or dependent child to another residence; discrimination on a prohibited ground of discrimination within the meaning of the Canadian Human Rights Act—another just cause for voluntary quitting; working conditions that constitute a danger to health or safety, just cause; obligation to care for a child or member of the immediate family, just cause.

The following reasons were added to the existing eight: reasonable assurance of another employment in the immediate future, just cause; significant changes to the terms and conditions respecting wages or salary, just cause; excessive overtime work or refusal to pay for overtime work—the employer is at fault and the employee refuses to tolerate the situation—just cause; significant changes in work duties, a reason recognized as just cause; antagonistic relations between an employee and a supervisor for which the employee is not primarily responsible, a reason recognized as just cause in case of voluntary quitting; practices of an employer that are contrary to law, just cause; discrimination with regard to employment because of membership in any association, organization or union of workers, a reason recognized as just cause in case of voluntary quitting; undue pressure by an employer on employees to leave their employment, just cause; such other reasonable circumstances as are prescribed. That is the thirteenth reason, the one that allows us, on the basis of current and future jurisprudence, to identify new, valid reasons without having to go back to Parliament and introduce new legislation.

Employment and Immigration Canada will be able to adopt regulations relating to the concept of just cause for voluntary quitting to maximize fairness to claimants.

The benefit of the doubt is a genuine consideration and Employment and Immigration Canada will give claimants the benefit of the doubt. Usually the people who make the decisions are able to draw sensible conclusions from circumstances, evidence and other relevant factors in favour of one of the parties. Considering that we have a system that has been in existence for 40 years and considering the experience of the people who work at Employment and Immigration Canada, I think there can be no doubt about their competence in this respect.

Claimants will be given the benefit of the doubt in cases when contradictory or equivalent evidence is submitted and, as a result, the evidence does not support one party rather than the other. In such case the benefit of the doubt will go to the claimant. In other words, the decision will be in the claimant's favour. This means that when the unemployment insurance officer, as prescribed by law, receives the employee's and employer's version of the facts and is unable to make a decision on the basis of these statements, the benefit of the doubt will go to the claimant.

In conlusion, I must say that Bill C-113 and all similar bills are never a matter of rejoicing for the government. However, with a debt of $400 billion, a deficit of $34.5 billion and an anticipated deficit of $8.5 billion in the unemployment insurance account we must act now, the government must make certain decisions and act responsibly, which is what Canadians want us to do. That is what this government is doing and has done since it came into office. That is what we will keep on doing as long as we have a mandate from the people of this country. I am sure Canadians will appreciate our responsible attitude and our sense of fairness, all of which is in the best interests of the people of this country.

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Madam Speaker, Bill C-113, the bill we are discussing today, arrives at the third reading stage after an exceptionally rocky ride.

We all remember the angry reactions of Canadians when they first heard of these changes in the government's economic statement last year. We all remember the protesters who invaded the riding offices of government members from Quebec and threw the furniture from those offices into the street. Despite this anger the government has demonstrated insensitivity and arrogance in its attempt to sell these changes to Canadians.

Who can forget the employment minister saying that it was time the government had—I will not use the words that he used because they are unparliamentary—to face facts and get tough with people who quit their jobs to freeload off the UI system? There was also a suggestion that UI recipients should be proud to sacrifice some of their benefits in order to help control the deficit. Who will ever forget such ludicrous ideas as the 1-800 UI snitch hotline, the UI police squad or the claim that the February 7 demonstration in Montreal was a separatist set-up?

The government paid for its incompetent handling of this issue. The former deputy minister of employment and immigration was demoted and transferred to the Department of Supply and Services. The government had to deal with a revolt in its Quebec caucus. Finally, the minister backed down and introduced a new bill, Bill C-113, in an effort to disguise the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act that attracted so much scorn across the country.

Of course Bill C-113 fooled some people. It fooled all but two of those Conservative members who have spoken out against Bill C-105. Those two remaining hold-outs eventually voted with their constituents instead of voting with their party.

However, Bill C-113 did not fool the people of Canada. The opposition to the new bill has been just as widespread and just as angry as that which confronted the government's first bill.

When the legislative committee on Bill C-113 started holding hearings, hundreds of groups and individuals opposed to the bill requested the opportunity to make a presentation to the committee. The opposition to Bill C-113 shows no sign of diminishing. I still receive letters and faxes from opponents of the bill who wish to present a brief to the legislative committee. I have petitions here with signatures of more than 5,000 Canadians who want this bill withdrawn.

The popular opposition to Bill C-113 was evident two weeks ago in Toronto when 3,000 angry demonstrators marched through the streets of the city protesting these changes.

What I am simply outlining here is the fact that the government has become extremely distant from the people of this country. That opposition was evident last week in Montreal when opponents of this proposed legislation broke down two doors at the Queen Elizabeth hotel where the Minister of Finance was scheduled to make a speech. Those protesters had to be restrained by the police. This is the type of anger that is being vented against this bill, which is extremely unfair and unjust to Canadians.

Bill C-113 is the cause of such anger. The changes to the UI act contained in this bill are absolute, arbitrary and unfair. They are going to cause pain for some Canadians and they are going to push some into desperate situations.

The employment minister and the Minister of Finance do not seem willing to accept this. They do not seem to believe that the changes they are proposing are going to cause economic suffering. It is easy for them to deny it since they do not come into daily contact with unemployed Canadians.

However, the civil servants who work in Canada Employment Centres know better. Many of them understand that this bill is just not right. They fear for their lives and are worried about how some UI claimants might react when they learn that they are not eligible for benefits. The government has acknowledged that the potential for violent reactions in CECs as a result of these changes is a possibility. At the legislative committee the deputy minister admitted that his department is going to be improving security at CECs.

If this bill is so fair and just and if these changes are needed and are morally, socially and economically acceptable, then why would Canadians, perhaps the most tolerant people on earth, react in the manner in which they have?

Already the threat of violence hangs in the air. Last week in Montreal a CEC had to be evacuated after it received a bomb threat. It turns out that there was a bomb but the detonator was defective. As a representative of the employees stated: "They were able to evacuate this time but next time, who knows?"

The people who work in CECs, who live that reality every day, have taken matters into their own hands. This week they started distributing a booklet entitled "For a Just Cause" that is designed to help UI claimants get around the obstacles that this government is throwing in their way.

Naturally the government is cracking down on the distribution of this booklet thereby contributing to the atmosphere of distrust and resentment which surrounds Bill C-113.

Why has this happened? How did the relationship between the government and the people of Canada deteriorate to the point where we have to seriously consider beefing up security in government offices?

Reaction has been so strong because the changes to the unemployment insurance program contained in Bill C-113 threaten every Canadian who has a job.

By reducing the benefit rate from 60 per cent to 57 per cent of insurable earnings, the government is going to be taking money out of the pockets of some families. It may only be $80 a month, but for some households that represents the hydro and phone bills or a weekly order of groceries. For the vast majority of Canadians who live pay cheque to pay cheque, losing an extra $80 a month can be a major set-back.

Bill C-113 will also deny benefits to people who leave their jobs without a government-defined just cause or who were said to have been fired for misconduct. It is the frightening possibility of total disqualification which has provoked the most resistance. This measure contains an implicit threat. It says to Canadians in a difficult or unfair work position: "You had better be able to take it, because if you quit or if your boss fires you, you are going to have to prove you deserve unemployment insurance and that can take a long time".

Bill C-113 contains a reverse onus. Instead of assuming that all unemployed Canadians deserve the support of UI, it assumes that only those who can prove they were wronged deserve it. In a sense, UI claimants will be guilty until proven innocent.

We have heard the example of women who are victims of sexual harassment in the work place. While I am glad the employment officers who hear such cases will be instructed to give such women the benefit of the doubt when they apply for UI, I am nonetheless worried that some women are going to fall through the cracks.

Sometimes the deck can be stacked against employees in these situations. It can be extremely difficult to prove sexual harassment. It can occur without witnesses being present and the guilty party can sometimes marshal other employees to contradict the testimony of the victim. Clearly the benefit of the doubt is not sufficient protection.

People are fired and forced to quit for other reasons than sexual harassment. Take the example of a member of a given minority group. If he is the victim of racial or religious discrimination in the work place he may have no recourse but to quit. If he complains too loudly, he risks being fired or forced to quit. Of course his boss will give another reason for his dismissal. Consequently that person may have serious difficulty proving he was not fired for misconduct but was the victim of discrimination.

The government may dismiss these hypothetical examples, but I am certain the members opposite have heard from their constituents and know just as well as we do that people are going to suffer economically as a result of these changes.

I was recently given a copy of a letter one of my colleagues received from a constituent. The letter was addressed to the minister of employment with a copy to my colleague. The letter was from an expectant mother who was distressed to learn that UI benefits she will receive during maternity leave are also going to be reduced from 60 per cent to 57 per cent. This woman spoke of the difficulty this will cause. She mentioned innumerable expenses such as diapers, clothes, baby food and others that arise with the arrival of a baby. She said something that really touched me. Addressing the minister of employment she said: "Maybe you think 3 per cent is small but let me tell you that most people do not have an expense account and our end of month is not as rich as yours". She is right, of course.

As I have said before, in the real world people have to fight to make ends meet. In the real world people fall through the cracks of the UI system. Despite a civil servant's best intentions, a person who deserves UI sometimes fails to prove his or her eligibility.

I have a very interesting example here. The claimant was a pipe fitter who was called out by his union hiring hall for a short-term job. The claimant always took jobs when he was called out by his union even though in this case the rate of pay was approximately $6 an hour less than his normal rate. The man travelled to where the job was. He found a place to live and worked for one day. He approached his new employer for an advance in order to pay for his lodgings. He was told that the employer did not follow the standard industry practice and would not pay the advance. The claimant advised his union which after discussing the situation with the employer, told the man no advance would be paid. As the claimant had no credit cards or money he was forced to quit and return home.

The commission decided this was a case of voluntary quitting and disqualified the man for 12 weeks. That decision was upheld by the board of referees. The man took his case to the umpire who reversed the decision and restored the benefits he had lost. It took 22 months before this man's benefits were restored by the umpire.

Under Bill C-113 he would not receive any benefits whatsoever until after the umpire's decision. Where is the justice in that? Is it any wonder that people are opposed to Bill C-113 if the changes it contains are going to mean that some people have to wait two years to get their benefits?

Why does the government persevere with a bill that is obviously going to create so much inequity and economic hardship? The government, especially the Minister of Employment and Immigration is sending out confused signals about why the country needs this bill.

On the one hand the minister says the bill is designed to merely help the government control its costs. As he said before the legislative committee: "I have always said this is not UI reform, this is a fiscal measure". However, in the next breath the minister seems to contradict himself and says: "There is a fiscal thing but there is also something else here. There is an incentive in the act, an incentive for workers to say well I am going to put in my 10 weeks and then I am going to go and sit at home and do nothing and I am going to get my neighbour to pay for me. The incentive is there".

That is what the minister believes. Sometimes Bill C-113 is a fiscal measure. Sometimes it is a remedy to the perceived problem of free-loaders in the UI system. I would like to address both points and show how the bill fails on both counts and then comment briefly on how the Minister of Employment and Immigration has allowed his personal bias to colour this debate.

First, there is the issue of Bill C-113's deficit-fighting mission. Before looking at what the changes in the bill are supposed to accomplish, I think it would be useful to put them in context by looking at the present state of the UI fund.

In 1990 the government decided that general revenues would no longer contribute to the UI fund. Since that time the fund has been financed solely by UI premiums paid by employees and employers. These premiums have been raised twice since 1990: first by 24 per cent in July 1991 and then by 7.1 per cent in January 1992. Revenues collected from these premiums totalled $17.9 billion in 1992-93.

Despite such revenues the cost of the program has climbed $7 billion since 1990 due in large part to an unemployment rate which went from 8.1 per cent in 1990 to 10.3 per cent in 1991 and to 11.3 per cent in 1992.

Because of steadily rising UI costs, the UI fund is in a deficit position. The cumulative deficit is presently $4.7 billion. The government expects that cutting the benefit rate from 60 per cent to 57 per cent and eliminating UI benefits for voluntary leavers and those who are fired from their jobs will save a total of $2.45 billion over two years.

Normally one might expect that if the government hopes to save such a large amount of money the sum will reduce or at least contain the deficit in the UI fund. Unfortunately that is not the case with these changes, even though the government is going to inflict economic hardship on millions of Canadians with these UI changes. The deficit in the UI fund is expected to rise to $7.6 billion by the end of 1993 from $4.7 billion at present. It is clear, therefore, that from a deficit-fighting standpoint the changes in Bill C-113 are a failure.

I am not saying, as some have suggested, $2.45 billion is a negligible amount. It is not. What I am saying is that if the government is willing to introduce measures which are going to hurt millions of Canadians, then it owes it to Canadians to make sure those measures accomplish what they were designed to accomplish.

If the deficit in the UI fund is going to continue to sky-rocket despite these changes, then it is right to say that the government has failed.

There is also the question of the bill's social engineering side. It is supposed to cure all the free-loaders who now live off the system of their dependency on hand-outs, to use one of the minister's expressions. The minister is quite insistent on the importance of hunting down these people who he says are hurting the system. He is convinced that this is a serious problem, but numbers from his own department seem to indicate otherwise.

During the legislative committee's study of this bill we were given a briefing by officials from the Department of Employment and Immigration. In their presentation one chart in particular stood out. It is entitled "The Pattern of Job Separation and the UI Program, 1991". At the top of the chart is a large rectangle representing total job separation. In 1991, 6.9 million Canadians left jobs for one reason or another. Below that first large rectangle is a smaller one called "Used to Establish UI Claim". There were 3.6 million UI claims in 1991.

The next rectangle represents UI claims for that year: three million. When that figure is broken down we are given two smaller rectangles. One represents people who applied for UI who did not quit their jobs. In 1991 there were 2.35 million who made claims under those circumstances.

People who did quit their jobs totalled 650,000. That number is broken down even further. Of the 650,000 Canadians who made UI claims after quitting their jobs, 460,000 were found to have quit their jobs with good reason. The total number of people who quit their jobs without good reason was 190,000 out of a total of three million, a mere sliver on the departmental chart.

While I agree that even 190,000 free-loaders, if they are free-loaders, are 190,000 too many, I would suggest to the minister, to the government and to Canadians watching today that this is not the problem the government is making it out to be. The problem is termination and lay-offs not voluntary quitters. The Conservative economic agenda has been the failure and as a result we must pay as a society with the economic hardships that Bill C-113 will create.

I know that the minister of employment disagrees vehemently with what I have just said. It has become clear in this debate that he views social programs and their important function in a completely different way than most Canadians. While most people think of the social safety net as something that catches us and saves us when we fall off the high wire of life the minister has referred to it as a fishing net that traps those in the net in a cycle of dependency.

When he appeared before the legislative committee on Bill C-113 the minister of employment told us an anecdote about people in his riding who work in a sawmill and would quit to go hunting. These people coerced the mill owner to write false records of employment because they knew that he needed them more than they needed him. The minister's disgust and frustration with these people was apparent.

It is clear that those are the kinds of people who fuel his pursuit against voluntary quitters, people who laugh at the system because they know that when push comes to shove they can survive in the underground economy selling firewood, working under the table, or living off what they hunt during the winter. That is not the reality of most Canadians. Most people are completely dependent on their salaries, and if they lose their job it is not a question of making a slight adjustment in life-style, they are completely devastated.

The minister is indifferent to that larger reality. All he sees is those people who thumb their noses at the system, and it makes his blood boil. Later in his presentation to the legislative committee the minister made a very revealing admission. We were talking about how these changes really just tinkered with the system, tinkered on the sidelines. The minister admitted that it is just tinkering. Then he said that if it were only him, and he stopped for a second as if catching himself, and then went on to say it would be much more comprehensive UI reform that would be undertaken because we need it.

It is a shame that the minister held back because I would have been interested in knowing what he would like to do with the UI program. I have often urged this government to present a plan to Canadians because we desperately need a vision to lead us into the next century.

I think that as a society we must re-evaluate old beliefs and find new ways to cope with the new reality. We see that the debt and the deficit are beginning to interest Canadians and I think this is a very positive development.

I am anxious to see how the government tries to explain its lackluster performance in these two areas and possibly the UI system is another area which deserves to be re-examined.

The minister seems to believe so, even though he hesitates about what changes he might like to make.

I say to the minister that if he has a plan for comprehensive UI reform, then he should present it to the House because the bill now before this House is a dismal failure. If the UI act needs to be reformed, then that is a debate which should take place immediately. Canadians need help in preparing for the new world economy and if UI reform is to be part of that help then let the government put a reform proposal before the Canadian people so they can judge whether or not the proposal is worth while.

Bill C-113 certainly does not fit the bill. The minister has admitted that this bill is only tinkering and that amateurism shows. Bill C-113 does not address the problems of the 1.5 million unemployed Canadians. It does not address the sad state of the 2.2 million Canadians on welfare. It does not address the skills shortage that keeps so many Canadians from being able to fill the hundreds of thousands of good jobs available in this country.

I said earlier that among the three million new UI claims that were filed in 1991, 2,350,000 were filed by people who did not quit their jobs. Instead of voluntary quitters, the minister should focus on these people. Instead of cutting benefits, the government should be helping Canadians get back to work.

As I have said before, for each one percentage point drop in the unemployment rate, the UI fund deficit drops by close to $2 billion. If the government would attack unemployment as single-mindedly as it fought inflation and managed to get the unemployment rate to the 1990 level of 8.1 per cent, it would cut $4 billion from the UI fund deficit. The government has consistently shown that it is unwilling to take on the problem of unemployment. It is for that reason that we now find ourselves with a $4.7 billion deficit in the fund.

In closing I would like to underline a few important points regarding this piece of legislation. Yesterday the member for Athabasca got up and addressed the House in the debate during report stage on this bill. The member spoke a lot about fairness and I agree with him that the question of fairness plays a very large role in this debate.

Although I look at it from the opposite perspective, the changes to the UI act contained in Bill C-113 are unfair. Of course many things in life are unfair and we have to adapt as best we can but I think it is fundamentally wrong for a government to introduce legislation that it knows will hurt people.

The minister says that the bill is necessary in order to stop the abuse of the system. I have already indicated that the so-called abuse by voluntary quitters is relatively minor but something that is equally important to remember is that safeguards already exist to limit the number of free-loaders who abuse the system.

The minister may enjoy talking about all the UI free-loaders enjoying Florida. In reality a person must be available for work in order to collect UI. You cannot just sit around at home watching TV all day if there is work available. That is a myth.

More important, there now exists a penalty period of seven to twelve weeks which officers who handle UI claims can give to people who either quit without just cause or are fired for misconduct. The legislative committee on Bill C-113 was told that the average penalty is 8.5 weeks. The EIC official said and I quote: "A very small percentage get the full 12 weeks". It is clear that abuse is not really the problem. What does that mean? If voluntary quitters were the problem, as the minister suggests they are, would not more people get the full 12-week penalty? Of course they would.

I asked the EIC official why go to a total exclusion, as in Bill C-113, if the full 12-week penalty is seldom given? Her answer was: "The decision was made on the basis of financial reasons". It was not abuse, it was merely a political choice that this government made. That is heartless. The government needs to save money, so instead of cancelling or scaling back a $5.8 billion helicopter package it is going to exclude needy people from the UI system.

An hon. member: Well said.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Canadians will not forget such inequities. A solid majority oppose the changes in Bill C-113 because they understand that the bill will affect everyone. The anger and the bitterness that has resulted from this bill are sad testimony to this government's ability in the dying days of its mandate. At a time when everyone, business, labour, government and individual Canadians, should be working together to design a new society, the government is pitting Canadians against each other in a new class struggle. Canadians deserve better.

The government owes it to the people to withdraw this bill and go back to the drawing board. If we need UI reform then let the government offer Canadians an honest reform package. I know, and deep down everyone here knows, that Bill C-113 will do much more harm than good. For this reason, and for the reasons I have outlined today, I strongly and sincerely hope that all members will defeat this bill.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak to Bill C-113. I regret that the member who is the unemployment critic of my caucus was unable to speak because he had to go to his riding for his nomination. We had asked the government to co-operate and delay the vote until tomorrow but that was not possible.

I am rising in his place and I wanted to begin my remarks about Bill C-113 by saying that it is interesting that not every employer in this country applauds the government's position in introducing this legislation. I would like to refer to The Ottawa Citizen of Wednesday, January 22, 1992. That is over a year ago.

Matthew Barrett, the chairman and chief executive officer of the Bank of Montreal gave a speech at his firm's annual general meeting. In his speech he said: "There is a dark side to an economy in transition. Building a new economy will be a painful process for many Canadians. Most of that pain will be borne by the thousands of Canadians whose jobs disappear. We now have 1.5 million unemployed. That is a human tragedy of enormous proportions. It brings grief and division to the jobless and their families, and it is unjust. A blameless minority are paying the cost of a restructuring that will ultimately benefit all Canadians".

He went on to say: "We cannot treat the unemployed as the cannon fodder in our economic battles. That would be callous and it would also be wasteful since every unemployed Canadian is an unrealized asset".

What did the government do subsequent to January 1992? It immediately set out to use the unemployed as cannon fodder for the failed Tory and Liberal policies.

A number of people asked me when I was home in my riding whether Bill C-113 is really as bad as I am saying it is. I sat down with them and talked to them about what is in this bill, and we have heard that discussed in this House today.

Anti-poverty groups are saying that Bill C-113 will drive more Canadians below the poverty line, and it is just magic that at the same time the hon. member for Don Valley North, who is the chair of the poverty subcommittee, wants to lower the poverty line in this country.

Bill C-113 further erodes Canadian labour standards, that is from the unions in Canada. Bill C-113 will increase discrimination, that is from human rights groups in this country. Bill C-113 will allow more employers to get away with sexual harassment, that is from women's groups in this country.

Bill C-113 passes the social programs back to the provinces, that is from provincial governments. Bill C-113 will increase the cost of transporting grain and hurt Canadian farmers, that is from farming groups. Bill C-113 threatens occupational health and safety, that is from a number of health and safety committees. Bill C-113 wipes out free collective bargaining for federal workers, that is from public sector workers in the federal government.

In response to those who have asked me about Bill C-113 I have tried to point out that if there was no danger for Canadian workers in Bill C-113 there would not have been protests across this country. There would not have been 50,000, 40,000, or however many thousand, people on a bitterly cold sub-Arctic day in Montreal demonstrating their disapproval of this legislation to this government.

We got back into the House of Commons and this government withdrew Bill C-105, rewrote it and introduced it as Bill C-113. Aside from some cosmetic changes in the UI section, adding to the just cause list, providing more privacy for victims of sexual abuse and a clause for evidence for fired claimants, the bill is still the same.

Public Service wages are still frozen in total disregard to due process of collective bargaining. Grain transportation costs still go up at a time when most farmers are already struggling. Bill C-113 actually adds in the Atlantic Freight Assistance Act.

UI benefits are still reduced from 60 to 57 per cent of former income. People who are fired for misconduct or who quit without just cause still will be totally cut off from UI benefits.

The bill is overkill on a problem that is more perceived than real. The government has turned the safety net of UI into a drift-net that will gather up thousands of innocent victims of economic policies that have been perpetrated by this government and the Liberal government before it. It will gather them in along with a few abusers. Every Canadian who is required to quit his or her job and every person who is fired becomes the victim of this bill and has to prove to the government that he or she should be eligible for unemployment insurance.

The government will argue that it will be saving money by introducing this bill. Judy Rebick says that by the government's own figures it is going to save $900 million through the cut in voluntary quits and firings. Of that, $400 million will go to businesses for the government to pay their premiums for new hires. We are now talking about $500 million, and out of the $500 million—I know a little bit about security, of what new security systems cost in every UI office—we could estimate that we are talking about several million—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, I have to interrupt the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam. She will have the time remaining for her speech as soon as the Speaker has addressed the House.

POINT OF ORDER

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Speaker: First of all, I thank the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam for her courtesy in allowing me to interrupt her on a matter which I wish I did not have to address but which I do.

Earlier today I made a remark with respect to an exchange that was taking place in the House, a remark which I was wrong in making, in which I asked the question whether or not the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Yukon, was supporting the position of our colleague who was involved in the dispute.

I want to say to my colleague, the hon. member for Yukon and the leader of the New Democratic Party, that I was absolutely wrong in saying that. I knew I was wrong as soon as I said it. That is why I did not say anything further about it.

I hope my colleague will accept my apologies and I hope her colleagues will accept my apology. I am conscious of the statement made in the Chamber by our colleague and long-time friend of mine, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona. I hope he will feel that this apology is adequate and satisfactory.

I sometimes have to ask members to apologize and it is probably fitting that once in a while a Speaker has to do the same thing.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank you very much for that. Of course I accept your words and your apology.

I think all of us understand that from time to time there are things we might change in what we have said, but I think it is with great honour to your office that you have on this occasion clarified the record. I appreciate it very much and I thank you.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will be resuming debate. There are 13 minutes left for the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-113, an act to provide for government expenditure restraint, be read the third time and passed.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I was in the process of quoting remarks made by Judy Rebick from the NAC in appearing before the committee on Bill C-113. I was outlining the costs she saw under this bill: "There will be an additional 200 appeal workers and estimates are that it will be more than that because of the increase that happened when the penalties were placed. There was a huge increase in appeals, from a few a week to constant every day appeals. We are now going to have even more under this new legislation because people are being thrown off UI altogether.

How much money is really being saved? Very little. We do not believe this is a deficit reduction, member. We believe it is a political attack on unemployed people, on women and an attempt to bring our UI system into harmony with the American UI system".

I would like to introduce something into my remarks and read it into the record for the benefit of those unemployment help centres across the country that are advocacy centres and for those who just might be watching and want to know what their rights are under this bill. I would like to read into the record a few instructions that are proposed in a booklet called "For a Just Cause". It is a UI handbook produced for workers by workers. It is printed by the Public Service Alliance of Canada and it is from UI workers whose wages, I might add, were frozen at zero for the next two years by this bill.

Those UI workers are very concerned about what the impact of this bill is going to be on those Canadians who are facing unemployment. In particular, I want to address my remarks to the just cause for quitting a job section and being fired for cause.

The question in the booklet is: "What are just causes for quitting a job?" The response, and I again point out this is from unemployment insurance workers who are the front line workers: "Just cause is defined in the UI act as having no reasonable alternative to immediately leaving the employment. You will not be disqualified from UI benefits if you have just cause for quitting your job: you quit because of a hostile attitude toward you created by your employer or supervisor; you quit because your employer is breaking the law, for example, you were not being paid and you reported the employer to the provincial or territorial authorities; you quit because your employer is harassing you for your union activities; you quit because your boss forced you to quit or be fired, forced early retirement or buy-out package.

Just cause is not limited to these reasons. For example, just cause might exist if: you quit because you had been working away from home for a long time and it is causing family problems; you quit because you were working away from home and had to return because of an illness in the family. However you may be disentitled for not being available for work".

There is an example listed.

"Suppose, before the changes to UI, you were being sexually harassed at work. You did not tell the person harassing you to stop; you did not go to the union steward or to the employer. You just wanted to get out of there so you quit. You probably would not have shown just cause and you would have been disqualified for seven to twelve weeks because you did not do everything possible to avoid quitting. The changes to UI mean that you will not receive UI benefits at all because you did not do everything possible to avoid quitting".

In other words, as a woman who is being sexually harassed you must confront your harasser and your employer before you are eligible for unemployment insurance benefits.

The question then becomes: What does misconduct mean? Misconduct means you have been fired from your job because you have done something improper or unacceptable for an employee to do. It can be either criminal or non-criminal.

That brings me to another matter that is under discussion or that would draw a nice analysis between this bill and the justice system in Canada. What is the difference between a UI claimant in Canada and an accused criminal in Canada? Under the criminal justice system the onus of proof is on the system. For a UI claimant the onus of proof is on the claimant.

Under the criminal justice system the person is innocent until proven guilty. Under the unemployment insurance system the claimant is guilty until proven innocent.

Under the criminal justice system criminal justice is guided by laws that must be changed by statute. It is a rigorous process. UI is guided by directives that can be changed by the commission at any time and that can be interpreted loosely or severely.

Under the criminal justice system all witnesses are treated equally before the law. Under UI, employers have more power through the separation slip and through the approach recommended by the UI directives than does the claimant.

Under the criminal justice system decisions are made first by police for information gathering, then by the Crown attorney's decision to proceed with charges and then by judges and/or juries. Under the UI system the UI agent is a police officer, lawyer and judge usually with the responsibility for making the decision all alone.

I could go on. There is a whole page full of these analogies but I think I have made my point on that.

I would like to suggest to all those people who are interested in UI and who want to know what their rights are under this act that they should contact their local Public Service Alliance of Canada office or the office of their member of Parliament to ask for the document "For a Just Cause".

I would like to say that the minister in committee told an anecdote about workers in his riding and I have a short anecdote too to close my remarks. A young man was out on the town in his home town. This is an anecdote by the way that was told to me in Fredericton, New Brunswick. He went across the line to have a few drinks on his motorcycle. He came back to town and had a bit of an accident on his motorcycle. He fell off his bike, injured his eye and had to miss some work. Let us say that man's boss had penalized him and fired him for not attending work because he had had an accident that the boss may have felt was self-inflicted. Would that young man have been eligible for unemployment insurance? The group of people who were discussing this, among them people who work in UI offices, said: "No, absolutely not".

What happened to that young man who was from New Brunswick who would not have been eligible for UI? That young man got two weeks at the Prime Minister's summer home for his troubles.

Mr. Merrithew: Small stuff.

Ms. Langan: The hon. member across the way thinks that was a cheap shot. I have to say that the unemployed in this country think that this government's policies are cheap shots at a time when there is double-digit unemployment in this country and it is taking away their benefits. It is inexcusable. There is nothing cheap about that shot except that this government has got to change its ways or be gone.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I have listened to most of my colleague's comments to the House on Bill C-113. First of all, I should say that I started listening with interest to her anecdote about the young man from New Brunswick, but I thought that the last comments about that young man were quite inappropriate for this kind of debate. It is unfortunate that comments of that kind are used in the House when trying to make an argument, but we have heard it.

My question to the hon. member is in line with the fact that Bill C-113 will stop paying UI benefits to people who quit their job without just cause or because they are fired for disciplinary measures. Here is my question to her. Is this fair for people working and remaining at their jobs to make a living to sustain their family? I refer here to women manning the cash registers in grocery stores or in drug stores, going to their jobs every day and having to put their children in another home so that they can go to work. These people stay on the job. These women have to work on a daily basis. Is it fair that they have to pay unemployment insurance in order for people who quit their jobs without just cause to be able to draw on unemployment insurance benefits?

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, the question that comes from the hon. member is an indication of the lack of understanding of what this bill does to women in particular in this country.

"Is it fair for women who have to 'man'." The word nowadays is "staff" a cash register in a department store or other work place. Is it fair that she has to work and put her children in child care? That is if she can get child care. If she cannot, she will be cut off unemployment insurance if she has to quit her job unless she can prove in the regulations that were tabled in this House the other day and out of a document that came from the department that she has tried to get her spouse to take care of the child, that she has gone to her employer and asked for a change of shift, that she has asked the employer for the ability to have work sharing or that she has asked her boss for unpaid leave. If she has not done all of those things and asked for unpaid leave, then she is not eligible for unemployment insurance.

Mr. Langlois: No, no. Wrong. Answer my question. You're wrong.

Ms. Langan: Not wrong. It is right in your own document.

The other point that the hon. member made is that he thought my anecdote was inappropriate in this House. Well, my goodness, it was the truth and I thought that the truth was in fact appropriate in this House. We have had some discussions about that from time to time lately.

The other point that the hon. member made is that it is not fair for people who are working—and here we come into the mentality of this government—to pay UI premiums for those who quit without cause.

If we are talking about the .01 per cent who are in fact found to be abusing the system—.01 per cent is the government's own figure—then we could talk about the 2 per cent, this caused the big debate in committee recently, of members of the opposite side of the House who had been found guilty in the courts.

I think that the hon. member probably should get up and apologize to Canadian women for his total lack of understanding for the kinds of difficulties that Canadian women are facing in this country and their need for unemployment insurance.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): I would like to ask my hon. colleague who has spoken so eloquently on this bill and particularly on the lack of justice for women, particularly women who suffer from sexual harassment in the workplace, what she thinks is the reason for having a section in this bill where such women who have suffered from harassment in the workplace could be excluded from their own hearings on this? They could be excluded from giving testimony on their own behalf.

Why is this included in the bill? Does she think that this is just?

Ms. Langan: Hon. Speaker, I wish I could have the opportunity to ask somebody, one person on the other side of the House, that same question.

I think it is important that this question is raised and I thank the hon. member for her question.

Of course it is not just. Have we any courts in this country? I outlined in my speech some of the analogies between a court of law and the UI system where criminals get fairer treatment in a court of law than if one is somebody in this country who is thrown out of work.

Now we have women in this country who have been sexually harassed who do not have the right to appear on their own behalf in a hearing on their sexual harassment. It is absolutely bereft of justice. This government does not even pretend to be a just government when it comes to women in this country.

Mr. Kristiansen: Political fraud.

Ms. Langan: My colleague has said "political fraud" and I think that probably is a good way of putting it. It is absolutely unjust, unfair and unqualified harassment of the Canadian unemployed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think at this stage if the hon. member did say something that was unparliamentary I wish she would get up and apologize.

I believe I heard something that was unparliamentary.

Ms. Langan: I do not think what I said is unparliamentary but certainly if I did say something that was unparliamentary I am terribly sorry.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to have the opportunity today to comment on Bill C-113. I hope that my comments will clarify the debate and help some groups and individuals who have concerns and questions, to better understand the objectives and the thrust of Bill C-113 which we are debating in third reading today in the House of Commons.

We have to go back to December 1992 and read once again the statement that the Minister of Finance, made in this House concerning Canada's fiscal situation. We must examine in particular the measures which that economic statement would put in place in order to correct the situation. The minister's economic statement had essentially two objectives: first, to put in place measures which would help reduce and control government spending, and second, to introduce incentives for economic renewal and job creation.

The incentives put in place by the economic and fiscal statement of the Minister of Finance were designed specifically to aid and support small and medium-sized businesses in Canada and to allow them to create additional jobs, to diversify their activities and to have access to new markets in order to confirm the already existing jobs and to hire new employees.

We all know very well that for many years now the small business sector has been the one creating the most jobs in Canada. Therefore, in December the Minister of Finance announced that by exempting small businesses and new employees from paying UI premiums for a certain period of time, he would facilitate the creation of new jobs and that is what we are witnessing now.

As I said earlier today, the second part of the economic and fiscal statement was aimed at the reduction and the control of government expenditures since it was realized that federal revenues had been much less than what was expected at the time of the 1992 spring budget.

The finance minister then announced a series of measures including a salary freeze for public servants, a two-year extension of the existing collective agreements and a salary freeze for everyone working here in this House, elected and non-elected, ministers, senators and even the Supreme Court judges.

In his economic statement the minister mentioned also that transportation subsidies, both in the Maritimes and in western Canada, would be reviewed and eventually cut, that tax transfers would be reviewed and that workers who quit their job without just cause or who are dismissed for misconduct would lose their UI benefits.

The second important measure regarding unemployment insurance is the cut in UI benefits whereby the percentage of insurable earnings is brought back to 57 per cent from 60 per cent. It is without a doubt the element of the minister's economic statement which drew the most comments and questions.

In December 1992 the minister introduced Bill C-105 to enact the measures he had announced in his economic statement. It immediately triggered concerns and comments regarding in particular those two measures concerning the unemployment insurance scheme.

I can tell you that after looking at the proposed changes to the unemployment insurance system contained in Bill C-105, members on this side of the House—the group of parliamentarians I belong to—realized that indeed the implementation of the legislation as drafted could have caused problems and led to potentially unfair and unjust situations and could have been a problem for groups in need of UI but who were not targeted by the economic measure.

• (1710)

So, with a group of Conservative MPs who are members of the Quebec caucus, we started working in late January and we reviewed Bill C-105. We held several meetings with officials of the department and with the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Finally, we submitted to the government a series of recommendations for safeguards to protect those who must rely on the unemployment insurance program but for whom Bill C-105 did not provide full protection.

The government listened to our representations and on February 17, 1993 Bill C-113 was tabled in this House while Bill C-105 died on the Order Paper.

The objective of Bill C-113 is essentially the one stated in the economic statement made by the Minister of Finance. However with respect to the UI changes, this legislation provides safeguards for those who rely on unemployment insurance, as I just said.

Therefore the main proposals included in Bill C-113 concern the Unemployment Insurance Act, and I will list a few of those. An important change is that people who quit their job without justification or are dismissed for misconduct will no longer be eligible for UI benefits. This is the basic objective of Bill C-113.

Second, the rate of the unemployment insurance benefits will go from 60 per cent down to 57 per cent of the average insurable earnings for the two years following the coming into force of the legislation.

The Unemployment Insurance Act includes a list of reasons which justify and support quitting one's job. Bill C-113 specifies in more detail these valid reasons, which have gone from five to thirteen, and which may justify a decision to leave a job. These reasons are now listed in the act. They are visible and include some 40 frequent circumstances which will be used by unemployment insurance officers to decide when quitting is justified and when the person who leaves a job and claims UI benefits is indeed entitled to them.

This was one of the concerns we heard when Bill C–105 was introduced so we corrected the situation with Bill C–113. This bill now offers more protection and safeguards to those who will claim UI benefits.

Earlier I was listening to the comments made by the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam, who referred to the case of a person forced to leave her job to look after her child. This is a just cause. The act clearly states that a person, man or woman, who must leave an employment to look after his or her child is automatically eligible for UI benefits. It is spelled out in the legislation. If you do not see that you just do not want to see reality. This person has a valid reason, and so does a person who is forced to leave a job to look after a family member who is sick and requires care at home.

A person who leaves a job because he or she has to accompany a spouse who takes a job in another city also has a valid reason.

There are a whole series of valid reasons now covering 40 different scenarios and giving added protection to those who must rely on the UI program in these circumstances.

A lot has been said about sexual harassment. From the time that Bill C–113 is passed by this House and receives royal assent, after consideration by the Senate, anyone who goes to an unemployment insurance office and says that they had to quit because of sexual harassment will automatically be eligible for UI benefits. The person who fills this statement and claims UI benefits gets the benefit of the doubt. That is how the law works. That is how Bill C–113 protects workers who are forced to quit their job because of sexual or any other harassment, whether it has to do with the colour of their skin, their religion or whatever. Much better protection is afforded to claimants under Bill C–113 than the present program.

Now regarding those who have to claim UI because they have been fired, where the ground for dismissal given by the employer is "disciplinary action"—it can cover a whole range of reasons, but let us stick to "disciplinary action" for the sake of argument—again, the person who reports to an unemployment insurance officer to claim UI benefits after his or her employment was terminated by disciplinary action gets the benefit of the doubt. With Bill C–113 the unemployment insurance officer is now required to ask the employer to prove that the grounds for dismissal are valid, justified and that there was just cause for dismissal. Where the employer fails to provide such evidence, the claimant is indeed entitled to UI benefits. This is an additional protection provided in Bill C–113 to prevent the kind of abuse we talked about when I met with groups of construction workers.

Several days in a row, unemployed construction workers from Sept-Îles showed up at my office. I had the pleasure to meet with them, chat with them and listen to their concerns and apprehensions. I was told it was common practice in the construction business to terminate construction workers' employment on the grounds of "lack of productivity".

At present there is very little construction workers can do because a 7 to 12 week penalty applies under the present program. Workers tend to take the 7 to 12 week penalty, after which time they receive benefits at a 50 per cent rate, that is to say half of what they would get under other circumstances. With Bill C–113 however, the same worker can go to the unemployment office, state the reason why he or she was dismissed and when it happened, and the Unemployment Insurance Commission officer then has to ask the employer to prove they did so for cause. Otherwise, the claimant immediately gets UI benefits at the rate of 57 per cent. This is one way the program was improved by Bill C–113.

Construction workers told me that employers in the construction business were regularly making that type of lay-off. They said they were worried that after the employee had taken his case to the board of referees and had had to wait for three or four months, finally the employer would not appear before the board to testify about the lay-off. The claimant would be eligible, retroactively, of course, to his unemployment benefits, but he had to go three to four months without an income.

Construction workers asked me if the legislation could not provide some form of penalty to prevent and stop that and also to force employers to appear and testify and to think carefully before issuing a lay-off notice for lack of productivity or whatever.

We looked into that concern and even if that change is not included in Bill C–113, which is a fiscal measure that does not deal exclusively with changes to the unemployment insurance system, I can tell you that representations have been made to the minister himself and people who work with him and people from the department. We are examining the possibility of including in the Unemployment Insurance Act a provision or a change which would force the employer to prove that the lay-off was justified and to penalize him if he does not appear. We are looking at that and we are certainly going to pursue that issue very diligently.

The other alternative the government had, instead of bringing those changes to the unemployment insurance program in order to disqualify from receiving benefits people who voluntarily leave their job or are fired because of disciplinary measures and to reduce benefits from 60 to 57 percent, was to raise UI premiums paid by employers and workers.

Credible studies have shown that every time UI premiums are increased by 1 percent or 20 cents, Canada looses 20,000 jobs the next morning. Consequently, that alternative was immediately rejected because UI premiums had been considerably raised not so long ago, last year if I remember correctly. It would have been unreasonable and disastrous for the economy to raise UI premiums paid by employers and workers to enable those who voluntarily leave their employment without just cause and who are constantly fired to receive UI benefits, to take advantage of a system which is truly an insurance program, a program which will help people who are looking for a job or are temporarily laid off for different reasons. It was more equitable, in my opinion, to proceed this way instead of raising premiums one more time.

Another point which was raised, and it is important to mention it, has to do with the case where a firm is forced to streamline its operations and offers early retirement to its employees. If we apply today's UI rules, it would be difficult for these employees to receive UI benefits. Bill C-113 corrects this situation because it now provides that if a firm has to streamline operations, to take downsizing action, to lay off its workers because of a work shortage, the employees affected are automatically entitled to UI benefits. It was recognized and agreed that when older workers accepted the pre-retirement package offered by the employer the benefits attached to it were agreed upon at the time of their employment. When the benefits run out these people can say they are available for work and claim UI benefits. They will be eligible for benefits.

This is another major provision that was included in Bill C-113. Again it is providing better protection for the workers who must avail themselves of the unemployment insurance program, these people who through no fault of their own have to rely on this insurance plan. These were the comments I wanted to make on Bill C-113. While Bill C-113 puts financial constraints on many citizens of this country, it is nevertheless necessary. This important bill is also fair to those it applies to.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to what was said by the hon. member for Manicouagan. I would like to ask him a question about the unemployment insurance system.

Our ridings both have a very high unemployment rate, and I am sure he shares my concerns in this respect. He is of course aware that the present system penalizes workers who quit without just cause. He is aware that with Bill C-21 the penalty was increased from seven to twelve weeks. He is also aware that with Bill C-113, in a region with a very high unemployment rate, there is a choice to be made by the employer faced with the decision to terminate an employee and by the member of the board of referees. He either has to agree there is just cause after a lengthy appeal process or uphold the decision of the unemployment insurance officer.

I want to ask the hon. member to try and explain or justify his government's policy which aims to change the unemployment insurance system and already provides very severe penalties for persons who quit their jobs without a valid reason.

• (1725)

In this case I am not referring to any of the circumstances listed in the bill, which were put there thanks to pressure from his colleagues, the unions and other people across this country. However, considering that we already have fairly severe penalties, could he explain the government's decision to give these officers a choice, as indicated in the legislation, of a range of options that reflect far more specifically all the circumstances that may influence a person's decision to either keep a job or quit, and in many cases are a necessary evil since a mobile labour force may be desirable to keep the economy and the labour market running smoothly? Often jobs and people are mismatched. Some people are really not suited to certain jobs. However, in the legislation it is all or nothing for the employer who is faced with the decision he has to make and all or nothing as well for the person who may be unemployed and does not want to accept a job because—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Will the hon. member now put the question.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): I am asking the question, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. member knows the question. I am asking him to explain the change his government has put in that provision on voluntary quits.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, the present Unemployment Insurance Act provides five cases—and it is right in the law—which are considered valid reasons for quitting one's job. As I just said, they are: being required to move somewhere else; going to live in another place with one's spouse; looking after a child or someone in need; and sexual, racial or other kinds of harassment.

In our discussions we learned that unemployment insurance managers referred to 40 other cases available to them which arose from arbitration or court decisions. Managers used them at will to honestly say that so-and-so was justified in leaving his or her job.

Bill C-113 includes these 40 cases under 13 reasons. The law gives additional protection which is visible and requires managers to refer to it when the time comes to decide whether someone quit or left a job for a valid reason. In all honesty, to respond to the apprehensions of the member for Restigouche—Chaleur, I must say that Bill C-113 improves the system from what exists now. It requires UI managers and people who study claims to consider these points because they are now in the act.

The thirteenth point reads "any other cause to be determined" or something like that. Of course this makes it possible to add other reasons which come from the decisions of tribunals or arbitration boards.

I find Bill C-113 a tremendous improvement. If someone cannot show that he left his job for a valid reason, using one of those 40 points, then he had no valid reason for quitting. The penalty provided in Bill C-113 will a apply and that person will not collect benefits.

Remember one thing. That person is not banned for life from UI. If he finds another job and works 20 weeks he can be eligible for unemployment insurance after completing 20 weeks in another job. In that way, I think that the system is flexible and gives people access to unemployment insurance in case they need it because their job ends. In that case, the reasons for applying for UI are clear, especially if the job ended.

Therefore, to answer the question of my hon. friend from Restigouche—Chaleur, Bill C-113 gives additional protection, especially in regions like ours, to people who have seasonal jobs. Knowing how industry works in our regions, I think that Bill C-113 adds more protection for people who must use unemployment insurance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have two minutes left.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have two very brief questions to ask the hon. member. First of all, I would like to ask if he believes that it is right or fair that a woman who has been sexually harassed be excluded from her hearings. The hon. member for Terrebonne said that there was precedent. The precedent happens to be the military, which has the worst record with the Human Rights Commission. I ask the hon. member, is that the kind of precedent we want to use and is it fair to exclude women from their hearings?

He has outlined the cost savings in his view to the government. Could he outline the staggering social costs to all taxpayers excluding people who are legitimately unemployed from the unemployment rolls? What will this cost?

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, the first question put by the member for Mission—Coquitlam refers to a woman who has been harassed, sexually or otherwise, being excluded from the hearing. I have to tell her very honestly that as far as unemployment insurance is concerned, I do not think that is the case. I may be completely wrong.

If a person goes to the unemployment insurance office to apply for unemployment insurance and she gives sexual harassment as the reason for quitting her previous job, she simply fills out the form and she is referred. She is even able to have her case heard by a person of her choice in the unemployment insurance office. She fills out the form and then automatically has the benefit of the doubt.

It is up to the employer and the employer may be called, but in the case of sexual harassment it is quite clear that the person has the benefit of the doubt.

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Langlois: Yes, she has.

As for the other question she put about social cuts, I have to tell her that the unemployment insurance system is an insurance system. It is not a social benefit system. It is an insurance system to which the employers and employees contribute to make sure there is money available when people lose their jobs and need to apply to the unemployment insurance system. It is not a social benefit program. It is an insurance system and should be treated as such.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I will be sharing my time with the hon. member for Stormont—Dundas.

I would also like to say a few words about this legislation, an act to provide for government expenditure restraint. I want to focus my remarks on the features of this legislation that bear upon the unemployment insurance program, specifically those that would cut the rate of UI benefits from 60 per cent to 57 per cent and those that would deny benefits to those claimants who, in the words of the UI act, quit their work without just cause.

To begin, I want to say that I am not any more impressed with this legislation than I was with its ill-fated predecessor. I am not going to focus, as others have done, on the definitions of just cause and the problems of litigation that will befall the unemployed person who seeks to be considered under one of the 14 categories of exception provided for in clause 18 of the bill. That does not mean that I do not consider these issues to be important. I do. However, in the short time available to me I would like to address other ways in which I believe this legislation is misguided.

I noted that these changes in the UI act are being introduced by the Minister of Finance as measures to contain the deficit and maintain an environment that supports economic growth and increased employment.

Once again the Tories have chosen to ask those that are the main victims of the recession, the unemployed, to bear the burden of expenditure restraint, while at the same time they enact other measures that allow the wealthy to continue to escape paying their fair share of taxation and contributing to deficit reduction.

My problem with Bill C-113, as well as with Bill C-21 of two years ago and the other changes that this government has made to the UI program and related legislation, concerns the government's failure to address the fundamental changes that need to be made to this program and to other programs in order to enable Canadians to adjust to the free trade environment in which we now find ourselves and to make our economy and its most precious asset, namely our people, more competitive in the next decade.

I want to talk about not what this government does with Bill C-113 but what it fails to do. These points are important to make in this debate as this legislation comes from the Minister of Finance and flows from his mini budget of last December.

The pain of this recession and the many human tragedies it has exacted has been exacerbated by the failure of this government to put in place, as the Prime Minister promised during the last election campaign, a comprehensive and coherent program of adjustment policies to deal with the fall-out of the FTA and to prepare Canadians for the future.

This is one of the great failures in the economic policy of this government. Its human costs are incalculable and will be felt and borne by millions of Canadian families for years and generations to come.

These costs are every bit as important and are quite linked to the cost of the growing and worrisome Canadian debt. If the Canadian economy does not respond to the profound changes that have taken place around the world, in order to be more flexible and be able to respond, we will fall further behind. We will deal with the problem of higher than acceptable unemployment for years and years to come.

As many studies have shown over the last five years, there are many aspects of the Canadian income security system and economic policies that inhibit the flexibility of the Canadian economy. These policies have contributed to a slow-down in productivity, which has contributed to a slow-down in the adjustment of labour, markets and businesses from low value-added to high value-added industries. It has made it more difficult for Canadians to respond to the new challenges created by the more globalized trading system, by the shift, in terms of what used to be the comparative advantage of Canada, from resource industries into more knowledge-based and high-tech industries.

The failure of Canadian policies to prepare Canadians for that is what will really force us to pay in the future a much higher price of unemployment than we needed to.

Central to these programs of adjustment policies is a proper reform of the unemployment insurance system and the companion set of policies that are needed to support Canadians to adjust out of declining industries and employment opportunities and into the emerging and growing opportunities that will be there in the future.

Like many other Canadians, including many in Atlantic Canada, I believe that a proper reform of the UI system in the context of a comprehensive labour force adjustment strategy is long overdue.

We watched with great interest the refreshing debates that took place south of the border during the midst of the last presidential election campaign and some of the new ideas that have been brought forward by President Clinton, the new American President.

What has been most refreshing in this debate is the new President's grasp and understanding of some of the new concepts and the need for the appropriate incentives, I mean carrots as well as sticks, as a means of encouraging and empowering individuals to use their talents, their skills and their economic resources in the most productive manner.

The notion of appropriate incentives underlies many of the ideas that President Clinton and Vice-President Gore brought forward and are now putting into legislation in the United States as they seek to bring their economy back into recovery. It underlies such concepts that have been discussed as work-fare and learn-fare as opposed to welfare and some of the other more stagnant forms of social assistance programs.

This notion of appropriate incentives to empower individuals is something that is missing in this legislation in what it does to the UI program and in other legislations that this government has introduced. In fact it has failed to understand these important lessons of empowerment and incentives in the design of its programs.

I want to use the example of the measures regarding voluntary quits just to make my point. The government talks about abuse and says that it has to root out abuse and that those who quit their jobs without just cause are abusing the program and must be denied benefits.

A distinction has to be made between abuse and disincentives as these terms concern the UI program. This government thinks the problem with UI is that it is being abused by individuals such as those who leave their work without just cause. In other words it is the individuals who abuse the program, and sure there is abuse. In a program that is of the size and complexity of the UI program there are going to be instances of abuse, but the program has rules and systems to deal with that.

I will have to terminate more quickly than I expected. Let me just come to my conclusion. The problem with the UI system, which is missed in this bill, is that it is not the abusers who are costly to the Canadian economy. It is the wrong incentives already embedded in the program which are leading Canadian businesses and individuals into choices they would not make if the program was properly designed.

This is a subject that I will return to. I think it is an important one which has been missed in this debate. I would now like to turn over my time to my colleague, the member for Stormont—Dundas.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in the debate today on Bill C-113, an act to provide for government expenditure restraint.

The objective of the omnibus bill is to implement the various expenditure restraint provisions which were outlined in the economic statement of the Minister of Finance on December 2, 1992. Included in these measures are several controversial changes to the unemployment insurance program.

I would like to concentrate my remarks on part VI of this bill as it is this section that deals with the proposed changes to the UI program.

Like its predecessor Bill C-21, part VI of Bill C-113 continues the government's attack on UI and unemployed Canadians. Instead of concentrating on the root problems which have led to 1.6 million Canadians being out of work, the government has opted to intensify its assault on the UI program.

As a result of the government's own economic mismanagement, Canadians are witnessing high unemployment rates, plant closures, bankruptcies, lay-offs and downsizing on a scale never before seen since the Great Depression.

Contrary to what the government would like us to believe, Canada is still not out of the grips of the recession. Yet instead of addressing the economic problems of the country, the government is promoting its right wing, Reform Party-driven agenda by attacking UI.

Mr. Speaker, 2.6 million Canadians are on welfare, 3.8 million live below the poverty line and over 2 million rely on food banks. Yet in an almost frenzied state to correct its failure to address the deficit, this government has turned its back on these Canadians and has set its sights on the unemployment insurance program.

The proposed changes to the UI Act contained in Bill C-113 have serious implications for many Canadians. In clause 17 of this bill the UI benefit rate is reduced from 60 per cent to 57 per cent. In addition, clause 18 provides for the disqualification of those who quit their jobs without just cause or are fired due to their own misconduct. Unfortunately there is no clause in Bill C-113 that will do anything to help unemployed Canadians find work.

The city of Cornwall in my riding of Stormont—Dundas has an unemployment rate of over 20 per cent. The plant closures, lay-offs, business bankruptcies and increases to the welfare rolls have become almost commonplace.

The lack of economic leadership from the federal government, the impact from the recession, the previous high interest rate-high dollar policy of the government and the fall-out from excessive taxation including the GST have contributed to the economic disintegration of this border community.

I would like the government to go into Cornwall and tell the people there that the recession is over, that the more than 2,000 jobs lost over the last 20 months will be returning and that while they are waiting they can rely on unemployment insurance to see them through.

Under Bill C-21 workers who lost their jobs obtained less benefit coverage even though they were made to pay more in UI premiums. With Bill C-113 UI benefits will be reduced 3 per cent. Thus we can see the continuation of this government's attack on the UI program, a continuation of the pay more for less Conservative approach to unemployment insurance.

It was not enough for the government to withdraw from contributing to the UI fund while at the same time reducing the benefit period and raising UI premiums. The government now wants to reduce the percentage of benefit unemployed Canadians will receive.

How much further will the Conservatives go? Perhaps they would like to eliminate the UI program altogether.

The government justification for implementing these changes to the UI program are not defendable. The government says that changes are necessary to stop those lazy shiftless Canadians who quit their jobs and expect to be supported by hard-working responsible Canadians.

In listening to the government, you would think every Canadian on UI was on it because they quit their job or were cheating the system and taking it for a free ride. The truth is the government's own estimates indicate that only 6 per cent of UI recipients actually left their jobs without just cause or were fired for misconduct.

While no one condones cheating or unnecessary quitting, the changes in this bill are designed to catch 6 per cent while 94 per cent of UI claimants end up with reduced UI benefits. Moreover, those who quit their jobs run the risk of losing their benefits entirely if they cannot satisfy officials that they had just cause. It is clear that in reducing benefits the government is cutting the UI program simply for the sake of it.

There is no all-encompassing vision in Bill C-113 of what the UI program should be doing, nor is there an effort being made in this bill to truly reform the UI program so it can better meet the needs of the unemployed.

In 1990 when the Conservatives introduced Bill C-21, thousands of Canadians were thrown into poverty and on the welfare rolls. The percentage of unemployed workers covered by the UI program dropped from 70 per cent to 58 per cent. If the proposed changes in Bill C-113 become law, unemployed Canadians who are not eligible for UI will also be left with little choice but to turn to an already overburdened welfare system.

The opposition against Bill C-113 and its short-lived predecessor, Bill C-105, indicates that Canadians do not support the government's assault on the UI program. Many Canadians feel the proposed changes are obstacles to people who may be forced to quit their jobs because of harassment or are fired for arbitrary reasons.

Bill C-113 fails to correct the flaws in Bill C-105 with respect to just cause for quitting one's job. While definitions of what constitutes just cause are enumerated in the bill, Canadians will still have to prove that they were justified in quitting their jobs. This process will not only be time consuming, it may also be difficult to endure, especially in cases where people quit their job due to sexual harassment.

Furthermore, individuals who claim they left their jobs due to sexual harassment may find that proving such harassment took place to be quite an undertaking. Many individuals, rather than pursue their case, may choose instead to work under harassment rather than quit. Even worse, they may decide to leave their job and be denied UI benefits entirely.

Bill C-113 does not improve the UI program. It forces claimants to prove that their quitting or firing was either justified or not due to their own misconduct before they can receive UI benefits. Claimants will be considered guilty until they prove themselves innocent.

The restrictive nature of the proposed changes will cause numerous appeals which in turn will create a backlog in cases and, consequently, delays in processing UI benefits. This is hardly an example of UI reform. Moreover, there will be cases where legitimate claims will be rejected and individuals who were fired without appropriate reasons will end up without any benefits.

Rather than be preoccupied with the UI program, the government should be addressing why Canadians require UI in the first place. Canadians do not want to be on UI. They want to work. Job creation, skills development, investment in education, research and development is what Canadians want to see their government take action on.

In conclusion, I urge members of this House to reject Bill C-113. Hopefully the government will then reassess its priorities with an aim toward getting Canada and Canadians working again as my colleagues and I in the Liberal Party are committed to doing.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to participate in this debate on the third reading of Bill C-113, an act to provide for government expenditure restraint.

This bill seeks to implement a number of restraint measures that were announced by the economic and fiscal statement tabled by the Minister of Finance in this House last December. Let me make it clear that the measures in his legislation were not introduced without careful consideration of their impact. We have put them forward because we are determined to strengthen the economic recovery now under way in Canada.

We are not cutting for the mere sake of cutting. We are taking these steps because deficit control is essential. It is the very foundation for Canadian investment, competitiveness and job creation. Let me remind the House that Canada is making progress in these areas. Even though too many Canadians are still unemployed, we are encouraged by the positive signs of the recovery that are visible in almost all sectors of the economy. However, the economic recovery we are experiencing here in Canada has been hampered by a very difficult global environment in which we find ourselves.

Economic activity in major industrial countries worldwide has been held back by corporate restructuring, trade uncertainties and certainly high levels of debt. The weaker than expected economic growth that we have seen in Canada has resulted in the revenues that the government has anticipated being less than they would otherwise have been. This in turn has led to severe pressure on our deficit. As a consequence we must take some very strong measures to keep our fiscal situation under control. Sound fiscal policies are essential if we are to maintain economic growth that secures existing jobs but, more important, creates new ones.

In that December economic statement, the Minister of Finance outlined many steps the government is taking to assist the economic recovery now under way and to foster even stronger growth. Some of those included measures to stimulate job creation, especially by the small business sector; enhanced support for research and development, enriching what is already one of the most generous programs in the world; continued action to encourage exports through improved access to foreign markets and measures to improve Canada's competitiveness internationally; increased funding for worker training, coupled with measures to foster joint efforts by government, business and labour to make learning and skills upgrading a lifelong priority for all Canadians; and of course additional support for strategic investments in Canada's infrastructure.

We cannot make these important investments in our economy if the costs involved cause the debt to grow out of control. We cannot simply say "charge it" as we would hear from members opposite and make no provision to pay for the actions that we are taking. As the events of recent weeks have shown and certainly with some recent budgets in provincial capitals, governments across Canada are starting to realize and are aware of the debts that they hold and the problems that those debts cause and, more important, that the deficits fuelling those debts must be brought in line. They are a continuing burden to the economic growth and job creation.

For our part, the federal government has worked to put this country's finances back in order ever since we came to office. Certainly in the four and a half years I have been here we have been very involved in a number of steps to try to do that. We have taken some very difficult steps. We have curbed the growth of program spending. We have privatized Crown corporations. We have passed the Spending Control Act and implemented the debt servicing and reduction account, making fiscal responsibility part of federal law. During our hearings across Canada on the GST, certainly that is what Canadians said: put in place a spending control act. We did that.

Given the impact that our declining revenues are causing at the moment and the weaker than expected growth experienced both here and around the world because of the recession, we must do more to restrain and reduce the deficit. There are two clear reasons why we have to take action to limit our fiscal shortfall.

First of all, higher deficits will damage prospects for sustained recovery. Growing deficits compete with productive private sector initiatives for the limited investment funds available in this country. This puts upward pressure on domestic interest rates and forces domestic borrowers to seek funds abroad, thus increasing the nation's indebtedness to foreigners. As a consequence, the country is left more vulnerable to exchange rates and interest rate volatility. We have certainly experienced some of that over the last year.

Second, if we fail to act now we will have to deal with even greater deficits in years to come. Bringing the fiscal situation back into balance will exact an even more painful price from Canadians at that time. That price could be higher taxes reducing our competitiveness and our ability to create jobs. The alternative to spending restraint, the imposition of higher taxes is not, and I have to repeat, is not a solution. Clearly then the most responsible avenue of action is to further constrain government spending.

The measures we have included, including those implemented by this bill, will reduce spending allocations by some $8 billion over the three-year fiscal period ending in 1994–95. This will bring about a significant reduction to the structural component of the deficit.

I would like very quickly to run through some of the things in this bill that make it worthy of support by myself and my colleagues on this side of the House and should in fact be supported by colleagues on the other side of the House.

There has been a lot said about this bill as it relates to unemployment insurance. Let me talk about some other things in the bill that are very important. Part of the bill deals with implementing wage restraint. Certainly, as is happening with this bill, the salaries of members of Parliament and salaries of senators are being frozen for three years. The salaries of judges and employees in non-commercial corporations are being frozen for two years.

The salaries of the Prime Minister, the cabinet, the Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada, the Governor General, and lieutenant-governors across the country are being frozen and I think most appropriately.

Public Service salaries will be frozen for two years. Those who are under contract will simply have the contract extended. If they have signed one last year which goes for three years the contract will be five years in length. The government has said that if there are non-monetary issues that can be agreed upon by the parties involved, namely the union and the people it represents, the government will be happy to amend the various contracts to deal with non-monetary issues.

Within this bill are serious steps on wage restraint. Why do I support wage restraint across that sector? It is really quite simple. I have 200,000 constituents and very few of them got a raise last year. Very few of them expect to get a raise this year and very few of them expect to get a raise next year. It seems to us, when my constituents cannot afford to pay more taxes, there is no reason they should have to pay more taxes because we have given raises to people who are not operating in the private sector. We will be imposing upon ourselves the very thing that my constituents are having imposed upon them because of the situation within the economy.

Another step we are proposing which I certainly have no hesitation in supporting is the transportation subsidy cut. We provide assistance through the Western Grain Transportation Act for grain shipments. That will be reduced by 10 per cent a year for two years. The Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Program will be cut by 10 per cent and the Maritime Freight Rates Act will be cut by 10 per cent.

During the committee process that dealt with this bill we were advised there was another way to amend the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Program. I am happy to see the government was able to meet with the people affected and bring forward in this House through Committee of the Whole some amendments to the legislation which accomplished what the government was trying to accomplish in the way of a 10 per cent reduction in over-all expenditure. It was more acceptable the way it was done than the way it was originally proposed by the government. We were able to take input and change the legislation appropriately.

Another reduction that appears in this bill is the public utilities income tax transfer. This is a transfer from the federal government to the provinces for utilities such as electricity and gas transportation across Canada. In a sense it is from the income tax received from those public utilities. We will be reducing our transfers to the provinces by some 10 per cent per year. Again I think that is very appropriate. We cannot simply hand out money all the time. It is time we started reducing some of these handouts on a very consistent basis.

The final part of this bill deals with the unemployment insurance. There have been lots of comments by members opposite about what is in this bill. I would like to comment very briefly on some of the reasons I have no hesitation in supporting this bill. Much the same as I said before about the fact that we were freezing the salaries of many people involved in the public sector by this particular piece of legislation, we are freezing the unemployment insurance benefits received by those after April 1 of this year. The reason we are freezing the benefits is the same logic as I gave before. None of my constituents is going to get an automatic raise early in April. I would question why those on unemployment insurance should expect an automatic raise in April. This takes away the automatic 3 per cent raise they were to get and freezes their benefits. I do not have a problem doing that at all. I would love to be able to give a raise to those who are on unemployment insurance, but the economic circumstances of the country say that we cannot give them a raise. The reason for that is that the taxpayers of my constituency cannot afford to pay any more. That is very important.

Tied to a freezing of benefits is a freezing of the premiums paid by my constituents personally or by the employer for their benefits. Not only are we freezing the amount of money we are paying out at last year's rate or at the 1992 rate, we are freezing the amount of money we collect from the employees at the 1992 rate.

If I ask my constituents whether they are willing to pay more in unemployment insurance premiums so that those on unemployment insurance get greater benefits, there is no hesitation in my mind what they will say: "No, I am not prepared to pay more. I didn't get a raise. There is no reason they should get one". That is also part of this particular piece of legislation.

There is some additional encouragement for job creation in this legislation. The premium holiday for small business is a very important step. A small business hiring more people does not have to pay any more premiums in the first year than it paid last year for that increase in employment. It is a small benefit, but it is an extra lift for employers in a position to hire more people. If one is creating a new small business one does not have to pay any unemployment insurance premiums in the first year.

Is that not a positive step to encourage job creation? Of course members opposite are opposed to this legislation and these ideas. I guess they can account for why they are.

There are a few extras in the legislation I would like to talk about. It happens that there are people on unemployment insurance receiving benefits. To help those people get back into the work force the government has announced a $260 million increase in training funds for those on unemployment insurance. That is a significant increase and takes the total for UI claimants up to $2.21 billion for the coming year. We add to that another $1.6 billion the government pays out to those who are unemployed but not receiving UI benefits.

This shows that the Government of Canada has come to the taxpayers of Canada—the government does not have any money; its source of money is the people who are out there listening to me speak today or working on a continual basis—for $3.8 billion in training funds. I do not have any hesitation in saying the training funds will get people back into the work force much more quickly.

The item that received an awful lot of comment was the one related to benefits for voluntary quitters. During the committee process in which I was involved it was brought to our attention some 225,000 voluntary quitters a year will be affected by this legislation.

In the circumstance of unemployment in the country over the last few years there are 225,000 people who quit their jobs for no reason and expect—and the opposition would give it to those people—unemployment insurance benefits. Why? It is beyond me. What did that cost us last year? One billion dollars for the year. Where did we get that $1 billion? We borrowed it or we increased premiums from those people who are working.

We have heard terrible examples of how some person may be forced to quit a job and have just cause for doing so. I believe the legislation adequately protects people who have just cause for quitting, but can we imagine the circumstance the opposition has been supporting? An employee shows up for work in the morning. He decides he has had a miserable night the night before and, to make up for it, smashes all the computers in the office. The employer shows up and says: "My goodness, isn't this an awful thing you have done? You have destroyed all the equipment in our office. You are fired".

The opposition wants to pay those people unemployment insurance. The employer says that the employee is fired for cause and there are no benefits; that is exactly what he deserves. However those people opposite are happy to say there should be a penalty because he was fired and instead of giving him 60 per cent of the benefits he should only get 50 per cent of them. The employer says the employee who got fired because he justly deserved to get fired should get zip from the unemployment insurance account and zip from the taxpayers of the country.

I am happy to say the legislation ensures that those who voluntarily quit their jobs or those who were fired because they deserved to be fired will not get benefits under the program. Do we have to do that?

In closing I would refer to an article in The Montreal Gazette of February 23. It is headlined Canada faces ruin if UI deficit not limited. That is a statement by Mr. Forget. I would just like to read three paragraphs of it if I have the time to do so.

> "Canada might have to go to the brink of economic ruin before its leaders make the hard choices needed to rein in the growing unemployment insurance deficit", a Quebec economist said yesterday. "The government's proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act amount to little more than tinkering on the margins"—

That is certainly not what we would think the opposition would say we were doing:

> —said Claude Forget, a former Quebec cabinet minister who headed a 1986 federal inquiry into unemployment insurance.
> This country is at most maybe three years away from a major financial crisis. It may well be that the sort of thing that we would need to do to avert a crisis is look at UI in a fundamentally new way, said Forget. Forget said taxpayers might have been lulled into a false sense of security by borrowing binges at all levels of government and don't see a need to force politicians to reinvent the UI system. There is no belief among the public at large that this is an urgent issue. We presumably will wait until it is too late.

I am here and I am glad to say we are not waiting. We are acting because that is exactly what we should be doing.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): I have a question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the member watched the CTV program W-5 on New Zealand. Figures were provided in the program indicating that when New Zealand went into basic collapse in 1984 its all-government deficit was 7 per cent of its gross domestic product. Its accumulated government debt was 62.7 per cent of the New Zealand gross domestic product and its net public, private and foreign debt was 47 per cent of its gross domestic product.

Today, after eight years of talk about the deficit and the debt from those opposite, including the member, the budget deficits of all levels of government in Canada—and the federal government cannot be responsible for provincial governments debts—last year was 8.5 per cent of our gross domestic product. Our accumulated all-government debt, which is about $650 billion, was 44 per cent of gross domestic product. Yet the spendthrifts opposite want to spend $6 billion buying the Rolls-Royce of submarine chasing helicopters.

Will the member attempt to justify to anybody who might be watching this debate how he can talk about trying to cut back on spending? They have run up the spend and borrow philosophy like Ronald Reagan in the States. The debt managed to increase over his period in office and Mr. Bush's period in office by $3 trillion.

Will the member tell us in terms of actions rather than very cheap talk in this place where the actions and the words have been in the same direction from this grossly irresponsible government? Does it have no sense of responsibility to our children and grandchildren? Or can its members only get up as they have in the past nine years and speak about how we are going to fight the deficit and the debt next year but never this year.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I did see the show the member is talking about and was appalled at the problems New Zealand had. He was absolutely right in saying that in New Zealand the percentage of deficit and debt as they relate to their gross national product was increasing.

I am happy to say that in the eight years we have had a Conservative government in Ottawa our share of that debt, as a percentage of the gross national product, if he accepts that provincial debt and municipal debt is not the responsibility of the federal government, has in fact dropped from about 8.2 per cent to about 6.1 per cent. We have been doing exactly what we should be doing.

The member failed to mention that New Zealand, in order to help solve its problems, made some tax changes and brought in a value-added tax. I might point out we brought in a similar tax and this member walked away from the party that was taking very responsible action because he did not have the guts to take the actions that were necessary.

He asks what actions have we taken to cut spending. Let me ask that member what spending restraint measure, what cut that this government has made in eight years has that party opposite supported? Has it ever agreed with any of the cuts? Has any of its members stood in this House and said once that it is a good cut, it is one they can support?

I challenge the Liberal Party and in fact the NDP to indicate just one program of restraint they have supported. I think the member will find that these people opposite cannot do that.

We have cut defence spending, the very thing the member is asking about. If he checks the actual spending estimates for this year he will see there are savings in those estimates. Part of the reason we are able to save is because we are pulling back our obligations in Europe which is a very constructive thing to do. We are also cutting back in some areas so that we can say to all our armed forces personnel that this is their budget, this is how much money they have to spend, and if they want modern equipment, then they will have to show where they can save money in order to spend money.

The member opposite would say to those people that they have been shown where money can be saved but their opportunity to have modern equipment will be cancelled. Our men and women, those who serve you and I and all Canadians, will be forced to work with 40 and 50-year old, ancient equipment which in its own right is not safe.

That is the view of the Liberal Party. That has been the view of the Liberal Party from the day that Pierre Trudeau took over through to today. From 1967 through to 1984 they decimated the equipment that our Armed Forces have. The Liberal Party of today would carry on that decimation until there would be no longer an Armed Forces that could do a darned thing for this country.

Mr. Kilgour: The member seems to forget, Mr. Speaker, that the member for Calgary Northeast and I were expelled from the party. We did not walk away. Our chairs were virtually moved across the Chamber.

Perhaps the member will explain the New Zealand tax system to his colleagues sitting nearby. I suspect I know more about the New Zealand tax system than he does. Will he tell us how the income tax and the sales tax were implemented? Does he think they were done identically in Canada and New Zealand? Has he talked to Roger Douglas about it? I know he was on the committee. I know he came to Edmonton, Mr. Speaker, your city and mine, and would not let a lot of very thoughtful people even speak to the committee.

I know the member's caucus quite well and I do not think there was any intelligent discussion on what the GST would do to Canada at this time in our economy, what it would do to the small business community, what it would do to the member's constituents. I do not think any of them, or very few of them, understood it from the beginning. They just went along like so many robots following their genius, the former Minister of Finance. With respect, I do not think he understood it at the time nor does he understand it today or the havoc it is wreaking from one end of the country to the other.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, the member is right, he was expelled and deservedly so. The reason deservedly so is because he did comment about the fact that there was lack of intelligent debate on the matter. As someone who was on the committee for the entire year and a half dealing with this matter, I must admit I do not recall him appearing and providing that intelligent input that he thought was appropriate.

I can comfortably say that the reason we implemented the GST was many fold, but certainly one of them was because we had a regressive sales tax regime in place that penalized the manufacturers in my constituency and other constituencies in Canada. We said that if we got rid of this old federal sales tax we would make our manufacturing sector more competitive. We would be able to assist them, because of that competitiveness, in exporting more product out of Canada.

Is it not interesting that we are now setting records month in and month out. Our exports are record. What are they record in? In manufactured goods.

If the member says that this was terrible implementation of a tax, of course from his philosophy any positive steps are terrible implementations. From our side of the House, assisting manufacturing so that they can export more out of this country or be more competitive with imports is a very positive thing to do. We did that.

I am happy to say that this party will take the tough decisions that that party over there has run away from for all the years that it has existed since 1967.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I must say I have listened to the member for Ontario with great interest. I do not think he has proven very much of anything with all his comments about how the government is taking tough decisions.

It would seem to me that if the government was taking tough decisions it would not be taking them against the unemployed. It would be taking them against a theoretical thing like the helicopter project. The cold war is over. We do not need the same kind of armaments and equipment that was needed during the cold war, yet here is a single project where the cost has jumped by $1.4 billion. The government is not cutting back on that. As a matter of fact the government is hanging tough. It has just moved the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore from his parliamentary secretaryship because he came out opposing it. Likewise many of the leadership candidates are coming out opposing it.

I think that when the member for Ontario asks for suggestions for cutbacks, there is a shining example: $5.8 billion that could be saved.

The hon. member for Ontario reminds me of the emperor who was parading down the street and suddenly a child said: "But he has no clothes on". Clearly in this case the hon. member for Ontario really has been stripped of any credibility when he is trying to explain why we are taking $2.5 billion away from the unemployed but we have $5.8 billion to buy military helicopters that will probably never fight in any war. They will probably only do search and rescue work which could more adequately be done by other less expensive equipment.

We look at the government restraint and the cutting back of $2.5 billion from the unemployed at a time when the government has passed through the greatest growth period in the history of the nation from 1984 to 1990. It has imposed 35 new taxes, including the GST.

They talk about spending restraint and saving money. It reminds me of Ronald Reagan. What a disaster. He talked about all these things but spent billions. The Prime Minister flies off to the Pacific Rim or to the United States and transports extra equipment, limousines and whatever he wants but the government deficit piles up.

When this government came to power the debt was $169 billion, this year it will surpass $450 billion. Are these people really good managers? Could anybody ever have believed that during the longest sustained period of growth in our history, with the imposition of 35 new taxes, the GST and still the debt has more than doubled in those few years.

What is the government's solution after creating the worst economic recession since the 1930s? It brought in three actions. Three actions are really what did it. It brought in the free trade deal which wiped out all kinds of manufacturing and processing industries. It brought in the GST which was supposed to help those manufacturing and processing industries. In fact that along with the free trade deal has cost some 400,000 manufacturing jobs.

Then to put the real hammer down it imposed extremely high interest rates. During the period 1986 to 1990 it kept the interest rates about four or five points above those in the United States which drove up the value of the dollar from what it was in 1986 so the manufacturing and processing industries got a double whammy.

First of all they were competing with American industries which had 7 or 8 per cent interest rates when our industry had rates of 13 or 14 per cent. They had a dollar catapulting up from the mid or low 70 cent mark to 85 cents, 86 cents or 87 cents.

The pressure of the fiscal and monetary policies was incredible and the most regressive and harmful in history piled on top of these 35 tax increases. Practically every one of those tax increases was a regressive tax. It was an excise tax on gasoline or a sales tax on something else.

Now that the Tories have driven 1.6 million people out of work—there is probably at least two million, 400,000 have just given up looking so they do not count in the estimates—and now in December they say: "Okay, we have put you out of work and now we are going to cut your benefits". Many individuals will face a chop of $80 or so a month which is pretty painful for a single parent or a family where only one member is working and there are three or four children.

I know about this because in my constituency of Algoma, in the uranium mining town of Elliot Lake during the last two and a half years we have seen some 3,400 highly paid production mining jobs wiped out. With that another 1,500 or more secondary service industry jobs were wiped out.

Those people are not only facing the chop of some $70 or $80 a month but very restrictive, tough measures. If you quit your job without just cause you are gone.

There are all kinds of reasons why people quit their jobs that are justified. They pay a very severe penalty already, some 12 weeks' waiting and so on.

I was just looking at the figures of the number of people who quit their jobs. In September 1988, at the height of the economic cycle, more than 31,000 Canadians quit their jobs. In September 1990 this number had fallen to 26,000 and in September 1992 only 16,700 had quit their jobs.

We are talking about a work force of 11 million or 12 million people. There are all kinds of family situations, health problems or work activity problems that cause people to quit, and it does not seem to be a very large number of people. Yet it puts employers in an incredibly strong position. They are able to say to individuals: "Buddy, maybe I am working the butt off you, but if you do not like it, if you quit the job you are not going to get any UI".

There must be a certain civility about how we operate the unemployment insurance program. It is the largest program in the country, $22 billion. This could surely be operated without putting the hammer in the hands of the employer. There must be a balance so that if the individual quits his job, whether it is because of situations at home, situations in the work place or whatever, then he pays a penalty. However, under this arrangement all the power is given to the employer, and that is the unfair part of Bill C-113.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to say a few words for the record on this particular piece of legislation.

First, I want to address the over-all situation. The government is continuing to do what it has been doing on a number of other issues, and that is trying to fool Canadians.

It is doing two snow jobs here, trying to fool two groups of people, Canadians generally and the workers. I will explain that to the House.

During the constitutional crisis the government decided to try to frighten people into saying yes. During the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement debate it used the same kind of tactic. It has not learned a lesson from those experiences.

What is it doing now? Why do I say that it is doing a snow job on Canadians? I say so because it is preying on the fears of Canadians that some people are taking advantage of the current system, and it is true, but they are very, very few in number. It is preying on the sense of fairness that Canadians have, because Canadians do not want people to take advantage of the system. That is what the government is doing.

It is trying to pretend that there are scads of people who are really taking advantage of the situation and costing Canadians millions of dollars of their hard earned money, but we know that is not true.

We also know, by virtue of this bill, that this government has not learned anything during the last eight plus years that it has been in power.

[Translation]

It is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker. It is very, very unfortunate. This approach or tactic, which was used in other circumstances, is meant to exploit the fears and feelings of Canadians. It will not work.

[English]

I will explain why it will not work. Let us look at what some people have said. Alain Dubuc of La Presse, in an editorial on January 25, commented on this piece of legislation and damned it because it does not take into account any grey areas. He said: "The bill in its present form is inhuman".

People will argue that it has been changed, but it has not been changed sufficiently so that it now is considered acceptable. Let it be clear that we on this side of the House want those who do not want to work to have to face the music. We do not want to go easy on them. We want them to contribute their fair share to society but we do not believe that this is the way to do it.

Let me quote another individual. Claude Forget, the head of the study, questions the Tory measures, calling them: "a political miscalculation and economically just an empty gesture—a waste of time and political credibility". That is what Mr. Forget has said about this bill. This is not Ron Duhamel, member of Parliament for St. Boniface. This is not the Liberal Party. This is what Mr. Forget has said: "a political miscalculation and economically just an empty gesture—a waste of time and political credibility". Not even the Conservative's ideological soulmates are with them on these measures.

That is not all. Remember that I said initially this government was taking advantage of the sentiment of Canadians because clearly we are fair people. We do not want people to cheat. Let us see what the Economic Council of Canada has said about unemployed workers. A 1991 Economic Council of Canada report on people who quit their jobs said that they are not—and I want to repeat—not a drain on the unemployment insurance fund. That is what the Economic Council of Canada said. Of course we know what has happened to them. When one gives good and honest advice, then one could become a victim.

An analysis of the 1986 employment figures showed that half of all job quitters went to another job immediately. I know you know that, Mr. Speaker, but your colleagues on the government side did not know that. I want to point out that not only did half go to another job immediately but another 43 per cent found new jobs within 10 weeks. By contrast, only one in five persons who lost their jobs found work immediately and another 50 per cent had found work within 10 weeks. It is quite clear when you look at this particular credible study that this will do nothing for those who decide to quit because it is not the issue. This is not the issue.

Supposedly the government wants to go after the cheaters. We have already demonstrated that fewer than 1 per cent cheat. We have already demonstrated that out of some $20 billion in expenditures, it is about $200 million that is probably not being used appropriately. That is a lot of money, but proportionate to the approximately $20 billion it is very, very little.

It is very interesting when we look at Canada in comparison to the G-7 countries. We like to talk about our involvement with the G-7. At present, Canada is in the majority. Most G-7 countries pay unemployment insurance benefits to voluntary leavers. Why is the government doing this? Why? Why? It says it is to get to the cheaters, but we find out the cheaters are very, very small and they cost very, very little. We find that. We find that the people who voluntarily leave their jobs find jobs very, very quickly. We also know that very few people leave their jobs during a recession.

Why in the world would it want to do this? I think I know why and I think I would like to share it with you, Mr. Speaker, and with my colleagues. I said initially that they are exploiting the fears of Canadians the fear of a very tough economic situation. Money is sparse. Anyone who is cheating is hurting everyone very, very badly. I believe that and I think all Canadians believe that, but it is exaggerating that.

Second, there is our sense of fairness as Canadians because we do not want people to cheat. It is exploiting that as well. It is not attacking the problem. It is not at all attacking the problem. It is known that this unemployment insurance fund is funded by employees and workers. The government still makes a sizeable contribution, but in relationship to workers and to employers it is very, very little.

It is known that these changes could, according to government estimates—we know how good government estimates have been; those have been off time and time again—save $2.45 billion in two years on the backs of the unemployed though. However, we also know that this fund is already almost $5 billion in deficit and in another year or so it will be almost $7 billion. If it is really trying to do something, this is obviously the wrong thing to do.

You remember this, do you not, Mr. Speaker, that it tried to redefine what poverty was. Why? It was because it was alarmed at the figures. It could not solve the problem so it said poverty is no longer what it used to be. It is now a new definition. It cut out the poor from the statistics.

This is what the government is trying to do now. It is trying to redefine what it is to be unemployed. That is what it is trying to do because it does not know how to grapple with the problems. Change the rules. Make it look as if people are cheating or exploiting the system so it can look good, it can look tough, that it can look as if it is doing the right thing. At the same time it is trying to snow its electorate.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I find it deplorable, truly deplorable. I would really have liked to see this government, for the first time in two terms, listen just a little bit to opposition members and accept some of the amendments which we had proposed.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, you know as well as I do that workers will be vulnerable with this. How can a woman with confidence go forward and complain about sexual harassment? Can one envisage an employer saying to his employees: "Things are tough. The wages are going to be cut back and if you don't like it you know what awaits you". Can one imagine that? I can.

This is not a step forward: it is a step backward, a giant step backward.

[English]

I find it deplorable that this House may indeed go forward and endorse this particular piece of legislation.

[Translation]

As I said earlier, and I will repeat it, I find it deplorable.

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, there have been about eight or nine speakers this afternoon on this bill. The two major aspects of this bill are UI and the Western Grain Transportation Act. All of the speeches have been on UI and I have five minutes left on the Western Grain Transportation Act.

The government proposes with its so-called restraint to take $74 million away from the amount it pays to the railroads under the WGTA, which means that the grain producers will have to pay it. The grain producers in western Canada will have to pay it and their wheat prices are down to $110 a tonne on export grain.

Instead of the government giving $729 million under the WGTA it gave $653 million. Out of that $653 million, it will propose paying that to the farmers, instead of to the railroads, but it will be less rail line related costs, remaining subsidies to the railroads, adjustment funds and any funds associated with pooling charges. Even then, the farmers will not get the amount of money that the government is cutting from the WGTA.

The National Transportation Agency Review Commission did a report. Here it is. It was done by Mr. Gilles Rivard. It is garbage. He is the new guy who is going to be the head of the National Transportation Agency. If there was ever a case of putting a coyote in charge of the chicken coop, this is a dandy.

The government has been paying $28 per tonne to the railroads and paying the grain producers $14 per tonne. The government proposes to cut its share. It means that the producers will now be paying more than three times as much for freight costs as they did in 1984. The Tories who were in opposition in 1984 fought the Liberals, as well as myself and my colleagues, by opposing this legislation and today they are doing exactly the same thing. They are adding insult to injury. In their errors of omission and commission they have compounded what the Liberals did.

We are losing farmers by the thousands who are losing their land that has been in their families for three or four generations. This government's solution for them is to make them pay another $74 million share of the cost of moving grain.

Consider what the Canadian Pacific Railway got from the people of Canada: 25 million acres, $25 million and coal lands as the result of the Crow's Nest Pass Agreement. The government allowed the railway to siphon those off into separate companies. It should be making the CPR take some of the profits that the CPR got from the lands, forests and coal fields that we the people gave them and make them pay their own damn costs of moving grain to live up to the agreement of 1897.

I do not understand why the Conservative government that opposed this in the first place back in 1983–84 are now doing exactly what the Liberals did.

Mr. Duhamel: Not so.

Mr. Benjamin: Yes it is. Compare the speeches of Tories in those years in opposition with what they are doing now. The Liberals abolished the Crows Nest Pass Agreement and it is a different story now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 6.45 o'clock p.m., pursuant to an order made Tuesday, March 23, 1993 and in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the third reading stage of the bill now before the House.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the third time and passed.

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Were he allowed to be present the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca would have voted with his party.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved that Bill C-241, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act (national flag of Canada), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to be here this evening and to speak about my Bill C-241 at second reading. I am sure you have read the bill. It is a very short bill but it has a lot of meaning.

This bill calls for the displaying of the Canadian flag in all Canada Post outlets. The intent is much more, as I said before, than just the bill itself.

• (1920)

During the last few years the services offered by Canada Post have changed drastically. With its policy aimed at closing rural post offices, Canada Post is abolishing the only federal presence in those communities. This bill wants to re-establish those symbols in the communities.

[English]

Our national flag is an important symbol of our nation. It is a symbol that allows all Canadians from coast to coast to coast to identify together as Canadians. Canada is a vast land of diversity, embracing vast differences within its borders and among its people.

Traditionally the flag has provided connections across the great expanses of space and time and has been a source of unity and pride.

[Translation]

Canadians are proud of their symbols. They reflect the history of our nation, its people, its environment and its cultures. Here, as in many other cities throughout the country, there are numerous symbols such as museums and other historical sites which remind citizens of their national identity. However, in rural communities such symbols are rare. Oftentimes the post office is the only one.

[English]

For someone living in an urban centre such as Ottawa, Montreal or Vancouver, it might seem strange to refer to a post office as a national symbol. However in rural communities this would often be the only federal presence in the community. For these communities these post offices were a source of pride, a sign that the federal government acknowledged the existence and the importance of their community.

I would like to quote from a letter I received from one of my constituents in which that person discusses the importance of the post office in their community.

Let me quote that letter: "We were born in Pointe-Verte and we saw, at least partly, the history of our post office in the making. We remember more particularly that small wooden building near the school. In those days, people were talking about the possibility of building a post office. When it finally happened, the population in our community was very, very proud since, for us, it was normal to have a post office".

This shows how much people consider their rural post offices as symbols. Now the government wants to take away those symbols. Even though Canada Post received numerous letters asking that these post offices be maintained it still continues to implement its disastrous policy. As I mentioned earlier, more than 3,000 rural communities have lost their post offices and therefore, an important national symbol.

With this bill I propose to give their national symbol back to those rural communities. While I support re-opening those post offices, I am quite aware that my view is opposite to the philosophy and the agenda of this government. Taking this into account, I propose we require that a Canadian flag be flown over every Canada Post facility thereby giving them back the status of national symbol which our federal government seems to have forgotten.

[English]

Recently Bill C-73 was introduced in the House of Commons and we debated Canada Post and the attempt at its privatization. At that time if we were to review Hansard we would see the important role as a national symbol that post offices play in every community across Canada.

Quite often in these small communities the post office is the only federal government presence. It is the only place where the federal flag flies. The importance of Canada Post and rural post offices as a national symbol and federal presence in communities has been recognized by all parties and MPs in this House.

The new aspect of the Canada Post philosophy regarding new commercial outlets is to get away from the post office as a national symbol. It is getting away from the use of the national flag.

We as Canadians must preserve these national symbols right across Canada. The new Canada Post logo has what some refer to as pigeon wings. That is the flag that many of them are using, along with the Canadian flag. They are using both. But what is the next step? The Canadian flag is good enough. It is meaningful and that is what we should have. We should have the Canadian flag at every post office and every post office outlet.

I know we started a little late, so even though I am allowed 20 minutes I am going to cut it short because I know there are a number of other MPs in the House who have expressed the desire to speak. I will allow them some extra time by cutting my speech a little short. I was hoping to be able to refer to the Canada Post philosophy of closing down small rural post offices because it is inter-related.

I was hoping to speak about Pointe-Verte and the closure of its post office; the reduction of hours at the Dalhousie post office, Saturday service; the sorting centre in Campbellton; the reduction of hours in Nash Creek; and the requirement for extra boxes in Saint-Quentin and Kedgwick.

[Translation]

These points must be made. However other members want to speak and I know that we started late because of the vote. Therefore I will give them this opportunity and shorten my speech.

[English]

I would only hope that other MPs will support me in the move to have the Canadian flag fly at every post office outlet in Canada.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate on the proposal to change the Canada Post Corporation Act with regard to the use of our national flag.

I believe that the hon. member is presenting us with a complicated solution to a problem which for the most part does not exist. I do not believe the hon. member has been able to demonstrate that there is really a need for this legislation. I do not think that it deserves the support of this House.

It does not merit our support for several reasons. There is the cost which would be incurred should this legislation become law, but this is not the reason for my objection.

The hon. member's bill ultimately proposes that the flag be displayed in every business in this country that provides postal service, some 14,000 sites. I would hope that the hon. member is not suggesting that Canada Post is not proudly displaying the Canadian flag because that is simply contrary to the facts.

Canada Post has an official policy to guide its employees in the proper manner for display of the Canadian flag. This policy ensures that all Canadian flags that are displayed in corporate facilities across Canada are done so in a fashion that demonstrates pride and respect.

There are approximately 19,000 locations at which postal products and services are available across this country. Of those, only about 3,600 are corporate post offices. It is Canada Post Corporation's practice to display the Canadian flag at its corporate buildings and sites, but the vast majority of postal outlets are franchise operations that are primarily located in retail stores owned and operated by private individuals.

The hon. member will agree that we should continue to respect the independence of those individuals who run private outlets and rely on their good sense and judgment on this question.

Some of these franchise operations are in small quarters. I believe it is up to the individual retail store owner, whether they have a postal service or not, to decide whether they want to display the Canadian flag.

Canada Post is doing an excellent job of providing official postal service to all Canadians. When the former government presented legislation in 1981 to convert the old post office department into a self-sufficient Crown corporation it did so with the intention of removing the postal service from political interference. Even the CUPW president at the time, Jean-Claude Parrot, welcomed the move and encouraged Parliament to let the managers of Canada Post manage. All parties in this House agreed to the change because it was a very sensible solution to a nearly impossible situation.

In my view the results have been very positive. As many members want to speak, I do not want to use my full allotted time. I think the management of the new Canada Post is one of the most important elements in making this organization work to the benefit of all Canadians.

I cannot fault the hon. member wanting to encourage a display of the Canadian flag, and I doubt that any Canadian would find fault with his suggestion. However, I believe this bill misrepresents Canada Post's commitment to the promotion of Canada's distinct identity.

Every year Canada Post produces 250 million Canadian flag stamp definitives. Canada Post is proud to encourage Canadians to use it year after year. Since the introduction of these stamps many attractive designs of the Canadian flag have been featured. I am happy to say that often I use these designed stamps on my own correspondence and I urge all fellow Canadians when they are buying stamps to request that particular stamp.

Canada Post's commitment to national heritage does not stop there. Canada Post is a contributor to a series of TV vignettes seeking to make Canadians aware of their special heritage. Each one-minute spot highlights a particular facet of Canadian history or an outstanding Canadian. I am sure many members have seen these on television.

I want to congratulate Canada Post for its continued contribution, not only in its commercial capacity but perhaps even more so as an agent of Canadian identity.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise today and put a few comments on the record on Bill C-241, presented by the member for Restigouche—Chaleur, with respect to the Canada Post Corporation and the national flag of Canada.

The member has made some very valid points in pointing out the reasoning behind putting this bill before Parliament to change the Canada Post Corporation Act to ensure that flags are flown over all Canada Post outlets.

If we think back to the establishment of not only Canada but the postal service we realize what it has meant to our various communities, as the member has pointed out and those of us from rural Canada understand perfectly, and how important our postal outlets were prior to privatization and, in some cases, still are to our small communities.

It is a gathering point. Back in the old days it was a place where the local people came in and congregated. That was a tradition that continues in some communities today. Unfortunately as we go across Canada more and more small postal offices in our small rural communities are being closed and so are some of the post offices in some of our larger communities.

In my own riding Penticton, with a population of 27,000, had its post office closed last year in spite of that community rallying behind its post office and the fact that I presented petitions with the names of well over half of the population of Penticton protesting the closure of the post office.

In the rural areas around Penticton the community of Naramata just recently had its post office closed. Rock Creek, a small community in the boundary country, had a post office until last year that was over 100 years old, almost 125 years old. Yet Canada Post does not care for history. Canada Post apparently does not care for service and Canada Post has not indicated that it cares very much for patriotism.

The member is on the right track in that he is trying to ensure we are at least keeping a little bit of our heritage, our culture and our patriotism in our small communities by saying that if people have a Canada Post outlet they should at least identify themselves as part of the Canadian mosaic, the Canadian culture, the string that keeps Canada together. I agree with that proposition.

Let me digress a little bit. We are saying that all postal outlets should be identified as Canada Post and Canadian outlets by the reason of the flag.

Let us go back to exactly what is happening. I recall when I was in business approximately eight years ago that across Canada we were assured of one-day service from major centre to major centre. I live in the small community of Osoyoos, British Columbia. I am a lawyer, and in sending our land registry documents to Kamloops we would put them in the mail at 2.30 in the afternoon. They would be delivered and we would have registration phoned back to us by eleven o'clock the following morning.

In the last year the people in my constituency have been keeping track of how long it takes to get mail from one community to the other. Just yesterday I received a letter from a constituent enclosing an envelope and his stamp received date on it from Kelowna to Penticton, 40 miles. It took eight days to deliver that piece of mail 40 miles.

That is not the only one. I had a phone call a few days ago telling of a letter that was sent from Summerland to Okanagan Falls, approximately 25 miles. It took 11 days to deliver that piece of mail the 25 miles. I just received some correspondence that was mailed six weeks ago in Vancouver, intercepted and re-sent by Canada Post to Ottawa. On a regular basis it takes from my office in Ottawa to my office in Penticton, British Columbia, 8 to 14 days to have mail delivered.

I look at it and say: What has Canada Post done? How is its service improved with the privatization of our small postal outlets?

We have not even taken baby steps forward. We have taken giant steps backward. We are worse off, I would suggest, than we were back in the pony express days. Speaking of pony express, we have gone back in my riding. The centre of Princeton, British Columbia has twinned with a community in the United States called Tonasket. Each year they have a pony express ride where they take letters from one community to the other. By horseback they get those letters between the two communities, some 150 to 180 miles, in approximately six hours. They are doing a lot better than Canada Post is with all of its modernization.

Canada Post has not done much for my constituents. It has closed post offices. It has taken away the identity of small communities. It has privatized areas, and I get complaints about that. There are some good retail outlets. I do not argue with the fact that often those retail outlets are kept open longer hours, but unfortunately those people are not bonded. Unfortunately those people often are not trained adequately to handle the mail.

There are 19,000 locations that should be covered. Perhaps flying the flag over one of these retail outlets would give the workers more pride in the work they do. They may already have three or four other jobs to do in a retail outlet. Perhaps it would give them extra incentive in getting the mail to people. Perhaps it would show Canada Post that we in Canada still care about Canadian culture, Canadian unity and that Canada Post is the bottom line entity in getting our mail from east to west.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have 22 minutes left and I have the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, and the hon. member for Mont Royal. Use discretion, please.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, let me begin my remarks by congratulating the member for Restigouche—Chaleur for his initiative this afternoon to ensure that the flag of Canada is displayed in post offices and in agencies providing postal services in Canada.

I heard the remarks of the hon. member for Cambridge. In the beginning he invoked cost as a reason not to do this and then said he did not really mean cost, he just said it as an aside. I am paraphrasing here.

The member for Cambridge should be aware if he has read the bill—and the bill is only about 20 lines long—that under the bill the size of the flag and the material is to be designed by regulation to be promulgated by his government. Therefore there is nothing that stops us in a retail postal outlet operated by the private sector to have a flag which would be in the form of a decal, for instance, to be affixed to the counter, not at a cost of $150, but at a cost perhaps of a few cents. That is what we are talking about in the case of a privatized outlet. Needless to say, if it were a Canada Post structure, owned by the corporation, we would expect an outdoor flag of the kind that is customary.

I remember two years ago getting a phone call from an irate constituent in Navan, Ontario in my riding, complaining about the fact that the flag on the post office was all ripped and that it looked terrible.

An hon. member: Faded.

Mr. Boudria: Not faded. Faded would have been the least of her worries. I phoned Canada Post. After a month of trying I finally gave a flag to the constituent to take to the postmaster because no one had had the smarts to replace it in spite of my requests and those of my constituent. Is that acceptable for a federal government structure? I say not and my constituents say not.

Furthermore, let us remember what is in the Canada Post Corporation Act, the law of the land as it is today.

Section 5(2)(e) of the Canada Post Corporation Act stipulates that, and I quote:

> While maintaining basic customary postal service, the corporation, in carrying out its objects, shall have regard to——listen to this—

> (e) the need to maintain a corporate identity program approved by the Governor in Council that reflects the role of the corporation as an institution of the Government of Canada.

Therefore the Canada Post Corporation now must identify itself as an agency of the Government of Canada. Have you seen recently the Canada coat of arms on a post office? The Canada Post Corporation abolished it. When have you last seen the traditional flag design on the logo of the Canada Post Corporation? The corporation abolished it in contravention of the existing law. The hon. member for Cambridge and others who think likewise approve of that kind of behaviour. I do not nor does the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur.

[English]

In April 1990 the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations published a report called "Moving The Mail". I have a copy of it here. In the dissenting report, if you want to call it that, there were additional recommendations or additional clauses proposed by the Liberal Party. I authored many of these clauses and in particular this one. Liberal recommendation No. 40, which is part of Liberal policy as we speak now and has been approved by our leader, is that Canada Post restore its corporate identity program to reflect the role of the corporation as an institution of the Government of Canada. Anyone at Canada Post listening right now better take heed because that is what we want. That is what we want and that is what Canadians want.

[Translation]

Most of the time in rural Canada, as my friend from Restigouche—Chaleur said so well, the post office is the only federal building. That is where we get passport forms, birth certificate forms, old age pension forms, et cetera. In many villages, only the postmaster can certify a passport. It is an important position. Maybe that does not mean anything to some hon. members on the other side or even to officials of the Canada Post Corporation, but to many of us in rural Canada the postmaster and the post office are very important. They represent the federal government.

• (1945)

When we founded this country, one of the reasons we did it was to defend our borders, have a universal currency within our boundaries, and deliver the mail. Those three reasons are still there and they are still valid.

I am sorry to say it but I do not accept the reasons invoked by the member for Cambridge earlier tonight that we cannot afford this, or that it is undesirable, or that this is a Crown corporation. If it is a Crown corporation the least it could do is to live within the act that exists now, but it does not even do that.

No, Mr. Speaker, I do not accept those arguments and neither do my colleagues. Canada Post can bloody well learn to live within the law and behave like a Crown corporation, a corporation of the Government of Canada. This is not Purolator, this is not a company that manufactures hockey pucks. This is a corporation of the government. This is Canada Post. That is how I want it, that is how my colleagues want it and, more important, that is what Canadians expect us to do.

I congratulate my colleague.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, since other members wish to speak as well, I will be brief and I simply want to say that the bill introduced this evening by the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur is undoubtedly well-intentioned. I heard the hon. member's presentation on his bill to the Sub-committee on Private Members' Business, and I must say his argument was very convincing.

However the hon. member must realize that Canada Post offers its services through a network of more than 19,000 sales outlets, of which only 3,600 belong to the Canada Post Corporation. The corporation has always given our national flag pride of place in its establishments.

It is the corporation's policy to ensure that its employees know the proper way to display the Canadian flag. The Canada Post Corporation ensures the flag is displayed proudly and with respect.

However the vast majority of postal counters in this country are located in retail sales outlets owned by private interests. Most of them are in drugstores, retail stores, variety stores, service stations and shopping malls.

Since private sector entrepreneurs make up the majority of sales outlets of Canada Post, I think it is up to them to decide what they wish to display in their own establishments.

First of all, I want to point out that in corporate sales outlets where it is possible to do so the Canadian flag is prominently displayed by the corporation.

Second, this bill totally ignores Canada Post's commitment to promote the Canadian flag. The corporation is already involved in promoting the image of the Canadian flag in its philatelic program. Every year Canada Post produces 250 million stamps showing the Canadian flag—more than 10 stamps for every man, woman and child in this country—and the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur will admit that as far as promoting the Canadian flag is concerned this is a tremendous program.

Incidentally, in philatelic language these stamps are commonly referred to as definitives, in other words, stamps that are reprinted year after year. This government is proud of the fact that year after year the Canada Post Corporation promotes the Canadian flag through its philatelic program.

Despite their differences, Canadians are proud of their country and thanks to Canada Post they can express that pride by using these stamps that bear the image of our flag. I hope that all members will encourage Canadians to use these splendid stamps on their correspondence.

Eleven years ago, when Canada Post was established as a Crown corporation with the support of all political parties, the postal system was going through a very difficult period. Service was deteriorating, labour relations were in disarray and the deficit was nearing $1 billion.

Changes had to be made to provide the postal service to which Canadians were entitled. In particular, it was necessary to eliminate political interference in postal affairs. It was time to let the experts on mail delivery work without worrying about the political meddling that was customary before 1984.

I believe that Canada Post is doing a very good job and that it has considerably improved the postal service, thanks to the cooperation of local businesses and establishments which provide Canadians with increased access to postal products and services. Today stamps and other postal products and services are sold wherever the demand exists, especially in food stores and shops and various other types of business.

I think it is essential, and I am sure that the great majority of our fellow citizens agree, that we can obtain postal services right where we shop. Franchises are an additional asset. They help lower the cost of operating the postal service, which results in moderate rates and good service for all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to rise and support my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur and his private members' bill, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, which would ensure that the national flag of Canada is displayed in the manner prescribed by the regulations inside each post office and on every building in which a post office is located and of which the Government of Canada is the owner or the main tenant.

I cannot believe what I have been hearing from the government in the last 20 minutes. National programs and national symbols are how we create national will in this country. It is from national will, national symbols and the symbol of our flag that we develop a sense of patriotism in this country.

Over the last nine years Canadians have experienced national institutions and national programs being dismantled year after year after year.

Now we have a situation where the post office is no longer flying the Canadian flag. This is wrong. The federal presence has always been integral to holding this country together. There are regions in this country where the post office is the only federal presence. Just think, by comparison, of what happens in the United States. One could not find a United States government building or truck without the American flag on it.

I cannot understand when the member from Cambridge talks about franchises, that he wants to give them their own independence. When one gives a franchise one sets standards. One of the standards should be the federal presence. In the province of Quebec there is not going to be any mad rush to display the Canadian flag. Oh yes, there are thousands of buildings in the province of Quebec that are owned by the Government of Canada and the federal flag is not flying. Now, under the name of privatization and franchises, the government is saying: Oh, we will not tell them what to do. That should be a condition of the franchise, that the Canadian flag is flying.

I think this government is taking the idea of federal presence too lightly. I know that when I first came to this town in 1980 it was during that period that we developed the Canada word mark, which is the word Canada with the flag over the letter a.

I remember one time we were working with Spar Aerospace and there was a group that did not want to put the Canada word mark on the Spar Aerospace space arm because it was a private sector company. We said that there is $130 million worth of taxpayers' money that went into that space arm and so we insisted that the Canada word mark go on the space arm.

When that space arm opened in outer space for the first time and everyone in the world saw that space arm and we could all see the Canada word mark there was a great sense of pride in the technology and the people that put that technology together. It was a great symbol of our contribution to the space project.

As far as I am concerned that Canadian flag should be on every federal building, prison and post office. Every piece of Government of Canada property should always display the Canadian flag because it works at galvanizing the will of this nation, and when the will of this nation is galvanized the economy flourishes because it affects the spirit and everything else.

More than ever this country needs to be galvanized because for the last nine years we have been dismantling national institutions and programs to the point where Canadians have lost their identity to a great extent.

I stand proudly behind my colleague today from Restigouche—Chaleur in insisting on this. We have an act here which enshrines the Canadian flag at every post office in this nation. Whether it is a government-operated post office, a Crown-operated post office or a franchise it should be part of the package.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion that has taken place here this afternoon and I want to take this opportunity first to thank our colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur for having brought forward the whole question of national symbols and national identity, the Canadian flag and the whole sense of Canadian persona.

I want to say to anyone who is interested in this issue that the remarks of my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell were very revealing and the warmth, dimension and depth of feeling that was expressed by my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood—as well as from my colleagues from across the floor and on both sides of this House—were very meaningful.

I find it absolutely abhorrent in today's country that, after we have gone through the Spicer commission and all the agony and sometimes ecstasy of the constitutional discussions when Canadians have said that they love Canada: "I love Canada; let us show the flag". We can have differences of opinion as to what that flag means in terms of the Constitution of the country, but we have no difference of opinion with respect to our pride of belonging, our pride of heritage.

The concern that I want to express—I ask everyone to read the other speeches that were brought to our attention because they were worth while—is that if there is one thing that we need it is the tie that binds. The tie that binds has been cut and cut by this government.

Look at the post offices in many places in the small, rural sectors; the railroad lines; the privatization of Air Canada; the cutting of the air routes; the CBC in small parts of this country and the cutting of our cultural programs throughout this country that develop the sense of who we are as a people. There is no sense of pride in the way this government has picked its priorities.

One of the simplest ways to establish one's priority and to establish who one is across the nation is to put a flag up. It is at the back of the store, the front of the store and behind the teller. Whoever is serving us in that post office is the link. That is the Canadian voice that is going out or coming in as the case may be.

I really have a strong sense that our patriotism is being diminished by this government's lack of foresight. So we have 19,000 locations, so we have 3,600 corporate offices and sites. The member for Cambridge stood up and talked about the fact that we should not interfere with individual rights because they took a franchise. With a franchise people buy logos, responsibilities, and obligations. The obligation in this case should be to fly the Canadian flag. If the space is too small then put on a Canadian sticker. They do not get it for nothing. They have an obligation to use the rights and privileges to distribute the mail for Canadians across this land.

Canada was founded on a number of principles. One principle was the ties that bind with respect to defending our own borders, common sense and courtesy, and delivering the mail.

With you people it does not matter who delivers the mail as long as they have the right to negotiate, as long as they have the right to forget that they are Canadians and they have an obligation to demonstrate that to people across this country and in Quebec, as my colleague said, and anywhere else across this land.

I would like to support this particular motion and thank the hon. member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being eight o'clock p.m., the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

PRIVILEGE

ALLEGED COMMENTS OF MEMBER FOR ROSEMONT

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, having thought the matter over and reviewed the remarks made on this subject on Tuesday March 23 as reported in Hansard, I wish to withdraw the comments that were construed as offensive.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the hon. member's gesture and I hope this resolves the matter.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 11 petitions.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS AND GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Madam Speaker, I move that the seventh report of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, presented to the House on Tuesday, June 23, 1992 be concurred in.

• (1010)

On June 22, 1992 the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, after a lengthy study which followed two studies on credit card interest rates, the previous one having been in 1989, tabled its report.

The New Democratic Party did not agree with the conclusions reached by the majority members of the committee. As a result I tabled a minority report on behalf of my caucus with respect to credit card interest rates.

We tried to make several points throughout. We were in a period when the Bank of Canada rate was dropping. Yet at the same time credit card interest rates remained up. The Bank of Canada rate was coming down. The prime rate came down and credit card interest rates stayed up. Today the Bank of Canada rate is somewhere around 5.6 per cent. The prime rate is at 6 per cent.

An hon. member: Thanks to our policies.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is another debate, I say to the minister who says thanks to their policies. That is another debate.

The prime rate is at 6 per cent and the Bank of Canada rate is at 5.46 per cent. Yet the credit card interest rate for the standard Bank of Montreal card is 16.75 per cent; for Canada Trust, 17.75 per cent; for the National Bank, 17.25 per cent; for National Trust, 15.75 per cent; for the Scotiabank standard card, 16.75 per cent; the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce card, 16.75 per cent; Central Guaranty, 17.75 per cent; the Laurentian Bank, 16.75 per cent; Montreal Trust, 16.75 per cent; the Royal Bank standard card, 16.75 per cent; and the Toronto-Dominion Bank, 16.75 per cent.

This is a time when interest rates, as the Prime Minister said yesterday, are the lowest in some 20-odd years. Yet we have disparity between the credit card interest rates and the Bank of Canada rate.

We were not convinced that there was a competitive marketplace out there among the banks. In fact what we have is an oligopolistic system in the financial institution sector of the economy. In other words the marketplace did not set the rates. Had the marketplace set the rates when the Bank of Montreal came in with its prime-plus card about a year ago or when the Scotiabank came in with its card which offers 10.5 per cent, one would have thought all banks would have started competing at the lower rates.

The fact of the matter is there is no competition. There is no marketplace. Read my lips, Madam Speaker: There is no marketplace with respect to the setting of credit card interest rates. What we have is legalized grand larceny on the part of the banks. If anybody outside the banking system had done that, he or she could be charged with highway robbery.

What did the committee do? It ignored the opportunity to put a leash on these roaring bandits. Actually it refused to put a collar and a leash on them.

We argued in committee that we needed to set a floating cap on credit card interest rates. Since there is no competition the only way to protect consumers as they grovel and as they forage for credit in the marketplace is by having a floating cap on credit card interest rates. This means that as the Bank of Canada rate comes down, credit card rates will come down; if the Bank of Canada rate goes up, the credit card interest rates will go up.

Right now there is no benchmark by which the banks bring down the rates. It all depends which side of the bed the president of the Royal Bank gets out on. When he looks at the overnight returns on foreign exchange profits it determines whether the rate comes down .5 per cent or stays up. We are depending on the goodness of the heart of very—

An hon. member: Heartless people.

Mr. Rodriguez: I would say more: very greedy people. On the government side of the House they hope consumers will open their wallets and start spending us out of this recession. How can they expect that when the banks have them by the neck or by any other part of the anatomy, whichever is the more effective?

We said that the only way to control them was to put a floating cap. The banks said we could not do that, that it would interfere in the marketplace. The Tories said we could not do that, that it would interfere in the marketplace.

I have never seen such a vivid example of where Tories and the banking sector were cheek to cheek and jowl to jowl on an issue.

An hon. member: Teller to teller.

Mr. Rodriguez: This government has achieved it. I give it full marks.

We have the spectacle of consumers being taken to the cleaners. We said they should not do that, that we should have a standard by which those rates will come down, and that standard has to be in relation to the Bank of Canada rate. Imagine 300 per cent more being charged. That is usurious, absolutely usurious.

These are the most profitable institutions in the country. The banks have done spectacularly well. Even when they do not do very well, even when they actually goof up as in the Olympia and York situation and even when they went down to South America and lent the money for petrodollars, who bailed them out? The taxpayers. Even when they have trouble, the taxpayers bail them out.

When it is to make sure they get the best deals going as the whole marketplace is collapsing, we make sure Toronto-Dominion gets all the choice parts of Central Guaranty. When Royal Trust was in trouble we made sure the Royal Bank got all the choice cuts from the side of beef and we left the taxpayers to pick at the bones. The taxpayers got the soup bones. Who gets the meat? It is the big banks.

Our caucus said we had to have a floating rate, that it was the only way to provide justice in the marketplace as far as credit card interest rates were concerned. In 1989 the committee recommended the floating cap. The committee at that time was led by a Tory. This time it was led by a different Tory. I am sad to say the Liberals went back on their commitment to a floating cap and voted with the Tories to produce the report that was tabled on June 22.

An hon. member: What's new?

Mr. Rodriguez: What is new? What is the difference? They all sing to the same master for their supper. I suppose at this time when we are on the eve of an election, they have to really pat the banks because they need to protect their donations and their contributions.

The other thing we said in our minority report was that all partial payments should be applied and should be fully credited to the amount owing and that the interest charged should only be on the amount owing.

The province of Quebec has legislation that says for every partial payment made the interest can only be calculated on the remaining balance. I want to mention an interesting situation. That is the law in the province of Quebec for consumers. That is the kind of law I wanted the federal government to adopt in the Bank Act. Then the benefits that Quebec consumers get with respect to credit would apply to all Canadians. I think it is an exemplary piece of legislation.

In fact, the National Bank, the bank in the province of Quebec, was following the rules of Quebec. When it joined the club, the bankers association, I bet you dollars to doughnuts the pressure was put on it to conform to the way the other banks do it. The club made the club member conform.

Therefore, it seems to me this is one of the things that we should be concentrating on, never mind trying to ram NAFTA through here in two days with limitations on freedom of speech in the House of Commons. Why do we not really deal with the things that will provide benefits to Canadians, rather than taking them away? Even now with the NAFTA as it will apply to the banking system, those will never be touched now. They will never be touched, once they are locked into a North American continental financial institution structure. That is the problem.

Therefore, we said to them: "Look, every partial payment that is made should be deducted from the balance owing and the interest should only be calculated on the balance owing".

An hon. member: That makes sense.

Mr. Rodriguez: Oh, no, they go back and charge it from the beginning, if the payment date has passed.

An hon. member: Even on members of Parliament?

Mr. Rodriguez: Well, I know on this member of Parliament. I do not know about all members of Parliament.

I say that is the most unfair way. We suggested that all credit card issuers be compelled to calculate the interest charges in a consistent way. Every one of them should calculate the interest using the same process.

We said that there ought to be a financial services ombudsperson. That person would monitor credit card rates and the abuse of financial service charges. In all my case-load a good 25 per cent of it deals with credit card complaints and service charges imposed by the banks on their customers.

Now, what does that make the member of Parliament? It makes the member of Parliament an ombudsperson for financial institutions. The member of Parliament now becomes the ombudsperson and has to phone and try to get the banks to let up.

As I watch I notice these service charges and the credit card interest rates are often used to bail out the banks from some of their terrible investment decisions. I have watched small businessmen in my riding, small entrepreneurs who have gone hat in hand to the banks saying: "Carry me through this recession". Here are these banks, the pillars of the community. When things are going well and the money is rolling in it is happy days are here again. They break out the champagne. When the economy shrinks in the community, who are first on the Greyhound bus to Mexico? Who are first on the Greyhound bus to the Cayman Islands? The banks, closing up.

It is amazing. They are there when the going is good. When things get tough, they tighten down the hatches, but they do not tighten them down on the big guys. No, when Mr. Reichmann phoned up, he said: "Look, I need $100 million for Canary Wharf". Or is it Parrot Wharf, the bird sanctuary in London. When he said: "Can I get $100 million", the Royal Bank president said: "Mr. Reichmann, are you sure you do not want $200 million? It is the same price. You can get $200 million and we do not want to see your books. Security? We do not need security. We will take your word for it".

Now, do you see the difference? If the entrepreneur goes to the banks, the banks say: "No, you cannot have credit. You do not have any collateral. You do not have any security, not even for a $25,000 loan, not even for a $40,000 loan".

Mr. Barrett: "We will take your home".

Mr. Rodriguez: Not even for a $100,000 loan. They do not want that.

Mr. Barrett: They do not want his home.

Mr. Rodriguez: No, they have too much real estate.

Mr. Barrett: Too many homes.

Mr. Rodriguez: The greatest landlords in the nation, the banks. That is what they are.

When the going is good, they are there. When times are tough, they do not take risks. They do not take a chance on the people who built the community. They do not have any interest, do they? They do not have any interest. That is all. They do not take an interest. They just want interest. That is the way it works.

I want to give credit where credit is due; I am not a negative person. We have probably one of the best banking systems in the world. Why do I say that? Because in fact we have a Bank Act. It is a national banking system. Parliament has the power to set the ground rules by which the banks operate. We do not have the Barrett First National Bank of British Columbia. He tried it once.

Mr. Barrett: They would not let me.

Mr. Rodriguez: They would not let him, but a different government, what does it matter? It is still a Liberal, Tory, a Liber-Tor government. He tried it once and it did not work.

Mr. Barrett: They would not let me.

Mr. Rodriguez: They would not let him, but he tried. His heart was in the right place.

Mr. Barrett: So was my deposit.

Mr. Rodriguez: Now you have made me lose my train of thought here. Where was I?

We have a national banking system. It is controlled by the House of Commons. The banks have branches right across the country. No doubt about it, it is a very efficient system. Compared to the American system, we are in the 21st century.

Why is it that when it comes time to actually make the banking system work for the country, make the banking system work for Canadians, we suddenly back off?

Mr. Barrett: No, the government works for the banks.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is the question then, why? You have given me the answer.

Mr. Barrett: They work for the banks.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is right. You have got it right, brother.

Mr. Barrett: I knew I had it right.

Mr. Rodriguez: I know, that is why you were premier. I wish you were premier longer.

Mr. Barrett: Then I wouldn't have been thrown out of here.

Mr. Rodriguez: The question has been answered. The reason is because political will is lacking. Political will does not exist on the part of the two old line parties when they have been the government, the ability to make the bankers do what is best for Canada. It is the other way around.

• (1030)

Mr. Barrett: You can bank on that.

Mr. Rodriguez: The government works for the banks. That is how the system works.

My party said in our minority report that we believe the consumers' interests should be protected in this area. We proposed a floating cap. That seems fair to me. The precedent has been set. There are a whole host of other areas where we use the Bank of Canada rate as the departure point for other rates. We use that all the time.

For example, in the government's Small Businesses Loans Act it is 1.5 per cent above prime or 2 per cent above prime. We always use a benchmark against which we set interest rates. Why are banks allowed to gouge consumers with high interest rates?

Imagine at this time that the Royal Bank's interest card rate is 16.5 per cent. That is unconscionable. I call on members to indicate their non-support of a system that allows the banks to just go ahead and keep on gouging consumers again and again and again.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, I would like to express first of all my appreciation to my colleague, the member for Sudbury, for fighting this issue and proposing an alternative and not just being negative.

I would like to inquire from my colleague as to whether there has been any positive response from the banking community in these complaints he has made. Has any bank shown any interest in being concerned about its depositors, those people that they appeal to through massive advertising expenditures across this country? Every time we turn on the television—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, I must interrupt the hon. member. The hon. member for Sudbury on a question of privilege.

Mrs. Marleau: I want to remind the House, Madam Speaker, that I am the member of Parliament for Sudbury and that the member when he was speaking was not referring to me. I will not be a party to this kind of obstructive behaviour in the House of Commons.

Mr. Barrett: That is right, Madam Speaker, I was referring to the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

Mr. Barrett: I regret that other members are not fighting the banks. I regret that other members are not demanding that their constituents have floating caps put on their cards. I am surprised that a member would get up and say she does not want any part in this. I want to tell her constituents and everyone else if that is the position of the Liberal Party, it proves that members of that party are in with this government and they want to continue this gouging system of those cards.

If I may return to my comments, Madam Speaker, I want to point out that every magazine says: "Get another card. Grab another credit card. Go ahead". I want to ask the member: How much does it cost the banks to advertise for all this gouging that goes on? Why do they not give the service they say with the claims of the ads with the sweet smile saying: "Come on in here". Do they mention in any of those ads exactly what they are going to charge on those cards? Do they tell people the truth in those ads?

Mr. Rodriguez: I want to thank the hon. member for his questions. There are a couple of observations on the questions.

First of all, just imagine right now the rates are about 16.75 per cent on the credit cards. Just ask yourself, Madam Speaker, when you put your money in the bank, what do you get on deposits? I think if you are getting 1.5 per cent now you are pretty lucky. What is the spread? That is another comparison one has to make: What the banks pay for money on deposit and what they charge their credit card customers. That is another interesting spread which I point out to my hon. colleagues. The other spread I mentioned was between the cost of money, the Bank of Canada rate and the 16.75 per cent figure.

• (1035)

The other question is the advertising. Of course they suck people in with the advertising. They do not say in the TV advertising what the cost of the card is. People find that out when they make the application for the card and then get the card, that is when people really find out what the rates are.

It is also interesting to point out that ranked by profit five of the top 10 companies in Canada last year were banks. Together the big five earned after-tax profits of $3.5 billion in what for most businesses was a grievously tough year.

They did very well, but 50 per cent of the people who hold credit cards issued by banks did not get any breaks. Fifty per cent of card holders do not pay off their cards on time so they carry a balance and pay these usurious interest rates. There are no benefits for them.

Where does the money go? It goes to the banks to make the kinds of investments that we have seen in recent times. We have seen the problems with O&Y, the Campeau Corporation, and the Hees-Edper group. That is where the banks have been lending their money. We have seen it there.

The banks are not prepared to take a chance on small entrepreneurs. In order for them to do so they want the government to give them all kinds of guarantees. Why does the government have to pass a bill guaranteeing returns to banks to make loans to small entrepreneurs? One would think that is the nature of banking. The nature of banking is to make an investment to make a profit. They want guarantees from the government. What do they do to their clients? They grab them by the neck and squeeze and squeeze.

The other question the hon. member raised was initiatives by banks. I mentioned the Bank of Montreal and its prime-plus card. It used the floating cap when I was told it could not be done. It said it would charge prime plus 5 per cent. That was one year ago and I applauded that initiative. I said to the Bank of Montreal that this was a good move.

Lo and behold, the other banks have not followed. The Bank of Nova Scotia came out late last year with its special credit card at 10.5 per cent. I applauded it for the action it took in setting the card rate at 10.5 per cent. Do not get too anxious. That does not mean that we can go over to Scotiabank or the Bank of Montreal and say we have this amount owing to CIBC Visa of $4,000 and ask whether they can lend us $4,000 and then we will get their card. It does not work that way.

Mr. Barrett: No?

Mr. Rodriguez: No sir. It does not work that way.

Mr. Barrett: Why not?

Mr. Rodriguez: It is because they want to sign up new business. They are not going to give people money to pay off and finance that CIBC card at 10.5 per cent.

This is the situation. It was unfortunate that the committee did not stick by its 1989 recommendations of a floating cap. I was most disappointed to see my Liberal colleague falling in with the Tories on the committee. It was the same member on the committee who in 1989 supported the floating cap. In 1992 he had a change of heart. What had changed? Nothing had changed.

Credit card interest rates were still high and the Bank of Canada rate was down. It seemed to me that one had to ask why there was a change of heart.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend is a well-known friend and supporter of Ms. Shelley Martel, the NDP cabinet minister who took a lie detector test to prove conclusively that she was telling the truth when she said she lied.

It has often been rumoured that he was the person behind that strategy. There has even been a rumour that he leaked it to the media.

• (1040)

I wonder if my hon. friend has discussed this very serious matter with Ms. Martel in the many strategy sessions they hold in their weekly and almost daily meetings while he is in the riding. It is very well known that they are very close and that they share strategies. I just wondered if he has discussed this with her.

An hon. member: Order, Madam Speaker. This is completely out of order.

Mr. Rodriguez: Madam Speaker, I fail to see the relevance of the minister's question to the issue of what is being done to consumers on credit card interest rates. The issue we are dealing with is the rates that banks and other financial institutions charge on their credit cards.

This has nothing to do with conflicts of interest by Sinclair Stevens or other Tories of the past.

An hon. member: Or convictions for theft or corruption.

Mr. Rodriguez: They have nothing to do with convictions for theft by Tory members—

An hon. member: Or patronage.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think comments on both sides are out of order and certainly not relevant.

Mr. Rodriguez: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You sat there quietly while he raised a question that had absolutely no relevance.

Madam Deputy Speaker: My comment was that comments on both sides did not belong in this place and I could not see the relevance of the comments from the minister. After I saw that the hon. member had answered and was continuing with comments that were not particularly relevant I thought it was a bit early today to get out of the normal line of discussion in this House.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker—

Mr. Rodriguez: Madam Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege because there were implications in the minister's remarks and I believe they must be withdrawn. I believe they impugn my reputation by innuendo and that is not becoming of a member in this House.

Madam Speaker, I think you should ask the minister to withdraw his remarks.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, in the interest of progress, and I know my hon. friend wants to remain in the House, I will withdraw any impugning implications that I might have made in suggesting there was a close relationship between Ms. Martel and the hon. member.

Mr. Breaugh: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I know there has been a small amount of frivolity in what has been done here this morning, including the Solicitor General sitting chortling that he had managed to get something on the record.

I do not want to deny the House the right to have a little exchange back and forth, but I do want to draw to your attention, Madam Speaker, that there ought to be a distinction when the Solicitor General of Canada takes advantage of his parliamentary privileges, rises in his place and puts on the formal record of the proceedings of the Parliament of Canada some remarks that outside this Chamber might well be considered matters subject to legal action.

• (1045)

Mr. Cadieux: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. As my hon. colleagues are seemingly acknowledging that innuendo should not be used in the House I hope they will remember that in Question Period.

Mr. Barrett: Point of order, Madam Speaker. Since points of order are being used for debate it is up to the Chair to determine, and we have a complaint about that.

My colleague rose on a point of privilege. There was no intervention from the Chair when that member was completely out of order. That has not been addressed by the Chair.

I ask you, Madam Speaker, to explain why that member was allowed to speak completely out of order, but my colleague was brought to order when he was responding to that member.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister has done the honourable thing and has withdrawn all comments.

We will resume debate. The hon. member for Manicouagan had been recognized and had started his speech.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I move:

That the House do now proceed to Orders of the Day.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Motion carried. Orders of the Day.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, it is quite within the power of the hon. member for Manicouagan to move that we move to Orders of the Day but the Chair is under obligation to ask who is in favour of the motion, et cetera and—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I did. I did ask if it was the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion and the only thing that was heard was yes.

Point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, at least you can recognize that there may have been some uncertainty given the distance between here and there and that you may not have heard members who said no when you asked.

You could ask again and see what happens. You could at least have the decency to do that, Madam Speaker, so that we could have a vote on this if indeed there are five members who are here to force a vote.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question was very clear. The hon. member put the motion, I put the question to the House and nobody said no.

Orders of the day.

An hon. member: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I cannot see a point of order but I will of course listen to the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, there is no need for the Chair to disgrace itself in this way—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am well aware that the issue we are about to deal with is a very difficult one, as it is the object of much contention and kindles passion—

[English]

The hon. member will please allow the Chair to answer some of the concerns that have been raised.

An hon. member: Take a vote.

Mr. Barrett: You are being stupid.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am on my feet. I would appreciate if the hon. member would withdraw that comment. That was not to me personally. I think not. Do not apologize to me but please apologize to the Chair and to this institution.

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, when the Chair starts acting worthy of the respect that the Chair deserves I will start apologizing.

An hon. member: Point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Just a minute, please. Let us go back a little bit. A motion was put from the floor. I put the motion to the House. I asked if the House was ready to adopt this motion. I have checked now with the Table and nobody at the table heard anyone say no. It might have been said but it was not heard at this end of the House. It is also the members' duty to make sure that they are heard. Certainly hon. members can do what is needed to be heard at this end of the House. This time they were not.

I declared the motion carried and the motion is carried. We will now proceed. I will now put the motion to the House.

Some hon. members: A point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre), seconded by Mr. Andre moves that Bill C–115, an act to—

Some hon. members: Point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am putting a motion to the House; it cannot be interrupted—an act to amend the North American free trade agreement be now read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? Debate.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister of International Trade) moved that Bill C–115, an act to implement the North American free trade agreement be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Madam Speaker—

Some hon. members: Point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, with respect, you said that you may not have heard nos, so you may have been in error. Yes, Madam Speaker, you said you may not have heard. That is the point that we are making.

Two members have said they said no. If you are calling them liars, which you are not doing, you said you may not have heard it. What I am suggesting is that you put the vote, based on an hon. member's word.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I said I did not hear anyone say no, and the officers at the Table did not hear anyone either. I then made a decision, and that decision is maintained. I must say I do not appreciate the comments that are being made, both directly and indirectly, at this time. If hon. members disagree with the Chair's decision, which was made in good faith, there is a procedure with which hon. members are quite familiar, and they can use that procedure, under our Standing Orders. However, for the time being, the decision stands and is not open for discussion. The minister has the floor.

[English]

An hon. member: A point of order.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise—

• (1055)

Mr. Blaikie: A point of order. Did you hear that?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Yes, I did hear that. The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: A point of order, Madam Speaker. You have not answered the question of the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca as to what you were calling the members who have made it clear to you that they said no when you asked the House. Are you calling these members liars?

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would never do anything like that. The point is not whether something was or was not said. I am saying that the Chair quite honestly heard nothing, and the same applies to the officers at the Table. So the case is closed.

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I do thank you very much. I am pleased to rise on debate on Bill—

Mr. Barrett: On a point of order. A point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Are we still on the same point of order?

[English]

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, I must be heard and I will ask my question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am asking a question of the hon. member. I would like to know if we are now discussing the same point of order which has previously been settled.

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, this is my point of order. If members stand in their place in this Chamber and say that they had said a no that may not have been heard, is their word not to be taken that they said no? I want a ruling on that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may want to consider with some of his colleagues changes to our rules. Our rules right now say that if the nos are not heard, the motion is carried. This point of order is now settled and over with. The hon. minister. I will not hear any more.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I want to before I commence the substance of my speech today to talk about the extensive consultation that has been held—

An hon. member: A point of order, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. members: Point of order. Point of order.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —prior to the NAFTA negotiations—

An hon. member: You're going mad.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —that relate to the consultative process that we have had through the international trade advisory committee, the central advisory groups on international trade, the work that we have done with the provinces, with other private sector organizations—

Some hon. members: A point of order.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —consultations which took place right up until the very final stages of the negotiations.

Some hon. members: Order.

Some hon. members: A point of order.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): This was followed by committee pre-study during the month of November and into subsequent months that covered 9 cities, 119 organizations and many other briefs that were received.

Some hon. members: Order.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It has been the subject of virtually every Question Period during this time. It has been the subject of a number of opposition days.

Some hon. members: A point of order.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Indeed, my colleague from Etobicoke North went to the first of our ongoing conversations on the North American free trade agreement—

Some hon. members: A point of order.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —and we on this side of the House have tried to activate the committee again to accommodate the suggestions of the New Democratic Party to hear more witnesses, but the New Democratic Party, as we can see again today has preferred to play pure politics with this.

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Desperation politics I might say, because its members have seen where their standing is going in the polls. They are slipping out of sight. There is a very good reason why they are slipping out of sight and their fear is written all over their faces today.

We have been trying for days to reintroduce this legislation. New Democratic Party members have blocked us continually, as they are trying to do today. We must follow through with the proper parliamentary procedure of having second reading, moving the legislation into committee stage and then moving ahead with the implementing legislation.

Some hon. members: Point of order.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Canada's economic prospects are brighter today than they have been for quite some time now. Economic indicators are confirming remarkable strength.

Eight and a half years ago when our government took office we recognized that the world was changing. We recognized that the transformation to a more integrated, global economy was accelerating and that Canada needed to respond. We developed and implemented a comprehensive—

• (1100)

Mr. Blaikie: Let them vote, like you should have, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The lack of respect that is being shown for this place today—

Mr. Barrett: Do not lecture us. Just stick to the rules.

An hon. member: Look who is talking about obeying the rules.

Mr. Barrett: I'll take my punishment under the rules but I do not want the rules changed by the Chair.

An hon. member: You'll take your punishment in the polls also.

An hon. member: Well, we won't have you to sell out our country for a mess of pottage either.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will listen to the hon. member one more time, hoping that this time he will show some respect for the House, for the Chair and for the decision that has been made. The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

Mr. Rodriguez: A Tory should not lecture us about respect for the Chair.

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, when I stand on my feet on a point of order it is out of respect for the rules of this House and the Chair. So I find it difficult to hear the Chair say: "I hope that you respect the Chair". I respect the Chair and the rules and I will live by those rules.

Two hon. members have given their word that they said no to your question, which you did not hear. The reasonable thing to do is to accept their word and put the vote. To deny that the members said no is, in effect, to call them liars and that is not acceptable from the Chair of this House.

That is my simple point. They have given their word. They said no. An hon. member's word must be accepted in this Chamber. You may not have heard the word, you may not have heard no, but they have said they said no and an hon. member's word must be heard in this Chamber. That is standard, traditional practice, Madam Speaker. That is not an insult to the Chair.

Mr. Nystrom: Madam Speaker, up until this point I have not intervened in the debate. May I make a suggestion I have seen happen many times in my number of years in this House. A number of Speakers, where there was some uncertainty, where there was some doubt or some dispute on both sides of the House, the Speaker would often put the question again to clarify the air.

It is with respect, Madam Speaker, that I suggest that to you. There is obviously some doubt. There are some members who are not pleased with the interpretation made. We could create a lot more peace in the House if you once again were to put the question, ask if there are yeas and nays, and then proceed in that way.

That has been done many times in the past. I think that would clear the air and resolve the situation in terms of the impasse we are in right now.

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, when the question was put, I think that most members in the House recognized that the members of the party who are objecting to the decision basically fell asleep at the switch. It was very clear on this side of the House that the Chair made the right decision. We support the decision made by the Chair. There is no question at all, Madam Speaker, in that regard.

Mr. Breaugh: Madam Speaker, I want to try to put this with the complete understanding of someone who has occupied a position in the chair in another chamber of how awkward things can get at any given moment.

I am one who said no. I did not yell it, I did not scream it, but I did clearly and with some colleagues in this corner of the Chamber say no. The Chair, it was fairly obvious to me, did not hear me, nor perhaps did the table officers. I stood in my place to make the Chair aware that I had voted no to the motion. The Chair did not see me. I understand that. This is a big Chamber. I repeatedly stood in my place to try to make the Chair and the table officers aware that I had in fact said no to that particular motion.

• (1105)

Forgive me, but from where I am at this far end of the Chamber it seemed like this one lonely member was being ignored. It is not a big deal, but it is quite offensive for us at this end of the Chamber to have voted no to a motion, to have attempted to be recognized quietly without any furore and be ignored. I would plead with you in all fairness to simply put the question and allow our votes to be heard.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hope the Chair does not have the impression any of us enjoy what is happening here this morning.

We are here to oppose the government and the legislation the government is trying to bring before the House. We assumed a certain amount of goodwill when we moved the motion on concurrence that at some point the government would get up and move to go to Orders of the Day and there would be a vote.

We said no. There are people here who said no, but they did not yell no because they did not yell in the expectation that the Speaker would recognize that and move to have the vote, but people did say no.

Madam Speaker, I plead with you in the name of the Chair. It is a pointless dispute. It creates the perception, albeit I am sure unfounded, that the Chair is favouring the government in this respect.

All you have to do is call the vote. The government will win because it has the numbers. Then we can proceed to do what the government wants to do. We want the House to divide on this and the Chair's responsibility in this case is to permit the House to divide on this.

A week or so ago, we tried to have unanimous consent and the Chair ruled that a nod of the head was enough to deny a unanimous motion. Here we have members saying no, getting up and testifying to the fact they said no and the Speaker refusing to put the motion.

I plead with the Chair so the fight is not between the Chair and certain elements of the House, but continues to be between the government and the opposition on the North American free trade agreement to put the motion.

Mrs. Tardif: Madam Speaker, I would simply like to give my perspective on what is happening now in the House.

I remember that once, when I was dealing with a specific matter here in the House, the same thing happened to me. In a discussion with the Chair and the officers at the table it was explained to me that this was not a matter that could be tabled again. Once the question is put and the answer is heard, we must accept that decision.

Just because I am a member of the government, as I was at the time, there is no reason I should be treated differently.

An hon. member: It is a completely different matter here.

Mrs. Tardif: The circumstances were identical. I had said no and other members had said no, and the same decision was applied.

Madam Speaker, my point is that in this House, whatever happens, all members should be treated the same.

[English]

An hon. member: I never said no.

Mrs. Marleau: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As a member desiring to assist the Chair I want to tell you I was sitting in my place here when the question was put. I was looking over to the left of me and as far as I could hear there was no response when the question was put. In the interest of helping with the work of this Chamber, common sense might dictate that the question be put at this time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not and did not, since it was brought to my attention, at any time doubt the word of members who said they did say no.

[Translation]

However, I assured the House that I did not hear them say I therefore declared the motion carried. At this point, since the House is the master of what it does and since I am obviously here to do what the House asks me to do, if there is unanimous consent, I am prepared to put the question again, and I would, of course, do so immediately. Is there unanimous consent?

• (1110)

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is no unanimous consent.

[English]

Mr. Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I have seen this kind of dispute in the House of Commons for well on 35 years, 20 years up there in the press gallery and 15 years here.

When we reach such an impasse, is it not advisable to adjourn the House for 15 minutes and let the key parties discuss how we are going to resolve this? It must look crazy to the public watching. To cool down tempers we should adjourn the House for 15 minutes and let the people involved discuss it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: What for?

I would like to read to the House a passage from Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 558, which may help the House understand the problem we are now facing. As I said earlier, I do not doubt the word of hon. members who say they said no, and I do not think they doubt I am telling the truth when I say I did not hear them.

[English]

I think telling me I did not listen is really unfair. I did and I did not hear. This is a fact.

I then declared the motion carried. Citation 558 reads as follows:

> (1) An old rule of Parliament reads: "That a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the House."

That is where we are and I believe that we must resume the debate at this point. The hon. minister has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): As I was saying, in 1984 we created a comprehensive plan of action that covered a range of things such as privatization, deregulation, tax reform, fiscal control as well as means of allowing and encouraging the country to look outward through the negotiations on trade access, the GATT, the free trade agreement with the United States and now the NAFTA involving Mexico.

This has resulted in a very solid basis of support for the economic activities that are happening today. I believe our policies have helped our country weather the economic storms we have had over the past two or three years, and other economists would agree. Without this program of economic reforms, the impact of the global recession on Canada would have been much more severe. Today we are better positioned than ever to catch the next wave of strong economic expansion. That is what the recent economic statistics are indicating to us right now.

The bill before us today, when passed by Parliament will affirm Canada's foresight in negotiating the North American free trade agreement. When the agreement goes into force next January with the approval of all three countries, the North American free trade agreement will provide Canadians with a strengthened base from which to tackle the rugged terrain of the global marketplace.

The removal of trade barriers with Mexico, together with the opening up of the market achieved under Canada-United States free trade agreement will give us access to a dynamic market of 360 million consumers.

NAFTA will open the Mexican market to Canadians as never before. Tariff barriers, import licences, investment restrictions, trade balancing requirements and other barriers to Canadian exporters of goods and services will be removed.

• (1115)

Mexico already enjoys relatively open access to the Canadian market. In fact, almost 80 per cent of Mexican goods now enter Canada duty-free, so today we have effectively one-way free trade.

[English]

The improvement in market access under the NAFTA is much greater for Canadian goods going to Mexico than for Mexican goods coming to Canada.

In terms of trade barriers, Canada is dismantling a picket fence, whereas Mexico is hauling down a high stone wall.

In agriculture, we realize significant new opportunities to serve the growing Mexican market for food of all varieties, from fish and processed foods to apples and barley.

In transport, trucking firms and bus operators will have new access to Mexico.

In financial services, Canadian banks will be able to make major investments in the Mexican markets and this has already started with the Bank of Nova Scotia and the 5 per cent investment it has in one of the important Mexican banks.

For Canada's high technology industries, the immediate removal of Mexican duties on telecommunications equipment will provide a major opportunity for this highly competitive sector. They cannot wait to get into Mexico. I remind you of the comment by a representative of Glenayre Electronics Ltd. who said: "The NAFTA cannot come soon enough for us".

The NAFTA will eliminate the Mexican trade restrictions in the automotive sector which have been major impediments to the sale in Mexico of Canadian vehicles and auto parts. This will set right the current imbalance whereby, in contrast to Mexican restrictions, around 90 per cent of Mexican automotive exports enter Canada duty free.

I have time to mention only a few examples of these opportunities created by opening up the Mexican market to Canadians, but whether it is urban transportation equipment, pollution abatement and monitoring technology or oil field services and equipment, the opportunities we have negotiated for Canadians are numerous.

[Translation]

Improving the FTA was another of our objectives in developing NAFTA. We strengthened the system for settling trade disputes. We made the rules of origin clearer and more predictable. This will mean that disputes over the full North American content of Canadian built Hondas should be a thing of the past.

Disciplines in the agreement will help ensure that standards are not used as disguised protectionism.

Canada won expanded access to the U.S. market for textiles and apparel by negotiating special quotas that are higher than in the FTA. This will permit Canadian textile and clothing makers to further expand their export sales, which have already increased substantially under the FTA. Canadian apparel exports have increased by 150 per cent since the FTA was implemented; Canadian fibre exports have also grown by 90 per cent. Canadian exports of fabrics and other textile products show an increase of 50 per cent. NAFTA will provide even greater headroom for growth.

[English]

We also strengthened energy provisions through the NAFTA and obtained stronger disciplines on U.S. regulators from interfering with freely negotiated contracts between Canadian exporters and U.S. buyers.

• (1120)

We negotiated a very attractive government procurement deal and for the first time suppliers of Canadian building materials will have competitive access to U.S. and Mexican government construction contracts. For the first time Canadian service providers will have access to U.S. and Mexican government service contracts.

Moreover the U.S. has agreed to lift the buy America restrictions on loans provided under the rural electrification administration which is a contract pool amounting to some $1.5 billion U.S. a year. Even more exciting for Canadian firms, the U.S. under the NAFTA will waive the buy America restrictions on contracts let by the Army Corps of Engineers that last year by itself ran up almost $9 billion in procurement. This new government procurement market is now three to four times the size it was under the original free trade agreement.

We entered the negotiations intent on making improvements to the FTA and I think it is clear that we have done that. The NAFTA also gives a new edge to Canada's international competitiveness. It will enhance Canada's attractiveness as an investment base from which to serve all of North America.

Canada had a choice when it entered the negotiations. We could have stood back and let the United States and Mexico sign a deal by themselves. That is something that the Liberals and the NDP probably would have preferred us to do.

However, such an agreement would have given a tremendous advantage to the United States. The U.S. would have been the only country with barrier-free access to all of North America. Under those circumstances the decision for investors wanting to gain access to the entire North American market would have been obvious: locate in the United States.

Instead we made the right decision and that was to become a full partner of the wider North American market. In addition to the significant market opening to Mexico, the provisions for services and investment will support hemispheric business planning and economies of scale. These are significant advantages in today's global economy.

[Translation]

Canadian industry is already responding to the potential of the new larger market in view. Canadian firms are demonstrating the entrepreneurial daring essential to any country that would be a leader in world trade. They have sent delegations in record numbers to our trade missions in Mexico, made contacts, found partners and signed deals. Our embassy in Mexico City received 4,500 Canadian business visitors in 1992, eager to find new customers and partners in that market, up from approximately 1,000 in 1990.

NAFTA is clearly widening Canadian horizons. It is giving us a bigger stage on which to demonstrate our economic expertise and leadership.

[English]

Canadians can venture into new markets assured by the growing evidence of our increasing export success. We saw this so clearly last year, which was not a big year in the world economy. World economic growth over all grew by 1 per cent. It was the slowest since 1982 but it was an outstanding year for Canadian exporters. It is the export sector that is leading the way in the current expansion.

Merchandise exports for 1992 reached the record level of $158 billion, which is an 11 per cent increase year over year. That is the largest year over year increase since 1984.

The increases in our exports to the United States alone were even greater. Sales to the United States, our largest single market, were $122 billion or a 13.5 per cent increase over 1991.

This picture continues to get better as we move into 1992. Our total exports soared to $14.5 billion in January or 16 per cent higher than the same month the previous year. Exports to the United States in January were more than $2 billion higher or 22 per cent higher than the previous year. Our world trade surplus jumped a remarkable $900 million to reach $1.9 billion in January alone. When I see figures like these I have to wonder how long the hon. members opposite can continue to criticize the Canada—U.S. Free Trade Agreement. Blaming every sparrow that falls on the free trade agreement is no longer credible and gets less credible with every new report on Canada's economic performance and outlook.

It was the English historian Macaulay who said: "Free trade, one of the greatest blessings which a government can confer upon a people, is in almost every country unpopular". What he meant here was that no country ever pursued free trade without resistance from entrenched interests.

However, the single interest groups cannot fool all of the people all of the time. They can neither hide the evidence nor can they ignore it. All their diversionary tactics—we saw a lot of these this morning—and fear-mongering rhetoric cannot bury the truth. The benefits of the free trade agreement, buttressed as they are by the other economic reforms that we brought in, are emerging in the form of hard economic figures that cannot be denied. Evidence of the value of these policies are there for Canadians to judge for themselves. I am confident that Canadians after a fair appraisal of the facts will recognize where their best interests lie.

Look also at the composition of these exports. Canadian exports rose most sharply in 1992 in high-end manufacturing products. This is exactly what the opposition parties are saying we should have. However, their way is to snap their fingers and hope that it will happen. Our way is to remove the obstacles to these exports, the high-end manufacturing products, that are so important to our economy and watch them surge.

Where, though? They perform particularly well—and this point bears underscoring—in those sectors where tariffs have been eliminated by the free trade agreement or where they were being rapidly phased out.

Furthermore, Canada's share of a number of U.S. markets for value-added manufactured goods is growing. The amount of Canadian manufactured products as a percentage of the total U.S. market has risen and has now reached a record level. It now represents about 2.6 per cent of the United States market. That sounds like a small figure but it is not when one considers the large U.S. market. That figure represents a 20 per cent increase in Canada's share in the U.S. manufactured goods market in just a decade.

Transportation equipment and chemical, electrical, electronic and paper products are the sectors that are leading this expansion. Canada's exports to the United States of office, telecommunications and precision instruments was valued at $9.3 billion in 1991. That is up a remarkable 74 per cent since 1989 which was the first year of the FTA.

In the manufacturing sector these are the high-end products. They contain more value added by the highly skilled Canadian workers who make them and they represent the indispensable equipment of the new economy.

This is a success story that is rarely reported. Canadians deserve to hear of these results because if they hear them it will give them the confidence and the hope that we can compete, we are competing, we are winning that business and we are turning that business into jobs back home.

Canada saw the first strong evidence of post-recession job growth in 1992. A net 118,000 jobs were created in that year. That pace will certainly accelerate as the recovery strengthens. Even though the NAFTA is not in effect yet, Canadian companies are already exploring the increasingly robust and dynamic Mexican market that is benefiting from the reforms of the last seven years.

Canadians and Mexicans are signing contracts and making sales today. SR Telecom of Montreal has a $13 million contract to supply radio systems to 535 small Mexican villages. Royal Plastics Group of Toronto is drawing up plans for a joint venture to produce panels needed for housing in Mexico.

• (1130)

Consider for a moment the $1.5 billion contract that has been negotiated between Bovar-Western Research and Pemex, a state-owned oil company in Mexico. Bovar-Western Research is the first company ever to help Mexican petrochemical firms install instrumentation control for their sulphur recovery units.

Several weeks ago we learned of a $160 million joint venture by Quebec and Spain in Canadian petrochemical production to serve the whole North American market.

Finally, there is the contract by SHL Systemhouse to supply computer services amounting to $500 million over 10 years to the Mexican department of finance.

These few examples illustrate the marvels of international trade.

[Translation]

The sales I mentioned represent only a small sample of Canadian successes already achieved in the Mexican market. The marketplace is doing its job.

In the months and years to come, the Government of Canada will be helping more Canadians benefit from opportunities in the North American market. Two weeks ago, I announced our Access North America Program.

This program follows through the recommendations in the action plan of the prosperity initiative steering group. The action plan urged the government to make greater efforts to develop markets abroad. We are doing this.

Access North America will help make NAFTA work for Canada's benefit. It will help Canadians display their products and services at a permanent trade centre in Mexico City. It will help Canadians become better acquainted with the Mexican market through a program known as NewMex.

[English]

Yet what would my hon. friends opposite do? They would deny Canadians all the opportunities of this market and some of them would tear up not just the NAFTA but the free trade agreement as well. They have no vision of their own. They have no plan of action for Canada to play an important role in the global economy. They have no understanding of the impact of their actions on the economy and no confidence in the ability of Canadians to compete and take advantage of these markets as they have demonstrated over the past four years under the free trade agreement with the United States.

The opposition parties counsel withdrawal. They do not want an active Canada involved in the world. They want a catatonic Canada. For the benefit of my colleagues opposite that means putting Canada in a trance or a seizure with loss of sensation or consciousness. They want Canada to stagnate as a backwater.

Their policies would amount to planned paralysis, or worse, to the reckless abandonment of our largest trade relationship. They like to quote Gordon Ritchie from time to time. He was the deputy chief negotiator for the free trade agreement who said: "Those who want to rip up the free trade agreement say you cannot unscramble an egg".

One cannot go back to four years ago and put the companies that made the adjustment and that are taking advantage of the successes that are there into a position where they have the tariff and non-tariff barriers that were there before and upset the changes in investment that they have made since that time.

What would the opposition be saying if we had not joined the NAFTA negotiations? We would be under attack. We would be criticized by many of them for letting the United States march into the Mexican market while we sat passively and paralyzed on the side and sitting on our hands. You can hear them now, Madam Speaker.

Many in the opposition would have undoubtedly accused us of putting our industries at risk and of freezing them out of a prime commercial opportunity. They would have charged us with undermining Canada's drawing powers of location for investment. They would have condemned us for refusing to defend Canada's interests, but they cannot do that because we in this government did the right thing. We saw the future and wanted our rightful part in that future.

When the bill before us today is approved, it will lead us into the 21st century. One of the fundamental concerns of the next century will be the relationship between the developed and developing worlds.

I want to direct my comments to those in the New Democratic Party because this is of particular relevance to positions they have taken in the past. The NAFTA offers a positive prototype for those relations. Aid to the world's developing nations has too often realized only small and isolated victories in the war on poverty over the last 50 years. The developing nations increasingly admonish the developed world to realize that trade, not aid, is the key to a richer future.

Developing countries want the freedom to sell their goods and services on world markets, and to be able to buy goods and services and attract the investment that the developed world has to offer. This is the acknowledged key to their future development and prosperity. It is also essential for the developed world's continuing prosperity and to international peace and stability.

Greater trade and greater economic interdependence can defuse the resentment and envy that have too often been responsible in the past for international disorders ranging from famine to terrorism. Trade is a powerful antidote to conflict and a powerful support to international order. I say unambiguously that free trade is good foreign policy.

It is good for our relations with our Mexican friends and partners and also for our relations with countries in Latin America and beyond that may join NAFTA and other market-opening trade agreements in the future.

[English]

Yes, there have been some costs as companies or individuals adjust to this larger market. Some have lost their jobs. Some companies have shut down. That is regrettable, but unfortunately it is inevitable in a dynamic global economy.

Is the benefit not worth it? We are now a stronger economy, better able to compete and the export successes I described earlier prove that. Is there anyone in this House who would deny the benefits I have just described for developing nations? The transition to a full NAFTA will occur over a 10-year period, not too long to delay the benefits unduly and not too short for a reasonable transition for all three countries.

What are the other benefits? The conservation and protection of our natural resources, our air, land and water will be another preoccupation of the 21st century. Likewise the quality of life in the work place will be a concern of workers and managers everywhere.

The NAFTA breaks new ground in addressing environmental issues in ways never done in any trade agreement before. For example, the NAFTA specifically allows for the inclusion of scientific experts in the settling of trade disputes. It states that NAFTA partners should not lower environmental standards to attract investment.

Above all, the NAFTA recognizes the responsibility of all partners to maintain and improve their environmental standards. The NAFTA in its preamble lays out the broad objectives of the agreement and confirms a commitment of all three countries to improve working conditions and living standards and enhance and enforce workers' rights.

Canada is committed to pursuing additional environmental and labour accords in trilateral discussions with Mexico and the United States. That was our objective in February 1992 when we first put forward Canadian proposals in this regard. We welcome the initiative the Clinton administration has taken in bringing these proposals back to the table because they will lead to strengthened environmental co-operation among our three countries and an open dialogue about the work place in the new North American market.

The NAFTA has proved to be a powerful catalyst to pursue the environmental and labour agendas. While Canada had a number of bilateral agreements with Mexico on these subjects before the NAFTA negotiations, the trade talks have led to a more concentrated program of trilateral discussions.

Without the NAFTA, it is unlikely we would be preparing for the establishment of a North American commission on the environment today. The functions of this commission may well include harmonizing environmental standards at higher levels, developing limits for specific pollutants, promoting environmental science and technology and increasing public awareness of environmental issues.

In the labour discussions we will be pressing for the establishment of a trinational body to focus on the improvement of working conditions and living standards in all three countries. I am quoting here: "This type of commission would help give effect to the NAFTA's commitment to protect, enhance and enforce basic workers' rights".

Throughout the negotiations of the NAFTA and now as we negotiate these parallel agreements, we have been able to call on the knowledge and expertise of the provinces, labour organizations and environmental groups. They have played an extremely important role in helping the government develop and refine its agenda. They will continue to do so as the labour and environmental talks proceed in the weeks ahead. The NAFTA is part of this government's commitment to the quality of working life and sustainable development.

The NAFTA will contribute to economic growth. That is clear, but it will contribute in a way that takes into account the health and well-being of the population and the protection and preservation of the environment on which we depend.

The world of nations has been rapidly transformed into an increasingly interdependent global economy in just a matter of decades. The dawn of the 21st century rises over an interconnected marketplace that includes at the same time mass production for true world markets and very specialized production for highly individualized niche markets.

The way business is conducted today would have been inconceivable to our counterparts less than a generation ago. Fibre optics, laptop computers, fax transmissions, interactive video, the quick transformation of research into technology to create new products and services has ceased to amaze and is now routine. This government has worked hard to prepare our economy for the global marketplace. With the framework we have put into place Canadians will exploit it to their advantage.

Canadians do not fear the future. They are leaders. They make the future work for them and profit from it. The creation of a North American free trade area is one of the future's opportunities. It will contribute positively to our greater competitiveness and prosperity.

It provides us with a larger market, allowing us to take advantage of both economies of scale and market specialization. In doing so, it better equips Canadian industry and workers to tackle other world markets with increasing success. This applies not only to the larger Latin American market to which Mexico offers an obvious opening, but also to the economies of Asia-Pacific, Europe and the Middle East. Developing the skills and adapting to the demands of the North American free trade area will clearly assist us in other markets.

Eight and a half years ago, the government set itself the task of looking to the future and outward to the world. The opposition would like Canadians to hunker down in the claustrophobic shadow of the way things once were. This is not the fate this government wishes for this great nation. It wants to fulfil Canada's vocation as a world leader, committed to a stable international economy, environmentally sustainable growth, developing new markets and finding new economic partners.

When we pursue this progressive agenda, we inevitably create high quality jobs for Canadians and strengthen the foundations of our prosperity. The North American free trade agreement is proof and a solid demonstration of that commitment.

In closing, I travel to a lot of countries and a lot of trade missions. I meet many exporters from other countries and ask them: What country in the world would you like to have assured access to? What is your most important market? With what country would you like to have a fair and binding means of settling trade disputes? In all cases, the answer is the United States.

We have that with the free trade agreement. We have something others would give their eye teeth for. Now we are broadening the relationship to include Mexico. We are very fortunate people in Canada to have this. Let us not squander that success. Let us approve the free trade agreement with Canada, the United States and Mexico.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Madam Speaker, one does not need to be a partisan of any particular political ideology to recognize that trade has emerged as one of the most important issues facing Canadians over the last several years.

In 1988 the country was embroiled in an unprecedented debate over the century-old question of whether Canada should enter into a free trade arrangement with the United States. Now, only four years later, Canadians are being asked to contemplate the inclusion of Mexico in a more extensive North American free trade agreement, an agreement which will, in all likelihood, be extended to other countries by the end of this decade.

This is taking place against a backdrop of the yet uncertain Uruguay round of the GATT which, if implemented, will be more pervasive and far-reaching than the agreement we are contemplating today.

Why trade is of increasing salience to Canadians is not a difficult question to answer. Globalization, the combined processes of increasing international trade, growing financial integration and rising direct foreign investment is rapidly opening national economies to the world, whether they want to be opened or not.

At root, this process is not being driven by ideologies or even policies, contrary to what its detractors may think, but mainly by technology and such superficially prosaic developments as microprocessors, fibre optic networks, communications satellites and transnational corporations.

Ironically, given its current ideological label, late 20th century globalization has come to epitomize what Karl Marx once postulated was the power of technological determinism. The minister quotes Macaulay and I am quoting Karl Marx.

For this same reason, globalization is immutable even for large, relatively self-sufficient economies such as the United States. Witness the profound re-evaluation which has taken hold of this once unshakeable and impenetrable economic fortress. There is the sudden realization that America is no longer an island entirely unto itself.

For a small open economy such as Canada's, globalization entails even more profound changes. Already Canada's exports account for 40 per cent of the total output of our private sector. One in five Canadian jobs are directly dependent on exports. Indeed, with the solitary exception of the now united Germany, Canada is the most trade-dependent nation in the world. It is a trend which, for the reasons I have noted, will only become more apparent in the years ahead.

It is becoming no exaggeration to say that everything we do in this country depends upon our success as a trading nation. By the same token, our success as a trading nation depends on the success of our economy and ultimately of our society and our people. In that very real sense, our domestic policy is becoming our trade policy and vice versa.

Yet in the midst of these profound changes I would suggest that Canada faces a curious paradox: Trade is of central and increasing importance not only to Canada's economic future but also to the way we shape our social and political structures. Yet at the same time globalization has rapidly overturned the traditional signposts of Canadian trade policy without necessarily revealing an obvious replacement.

I believed in 1988 as I believe today that Canada faces a fundamental decision as to where and how it wishes to place itself in an emerging global marketplace and the emerging economic alignments of the world community. Do we still believe that our negotiating interests are best served in the multilateral world of the GATT, an institution which has served Canada well since the Second World War, or should we also pursue our interests more in bilateral relations principally with the United States? Should Canada's economic future be cast in a global mould or are we now to limit our focus to a continental or hemispheric bloc? Is the socio-political dominance of the United States still a concern for Canadians or is this traditional concern now mitigated by the demands of a post cold war world, a multipolar world?

My basic point is that Canada is in need of a trade and competitiveness policy to guide us in an era of globalization and increasing interdependence. So far, despite the proud boasts about Canada's trade performance which we heard from the minister just a moment ago, this government has never attempted to articulate such a basic policy. It seems content to be swept along in the wake of globalization rather than attempt to plot a course and to navigate such changes to Canada's advantage. Traditionally Canada's trade policy as fashioned by successive Liberal governments has rested upon two pillars: liberalization of trade and multilateralism.

The first has been a response to the very nature of the Canadian economy. Although rich in natural resources and indeed human resources, our economy for geographic and demographic reasons has lacked sufficient diversity to approach anything like self-sufficiency. Canada has been and must continue to be a trading nation. More generally protectionism risks making the economy more inward looking, insulates it from uncompetitive forces in the international marketplace, and can distort the allocation of Canada's own resources. For these reasons our arrangements or institutions which promote more liberalized trade are in principle in Canada's national interests. Protectionism, in the classic Ricardian sense, is economically counterproductive at the best of times. In Canada's case, it is a luxury which we simply cannot afford.

The second pillar of Canada's traditional trade policy, multilateralism, has been a response to the concerns about our sovereignty. By trading on a multitude of fronts and by eschewing bilateral ties with larger economies, principally in the United States, Canada sought both to reduce its economic dependence on one partner and to preserve as much as is possible for a small, economically open country its independence.

More recently Canada has taken a leading role in post-Second World War multilateral institutions such as the IMF, the World Bank, the G-7, as well as the GATT, to embody that commitment to multilateralism which has long offered to Canadians the best protection of their sovereignty and of their national interests.

However, there are signs of late that Canada is being deflected from its traditional trade interests. Of immediate concern is the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement which irrespective of whether it has produced the benefits that were promised, which the minister put before the House today, has had the undeniable effect of pulling the two national economies closer together, or harmonizing the Canadian with the U.S. This policy marked a significant deviation from Canada's traditional path, not because it promoted liberalized trade but rather, because it threatened to bind Canada even closer to the United States, to the exclusion of other countries.

Now we are being asked to extend what is in effect the free trade agreement to Mexico and potentially to other countries under a North American free trade agreement.

To the degree that such an agreement would liberalize Canada's trading relations within the hemisphere and encourage the region's development, this trend is to be applauded. Mexico boasts a population of over 85 million people, a degree of industrialization however segmented and imperfect, and geographic proximity to Canada, to production and to markets. Its economy is northward oriented.

We should not be led to believe, as the government has repeatedly attempted to assert, that at least in the medium term trade with Mexico will have a profound impact on our economy, positive or negative, or that it will serve to counterbalance our relationship with the United States. After all, only a small fraction of Canada's trade today is with Mexico.

It will be decades before the results make a significant impact on Canada's over-all economic performance. Even if our exports to Mexico double this year, they would still represent less than 1 per cent of our exports to the United States. This volume will, no doubt, increase in the future, a development we would welcome. However, given the global trends and the potential for rapid development in much of Mexico, not even the most optimistic supporters of NAFTA will pretend that Mexico can rank as one of Canada's major trading partners for the next decade or two.

Nor can the government pretend that a free trade agreement with Mexico was high on our list of national priorities. Such an agreement is in Mexico's interests as a means of counterbalancing the trade diversion arising out of the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement, of cementing its recent economic reforms, and of attracting scarce foreign investment. An agreement is also in the interests of the United States, if only to enhance the economic and hence political security of its southern neighbour and to stem the flow of the illegal immigration.

Canada, however, has been drawn into these negotiations only by virtue of our existing arrangement with the United States. To this extent we find ourselves in the anomalous and ultimately vulnerable position of allowing our trade and foreign policy agenda to be driven by the priorities of the Mexican and the United States governments, not by our own national interests.

Much of this underscores the contradiction to Canada's traditional interests implied in the whole trend toward regional trading blocs: the European Community, the North American free trade area and a more nebulous Asian bloc which is threatening to diminish Canada's economic and trade links outside North America.

The implicit danger is that these developments will undermine the incentive to preserve and enhance the existing multilateral system, a fear underscored by the apparent willingness of the United States and Europe to walk away from the recent Uruguay round of the GATT without reaching an agreement on agricultural subsidies.

Indeed it can be argued that regional trading blocs are a subtle aspect of economic imperialism, with three economic superpowers, the United States, Germany and perhaps less willingly Japan, each carving out a continental hinterland in an effort to preserve their industrial pre-eminence. It is worth recalling that Canada sought out a preferential trade agreement with the United States in the first place, not because the latter was intent on becoming more liberalized but, on the contrary because the United States was threatening to become more protectionist.

Equally doubtful is the notion that Canada can aim to be part of hemispheric political arrangements along the lines of the European Community. The crucial difference of course between Europe and North America is that the former is multipolar. At present the European Community is comprised of 12 members, none of which can dominate the community as a whole. A united Germany, although clearly pre-eminent, represents less than one-quarter of the population and less than one-third of the community's total Gross Domestic Product.

In contrast, the United States' dominance of the North American continent is unparalleled. Its population and Gross Domestic Product are more than 10 times that of Canada. Even the addition of Mexico with one-twentieth of the United States Gross Domestic Product would do little to correct this imbalance. In contemplating supranational structures for North America or the western hemisphere however limited, Canada would implicitly be surrendering aspects of its sovereignty to the United States.

Even assuming for the moment that greater political and institutional integration is politically saleable in Canada, a likely assumption given the continuing nationalist concerns of the majority of Canadians, the United States is in no mood at present to contemplate any significant international restrictions on its authority, let alone the kind of supranationalism embraced by Europe both for ideological and national reasons.

The government has done little to address these and other fundamental concerns of Canadians as we approach the North American free trade agreement. Despite perfunctory support from the world community for the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, Canada quite rightly has been perceived as quietly turning away from multilateral trade. A much vaunted Pacific Rim initiative has yet to progress beyond the rhetorical stage. There has been virtually no attempt, public or private, to exploit the major opportunities opening in the European Community. Nor has the government taken the initiative to pursue opportunities in eastern Europe as a possible new trade option for Canada and, perhaps more important, as a back door into the European Community. As far as Latin America is concerned the government has failed to formulate, let alone implement, a trade strategy except in reaction to U.S. and Mexican initiatives. Both actively and passively, the government's whole approach to trade points to a fundamental drift, if not shift, toward continentalism.

It is still less than clear whether this government views NAFTA as but one step toward a global trade policy or as the last piece in an inward-looking continental bloc. Rising protectionist sentiments in the United States, together with higher North American content requirements in the North American free trade agreement only fuel concerns that Canada is drifting into a U.S. dominated continentalist form of protection.

This latter eventuality is hardly in Canada's national interest. As barriers to trade and investment fall, Canada must be prepared to compete with the world's best in Europe, in the Pacific Rim, as well as in North America, or risk watching our technology and productivity slip and our living standards steadily erode. Indeed the deteriorating competitive position of the United States together with the growing ascendancy of Europe and the Pacific Rim raise serious doubts as to whether North America is still the benchmark against which Canadian industry should measure itself. Moreover, Canada's growing trade deficits, the imbalances we must correct, are with our partners overseas, especially with Asia, and not with the United States with which we continue to enjoy a trade surplus. Lastly we cannot lose sight of the fact that trade in an interdependent world is largely about investment and that the United States, let alone Mexico and the rest of Latin America, is hardly flush with capital.

The movement toward regional economic integration can be seen as part of the broader movement toward global integration. Developments in telecommunications and transport are effectively diminishing geographic boundaries and constraints, thereby reducing the saliency of regions.

This is especially true with regard to trade and advanced technology industries and services. It would be naive to expect that there will ever be a time when Canada is not highly dependent on the North American economy. However, it would be equally naive to ignore that the world has changed dramatically since the 1960s and that Canada has greater means at its disposal today than at any point since World War I to break out of its continental constraints and to develop relations across the Pacific and across the Atlantic.

In short, if Canada is to take advantage of globalization rather than merely be swept along in its wake, we must pursue a far more independent and aggressive trade and competitiveness policy. We have the opportunity to build the first global trade and outward-oriented economy in North America, not just by reaching out to Mexico, but by actively seeking freer trade agreements with our major trading partners, notably in Asia and in the European Community. The alternative is the current policy of drift toward a decidedly more uncertain future.

Even with regard to the North American free trade arrangements, the government's work is at best half finished. Only the most sanguine would argue that the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement has lived up to the extravagant promises made by the government in 1988. Its central justification was to secure access to the American market in the face of rising U.S. protectionism yet a whole series of recent trade disputes from Honda automobiles to softwood lumber have demonstrated just how tenuous that access really is.

One of the principal reasons why the Liberal Party supported Canada's participation in the NAFTA negotiations was to correct shortcomings in the original Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. We called for tougher environmental standards. We called for tougher labour standards. We called for an accession clause to make it easier for other countries to join and thus to expand Canada's free trade options beyond the United States and Mexico. Most important, we called for the inclusion of a subsidies and an anti-dumping code that would put an end to the kind of trade harassment that has been eroding the so-called free trade environment between Canada and the United States and which would introduce a desperately needed degree of predictability into our entry into the yet untested waters of Mexico.

In some important respects NAFTA did indeed represent an improvement on the original Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. Its greatest—if largely ignored—achievement is the inclusion of an access clause. If treated as a serious provision in the future this single clause has the potential to transform NAFTA from a continental bloc into a new and deeper level of world trading order, a GATT-plus if you will.

The NAFTA also promises to clarify the vexing question of rules of origin. Although this will emerge as a Pyrrhic victory, if in our efforts to appease the Americans over domestic content we merely succeed in driving additional overseas investment away from Canada.

There remains, however, a great flaw, the black hole if you will, at the centre of the NAFTA which threatens to undermine the success of the entire regime. That is of course the continuing absence of a common set of trading rules. Not only is there no definition of subsidies in the agreement nor a commitment to replace countervail action with competition law, even the free trade agreement's modest provision—it was a notably modest provision—to pursue these objectives within a specified time has been quietly dropped in the NAFTA to be replaced by a woolly commitment to pursue this goal in some undefined future consultations.

This is unacceptable. It is unacceptable because it ensures that the kind of trade harassment which we have seen in recent years over pork, softwood lumber and now steel will continue unabated. The argument that such actions only represent about 5 per cent of bilateral trade is surely spurious, given that such actions are typically launched against those Canadian exports which are enjoying some success, indeed growth, in the U.S. market.

Most important, the absence of common trading rules is unacceptable because in the long run it will undermine the legitimacy of the entire arrangement. NAFTA is essentially a political document. Its authority ultimately rests not on what Bagehot once called the "dignified letters" of the text but on the support it enjoys among the electorate of the three countries.

Nothing has done more to undermine enthusiasm in Canada for the NAFTA or for the free trade agreement even among its erstwhile supporters than the highly public spectacle of ongoing, punitive and seemingly groundless U.S. trade actions launched against Canada during the four years since the beginning of the supposed era of free trade.

It is this central issue of the rules of trade that is the real acid test of the success or failure of the free trade agreement and now NAFTA. As the Leader of the Official Opposition argued recently, without a common set of trade rules to govern the North American market, Canadian exports will continue to face trade harassment.

What is to be done? Ironically it is the United States that has provided an opening for change even at this late stage by making a condition of U.S. implementation of NAFTA the parallel accords on the environment and on labour standards and possibly on import surges. The new Clinton administration has provided Canada with an unexpected opportunity to put forward its own conditions for ratification: a coherent definition of subsidies under which all three countries are prepared to base their trade laws and a firm commitment to replace anti-dumping action with a common competition and anti-trust policy.

Moreover, the ambit of the negotiations has shifted somewhat in Canada's favour. In 1988 it was Canada that was the demandeur, increasingly dependent upon an agreement with the United States, not the least because of the vast political capital which the Conservative government had invested in the initiative.

Now Canada is arguably the country least dependent upon the outcome of NAFTA and in the best position to threaten to put on the brakes. Why not use our leverage, as the Americans are doing so successfully with their parallel accords, to fashion an agreement which more accurately reflects Canada's long-term national interests?

Against the argument that no agreement on subsidies can be reached, especially in the time available, I suggest that one already exists under the umbrella of the still pending Uruguay round of the GATT. The Dunkel text contains a perfectly acceptable subsidies code that is modelled in part on Canada's own submissions which has already been endorsed in principle by the main contracting parties, including Canada and the United States.

Why not simply transplant this existing subsidies code from the Uruguay round into a parallel accord? It would accompany the NAFTA in something of the same way that the United States is proposing with regard to the environmental and labour standards.

The government has repeatedly argued that Canada should be wary of embracing the idea of a subsidies and anti-dumping code. This is a spurious argument. For one thing no one is advocating the abandonment of domestic trade remedy law. We are talking about defining a common set of procedures and rules that will establish parameters within which legitimate trade law can be exercised.

More to the point surely is the fact that the Canadian economy is far more dependent upon exports to the United States than the Americans are on exports to Canada. This alone makes a compelling case for seeking an agreement that curtails the arbitrary use of trade remedy law on both sides of the border irrespective of those isolated Canadian sectors that currently benefit from protectionist trade practices.

NAFTA should be viewed as the beginning of a new approach to trade policy for Canada, and not as an end in itself. Armed with a new trading model based upon a core set of rules and procedures, Canada can move to extend free trade agreements to Japan, Europe, Australia and New Zealand all with the goal of making Canada the first truly open global economy in North America.

Beyond the discussion that we are having today of the NAFTA and behind that the free trade agreement with the United States, is how Canada equips itself to compete in an increasingly global market.

In a sense the free trade agreement and NAFTA may have accelerated what Canada will confront sooner or later and will certainly follow the successful conclusion of the pending Uruguay round of the GATT. In Canada the answer to what some see as challenges of the new global trading environment can also be seen as opportunities if we are adept enough at improving our competitive abilities.

By refusing to confront the need for root and branch reform of the way government services are delivered, the government has also refused to recognize the direct linkage between economic liberalization and the need for major domestic adjustment and reform.

As the Leader of the Opposition recently noted: "Trade agreements are not an end in themselves. The ultimate objective is to secure a better life for people. That means jobs with a future in industries with a future".

The success of freer trade grounds of the GATT that extend over the past three decades, although perhaps invisible to many, did undeniably contribute massively to Canada's affluence.

The reason is that they were matched by effective and comprehensive adjustment assistance programs, following the precedents of the various GATT rounds. The Macdonald royal commission, in recommending the negotiation of a free trade agreement with the United States, urged repeatedly that any such agreement should be matched with comprehensive adjustment assistance in the form of training, retraining, investment incentives, the elimination of interprovincial trade barriers and so forth.

The government moved on the recommendation with regard to free trade with the United States, but it did not complete the other half of the agenda. It did not offer Canadians that comprehensive opportunity to benefit from adjustment assistance programs so as to make them the real beneficiaries of freer trade instead of victims.

Among those who now find themselves in that wholly unacceptable statistic of the 10 per cent or more unemployed there are many who understand as clearly as the economists what globalization means. They not only want to work, they want to work smarter and be more productive, but they cannot do it alone. Business has a role, as does organized labour, but it is the national government that must assist business and labour with that collaboration to make Canadians more efficient.

What is needed now more than ever is for the national government in collaboration with the provinces, businesses and labour to create the framework and the institutions within which Canadians can adapt to international change, when such change can generate employment and prosperity instead of unemployment and a national loss of confidence. This is what to a real degree any debate about free trade should be about.

In a post-industrial, post cold war environment we need to develop a global trade and competitiveness strategy. We have the opportunity to build the first truly global outward-oriented economy in North America, not by just reaching out to Mexico but by actively seeking freer trade agreements with our other major trading partners overseas such as Japan and the European Community, but first we need to get the fundamentals right.

In this final act of the NAFTA drama, which we have before us today, we have the opportunity to write a very different conclusion from the one with which we were left in 1988. It will be evident to all Canadians that the opportunity to pursue a better agreement is available to this government, an opportunity has been opened in part by the initiative of the new United States administration in seeking parallel accords which will inevitably modify and change the nature of the treaty itself.

Why is it that this government is moving today to bring forward legislation to implement the North American free trade agreement without waiting, without discussing with Mexico and the United States the nature of those proposed parallel accords in areas which this side of the House has emphasized are important to Canada's future? I speak of the environment and labour standards.

This government has failed to take the opportunity presented by the change of administration in the United States to pursue Canada's own interests in seeking an agreement on a subsidies code, or more broadly, trading rules that would ensure Canadians are not subjected to the sort of trade harassment we have seen in recent years and would go a long way toward ensuring the freer trade environment from which all Canadians must ultimately benefit.

It is for that reason I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting all of the words after the word "That" and by substituting the following therefor:

Bill C-115, an act to implement the North American Free Trade Agreement, be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months hence.

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, on a point of order.

With the unanimous consent of the House, I move that the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca be allowed 40 minutes to speak on the bill. While I am on my feet, I move that pursuant to Standing Order 26(1) the House continue to sit through the midday interruption today for the purpose of continuing consideration of Bill C-115, an act to implement the North American free trade agreement.

An hon. member: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Just a moment. There are two different motions. Let us deal with the first one. I am sure the House will agree that the representative of the New Democratic Party will get 40 minutes to speak as will the people from the other parties.

An hon. member: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That one is agreed.

The other motion which the hon. parliamentary secretary put to the House is not admissible at this time. It can only be done by unanimous consent. It cannot be done on a motion.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When people talk a little louder I hear very well. The motion is not accepted.

• (1225)

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): I suppose I should say I appreciate the courtesy of all the members of the House for extending my time. As a matter of record, I also consulted the members of the Bloc. They also indicated to me they would have agreed to this motion. I did not have the opportunity to speak to the independent members.

I want to start out by saying how much I have appreciated the opportunity to work with my colleague in the Liberal Party in the brief committee hearings we have had plus other debates on this matter.

While I disagree fundamentally with my colleague from the Liberal Party on position on this issue, the exchange we have shared has been useful in my opinion and I want that to go on the record. I also want it to go on the record that we have a fundamental difference of opinion on this.

The personal relationships I had with the brief subcommittee were important to me too. I have no personal rancour against any of the members I worked with, but I am deeply bitter and disappointed at the Conservative Party and the Conservative government for its handling of this issue, including what is happening today.

The government attempted to avoid massive public discussion on what may be the most important bill in this House in the last 50 years. The subcommittee was told it would be allowed to hold a few hearings, but there would be no money for advertising of those hearings. After our efforts to get the subcommittee going, we were told by the chairperson of that committee the government would not allocate five cents to advertise to the Canadian people that there would be some brief hearings across this country.

At the same time, the government spent millions of dollars on a referendum on the Constitution that would have changed the political landscape of this country, but it would not spend five cents to advertise committee hearings on a fundamental change of the economic constitution of this country.

To show how ridiculous that position was, I was forced to stand up in this Chamber and deal with a subcommittee's problems in Question Period. The Prime Minister, embarrassed as he was, announced we would be allowed to spend $30,000 to advertise in Canadian newspapers that we were holding these little hearings.

My colleague from the Liberal Party, the members of the subcommittee and I then rushed to a discussion of how we would spend this $30,000. We very quickly discovered we had five days to initiate advertising before the first hearings in Vancouver. We had five days' notice to get the ads in only two major newspapers in British Columbia. This is open democracy? This is sharing the good news with the people of Canada?

It is nothing more than crass cynicism by a government that has been drunk with power and has simply no understanding of its basic obligations to the people of this country, absolutely none.

These are the same people who, while they were in opposition, ran up this corridor and attacked the Speaker with the rule books in their hands. These are the same people who sanctimoniously attacked previous governments in this country saying they wanted openness in government. These are the same people I had to beg money from so there would be ads in the paper telling the people we were going to have these quiet little hearings somewhere. Let that go in the record.

Let it also go in the record that at the moment the debate is being called, another political circus is being staged so the media's attention will be drawn away from this Chamber as the government attempts to sneak this bill through.

Where are the members of the Chamber? On television. While we are in this Chamber, we see them all standing around at the Chateau Laurier watching the announcement of a leadership candidate for the Tory Party.

Their duty is here. The House's duty is here. The members of this country should know. Anybody who happens to be afflicted with a habit of watching this television channel should know it is the most contemptible behaviour I have ever seen in my 30 years in public office in this country. The contempt this government has for this issue and the closure it intends to bring into this House indicate it is frightened the Canadian people will find out exactly what is going on with this bill.

I heard the Minister for International Trade get up, recite statistics and interpretations, and attack colleagues in the Liberal Party and us. I understand that is a political game. But why does he not go on national television and have a debate with the Liberal member and me? If this issue is so important as the government says, why does it show it is afraid by closing the debate and giving only two days' notice? Our party will have only five speakers out of 45 duly elected members of Parliament whose constituents pay their wages and demand they come here. What about the right to speak? Only five will be able to speak.

The Liberals may have eight speakers. It is absolutely disgusting behaviour by a government that claimed it was interested in parliamentary reform. It is craft use of power and that has to go on the record too.

If things are so good in this country why are they so bad? We have had the pompous statements of a government that is afraid to deal with this debate openly and among the Canadian people. We have heard how it interprets the trade figures to show expanse in trade and great opportunities. Tell it to the two million people a week who line up for food in this country. The greatest growth economically has been in the number of poor in this country.

Transfer payments to the provinces are beginning to evaporate. The core and heartbeat of the secondary and tertiary industries, part of this country that pays the taxes so we can provide the services, has been ripped out of the guts of Ontario and downtown Montreal.

My good friends in the Liberal Party get up and say: "Oh, it is the NDP's fault in Ontario". We get up and say: "Oh, it is the Liberals' fault in Quebec". We point fingers at each other: "It is your party that did it". In reality it is not the Liberal Party in Quebec or the NDP in Ontario that did it. That Tory government over there did it. It is the one responsible for it.

What is regrettable, as we play these little political games at the provincial level, is the absence of a position of the Official Opposition in abrogating the free trade agreement and opposing NAFTA.

My good friend in the Liberal Party left the message today that this bill will implement NAFTA. He did not do this by guile but he made a fundamental error. This bill will be passed by the government majority but it will not implement NAFTA. The implementation date is January 1, 1994. The Canadian people have the right to ask the Conservatives if they are elected to government whether they will implement on January 1, 1994. They have a right to ask to the Liberal Party and the NDP that question as well.

Any attempt to allow the Canadian people to believe that this battle is over is wrong and false. The one hopeful aspect of this government's behaviour is it does not have enough time to avoid that January 1 deadline to implement the bill.

The Canadian people will have an election. During that election campaign, the Liberal Party, the Conservative Party, the New Democrats, the Bloc Quebecois and Independents will be asked this one fundamental question: "If I vote for you and your party forms a majority, will you implement NAFTA on January 1, 1994?" We know where the Conservatives stand. Their answer is yes. Our answer is no. Here is the question now in front of the Canadian people: Is it yes or no from the Liberal Party? They can say all they want—

• (1235)

Mr. Blaikie: They say maybe yes, maybe no.

Mr. Barrett: Oh, no, maybe is not good enough. The Canadian people have a right to know. Leaving the impression that it is being implemented is not correct. It was an undesigned error by my friend from Etobicoke. The reality is that the implementation date is January 1 and the electorate will have a decision to make about that.

We have heard a great deal about this government's new-found pious interest in human rights in Third World countries. This government has now announced that it is concerned about racial tensions in Third World countries. This country has said that we have to lift these people up and why is it that the New Democrats would be opposed to this deal? That is one of the greatest lines being used by the government against us in our opposition. In actual fact Mexico is a major violator of human rights. It is the Prime Minister of this country who has stood up piously and said that we should not trade or give aid to those countries who violate human rights.

What are we doing with Mexico? We have even had to allow refugee status for an elected senator of Mexico to come into this country so that his life can be protected because he is a member of the opposition of that country.

Would it matter if it was the NDP? Is that the answer? It is the fundamental stupidity of people on the back benches of this government who do not understand that human rights apply to everybody. If one intends to define human rights on the basis of politics, then that is sheer stupidity.

Mr. Arseneault: A good NDPer.

Mr. Barrett: Even when I defended the human rights of others I never used a political definition. I know that that member only speaks from his own background of ignorance and not for the government I am sure.

An hon. member: He should withdraw it.

Mr. Barrett: No, let it be. I do not deny his opinion. It could be stupid or racist or anything else, but he does not speak for the government I hope. I hope he does not speak for the government in that remark. That is what I am saying.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): He is not a member of the government, Dave, for goodness' sake.

Mr. Barrett: Are you saying that is the government's position?

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): No, I am saying he is not a member of the government.

An hon. member: He is a Liberal.

Mr. Barrett: He is a Liberal? That is even worse. I apologize to the Conservative Party. I hope that the leader of the Liberal Party takes that member into the back room and spanks him intellectually for what he just said. Brush his teeth. Whatever you do with him, clean him up a bit because that was a stupid statement.

Mr. Blaikie: Wash his mouth out with soap.

Mr. Barrett: Here is a situation where we now have a Mexican senator seeking political refuge in this country. That is the country we are going to sign with?

Let us talk about the environment. I want to recall to the House the nice statements made by the minister. Oh, we are going to incorporate environmental law., Oh, yes, this is the first agreement that will have environmental protection in it. As a member of that committee, I wanted us to go to Matamoros, Mexico to see the results of the devastation from pollution. That can be ranked with a North American Chernobyl at Matamoros, Mexico. It is not radiation environmental damage, but certainly pollution from every form of chemical and toxic, poison waste being poured into open ditches in that city.

Mr. Blaikie: Free enterprise thrives there.

Mr. Barrett: Free enterprise. There are no rules or regulations. Leave Canada and leave the United States and go down to Mexico and allow this to happen.

• (1240)

The rate of birth defects in infants is 1 in 16 in that Brownsville, Texas and Matamoros area. Guess what? The residents of Brownsville, Texas have discovered that pollution knows no borders. The poisons, pesticides and chemical toxins that are being dumped into the soil and water in Matamoros, Mexico are coming right into Brownsville, Texas. What does the agreement have to say about that?

An hon. member: Nothing.

Mr. Barrett: Nothing. If the government is suggesting that there are parallel accords to deal with this problem, that was an initiative of the United States government and not the Canadian government. For goodness' sake, if it is really sincere about that then it should not allow the bill to go through this House without every member of this House seeing those parallel accords.

Has anybody in the press gallery of this great nation seen the parallel accords? Has anybody on the government backbenches seen the parallel accords? Has anybody here in this Chamber seen them? Yet we are asked by the minister to accept the flat argument that pollution is in the agreement. It is not even written yet. How in the world can it be in the agreement if it is not written yet?

It is to weep to see what is being done to this country. It is to weep to understand the cynical manipulation of what is going on here today. It is to weep to know that we will have one-half day more next week to debate this and then it is finished. We will get some little tiddly-widdly committee and we might visit some other cities maybe.

Speaking of that, the committee never even travelled to Montreal. It never travelled to Toronto. I suggested in the committee hearings that the reason we did not travel to Montreal and Toronto is because they are too big and there are too many people. They might come to the committee meeting. What an absurdity.

I also want to deal with some substantive factors that are inside the agreement and put them on the record. It is impossible to go through chapter and verse of what is in the agreement, but I have picked a couple of selective items so that members of this House can hear for themselves exactly what we are doing to our Canadian sovereignty and how this bill is a massive capitulation to mindless corporate greed and selfishness with no protection for ordinary people.

One may say that is an outrageous statement of clichés. It is an outrageous statement and it is full of clichés but it is tragically based on fact.

I want to bring to the attention of this House a document that has been distributed by the government called: "North American Free Trade Agreement: An Overview and Description". I want to refer specifically to what this government has signed. On page 16, under the paragraph of intellectual property rights, the following has been agreed to by the Conservative government, the Americans and the Mexican government: "Intellectual property rights, trade secrets generally," are acceptable "as well as protecting"—I want you to listen to this, Madam Speaker—"from disclosure by the government test data submitted by firms regarding the safety and efficacy of pharmaceutical and agrichemical products".

What did the government sign here? It has signed away the right and the responsibility of an elected government in Canada, and at the provincial level, that once given documentation on the efficacy of a pesticide or a pharmaceutical product that it cannot release the data to the public. What is the point of having a public health department? What is the point of allowing the Canadian people to believe those doctors and public health nurses who look after the children and the elderly of this country who are the whistleblowers against filth, vermin, germs and ill-health? Those whistleblowers are paid by Canadian taxpayers to protect us against pharmaceuticals and agriproducts that are toxins. What is the point of having a health department if we pass this to say that when the government gets the data on efficacy of drugs or of toxins on pharmaceutical products that it cannot release the document?

Mr. Rodriguez: A conspiracy of silence.

Mr. Barrett: A conspiracy of silence my friend. Do you think the doctors of this country know this? I bet they do not. Do you think the public health nurses know this? I bet they do not.

Mr. Rodriguez: Do you know it?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Barrett: No.

Mr. Rodriguez: There is a doctor and he does not know it.

Mr. Barrett: Did you know, Madam Speaker, that not one letter was sent out to the health people and caregivers of this country to ask: "Do you think we should sign this right away?"

Do you remember the thalidomide tragedy, Madam Speaker, and the brave doctor in the United States? What was her name? Was it Kelsey, or something to that effect? That one brave woman in the bowels of the huge health bureaucracy in the United States put out a stamp and said: "No, thalidomide will not be sold in the United States". It did not happen here in Canada until after. Canada accepted it. There were no efficacy tests. There was no responsibility. Europe did the same.

After we learned from the thalidomide tragedy, that single woman doctor in the United States was given the highest civilian award possible in that country. What did Canada do then? It announced that we would have the same standards as the United States. That was a Liberal government. It was late and tragic. We still as taxpayers must share the burden, and rightly so, morally and ethically, to care for those victims of thalidomide in Canada. However, after that tragic incident we said: "Never again in Canada".

Let me warn all pregnant mothers. Let me warn all the elderly. Let me warn all children in this country and all parents who are concerned that the protection they thought would be there in perpetuity—never again the thalidomide scare—has all been signed away by that government over there.

I repeat. These are the words: "intellectual property rights, trade secrets generally, as well as protecting from disclosure by the government test data submitted by firms regarding the safety and efficacy of pharmaceutical and agrichemical products".

Have we heard anyone on the government side, the health department, the justice department, any of the candidates for the leadership or even the chief spokesperson for the government give an explanation as to why it signed these sovereign rights away? Has it consulted the Canadian people? This is one specific example of literally dozens of examples throughout this whole massive documentation of the agreement this government has signed with Mexico and the United States.

There is no protection for the environment. There are no health and safety standards. For those unemployed Canadians who are being chastised for using unemployment insurance as a bridge before they go back to work, let me tell them that the kind of work they will face within 18 months after this agreement is implemented is competing against Mexicans who are paid 80 cents an hour on average for the same jobs that pay $7 to $12 here in Canada.

Has there been one populist voice from the business community against this kind of thing? Not in this country. The big-business community has totally capitulated to this agreement because it is hand in glove with this government. If anybody thinks that there is going to be relief through the Conservatives then they should forget it. Big business is going to put its money on the Tories. It is going to sell the brand new leader and unless the Liberals have specific policies to announce they are going to be brushed aside in the debate.

That is the dilemma for the Official Opposition. The Liberals have not laid out exactly what it would change or do to protect Canadian workers or Canadian health. Since John Turner left the leadership of the Liberal Party it too has thrown in its hand with the same corporations that sponsor this government here.

Mr. Peterson: Balderdash.

Mr. Barrett: You can call it balderdash or any other uncomplimentary word you want. I have even better words for your position than balderdash. If you want to confess and repent your position on this, do it now. Do it quick because we do not have much time to debate this. The government is the one that is going to close this debate down.

• (1250)

In the United States there is a billionaire. In our culture it is important to define how much money you have got, not how much you have got up in your head or how much backbone you have got because we have abdicated defining human beings on those bases. Poets cannot make it in our society because they do not produce anything, just words.

Scientists are relegated to begging for research money because they are working out of an intellectual commitment.

But if you are greedy and you want to be measured in success, grab as much profit as you can under a wide open rapacious system that even the international Catholic church has now attacked as being the most serious evil facing mankind and that is rampant capitalism. Yes, it is the Catholic church that has defined the greatest sin now. They have even defined in the Catholic church that it is now a sin to exploit people by paying low wages. Under that definition every Catholic who is true to his or her faith who supports the free trade agreement is violating the tenets of the Catholic church and is being sinful.

I am not suggesting the church will excommunicate but I just want to warn Catholics as one who was educated in Catholic universities that they are open to sin if they support this agreement. The only organized group internationally that has defined what is a sin around this kind of agreement is the Catholic church and I applaud it with a great deal of enthusiasm.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Barrett: Who is this billionaire in the United States that has all the attention of the talk shows and has all the attention of MTV? I never knew what MTV was until the election happened. Who is this fellow out of nowhere who picked up 20 per cent of the vote in the United States and appeared before a committee in that country? One Ross Perot. He would not vote for me and I am not sure about Ross getting my vote. But as a billionaire, he is that symbol of everything this government adores and believes in, the accumulation of massive wealth by a handful of individuals, the definition that the Tories would love to have as a candidate. That billionaire said if we signed this agreement with Mexico, Canada and the United States all we would hear was one big sucking sound as jobs left the United States and went into Mexico.

Mr. McCreath: Point of order, Madam Speaker. I am enjoying the remarks of my hon. friend. In order that he might finish his remarks and others might have an opportunity to participate I wonder if I might seek unanimous consent of the House to sit through the lunch hour.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion cannot be moved on a point of order, but unanimous consent was sought and was denied.

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, I could ask that the rules be suspended and the government pass a motion that no closure will be used on this bill. It will have my support. Of course that is something I may address in a few minutes.

Madam Speaker, do you believe that the Canadian people had an opportunity to examine this closely? Do you believe that the people in Montreal, the people in Toronto who represent the visible minority community, ethnics and other communities which are suppressed economically in this country because of the kind of capitalist system we live under are participants in this kind of debate? They are deliberately at the bottom of the economic ladder because of policies of this government and preceding governments. Yet these people will be wooed by that government and by the Official Opposition without ever hearing a word of this debate and understanding the implications for them as new Canadians.

New Canadians will be among the first victims. Those who are generational in this country, the women, the marginalized workers, those across this country who have never had a chance to break through to the good life that the Prime Minister likes to boast about, will also be victims of this agreement.

Are there going to be town hall meetings by the official candidates for the Conservative Party on this issue?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Barrett: Will there be an opportunity for reporters to ask: "How do you feel about this loss of sovereignty on the efficacy of drugs or of toxic things?"

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Barrett: Do you think that the government will travel to each community where jobs will be lost and stand up and say: "I know it is painful, I know it is going to hurt you, but it is for the greater good?"

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Barrett: Do you think that this government will lie again?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Mr. Barrett: Do you think that this government will say we will have massive retraining, as it promised in the de Grandpré report, and then lie again?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Mr. Barrett: Do you think that it will further harmonize in this country unemployment insurance legislation, health care, and every other part of the social fabric so that we can be forced down to the level of the United States, and not force it up to our level?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Mr. Barrett: Let me give you a specific example about that, Madam Speaker.

As the wife of the President of the United States travels through that country seeking to find a solution to the terrible problem of the lack of health care for a significant number of Americans, the Americans are looking to Canada as a possible solution. They are looking at Tommy Douglas' solution.

An hon. member: Right.

Mr. Barrett: Just a little aside, I remember when people used to talk about socialized medicine and they said that we were all a bunch of dangerous Reds, that socialism would take away the opportunity for the patient and the doctor to have a relationship. I was never interested in the relationship between the doctor and the patient. All I was interested in was paying the bills.

An hon. member: The same with the doctor.

Mr. Barrett: The same with the doctor.

What do we hear 25 years later? We hear the government benches and the Liberal benches saying: "Vote for us and we will improve medicare". How can they improve medicare if the taxation base is evaporating because of these trade deals? Where are the people who are going to pay the taxes?

I want to tell Mrs. Clinton that the devastation of the loss of nearly 500,000 jobs in this country because of the free trade agreement has cut a terrible swath through the services of health care, and they will never be allowed to initiate theirs if that job base goes to Mexico.

I also want to say this without rancour or personal vindictiveness, but I have yet to hear a Conservative member denounce socialized medicine, denounce the fact that Conservatives also use public health care. They also carry in their pockets that pinko card that allows them to go to the doctor anywhere in the world.

If they were serious about supporting health care, they should say so. On the other hand, if they attack socialism then I demand that they stand up and rip up their medicare cards before someone calls them hypocrites. Only a hypocrite would espouse the public health care system. Only a hypocrite would espouse a socialist health care system while attacking socialism.

I do not believe there is a single hypocrite over there, but I want them to prove it by ripping up their socialist health care cards and telling the world they are against pinko policies. In a pig's eye. Can a pig fly? They are opening themselves to the charge of hypocrisy by supporting health care that they do not believe in, as it is socialist, but at the same time ripping the guts out of the possibility of sustaining the taxation base necessary to support it.

An hon. member: What will NAFTA do to it?

Mr. Barrett: NAFTA will take away approximately another 8 per cent of that potential tax base within 18 months. As that tax base shrinks our unemployment will rise, in some regions beyond the 20 per cent figure.

• (1300)

In Newfoundland, in the maritimes and in large urban areas those people who first need entry level jobs to get work experience will not be given the opportunity because we signed this deal and those jobs will be gone.

Offshore investment and Canadian investment will go to Mexico. Canadian dollars in Canadian banks, which are saved by Canadian deposit holders who are paid a measly 1.5 per cent by the banks while the banks rip off 16 and 17 per cent on credit cards, will go to Mexico.

An hon. member: It is called greed.

Mr. Barrett: Some of the money held in self-directed RRSPs will also go to Mexico. Nothing will be spent here in Canada. Nothing to provide jobs here. They are all motivated by greed to make a quick profit in Mexico at the expense of Mexican workers.

We demand that Canadian wages and working conditions not go down to the Mexican level. If this government is serious about Third World development we demand that they come up to our level.

Madam Speaker, if you are blind to the clock, I have approximately four minutes to go. Let us not be hasty.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the House agree that we do not see the clock for the next four minutes?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Barrett: Thank you, Madam Speaker. If this Canadian government believes that this agreement can provide the jobs to fuel the engine of growth then let it provide some details. How much money will come into this country once we sign this deal, and from where? How much indigenous generic capital will be mobilized in this country to provide jobs now?

There is no strategy, there is no plan. In that regard I agree with the Liberal critic who said the biggest flaw of all was the lack of planning, but the four letter word is also anathema to the Liberal Party. It is spelled p-l-a-n and it has never been used by the Liberal Party.

On the eve of a national election this destructive agreement that destroys sovereign control of Canadian interests in health care, environment and labour standards, that diminishes the capabilities and opportunities of Canadian people, and that says that we as a nation will now capitulate and give up forever our destiny as Canadians in a tough world by tying into the United States is ready to be signed.

I did not spend 25 years in public life to be present at the funeral of this country. We human beings have our weaknesses and our strengths. We have our passions and our ideologies. I want to urge all Canadians, regardless of passion and regardless of ideology, to understand that nothing less is at stake in this deal than Canada as we know it.

This bill could be aptly renamed as the Canada termination act. If we sign this agreement we put an end, a finish, to any idea that we will ever be masters in our own house again. That great cry of the province of Quebec, maîtres chez nous, ironically is shared by every single Canadian in every corner of this country about our beloved Canada.

We have never faced a government as bad as this in the history of our country. This government's policies and the efficacies of its policies have seen us destroy the hope, the dreams and the passions of those Canadians.

I welcome the next federal election. I hope to God that Canadian people study the issues, think clearly and force the parties to define their positions. The reckoning date is not this bill. Even if this bill passes in the House the reckoning date is January 1, 1994.

The government people vote for can save Canada or destroy it.

The New Democrats are opposed to this bill. The Tories are in favour of it. The Liberals are still on the fence, and they have to be part of the debate too.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1:04 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the eviction from the House of Commons of the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca yesterday is the first such incident in years and came as a surprise to no one, especially the leader of the NDP.

I would suggest that the NDP members take heed of their leader's comments and once and for all allow this House to proceed in a constructive and orderly manner so that the business of the nation can take priority over the antics.

The leader of the NDP spoke just a few months ago about the chaos sometimes seen during Question Period. She said: "The abuse that is shouted back and forth, the heckling, and the histrionics strike me and my women colleagues as silly, childish, sometimes wounding and always counter productive".

An hon. member: Who said that?

Mr. Walker: That was the leader of the NDP. Never were more appropriate words spoken. Unfortunately for her, her party, the House of Commons and all of Canada these words fell on deaf ears in her own caucus.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, both business and labour communities in Prince Edward Island and the maritime regions are responding to the decision in the courts regarding the fixed link project.

The United Brotherhood of Carpenters in Charlottetown says: "With 80 per cent of our members on UIC it is no longer reasonable for the majority to be held hostage forever by those who use environmental legislation and regulations to serve their own selfish concerns".

The Construction Association of P.E.I. says: "We are extremely concerned about the apparent delay in the construction of the bridge between P.E.I. and New Brunswick".

The Islanders for a Better Tomorrow say: "It is important that the clear majority of islanders have their wishes respected".

Proponents from the maritimes are calling on the government to fulfil the requirements of a section 12, as outlined in the recent court decision, so that the work on this project may begin.

I add my strong support to those who are calling for this decision to be made as soon as possible and in compliance with the judge's recent ruling.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, Multinational Water and Power is proceeding with plans to divert a portion of the flow of the North Thompson River in British Columbia for export by pipeline into the California market. This U.S. based company is now lobbying B.C. construction industries to bring them onside with the promise of jobs, jobs, jobs.

Contrary to this government's explanations water is defined as a commodity of trade under both the Canada-U.S. trade agreement and the proposed North American trade agreement, making the Multinational proposal a serious concern.

If this government is serious about preserving our Canadian water supplies it should put its money where its mouth is. U.S. President Clinton has said the NAFTA deal will not be signed until environmental concerns are met. This government should seize this opportunity to negotiate specific exclusions for the export of water.

The people of British Columbia do not want to see our fresh water supplies exploited for export. They know that once we turn the tap on, we are never going to turn it off.

CHANGE

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to talk about change.

Parents and students are talking about spending more time in school during the school year. Workers are becoming ever more positive and enthusiastic about cross-training. Smart cars will eliminate traffic jams, spot tie-ups and tell drivers of alternative routes.

No-name Dave Nicol says that the baby boomers' gastronomic desires are Splendido pizza bread, hot, hot salsa and zipper back shrimp. In place of the simple copper wire and analog signals of the past there is now fibre-optic cable and digital transmission.

IBM and other majors have new changed ways of operating, such as independent units, noting plans to become more mobile, more entrepreneurial, and more service oriented.

Bob Rae is reported as saying, as reported in The Globe and Mail: "My own view about welfare is that simply paying people to sit at home is not smart".

Clear and transparent is the change desired. There is even Crystal Pepsi, Tab Clear, and clear Ivory Liquid and Palmolive.

• (1405)

Today I read that staid IBM dress is being replaced by an informal dress that will note more free thinking. Certainly it is a wave of change and the wave of change is very evident. Except—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

EDUCATION

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, in a fast changing but slowly expanding economy, education has become the surest way of acquiring and maintaining employment.

Education, not experience, increasingly determines one's ability to compete in today's labour market.

[Translation]

More and more young Canadians are feeling the impact of the high cost of education and high unemployment. The government's cuts in the student employment program have forced thousands of students to reassess their ability to afford a post-secondary education.

Students in increasing numbers are turning to the Canada Student Loans Program for assistance.

[English]

This government must begin to view post-secondary education as a long-term investment. I urge the government to undertake a comprehensive review of the Canada Student Loans Program with the aim of increasing the flexibility and accessibility of the program while permitting students to secure employment prior to establishing repayment plans.

ELIJAH HARPER

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, a socialist is a Liberal is a New Democrat is a socialist. Elijah Harper is now a candidate for the Liberal Party in Manitoba in the next election.

He is a former member of the New Democratic Party, a former NDP member of the legislature, and a former cabinet minister in the NDP Government of Manitoba. When he announced his candidacy for the Liberal Party he said that he would not have to compromise his principles from being a New Democrat to now being a Liberal.

That comes as no surprise to me. I have watched the opposition in this House for four years. There is no difference between a Liberal and a New Democrat. Socialism is alive and well in both parties.

CANADIAN AUTO WORKERS

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pride that I announce that Canadian Auto Workers local 1990 has voted to affiliate with the New Democratic Party.

The local, representing 2,600 workers at Canadian Airlines and its partners, voted on the resolution at its annual convention in Port Elgin, Ontario. CAW President Buzz Hargrove said: "Workers of Canadian Airlines know which party has fought against privatization and deregulation. They know that the NDP is the only political party that stands up for working people and the Canadian airline industry. This is a grass roots decision. It was made after spirited debate by delegates from across the country and is the first time these people have decided to throw their full support behind the NDP".

THE REFORM PARTY

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, the Reform Party is cutting up again.

In the March 22 issue of The Globe and Mail it was reported that: "After asking its members to fill in questionnaires to help guide its policy, the Reform Party looked at only a small fraction of the forms and secretly shredded tens of thousands without reading them".

The Reform Party is not a grass roots party. It is a crab-grass roots party. How mean it is to ask people for their ideas and then to turn those ideas into mice nests. The report also indicated that other questionnaires are being read by laser reading machines. In my political party we have a program called Talk to a Tory; the Reform Party could have one called Liaison with a Laser.

The Reform Party is a bumper sticker party that tries to resolve major issues with slogans like the "The west wants in". Its next slogan should be "Read my laser".

Preston Manning, like the character in the Ninja Turtles, may now be called Shredder.

PAKISTAN

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, while the minister of minority rights of Pakistan is in Canada Canadians want to urge him to ensure that the human rights of Christian minorities in his country are respected.

Pakistan is an essentially Islamic state. Christian minorities number fewer than 1 per cent. There have been reports of growing anti-Christian violence and steps by the government to undermine their rights.

For example, Pakistan's blasphemy law states that anyone who does not accept Muhammad is a traitor to Pakistan. We are pleased however that the government has resisted taking other proposed repressive measures on several occasions.

Pakistan's Christians have been proud citizens since the founding of the country in 1947, and most resided in the area before the country was born.

• (1410)

The Government of Pakistan should take steps to assure maximum protection and full human rights for Christian minorities. Canada enjoys a good relationship with Pakistan and we want this to be continued. The best way is to ensure there are no religious and human rights violations of its minorities.

GREEK INDEPENDENCE DAY

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay special tribute to the Greek community in Canada as it prepares today to celebrate Greek Independence Day.

The roughly 350,000 Canadians of Greek descent are proud to celebrate that day in 1821 when their ancestors rose against the Ottoman empire, which had held a stranglehold on their homeland since 1453.

The Greek national consciousness went through a period of reawakening, led by the poets, scholars, writers, and revolutionary leaders of the day.

The 1821 revolt in Moldavia and the Peloponnesus inaugurated a decade of revolution and civil war in Greece. Most of the population picked up arms, while the commercial fleets of Greek merchants and islanders built a navy.

With independence achieved, surely no nationality is more in tune with the passion for freedom than the Greeks. It is indeed an honour and a privilege that so many of them have chosen Canada as their home.

We are the better for them and we wish them all a happy Greek Independence Day.

NDP GOVERNMENT IN ONTARIO

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Once more, the NDP government in Ontario breaks one of its promises. This time, it is education.

After raising tuition fees, cutting bursaries and reducing funding for school-boards and universities, the NDP is now attacking second language teaching in Ontario.

The provincial education minister announced yesterday in Ottawa Centre, in my riding, and I quote: "We will have to soft-pedal French-language services in favour of other, more pressing needs".

My colleague from Ottawa—Vanier, Jean-Robert Gauthier, made the following point, and I quote: "There should be only one class of students in Canada. By denying Ontario's francophone minority access to education from grade one to university, the NDP is creating two classes of students and putting the seal of approval on linguistic discrimination".

The NDP government is also planning cuts in the budget for the Ontario Office of Francophone Affairs.

This is one more attack by the government on Ontario's francophone population. The NDP has demonstrated that protecting the French language is not a priority.

I want to join my Liberal colleagues in condemning this attack by the NDP on French language education in Ontario.

NATIONAL KIDNEY MONTH

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to remind the House that March is National Kidney Month in Canada. Fourteen thousand Canadians and their families live with kidney disease.

The Kidney Foundation of Canada is a national volunteer organization dedicated to improving their health and quality of life. It funds research and clinical education, provides patient services to those living with kidney disorders, advocates for access to high quality health care and promotes awareness and commitment to organ donation.

Incidentally, the first kidney transplant in Canada was performed in 1958. Such innovative life-saving techniques were made possible in large measure as a result of research funded by the Kidney Foundation of Canada.

This March drive is the foundation's major source of funding. This year 90,000 volunteers will try to raise $5 million.

I would like to urge all members of this House and all Canadians to give generously. I ask them to please remember to sign their donor cards.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, on Monday I met in Winnipeg with representatives of the Air Canada employees' political action committee.

These employees of Air Canada in Winnipeg are rightly concerned about the future of the Canadian airline industry and the long-term effect of permitting American ownership in the Canadian industry.

They do not want to see the export of jobs to the U.S. or the demise of good airline and airline-related jobs in Canada. They believe that control of Canada's airline industry should remain in Canada and that a single Canadian-owned international airline would best be able to compete with other global carriers.

Too often the CAI/Air Canada debate is seen as a Montreal versus Calgary debate. The hundreds of Air Canada employees in Winnipeg are in the west too and they should be listened to. They have the interests of all of Canada at heart.

CHILDREN AND HOSPITALS WEEK

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the House that the week of March 21-27 is the 14th annual Children and Hospitals Week, an event sponsored by the Association for the Care of Children's Health. This year's theme is "Commitment to Caring".

During the week programs will be sponsored to increase public, parental and professional knowledge of the special needs of children in the health care system. The week is celebrated by many events that will appeal to and inform both children and adults.

The Association for the Care of Children's Health is a multidisciplinary organization of more than 200 hospitals and organizations, as well as 4,000 health care professionals and parents. For more than 25 years it has worked to promote comprehensive health services for children.

• (1415)

Please join with me in wishing everyone involved a very successful Children and Hospitals Week.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, you will know that the government has imposed a 3 per cent tax on student loans. You will also know that it has added an additional six months' interest to student loans. You will know as well that it is proposing to privatize student loans and it may limit access to students to post-secondary education.

But did you know, Mr. Speaker, that right now as we meet today, there are tax collectors out there who are trying to get blood out of a stone? They are trying to get money paid back from students, young men and women sometimes with families, who have limited or no means to pay those loans back.

I want to ask the government to stop this harassment.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, 214 Canadian military personnel and approximately 50 civilians are serving, the latter mostly as volunteers, in Cambodia as part of the United Nations Transitional Authority for Cambodia.

These Canadians are serving with distinction in a theatre where danger is a constant companion due to the growing number of land mines, the problems of deadly diseases such as falciparum malaria, the hazards of travel especially by helicopter and the constant possibility of confrontation with hostile military forces.

Thanks to the efforts of the United Nations force including the above-noted Canadians, the general election planned for May 23-25 will in all likelihood occur as scheduled. Regretfully, however, the refusal of the Khmer Rouge to co-operate in the electoral process means those Cambodians who reside in Khmer Rouge controlled territory will not be able to vote.

The harsh reality, moreover, is that a United Nations presence in Cambodia may well be required for a considerable period of time after the May election. The premature withdrawal of UN forces from Cambodia could well lead to the renewal of the armed conflict which for decades has tragically characterized the history of this troubled country.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

HELICOPTER PROGRAM

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

I am told that earlier today in Vancouver the Minister of National Defence was asked whether she would choose between a national day care program and the military helicopter program. She said it was an unfair choice, a Hobson's choice, one that she would not make. She in fact made her choice, saying yes to the helicopters and no to day care.

Does the Minister of Finance agree with her choice, or will he scale back or cancel the helicopter program in his upcoming budget?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's comments are an absolute distortion of what the Minister of National Defence had to say. I think it is very unfair for him to put that kind of an interpretation on the matter.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the transcript of the minister's remarks is there and I do not see why in the light of her significance in his party he could not answer the question.

I am going to ask him a supplementary, based on a report today by Canadian Press which says that supporters of the proposed new anti-submarine helicopters admit the aircraft would be virtually useless at guarding Canadian waters of the Arctic where nuclear submarines spend a lot of their time. The Canadian Press goes on to say that even the navy acknowledges there is no way to get sub-detecting sensors through the ice.

If the Minister of Finance is truly interested in sound management of public funds, should this information not make him re-think the acceptability and viability of this $5.8 billion helicopter program?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, each year the House allocates to the Department of National Defence sums of money under which it operates. It spends about 25 per cent of those sums on capital equipment each year renewing equipment.

A defence committee of this House unanimously agreed, with every party represented, that in fact there needed to be a replacement for the aging Sea King helicopters and that the replacement should be the EH-101. It could look after its role with the frigates in terms of sovereignty patrol, fisheries patrol, drug interdiction and anti-submarine if necessary, as well as search and rescue.

The reality is if the EH-101 contract were to be cancelled it would put the defence department in a situation where the frigates were unusable and we would not be able to rescue Canadians who were in distress in bad weather.

• (1420)

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question, again for the Minister of Finance.

According to the Canadian Press, Fred Crickard, a retired rear admiral and a member of the Naval Officers' Association said: "The passive sonar equipment on the EH-101 would be very unsatisfactory even if you could get the sonabuoy (sensors) down, which you cannot".

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in the light of this statement, I want to ask the minister why the Minister of Finance insists on including the $5.8 billion helicopter program in the government's Main Estimates. Why can the minister not himself answer this straightforward question, since he is responsible for managing the government's finances?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to be implying that Canada should acquire the capability of pursuing submarines under the ice pack as part of our sovereignty.

I am sure if he checked with his colleague, the former vice-chief of naval wing of the Canadian Armed Forces, he will realize the only way that could be done is by Canada acquiring nuclear submarines. Is that the position of the Liberal Party?

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Despite the government's bravado, Canadian consumer confidence remains at an all-time low. The government continues to ignore a plan that can create thousands of jobs for unemployed Canadians, tackle environmental problems such as water quality and improve the global competitiveness of Canada's infrastructure.

This cost-shared infrastructure program would not add to the government's deficit but would create growth, jobs and confidence that the country desperately needs.

Why is the Minister of Finance ignoring a proposal that is proactive for this economy rather than continue his government's destructive policies of unemployment and devastation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware of the reference I made to strategic capital investment in infrastructure in the December statement. In this statement we announced a $500 million fund to provide for highway improvements in all the provinces of Canada, particularly in the Atlantic region.

We announced and continue to pursue the fixed link which is worth $800 million. We also announced a program of improving federally owned bridges and roads within the parks. We made reference to the fact that we would be improving some of our railroad infrastructure, particularly grade separations, et cetera, establishing microwave landing systems, an electronic highway.

Over the next five years these initiatives will result in $2 billion worth of investment, creating some 4,000 to 5,000 jobs. This is clearly geared toward improving the competitiveness and the productivity of Canadian industry.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, the government and this minister knows that is a pittance compared to what this country needs. The municipalities and the provincial governments are prepared to work with you, sir, in order to make this country work again.

I have a supplementary question for the minister. The minister has orchestrated a federal tax revolt because it is unilaterally refusing to pay its fair share to municipalities for services that other Canadians have to pay through their municipal taxes.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance if he will lift this government's unilateral freeze on grants in lieu of taxes until after the negotiations are completed with the municipalities and new legislation is introduced?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member's philosophy is spend, spend, spend.

What we have tried to do—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: Spend, spend, spend, borrow, borrow, borrow, tax, tax, tax. That is the philosophy over there. No government can continue to sustain a policy of spending $1.33 for every $1 worth of revenue that was taken in. That could not be sustained. What we are doing here is containing—

• (1425)

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Cancel the helicopters.

Mr. Mazankowski: Well, sure, he says cancel the helicopters.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am really surprised at the hon. member. He thinks that it is appropriate for servicemen and women to fly around in 35-year old helicopters.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Fix them up.

Mr. Mazankowski: Fix them up, he says. That would be like the hon. member driving a 35-year old car. Why does he not fix his up?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

It is clear this government will do everything it can to rush NAFTA through Parliament. It will impose time allocation. It has refused to hold serious consultations, although the agreement is far from being finalized. A former negotiator for the government has said that for Canada to adopt NAFTA at a time when the U.S. Congress wants to negotiate major changes is poor strategy. It is not good for business and it is not good for democracy. So why the rush?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the NDP forgets to tell the House that we have, to an unprecedented degree, consulted with Parliament.

An hon. member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Hockin: The subcommittee that looked at this agreement has already heard 160 witnesses. We now have the bill before the House. We want to get the bill into committee so that it can be further looked at, even after all this pre-study, even after listening to 160 witnesses through the pre-study process. However, the hon. member's party will not let us put the bill into committee. They are simply blockading that process.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. member is clear that debate at second reading of a bill is debate on the principle of the bill. It is essential to have a full debate at second reading and on the principle of this bill and I want to—

Mr. Speaker: I am having some difficulty because I think these questions are in anticipation of debate. I wonder if the hon. member could put her question more appropriately.

Ms. McLaughlin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can. The government is clearly confused on its own position. On December 18, 1990 I was told by the government that the inclusion of labour, social, environmental matters in NAFTA was a silly idea. I quote: "a silly idea". On June 13, 1991 I was told by the Minister for International Trade that such issues were not part of the actual trade negotiations yet now he calls these negotiations unnecessary bonuses.

My question to the government is simply this: The government is confused, the public needs more information. What is the hurry to ram through NAFTA?

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. I think the hon. member is having some difficulty with the rules. The minister may want to reply, but it seems to me the question is out of order.

The hon. member on a supplemental.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the United States, one of the major signatories to the NAFTA deal, is going to go through this process with extensive negotiations, extensive debate.

I want to ask the government simply this. Why is the government going ahead with legislation which is not complete? Canadians do not have the completed negotiations. I just want to simply ask the government—

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is rather interesting how the NDP takes its cue from the United States when it is convenient for it to do so.

I think perhaps I can help the hon. member out. In an interview with Business World Mr. Steve Van Houten, the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association was asked this question: "Has the free trade agreement helped or hindered your members?" Mr. Van Houten replied: "Oh, it has helped considerably. In fact, exports of manufactured goods from Canada to the United States have gone up by 60 per cent since the free trade agreement came into force".

• (1430)

Those who blame the free trade agreement for all of our ills and job losses frankly do not know what they are talking about. Without this business we would be in real trouble. The interviewer asked: "And are you looking toward NAFTA?" Mr. Van Houten: "Very much so, indeed, our members are behind it. They tell us so in a 10:1 kind of a ratio".

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

According to a study by the Canadian Tax Foundation, our tax burden has increased 25 per cent since 1980. Forty cents out of every dollar earned by Canadians today goes toward paying taxes.

Is the minister prepared to get the economy back on its feet, an economy that, according to 81 per cent of Canadians, is still in a recession, without adding to a tax burden that is even harder on the 85,000 people in Montreal who depend on food banks and on 216,000 unemployed workers in that city? Will he tell the House in no uncertain terms that in his next budget he will not raise taxes?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I can enlist the co-operation of the hon. member and other hon. members to reduce government spending then we can reduce taxes. It is as simple as that. Every single, solitary attempt that we make to bring down government spending, they oppose it. They block, they filibuster and they do everything in their power to stop it.

Under the provisions of tax reform, I remind the hon. member that the personal income tax changes removed 850,000 low-income Canadians from the tax rolls and 250,000 were senior citizens. Nine out of ten Canadians age 65 and over saw their federal tax reduced. We will continue to do that, as I did in the budget and as I reconfirmed in the December statement.

EMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. minister, I would like to make him an offer. Back down on the helicopters and we will support you 100 per cent.

As of last June, 17 per cent of Ontarians under the age of 60 were receiving some form of provincial or municipal welfare. This is three times the level it was during the early 1980s. Shameful figures.

Will the Minister of Finance take action in his upcoming budget to address the serious problem of joblessness in Ontario and in the rest of Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have taken a number of steps. In the budget last February and in the December statement we have taken steps to improve the tax regime, the investment climate for the small business sector, and particularly for the manufacturing and processing sector.

I am sure the hon. member just heard my quote from Mr. Stephen Van Houten of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association which indicated very clearly that since the free trade agreement has been signed, manufactured shipments have increased by some 60 per cent. He also indicates that the North American free trade agreement will provide further opportunities. This will indeed create jobs.

As I said to the House yesterday, 12,328,000 Canadians are working. That is 1,328,000 more Canadians working today than there were when we came into office in September 1984.

PEACEKEEPERS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Yesterday, two Canadian peacekeepers were seriously injured by shell fire. I think we all admire their bravery and wish them speedy recovery.

I say to the minister that it just shows what a dangerous and untenable position we put our peacekeepers in. There is no authority or authorization to retaliate so they are defenceless. They cannot even protect the people they are there to help.

Will the minister go to the United Nations to seek a clear mandate to ensure that our troops are not left in a defenceless position so they can carry out their clear role that they want to carry out which is to protect the victims in Bosnia?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has said, we are first of all very proud of our peacekeepers and we do everything we can as a government to ensure their safety and that the rules of engagement are clear. Those rules of engagement are established by the United Nations. We work very closely with them and through our military in assessing the capacity of our people to carry out their mission.

This does not mean that it should not be re-examined virtually on a constant basis and that is something that we do. It is something we are in constant touch with the United Nations about.

The situation that we find ourselves in as do others in Yugoslavia is different from the kind of situation we have found ourselves in before. We have worked closely with our own military and have had long discussions with them as to the capacity of our military to carry on their job.

Yes, we know that they can do that under extraordinary difficulties, but we are peacekeepers who have faced difficult missions before. This is not the first even though it is different from some others.

We are there because of the people of Yugoslavia who require our help and that of the international community. We will continue to do all we can for them as well as for our own people through the United Nations and through our own examination of our capacities.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to put my question to the minister.

The peace process in the former Yugoslavia is stalled in New York. There is continued violence and rape against civilians in Bosnia. Our troops are operating under a mandate that does not allow them to do the role they are sent to do. The Canadian member of the UN commission on war crimes said there are no resources to carry out that mission.

Is the minister not concerned about these problems? Is the minister not concerned that the entire UN mission in Bosnia is losing its credibility? Is it not the responsibility of Canada to make some new proposals, to take some new initiatives to try to restore the legitimacy and effectiveness of that action in that poor war-stricken country?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada has been in the forefront of taking initiatives around the tragedy in the former Yugoslavia.

We helped the Secretary-General when he was redesigning and re-examining the whole concept of peacekeeping through his agenda for peace. The concept of bringing war criminals to trial as individual criminals internationally was a Canadian initiative at the London Conference on Yugoslavia.

We have provided resources. I have said publicly that I will support that initiative among other countries and advocate that other countries do the same.

Yes, the peace process at the moment is facing difficulties, but if ultimately there is going to be peace in Yugoslavia, there is going to have to be a negotiated settlement. The Security Council is, right now even as we are here, attempting to bring some conclusion to this. We are supporting it every step of the way and helping it in every way that we can and we will continue to do that.

STUDENT LOANS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Nowlan: He was in his seat, Mr. Speaker. You were in your seat, Howard. Otherwise it is a farce. Mr. Speaker, this is important. You have to get out of your seat before you are recognized. Otherwise you should be off the list.

Mr. McCurdy: I do not know if I need a bodyguard or not to pursue this question.

Yesterday in response to a question the Secretary of State indicated that there had been wide consultation before the government introduced its new single bank monopoly Canada Student Loans Program.

We called the Canadian Federation of Students, the Canadian Association of University Teachers and the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada and none of them had been consulted.

My question is for whoever is speaking for the Secretary of State. Why before introducing such an important program did the government fail to consult the university community or its students and why was it that they had to find out about this program by reading The Globe and Mail?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): In the absence of the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the question. I believe there has been some discussion going on but maybe not with the same people that the hon. member was talking to. I will bring it to her attention.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the member can transmit this question to the Secretary of State or perhaps the Minister of Finance can answer the question. I want to ask how many banks have responded positively to the government proposal and what does this government intend to do if no banks respond to the government proposal, concede that the banks will dictate the conditions, or will it come up with a new program that is more responsive to the needs of needy students in the universities and colleges of this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was advised yesterday that indeed there had been consultations about this matter through an advisory organization that did include the students group. That was confirmed to me by the Department of the Secretary of State yesterday.

The hon. member can shake his head in the negative but that is a fact. It was conducted by the previous Secretary of State.

In so far as the other part of his question is concerned there have been submissions received. They are currently being evaluated. I think the cut-off date was March 12. There will be further discussions with interested parties as the new approach is being developed.

I think the hon. member would recognize that the system that was in place was deficient and faulty. What we are trying to do is improve it so it will ensure there is access to student loans for students and to ensure it is done in a fair and equitable way and at a reasonable cost.

GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it is a fundamental principle that no member of cabinet should ever be in a position to benefit in a direct and financial way from any cabinet decision.

Yet cabinet has appointed the former wife of the Minister of Supply and Services to a high-paying job, an appointment that directly and personally benefits the minister by putting him in a position to apply to the courts to reduce his alimony payments to his former wife.

Would the Deputy Prime Minister explain how cabinet could make a decision from which a member of cabinet, the Minister of Supply and Services, is in a position to benefit financially. Why is cabinet clearly using public money to get the minister off the hook on alimony payments?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, that has to rank as one of the lowest forms of questions we have ever heard in this place.

To suggest that Judge Judith Parish cannot be a human being in her own right and be selected for the post of citizenship judge, which is a government decision, and to suggest there is something wrong with that shows there is something very wrong with the thinking of that hon. member and those who applaud it. She will make an outstanding judge.

If she is going to criticize the spouses of members of Parliament, senators, or anybody else in terms of positions they might have in this government she had better look around at some of her own colleagues before she starts digging in that sewer.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, for once the hon. House leader is at least partly right. Any woman who has raised two children, managed a household and at the same time survived a political marriage is capable of carrying out almost any responsibility.

The question does not address the competence of the appointment. However, in light of the views expressed by both the House leader and the Prime Minister concerning the high esteem for women and their capabilities, esteem which I share by the way, can the Deputy Prime Minister please explain why Michael McSweeney, the Prime Minister's former baby-sitter and bag carrier, was appointed to a job at over $100,000 while the former wife of a cabinet minister gets an appointment at half the salary just to help the minister out with his support payments?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member should talk to the hon. member for Saint-Denis about his sister who is a citizenship court judge. Or perhaps she should talk to Senator Keith Davey whose wife is on the Immigration Appeal Board. Or perhaps she should talk to Senator Leo Kolber whose wife is part of the CBC board.

Perhaps she should look around a little bit before she starts casting stones. People who live in glass houses should not cast stones and it is beneath contempt to slander these people in this House the way she has done.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the question is not whether this government has a right to appoint people to positions. The question is on the ethics of this government.

• (1445)

I want to ask the following question of the Acting Prime Minister. We know that on September 21 Michael McSweeney got a $95,000 a year job from this government. Rinaldo, the hairdresser of the Prime Minister's wife, sits on the Federal Business Development Bank. Former speech writer Keith Morgan got a 10-year appointment to the Parole Board, and the husband of the member for Louis-Hébert who interestingly enough is named Maurice Duplessis got a patronage job.

Has the Canadian public not been subjected to enough? Why does this government for once not say that it is going to respect the edicts that it imposed on itself in 1984?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, it is a horrible thing that a small business proprietor should be appointed to the board of the Federal Business Development Bank. That is a horrible thing.

It is a horrible thing that a former alderman of the city of Ottawa, elected by his fellow citizens to represent them in city council, should be considered too tainted as to be capable of taking on federal responsibilities.

It is a horrible thing that people got involved in political life or happen to be married to members of Parliament. If he is outraged about Maurice Duplessis, let us hear his outrage about the sister of the member for Saint-Denis. Let him be consistent rather than just slinging mud.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, in 1984, the same Prime Minister said that political appointments would be beyond reproach.

[English]

The Prime Minister said in 1984 to another Prime Minister: "The least you could do is apologize for having made these horrible appointments".

I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister on behalf of the cabinet that made these appointments: Will he stand on behalf of his cabinet and apologize for these horrible appointments?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if there are apologies due it is from the hon. member for injuring the common sense and decency that ought to prevail here. He is the prolific mud-raker who digs around and has no problem slandering people who are here.

Each and every one of the appointments this government has made has been made on the basis of our conviction that they will do a good job in fulfilling the obligations we have asked them to take on. If the hon. member does not like that, that is too bad.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

This morning the Federation of Canadian Municipalities met with the Minister of Public Works over the freeze on grants in lieu of taxes announced by the Minister of Finance last year. By a single stroke on December 2 this government destroyed over 40 years of consultation with Canadian municipalities in this unilateral tax grab.

Will the minister assure municipal governments that there will be no freeze on grants this year or in the future without extensive meaningful consultation to find reasonable solutions that will not simply off-load federal tax burdens on municipal taxpayers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that this cost has increased very dramatically, by 77 per cent in the last six years, from $238 million in 1986-87 to $424 million in 1992. During this period there has been little increase in the inventory of federal properties.

The hon. member knows very well that we are going through difficult times. We have to constrain expenditures across the board. What has been done here is a freeze. We are attempting to work out a way in which we can put in place a better regime so that the grants in lieu of taxes will be distributed in a fair and equitable way. Those discussions are ongoing at the present time.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

Earlier this year the federal government cut 10 per cent of the funding to a number of organizations including the Indian and Métis friendship centres. Last week the provincial government in Manitoba cut provincial funding completely to many of these same organizations.

At the end of this month friendship centres, crisis centres and poverty organizations are closing their doors, laying off staff or eliminating programs.

Will the Minister of Finance recognize that at this time of high unemployment and the resulting family problems these organizations must be kept going? What good news does he have for these organizations?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had a chance to read the budget that was brought down by the province of Saskatchewan last week he would find out that provincial governments are facing the same difficulties as federal governments.

As a matter of fact if he looks at what the Government of Saskatchewan had to do, it has reduced its transfers to hospitals, to school-boards and to rural and urban municipalities anywhere from 3 per cent to 8 per cent, an actual reduction.

While we will try to provide some latitude and flexibility on this particular issue, we still have a very major challenge in reducing our fiscal deficit. We not only have a challenge to reduce it. We have a challenge to bring it down to zero. I hope I can call upon the hon. member for co-operation in that regard.

FEED FREIGHT ASSISTANCE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and refers to one of the spending cuts.

Atlantic Canadian farmers accepted the 10 per cent cut in the Feed Freight Assistance Program. However they still want a fairer form of applying the reduction in a way that maintains the principle of the Feed Freight Assistance Act.

Has the minister accepted the plan by the Atlantic Canada Farmers Council, or does he have another proposal that will maintain the principle of the act?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his interest in this matter. I have to say that when I was given this job some three months ago he was one of the first members to contact me on this issue.

We have had ongoing discussions with the provinces affected as well as with the interest groups affected. We are trying to reach a solution that takes into account the principles he outlines from the Atlantic Farmers Council as well as all other individuals involved. I want to let the member know we are going to have to reach a solution pretty quickly. When we do we will do our very best to take the considerations he raises on behalf of his constituents into the over-all decision we make.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

My question is for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker.

On March 16 the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories unanimously passed a motion condemning this government for cutting programs and services important to the Northwest Territories and for disregarding the effects of these cuts on the people of the NWT, a majority of whom are aboriginal people.

Why has this government chosen to celebrate 1993, the United Nations International Year of Indigenous People, by inflicting additional hardships on the aboriginal people of the Northwest Territories?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. colleague is referring to the 1988 health transfer program with regard to the federal government's transfer to the Government of the Northwest Territories to fulfil our obligations with regard to their autonomy of looking after their health care and welfare issues.

That particular case is before the courts. It would be quite inappropriate for me to make any further comment until the case is resolved.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance, in the absence of the Secretary of State who I might add moved the United Nations motion to recognize 1993 as the year of the indigenous people.

Among the cuts condemned by the NWT legislative assembly in its motion is the cut to the Canada-NWT language co-operation agreement. Under this agreement the federal government is obliged to fully fund the provision of services in French and to preserve, develop and enhance aboriginal languages.

Why has the minister disregarded his obligation under the terms of this agreement? Will he agree today to revoke these cuts?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated in this House on many occasions, the increase in transfers to the provinces and the territories has been growing at the rate of 5.2 per cent per year or 60 per cent since the time we came into office. In the area of the Canada Assistance Program, for example, that rate of growth has been 8 per cent per year.

I should say as well in terms of our expenditures for the aboriginal community that the expenditures have doubled since we have come into office from about $1.4 billion or $1.5 billion to $3 billion.

• (1455)

That hardly strikes me as a signal that the government is not concerned about the welfare of the aboriginal people. I think that kind of growth, which is something in the area of 8 per cent per year, is quite substantial. At a time when we are under very severe fiscal restraint and fiscal pressures we still continue to increase that budget substantially.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance.

Despite the claims of his government that the recession is over, Canadians know a very different story and those same Canadians have no faith in this government's management of the national economy.

In fact in a recent survey over 81 per cent of Canadians felt that they were still in an economic recession and that there was not any hope for an immediate withdrawal from that.

I ask the minister who is in the process of preparing a budget for next month: Has the government heard the voices of Canadians? Is it finally prepared to commit itself to a job creation budget that would not only produce some much needed job opportunities but instil some much needed confidence in both the marketplace and consumers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate what the hon. member is saying. We have said all along that the recovery was going to be a slow and painful process because there is substantial restructuring and adjustment that still have to take place. I think he would agree with me that the fourth quarter of 1992 experienced growth of 3.5 per cent. That seems to be continuing into the first quarter.

I can tell my hon. friend that in the course of consultations I have been engaged in, in preparation of a budget, the indicator I have been getting from Canadians far and wide right across the board—and we have consulted with all sectors of Canadian society—is that we have to address the difficulties of the deficit and the debt; that we have to to do it in a co-ordinated fashion, both at the federal and the provincial levels; and that we have to do it through cost cutting measures and not through increases in taxation.

That approach is serving us well because we have got inflation down. We have got interest rates down. Unemployment is starting to come down. Employment has increased, I believe, in eight or nine of the last consecutive months. The composite indicators are looking good. We have the small business sector with a new Small Businesses Loans Act. The Bank of Nova Scotia just announced a 6 per cent prime rate of interest for small business loans. We think that is a very positive effect.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

As a result of this government's 37 tax increases including the dreaded GST both small and medium sized business, as well as working and middle class families, have never ever been squeezed as much as they have. This has obviously put the lid on economic activity.

Given that this is a reality why did the minister refuse yesterday to rule out further individual tax increases? Rather than try to further shrink the pocketbooks of individual Canadians with additional taxes, why does he not try to make the economy grow and provide opportunities, confidence and hope?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier, under tax reform we took 850,000 low income Canadians off the tax rolls. Two hundred and fifty thousand of them were senior citizens, and nine out of ten Canadians aged 65 and over are paying reduced taxation.

We now have growth in the economy. The unemployment rate is down. The help wanted index is up. Department store sales are up. Retail sales are up. The prime rate is at 6 per cent, the lowest in 20 years. We have mortgage rates, the lowest in 35 years. We have housing prices down. Retail—

Mr. Speaker: We should press on. The hon. member for Simcoe Centre.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. It is time to stop protecting young offenders who commit violent crimes. When the charter protects individual rights at the expense of public good then the charter has gone beyond the limit of the initial intent of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

To be just, we must balance the rights of the victim, the rights of society and the rights of the offender. I cannot accept that our laws cannot reflect more closely the values of our society. If there is political will it can be done.

• (1500)

Could the Solicitor General tell the House what is being done to address this issue of great concern to my constituents of Simcoe Centre?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the recent amendments to the Young Offenders Act which balanced the protection of the public with the interests of the young person have made it easier to transfer young people to adult court.

The House will know that the Court of Appeal recently upheld them as being within the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I know the Minister of Justice is looking at further amendments to the Young Offenders Act and anticipates bringing them in as soon as possible.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of members the presence in the gallery of His Excellency, Dr. Egon Klepsch, President of the European Parliament.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I also wish to draw to the attention of members the presence in the gallery of Mr. Necmettin Cevheri, Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development for Turkey.

PRIVILEGE

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, there was a very vigorous exchange during Question Period about government appointments.

I learned from my father that one must never act in the heat of anger, but as the Standing Orders require, in such cases, the point must be raised at the first opportunity, I would not want people to think that I am passing it up. Since I was not present for the full exchange that took place between the person whom the Standing Orders require me to call the hon. minister and some of my colleagues, I would like to serve notice that I will read over what was said when I have a quiet moment, so that I can have an exact idea of what happened.

Right now, I would like to reserve my privilege to pursue this question. I hope that my colleagues will note once again that some things can be done in this House and others cannot, but above all, that anger is certainly the worst master when we have a discussion or wish to pursue a debate.

So I will try to heed that advice, but I assure you that I carefully noted only part of that exchange. I will examine it at leisure, but I will certainly act. I can assure you that I will act in my own way, which may not be the way others would act.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, perhaps in this context it might be useful for me to make a point at this time. The hon. member for Saint-Denis was mentioned in the exchange and in particular his sister, Rita, who is a Citizenship Court judge.

Let me make the point very clearly that the Prime Minister, after 30 years of friendship with both the hon. member and his sister, directly intervened and was delighted to reappoint her a Citizenship Court judge. If there was any connotation of something wrong with that, I would certainly want to remove it from the hon. member's mind. There was certainly nothing wrong with it. Judge Prud'homme was reappointed with pleasure and confidence that she would continue to do a good job.

I was simply making the point in regard to questions from the other side about a former spouse of a member that the relationship between family and talking about something being inappropriate is demeaning to the individual involved who is appointed. I do not think that is proper conduct in the House.

Michael McSweeney was mentioned. He is a graduate of the University of Ottawa. He has a masters degree in public administration from Harvard University. He is a former councillor and deputy mayor, precisely the kind of person who should be—

Mr. Speaker: We are getting into debate and I think we will leave it at that. The hon. member for Saint-Denis has raised the matter and he wishes to consider Hansard. I would hear him if he feels it is necessary to raise it further.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to get into this debate and I do not intend to. I rose on another reason. However, when the government House leader started to use names including that of Michael McSweeney, who is a very interesting individual whom I first employed in my office and I am not casting aspersions, in response to a situation—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. We are again getting into debate. I think the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants has a point of order though and I would hear it.

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I would not have mentioned Michael McSweeney but I do not equate him with Judy Dick.

Be that as it may, I do have a point of order. I see the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is here more often now that she made a decision on her personal and political life—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could make the point if there is one.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, there is difficulty sometimes in getting recognized in this mute corner over here that caused so much problem earlier in the day. I understand that and I understand the problems with independents. I will not accept any more, as long as I am in the House, that somehow with telepathic knowledge the Speaker will recognize people for either statements or questions who do not even levitate from their seat.

As long as that continues I will sit here on the backbench and make as much noise as I can because I do try to do my parliamentary aerobics to see if I can get recognition. That is my point of order.

Mr. Speaker, you and I know that I have had a point of privilege for a long time. I do not want to cause a disturbance. You have had enough today, but I am suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that you keep some control. I say to all members that they had better get up off their seat if they are going to catch the blind eye of an interested Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I anticipated this point of order. I want to say to the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants that it is because I realize how modest and diffident our colleagues are that I have encouraged them occasionally to get up.

I do not want to delve into all of the potential discussions that could take place with respect to a list which I seem to be handed each day, for guidance only of course. I do not have to make any particular ruling. I am sure that the hon. member's comments have been heard by our colleagues and perhaps members will be rising with greater speed and precision in the future.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government House leader. Could he indicate to the House the business for the remainder of this day, as well as Friday and next week?

Perhaps while he is on his feet he could say whether or not he could share with the House the subject matter of the conflict of interest we had discussed earlier in the House leaders meeting. I think it is incumbent upon us to get back to the hon. minister.

I want to indicate to him that we are prepared to proceed with that subject matter, but I am wondering if he could give me a timeframe. Also, in terms of the continuation of the debate as it relates to Bill C-115, the NAFTA bill, I wonder when he might be calling that for further discussions.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we will begin second reading of Bill C-118, the amendments to the Export Development Act.

• (1510)

Tomorrow we will begin second reading of Bill C-117, the Borrowing Authority Act. On Monday we will do report stage of Bill C-92, the income tax technical act, after which we hope to complete report stage and third reading of Bill S-8, the Motor Vehicle Safety Act. On Tuesday we hope to continue with Bill C-92. I will enter into discussions with the House leaders opposite in terms of the rest of that week.

In respect to the conflict of interest legislation, given that this legislation had come out of and was based on unanimous recommendation of a committee of this House, I was hopeful that we could have a limited debate on second reading, get it to committee and have it examined by the House for passage prior to the summer break.

I have been soliciting support from the opposition to see if we could do it this evening because to set aside the legislation which I would like to get passed before the end of this month would result in significant economic cost to the taxpayer. In other words, if we do not get them passed there will be money spent and wasted as a result of the failure to get the bills passed in a timely fashion. Hence the request for an evening sitting.

The same thing is true of the Canada Elections Act amendments, as they are the result of all-committee deliberations and received committee study. I would like to get report stage and third reading so the Chief Electoral Officer can put the legislation in place before the next election. That will not be possible if it is delayed more than a week or two.

I have not been able to get the agreement of the New Democratic Party to extra hours of sitting either at noon or in the evenings to accomplish that. After some frustration at the Department of Finance, I suggested setting aside a day for passage of the conflict of interest legislation at second reading and of the report stage and third reading of the Canada Elections Act. The New Democratic Party turned me down on that as well.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to negotiate on the floor of the House, but I do want to indicate to the government House leader, as it is my responsibility to report back to him, that with regard to amendments to the Canada Elections Act there are some difficulties with that particular piece of legislation. I understand that negotiations among the political parties are still continuing.

With regard to the conflict of interest legislation, since it is a subject matter that affects all members and all members have had an opportunity to participate in drafting that particular piece of legislation we would be prepared to move on it, perhaps not this week but if negotiations could be completed we would be prepared to proceed next week.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I might begin by saying that the government House leader indicated that he had made a proposal with respect to passing Bill C-114 and Bill C-116. We do not make any apologies for not agreeing to pass bills concerning electoral reform and conflict of interest, two very broad topics that Canadians would like to hear more about, all in the course of a Friday afternoon, which is what the government House leader proposed.

The one thing the government House leader did not mention as he gave us the government business up until Tuesday of next week, which does not exactly carry us through until next Thursday when we get to ask this question again, is whether he intends to proceed with Bill C-115, the legislation concerning the North American free trade agreement, next Wednesday.

When he is answering that question I wonder whether he would indicate the government's intention with respect to time allocation. He will know of the concern we and others have expressed that this particular piece of legislation should in all parliamentary fairness and tradition receive more than a day and a half of debate, which is so far what the government has proposed.

Could the government House leader put these fears to rest? We are not interested in debating it forever, but we think that a day and a half is certainly not adequate. Would he put these fears to rest and would he have some confidence that once a decent debate has been held we will be willing to send it into committee? Would he withdraw the threat of time allocation and indicate to us just what he intends for the rest of next week after Tuesday?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the hon. member talking about traditions and fairness in the way of operating. The way we have always operated is by reaching agreement on issues for which there is no great partisan dispute, conflict of interest, election reform act, so that we can treat them in an expeditious manner. It is not a matter of not having them exposed or trying to pull anything sneaky.

It is a matter of getting them into committee so that they can be looked at. The conflict of interest act came out of a committee study. As for the Canada Elections Act, for goodness' sake, there have been months and months of study after a $20 million royal commission. How much longer is it necessary to carry this on before the hon. members will be satisfied?

I did indicate in my answer to the House leader of the Liberal Party that in terms of beyond next Tuesday I would have the usual discussions with the opposition.

I have asked the NDP repeatedly how much time it wants. There has been a flat refusal from the New Democratic Party to agree to any reasonable time limitations on any piece of legislation at any time. How do I negotiate in the face of that kind of flat refusal, which is all I have received from the New Democratic Party up until the promise made just a while ago for the first time?

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, this is right on the House business and what the government House leader said. I was very interested in that last comment. I am not going to get into the other elements that interest me.

I would like to ask something in terms of the Canada Elections Act and the $20 million spent by the Lortie commission and the recognition that there was a discrimination on tax receipts for people who were not involved in registered parties.

I would like to ask before the government House leader and/or other House leaders, who sometimes get together in these little agreements, go too far on the agreements, whether the government is prepared to recognize the discrimination that was set out in the Lortie commission. It said that there was discrimination on tax receipts, because if candidates were not members of a registered party they could not give a tax receipt. That little amendment would put independents in the same position before an election. I understand the problem of independents springing up like mushrooms across the country and looking for the—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister will answer the member's question. The hon. member has asked a question. I will ask the government House leader to answer the question.

Mr. Andre: The committee that was studying the Lortie commission reached the quite sensible decision to bring forward by way of early legislation those things that would require the Chief Electoral Officer to spend an extended period of time to have them in place for the next election.

This first bill that is now before the House and has had second reading and committee study, and for which I am seeking report stage and third reading, deals primarily with those aspects. The second phase, which the committee is now actively working on, deals with the question of financing, receipts, limits, and so on. They have not completed their deliberations to my knowledge.

In any event it is not the government that is pushing one or the other. It really is a House of Commons initiative, and all parties are there representing their interests and discussions are going on. There is no government position that we established and asked our members on the committee to try to push in place.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants is a hard man to shout down. I am better at it when I do not have the microphone than when I do. I would just like to follow up with the government House leader who indicated two things.

First, he is not able to say what the business of the House will be past next Tuesday because he is looking forward to the discussions with House leaders on Tuesday. I would ask him this with respect to that. Is he prepared to give a commitment that pending those discussions on Tuesday that he will not give notice of time allocation on the legislation having to do with the North American free trade agreement?

Second, with respect to the conflict of interest legislation, in particular, the government House leader should have acknowledged that we have made it clear to him that we would be willing to deal with this legislation speedily. We would only like two speakers but we would like to do it in the ordinary course of events.

If this is important legislation as the government says it is, we could deal with it this afternoon but that is not what the government called. There are many occasions on which we could have dealt with the conflict of interest legislation but the government has not called that particular bill.

It is not just a matter of House legislation. The legislation does not completely reflect the consensus in the committee. Therefore it is a matter of contention. Therefore it should be dealt with in the way that things are normally dealt with.

That is all we are asking. It could have been dealt with a long time ago if the government had not insisted on having a special evening sitting.

The same with electoral reform. We all know it is important. The government knows it is important and it refuses to put it on its own agenda and have the House deal with it. It could be dealt with at any time instead of trying to put through a bill that does not have to be dealt with till the fall, if ever it has to be dealt with, given what is happening in the United States with respect to NAFTA. There are things that need to be dealt with now. We could deal with them but the government insists on dealing with NAFTA.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my earlier comment, the reality is because of the timetable and the fact that a lot of time was not spent in the most productive fashion earlier this year, we have a number of bills the failure of which to pass will result in the loss of tens and hundreds of millions of dollars to the taxpayers.

Is the hon. member suggesting that the penalty of having to actually sit and discuss a bill in the evening, something we used to do regularly, is so significant that in fact we should impose on the taxpayers these tens of millions of dollars of expenditures so as to not divert from this principle of actually sitting in the evening from eight o'clock to ten o'clock.

I sat quietly and listened to the hon. member when he was questioning. Perhaps he could do me the courtesy of doing the same.

The hon. member talks about the legislation dealing with the North American free trade agreement. We have been seeking for three weeks to have that legislation referred to committee so it could be looked at and compared with the agreement which has been in committee for several months.

I have been told by the New Democratic Party repeatedly, it has been asked twice in the House, under no circumstances ever will it agree. That is it. No way.

In order to get it to committee I have no other choice but to get second reading done. Debating second reading ad nauseam is a matter of principle. Is that going to change the principle of the New Democratic Party? Is there anybody in the country who knows what its position is or does not know what its position is?

The hon. member continues to talk from his seat. The hon. member cannot do me the courtesy I did him by listening to my response.

We have had dozens and dozens of witnesses. The bill is there. I see the hon. member for South West Nova, like the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, cannot keep her mouth shut while others are talking.

I do not know for sure what an appropriate level of debate is at second reading but I do know that the British Parliament had six hours of debate on the resolution to sign the Maastricht treaty, something that is profound and important. It was able to do it in six hours.

Incidentally under British rules it is not allowed to be brought up in Question Period the way it is repeatedly brought up here, day after day after day.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): It is time you got out of here.

Mr. Andre: I think it is time we completed that debate, sent the thing to committee and people could examine it in its detail. Then perhaps even the hon. member from Nova Scotia will have an opportunity to go there and she will be able to talk to the record where people will keep track of what she is saying if she thinks it is so important.

• (1525)

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, the government House leader has brought up a good point. He cited the example of Westminster with respect to the passage of Maastricht.

I wonder then whether the government House leader would be willing to consider, seeing as he is such a fan of what happened at Westminster with respect to Maastricht, putting the North American free trade agreement in the House of Commons, on this floor, in Committee of the Whole for over 21 days, which is how long they have considered Maastricht now on the floor of the House of Commons. If he wants to cite Maastricht and Westminster in the House of Commons, he should keep in mind that that is what they have done there. They have considered it in Committee of the Whole—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to say to the hon. member that he is getting into the substance of the bill which I think is more appropriate to debate when the bill is called. I will recognize him again if he has another request.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I agree. I listened to the exchange of the government House leader, who is no longer here I guess. I understand and I perhaps trespassed too far, but frankly in view of what has happened here in the last two or three days I do not really think I have trespassed enough.

All I was going to ask the government House leader, knowing full well my point over two years of correspondence, knowing it is not in the bill, knowing it is not in the committee report and knowing full well in the answer to me that there is an oxymoron that obviously parties do not have any interest in independence, is there going to be a section in the bill to take care of the discrimination that the Lortie commission found about independence?

That will help facilitate my co-operation, what little it is worth, but it can be quite a bit depending on how I get energized as to the passage of the bill which I would hope in the first phase would be passed, but you cannot pass the things for Mr. Kingsley, the electoral officer, unless you help some members who happen to be independent who cannot write a tax receipt the same way that you can. That is discrimination of the worst order.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that the government House leader has left the House.

I would like to put this on the record. It is a question that I asked last week following the statement by the Prime Minister who is a very strong supporter of redress for Japanese Canadians. That redress settlement is not completed.

I wanted to ask the government House leader but perhaps whoever is standing in for him would forward this to him. When will the government proclaim Bill C-63 which you will recall was the act to establish a Canadian race relations foundation, part of the redress resettlement, in view of the fact that this bill received Royal Assent way back in February 1991? This House went through the whole process of debate for many months prior to that.

We need to have this bill proclaimed before this session ends.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the question has been received and will be taken into consideration.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade) moved that Bill C-118, an act to amend the Export Development Act be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is truly export day. We had NAFTA before lunch and now we have Bill C-118, the bill to amend the Export Development Act. That is the legislation which governs the Export Development Corporation.

If there is one thing that I hope all members of this House will agree upon, it is the importance of bolstering the capacity of the Canadian economy, to strengthen it in any way so that Canadians now and into the future have every opportunity to prosper and grow.

If there is one thing that I am particularly proud of after serving nine years as minister it is the leadership that this government has shown in preparing Canada's economy to meet the fierce competition of the new global marketplace.

Canada is a trading nation. I think we are all very well aware of that.

• (1530)

On a per capita basis, we trade twice as much as the Japanese and two and one-half times as much as the Americans. Canadian companies that compete abroad learn what it takes to compete anywhere. They and their work forces become less and less vulnerable to foreign based marketers, sweeping in and beating them on price or quality on their own Canadian shelves.

They are ready for that kind of competition because they have faced it internationally. With the better market share here and new market share abroad, these companies grow. They create good jobs. If we are going to remain a high-wage society, Canadian-based companies must be able to compete everywhere.

[Translation]

Ever since this government came to office, it has emphasized the importance of Canadian entrepreneurs being competitive players beyond our borders. No other government in Canada's history has done more to open up new international markets, including North America, which is the most important marketplace in the world. And no other government has done more to encourage Canadian companies to expand internationally.

[English]

These efforts have already had an impact. The strength of our exports which I referred to extensively this morning which have to keep growing if Canada is going to maintain its status as a leading international economy were of critical importance in sustaining this through a debilitating world recession.

It is our exports once again that are leading us out of this recession. The bill before us would modernize the Export Development Act, enabling the Export Development Corporation to become a more dynamic institution for Canadian based enterprise operating abroad. If we are encouraging more Canadian firms to operate abroad, we must do what we can to minimize the risks and difficulties that these companies encounter. This is where EDC comes in.

It has been a partner with Canadian exporters since World War II, helping them compete more effectively in foreign markets by reducing the financial risks and other difficulties involved in penetrating these markets. For those members who are not familiar with the work of EDC, let me take a few minutes to explain the nature of the corporation.

It is EDC's job performed on behalf of all Canadians to act as a catalyst in stimulating Canadian exports which in turn stimulate the Canadian economy. It encourages exports by reducing the risks involved in operating outside our borders. EDC facilitates export trade and investment through the provision of risk management services, including insurance and financing to Canadian companies as well as their customers abroad.

The corporation has supported approximately $60 billion worth of Canadian exports over the past decade. That amounts to over two million person-years of employment. It has been an essential factor in facilitating export trade. Demand for its services has tripled in the last eight years.

In 1992 alone, it provided services to nearly 2,000 clients, 80 per cent of which were small and medium-sized companies. That involved them in export transactions worth more than $8 billion. EDC has operated on commercial principles since it was established in 1969. Its customers pay for the services that it provides. The Canadian taxpayer does not.

Whatever borrowing the corporation does, it is balanced by increasing its assets. It has a long-standing record of self-sufficiency.

[Translation]

This is the type of self-sustaining discipline that makes EDC so valuable. Canadians want governments to do everything possible to stimulate employment, but they also realize the urgency for these same governments to reduce their deficits. Strengthening EDC represents one way this Parliament can stimulate job creation without increasing the burden on Canadians.

[English]

As we approach the end of the 20th century, EDC's services have developed gaps. There are three good explanations for it and they all begin with the letter c. EDC's customers are demanding more. The corporation's competitors in other nations have been offering more support to their exporters. The degree of international competitiveness has escalated considerably.

• (1535)

As effective a catalyst as EDC has been for Canadian exports, it has been the need for the kind of boost that we have given to many of Canada's other economic levers as part of our competitive repositioning. The time has now come to free EDC from the legislative strait-jacket that in these new market conditions has begun to restrict its capability to respond to our exporters' needs.

[Translation]

We need to give EDC a new flexibility. In making EDC more flexible, we will make it more responsive to the needs of Canadian exporters, the people we are counting on to meet the tough challenges of international competition.

Canadian exporters have been making more sophisticated demands of EDC in recent years, as they themselves face more sophisticated demands.

Bill C-118 is designed to meet the demands of EDC's customers, to offer them services that are at least as helpful as those their competitors from other countries have access to, and to recognize that international competitiveness is one of the keys to Canada's and individual Canadians' prosperity.

[English]

Simply put, we need a more complete Export Development Corporation. These amendments are designed to give us one. The proposed new EDC can be best summed up in two words: creative packaging.

In the new international marketplace where buyers have to a large extent been able to ship the onus of financing to producers and whose projects are more often commercial ventures rather than government backed projects, financial packaging in some situations has begun to rank with price and quality in determining the product's marketability. Canadian exporters are asking for a more comprehensive mix of financial services from EDC.

Many other trading nations are offering their business sectors a wide range of financial services. These countries—the United States, Japan, Germany and France—make extensive support available to their business people through a variety of mechanisms. These often include sophisticated methods of entering into partnership relationships with them, including the provision of equity participation overseas and loans and guarantees to support foreign investments.

As the international marketplace is developed, an increasing number of Canadian businesses have complained that gaps have developed in the financial support available to them—take leasing, for example—either through EDC or commercial financial institutions. EDC has the talent, the creativity and the expertise to fill in those gaps, but under the current legislation it has had to scramble to the end of its legislative boundaries to be of assistance.

The proposed amendments to the Export Development Act would streamline the EDC and extend its capabilities in a way that would provide it with much greater flexibility in meeting the demands of the globalized marketplace.

I am hopeful that this will prove particularly enticing for small and medium sized companies on the threshold of internationalizing their business activities in defined circumstances that reflect the relatively static needs of the 1969 marketplace. That marketplace no longer represents the world in which Canadian business operates. Instead of simply defining a rigid new set of tasks for EDC, we want to give the corporation flexibility to respond more creatively to the type of dramatic changes that have already been affecting its customers.

We know international deals are often complex and time consuming, but we want EDC to be capable of overcoming stumbling blocks in the most efficient ways possible and to have the tools at hand to minimize delays. We want an EDC that offers the most streamlined services possible and an EDC that acts in partnership with both customers and private financial institutions. We want an EDC that can shift with the marketplace the way Canadian entrepreneurs must also shift with the marketplace. We know that change is the norm in today's marketplace and that Canada has to be ready for it. So, for those reasons I strongly encourage members to support this legislation.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the legislation which the government has brought forward today. I welcome it for a number of reasons but I want to touch on two or three in particular.

The fact is that Canada, heavily dependent on international trade, has embarked on new trading arrangements whatever the merits or demerits of those may be. They certainly do involve a challenge to Canadian exporters with which they need the assistance of their national government.

The need for adjustment assistance in the global marketplace and the freer trading environment of the world today must be obvious to all. I am not at all clear that it is as obvious to this government as it should have been. The government has not been as active as it could have been in helping to equip Canadians through collaboration with business and organized labour to benefit from the effects of trade liberalization.

Bill C-118 about which the minister just spoke does represent a step in the direction which we on this side of the House have certainly supported and sought for some time. I would only recall once more to the minister that the Macdonald royal commission in putting forward its recommendations to seek a freer trade environment matched that recommendation with an equally strong recommendation that the government work for the benefit of Canadians in reducing interprovincial trade barriers, in improving the standards of education and training in our country and in offering financial incentives to small businesses.

There were a dozen and one recommendations that much to our regret this government ignored when it brought forward its free trade legislation. Even today with the North American free trade legislation we see the continuing absence of effective adjustment assistance to match the commitment this government has made to continental or hemispheric freer trade.

I am pleased to say that the bill the minister introduced reflects a greater awareness of the need within Canada to cope with the impact of globalization of world markets and of investment. It equally does something to recognize the fact that Canada must be an attractive base for investment by companies in the export business seeking markets abroad.

In my view the bill has the merit of emphasizing the need for Canada to seek diversification of its markets. The emphasis in this government's policy since 1988 has unfortunately been squarely on the North American continent first and more recently on the western hemisphere. However, the merit of this bill in my opinion is that it does offer Canadian business the type of assistance it needs to diversify into export markets overseas, beyond the continent and beyond the hemisphere.

The second merit that is reflected in the bill is that it offers new dimensions for a 50-year old institution, the Export Development Corporation, to engage actively with smaller business. My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood who is expert in these matters of assistance to small business and how a greater stimulus might be provided to small business investment will no doubt wish to address in greater detail that dimension of the bill. I want to say that it is something that we on this side of the House have been calling for for a considerable period of time. We had in mind the fact that small business has not had the access to export promotion and export development support and the bill before us today does go some distance to enabling the Export Development Corporation to provide such support.

The minister in commenting on the bill has spoken of the need to equip the Export Development Corporation to match or indeed to compete with the comparable institutions in other major trading countries. I would only want to say in passing that there is always in these instances a potential danger of competition arising among export development institutions in the industrialized world.

We have seen in the past the competition—I can think of no better word—in the case of concessional financing. One country offers more attractive concessional terms in its export lending and another country attempts to match that and the escalation sets in. I trust that we are pursuing within the OECD and other international organizations opportunities to discuss with our trading partners the need to avoid such escalation in export promotion that in certain circumstances can become subsidies and that of course is to the benefit of no one.

The only other comment I wish to offer before touching for a moment on the more specific aspects of the bill is that there has been some concern expressed about the possibility that the expansion—or perhaps more accurately the diversification—of the role and potential of the Export Development Corporation could lead to some unwarranted competition with the private sector. This I do not think should be a matter of prime concern if the Export Development Corporation is committed, as for my part I understand it is, to co-operating and working with the private sector.

I cannot think that there is not an ample challenge within Canada for a co-operative effort between the private sector and the Export Development Corporation. I would assume that when the Export Development Corporation officials or the minister appear before committee in support of this bill we will receive that assurance that the corporation will work actively and imaginatively with the private sector to provide the services that Canadian exporters need.

The bill is innovative in terms of the traditional practices of the Export Development Corporation—as I said it is a 50-year old corporation—in that for the first time we see the possibility for the corporation to take an equity position in certain circumstances to act as a catalyst to mobilize other investors. This opportunity will be something I am sure the corporation will use with discretion and work to ensure that its presence brings credibility to the project as a whole.

The second major innovation offered in the bill is the matter of insuring receivables. The Export Development Corporation has of course in the past been involved in the insurance of export receivables. Now for the first time the corporation will be able to provide some coverage for domestic receivables as well. There is obviously a balance to be struck in that activity, but it is one that we for our part will welcome from the corporation.

On leasing matters the inability of the corporation to offer its clients support for exports through leasing arrangements has been a hindrance in the past. The minister spoke of the corporation pressing the bounds of its legislative authority to seek ways in which it could offer such support to Canadian exporters. It is good that we are now moving to make leasing arrangements part of the mandate of the corporation.

For these and other reasons we welcome the legislation before us. The Export Development Corporation has a long and admirable record. I note that in this past year it made a profit and that is not something that most Crown corporations can claim. I look forward to the Export Development Corporation continuing to maintain its viability and its contribution to the Canadian export community partly through the new mandate we are giving it today. It is a mandate that in our view is overdue and certainly to be supported.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to speak on this bill extending further authority to the Export Development Corporation, which I think is a useful thing to do. Crown corporations cannot function when they are restricted and these amendments all add to the ability of the corporation to do its job which is to assist in the insurance of export credits to exporters who wish to go into the world market.

The proposals that are included in the bill provide additional abilities by the corporation to meet new competition and are new practices that have developed since the corporation began its operations in 1944. A lot of practices have changed and a lot of our foreign competitors do in fact have rights and privileges available to them that are no longer available to Canadian exporters simply because we have not brought our practices, laws and rules up to the levels that exist among foreign traders.

By my reading of the act, among other things, it would permit the Export Development Corporation to take an equity share in some projects that would permit it to act as a catalyst in mobilizing investors, other banks and banking institutions and make it possible for the funding of larger projects to proceed.

Sometimes the ability to take a minor equity position in a project may bring credibility to the whole project that would in fact attract other legitimate investors in the project.

As large projects and long-term projects develop, it becomes more and more necessary for the Export Development Corporation to be involved over a long term for many years and some of these changes that are proposed in the act appear to facilitate that need.

• (1555)

Another thing many of the users or would-be users of the Export Development Corporation have complained about involves the current requirement for setting up a multitude of export development contracts with different countries and different contracts for domestic sales as opposed to export sales so that a company like a textile manufacturer that exports some of its product has to keep two sets of accounts: one for its exports business and the other for its domestic business. A lumber company that might be doing business both internally and externally will find the ability to offer one contract for both internal and export business to be quite attractive.

It also has the effect of spreading the risk of the Export Development Corporation in making it less subject to bad collections in the event of a sudden collapse of a foreign country or a foreign currency market.

Many of our competitors are now in the business of making available to their exports long-term pre-shipment financing so that the pre-shipment development costs of getting the business are being financed in other countries and in other jurisdictions. The proposed amendments to this legislation would allow the Export Development Corporation to provide that kind of service as well, again a laudable acceptance on the part of the government and the corporation. In order to do long-term business they are in fact going to have to participate even at the planning and pre-export stages of the project aimed at increasing exports to other regions.

The fourth area that appears to provide some change would be the one permitting or enhancing the ability to support export sales through leasing arrangements. It would permit the EDC to act as a lessor or permit it to take direct equity participation in a lease financing arrangement so that a variety of partnerships could be established.

These proposals provide the kind of flexibility that seems to be there for our competitors and should assist somewhat in providing the infrastructure our exporters require in arranging the financing and insurance that go with completing an export sale.

The role of exporting in this country has always been an extremely important one from the earliest days of economic activity when we exported fish to Europe, to the days when we increased our exports to include timber, later wheat, and now a wide range of commodities and manufactured goods and services. The role that Export Development Corporation has to play can be a very important one. We need it to continue the trading relationship with our neighbours to the south that has existed for a couple of centuries. We need it for expanding our trading operations in the rest of the world.

As a representative of a region that exports virtually all its production and can rely very little on the domestic market to consume the grains, oilseeds and meats we produce, I want to say a few things about the fixation the government has had for most of its mandate, both the previous one and the current one, with trade with the United States as a means of increasing economic activity. When we look at it from the experience of having been four years into that relationship we see that perhaps it was not the great thing the government likes to tell us it was.

I am using as my source Statistics Canada and I am looking at the trade balances that existed for four years prior to the implementation of the Canada-U.S. trade deal. I am comparing that with the average of the four years that have occurred after the signing of the Canada-U.S. trade arrangement. I see that 1988 was the last year we had a positive trade balance between our two countries. If we take the four-year average before the deal we had a positive net balance in goods of plus $17.3 billion. We had a negative trade balance in services of minus $12.4 billion, leaving us a total on average of $4.8 billion before the free trade agreement.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Mr. Speaker,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Peter de C. Cory, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 25th day of March, 1993, at 4:00 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

Yours sincerely,

Judith A. LaRocque
Secretary to the Governor General

• (1605)

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Madam Speaker, the Deputy to his Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (1610)

And being returned:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate Chamber, the Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

Bill C-111, an act prohibiting the sale of tobacco products to persons under the age of eighteen—Chapter 5.

Bill C-99, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act and another Act in consequence thereof—Chapter 6.

Bill C-69, an act to amend the Criminal Code (air and maritime safety)—Chapter 7.

Bill C-79, an act to amend the Divorce Act and the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act—Chapter 8.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-118, an act to amend the Export Development Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, before we had the call from the Governor General and the trip to the Senate, I was pointing out that the increase in trade to the United States, which has been the basis of government policy over the last two terms, has not proved to be as propitious for Canada as originally thought or at least as you would glean from the government's presentation of the statistics.

When you look at Statistics Canada and use four years before the trade deal and the four years after the trade deal and take average trade balances, you find that 1988 was in fact the last positive trade balance that this country had with the United States and since January 1989 when the trade deal came into effect, we have had nothing but negative balances.

On average, the four years before the trade deal we had a positive trade balance of $4.8 billion, with goods providing a positive net balance of $17.3 billion, services a negative balance of $12.4 billion, leaving a positive position of $4.8 billion. On post-trade deal, goods on average for the four years provided a positive trade balance of only $15 billion, down $2.1 billion from the average before the deal started. On services our negative balance went up from $12.4 billion to $18.2 billion, leaving a negative trade balance with the Americans in all goods and services of $3.15 billion.

The trade position with the Americans has deteriorated considerably since the implementation of that agreement. Part of the reason that that has happened is fairly obvious. There were 222,000 fewer employed Canadians between January 1989 and August 1992 according to the labour force survey of last August. An additional 600,000 Canadians have joined the official unemployment rolls since January 1989, pushing the unemployment rate from 7.6 per cent in January 1989 to 11.6 per cent or 1.6 million people unemployed.

It appears that there are an additional 344,000 discouraged unemployed individuals who have simply dropped out of the work force since January 1989 as well.

The proportion of the work force working part time since 1989 has jumped from 15 per cent of the population to 17 per cent and 386,000 more Canadians in August 1992 compared to August 1989 are now working part time because they cannot find full-time work. It has been noted many times by many economic observers that since the trade deal was signed part-time work seems to be the only new jobs that are available to Canadians.

This has had a tremendous effect on our efficiency and our productivity levels. According to the OECD statistics the Canadian economy is currently operating 9.2 per cent below its productive potential. To arrive at productive potential they measure such factors as existing capital stock, labour efficiency and a Conservative measure called the natural rate of unemployment.

By comparison the U.S. is operating at 3.6 per cent below productivity potential and Japan is only .4 of 1 per cent below its potential. We are further below our productive potential than the economy of any other major industrialized country since 1960.

The policies of the government which put us into a trade deal with the Americans have in fact been to blame. When we look at the various sectors and the negative effect on those sectors we see that in the furniture sector 22,700 jobs have been lost, 33 per cent of all the furniture jobs that existed in 1989 have now disappeared; 12,395 textile jobs have disappeared or 22 per cent of that entire sector; 41,600 clothing jobs have vanished, 35 per cent of all the jobs that existed in the sector before the deal started. This is a dramatic shift in the amount of jobs that are available in Canada.

In auto parts, 19,950 jobs have gone, 22 per cent of the sector has disappeared since January 1989. In printing and publishing, 23,373 jobs disappeared, 15 per cent of that work force no longer exists.

In spite of the facts that are there, produced by Statistics Canada and available to all of us if we look, the government persists in telling us that is a good deal, that it is good for Canada and good for Canadians. You cannot convince anybody who is looking for a job that it is a good deal. You cannot convince anybody whose plant has closed down and set up again in the United States that it is a good deal. You cannot convince anyone who finds that the products that they used to be able to produce are no longer being produced in their local town in their corner of the country. Yet the government tells us it is good for us.

The purpose of this bill is to make some of the services that are available to exporters more flexible and to provide them with the kinds of services that will allow exporters who exist all across this country to go into other parts of the world other than the United States. For that reason I think it shows a softening of a number of the government's positions, which I applaud.

It seems to me that strengthening this Crown corporation, which is a policy that runs counter to the government's initial instincts which were to throw out all Crown corporations, at the end of the government's mandate is still a good move because this particular corporation functions mostly in markets beyond the United States. I think it is a belated recognition that Canada has to look to the rest of the world, that our saviour is not in a better trade deal with the United States or Mexico but that there is a whole world out there.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Immigration; the hon. member for Comox—Alberni—Indian affairs; the hon. member for Don Valley East—Cyprus; the hon. member for St. Boniface—Employment.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, for some time now we have listened to the Minister for International Trade comment on the impressive increase in the export trade figures that Canada demonstrated in 1991-92. We have listened to his argument that it is a direct result of the imposition of the free trade agreement between Canada and the U.S.

When you look at the total in goods and services, it indicates a substantial difference from the rhetoric that we hear from the Minister for International Trade as to the facts and figures that are before us, facts and figures that have been compiled by Statistics Canada.

When we look at the total trade balance in both goods and services between Canada and the United States prior to the free trade agreement coming in, the four year average from 1985 to 1988, we had a total trade surplus of some $4.8 billion. When you look at the four year average subsequent to the FTA we see that we have turned that trade surplus of $4.8 billion into a net trade deficit of $3.1 billion.

I say to my hon. colleague that is a turn around, a loss if you like, of 165 per cent on our trade balance between Canada and the United States.

I would like to ask my friend how he can explain the comments that have been made by the government, and particularly by our minister of trade who says that we have been doing so well under the FTA, when in fact we have a dismal and accelerating trade deficit when you look at the figures both in goods and services.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I guess the explanation is that in magic, in public relations or in politics you always concentrate on the bean or the shell that is most important to the argument.

If you look only at the positive trade balance in goods, 1988 versus 1992, you could make an argument, as the government does, that trade increased by just over $3 billion.

That does not tell the story on services where trade has produced a negative balance of an additional $5 billion or $6 billion. This means that over all—it is over all that counts to the total economy of Canada—we have moved from a positive trade balance in 1988 to a fairly heavy negative balance. There was a loss in fact of $2.6 billion.

We have imported $2.6 billion more services and goods combined than we have exported. We are actually shelling out more money after the deal than we were before the deal. Before the deal Canada benefited from the trade with the United States. After the deal they are making more money out of that trade because they are selling us far more services. We have not been able to keep up the same rate of growth in our goods-producing sectors.

The reasons we have lost on the goods-producing sectors are quite clear as I spelled out in my speech. We lost furniture jobs, auto parts jobs and textile manufacturing jobs. When we have lost these jobs we no longer have the ability to produce for export.

Part of the reason why we lost these jobs is because of the terms of trade changing and it was no longer most economical to produce and sell furniture from a Canadian base. We were importing more of it and this has resulted in job loss and a worsening of the trade balance between us and the United States.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, with your indulgence I would like to split my time with the hon. member for Laval West. I will confine my remarks to 10 minutes and watch the clock very closely. It is only for that reason that I will resist the temptation to respond to the remarks of the previous speaker. I find them absolutely fantastical, if that is a word. I do not know where those trade figures came from but they did not come from a very reliable source. They are an extraordinary set of statistics I must say.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The not very reliable source that the member is speaking of is Statistics Canada catalogue 67-001, table 3. He can look it up. It is a very reliable source.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I will look forward to the NAFTA debate. Since my hon. friend did not actually speak to the bill that is before the House I will be pleased to engage in a discussion further when we speak on NAFTA. That is of course if his colleagues will allow the House to actually debate the NAFTA and not just play games with parliamentary procedure.

On the other hand I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak briefly on Bill C-118. This is legislation to amend the Export Development Act and to make the Export Development Corporation the kind of catalyst Canadian exporters need to compete in the global marketplace.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, the member has impugned the motives of me and my colleagues in the New Democratic Party in terms of the impending debate on NAFTA.

I just wanted to point out that should he and his colleagues on the government side decide to provide ample opportunity for debate on NAFTA then we will do everything in our power to ensure that debate is—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Debate right now.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend and people of Canada had an opportunity to draw their own conclusions and I am sure they will.

Speaking again of this very excellent piece of legislation, Bill C-118, I want to point out that this legislation will not only enhance the prospects for Canadian importers but it will indeed be highly beneficial to all Canadians.

When he spoke to introduce the bill the Minister for International Trade made reference to what he referred to as the three Cs: customers, competitors and competitiveness.

The Export Development Corporation's customers are demanding a more complete set of risk-management services. Many of our exporters' competitors are already receiving risk-management services that EDC has difficulty offering under the wording of the current act.

Finally, the degree and nature of international competitiveness has in fact changed. There is I suppose a fourth C. We will remember that the minister emphasized on several occasions how important exports are to both the number and quality of jobs we will be creating in Canada during the next decade.

The fourth C quite simply stands for Canadians. This government more than any government in Canada's history has seen how important success in the international marketplace is to maintaining the standard of living that Canadians have known, the quality of jobs that Canadians have had access to and the lifestyle that Canadians have worked so hard to build up over a century and a quarter as a country.

Canadians cannot continue to prosper the way we have prospered as a nation if we do not rise to new international challenges. This bill is part of a concerted initiative spearheaded by this government to assure that Canadians can meet those new challenges.

The government could have taken the politically easy route of pretending that Canadians would not be hurt if we tried to ignore what is going on in the world today and tried to create a kind of fantasy environment with great, huge walls around us. Frankly, we would not do that. It would not be right to try to fool Canadians into thinking that everything would be just fine if we tried to hide our little heads in little holes in the ground and pretended that nothing was happening in the world.

This government has not chosen to meet the challenge of the international marketplace because we enjoy the adventure of selling beyond our borders. We have done it quite simply because we knew that the Canadian economy would wither if we tried to hide and tried to produce only for our own marketplace. A quarter of the jobs in this country today in the productive sector are indeed directly related to export.

We chose to meet the challenge not just for our entrepreneurs' pocketbooks that depended on international success but for the well-being of our whole society, our whole culture and indeed the people of Canada. It was access to good jobs but it represented even more than good jobs. It involved the futures of our symphony orchestras, health plans, school systems and our capacity to serve our disabled people and our disadvantaged. It was all of those social and cultural components that make Canada a very special place to live.

Those particularly Canadian advantages have already come under pressure because of our struggle to deal with the deficit this government inherited from its predecessors who had a quaint definition of economic boldness called "mortgage the future".

We as a government understood that these components of our rich and generous society would come under permanent pressure if we turned away from the challenge of the global marketplace. Our economy will simply not give us the social and cultural nourishment we have drawn from it in the past if we do not make adjustments to meet the imperatives of competing internationally in the future. We as a government have understood that.

From the beginning of our mandate we have pinpointed the new challenges abroad. We recognized the growing Pacific Rim capacity to export high quality goods at low costs. We knew there would be increased resource competition from the Third World even as some of Canada's resources were becoming more difficult to access.

We also saw the European countries and the Asians reducing trade barriers. Common markets were on their way at least as short or medium term bridges to open trade everywhere. It was a time to either get involved or get shunted aside.

We are involved and this legislation to strengthen the Export Development Corporation is an important step in the government's economic agenda to encourage more trade beyond the North American marketplace.

Our exports are climbing. All members will have rejoiced at last month's trade surplus but there is still plenty of room to grow. Canadian firms are looking beyond the U.S. marketplace to Mexico. This is another lucrative marketplace that will open up under the NAFTA.

We have to look beyond Mexico as well. The global marketplace has undergone a huge transformation since the Export Development Act was first brought in. Minor amendments to that legislation in the 1970s and 1980s updated the act but nobody could have foreseen the scope of change that would take place in the coming years.

The revamping of the Export Development Corporation, Canada's official export credit agency, is an important part of the national initiative to make Canada a more powerful player in the international marketplace. At the core of that initiative of course is the private sector but this Parliament must play a supportive role if this mission is to be sustained. That is why I encourage all members to support Bill C-118.

In concluding I move:

That the question be now put.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would care to give us the proportion of business that the Export Development Corporation has been doing in Europe, Asia, the United States and so on, so that we can see where its efforts have been directed.

• (1635)

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend raising the question. I do not have exact figures in my head but I would be more than pleased to get them and share them with my hon. friend.

I think what is important to observe and to take cognizance of is the outward looking approach that this government has taken of which I spoke in my general remarks. We hear a great deal these days about the free trade agreement and about NAFTA but in actual fact this country has a number of trade initiatives looking in a variety of directions: the Asia-Pacific initiative that has been taken; the strengthening of relationships and the continuing negotiations with Europeans; and the Caribbean area and NAFTA present tremendous opportunities for growth. As I am sure my hon. friend is aware, there is so much enthusiasm throughout the world for the concept of NAFTA that we have a great number of countries interested in joining it. I know all members are aware that we have had approaches from various Latin American countries, like Chile for instance, that are interested in joining the NAFTA.

In fact I can tell my hon. friend that in January I had the occasion to attend and speak at a business conference in India. The president of the Confederation of Indian Industry, the organization in India that is like the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, indicated that India would be very interested in looking into the possibility of joining NAFTA. Who knows what is going to go on?

I now have had said to me—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. McCreath seconded by Mr. Brightwell moves that this question be now put. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval–Ouest): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to discuss some of the services which the Export Development Corporation would be able to offer under this legislation. Senior officials of the EDC feel these are some of the areas where they could substantially improve customer service.

The EDC could improve its pre–shipment financing capability. The complex and costly procedures imposed by the current legislation at the structural and contract level should be eliminated. I think there is no doubt about that.

With a streamlined program, Canadian businesses and their banks would have direct access to loans and guarantees to pay the initial, non–recurrent costs involved either directly or indirectly in a long–term export project.

Canadian exporters must be able to obtain credit insurance for both domestic and export sales if they are to build the solid base they need to compete internationally.

In Canada, the potential market for domestic credit insurance is worth about $100 billion, but only 5 per cent of that market has been developed so far.

There is room for involvement by the EDC, which would complement the activities of domestic insurance underwriters in this area. An increase in the proportion of insured export credits is a bonus for insurance underwriters and their banks, because it makes these companies a better risk when loans are involved.

The corporation should and could provide capital for certain projects or finance equity capital. The corporation is now restricted to debt financing in the case of Canadian exports provided directly under a project. The private sector's exposure to major international projects is far greater. There is more pressure on exporters to provide their own export financing and invest in projects where they also provide for maintenance of their equipment.

The EDC's ability to acquire an interest in certain projects or to help finance equity interests of Canadian businesses may help attract financing from other investment lenders for whom the corporation's involvement would be reassuring. This might also encourage some parties to seek out Canadian suppliers.

The EDC would be able to invest in international leasing companies. In fact, at the international level, leasing is growing at a faster rate than sales. The ability to offer competitive leasing agreements is particularly important in the case of high–tech businesses that manufacture specialized products such as aircraft and aerospace equipment.

Another example is the streamlining of the Canada account assessment process. I may add in this connection that the moneys deposited in the Canada account do not belong to the EDC but are administered by the corporation.

If Bill C–118 is adopted, this would eliminate part of the administrative red tape involved in using this account, without compromising the vitality of the decision–making process. The bill would eliminate the pre–condition for the EDC board of directors to formally reject the use of its own funds and also eliminate the need to obtain the approval of the governor in council.

The Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Finance would be jointly responsible for authorizing the use of these funds. This would speed up the process, an important consideration when we realize that speed is often essential when concluding contracts with countries overseas.

As the Minister for International Trade pointed out, streamlining the EDC is one of the most important elements of the government's comprehensive policy aimed at making Canada more competitive on the international markets.

The Export Development Corporation cannot spearhead Canadian involvement in global markets. That is up to the private sector. However, once these amendments have been adopted, the EDC will be able to play a far more effective role as a catalyst in helping Canadian businesses enter the modern global market.

As I said earlier, I am proud to be associated with Bill C-118, and I am confident that all members of this House will recognize the importance of international trade for the economic, social and cultural future of our country and will join me in supporting this bill.

Mr. Speaker, before I finish, I would like to present a motion, seconded by the hon. member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo.

[English]

Pursuant to Standing Order 26(1) I move:

That the House continue to sit beyond the normal hour of adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of Bill C-118, an act to amend the Export Development Act.

And fewer than 15 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 26(2) the motion is adopted.

Motion agreed to.

• (1645)

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to rise on behalf of my party today. As our critic for international trade said earlier, we on this side of the House are in support of the bill.

The Export Development Corporation is one of the few Crown corporations the Conservative government has managed to leave intact. It is one of the few organizations that has survived the cut, cut, cut. In fact the bill today modernizes and expands the capacity of the Export Development Corporation. We on this side of the House support this.

As the Minister for International Trade and my colleague for Etobicoke North said, the country depends on its export activity. This is the greatest hope for job creation in the country. Anything we can do to expand the capacity of the Export Development Corporation is something we support and applaud.

It is another example of how we in opposition will get behind the government to support a bill going through the House expeditiously if we feel it is meeting the objective of job creation. Today the number one priority is putting people back to work, and the bill certainly passes the test of meeting and assisting that objective.

A previous example of our co-operating so well was the Small Businesses Loans Act. Just before I came into the House today I was speaking to Blair McRobie, vice-president of government relations for the Royal Bank of Canada. He was telling me that as of today all the branch managers of the Royal Bank and all its loan officers are fully apprised of the Small Businesses Loans Act. I am absolutely convinced, now we have the loan officers aware of the Small Businesses Loans Act and once we have let all small businesses know, we are going to be putting more people back to work because small business represents the greatest hope for new job creation.

That brings me to a concern I want to put on the floor of the House about the particular Export Development Corporation. The minister said in his remarks today that the Export Development Corporation had approximately 2,000 clients of which approximately 50 per cent are small businesses. That represents about 1,000 businesses doing work with the Export Development Corporation.

If there is one flaw or one concern I have about the Export Development Corporation, it is that most small businesses are not even aware it exists. They are not even aware that the Export Development Corporation exists, let alone all the services, all the products, and all the various export enhancements it provides. I would like to suggest to the government—and we will be raising it in committee—that we must make sure we let the small business community know about the Export Development Corporation. We must make small businesses aware that this particular Crown corporation exists. If we take the same approach with the Export Development Corporation as we did with the Small Businesses Loans Act, I am confident that once again we will have another factor in the economic recovery equation to inspire or to give new hope, new opportunity, for the entrepreneurial spirit that exists out there.

This is one of the great tragedies of the work done in the House, in committee, and by many of our great public servants. A lot of people in the country do not know these operations exist. They are just not aware. Obviously this is not the kind of story the press will cover because it is good news and is not controversial enough.

When there is an organization like the Export Development Corporation providing assistance, not just to larger corporations but to small and medium sized operators, we have to get the message out. We must.

I support the bill in every respect. In fact I remember the very first time I had some involvement with the government back in 1985 at the Business Opportunities in Canada conference in Toronto. The president of Investment Canada at that time was a Mr. Paul Labbé. I believe he is the current president of the Export Development Corporation. I remember when we did that work in 1985 and 1986 that this man had real feeling and real passion for small Canadian exporters.

All too often in this House we are quick to pick out someone in the Public Service or a particular branch of government that is not really living up to the Public Service objective it is supposed to. However this is a good example of an organization and its leader, Paul Labbé, and all its counsellors. I have had people in my community and in other parts of Toronto who have had experience with the Export Development Corporation, and they have only good things to say about the officers who represent its various aspects.

On behalf of my party I am happy to stand in support of the particular piece of legislation. I have one concern or one qualifier to put on the table. I hope the government will treat the marketing, the awareness program or the promotional program of the Export Development Corporation the same way it is now treating the Small Businesses Loans Act.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say a few words on this particular bill.

Perhaps I want to make my comments a little more general in terms of the whole question of export trade as it pertains to Canada. Obviously as we all know nations engage in trade to try to benefit their economies. It would seem logical that agreements between two nations or agreements between a number of nations to expand trading opportunities between those partners would be beneficial to the economies of the nations involved.

That is only the case if the trading relationship between participating countries is fair and equitable. We have seen that is not the case in the current free trade agreement between Canada and its partner to the south, the United States.

The Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement has not really been about freer trade and increasing exports as the argument has been placed. After all, that is what this bill is talking about. It is talking about expanding export opportunities.

This trade agreement, to which Canada is struggling to adjust, has really been about greater access to Canadian resources for the U.S. market. It has really been about removing the kinds of barriers that have existed to the free movement of capital, goods and services to establish a free trade playing field for the multinational corporations, which are largely based in the United States.

This agreement, which has been in place since January 1, 1989, is really about reducing the ability of our provincial and federal governments to establish the kinds of economic priorities that are very much a part of the political priority of any democratic government. It is about the reduced ability of this country to control its own destiny, to control its own economy.

As we are talking about trade in this bill, I want to say that if Canada had really wanted a free trade agreement, if Canada had really wanted to embrace the concept of freer trade, then it would have needed a very short piece of legislation, a very succinct agreement between Canada and the U.S. It would basically be only one line: The parties involved, the nations involved, in this case Canada and its partner, the United States, would agree to eliminate all remaining tariffs that are currently in place on both goods and services. Said and done. It is very simple. That would have been free trade.

This agreement has gone far beyond the concept of simply reducing tariff barriers and has moved into whole areas of our economy, particularly in the area of financial services as well as in the area of increased access to Canadian resources. I want to get back to that later if I have time.

Rather than signing an agreement, a very simple, almost one-line agreement, to reduce or eliminate tariff barriers between the countries in question we have entered into this massive and convoluted agreement between Canada and the United States that has jeopardized the very future of this nation.

I want to look at facts and figures. These are figures that have been released by Statistics Canada since the free trade agreement was imposed back in January 1989. The last positive trade balance that Canada experienced was in 1988, the year before free trade came into effect in Canada. The average trade surplus for Canadian goods and services for Canada for 1985-88, a four-year period, was about $4.8 billion. That was a trade surplus. We had a very vibrant export market, both in manufactured goods and in services into the U.S. economy, so much so that we had an average surplus over that period of some $4.8 billion.

In 1989 the free trade agreement came into place. What have we seen subsequent to the FTA coming into place? That trade surplus that Canada had enjoyed for years before the free trade agreement was implemented immediately took a nosedive and went below the boards to a trade deficit.

If we look at the four years subsequent to the FTA coming into place we find that the government's great plan for economic and trade stimulation for Canada has turned into an unmitigated disaster. We had a trade deficit between 1989, the year that FTA came into place, and 1992, when the latest figures were available. That trade deficit averaged some $3.2 billion.

We took a trade surplus of $4.8 billion and turned the damn thing into a deficit of $3.2 billion. That is not very successful. That is a 165 per cent turn around, an 165 per cent decrease in Canada's trade balance with the United States subsequent to the FTA coming into place.

This great trade agreement, which is supposed to be the hallmark of this present administration, has in fact accelerated Canada's dependence on one market, the United States, for our exports. It has accelerated the economic decline of this country. It has accelerated job losses in this country and it has accelerated the downward spiral in working conditions, wages and the entire social fabric of our economy. That is what the free trade agreement has done for Canada in the four short years since it was imposed in January 1989.

In 1988, 73 per cent of Canada's exports went to the U.S. That is quite a substantial portion. We really have too many economic eggs in one basket. Subsequent to the free trade agreement being implemented we have increased that concentration to 78 per cent.

Through the free trade agreement Canada has been dumping all of its economic eggs into one basket, and it is the wrong economic basket to be dumping them into.

Let me cite some other figures that are quite pertinent. This again is—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Just one minute. Is it agreed for me not to see the clock so the hon. member can finish his speech? The hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you, at this particular point in time, could tell me how many more minutes this hon. member has. Private Members' Business is coming up, and as usual people have their speeches organized and have planned for it. I do not want any inconvenience to affect Private Members' Business.

How much longer does our colleague have, Sir?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe that after the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap finishes his debate there will be no more speakers in the House. As far as his time is concerned I do not—

Mrs. Sparrow: Will we be guaranteed that then?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Just hold on for a second. The hon. member for Rosemont on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I am willing to give my consent, but I want to be sure to be able to speak on Bill C-348 later. Can I get consent from the House in this?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): This is on Private Members' Business, and I see no problem with that. Now it is up to the hon. member. If I designate another five minutes will that be sufficient?

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I had planned on only taking my normal time allocation of 10 minutes. I am not quite sure how long I have spoken, but perhaps four or five minutes more would be quite sufficient.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Rosemont wants to speak on the private member's bill.

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All right. We will not see the clock and will let the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap carry on.

Mr. MacWilliam: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do appreciate the indulgence of the House. I will attempt to be as pertinent as I can.

Just before the debate was interrupted I was about to cite some Statistics Canada data demonstrating the impact of the current Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and what it has done to jobs in Canada. These Statistics Canada figures show that the total number of manufacturing jobs in Canada fell by over 400,000 from the end of 1988 to 1992. That is in the manufacturing industry alone. One in five manufacturing jobs in Canada have been lost subsequent to the FTA coming in.

Many of those jobs are gone for good. They are not coming back. The reason they are not coming back is because plants have been closed, they have shut down, they have been moth-balled or in some cases, as was the case in Annacis Island in British Columbia, the plant was literally picked up, packed away and moved south of the border. That situation is a grievous situation and is one that Canada will continue to struggle with as that structural change takes effect.

We warned before the free trade agreement came in that if it was brought in we would see these kinds of plant closures taking place throughout Canada. That is exactly what has taken place.

For example, plant closures have accounted for nearly half of all the manufacturing jobs lost in Ontario between 1989 and 1990. Those closures have been particularly severe in the areas of textiles, clothing, food and furniture manufacturing. I would like to turn to a quote that talks about the impact of this job loss and it is from a critique entitled "The Global Trade Challenge" by Mr. Bruce Campbell. He says: "Look what has happened to the jobs in these sectors in the last three years". He is talking about the period subsequent to the FTA.

He continues: "Furniture has lost 22,700 jobs, 33 per cent of all furniture jobs; 12,395 textile jobs have disappeared, 22 per cent of the entire sector; 42,000 clothing jobs have vanished, 35 per cent of all clothing jobs; plastics has lost 22,000, again a collapse of 35 per cent of all jobs in the sector. In auto parts 20,000 jobs have gone, 22 per cent of the sector. The machinery sector has lost 30,200 jobs, 31 per cent of the sector. Printing and publishing saw a loss of 23,400 jobs, 15 per cent of the sector. Over all, manufacturing has lost more than 20 per cent or 416,700 jobs".

That is a pretty sad state of affairs, and it puts the lie to the government's claim that free trade would be a true economic panacea for this country. We can see what it has done to our country, we can see what it has done to our economy. It has devastated the Canadian economy.

I want to say that the proposal of going into the next phase, which is the North American free trade agreement, only makes that bad situation even worse. If we go into this trilateral agreement the United States will have received all the pieces of the puzzle together: access to cheap Canadian resources and access to cheap Canadian labour.

Canada and Mexico will become the warehouse and the sweat-house for the U.S. based multinationals while they persevere with this idea of a level international playing field so they can move capital and assets around wherever they wish.

I know my time is limited. There is much more I could say on this issue. I hope I will have time later on to discuss a very specific concern that I have, which is the vulnerability of Canadian resources. In particular, I am concerned about the vulnerability of Canadian water supplies under both the free trade agreement now in place and the North American free trade agreement which this government proposes to ram through this House in the next few days with virtually no debate.

It is a sad state of affairs when this government wants to essentially rewrite the economic constitution of this country in the drafting of the North American free trade agreement and not involve Canadian people, not even involve the Parliament of Canada, in thoroughly debating this issue.

We saw exhaustive debate when the government attempted to rewrite our social constitution through the referendum campaign in the fall of 1992. People were absolutely exhausted with the amount of information this government tried to ram down their throats. However, when it tries to rewrite our economic constitution with the North American free trade agreement there is absolute silence. The committee does not even want to travel to some provinces, does not want to travel to our large centres, to Montreal or Toronto, because it is afraid of what the people will say.

I hope to have more opportunity to discuss this, and I hope that I will be one of the few speakers who has the opportunity to debate this proposal to ram through the North American agreement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The first question is on the motion of Mr. Ricard that the question be now put. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6) the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CRIMINAL CODE

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North) moved that Bill C-348, an act to amend the Criminal Code (gun control), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

She said: Mr. Speaker, first of all, the purpose of this bill is to establish a system that would enable the authorities to know the number and kinds of unrestricted firearms being acquired by Canadians after the coming into force of this bill, and to trace those firearms when they are subsequently disposed of, lost or stolen.

Presently only restricted weapons, hand guns and military-type weapons must be registered. Registration of unrestricted firearms is not required. No one knows how many guns there are in Canada or who has them. A person who has been issued a firearms acquisition certificate may buy as many guns as he or she wants. The FAC provides no record of purchase or any control over the number of weapons a particular individual owns. There is no ownership renewal process or follow-up conducted by police.

This particular bill is designed to be a fairly inexpensive way of beginning a system of gun registration. As you will note, it talks about after the coming into force. This would allow a point of sale type of registration system which is one that was recommended by the Canadians for Gun Control. One of the principals of that organization, Wendy Cukier, is an expert in the area of data and information systems and has recommended this particular kind of system.

The information is currently available from people who sell firearms and that data could be reported to a central source, also with the requirement that all sales, losses or theft be reported to that same source.

By collecting this data from gun sellers on a regular basis, such a system would minimize the administrative burden and the inconvenience to firearms owners. It could be submitted to local, provincial or federal authorities and the cost would be associated with organizing and storing the data.

Data base technology would allow records to be accessed by owner name even if they were entered by seller, and with scanning equipment can be done very efficiently and inexpensively. This would allow the registration of all guns when they were purchased from a dealer or if they were sold by an individual to another person. It would be a relatively efficient way to begin firearms registration.

The registration of firearms is supported by quite a number of groups which include the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Canadian Federation of Municipalities, the Canadian Police Association and the Canadian Association of Emergency Physicians. It would allow police to track the source—

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the minister could be asked to leave the House as he is talking extremely loudly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. minister, please, the hon. member cannot speak over the sound of your voice.

Ms. Greene: Thank you. The registration of firearms would allow police to track the source of lost or stolen firearms, as well as those used in the commission of a crime. This would mean that illegal traffic would be more difficult and it would encourage legitimate owners to respect safe storage guidelines.

It would allow the more effective enforcement of prohibition orders. It would allow police to be forewarned of the possible presence of a gun while investigating potentially violent situations such as domestic disputes. It would allow the confiscation of firearms during potentially dangerous domestic disputes.

A single national registry for all firearms would give us very useful data concerning the actual numbers and uses of firearms in this country and about the people who possess them. At the present time estimates are derived through various surveys but we really do not know how many guns are out there.

Recent studies demonstrate a decline in the use of firearms in violent crime in general, including homicides, but those same studies show that almost half the firearm assaults and homicide victims faced assailants armed with rifles or shotguns. The high proportion of long guns, ordinarily unregistered, used in those crimes suggests the need to further restrict their use and availability. If the decline in the use of firearms in violent crimes is even partially attributable to the 1977 legislation, it seems logical to expect that additional restrictions could further their illegitimate use.

If one expects that registration of hand-guns as restricted weapons has kept their numbers low, similar requirements for all weapons should restrict their numbers as well. The rationale that lowering levels of gun ownership reduces their availability and therefore use in violent crimes has found favour in hand-gun control. I believe the same argument would apply to other kinds of firearms.

An Angus Reid survey revealed that firearms in 50 per cent of households surveyed had not been used in the previous year. If gun ownership were made more inconvenient through registration requirements, a great many people might not bother to keep them at home.

Considering the large numbers of weapons in private households in Canada, the fact that firearm homicides occur should come as no surprise. Since less than one-quarter of 1988 homicides suspects were strangers to their victims, and about one-third of the victims and suspects were domestically related, fewer firearms in Canadian households could reduce their availability for use in those types of crimes.

Simply requiring registration of all firearms could reduce the numbers available. Requiring some indication or proof of intended use, like hunting, could reduce these numbers even further.

A requirement for registration of all firearms would send a message to owners about the seriousness of the responsibility they undertake and could have positive psychological effects on their manner of use.

The public is with this kind of bill. In 1975 and in the recent Gallup poll as well, the numbers reported indicated that 80 per cent of Canadians are in favour of the registration of all firearms. I am sure that that issue is one that clearly is the same today.

Registration of firearms would allow far more effective measures to be taken by the police. If we look at some of the particular situations we have had, for example in the de Villiers murder in Ontario, there was no way of verifying whether or not someone was in legal possession of a rifle or a shotgun. They were not able to track that one down although the courts were aware that this particular individual was violent.

Right now there is no way of enforcing prohibition orders short of ransacking someone's home because police have no way of knowing whether there is a gun there. There is absolutely no control on stockpiling. We have heard of stories of that happening in Alberta. There is no way of tracking lost and stolen guns. There are 3,500 reported lost or stolen guns in a year. That is probably an underestimate because there is no legal requirement for reporting lost or stolen guns.

We should consider the difficulty of registering guns. We register dogs in cities and there are probably far more dogs for example in metropolitan Toronto than there are guns. I know the estimate I saw for guns for Toronto was about 55,000 which was higher per capita than Alberta. Yet I know we have 20,000 dogs in Toronto and at least that number in North York. In the whole of the Toronto region we are probably talking about 80,000 dogs that are being registered at no cost to the taxpayer.

Finally, as I said before, this is supported by many people. It is supported by the public and by law enforcement agencies. It is also supported by the Senate. The Senate sent a letter to the minister after it reviewed Bill C-17 and one comment was: "We wish to reinforce the message that effective gun control can always be improved". They talked quite clearly about better information through firearms registration, better control over safe storage, better training for firearms users. I agree with Bill C-17. However, I think this bill would substantially improve the control over firearms in our society. It is something which I recognize could probably not be completed in this term of Parliament, but it is certainly something that I will continue to be advocating, as will many concerned Canadians.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak on this bill presented by the member. It is a very good bill and worthy of a good deal of consideration. I hope it will pass at second reading so it can go to a legislative committee for further examination.

The ideas she puts forward provide a good long-term solution. Eventually we are going to have to do this. It is a question of when we start. I know that there are a lot of people in Canada who feel that registering their firearms is an infringement of their privacy and that it is totally unnecessary. I understand that. It has never been done before, but that feeling exists. I can understand why it exists. However, it is becoming a problem not to have that information. That is the first aspect.

The second aspect is that we have never really had the technology before where this could be done as efficiently and as well as it can be done now. We are in a technological age and we must utilize the technology we have for the benefit of society as a whole.

The member mentioned the cost of the recording and registering of the firearms on a data system. She said that the cost would be very high. We had an estimate from the Firearms Advisory Committee through the Minister of Justice that this would be a very expensive procedure. I have also had information from certain sources that the cost has been blown out of proportion and that the actual cost will not be nearly as high as some people would have us believe.

I can understand one concern. If we say there has to be a central registry system, then we are going to have a jamming of whoever is in charge of doing this registration and it is going to be very cumbersome and counter-productive. I do not think that need to be the case. If we go into a registry system on a step by step process, we could eliminate these bottlenecks.

The member said that registering the purchase of new firearms, also sale of existing firearms from one person to another would be a good way to start. Even if we made this beginning, we would be a lot further along. Once we get the procedure in place, then certainly we could add to it and gauge how effectively the system is being utilized and whether, in fact, we are moving too quickly or too slowly. Certainly the need is there to start the system.

The member also made mention of a concern I have. We must wherever possible give police the advantage in dealing with domestic crises. These are problems in our society that we have to address. We have to address them quickly. We have to address them more efficiently. We want police to respond. We want them to respond quickly. We want them to respond with understanding. We want them to take meaningful action as a result of their investigations. We want a quick and effective follow-up.

If we are going to ask police to take more of a meaningful role in this and to take it more seriously than certainly some policemen have taken it in the past, then we are going to have to co-operate with them. If we can tell police through the central registry system that there may be firearms in that home, then I think we are giving some advantage to the police.

Certainly not all firearms are going to be registered. If we are dealing with someone who abuses his wife or his children, quite often that person is not going to register a firearm. They may neglect to do it and as such be in violation of the law when we have that registry system.

The fact is we should be able to have a registry system available to a police officer who is going to the scene of family violence. I think we have got to start. The job of the police has to be considered.

Also, we will know as we develop a central registry system how many firearms are there. I feel, as does the hon. member, that the number of hand-guns today has been kept to perhaps a lower level than ordinarily might have been if there was not a central registry system. I think that is good. That is responsible activity in our country. While a lot of people may not like to register their firearms and many will not and will absolutely refuse to register their firearms, most Canadians are law abiding and will register the firearms, so we will get participation and we will get co-operation.

We may never know even with a central registry system how many firearms are out there. As was the case with the ammunitions clip on a firearm, there is no identification quite often. These can be brought in. They can be sent in overnight from the United States. They do not have to be bought in Canada. There is no way of tracing it.

People say: "Why have it in the act that it is unlawful to have a clip that is over 10 for a hand-gun and five for a rifle?" The fact of the matter is if we have a law on that, it is going to do a lot more good than if we do not have a law. As well we cannot say that because we feel some people may not obey the law that is a reason for not having a law.

That is completely counterproductive. If we took that feeling in this House of Commons, we might as well all go home. There will always be some people who will not obey the law.

I commend the hon. member for bringing this legislation forward. I wish her well in this. I think it is a well thought out piece of legislation. I have not studied it in detail, but I have looked at it very quickly. I would like to see this legislation go to a legislative committee so we could study it more thoroughly.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I can say on behalf of my colleague, the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, that we also certainly would support this bill.

While I am not an expert in this field, coming from urban Vancouver I can certainly support the need for much stronger gun control and that includes registration.

• (1730)

I recently went on a ride-around with the police in my riding late in the night. I can tell you that the incidence of violence, including the misuse of guns, was pretty scary, to say the least.

At the same time we all appreciate that for aboriginal people and for hunters, people living in the north, there is a different situation and certainly we need to be sensitive to the ways that they would see this applied.

I want to come back in a minute to some of the quotes from my colleague so that his position is on the record. I understand during the hearings into the gun control legislation, Bill C-17, that while nearly every advocate that came before the committee called for a national registration system, the minister herself was not convinced of this or was not persuaded of this. This is the minister, of course, who now is aspiring to become the leader of the Conservative Party and indeed the Prime Minister of Canada. It is a little scary to see that she would compromise on so important a matter.

She said, for example, that she avoided implementation of a gun registry, citing a lack of funding as an excuse, and said that in a time of fiscal restraint this government prefers to concentrate the available gun control resources in those areas of the system that will provide real benefits to firearm users and to the public.

That seems a little strange. I would be concerned that a future Prime Minister would not be interested in a mandatory registration of guns in a country like Canada.

I would like to mention the position that our critic took in the committee and in a minority report which he wrote. He said: "Let us target hand-guns and then get back to paramilitary weapons". He was particularly concerned about paramilitary weapons. "These are not for hunters, these are paramilitary weapons that are flowing into Canada. When people buy guns, surely with modern cash registers and computers, we can take a record and send it to the RCMP."

He goes on to say: "We do not need these high powered guns. We do not need them flooding this country. We need some controls. Surely we must have a registration system for future guns so we know where they are and how armed our population is. If they are lost, stolen or get into criminal hands, we can then deal with them". Certainly, we are in support of this bill which spells this out further.

He also said in a later minority report, again particularly being concerned about semi-automatic weapons: "As restriction of semi-automatic weapons under the present law would effectively prohibit hunting activities, I recommend that all unrestricted semi-automatic weapons be registered as a separate class of weapons. Gun owners would also benefit as their valuable firearms would be better protected against theft. Numerous witnesses before the special committee recommended a full national registry system for every firearm in Canada".

He goes on to say that he supports the following proposal which was suggested by some members of the committee and by most witnesses.

All semi-automatic weapons would be registered. All future firearms obtained using the FAC would also be registered at the time of purchase. Finally, every applicant for an FAC would be required to list all their firearms on the applications. This would not place any additional bureaucratic burden on firearm owners with non semi-automatic rifles who do not need an FAC at present. This would move us toward a long-term goal of a full national registry system.

I want to say again that we will support this bill. I will not take the time today to quote this, but I notice in reading over some of the reference materials that certainly the coalition for gun control had a very strong position on this question. The Canadian Police Association said the association has over the past several months conducted an informal survey of the business community. Over 90 per cent of the respondents believe that guns of all kinds should be registered and that there should be a minimum age and compulsory training requirement in order to own a gun of any kind.

The chief of police of metro Toronto had a more detailed brief. I would like to conclude my remarks by including his comments about a national firearms registry. He believes this concept to be sound, reasonable, and workable, yet there is no mention of it in Bill C-17. Neither was it addressed in the special committee's report. It is hard looking back from this perspective to understand why it was not dealt with at that time and not dealt with by the minister. The police chief feels that if it is possible to control and register motor vehicles and domestic animal pets of which there are far more, surely it is possible to register all firearms in Canada. It is noteworthy to learn that the Government of Canada has recently added its name and support to a group of other nations in establishing a world-wide registry control of weapons of war.

The stated intent of this philosophy is to monitor the proliferation and extent of such weapons. Surely this concept could be applied here in Canada where the proliferation of and the accessibility to all firearms has become alarming. Let us get our own house in order first.

I think that is a good place to stop but I assure the member that we will support this and hope that this bill goes into committee so we can deal with it in further detail.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the hon. member for Don Valley North for her bill. It is excellent. This is an important bill intended to correct at least one of the major flaws in Bill C-17 on gun control by simply requiring that firearms acquired after the coming into force of this Act be registered in the owner's name.

Unfortunately, as we all know, the rules of this House allow only one hour for debate on this type of bill and whether or not it will actually be referred to a legislative committee for further consideration is up to the government to decide. I most sincerely wish for this bill to be allowed to go to committee.

Just having this debate is already a clear indication that the existing law is obviously failing to provide effective gun control. Perhaps I should remind the hon. members that it was the present Minister of National Defence and candidate in the Conservative Party leadership race who proudly moved Bill C-17 through Parliament when she was Minister of Justice.

Let us not forget either that the coalition for gun control, which is made up of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, the Police Association of Canada and many other justice and public health organizations, had estimated that this bill satisfied about 10 per cent of its demands.

We have seen what kind of regulations government has made since. The least we can say is that we were very disappointed and that the initial 10 per cent satisfaction rate would likely be much lower today. Let me give you an example. Did you know that the Ruger Mini-14 that was used in the massacre at the École Polytechnique has not even been included in the restricted firearms category? As things stand at the moment, we have no way of knowing how many people own a Ruger Mini-14 and who these people are. And there is no change in sight. Even a weapon like the AK-47 can still be sold today, although it has been classified as restricted, but you at least know who the owner is. Of course, Rambo's gun should have been completely banned.

In the case of the Ruger Mini-14, it can now be sold without having any idea of who owns such a firearm; in fact, we have no idea at all of who owns such firearms in Canada. This bill would at least correct this situation and in the short term, as some members mentioned, at least the semi-automatic weapons which were allowed in the regulations should absolutely be registered in the owners' names, so that they can be more easily traced if they are stolen or lost, and so that the police can identify the owners.

It is incredible; I was at the Polytechnique and I can tell you that you would not be able to distinguish between the weapon used there and an automatic one. To someone who heard the shots fired, it sounded like an automatic firearm. It is absolutely unbelievable that weapons such as that can still be sold today without knowing their owners, without a follow-up. As soon as you obtain a firearms acquisition certificate, you can buy as many of those firearms as you want, without ever having to undergo any control. Obviously, firearms kill many people. Some have said that it is not the firearms which kill, of course, but those who use them. However, we are well aware that where firearms are more restricted, where owners are more accountable, statistics show a significant reduction in the number of deaths caused by their use. People may be injured and there may not be any less violence, but violence with a knife or with fists hurts, while violence with a firearm kills.

Proportionally—hunters are 9 per cent of the population—when we look at the statistics, there are many more deaths due to firearms than to cars, for example.

Therefore, I am very pleased that this issue is being debated again today, now that we know the regulations which were adopted. As you know, Bill C-17 allowed the government to make regulations, to make a list of prohibited weapons, a list of restricted firearms, and a list of firearms which can be bought without any restriction. Obviously, when this bill was passed, nobody imagined that the AK-47 would still be allowed in Canada. This is incredible, because everybody thought that it would be prohibited. Everybody thought that a semi-automatic firearm such as the Ruger Mini-14 would be classified as a restricted weapon. Well, not so. Therefore, the whole issue of registration and control again becomes much more urgent.

I believe that today's computer technology would make it easy and relatively inexpensive to keep a registry of firearms. I think it is a privilege to own a firearm and it would be normal for such a privilege to be controlled.

It has been said many times that hunters would be really unhappy if they had to register their firearms. I personally know many hunters and none of them would oppose such a measure. Hunters are subject to many rules for hunting, except rules regarding firearms. This is incredible. Thousands of moose hunters must take part in a draw every year and if their name is not chosen, they are not allowed to hunt. They accept these rules because the wildlife must be protected. Yet there is hardly any restriction on firearms.

What about protecting people? Something is out of balance and I am convinced that, if you exclude the lobby of those who sell firearms, the common sense of the ordinary citizens who hunt is such that there would be no problem in implementing the compulsory registration of firearms sold, through the most effective and least expensive system available. I sincerely hope that the review of this excellent bill tabled by the hon. member for Don Valley North can continue in the legislative committee.

[English]

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to participate in private members' hour tonight. I would like to say that my colleague in her legislation has proposed some really sweeping changes to the way that most common firearms in Canada are dealt with.

All of us remember a great deal of what the witnesses at the committee said with regard to Bill C-17. If I can back up a bit, prior to Bill C-17 there was another bill. I think it was Bill C-84 which died on the Order Paper. When it came out is when I first got involved and talked to many of my constituents, the gun dealers and the gun clubs in my riding, as well as in all the ridings in Calgary and indeed into southern Alberta.

While Bill C-84 contained many clauses that were totally unacceptable to me, we have been pretty good with regard to Bill C-17. There are some things in it that I am not particularly fond of, but there is compromise within the system.

What my colleague is asking for is the complete registration of all firearms. I cannot accept that and I will not accept that. I would certainly have to vote against it. There are many reasons.

I would like to say first of all that I own shotguns and I own rifles. I have taken training. I think the majority of Canadians that own shotguns and rifles are very careful, understand the safety and use every precaution in how they store, carry and use their weapons. No amount of legislation anywhere is going to prevent someone who is unbalanced or perhaps mentally incompetent from shooting a person if he or she gets hold of a firearm.

What we are doing in the legislation we pass is trying to put forward a law or rule that makes society safer. We have to look at the total society. We have a lot of rural areas in our country. I am from Alberta and there are a lot of rural people, farmers, ranchers, hunters and fishermen who utilize shotguns and rifles daily. They are well trained and use them safely.

What was contained in Bill C-17 which was passed last year has gone a long way to improving the safety of our society. There are areas in that bill which I want to deal with. We placed restrictions on high fire power and military-type firearms. My colleague from the New Democratic Party was speaking about military-type firearms. They are restricted. We increased penalties for misusing a firearm. We have reinforced the screening system through which all Canadians have to pass before they are allowed to own a firearm. It is called the FAC, the firearms acquisition certificate.

Anyone in Canada purchasing a firearm must obtain a firearms acquisition certificate, generally speaking at their local police station. You fill out a form answering specific questions. There is a 28-day waiting period.

The most important thing we have asked for is that certain people sponsor firearm acquisition certificates so not anyone can go out and purchase a rifle or a firearm instantaneously. There is a 28 day waiting period. You have to have people within your community that know you, that can sign their names to vouch that you are indeed a very careful person.

Coming in July 1993, the FAC applicants are going to have to present evidence that they have successfully completed a course or a test involving the safe handling and use of firearms and knowledge of the laws relating to all firearms.

This might present a little bit of a hardship but most of the gun clubs and organizations are willing to work with us. I think if people are trained at a young age—one must be 18 or over to have a firearms acquisition certificate—that they will understand that firearms are a specific piece of machinery. It is not so much the firearm that kills as the person behind it.

It is the responsibility of everyone who owns this type of rifle, hand-gun or shotgun to become very familiar with the law.

I have to say that there is a compromise. The people who perhaps do not enjoy hunting or using rifles and firearms or perhaps are afraid of them might consider that we should ban firearms completely. That is totally out of the question.

My colleague tonight has a bill in front of us that suggests that all firearms be registered. One will have to go through a central registration system. The cost is high. There is no doubt about it. I heard my colleague from Cape Breton saying that the costs were perhaps a little bit out of proportion from what we heard before the committee hearings. That is not true. There are millions and millions of various shotguns and hunting rifles and to ask the police force to openly register and trace these, whether you are purchasing a new firearm or selling it second-hand, is asking a great deal.

First, we have to devote their energies to what their duties are as police service people. Second, all restricted firearms have to be registered with the RCMP. Restricted firearms are listed. As you well know, Mr. Speaker, we have particular brochures that outline those restricted firearms. The commissioner keeps a central list of those particular weapons if they are stolen or if the ownership is transferred. This is all covered in the bill that we passed last year.

I also want to say something to my colleague from Quebec with regard to the tragedy that happened at Ecole Polytechnique when 14 young women lost their lives and also at Concordia University where members of the engineering faculty lost their lives because of someone who perhaps was imbalanced—in one case he was—opened fire with a firearm and took the lives of these particular people. That was uncalled for and no one in this House or from the other place wants to see anything like that happen again. However, registering firearms is not going to resolve that problem at all.

What we have to do is take the specific types of firearms that are indeed the most dangerous and have those registered. We will also enlarge the list of those to be prohibited. Certainly automatics are prohibited. Semi-automatics that have been converted to automatics are prohibited especially if they can be converted within a short period of time.

There are many ranchers, firearms people and hunting clubs within the southern Alberta region to whom I have spoken. They put forth their best thoughts and best ideas when we were putting forth the firearms legislation, Bill C-17.

We upgraded the 1978 firearms legislation. Most of the firearms that are causing us problems come across the border. We have to have customs officers—or contract out to the RCMP or police services people—who understand and know exactly what they are looking for. There is a tremendous amount of money made in the black market with regard to firearms and we have to control that.

I appreciate this opportunity to speak with regard to my colleague's bill. I certainly do not agree with it and in no way could I support it.

• (1755)

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the debate today and I wish to congratulate the hon. member for introducing the bill.

I listened to the comments on both sides of the issues and I noted that the person who spoke before me, the hon. member for Calgary Southwest, said she could not accept the complete registration of all firearms. However, she did not say that she was opposed to this bill going to committee. I gather she is in favour of a debate and in favour of it going to committee. Perhaps she might clarify that, or I suppose we will see as the debate proceeds.

I hope it will go to committee because it is clear from debate in the House today that many questions were unanswered as a result of Bill C-17, that there is a need for debate, and that there is a need for further education on the part of members of Parliament and the public at large.

The purpose of the bill would be to establish a reporting system for unrestricted firearms which are acquired after the coming into force of the act. Restricted weapons, typically hand-guns, are registered but unrestricted weapons, typically rifles and shotguns, are not. There is no record of how many unrestricted firearms are in circulation. Persons who are issued firearms acquisition certificates may buy as many unrestricted weapons as they want. The purpose of the bill would be to get a handle on unregistered firearms, to require that unrestricted firearms, typically shotguns and rifles, be registered.

We are talking about after the coming into force of this act. It would an incremental step. It would be a beginning. It would enable us to determine whether the technology available today would allow the implementation of such a system in an efficient manner and a manner that would not impose undue cost or hardship on owners of these weapons.

I support the bill. I hope it goes into committee. I hope we have an opportunity to debate the matter further and to hear from witnesses. I note that many respected organizations support the bill including the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Canadian Federation of Municipalities, the Canadian Police Association, my city of Montreal, and a number of organizations in the city of Montreal including the Montreal General Hospital Surgical Intensive Care Trauma Unit which has had to deal with the victims of the tragedies at Ecole Polytechnique and Concordia University.

The bill is also supported by Concordia University and by Ecole Polytechnique, the staff, teachers and students of those schools. I support this measure and indeed hope to participate in the committee meetings on this bill.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a couple of comments on Bill C-348, an act to amend the Criminal Code with respect to gun control.

I have been looking at the bill. I understand its purpose is to establish a system that would essentially form a system of registration of unrestricted firearms, for example long-guns, hunting rifles and shotguns which people including myself use for recreational purposes. I have some real difficulties with the bill. I guess it is one of those times when I have to disagree with my New Democratic colleague who said the New Democratic Party is supporting this bill. I do not think that is unanimous.

I know that I also speak on behalf of my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke, who feels very much the same as I do.

We of course understand and sympathize with the intent of the legislation which is to reduce the amount of criminal misuse of firearms. Certainly any specific initiatives that can impact on the misuse and the deadly use of firearms in acts of criminal violence should be implemented, but this is going about it in the wrong sense and that is why we have difficulties with the bill.

The bill attempts to restrict ownership of firearms and to layer on more bureaucratic red tape in terms of the purchase, the ownership, the sale and lending of these firearms.

What it is essentially doing is confounding the legitimate and recreational use of firearms that people have throughout Canada. It is essentially attacking the problem from the wrong side. Where we should be attacking the problem is in terms of increased criminal sanctions when firearms are used in criminal acts or in acts of violence. I think that is a more appropriate mechanism in which to impose penalties.

This particular bill, for example, forces the further reporting and filling out of forms for the trading and lending of firearms. Really as was pointed out earlier people that are purchasing firearms or trading firearms now essentially have to register through the firearms acquisition certificate. I think that is an appropriate mechanism in which really anyone that is applying for an FAC is essentially registering that they are going to become a new owner of a firearm.

Rather than increasing the criminal penalties for the use of firearms and acts of violence, which is the focus that we should be taking, this legislation simply frustrates the legitimate recreational use of firearms by Canadians.

Although I fully support the intent, I fully understand the reasons that this bill was brought forward. What I am saying is that it is really the wrong medicine, it is the wrong cure for the causes of criminal violence involving firearms. As a result of that I find it very difficult to support this legislation.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have a few moments to make my own comments in support generally of the position that my colleague from Okanagan—Shuswap just made. I will perhaps be a little more general.

There are a number of us and I think a growing number of us in rural and hinterland Canada that are increasingly getting more than a little fed up with the attempt of city people to impose their political and social values on those of us who have a different way of life and we do have a different way of life.

My colleague from Kootenay East and I broke with our party and voted on third reading against the last regime of firearms control legislation that came before the House. We did that not because we disagreed with the principle behind that legislation but because we felt that it did not recognize sufficiently the differences between rural and urban Canada.

I have a lot of sympathy with people who live in downtown Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver where they are suffering the problems that automatically arise, whether it is caused by firearms or not as the instrument, from a crowding of people into a small space.

That has happened in New York and in Los Angeles and it increasingly I am afraid is going to happen here, particularly as the violent culture that we are bombarded with through the media gets heavier and heavier. We have not found a way to deal with it and the new technology makes it even less likely that we are going to be able to deal with it but this is not the way. One of the Liberal members—I do not know if he was the critic in this area for the Liberal Party—said a few moments ago that just because some people may not obey a law is no reason not to pass it.

I agree. Anyone would agree with that statement. But if there is widespread opposition and widespread contempt for a given regime of regulation and law in large areas of a country, it is unwise for Parliament to act in defiance of that kind of feeling without a great deal more discussion and without allowing a great deal more time for people to be accustomed to different laws and different regimes. Otherwise we simply dare those forces in society, which I think are legitimate ones, to begin to feel a widespread contempt not only for that law but for law generally. That is unhealthy for democracy.

We have, over the last few years, passed two major pieces of legislation on firearms and regulation in Canada after a great deal of debate. Compromises were reached. Not everybody agreed with the final bill. However, to attempt so soon after we have just completed one of those to bring another piece of bureaucracy into an increasingly collectively deregulated, society and increase regulation on individual people, I think is wrong and unwise.

I do not like disagreeing with colleagues in my own party. I do not like disagreeing with people across the way or down in the other end of the Chamber. However before I represent a party I represent the people who sent me here. I am not running again. I have no political axe to grind on this.

I want to conclude by quoting a famous British labour statesman, Aneuran Bevan, when he said: "A motion is good petrol but a shockingly bad driver".

I understand the kind of emotions that are the driving force behind this proposed legislation, whether it is proposed by a Conservative, as in this case, or by a Liberal or by some of my colleagues in the NDP. But I reject totally that it is wise. All the bill will do if it should succeed is increase bureaucracy, increase the regulation of people, deny personal freedom, with no real positive result. Further it will bring the whole democratic process into disrepute and contempt by a wider number of Canadians, many of whom live in the kind of area that I represent.

I am glad to associate myself in this regard with my colleague who spoke a few moments ago, the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap. It is the wrong time, even if it were intelligent. It is too much at once for people who feel that they have had enough already. The bureaucracy dealing with firearms registration is not yet equipped to deal expeditiously with the regulations we already have. For God's sake, let us not go any further at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): There being no further members rising for debate, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being 6.07 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(3) this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1993–94

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–117, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1993, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

He said: Madam Speaker, I very much appreciate the opportunity to speak at second reading of Bill C–117, the 1993–94 borrowing authority act.

Bill C–117 gives the government the authority to carry out its regular borrowing program for the fiscal year 1993–94. Under normal circumstances the bill requesting this authority would be tabled at the time of the tabling of the federal budget, usually in February, and the fiscal framework in the budget serves as the basis for the new borrowing authority.

However this year circumstances are not the same as in the past, as I did present an economic statement to the House in December with an update of the 1993–94 financial situation. As I indicated earlier, I will be introducing a budget shortly after we return from our Easter break.

Given that fact, it is important to have the new borrowing authority bill before Parliament before the new fiscal year begins, otherwise we run the risk of the bill not being passed before the borrowing authority runs out.

The fiscal framework set out in the economic statement in December provides the basis for both the 1993–94 borrowing authority and the 1993–94 Main Estimates.

With the December statement and the Main Estimates Parliament has all the information it needs to deal with the borrowing bill. I will discuss the main contents of the bill shortly, but first of all I would like to comment on the government's general economic and fiscal situation.

Since coming to office the government has pursued a clearly defined strategy to bring federal finances under control, improve Canada's international competitiveness and strengthen the private sector as the main engine of growth and job creation.

Our economic priority is to build confidence, enhance growth, create jobs and help Canadians adjust to the current economic changes and take advantage of new opportunities.

All our efforts have been directed at investing in growth through sound monetary and fiscal policies, opening up new markets through trade liberalization, streamlining government, reducing government intervention, the privatization of Crown corporations, the building of skills of Canadians and the encouragement of the private sector as the main basis for economic progress.

Despite the severe impact of a world–wide recession these efforts are beginning to yield positive effects. Canada's economy grew last year at a rate of about 1 per cent, however fourth quarter growth showed a strong upward trend of 3.5 per cent at an annual rate, with exports being the driving force. However, domestic demand has remained hesitant.

On the other hand there are encouraging signs, particularly with the growing competitive strength based on low inflation, the lowest in 30 years; reduced interest rates, the lowest prime rate in 20 years; and some mortgage rates at 5.75 per cent, the lowest in 35 years along with enhanced national productivity. These all augur very well.

This new Canadian strength is reflected in our export performance. Canadian businesses last year sold $157.5 billion in merchandise to foreign markets. That is an increase of almost 21 per cent since the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement was put in place. It also represents an increase of 11 per cent over 1991, the largest year–over–year increase since 1984.

I should indicate as well there are some rather interesting statistics I feel must be put on the record.

For example, in dealing with exports to the United States, Ontario's exports to the United States have increased by 29 per cent, from $56.4 billion in 1988 to $72.6 billion in 1992. Quebec's exports have increased by 27 per cent, from $16.5 billion in 1988 to $21 billion in 1992.

To go to my own home province of Alberta, again there has been an increase in exports to the United States since the free trade agreement came into effect. Alberta's exports to the United States have surged since the free trade agreement was put in place by rising 52 per cent, from $9.1 billion in 1988 to $13.8 billion in 1992.

In British Columbia, exports to the U.S. have increased by almost 14 per cent, from $7.4 billion in 1988 to $8.4 billion in 1992. Saskatchewan's exports have increased 44 per cent, from $2 billion in 1988 to $2.8 billion in 1992. Manitoba's exports are up 30 per cent, from $1.7 billion in 1988 to $2.3 billion in 1992. Nova Scotia's exports to the U.S. have increased by 29 per cent, from $1.4 billion in 1988 to $1.8 billion in 1992.

These are very impressive increases.

To look at some other sectors, transportation, electrical and electronic and chemical industries accounted for most of the gains of over 70 per cent recorded by Canada and the U.S. since the free trade agreement came into effect. Other sectors such as the Canadian high–tech exports to the United States grew from $6.6 billion to $10.7 billion, a gain of 63 per cent. The office, telecommunications and precision equipment component of that grew by 74 per cent. The electronics component went from $893 million in 1988 to $2.9 billion in 1991, a gain of 225 per cent.

These figures do not include the dramatic gains in exports to the U.S. which we have seen in the first 11 months of 1992. We really have chalked up an impressive increase in our exports to the United States since the free trade agreement was put in place.

We hear so often across the way that the free trade agreement has caused the so–called deindustrialization of Ontario. This is what the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has to say about that:

When the president of the CMA, Mr. Stephen Van Houten, was asked in a CBC interview how the free trade agreement had helped or hindered its members, he replied: "Oh, it has helped considerably. In fact, exports of manufactured goods from Canada to the United States have gone up 60 per cent since the free trade agreement came into force. So those who blame the free trade agreement for all of our ills and job losses frankly do not know what they are talking about. Without that business we would be in real trouble". The interviewer asked this question: "And you are looking forward to NAFTA?" Van Houten replied: "Very much so indeed. Our members are behind it; they tell us so in a 10:1 ratio".

That was right from the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. I happen to know as well that if he were asked what his opinion was of the GST, he would clearly say that without the GST there would not have been that kind of increase and that kind of penetration. The changing of the manufacturers' sales tax, the removal of the archaic, destructive manufacturers' sales tax has increased the competitive position of the Canadian manufacturing industry by something in the order of $3.5 billion to $4 billion.

Those are very impressive statistics. They clearly demonstrate that some of the policies we have been following are indeed working, making Canada more competitive, exporting more, generating more wealth, generating more jobs and improving the economic fortunes of all Canadians.

For the economy this year, these trends all support the view that we can meet the growth rate as forecast in the December economic statement of 2.5 per cent. As a matter of fact I am quite confident that can be exceeded.

The OECD, for example, in its forecast in mid-December predicted Canada's growth of 3.2 per cent this year and 4.2 per cent in 1994. Those are the levels that would lead the G-7 major economies.

I should say as well that Canada and the United States are clearly the leaders in terms of world growth. France is looking like its growth will be flat. The United Kingdom is still in a negative growth position, after seven or eight successive quarters of negative growth. Italy is going into a decline. Germany is expected to have negative growth. Japan is expected to have growth something in the order of 1.5 per cent to 2 per cent. Really, the promise is clearly focused on the North American situation and Canada is very much a part of it.

Still we notice that this means the over-all pace of growth will not be that encouraging, but it will be very competitive. It will require us to continue to improve our productivity and our competitiveness and to build upon the progress that has already been made.

Clearly an essential component of maintaining growth and economic progress, the single most critical issue that we face today in terms of determining our national potential for growth and job creation is to get a better handle on the deficit and the debt. I speak in terms of not only the federal deficit, but indeed the provincial deficits as well.

Since 1984-85 this government has taken firm action to improve Canada's fiscal framework and real progress has been made in reducing the deficit. As a matter of fact, I have said and I say so again, the deficit as a percentage of GDP has been reduced by almost 50 per cent, from about 8.7 per cent to 5.1 per cent. That is real progress and much of that progress was made notwithstanding the fact that we have been in the recession.

Much of this improvement results from the consistent spending restraint we have put in place. For example, from 1985-86 to 1992-93, the government has implemented a variety of restraint measures that have saved about $120 billion. About $120 billion have been shaved off the expenditure plans of the government. With these restraint measures in place, program spending growth averaged 4.1 per cent from 1984-85 to 1991-92 which is well under the rate of inflation.

By comparison, in the years 1969-70 to 1984-85 program spending grew at an annual rate of 13.8 per cent. In that period of time, the national debt increased elevenfold from about $18.5 billion to $206 billion. There was an elevenfold increase in the national debt during that period of time. That is what happens when program expenditures grow at the rate of almost 14 per cent over a period of 15 years. That is what happens when $1.33 is spent for every dollar's worth of revenue taken in. It simply cannot be sustained and we stopped that and turned it around.

As a result of this spending restraint, this year the government again will run an operating surplus in total revenues, that is, total revenues minus program spending. We have run an operational surplus every year since 1987-88 and it has accumulated. It has amounted to some $33 billion of accumulated surpluses since 1987-88.

Bear in mind when we assumed office, the operational deficit in 1984-85 was $16 billion. When that is contrasted with the previous administration, since 1987-88 we have generated a cumulative operational surplus of $33 billion. Contrast that with the period prior to 1984-85 when the administration previously chalked up a cumulative operational deficit during that period of time. The 10-year period before 1984-85 chalked up an operational deficit of $66.3 billion. If we had continued to spend along the lines of the previous administration and followed the Liberal pattern, we would have had a deficit of $82.5 billion today. We took action. To reinforce that commitment to restraint we brought in legislation, the Spending Control Act, which sets out firm ceilings on federal program spending for the period 1991-92 to 1995-96. The tough restraint measures we have put in place have held spending limits under the Spending Control Act.

Notwithstanding these efforts, the weakness of the economy in 1992 had a major effect upon government revenues and put upward pressure on the deficit. Confronted by this economic sluggishness we took strong action in December to reduce spending levels by an additional $8 billion over the balance of this fiscal year and the two years to come.

As hon. members know we took action to freeze the salaries of cabinet ministers, members of Parliament and those in the Public Service. I should point out that this is the sixth time since 1985 that cabinet ministers' and members' salaries have been cut or frozen.

We advanced a 5 per cent reduction in departmental operating budgets over the next two-year period. As for defence alone the combination of wage freezing and operating cuts will mean savings of $1.3 billion to the taxpayers of Canada.

We took targeted action on the unemployment insurance program. We cut 10 per cent in federal grants and contributions. We are prepared to take additional action as needed to ensure that our deficits as pledged in the December statement will hold true to form and to secure a firm, committed and credible track to get the government out of the pattern of public and international borrowing.

The December economic statement included a number of initiatives to bolster public and private investment and to encourage economic growth. As one will recall we announced support for small business, research and development and training and adjustment. I must say I am very pleased with the fact that the changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act, a very important piece of legislation, have been passed by the Senate and proclaimed into law. This will certainly help in a very tangible way our small business sector. I am very pleased to see that the banks, the Bank of Nova Scotia for example, announced they will be making loans under the provisions of the Small Businesses Loans Act at the prime rate of 6 per cent. I think this will be a real boon to the small business sector and provide additional stimulus to the small business sector for the creation of jobs.

We also undertook initiatives to improve the construction and resource sectors. We provided incentives for job creation through the UI premium holiday. We extended the successful home buyers plan that was introduced in last year's budget. We extended a number of improvements to encourage infrastructure and provide for some public expenditure to create jobs and to improve the competitiveness and productivity of our major industrial sectors. All of these measures will help the recovery and at the same time will ensure responsible action to reduce deficits.

We all know that all governments face similar fiscal pressures. I think it is important for all members and all people in Canada to recognize that deficits and growing debt are not just federal problems but are problems that are facing all administrations. For example provincial deficits have tripled over the last six years from $7.6 billion in 1987–88 to an estimated $23.4 billion this year. These deficits are being fuelled by spending increases that carry an onerous price. We only have to look at what happened when the federal government in the 1970s and early 1980s let program spending grow at a rate that eclipsed economic growth.

There is no way that the federal government could sustain program spending increases that averaged about 14 per cent a year for the 15 years prior to 1984–85. It created a debt and interest load that is punishing us today even though our government cut the average rate of program growth dramatically.

We all know that the current cost of servicing the debt is 32 cents out of every revenue dollar we take in. In other words for every revenue dollar that is taken in, 32 cents is lopped off the top to pay the interest on the cost of servicing the debt. Obviously that leaves that much less money to be spent on economic and social programs. If we do not deal with that and if we do not redress it then it will become progressively worse.

Likewise there is no way the provinces could sustain an average annual growth and program spending of 7.5 per cent. That is the level of spending their growth was increasing at. In some cases it was as high as 10 per cent. They are becoming trapped in the same vicious circle. We now see that provinces are running operational deficits as well. They obviously cannot sustain that.

However, in this regard we should all be encouraged that provinces are indeed taking action to contain spending. It is also encouraging to hear provinces indicating a renewed interest in working with each other and with the federal government to join in a national plan for restoring Canada's fiscal health.

We have been recommending this for some time. I certainly want to assure all members of the House and all the provinces that we will provide leadership action in dealing with this issue. We certainly have laid out a plan. We certainly would like to see a strategy outline with certain goals and objectives that can be achieved in a co-operative and co-ordinated fashion.

That puts this bill into context. I would now like to turn to the main elements of the bill. Bill C–117 contains three standard elements of previous borrowing bills. They are: first, the financial authority to cover financial requirements for 1993–94; second, the exchange fund account profits; and third, a contingency reserve.

The first element provides the government with the authority to cover its anticipated requirement for borrowing in order to meet the net financial requirements set out in the economic statement.

The second element of the bill provides for an amount of money to cover exchange fund account profits. These are the earnings which give rise to additional Canadian dollar borrowing requirements. Exchange fund account earnings are retained in the account and their main purpose is to provide the government with the capacity to intervene in foreign exchange markets.

The third element provides for a $3 billion non–lapsing reserve to cover contingencies. The reserve is there to cover unexpected contingencies such as foreign exchange and intervention requirements. This amount is the same as requested in borrowing authority bills over the last six years.

Bill C–117 is requesting $31.5 billion of regular borrowing authority for the 1993–94 fiscal year. This includes estimated financial requirements of $26.5 billion, projected exchange fund account earnings of $2 billion and a non–lapsing contingency reserve of $3 billion.

In line with the measure introduced in last year's legislation, Bill C–117 ensures that the 1993–94 borrowing authority may only be used after the 1993–94 fiscal year begins. This provision links the borrowing authority to the 1993–94 financial requirements even if Bill C–117 receives Royal Assent before the beginning of 1993–94.

The bill contains a standard clause stating that any unused borrowing authority granted by this bill over $3 billion will be cancelled on March 31, 1994. This clause allows the $3 billion non–lapsing contingency reserve to be carried forward into 1994–95 in case new borrowing authority is not in place by then.

There are also a couple of technical clauses that ensure the use of the borrowing authority matches the financial requirements for the year for which it was granted.

In addition, the bill provides for any unused borrowing authority for 1992–93 to be cancelled once Bill C–117 comes into force. Prior to this bill coming into force, the $3 billion contingency from the previous year's authority can be used between March 31 and the date the new borrowing authority takes effect.

Furthermore any portion of the $3 billion contingency reserve carried forward from 1992–93 and used during 1993–94 will be deducted from the 1993–94 borrowing authority.

I know that hon. members recognize the importance of passing this bill before borrowing authority runs out early in the 1993–94 fiscal year. We have announced the borrowing program for the first fiscal quarter to provide information to our investors and orderly marketing conditions for the large debt program.

• (1035)

This borrowing authority is a normal part of the operations of the government so I ask my colleagues to consider it and give it expeditious passage.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, only a month and a half ago the Minister of Finance through the parliamentary secretary asked this House to pass a bill authorizing the government to borrow a further $8.2 billion. This was supposedly to deal with the additional requirements of the government for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1992.

Now, only a month and a half later, we see the Minister of Finance himself here again on behalf of the government asking for the authority to borrow $31.5 billion for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1993. This is another request for substantial borrowing authority only a few weeks after a similar bill was presented to this House by the government.

I do not think the government has made a more convincing case for its financial record today any more than it did a month and a half ago when the earlier bill was presented by the parliamentary secretary.

The minister himself today has talked about the purposes of the government's financial policy. He talked about creating jobs and growth and helping Canadians to adjust. What has been the result of this government's policies? Since 1989 Canada has lost 325,000 manufacturing jobs. Unemployment has been at double–digit levels for two consecutive years and in spite of some slight improvement there are no prospects of this changing for the rest of this year and well into next year according to the government itself.

More than 200,000 people and firms have gone bankrupt since 1990 and 40 per cent of service sector jobs pay wages below the poverty level. Adjusted for inflation, average family incomes are no higher today than they were in 1983.

This situation did not happen by accident. I think this Conservative government has made some very basic policy errors such as fighting inflation at all costs, supporting high real interest rates and a high Canadian dollar and, in spite of what the Minister of Finance has said—I will talk more about this in a few minutes—a free trade agreement without a subsidies code or adjustment programs that contributed to the decline in manufacturing jobs and the deterioration of our industrial base in this country.

The minister has been talking about the benefits of his policies, his Conservative government's policies. But there are some other disturbing numbers in addition to those I have just put on the record which help to confirm that these policies have hurt rather than helped Canadians and their families in the last several years as well as at present and with respect to their prospects for the future.

Yesterday in The Globe and Mail Robert Sheppard wrote a very interesting but troubling column in which he said:

> By now, most Canadians are probably aware that once wealthy Ontario has finally overtaken New Brunswick—in a big jump last year—to become the province with the largest share of welfare recipients among its general population.
> As of last June, 17 per cent of Ontarians under 60 were receiving some form of provincial or municipal welfare. This is nearly three times the prevailing level throughout most of the 1980s, and four times what it was in the decade before.

• (1040)

Imagine that. In the province of Ontario 17 per cent of the population under 60 is now receiving some form of provincial or municipal welfare. What an indictment of this Conservative government's policies.

Mr. Sheppard goes on to say:

> Neither Ontario nor the country can afford to let their new bases be set at the 10 per cent national range, let alone Ontario's 17 per cent, only to be augmented by the "jobless recovery" of the next few years.

We have to note that to the extent there is recovery in this country it is tragically a "jobless recovery". No matter how much Canadian workers increase their skills there are still not enough jobs to meet the needs of those already unemployed, much less those entering the labour market.

The Minister of Finance went on at some length about his government's tax policies. He did not make clear that since this Conservative government came into office taxes for ordinary Canadians have been increased some 36 times. Today in The Globe and Mail Jeffrey Simpson wrote that:

> Among the world's seven leading industrialized countries, only in Italy did tax revenues rise faster as a share of the economy in the 1980s than in Canada. In 1991, tax revenues in Canada accounted for 39.4 per cent of gross domestic product, compared with 31.6 per cent in 1980.
> In 1980, Canadian taxes as a percentage of GDP were 6.5 points below Germany's and 3.5 points below Britain's. By 1991, the Canadian percentage exceeded that of both Germany and Britain by 3 points. In the same period, the gap between the Canadian and U.S. rates soared to 10 percentage points from 2, a striking difference between the world's largest trading partners.

Mr. Simpson made one of the most important points of all with respect to how this Conservative government has increased the tax burden on ordinary Canadians when he said:

> What's arresting in the figures, compiled from the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, is how fast Canadian taxes have jumped in recent years. The tax to GDP ratio increased by 4 percentage points from 1989 to 1991 whereas it remained steady in France and the United States and actually dropped in Germany and Great Britain.

I do not think I have to remind Canadians that the present Conservative government has been in office for almost nine years, that is, over most of the period we have been talking about and certainly during the period between 1989 and 1991 when the tax to GDP ratio increased by 4 percentage points in only some two years. This is another indictment of this Conservative government and its record and the way it has mishandled the finances of this country, in spite of the protestations today by the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance talked about the very good record of this government in handling these finances. What does the record actually say? It says that the accumulated public debt is in the area of $450 billion, more than twice as much as it was when this Conservative government took office. Is that good management of the country's affairs? No matter what the Conservatives say, the record is clear. The public debt is more than double today what it was when this Conservative government took office.

The Minister of Finance talks about the deficit. He admitted in his December economic statement that the budget deficit for the fiscal year 1992–93 would be $34.4 billion, some $6.9 billion more than had been forecast only a few months earlier in his February 1992 budget. The deficit is really not much different than when his government took office. As I said in this House in the borrowing bill debate only a month and a half ago, this government has put the Canadian economy and the Canadian people through a very high degree of pain for no real gain.

Another measure of this government's mishandling of the financial affairs of this country is the ratio of debt to our gross domestic product. When this government took office the ratio of debt to Gross Domestic Product was only 42 per cent. It is now in the area of about 65 per cent. That is a tremendous increase in the period since this Conservative government took office. It is a real deterioration from what it was when this government took office claiming that it had the answer when it came to our debt and deficit problems. Yes, it had the answer. That answer was to make things worse.

In the minister's speech today he talked about what the borrowing requirements would be used for, but he did not make clear that since this Conservative government has been in office its debt, which was once held almost entirely by Canadians, is now to an increasing and troubling extent held by borrowers outside this country. More than 20 per cent is held by borrowers outside this country, making us vulnerable to pressures that did not exist before this Conservative government took office.

These are the realities of our debt and deficit situation which the Minister of Finance conveniently ignored in his speech a few minutes ago. I can understand why he ignored these figures. I can understand why he ignored these realities. It is because they paint a very different picture, a more realistic and accurate picture about this government's handling of this country's financial affairs than anything he said in his speech. We can understand why he would prefer to sweep these facts under the rug and try to pretend they do not exist. They do exist and they cannot be forgotten and they will not be forgotten by Canadians when they pass judgment on this government in the next election.

The minister went on to speak about improvements in exports which we welcome. He talked about linking this improvement with the free trade deal. What he did not mention was that 80 per cent of the exports of this country to the United States were duty-free before the free trade deal went into existence. They were already duty-free, 80 per cent of them. How can he say with a straight face that this improvement in exports was in fact linked with the existence of the free trade deal with the United States? Common sense would say that simply does not hold up if the reality is that 80 per cent of our exports to that country went there duty-free before the free trade deal was in existence.

He did not talk about how our exports improved because the dollar went down after this government for months and years supported a high dollar policy which undermined our export sector, whether we are talking about exports of resources or exports of manufactured goods. He did not talk about how our exports were helped finally by lower interest rates although they are still quite high in real terms compared to the interest rates in the United States. So there are other factors there which can account for the improvement in our exports.

Thank goodness for an improvement in our exports because according to the government's own statistical agency, Statistics Canada, if it was not for this improvement, even the weak and slow and vacillating growth we have seen would not be there because we have in this country a very weak domestic demand according to Statistics Canada in its publication the Canadian Economic Observer. That is important because domestic demand accounts for 60 per cent of the activity in our economy.

According to Statistics Canada if there is to be continued growth in the economy it will have to depend on a further pick-up in exports rather than an improvement in domestic demand. Statistics Canada in its current publication of the Canadian Economic Observer made clear that Canadian job growth slowed in January and February and household demands for cars and housing remained sluggish. Here I am making use of a summary of this publication in a story from Dow Jones in today's Financial Post: "Statistics Canada said that the reasons for the slump in household demand are unclear because they occurred at a time of rising unemployment and falling interest rates".

It seems pretty clear to me. I suggest that it seems pretty clear to most Canadians that household demand would not be very strong and consumers would not have much confidence about whether they should spend their money if unemployment was rising. They would not have that confidence if unemployment remains high and shows little prospect of change because of the policies of this Conservative government over the next year and the year afterward.

Yes, Statistics Canada, the government's own statistical agency, confirmed a weakness in household demand. That means the intention of individual consumers, individual families, working people, working men and women and small business people to buy. Statistics Canada confirmed weak consumer confidence and little prospect of change. The public is passing judgment through that lack of confidence and through that lack of household demand in this Conservative government's policies. That judgment is that the government has been a failure and has caused destruction and damage to the lives of hundreds of thousands of Canadians.

Just a few months ago, looking at the policies of this Conservative government, our distinguished Whip said to me: "If the medicine is so good then why is the patient still so sick?" That I thought was a statement of essential truth. If the Conservative medicine is so good then why is the patient still so sick? The fact is that the patient is still so sick because the Conservative medicine has not been good. It has made the patient sick. It has created the sickness rather than curing that sickness when it comes to the health of the Canadian economy.

This is confirmed by what Statistics Canada says about our unemployment figures. We know that fortunately they improved slightly in the past month but they are still well above double-digit levels at 10.8 per cent.

Statistics Canada said the main reason it improved was not because there have been a substantial number of new jobs but because a large number of Canadians gave up. They lost hope. They left the labour force. The total size of the labour force dropped.

If that were not the case we would not have seen any improvement in the unemployment figures at all. They are still shamefully high across this country, in my own city of Windsor and in many cities like it in every part of Canada.

The Minister of Finance has talked about how well his policies have been working as a way of justifying the continued request for borrowing by his government.

As I have said before, as with a business in the private sector, the government's revenues do not come in at the same time as its required needs for expenditures and borrowing. In using this debate on the government's borrowing bill as a way of putting on the record and justifying this government's economic policies, the Minister of Finance, while certainly a good debater and a good speaker, really has not made a convincing case at all as to why these policies deserve to be further supported by the Canadian people.

What is missing in the government's talk about its economic policies now and in the future is any commitment to economic growth. There is no real commitment as a priority to helping the economy grow, as part of the answer to its problems whether they are problems of unemployment, the yearly deficit or the accumulated public debt.

Yes, we need to have a sound basis of fiscal management. Yes, we need to have control of government expenditures. At the same time if government revenues are weak—the minister admitted that today—then they are weak because of the lack of economic growth. Without policies of government aimed at encouraging economic growth we are not going to get a handle on problems of the debt and the deficit. We are certainly not going to get a handle on the problem of high and chronic unemployment.

What we need is something that this government has not only refused to make a commitment to, in fact it has gone in the opposite direction. It is a commitment to economic growth as a priority of government policy for the purpose of dealing with the problems of the debt and the deficit. It is equally important for the need to deal with the lack of jobs for Canadians and all that means in terms of their hopes and confidence for the future.

This is an essential difference between the Conservatives and the Liberals. This is an essential difference between the government and my party because we are committed to operating in a framework of fiscal responsibility, but we want to use it for the purpose of growing the economy to provide better lives for Canadians now and in the future.

As I said earlier, Canadians, especially in the coming months, have to ask themselves: "If the Conservative medicine has been so good then why is the patient still so sick?" I know their common sense and good judgment will tell them that the Conservative medicine has been wrong for Canada because no matter what changes may come in the leadership of the Conservative Party, nothing else will have changed. The content of the package is the same bad medicine that brings sickness rather than health. It brings sickness in an economic and social sense rather than hope and confidence.

Therefore I say this minister has not made a case for the economic policies of his government and they must be rejected along with his government. I am confident that will happen in the next election. It will soon be replaced by a new, effective Liberal government working now and in the future in the interests of all Canadians.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would I be wrong to assume that the hon. member for Essex—Windsor would rather wait until after Question Period to start instead of starting now for one minute? Let us call it eleven o'clock a.m. and proceed with statements by members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, one-third of all the taxes the city of Ottawa received last year came from the Government of Canada.

In their December economic statement the Tories announced that they were freezing these grants in lieu of taxes at 1992 levels. In effect, the Conservative government has unilaterally reduced its own taxes and imposed upon the rest of taxpayers in Ottawa a 5 per cent increase. The Ottawa city council estimates the freeze will cost it about $4.5 million dollars in 1993. Without this money other taxpayers will have to pick up the tab.

This unacceptable decision goes against years of co-operation between municipalities and the federal government. Yesterday we heard that the government might, and I underline might, be able to pay some of the increase it owes municipalities by renegotiating the base.

I urge the government to act like a responsible taxpayer as the rest of us do and—

CANADA CUSTOMS

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, I rise today in support of reports that Canada Customs is planning to institute a new business relationship initiative, or NBR. I applaud the effort to streamline procedures and reduce costs.

I also hope that NBR will bring a new and more practical approach to customs operations at the border. The so-called no hassle policy seems to have suffered a quick and easy death in my riding of Sarnia—Lambton.

A number of our small businesses have been banging on my door to complain that customs seems to take some pleasure in making it more difficult and more costly for them to do business.

This comes at a time when our government is trying to rekindle, support and enhance a small business community that is the life-blood of our economy.

I hope that the department's new business relationship initiative can be revisited. I can assure Revenue Canada of my full co-operation and a little to boot if it stops putting the boots to small business.

TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Madam Speaker, in recent months various letters to the editor and comments from Premier Rae of Ontario and other provincial authorities have all suggested that the federal government has drastically cut transfers to the provinces.

The term drastically cut is very wrong as there have been no cuts, so I wish to place the facts on the table. Since 1984 transfers from the federal government to the provinces have increased at an average of 5.4 per cent, and the average growth of Ontario transfers since 1984 has been 6.2 per cent.

Very rapid growth in transfers occurred in the Canada Assistance Plan area, which includes contributions to social measures such as welfare and community benefits. During Ontario's boom time, Ontario's social needs grew at an average rate of 20 per cent per year. One wonders what policies caused social costs to increase 20 per cent during a boom period.

Of course, during the same period Ontario's spending more than doubled, increasing from $22.5 billion to a budgeted expenditure of $50.9 billion for 1993. Transfer payments to Ontario grew with no restraint from 1984 until 1990 at an average rate of nearly 12 per cent per year—

SAINT-LAURENT

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, Saint-Laurent is celebrating its hundredth anniversary this year. Starting September 26, the centennial committee will offer a souvenir pocket calendar to residents, businesses and industries and sell a passport for the festivities.

In its 100 years the city of Saint-Laurent has become one of the most beautiful in the province and its second-largest industrial city. We have become a culturally rich city, with local theatre, painting and music.

This year the city of Saint-Laurent invites everyone to come and discover us. I wish all the citizens of Saint-Laurent a happy centenary.

• (1105)

The people of St-Laurent have a great deal to celebrate in this our centennial year. I invite everyone to come and discover what I have known about St-Laurent for many years. It is a great place to live and do business. Happy Birthday, St-Laurent.

CREDIT CARD INTEREST RATES

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Madam Speaker, while the announcement by the banks of Canada that they will cut their credit card rates by a single percentage point to 15.75 per cent is encouraging, the total dollar value of credit purchases in Canada continues to rise from one year to another, this in a time of restraint.

As a result of the fact that only 50 per cent of Canadian credit card holders pay off their balances each month the accumulated outstanding debt is almost $11 billion and rising.

This is an unacceptable situation. Surely when the prime lending rate rests at 6 per cent the credit card industry should not be patting itself on the back for lowering its rate. There is still a spread of nearly 10 per cent above prime.

It is still ripping off the Canadian public with these excessive rates. I call upon the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to investigate these high credit card interest rates and start protecting the Canadian public from the credit sharks.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, the total arrogance and contempt for democracy of this government is on display again.

By limiting debate on the substance of North American free trade to only two days the Conservative government is denying the people of northern Canada, and all Canadians, their fundamental right to have their concerns debated in this Parliament.

Northerners want to know how NAFTA will affect them on issues like telecommunications, water exports and local benefits from their resources.

Eighty per cent of my constituents do not have telephones, so who is going to pay to have them installed when U.S. companies cream off all the profit in the telecommunications industry? Water is the life-blood of northern Canada. Yet this agreement leaves our waters as unprotected as a baby in a snowstorm.

NAFTA also restricts the ability of governments to guarantee local benefits from resource development like employment, secondary processing, revenue sharing and preference for local northern business.

NAFTA is bad news for northern Canada and this government will pay a high price for muzzling this debate.

ENTREPRENEURSHIP

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Madam Speaker, I am extremely pleased to tell you about a wonderful initiative of a labour union in my lovely riding of Richmond—Wolfe, in Asbestos to be precise, where the workers have decided to invest $5 million in their own company. This initiative was taken by a union which has set up an investment co-operative.

We can already imagine the fantastic advantages that can flow from such entrepreneurial co-operation. For example, think of the better labour relations between management and the unions, who were usually at odds and now will be co-investors. Also think of the pride and feeling of belonging in the company, where both partners, traditionally on opposite sides, will now work together to produce a better product thanks to the improved relations and identification with the company. Of course we can also mention the effect of all this on the region's economy. What an example they set!

I would like to point out this important contribution from a union and I congratulate my fellow citizens on their investment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, last week when the Minister for International Trade met with provincial ministers one of the items on the agenda was the removal of interprovincial trade barriers. Yet right here in the nation's capital there exists one of the most blatant examples of an interprovincial trade barrier, and it is stifling economic development in this region.

The municipalities on both sides of the river have taken this in hand. They have already agreed not to discriminate in hiring on the basis of place of residence and are taking further measures to eliminate trade barriers with respect to the construction industry. However they need the co-operation of the federal government and both provincial governments to achieve a level playing-field.

I urge the Minister of Finance, if he really wants to remove barriers, to make sure that work on the construction of the new archives in Gatineau is equally available to workers on both sides of the river.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Madam Speaker, supporters of the fixed link are again asking the federal government to comply with the court decision calling for a section 12 determination and proceed with the project.

Supporters not only include business groups but a cross-section of people and organizations such as the labourers union, the federation of agriculture, the carpenters union, and the federation of labour, as well as the Chambers of Commerce of Charlottetown, Summerside and Kensington, the road builders association, the tourism association, the manufacturers association, the construction association, the hotel association, the convention bureau, the restaurant association, the engineers association, the real estate association and on and on.

It is clear that the majority of people on Prince Edward Island want and need the fixed link. I urge the government to forge ahead, meet the conditions of the court decision and proceed with construction.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, Canada can make a difference in the progress of human rights throughout the world. Canada should be taking the lead in ensuring that the World Conference on Human Rights in Vienna this summer is a success. That success can be measured in terms of new concrete action to strengthen the accountability of member states for their commitment to human rights and by expanding United Nations mechanisms which would work to protect women, indigenous peoples, refugees, disabled persons, democracy activists and development workers.

It has been too easy in the past to deny the universality of the human rights charter on the basis of cultural and economic differences. Canada would do well to include a broad cross-section of Canadians, including representatives of non-government human rights organizations, in its delegation to Vienna.

These NGOs have a deep sense of the need for progress in global human rights. Canada can use that kind of wisdom at the table.

THE DEFICIT

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Madam Speaker, recently the Minister for National Defence, who is a leadership candidate for her party, said that not only would she cut the federal deficit but she would balance the books by the end of a first term. The Minister of the Environment weighed in by saying that he would cut the deficit without raising taxes or cutting social programs.

Canadians should be a teeny bit sceptical about the simplistic Tory approach to deficit cutting. The Conservative record speaks for itself. In his first budget the then Minister of Finance, the current Minister for International Trade, said he would reduce the deficit to $18 billion by the end of the decade. Yet in 1990 the deficit was $30.5 billion. He missed the mark by the small sum of $12.5 billion. Of course, the deficit has increased since then.

The Minister of National Defence should not assume that Canadians cannot add. One does not cut the deficit by spending $5.8 billion on attack helicopters.

If Canadians want a realistic approach to deficit reduction they would be well advised to vote Liberal.

OIL AND GAS INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, during the past six months western Canadian oil and gas exploration and development activities have been showing signs of improvement. There have been increases in land sales, in the number of well licences issued, and in the level of drilling activity.

There are a number of reasons for these increases, including the industry's cost reduction initiatives, technology improvements, higher natural gas prices, the governments' efforts to provide a market-oriented environment and a stable, non-discriminatory framework for private sector decision making.

An example of this co-operative approach is the recent announcement made in Devon to support the development of Alberta's oil sands and the heavy oil resources of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

The Canadian industry is benefiting from federal government initiatives such as the flow-through share provisions, the elimination of the restrictions on foreign ownership and the Alberta government royalty change. These initiatives contribute to western Canada's economic growth and job creation and will result in spin-offs for the Canadian manufacturing and service industries.

SEXUAL ABUSE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, members of the government from the Prime Minister on down have made much of their policy of zero tolerance for sexual abuse and sexual assault. Far too often, however, their words do not match their actions.

In an article in today's Ottawa Citizen Transport Canada is reported to be considering granting one year's leave so that a convicted child molester can serve his sentence and then return to his job. What kind of zero tolerance message is that?

Zero tolerance means that those convicted of violence against women, no matter if the woman is 13 or 30, must not be allowed to take advantage of work place policies such as leave of absence. That a convicted abuser could see his job held open for him is unacceptable. What is needed from this government is action, not more pious rhetoric.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Madam Speaker, in 1988 the government approved an expenditure of up to $40 million of Canadian Jobs Strategy funds for youth strategy pilot projects in New Brunswick and Newfoundland, where youth unemployment is the highest.

This morning in Fredericton the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the New Brunswick minister of advanced education and labour jointly announced a one-year $25.45 million extension to the Canada-New Brunswick youth strategy. To date, this strategy has assisted over 17,700 young people in New Brunswick.

I was pleased to learn that this program has been extended for another year. The federal government will provide $16 million, with the province contributing $9.45 million.

The purpose of the strategy is to help at-risk youth integrate into the labour market. It is important that we give young people the opportunity to acquire the education, training and experience needed to find their own place in today's competitive work place.

This Tory government has again put its money where its mouth is.

TAXATION

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, following this week's meeting between the Minister of Public Works and representatives from the Federation of Canadian Municipalities regarding payments of grants in lieu of taxes, the government should accept two important principles. First, the federal government should pay its fair share of municipal taxes as established for its properties.

Second, the government should accept all of the municipalities' reassessment levels for all properties, be they residential, business or government. In doing so the government will not prove to be a burden on other municipal taxpayers.

One of the mayors, Claudette Cain of the city of Gloucester in my riding, pointed out to the minister that her municipality stands to lose nearly $2 million in revenues from federal properties, creating an unfair burden on other taxpayers.

The Conservative government should accept fair market value assessment and pay its fair share of taxes on its properties.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, there are hard times ahead for the New Democratic Party and their friends in the trade union movement. Where are Bob White and Daryl Bean when you need them?

What is happening? Bob Rae is going to roll back Public Service wages. He is not talking about Maurice Strong and $250,000. He is talking about hospital workers, domestics and the like.

Whatever happened to that great socialist philosophy? Where are those people who paraded against central wage freezes? Let us hear them holler: "No rollbacks for Ontario workers".

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the minister of trade I will put my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

The government has a major dilemma on its hands. Today the Mexican ambassador to Canada has said that Mexico will not accept any side deal that imposes environmental or labour standards upon Mexico.

At the same time, the trade representative in the United States says on the other hand there will be no NAFTA unless there are safeguards on the environment and on labour standards. These are two totally opposite, contradictory positions.

I want to ask this question: Where does the Government of Canada stand? Is it on the Mexican side or the American side? Does it have any position at all? Why does it not stop the legislation until it resolves this dilemma?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks where Canada stands on this. Canada stands on the side of sovereignty. We stand on the side of commissions that work and commissions that reach co-operation among the three sides.

What the ambassador said was really quite reasonable. Both ambassadors are essentially saying the same thing. The Mexican ambassador is saying that they do not want commissions that violate sovereignty. The American ambassador agrees with that and so do we.

What we would like to see is progress on the environmental side and progress on the labour standard side without violating sovereignty.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I can understand why this minister decided not to run for the leadership. That was the most foolish answer I have heard in the House of Commons in the last 14 years. He says that on the one hand we have a commission, but on the other hand the commission will do absolutely nothing. You either have a commission that has safeguards which the Americans want or you have a commission with no teeth which is what the Mexicans want.

Where does Canada stand? When is this minister going to smarten up and give Canadians the right and honest answer?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, every year I have been in the House, my hon. friend, stands up and expresses great concern for Canadian sovereignty. This is what he does all the time. Now he is calling for a commission to be established which would not protect Canadian sovereignty.

An hon. member: It would violate it.

Mr. Hockin: It would violate Canadian sovereignty. What we believe in is to find a way, which we have done in many, many other international contexts. The hon. member is very well informed on international contexts. You can have commissions, you can have supernational bodies that do not violate sovereignty and that is what we are after. We are after co-operation and we are after progress.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, this answer comes from a representative of the government that has had a fundamental policy of giving up Canadian sovereignty day in and day out for the last eight and a half years.

I want to ask the minister again, what is the Canadian position? Are we asking for a commission that will have the ability to enforce some real safeguards on the environment and labour so Canadian industry will not run out of this country and seek an arena where it does not have to live up to basic fundamental laws, or are we going to side with the Americans and say we need decent safeguards?

I ask the minister, for goodness sake, for the sake of some basics fundamentals of parliamentary democracy will the government stop this legislation, hold it up until this fundamental impasse can be resolved?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is trying to create an image of fundamental impasse. In fact there is no fundamental impasse. What we have is all three countries with their own laws on these subjects, environmental protection, labour codes, and so on.

We are trying to encourage all countries when they trade with each other in the new NAFTA—I am glad the hon. member likes the over-all content of the NAFTA; that is an impressive step forward from his point of view—to move forward together without violating sovereignty.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, over the past few years we have seen an unprecedented level of U.S. trade harassment of Canadian producers; automobiles, steel, pork, softwood, magnesium, and the list goes on.

This is poisoning the investment climate in Canada. The problem is this. The United States is not going to sign a new trade deal without having side agreements on the environment and labour standards. Why will Canada not stand up for its workers and industries and insist on a side agreement dealing with the definition of subsidies?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend expresses concern in the premise to his question about investment in Canada and about trade disputes.

First of all investment in Canada is running at a record pace. In 1988 with a $2.5 billion deficit in investment in Canada more Canadians were investing outside Canada than people were here. We had a surplus at the end of 1991 of over $4.3 billion, a tremendous turnaround in investment, a $7 billion turnaround.

When it comes to harassment all we read in the newspapers is the tip of the iceberg, only when we have disputes with the United States. Before we had dispute settlement mechanisms with the United States we were left to the whim of the U.S. protectionist operations in Washington. We would spend millions of dollars and get nowhere. Now we have binational panels that settle within 315 days and we have won more often than we have lost.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, the facts are very clear. Over the last four years Canada has lost 16 per cent of its manufacturing jobs. The United States has lost only 6 per cent of its manufacturing jobs. Where are our jobs going?

If this minister thinks his dispute settlement mechanisms are working so well why did Robert Milbourne, the president and chief executive officer of Stelco, just say that Canada's steel industry is toast unless this government can end U.S. trade harassment of our steel industry.

Why will this government not use its power to sit down with the Americans and Mexicans and insist on a side deal that will end the trade harassment of Canada's steel industry?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the facts are these on the steel side. Both countries have had tremendous decreases in steel production, Canada as well as the United States. Canada's share of the U.S. market since the trade agreement has grown.

Even with that we have argued we would like to see if we could have a separate binational agreement on steel.

I would like to thank my hon. friend for asking this question because the Minister for International Trade will be meeting with the U.S. trade representative, Mickey Kantor, on April 1 and the steel issue will be raised at that meeting because we are working to obtain a steel pact with the United States.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, coincidentally my question is on the same line of questioning vis-à-vis the United States and subsidies disputes. The United States has just confirmed it is allocating $1 billion this year to its export enhancement program that permits the government of the United States to pay subsidies to grain sales offshore by the United States. Not once has the Canadian government raised this and demanded a panel under the much vaunted FTA.

I ask the minister concerned: When will this government which boasts about this trade turnaround stand up and demand that the Americans stop their program of export enhancement, unfair competition and offshore sales of wheat and other grain products here from Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows because he is informed on trade matters that disciplines in agriculture have not been put in place appropriately under GATT. We have made some progress under the FTA but nobody believes that total discipline is in place on all ranges of agriculture, especially grain export subsidization.

What he is now saying, which is really news, is he wants us to use the dispute settlement mechanism panels for this. Now he likes the free trade agreement and likes the dispute settlement mechanism panels.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, as the hon. minister knows he is mixing oranges with wheat, not apples.

The minister wants to retreat to GATT when he tries to defend the fact that there are no teeth in the agreement between Canada and the United States known as the FTA to protect the farmers from massive American subsidies. There is no protection there whatsoever.

I want to address the minister directly. He knows that under NAFTA they will be dismantling the minimal protection this government boasts about provided to the farmers under section 701(4) of the free trade agreement. As a matter of fact it will weaken what they boast about, those so much vaunted panels.

Why is this government not standing up for Canadian farmers? Why is it accepting a weakened article 701 in NAFTA and not saying a word in defence of those grain farmers in the Canadian west?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I have to ask my hon. friend, why are our exports in the wheat area up 30 per cent to the United States? I have to ask my hon. friend, has he read the results of the durum wheat panel that was dealt with by a binational panel with the United States? Is my hon. friend aware of what this government has done for agriculture in the last eight years, billions and billions of dollars a year?

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question to the minister deals with another area of agriculture production, the asparagus industry in Ontario which has been almost destroyed by free trade according to this letter it wrote to the Minister of Agriculture just this month. In fact the chairman of the industry also told me today that he cannot see why we are pressing ahead with NAFTA when the problems like theirs with free trade have been ignored.

Will this government meet urgently with the asparagus industry to work out solid answers to these farmers' problems, especially since asparagus has been one of the substitute crops for tobacco which is considered to be such a dangerous crop to produce in this country? Help the asparagus farmers in southern Ontario. They come from your district.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, to the hon. member, the federal government has always worked with producers of all of the various commodities and special crops such as asparagus. We will continue to do that and consultation will take place with the producers of asparagus and other crops, as I have said before.

Everybody seems to think that the North American free trade agreement is the answer to everything. A GATT agreement is very important as well. One piece of legislation cannot deal with all problems.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cardiff: We have been very successful with many of our trade disputes with the United States through the panel. We solved the pork issue. We have won most of the assessments that have been put against us. I think we should take credit for that and be very proud of all the negotiations that have taken place and how this government has responded to the needs of farmers.

HELICOPTER PROGRAM

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): My question, Madam Speaker, is for the Minister of Finance. Circumstances have changed dramatically in the world, both in terms of finances and in terms of security since the decision was taken to purchase the EH-101 helicopter.

In view of the dramatic change in circumstances, is the Minister of Finance now personally committed to the continuation of that decision? Is he now personally committed to the purchase of the EH-101 helicopter?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, I want to ask the minister a question in view of that answer and in view of the fact that he wants to send a signal to the world that Canada's finances are sound and that international investments are secure. In view of the ballooning federal deficit, how does he justify the signal that is sent to the international community by the purchase of EH-101 helicopters at a cost of $5.8 billion?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, first, the cost is $4.4 billion over 13 years or 14 years. We want to send a signal to the world that we are prepared to patrol our coastal waters, to enforce the laws of Canada, to protect our sovereignty, to engage in effective search and rescue, and to engage in peacekeeping missions.

Yes, there is a price we have to pay to be a part of it. We have to pay to defend our own security. If we are to have an armed forces of capable and reliable men and women we need capable and reliable equipment for these men and women to use.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday the Minister of National Defence said there were ways of cutting defence expenditures other than cancelling the EH-101 helicopter program. Would the minister share with the House where these cuts will be made?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I certainly will when I bring down my budget. I obviously will not get any advice from the members opposite.

They want to put our men and women out servicing Canada's needs in 35-year old helicopters. I think that is a disgrace, particularly coming from that hon. member. He should know better. I am sure we will not see him driving around in a 35-year old automobile.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister who talks about advice. If we are going to talk about advice I think we should be balanced on it.

As early as three years ago the same committee that the government quotes in support of the EH-101 program had problems specifically with that program. I am going to quote from the same area that the government uses in support: "The committee views with concern the delays in the new shipboard aircraft project caused by technical problems during the development phase in Europe and difficulties in assembling the consortium".

These problems still exist; in fact they have been exacerbated. In view of that does the minister still consider that government priorities are in this area?

Mr. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member pointed out the committee was concerned, as was the government, in bringing it together but as he knows the consortium did come together and we agree with the unanimous recommendation of that committee to proceed with the EH-101.

I thought the hon. member would take some comfort from the fact that the Dutch have just announced they are looking at the EH-101 for their frigates.

TRADE

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, on March 12 the minister for privatization and Tory rhetoric in reply to my question on water exports and free trade confirmed that article 401 of the North American free trade agreement applied to water. I could not believe my ears.

I had to go back and read Hansard, and this is what it said: "In this section water means natural surface water and ground water and liquid in gaseous and solid state".

I would like to ask whoever is going to answer for the minister whether the minister would agree that the inclusion of water under article 401 as a good or a commodity of trade, as was confirmed by the minister for privatization, places the export of Canada's fresh waters under the remaining provisions of the North American free trade agreement, and the FTA for that matter, even though water may not be explicitly mentioned in these other provisions?

• (1135)

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I believe the hon. member is mistaken in quoting what a colleague on this side had said. I will be very slow and very cautious so that he cannot do that again.

Water in its natural state is not a product or a good capable of being traded. Any more than the trees in the ground or the oil in the sub-surface, water in its natural state is not covered under international trade agreements such as NAFTA. It cannot be covered under international trade agreements because it is not a good and cannot therefore be traded.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, the minister has just refuted his colleague's comments of March 12.

This government continues to hide behind the argument that Canada's water policy and the implementing legislation for free trade in fact excludes water. That is what this minister is referring to.

This government knows full well, first, that the water policy is a paper tiger and, second, that international agreements such as the FTA and NAFTA supersede domestic legislation.

I want to ask this government: When are you guys going to come clean and stop lying to the Canadian people?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member uses words that would not be accepted in most cases but I understand why. It is because his argument is so weak. Water is not a good. Water cannot be traded and just article 7 would maybe give the member some comfort. It says: "For greater certainty nothing in this act or agreement, except article 302 of this agreement, applies to water".

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKnight: Let my tell the hon. member what article 302 is.

Mr. MacWilliam: You said article 401.

Mr. McKnight: Let the record show that I said 302. Now the member knows that water in that article is bottled water. In my riding and in my province the member for Yorkton—Melville supports the export of bottled water because there is an active, very viable commercial opportunity throughout Canada in bottled water sales.

Mr. MacWilliam: You are lying.

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, privilege. The hon. member said that I was lying. That is not acceptable language.

Some hon. members: Withdraw.

Mr. Andre: Nystrom, get him to withdraw.

Mr. Benjamin: After Question Period.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Such accusations have no place in the House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would like the hon. member to withdraw now, please.

Mr. MacWilliam: Madam Speaker, the comment I just made in reference to this government will be withdrawn.

Mr. Gauthier: Just withdraw it.

Mr. MacWilliam: I understand that this government, in fact most members of this government, may not have read those very provisions. If one is not—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will please withdraw his comment unconditionally and now.

Mr. MacWilliam: Madam Speaker, I just did withdraw the comments. I said that it may be simply a misunderstanding.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Thank you. Withdrawn.

STUDENT LOANS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Young men and women with no jobs and therefore unable to pay their student loans are being harassed at this very time by collection agencies that are trying to renew their contracts. They are being harassed at home, in the work place, at social events, at all times of the day. Why is the government refusing to step in and help these young Canadians in their time of need?

• (1140)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, that is precisely what we are trying to do and that is precisely what the Secretary of State is trying to do in working out a new arrangement with the lending institutions.

The hon. member is quite right. There have been abnormally high levels of student loans that have been in arrears. In large part it is caused by the arrangements currently in place with the financial institutions.

It is with that in mind that we are trying to change the system. There have been proposals that have been presented to the minister. She is currently examining those. I can assure the hon. member that we will take his representation into consideration.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Part of the problem is that there are no jobs. They cannot pay them back when they have no money.

[Translation]

One constituent in my riding, a young mother with three children, can't pay back her student loan because she couldn't get a job. She might lose her child tax credit, because she was told she could lose it as well as her income tax refund. Meanwhile, she is being harassed by a collection agency. Why does the government allow this unfair harassment of a woman and her family?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I genuinely appreciate the hon. member's emotion attached to this question. It is a serious question and I want to treat it in a serious fashion.

He should realize there is a provision under the current arrangement and there will be a provision under the future arrangement. Where there are difficulties experienced by a student there are provisions for that to be taken into account. The necessary flexibility and accommodation to help students in that regard are clearly defined there.

I would ask the hon. member to look at that to see whether those provisions would be helpful.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Members of the post-secondary education community, in particular the National Advisory Group on Student Financial Assistance, were kept in the dark regarding the government proposals outlined in the request for financing the Canada Student Loans Program.

Why has the minister not consulted with them? As well, will the minister give his assurance in the House today that he will call on, consult with, listen to and implement the recommendations of the student representatives on this issue?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I indicated in the House yesterday, the former minister did consult with not only the Canadian Federation of Students but also the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada and outlined in a general way what was being proposed.

I am sure the hon. member recognizes, because of the commercial nature of these particular negotiations, one has to take that into consideration but I have been assured by the current minister that she will take representations into consideration.

What we are trying to do is improve the system. His colleague just indicated there were some deficiencies in the system. What we are trying to do is improve the system so that students will have access at reasonable cost and at reasonable cost to the taxpayer.

[Translation]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to know what steps the minister intends to take to ensure that the banks do not reject physically handicaped people or who, because of their age, would be less likely to find a job. What does the minister intend to do to ensure that Canadian students are treated fairly?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think I answered that question. That is currently what the minister is trying to do.

She has asked for proposals. The proposals are in. They are currently being re-evaluated. Our goal is to try to ensure there is adequate access for student loans to the students at a reasonable cost, fair and equitable access at a reasonable return, a fair return to the financial leading institutions with a certain amount of necessary accountability for service in those accounts, and at reasonable cost to the taxpayer.

• (1145)

I assure the hon. member that we take this issue as seriously as he poses the question.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

An essential part of the transportation network in Atlantic Canada is the fixed link, not only as a transportation link, but as a competitiveness tool for Atlantic Canada. The federal government has always consistently supported the fixed link project.

Is the federal government still totally committed to the project and will it take the appropriate measures to meet the two requirements outlined in the recent court case and proceed with the project?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, yes, the government has been committed to this project and is committed to the project. I so indicated in the December statement. Nothing has changed, except the fact that we do have a decision of the Federal Court which has to be taken into consideration.

That is what the Minister of Public Works is currently doing, to see if there is a way in which this project can go ahead. However, I remind the hon. member that the Federal Court decision has to clearly be taken into consideration and dealt with in an appropriate fashion.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of energy.

Recent statements have alluded to the economic viability of the oil and gas industry in western Canada. The recent signing of the Hibernia agreements with Murphy Oil and the federal government will prove vital to the Atlantic provinces' state of economic stability in the energy sector.

Can the minister advise this House of the current situation in western Canada and what the government's expectations are for the future prosperity of this industry?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member recognizes the importance of the industry in western Canada and in Canada and he is accurate in his assumptions on Hibernia.

I can inform the hon. member that activity, including bids for leases, has increased in the sedimentary basin in western Canada. I should also inform him the number of licensed wells has doubled, I believe, to 1,780 from 780 last year. I should also inform him that the increase in activity by rigs has increased 60 per cent this year over last year.

The reinvestment from cash flow will be over $5 billion this year. That is almost a 5 per cent increase in reinvestment over last year, but it is in the historic trend. Therefore, there is increased economic activity.

It is a good sign for the oil-producing part of western Canada. It is a good sign for Canada. The provincial governments and the Government of Canada should be complimented, along with the industry for the faith they have shown and the actions they have taken together to cause this increased activity.

WESTERN GRAIN TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, recently the Deputy Prime Minister made an announcement that his government was going to introduce enabling legislation to allow it to make any changes it wanted to the Crow benefit without further consultation with this House.

I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister when such legislation is going to be introduced. More important, why is he introducing enabling legislation? Why not a bill, a more substantive bill, that outlines exactly what his government plans to do with the Crow benefit?

It would be nice to have an opportunity to have a real discussion on an issue for a change around here.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's assertion is totally inaccurate and grossly misrepresented.

The Minister of Agriculture responded to those questions and he is attempting to seek out a national solution involving all parties having an interest in this subject. That consultation process is ongoing and will continue.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, it was this minister who indicated in a news release that the government was going to introduce enabling legislation to make changes to the Crow benefit. As far as complication is concerned, the Crow is already in an unhealthy state. It has been made that way by the wounds inflicted upon it by a lame duck government in its death throes. Now the government wants members of this House to give it the right to declare open season on what is left of the Crow benefit and all that without any real consultation with the producers in western Canada or with this House.

Why does the minister not show some real courage, show some real guts and have some real consultation with the people of western Canada? Make it an issue in the election and let the people decide then.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in order to set the record straight, this is exactly what was said in the backgrounder on the Western Grain Transportation Act:

• (1150)

"With respect to the method of payment of the Crow benefit under the Western Grain Transportation Act, ministers agreed to continue the present process aimed at finding a national solution through a whole farm income approach of the Net Income Stabilization Act type. That involves all producers in all regions of the country and will involve all governments".

That process has been ongoing, headed by the Minister of Agriculture, and that will continue.

GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

In 1984 the present Prime Minister said that political appointments by a Prime Minister who was on the verge of leaving public office were wrong and that "Canadians should not be made to pay the price".

How then can the Deputy Prime Minister on behalf of the government in good conscience have appointed the Tory election chair of Alberta and the vice-president of the Conservative Party for the prairies a full month after the Prime Minister announced his resignation? Why did the government change its mind and betray the confidence of the people of Canada?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Is it not strange, Madam Speaker, that the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott— Russell did not get up last week and complain about Mr. Jean-Claude Rivest, a Liberal who was appointed to the Senate last week. I did not hear the hon. member get up and complain.

The Senate exists. He knows that the Prime Minister and indeed everybody in this House campaigned vigorously for an elected Senate. That, in fact, did not come about. The Senate is there, it exists.

The hon. member should show his appreciation of the fact that these last four appointments in particular, but all of those previous to that as well, are outstanding Canadians. They will do an outstanding job.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, the minister just does not get it. The Minister of National Defence yesterday was reported as saying that the Prime Minister should not fill Senate seats before the next election. For once we agree with the Minister of National Defence, not with the minister across the way.

Why then, does the Deputy Prime Minister not take the advice of the Minister of National Defence? Why does he not stand in this place now and announce that there will be no further appointments?

You, sir, have the option.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, just to set the record straight, which one often has to do after that member speaks, the Minister of National Defence said yesterday and I quote: "The Senate is a reality; you have to deal with it". That is what the Prime Minister did. He appointed two outstanding Canadians.

I can assure you that none of his appointments will be running around with kazoos and cowbells and generally behaving the way some of the hon. member's friends in the other chamber have behaved.

VIETNAM

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Madam Speaker, in light of well-documented cases of human rights abuses that have been perpetrated by the communist government in Vietnam, I would like to ask the minister of external affairs if she is aware of the fact that two Canadians and 14 American citizens are being held incommunicado by the Vietnamese government on what may or may not be legitimate charges.

I would like to know what steps the minister has taken with the Vietnamese government to assure the security of the two Canadians held there.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am aware of the case involving the two Canadians and the others. They are allegedly being detained in Vietnam. We do not have the details. Our consular officials have approached the Vietnamese government to say that we expect that their human rights will be looked after, that we will have full access to them as consular assistance is required, and that they will have full human rights in terms of what is to follow.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Madam Speaker, the families of these individuals in Canada must know what is happening to their loved ones. I am asking the minister what immediate steps she will take to ensure the safe return of these Canadian citizens.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we do no yet know what charges have been laid against these Canadians. We have been in touch with the Vietnamese authorities. We are doing everything we can and we will be in touch with the families.

PEACEKEEPING

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

On Wednesday two peacekeepers were wounded in Bosnia and yesterday a second Canadian peacekeeper was killed. I would like to express on behalf of all members our deep sympathy to the family of Master Corporal John Ternapolski.

• (1155)

I would like to ask the minister if she can explain the circumstances of Corporal Ternapolski's death.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I want to, on behalf of our government also join with the hon. member in expressing our sympathy to the family.

An investigation is underway in the department of defence. We do not have a great many details yet, but it looks as though it was a simple case of an accident with the vehicle. There were three people in the vehicle; two were unharmed and unfortunately, the corporal was killed. There did not appear to be hostilities in the region. The Department of National Defence will do a full investigation. I have asked for a complete report as soon as possible.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, a supplementary to the same minister.

The UN commission to investigate war crimes in Bosnia and Croatia cannot operate with "absolute peanuts", according to Canadian Commissioner Commander William Fenrick.

What efforts is Canada making and what is the minister doing to assure that this commission has adequate funds to do its important job?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, first of all, we did offer the services of Commander Fenrick, so we are already providing some of the human resources that are required for the war crimes tribunal. We will be urging other countries to make resources available. We will also look at what will be required as this idea moves forward.

This was essentially a Canadian initiative as we raised it in London and then again in Stockholm in December. I am very pleased that the United Nations has now taken up the cause of this war crimes prosecution that I think we should follow in the future.

We will be urging the United Nations to adopt the kind of rules that are required and we will urge member nations and the UN to put the resources that are necessary into this. We are already putting our own resources into it by providing some of the people required and by helping to sponsor the conference in Vancouver.

EXTERNAL AID

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Some time ago the minister stated publicly that there would be an opportunity for Canadians to get involved in the debate on a shift in foreign aid from humanitarian aid to Third World countries to a more economic aid package to the emerging countries in eastern Europe and Russia.

In view of the pending budget which might freeze things in stone and not give an opportunity for that debate, what forum is the minister going to provide for a lot of interested Canadians to have their views made known?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, there are a couple of levels of discussion going on.

At the moment, we are looking at our over-all aid package from a number of points of view. First of all there is more aid today than there was in 1984. On balance, aid has increased. There have been some cuts as a result of earlier budgets. We are looking specifically within the framework we have today, "Sharing Our Future", on how that aid will be dispersed. We are also examining not just the changes in central and eastern Europe, but whether our aid to Third World countries should have some changes made to it.

The fundamental issue is that there are some success stories in aid. Some Latin American countries, for example, that used to be aid recipients now are more trading partners. We are looking at that kind of issue in terms of how to focus our aid program a little better in current times.

My colleague, the Minister for External Relations, and I are working closely on all aspects of our aid program. We will be appearing before committee. There will be the normal consultations with the NGO community and others once we have approved the document.

TRADE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Earlier in Question Period the Deputy Prime Minister will recall his colleague made reference to the fact that the Minister for International Trade, on April 1, will be making arrangements with U.S. officials with regard to a steel pact.

• (1200)

The Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance comes from a region of the country where he understands or ought to understand the importance of subsidies and the role they play in the Canadian economy.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister on behalf of the Government of Canada: Why is the government, and in particular the Minister for International Trade, so grossly negligent in not negotiating a comprehensive plan or package with regard to a subsidies code? Why are they not pursuing that track in their negotiations with the U.S. counterparts?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, this is one of the oldest questions that can possibly be asked in the House. This has been asked for six months and the answer is the same.

A very good subsidies code has been negotiated through GATT. We support what has been put together there. We are hopeful that the Americans and the Mexicans will support it.

MULTICULTURALISM

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship who knows that in November 1990 the Prime Minister announced that he would be making a formal apology in the House of Commons to Canadians of Chinese origin in connection with the head tax and the Exclusion Act, and to Canadians of Ukrainian origin and of Italian origin in connection with their wartime internment. At the same time he asked the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship to finalize the details.

Can the minister assure the House that he will have finalized all the details in connection with that apology well before the Prime Minister leaves office on July 1?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, indeed I can assure the member that after a very intensive and thorough consultation which I carried on with individuals and community representatives of the affected communities I did issue a report. I provided a full report which the government is now considering. I hope too that the matter can be resolved at a very early date.

One of the people I met who does not always support this political formation told me he thought it was essential that something happen now, in this current mandate. A result was the very positive response we were able to give, and justly so, to Canadians of Japanese origin. I know the Prime Minister has been very clear on what he would like to do. I am certainly looking forward to being able to participate in that.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 10 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

PROTECTION FOR UNBORN CHILD

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I wish to present a petition signed by a number of residents of Pembroke and Petawawa, areas that have much in common, who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass legislation to protect the unborn child.

[English]

IMMIGRATION ACT

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I have three petitions to present on different subjects. One is a petition from a number of Chinese Canadians in my riding of Vancouver East.

It concerns the impact of the Immigration Act, Bill C–86, and particularly the provisions that allow decisions to be made retroactively. The petitioners urge the government to withdraw these amendments.

• (1205)

FREE TRADE

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my second petition concerns NAFTA. The petitioners say that the proposed NAFTA has resulted in even greater trade concessions being demanded of Canada. They say that more jobs will be lost and there will be further restrictions on our government's ability to be effective. Also the North American trade deal cannot be remedied through renegotiation.

The petitioners call on the House to reject the NAFTA.

CHINESE CANADIANS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): My final petition, Madam Speaker, is a lengthy one so I will just refer to certain sections of it, if my colleagues will allow me to do so.

It is from a great number of Vancouver residents, particularly residents of the Chinese community. It concerns the very unjust and racist law that established the Chinese head tax and was followed by the exclusion act under which people had to pay $100 to come to Canada because they were Chinese. This had a tremendous impact, and to this day has an impact, on the Chinese community.

The petitioners call upon the Canadian government to support an all-party resolution that would acknowledge this injustice, including redress for the payers of the head tax and the community.

FREE TRADE

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 36, it is my honour and pleasure to present a petition from a number of residents of Etobicoke, Burlington, Oakville, Hamilton, Milton, Stoney Creek, Woodbridge, Dundas and Scotland, Ontario.

All these people wish to draw to the attention of the House that the North American free trade agreement has brought about even greater trade concessions by Canada or demanded of Canada, to our disadvantage, which will cause more loss of good jobs and will hinder the Canadian government from protecting our environment and conserving Canadian natural resources.

The petitioners also point out that it cannot be remedied through renegotiation and that there is an election coming, due before January 1, on which date the North American free trade agreement is scheduled to come into force. Therefore they now call on this House to reject the North American free trade agreement and recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I too have a series of petitions from various parts of southern Ontario concerning the North American free trade agreement.

The people who have sent these petitions to us are all deeply concerned about the fact that this agreement will cause Canadians to lose more jobs and that it will result in further restrictions on the ability of our governments now and in the future to assist Canadian industry, conserve Canadian natural resources and advance needed social programs.

The people are convinced that this agreement cannot be remedied through renegotiation. They call upon the House to reject the proposed NAFTA accord and to recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise with duty and with pleasure to present a petition to this House from a number of residents in southern Saskatchewan.

The petitioners say that the undersigned residents of Canada draw to the attention of the House the following. The proposed North American free trade agreement has resulted in even greater trade concessions being demanded of Canada. This agreement will cause Canadians to lose more jobs. If implemented this trade agreement will result in further restrictions being placed on the ability of Canada's federal, provincial and territorial governments now and in the future from assisting Canadian industry, conserving Canadian natural resources for Canadian benefit and advancing needed social programs. The North American free trade agreement cannot be remedied through renegotiation. Canada's Constitution requires a general election before January 1, 1994, the date on which the North American free trade agreement is scheduled to come into force.

Therefore they call upon this House to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and to recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, question No. 451 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 451—Mr. MacWilliam:

With respect to the RCMP, (a) were any measures taken to promote attitudinal and behavioural change among male officers toward women, specifically with respect to issues of sexual harassment, gender inequities and violence against women and, if so, what are they (b) have any affirmative action programs been implemented and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): (a) The community policing branch of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) recently published and distributed a family violence pamphlet relative to spousal assault. This pamphlet was designed to educate the general public as well as employees of the force to the issue of assaults against women in abusive relationships. It also provides a brief history of the problem and an outline of current laws designed to help and protect victims. It goes on to provide advice to victims as well as advice to anyone who might know a victim of spousal assault.

All contract divisions of the RCMP are at various stages of setting up police based victims services units usually staffed by a full time supervisor and volunteers from the community. These units provide assistance to all victims of crime, including women, and aid in the recovery from victimization related to criminal activity. These units also provide a listening ear and referrals to existing community services. After referral, a follow-up contact is made to ensure that sufficient and appropriate service has been provided. Where a community or court based victims' unit exists instead of a police based one, our detachments co-operate with these units by making referrals. Presently the force has approximately 100 police based units in existence with others coming on stream in the near future.

As part of its policing responsibilities, the RCMP has provided family violence training to its members since the early 1970s. Courses have been offered at the basic recruit level as well as at the regional in-service level.

Although no specific family violence course exists, many of the subjects related to family violence, such as sexual assaults, child abuse, and spousal assaults, have been taught as components of courses presented at both levels. In particular, the issue of sexual haraasment has been addressed in sessions of the Canadian Human Rights Act.

In addition, members of the force have participated in regional, inter-agency family violence workshops. Since 1988, 5,271 members have received training through this method.

The RCMP is participating in the federal family violence initiative, 91-95. Under this initiative our training programs have been reviewed in order to develop more comprehensive and innovative approaches to training in this area. Course development will address cultural and gender sensitivity issues.

As part of the interdepartmental response to incidents of family violence, the RCMP has promoted and conducted regional, inter-agency family violence workshops and will continue to do so throughout this initiative.

Upcoming activities include the development of scenarios for designing enhanced lecture materials, simulation training sessions and computer based, interactive training programs. These programs will reflect the force's commitment to providing policing services that are sensitive and responsive to the needs of victims and to Canada's diverse population generally.

In order to inform our membership of the RCMP's commitment toward cultural diversity and the law prohibiting discrimination on any ground, regardless of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion and gender, the RCMP has recently distributed a brochure to all members entitled "Policing in Canada, RCMP Principles and Commitments to Diversity". The booklet is also available to the general public.

An employment equity unit was established within the staffing and personnel branch of the RCMP in 1991. Two analyst positions were created for overseeing this function.

As a result of a joint review between the RCMP and the Canadian Human Rights Commission, the development of an employment equity policy, currently being edited for publication and ultimate distribution, states:

> The RCMP shall strive to change attitudes and behavioural patterns that have an adverse effect on the employment, career progression and attrition of members of designated groups.
> The RCMP shall implement special measures as outlined above to prevent, eliminate or redress disadvantages that hinder the representation of designated groups.
> The RCMP shall attempt to change behaviour that adversely affects participation of members of designated groups.

Under our human resource management plan for strategic issues, the following projects are in the works:

> Develop a strategy which will encourage or require force personnel at all levels to ensure that committees, working groups, specialized teams/sections, consultation groups, et cetera, have representative consideration for women and other target groups.

Develop communications to force membership which is conducive to the promotion of harmony and understanding of issues relative to managing the value of diversity within the force's membership.

Develop a strategy that will encourage appropriate and uniform discipline to founded complaints against force employees where prejudice, discrimination, racism or harassment is involved.

A sensitization video entitled "Strength in Diversity" was produced to help RCMP employees deal more effectively with designated group members, including women. The video illustrates physical and attitudinal barriers that may be experienced by these employees and suggests ways in which these obstacles may be eliminated. The video was distributed to over 700 RCMP detachments.

International Women's Week, which is held annually to reflect the progress made to advance women's equality, is promoted throughout the RCMP. Information is made available and presentations are given to employees on topics such as self-defense, sexual harassment and violence against women.

All senior managers were provided with copies of "Beneath the Veneer", the report of the task force on barriers to women in the Public Service. In addition the summary of the report was made available to line managers and employees through the RCMP newsletter. All levels of management have been encourged to take positive action to implement the task force recommendations.

Departmental harassment policies for both Public Service employees and RCMP members have recently been strengthened to better inform employees and investigative bodies of the guidelines that apply, should harassment occur in the work place. Both policies will be published in the very near future.

An employment equity program has been in place for the Public Service component of the RCMP since 1983. The recruitment, promotion and retention of women are monitored regularly. To ensure that women have opportunities to enhance their careers and broaden their experience, a number of initiatives and policies have been implemented, for example a career advancement course for women, an assignments for career enhancement program and a part-time employment policy.

(b) Over and above the aforementioned response to question (a) the RCMP is in the process of forming focus groups in the divisions to set up a networking system for female members.

In a continuing attempt to reduce imbalances and the under-representation of women within the RCMP, two special programs were sanctioned in 1988 and 1992. Under these initiatives 17 females members will have been promoted to the rank of corporal for instructor positions at the RCMP training academy by the end of 1993: 8 were processed from 1988 to 1991 and an additional 9 will be processed in 1993.

Mr. Langlois: I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question as enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary has been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1993-94

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-117, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1993, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, we have a situation in front of the House of Commons today which is shameful and unacceptable. We have a government asking this House for permission to borrow over $31 billion on behalf of the people of Canada despite the fact that this government has not presented to the House of Commons a budget for this fiscal year that is coming up.

The minister has suggested in his comments this morning that what he is asking for is permission to borrow based on his economic statement of December 1992. In fact he has already put through a borrowing authority bill based on that particular economic statement which passed in this House just a month and a half ago.

There is absolutely no justification that we can see for a government to come before the House of Commons and present a demand to the House of Commons that it be given carte blanche to go out and borrow over $31 billion without telling the people of Canada why that money is necessary, or without giving them any sense of the fiscal parameters within which that borrowing will take place. It has done so without giving to the people of Canada any sense of what kinds of policy directions the government will take to try to deal with the massive unemployment problems we have in this country, to try to deal with what some people have called a debt crisis in this country, or to try to deal with problems of poverty in this country that are getting seriously worse. We have no suggestion from the government as to how it will proceed to put in order the finances of this country.

Let me go back to the budget of February 1992. This is a budget that was presented by this same minister to the House of Commons, the same House of Commons, less than 14 months ago. It was presented on February 25, 1992, 13 months ago almost to the day.

Let me remind the House what was suggested within that budget from 1992. It suggested first that the deficit for 1993–94, that is this coming fiscal year for which this borrowing authority is put before us, would be a deficit, and I quote from page 71 of the budget from last year, of $22.5 billion. That would be the deficit. The financial requirements that this government would need according to this budget presented just 13 months ago were $13.3 billion. Yet today the minister is bringing before us a borrowing authority for over $31 billion.

How can any member of this House of Commons react with any sense of responsibility to an outlandish demand for authority to borrow $31 billion when just 13 months ago this same minister was telling us he was only going to need to borrow $13.3 billion? How is it possible for anybody in the country to believe what this minister is telling us today?

Clearly there have been things that have changed but we do not know what those things are. We do not know what the government's projections are for 1993–94 because we have not received a budget yet for 1993–94 despite the fact this government promised it faithfully.

Michael Wilson was the finance minister of this country. He was somebody who—whatever criticisms I have made of him—at least knew something about economics and the market in this country. At that point the government promised there would be a budget presented each February so that provincial governments, private businesses, households and all of us as members of Parliament would have some sense of where we were heading and what the government saw in the future.

However, now we have a Minister of Finance who does not understand economics, does not understand the needs of the marketplace, does not understand the concerns of Canadians across the country with respect to the debt problems we face and does not understand the concerns of provinces and we do not have a budget.

It is almost the end of March. April 1 is next week and there is no budget. We are told there will not be a budget until April 21. Yet the government asks us: "Despite the fact we have not given you a budget, write us a blank cheque for more than $31 billion and a month from now we will let you know what it is for. A month from now we will let you know what the situation will be financially in Canada during the year for which we will already have received the authority to borrow this more than $31 billion". It is absolutely and totally irresponsible.

This government talks about fiscal responsibility. It talks a good fight. Right from the day it was elected in 1984 it said it was going to deal with the deficit and the financial problems facing this country.

Well, those problems are worse in 1993 than they were in 1984 because we now face a situation where we have a government presenting demands for borrowing authorities without even presenting a budget to us.

• (1220)

I do not see how anybody in this House of Commons who believes in financial responsibility could vote for a borrowing authority under these circumstances. I say this to the backbenchers of the Conservative Party: If hon. members in the Conservative Party expect to go out into an election later this year and to run in their various constituencies on the fact that they have tried to get the finances of Canada in order, how can they possibly do it when they passed a borrowing authority for over $31 billion without even having a budget to go with that borrowing authority?

I warn those members that the people of Canada will not buy that kind of irresponsibility. The people of Canada are not prepared to give away blank cheques any more. They want to know what is happening. They want to know why it is happening and this government is not giving any answers at this stage whatsoever.

The minister talked in his comments about a number of other points. I want to deal with some of those points. As I say, I think the major problem with the minister's presentation was his failure to offer any satisfactory justification for getting the right to borrow more than $31 billion without a budget.

He also talked about the federal government being prepared to offer leadership in dealing with the debt problems of this country. The fact is that there have been requests from provincial governments across this country for a First Ministers' meeting on debt in Canada and this government has refused those requests. This government has refused requests coming from provinces that are hard pressed and hard hit financially and need to have a first ministers' meeting on debt. This government has said no.

Again, the people of Canada must not accept that this government really seriously cares about debt. It is willing to play politics with debt but it will not come out and try to deal with the problem seriously in a first ministers' meeting.

This government suggested that its record was superb on dealing with debt and the deficit. In that case how can it explain one of the conclusions from the C. D. Howe Institute this past February when it held its now famous workshop on avoiding a crisis? These were the proceedings of a workshop on Canada's fiscal outlook. The workshop brought together some of the foremost authorities on debt and fiscal management in this country. How can it explain that one of the strongest criticisms made in the report of the proceedings of that workshop indicated that the workshop was: "critical of the government's fiscal performance, in particular its loose stance during the late 1980s". I am quoting from page 3 of the workshop's conclusions.

The government likes to get up and blame everything on the Liberals. I admit that sometimes that is easy to do or often easy to do because the Liberals left a sorry mess when they left office finally in 1984. However, the fact is that this government, the Conservative government, is being criticized by this C.D. Howe analysis. It is not the Liberal government of the time before 1984 because, let us face it, these guys may have done a bad job way back then but that is not the issue now. The issue now is what the Conservatives who have been in power for almost nine years have done.

The Conservatives have, according to this C.D. Howe analysis, clearly made a mess of things. They have created a fiscal situation by their irresponsibility in the late 1980s that has made the debt crisis in this country very much worse than it otherwise would have been.

There is no way the Minister of Finance, though he squirms and tries to cast the blame off onto somebody else, and this government can get out from under that criticism. There is no way it can escape from carrying the can for the fiscal problems we now face as a country.

The Conservatives try to blame the provinces. Listen to this government. In fact we heard it repeated today during Statements by Members. Somebody from the Conservative Party got up and said: "We have increased our transfers to the provinces". So when the provinces blame the federal government for transfers being cut back, somehow they are not being fair.

I want to quote from as neutral and disinterested a source as I could possibly find: the Dominion Bond Rating Service. This service has downgraded and put on alert the financial and debt situations of all our provinces in Canada. It outlines here the reasons why it has done that. It says one of the reasons is the effect of the recession. I am not surprised.

However, look at the second reason it cites. I quote it specifically again: B. "Federal caps or limits on the growth of all federal transfer payments". That is not the premier of Ontario. That is not the premier of New Brunswick. That is not the premier of British Columbia talking. That is the Dominion Bond Rating Service saying to the people of Canada that this federal government has created a big part of the problem that the provinces are now facing.

There is no way, although he might squirm and wriggle, this Minister of Finance can get out from carrying that can. There have been serious mistakes made by this government. It has made mistakes by cutting taxes to those at the top and thereby worsening our deficit. It has made mistakes by fiscal irresponsibility in the late 1980s that have been identified by the C. D. Howe Institute. It has made mistakes by cutting back the amount of money going to the provinces as the Dominion Bond Rating Service has indicated. That has thrown our provinces right across Canada into crisis.

Yet this government comes before us today and says: "We are managing the economy magnificently. Give us a blank cheque for more than $31 billion to go out and borrow".

Undoubtedly the trained seals on the Conservative side will get up and support this. Undoubtedly it will not prove to be possible for voices of reason to stop this craziness on the part of the government benches.

We have a government that has been wrong on its budget projections it made just 13 months ago. It was so wrong when it said 13 months ago that it would need just $13.3 billion. It now says it needs over $31 billion.

This government has been so irresponsible that it has not brought a budget forward to justify this borrowing authority. This government has been so vicious to the provinces that even the Dominion Bond Rating Services has underlined that as a major problem for the provinces.

This is finally a government that has been recognized even by the C. D. Howe institute as being a major part of the problem in creating the debt crisis we face in this country.

There is no way our party could ever support giving this government with this record a blank cheque for more than $31 billion in borrowing authority. This government has been so irresponsible that it deserves to be thrown out and not thrown money.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a comment on the speech made by the hon. member. I certainly appreciate the depth of the difference between what was anticipated 13 months ago and what in fact is the case right now.

If his figures are correct then we are looking at a fantastic increase in projections. Those figures show the inability of the government to make any reasonable projections at all. When making projections in financial areas, one may be out by 5 per cent, 10 per cent or even 15 per cent given the vicissitudes of financing and the uncertainty of the financial markets today, the state of the recession and those similar impinging matters. However, to be out by a factor of over 100 per cent is astounding.

To add insult to injury, even before a budget is released, the government expects this House to go in front of the Canadian people to say we have not produced a budget yet. In fact the Minister of Finance was not sure whether he was going to have a budget or not until he was cajoled by the opposition to do so.

Having decided there will be a budget, he now comes forward to ask for the borrowing of $31.5 billion given the dismal state of the economy in the country right now and before the budget. This is not only arrogant and presumptuous but unprecedented in recent parliamentary history.

Could the member elaborate on the borrowing authority the government is seeking and the bond market it plans to visit and does he have a breakdown of how much is foreign and how much is domestic?

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, again I thank my colleague for what is an interesting question. If we look at the total of the federal government debt we are talking at the moment of something over $420 billion. Approximately 23 per cent of that is foreign held. I would expect of this new borrowing authority we would likely be looking at a somewhat larger percentage than the 23 per cent simply because the government has been gradually increasing the degree to which it has gone to foreign markets to try to source some of its borrowing. We might be talking about 25 per cent but again there is nothing in the government's legislation which suggests the direction it will take.

The other point I might just comment on is that it is not entirely unprecedented for this approach to be taken and for a borrowing authority to be passed before a budget. I am told it was done by some previous governments before 1984.

However, one of the things that I think everybody in the House felt was a useful step forward, whichever party we were in, was the commitment on the part of the then finance minister Wilson that there would be a budget in February. There would be a set time and we would then be able to have a borrowing authority that followed from that that was important. We also had some greater certainty created for the various provincial budgets that had to be brought down subsequently. As it is at the moment, virtually every provincial budget will be presented before the federal budget is presented on April 21.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to compliment the member for Essex—Windsor on his speech. His contribution certainly to this party with respect to job strategy and economic strategy in the New Democratic Party is paramount and instrumental in the direction this party is going.

I would like to ask the member for Essex—Windsor something. The fact is that oftentimes some say that as New Democrats we have no economic plan and cannot manage an economy and if we were in power things would be terrible. We have never been in power federally in this country and the debt of this nation is over $420 billion and is increasing at a dramatic rate. In provinces where the New Democrats have been in power, such as Saskatchewan in 1981, for example when the Blakeney government was in power, there were comments made that the Blakeney government was the best managed government in North America at that time.

I would like to ask the member if he could set the record straight a bit. What sort of process would he undertake as finance minister in the government next year to get this country on the right track? Could he give a general outline, for myself and for Canadians watching and for members of this House, of what directions a New Democratic government would take with respect to the economy in this country?

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): I thank my colleague for the question. It is a tough one to answer in a few minutes.

I just want to refer people in the House and elsewhere to a very interesting article by Jeffrey Simpson which was published February 9, 1993 in The Globe and Mail, entitled: "It was not a socialist shopping binge that gave the country a hangover". He stresses in this article one of the important political realities in this country. It is that the massive national debt and the great bulk of provincial debt we have built up in this country do not come from New Democrat governments but from irresponsible governments whether they are Social Credit, Conservative or Liberal at the provincial and federal levels.

• (1240)

The jobs plan we have issued is characterized by—perhaps to the surprise of some across the country—commitment to reduce the level of expected deficit in this country over the next five budgets by $11 billion compared to what the Conservative approach would bring us. Therefore, we recognize the importance of sound fiscal management. We also recognize however that to reach that sound fiscal position requires getting people back to work and requires levels of interest rates in this country that would make the interest rate burden on our national debt less onerous than it presently is.

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speech by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor who, if my notes are correct, mentioned two problems. First, the hon. member expressed his surprise that the borrowing authority bill was tabled without any information on the government's objectives or intentions, which was unprecedented or at least not common practice. Perhaps I could explain.

We have the December 2 economic statement, which announced the government's intentions and the economic and financial outlook. In other words, today's bill comes after this economic statement. I think that is a very important point. Furthermore, the basis for this borrowing authority will be further explained in the next budget. This is a very important point, and there is no reason to call this unprecedented. In fact, the precedent is there, and the basis for this borrowing authority is there as well. That is the comment I wanted to make.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may want to make a very short comment. The time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, following last year's statement the government tabled a borrowing authority bill. Today it is tabling another bill. In my opinion, there should have been another statement or a budget. I am not particular about whether we have a statement or a budget, but we need one or the other to indicate the reasons and figures for next year so we can see how much money we need. There has been no statement or budget providing this information, and in my opinion that is what we need.

Mr. Côté: Madam Speaker, as I said before, I understand the hon. member's concerns, but I want to point out that in addition to describing the perilous state of the economy and proposing corrective action, the December 2 statement also announced the government's intentions for the coming year. I think it is important to realize that the borrowing authority is motivated by and based on the statement. And of course a few weeks from now, the budget will provide additional information.

I have a second point on which I did not have a chance to elaborate. The hon. member said the provinces were already bringing down their budgets, while we usually have our budget earlier, in February. I agree that is usually what happens. Speaking as a private member, I wonder if it would make more sense for the government to bring down its budget after the provinces bring down theirs. Traditionally the provinces never made much of an effort since their federal big brother had already announced his intentions and was the only player to make a reasonable effort, with or without budget cutbacks. Often the provinces would just tag along behind. However today for once, and I agree this is unusual, the provinces are taking the initiative, since big brother did not bring down his budget and they are now performing better than ever before. I refer to the last two budgets that were announced by Newfoundland, if I am not mistaken, and Saskatchewan.

I realize the member is disappointed that the next budget will be postponed for a few weeks, but I think there is every indication this will be beneficial and give the provinces that extra motivation to take the initiative, since they will be first with their budgets this time around. I think the impact will be particularly effective this year.

[English]

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, I will answer the member's question in English because I can say it more quickly that way.

First on the question of a budget, the government cannot have it both ways. It is not possible to have it both ways. If there was a declaration, an economic statement, in December which covers next year, the government does not need a budget.

If it is going to have a budget, which the government has decided, then that budget presumably sets out new projections about what is expected and we must see those new projections in order to be able to make a responsible decision with respect to borrowing authority requests.

With respect to the second point that was raised, my problem is that the federal government budget is the budget that can have the greatest impact on the over-all economic situation in the country. It is the broad framework within which the provinces have to operate.

What we are getting at the moment is not the provinces presenting their budgets and then the federal government presenting a budget that somehow takes them into account because the timeframe would be far too short to make such changes. We are really getting at budgets being prepared and presented in parallel without any sense of interplay and inter-connection. That is really unfortunate when there are such serious economic problems within the country.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I will be splitting my time with the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. I will go ten minutes and five and he will follow with ten minutes and five.

As much as I respect my hon. colleague and am delighted to share my time with him, I would like to have had more time to press home some of my points, but I am sure my hon. colleague will do equally well in pressing home the difficulties we have with this bill.

I am going to say at the outset that I have great difficulties with not only the details of this bill but with the principle involved.

• (1250)

Looking at it in its simplest, mundane, ordinary day-to-day terms, this is like me asking you, Mr. Speaker, to sign a blank cheque in any funds available to finance my record of financial mismanagement over the last eight and a half years. I want a blank cheque from you to continue financing the ways in which I have practised over a period of time, which have been unconscionable, and I am still not financially solvent.

If I went to a bank with the record of this government and asked for a loan, even with a guaranteed support and a demand loan where I had assets or promissory notes to cover what I was asking to borrow, I do not think it would let me get beyond the second question. It would look at my record and would boot me out on my behind.

This is a litany and it is becoming tiresome for people who watch this on channel 18, 19, 20 or whatever it is. The role of the opposition is to press home just how atrociously the government has managed the finances of the country, and I am not one who presses home with such direct and consistent criticism on a particular point.

When we have a government that over the past eight and a half years has been pressing home a pledge and a promise to put Canada's fiscal house in order, reduce the annual deficit, and retire the public debt, on a regular basis, in 1984, 1985, 1986, et cetera, the government management of the economy has been atrocious, maladroit and inept. Why? It is because over that period of time it has increased taxes 38 times including the hated and badly timed goods and services tax. It has nickel and dimed students. It has reduced unemployment insurance safety nets for those people who need them the most at this particular time. It has introduced temporary surcharges that are still in existence and it is at its wits' end.

It cannot tax any more because it is well beyond the break even point of taxing individuals, and it cannot find money anywhere else. Now it has to go and borrow money. There are a number of things that bother me about this.

Borrowing money is not unusual. I think we all from time to time have to borrow money. When people borrow money surely one of the things their bank manager, assistant bank manager or whoever is going to lend them the money will look at is their credit rating and how much money they make; in other words, what they are looking at is their ability to repay the loan. That is the concern.

In 1984 when this government first looked at borrowing money the relationship of how much the country owed to how much the country made, in other words the ratio of the debt to the gross domestic product, was 42 per cent. Those are the best figures I can get and they have been verified by other people. It might be 40 per cent or 45 per cent, but it was in the vicinity of 40 per cent. We owed 40 per cent of what we made.

Eight and a half years later a concerted effort was promised by this government in its annual statements in the budget. Normally it is in February, March or April, the spring of each year, as is common for any government. It certainly has been a precedent with the Canadian government and in Parliament for as long as I can go back in my history books. There were promises by the government that it would retire this debt. It now says that the annual deficit is the same as it was when we started the exercise back in 1984 and that has caused the national debt to be doubled.

What is more important in terms of the relationship of one to the other, how much we owe versus how much we make, is that we have now gone from 42 per cent to 64 per cent. In other words, looking at our ability to pay and our financial solvency, we now owe 64 per cent of what we make.

Mr. Speaker, if you were running a business or were in a private situation in which you were borrowing on a regular basis 40, 45, 50, 55, 60, or 65 per cent of the money you made and you had a personal or financial debt for your business which in eight and a half years more than doubled then I do not think you would be a very good financial risk.

More important, and more scary to me and of more concern to the Canadian public, is the very question of where this is going to lead: Will the government have us in a position by the election, which has to happen by the end of this year, in which any party that assumes the custodianship of the country will never be able to take us out of the depth of financial despair we are now in?

We all know there was an attempt in 1990 to help retire the debt by changing the tax structure from essentially a manufacturers' sales tax on around 20,000 businesses in the manufacturing sector to a consumption tax on all individuals.

We all know a tax of that nature has a greater impact on those with less income because the amount they spend on necessities is much higher proportionately than for those in the higher income bracket. By having a consumption tax we attack those people who can least afford it.

The other aspect of this issue is, quite apart from the pros and cons and the advantages and disadvantages of a consumption tax not being harmonized with the 10 provinces, that the timing could not have been worse. I am sure the government's financial advisors in the country and our financial friends outside the country would have advised, and indeed had advised, against implementing a consumption tax when the government by its own admission and at its own hand was responsible for an impending made in Canada recession.

Mr. Speaker, would you expect me, with this background, knowledge and understanding, or anybody else with these concerns to be supportive of this bill? I think not.

In summary, we have a situation in which the government is asking to borrow $31.5 billion, and I wonder how much of that is offshore contributing to our 30 per cent of foreign debt. The government is asking to borrow $31.5 billion before a budget has been put in place and further play into the promise and pledge that it is going to reduce the deficit and the federal debt.

I do not believe it for one moment. I certainly am not going to support it because I think it is wrong, and I think it is atrocious. I do not think the Canadian people will support it either.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, this bill to give the government the authority to borrow certain moneys gives us the opportunity to discuss the economic situation in this country and the government's economic policy.

Whenever we in the opposition and groups outside this House, economic experts, business experts, and think–tanks, attempt to bring to the government's attention that the economic situation in this country is bad and that its economic policy is not working, the government gives us two standard replies:

First, it trots before us a whole set of statistics attempting to show us that everything is absolutely fine, that the situation is really great, it is really moving in the right direction and so on. The second answer we usually get from government members, particularly the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, is that things were worse in the recession of 1981–82.

Let me deal with that response first because it is continually thrown back at us. Whether or not the recession we have had for the last three years is better or not as bad as the one of 1981–82 is irrelevant to the many thousands of Canadians who are unemployed now. Those kinds of answers from the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance give no comfort to those many people who are unemployed, to the many businesses that are going bankrupt, and to the many people who are living in poverty. It does not become a government of this country to use that kind of response when we seriously raise the plight of unemployed Canadians and the dire straits of our Canadian business situation.

Let me just for a minute compare the recession of 1981–82 with the present recession. Many experts, not members of this House, have pointed out that if the participation rate in our labour force stayed at what it was in 1981–82 the unemployment rates would be much higher. For example, I refer to the Ottawa based company Informetrica which in its monthly economic review in January said the following: "The disappearance of hundreds of thousands of workers is all that has kept the unemployment rate from exceeding the level reached a decade ago in what was the deepest downturn since the dirty thirties. Unemployment would have reached 13.7 per cent last year, slightly higher than during the 1981–82 slump, had 345,000 discouraged workers not given up looking for jobs".

You are only counted as being unemployed in the official unemployment statistics if you are actively looking for work. If you are not actively looking for work and have become disillusioned, frustrated, and continually turned away, and have not looked for work in the last few weeks, then you are not counted as unemployed. Because of the situation today the participation rate in our labour force is much lower than it was in 1981–82 and consequently the unemployment rates appear to be lower.

In addition those who are unemployed in this recession have been unemployed longer. In 1981–82 there were high rates of unemployment but those people found new work quicker than they are today.

The unemployment today, to a much greater extent, is based on structural changes in our economy and not cyclical types of unemployment. Consequently a structural problem in our economy, which means the closing down of factories that have existed for years and years, and replacement by automation or new trade patterns and so on, requires a different kind of solution from the cyclical type of unemployment we had for the greater part of 1981–82.

There was another major difference as well. In 1981–82, faced with high unemployment, the Liberal government of the day believed the government could and should do something. We did try to do things. We tried to kick-start the economy. We had public works programs. We had programs to build houses, infrastructure and so on, all to kick-start the economy.

• (1305)

This government was influenced by the economic policies that were promoted in the United States under President Reagan and in Britain under Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher. Their belief was that the market economy would solve all our problems and the less government did the better.

We do not believe the entire solution or the basic solution can be found by government but we believe there is a role for government. We submit that the greatest areas of prosperity in this country have been where government, in a wise partnership with the public sector, has produced a lot of jobs and a lot of growth.

The new Government of the United States recognizes that as well. It campaigned on a rejection of Reagan–Bush type economic policies and won. Now it is trying to return to what can be more properly called a mixed economy approach.

Another response we get from the government is that everything is fine, that there is a glowing picture out there. It cites certain inflation figures and points out how low inflation is, how certain trade figures are up and so on.

Whenever statistics that deal with improvements or with things getting worse are cited, the distance of improvement depends on the starting point. I could take issue with the government on many occasions for picking starting points that were misleading and false in order to show that things had greatly improved. That aside, the fact of the matter is that things are not fine economically speaking. They are not. The government can try to paint as rosy a picture as it can, but that is simply not being bought by Canadian people throughout this country.

The unemployment rate is well over 10 per cent. There are still 1.5 million Canadians unemployed. Bankruptcies during the last year have been at record levels. There are record levels of Canadians going to food banks and soup kitchens. There is a greater number of people living under the poverty line. Things have been worse in the last 10 years than they have ever been in a continuous trend since the end of the Second World War.

When the government brought in some of these policies we warned it that those policies would result in exactly what has happened. They would exasperate what might otherwise be a shallow recession or downturn in the economy. But it went ahead with them anyway.

We in the Liberal Party are in favour of freer trade. Our history shows that as a party we have always taken steps through GATT and otherwise to expand trading opportunities. Before the free trade agreement there was a movement between Canada and the United States to lower tariff barriers.

We opposed vigorously the so-called free trade agreement which was much more than a free trade agreement. It allowed us to be left open to all sorts of attacks on our economy from the United States. We said it would lead to high unemployment, and it did. We said it would lead to the closing of Canadian companies, and it did. It was the same with the GST. We opposed the GST. Even those economists who supported the GST said it was the wrong time, that we should not bring in a big tax increase when the country was moving into a recession.

I do not have enough time, but I could quote from article after article which back up what I have just been saying. Let me say what we have put forward time and again. The Federation of Canadian Municipalities was here this week asking the government once again to participate in a tripartite program to rebuild Canadian municipal infrastructure: roads, sewage systems, bridges, tunnels, ports and transportation systems, which would improve the economic climate of cities attract business and commerce to cities, and at the same time put thousands of people to work. Why will it not do that?

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the remarks of the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. As usual his remarks have made a lot of sense. Of course in the time available it is not possible to cover everything.

I would like to ask him a couple of questions. First, what does he think is the effect of the government's policy of reducing the taxes on rich people and increasing the taxes on middle income people? Has that policy had any effect on creating jobs or creating unemployment?

I will ask my second question at the same time. What does he think is the effect of the government spending billions upon billions of dollars for the arms industry? Is that having a good effect on employment or a bad effect?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I will deal with the second question first. If I had the time I would deal with the government's commitment to buy military helicopters at a cost of $5.6 billion, almost $6 billion.

We are in a period where we need money for all sorts of things: health care, education, retraining and so on, and the government is going to spend nearly $6 billion on helicopters designed to fight a cold war which has now come to an end. Talk about nonsense. The government is saying it wants to reduce the deficit and provide growth in the economy. Even from the point of view of creating jobs, the production of military equipment such as helicopters is very low as a labour intensive industry.

If we want to create jobs there are many other things which would come before military production. Even from the point of that argument this is unwarranted expenditure. We must find a way since the cold war is over and there is not the major threat there was years ago. We still need armed forces for certain matters, such as peacekeeping and patrolling our oceans, shores and territories, but we do not need the same capacity we needed while the cold war was still going on.

With respect to taxation the member is absolutely correct. Taxes are not liked by anybody. We pay them because we know they are essential. If there is to be a certain peace in this country there has to be a consensus among all classes that the taxation system is fair. If people in certain classes, whether it is low income classes or middle income classes, feel they are being inequitably dinged with the taxes of this country then there is going to be unrest and instability.

One of the reasons we so vigorously opposed the goods and services tax, which was put through without proper consultation, without the support of the provinces and at a time when we were moving in a recession, was that it bears more heavily on the poor and middle classes than it does on the rich.

A 7 per cent tax or a 15 per cent tax on goods and services does not make as much a dent in the incomes and lifestyles of the rich as it does in the lower incomes. That is why years ago we brought in a progressive income tax system where the rates of tax increased: higher percentages on the wealthier population and lower percentages on the middle class, with exemptions for the people who had very low incomes. That is a fair system in principle. Where there is a certain percentage of tax for a consumption tax that applies across the board, no matter what it is not fair.

It is true the government has a tax credit system for those with very low incomes, but it does not compensate them for the high taxes they are paying to the government, hidden in most respects by the goods and service tax. In answer to the hon. member we know we have to raise taxes, but the taxes have to be introduced in an equitable and fair way for all classes in society.

• (1315)

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult today to talk about this bill without talking about the national tragedy that we are faced with in Canada as we are being pressured into passing a North American free trade agreement. I would like to concentrate my remarks on that.

This Conservative government is bound and determined to sell Canadian interests to the U.S. and Mexico under the North American free trade agreement or NAFTA. Five years of the Canadian–U.S. deal, the FTA, has resulted in the loss of some 500,000 jobs, mostly in manufacturing. We know that company after company in Canada has gone broke or has moved to the United States.

In my riding of Vancouver East, for example, fish processing plants have been forced to close and some have moved south with hundreds of jobs being lost. This is a whole field of jobs, particularly for immigrant women.

Textile workers have been laid off or forced into exploitive home work and many, many small businesses have closed. Many have been affected by cross–border shopping.

However we look at it, five years of the FTA and now a NAFTA agreement on top of it will be devastating to Canada and to our sovereignty. Many young Canadians have given up hope because of the lack of job prospects.

Canadians already are hurting from continuing high unemployment, government cuts to our social programs and a battered economy. Much of this is really related to our locking ourselves into a continental agreement with the United States. Many more Canadians will suffer if this government passes the NAFTA.

Canadians do not want NAFTA because it is bad for Canadians and bad for Canada. NAFTA is much more than a trade deal. This is what I hope Canadians and viewers will understand. It is a continental economic agreement, an economic constitution that gives economic control not to governments but to transnational corporations whose sole interest is profits. It emasculates our national government which will have no say or control over Canada's destiny.

It is a triumvirate kind of agreement where Canada will provide unprocessed resources, Mexico will provide cheap labour and transnationals based mostly in the United States will make the products and get the trade benefits.

Our brain power will go south. Small businesses will not be able to compete. NAFTA threatens Canadian jobs and businesses in our auto industry, in textiles, agriculture, transportation, banking, insurance and data processing.

The Government of British Columbia is strongly opposed to NAFTA because it will erode the provincial government's ability to manage provincial resources and to control foreign investment in our economy in B.C. B.C. will be hurt in five very critical areas.

First of all, NAFTA will not stop the U.S. from setting up unfair trade barriers. We see how damaging this has been to the B.C. economy in relation to softwood lumber tariffs. It will prohibit Canadian incentives that are needed for processing our raw materials, our raw logs and our raw fish and to have value–added products for trading. This will be very difficult in our economy.

Second, this deal will not ensure that workers' rights and the environmental standards are protected. There will be tremendous pressure to undermine unions by lowering the working standards and wages for Canadian workers. Higher profits will be had in Mexico because of its poverty levels, its abysmal health and safety standards and lax environmental enforcement.

We heard at a rally recently in Vancouver that Mexican workers earn $5 a day if they are lucky, are working in very polluted environments and their situation will be worse with NAFTA. Mexican workers also oppose this.

• (1320)

Third, this unfair deal will hurt B.C.'s processed vegetable producers and apparel industry. The Canadian Apparel Manufacturers Institute says that as many as 30,000 Canadian jobs in the apparel industry are at risk if NAFTA is signed.

Fourth, NAFTA offers absolutely no guarantee that B.C. will not be forced to export water to the United States. Earlier today we heard the minister refuting this, but I can tell you at the hearings which I attended in Vancouver, experts there had studied the documents very carefully and pointed out that water is not exempt. It can be considered as a good and therefore become a transcontinental resource.

Fifth, the Canadian government offers no assistance to help Canadian workers adjust. This has been promised to American workers. We know this was promised under the FTA. I certainly know many people in British Columbia who are unable to get any adjustment programs.

This Conservative government is setting Canadians up for a future where our health care and social programs are in jeopardy. Bill C-91 was a part of this NAFTA deal. It was part of this nefarious plan and, of course, this was the drug patent bill which gave a monopoly to multinational pharmaceutical companies and has a tremendous impact on the cost of drugs and the whole medicare system in Canada.

Tories have argued that this was necessary. It was necessary in their view. It was something that they had already promised to Mr. Bush.

NAFTA basically wipes out the sovereign right of the Canadian Parliament to allow generic drug companies to provide cheaper copies of brand name drugs to consumers.

Canadians have suffered more than enough under the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement. Enough is enough. NAFTA must be rejected in favour of world-wide fair trade and I will ask my colleague to expand on some of these points in his remarks.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): I would ask the member for Vancouver East to comment further on the effect of the free trade agreement and unemployment on the income levels of the people she knows of.

In my city, and I will go into this later, the rich have got richer and the poor have got poorer. This is the intended effect of the free trade agreement and other parts of the Tory agenda.

I am sure the hon. member can tell us something of the situation of the people, especially the large number of unemployed people, in the district that she represents.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, it has had a devastating effect, as the member suggests. For example, I have met with a number of people who were in the fish processing industry and these plants have closed down entirely. Incidentally, they were not even given adequate unemployment insurance coverage. Many of them are immigrant women raising families on their own. Some are native women, and that is probably one of the worst effects.

Look at the garment industry. We know that if the industries are to survive at all and compete with the American and Mexican industries, they are going to have to force largely women into doing things at home in the cottage industries.

Some people think this is folksy and lovely, but it is a terrible situation because it is not controllable. It is not unionized and women who are looking after kids are going to be trying to do work on machines and so on in their homes at very low wages.

We know the impact it has had on the whole aspect of unionization. There is a move to do anything possible to undermine decent union wages and to force down wages by whatever means possible. There are many, many impacts.

• (1325)

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member has been very active in issues dealing with the multicultural areas and various cultures in Canada and the number of support groups over the years to help immigrant women and other people adjust and get ahead in this country. I would like to ask her, from her experience over the years, what impact has the effect of government budgets and government cutbacks had on various support groups that have been trying to help disadvantaged groups in her riding and perhaps right across the country. If she could make some comments on that, I think it would be quite enlightening.

Ms. Mitchell: Of course, speaking more generally and not only from a NAFTA point of view, we know that the federal government has targeted advocacy groups, in particular immigrant and visible minority groups, the Canadian Ethnocultural Council and many groups and communities, and has cut back on their funding, just as it has cut back on native friendship centres, for example.

These groups are needed as advocates to work for improvement in the conditions for these people. The government has cut back and they are now having to close.

It is very interesting that the member for Vancouver Centre who is aspiring to be Prime Minister is talking about wonderful citizen involvement, grass roots citizen involvement when it was her government in its budgets year after year that cut out any funding that makes it possible for people to organize, to speak for themselves, to get involved in the whole process of speaking for themselves and developing programs affecting government.

There are those impacts. There are also great impacts on immigrant people coming in, immigrant women who are the last hired and first fired, and on small businesses. I know in my area, in Chinatown particularly, I have had merchants saying how difficult it is to survive and the impact the combination of FTA, the free trade agreement, plus GST has had on their businesses. It has just about made them go under.

Also it seems unfair that we are putting so much emphasis on north–south trade and ignoring the Pacific Rim where there is tremendous potential. That is certainly what we should be developing.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, we have divided our time because we want to speak on this bill and we know that time is running out. We know that we will not get a fair chance to speak on the official debate on the North American free trade agreement because the government is cutting it to two half–day debates. It is not even two days.

However, these two bills are closely related, though the NAFTA bill is more important. The government is asking us to agree to let it borrow $31.5 billion and it has not told us what it is for. It did put out an incomplete financial statement in December. Things have changed further since then, as the government itself admits. It is not giving us a real budget prediction for the coming year but is telling us: "Lend us this money to spend it on such and such". It is just asking for a blank cheque.

We in our party would not lend the government a nickel, considering its record of wasting money. The government has been wasting the taxpayers' money for eight and a half years. It has given tax breaks to rich people, which is the main source of the growth of the deficit in the last few years. The previous government started it and this government has continued it.

The government has been giving tax breaks to rich individuals and big corporations and grants to big corporations. It is giving grants and subsidies to the arms industry at a time when it does not need it. The cold war is over. Not only are the Russians not there, but the subs are not in the ocean. They do not have enough fuel or enough dollars to put their subs out to sea. If we want to watch where their subs are we just have to send somebody to the northern port at Murmansk and he can count them because they are all tied up at the docks, so we read.

This government is wasting money on armaments at a time when it should be investing in things Canadian people need. It is going to blow $5.5 billion on helicopters to hunt for submarines that are not coming.

It has changed the laws to sell automatic weapons to foreign powers. It has in fact decided to sell over a thousand troop carriers with automatic machine guns on them to Saudi Arabia, a country that is already too highly militarized with a notorious record for abusing its own citizens and denying freedom, particularly to women.

It has also agreed that Canada will sell frigates to Saudi Arabia, probably $1.5 billion worth.

That kind of encouragement to the international arms race is going to promote more war. It promoted the gulf war because we had been arming Saddam and were then surprised that he used his arms. We are now hurrying to try to sell more weapons to more dictators and police states around the world.

The reason is that the Tories believe in the trickle down theory: If you give the money to the rich they will spend it and somehow the poor will get some too. What they always leave out of that nice theory is that they did not take the money in the first place from the rich; they took the money from the people at the bottom and in the middle and gave it to the rich. Then they tell the people at the middle and the bottom that if they live long enough some of that money will come back to them. That is their trickle down theory.

That is also why they signed this agreement with the United States, the free trade agreement, which has ruined hundreds of thousands of good jobs in Canada. The agreement gives control of our economy to the great transnational corporations which are mostly based in the United States. The North American free trade agreement will give further control even over the provincial governments.

Mrs. Maheu: That's our socialist: Print the money.

Mr. O'Kurley: Comrade.

Mr. Heap: If the hon. member would come to order it would make it easier for the House to carry on its business, instead of carrying on her gossip across the floor.

The purpose of the free trade agreement, like the purpose of the whole Tory agenda, is to prevent the Canadian people from controlling their own economy, from controlling their own daily working lives to produce the things we need. The result after that, for example in metro Toronto according to a recent report of the Social Planning Council, is that more than 21 per cent of the people of Toronto—that is of 2.5 million people—are on social assistance. More than one in five is on social assistance. The reason for that is simply the unemployment that has resulted from the free trade agreement. The factories were being shut down even before the NDP government was elected. They had been shut down, dismantled, emptied of their machinery.

Unemployment is up across the country, although it is stronger in the manufacturing area because it is there that the American corporations made their attack, shutting down branch plants, buying up plants to shut them down so the production would be concentrated in the United States.

The government brags about increased export of goods which it has been able to do by at last devaluing the dollar, but it does not tell us about the drop in the export of services where most of the jobs are.

The Tory agenda has caused unemployment and extreme poverty so that one-fifth of the people of metro Toronto are now on social assistance.

There was a study done by the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto. It divided the incomes of people according to size into 10 groups—the highest, the middle and the smallest—about 350,000 families in each group, just the families. It found that 10 per cent of the families with the highest income during the last 20 years increased their income by 3 per cent, that is their share of their national income, to $124 million per family on average, while the bottom 10 per cent found their income dropping. It dropped by almost .5 per cent so that they are now only getting $3,400. In other words, the top ones are getting about 40 times as much as the bottom ones.

They have reckoned the top ones' increase in worth at about $5.4 billion. If it were divided evenly among the bottom ones with the same number of families, 350,000 at the top and 350,000 at the bottom, it would give an income to each bottom one of about $15,000 more.

How could that be done? It would not have to be done by handouts except in the short, emergency situations. We could close the food banks in Toronto in short order if we made certain changes, if we had fair taxation, taxation according to ability to pay instead of people earning $200,000 or $300,000 paying no taxes, corporations worth many millions of dollars paying no taxes and the taxes being loaded on to the people at the bottom and the middle, even people on unemployment insurance or pension paying taxes.

We could make fair employment and unemployment insurance rules. We could have proper investment in health, education and housing. We could have a day care system that people need. Those would all provide scores of thousands of new jobs. We could also rebuild the transportation and communication systems of Canada east and west instead of making Canadians depend on going south to the United States. All of that would create the jobs if we dumped the free trade agreement and dumped the whole Tory agenda with its unfair tax system.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I commend the member on his speech. I have a question for him.

The member has been very active in helping the socially downtrodden in this country over the years as a minister, as a member of the New Democratic Party and as a member of Parliament. I also know he has been active on a great many committees. Being from the Toronto area he certainly has seen his share of hardships and suffering in that area of the country as there is in many other areas of the country.

I would like to ask the member to comment on exactly what the state of poverty is in this country and how it has changed even in the past 15 years since he has been involved. We have had Tory governments and Liberal governments all claiming to want to help the socially downtrodden and wanting to improve the lot of people. I wonder if he can make some comments on how he sees the kind of improvement that has been made in this country with respect to the poor. Are the numbers decreasing? Are they increasing? Is there hope there? Has the hope diminished? Have problems increased? Have problems changed?

This is a general question but I think it is very important that we start looking at a perspective and get a bit of a picture as to exactly what is the state of individuals in this country, those who are financially not as well off as many, those who are suffering socially and those who are suffering emotionally. How are we dealing with those people in Canada? How are we improving their situation? How are we improving their lot in this country?

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question. It is a very broad one. I will just pick two or three points.

As to what has happened in the last 15 years, I will go a little bit farther back than 15 years. In 1975 the then government of Pierre Trudeau imposed a wage freeze. At one stroke, without the slightest consultation, even less consultation perhaps than the present government uses, he denied the legislated and hard won right of the working people of this country through their unions to bargain for higher wages.

He simply imposed a freeze. He claimed he was imposing a freeze on prices. Nobody ever noticed the price freeze. Certainly he did not even claim to impose a freeze on profits. Since then there have been many moves like that by Liberal and Tory governments to take away the strength that the working class in Canada has won through a century or two of struggle, almost an entirely peaceful struggle, on the part of the working class.

Second, there were the tax breaks for the rich initiated by the Liberal government in the early seventies and then much increased by the Tory government in the last eight and a half years by which they have simply taxed poorer and middle income people into a lower level of real income than they had in those years past.

Third, beginning again with the Liberal government in the early eighties and continuing at a greater pace under the Tory government, they have been dismantling the health system, the post-secondary education system and the transportation system of this country so as to make Canada more dependent on private enterprise, that is to say on the transnational corporations which are now moving in to take over health and moving in to take over education even in lower systems. Now they are even dismantling the telephone and other communications systems in this country to make us dependent on large American multinationals.

Basically it is a policy that the present Deputy Prime Minister enunciated before the last free trade agreement, before the last election. He explained to people in the oil patch this free trade agreement would protect the oil barons against a left wing Liberal government or an NDP government.

In other words, the free trade agreement is to protect the companies from the people of Canada in case the people of Canada should elect a government that did not support the companies in the style to which they aspire.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I understood that an hon. member across the way had wanted to be recognized. He is not in his place so I will continue my remarks.

I just want to indicate to the Chair that first I would like to share my time with the hon. member for Ottawa West.

[Translation]

The government is asking this House today to grant it authority to borrow $31.5 billion. We are therefore discussing the government's fiscal and administrative policy.

Before going further, I would like to dissociate myself from the comments made by my colleague from Trinity—Spadina. I have a lot of esteem for him, but even though I do not much like the government opposite, I will not go so far as to say that the government intentionally or in bad faith acted against the interests of the Canadian people.

I do not agree with the Conservatives' policy, but I still recognize that most people in this House are doing their best for their constituents.

We must establish new policies in this country and restore the confidence of the Canadian people in government institutions. Barely two hours ago, we had an oral question period in this House during which the government was questioned on the Prime Minister's behaviour in appointing people to sit in the other place just as he himself is preparing to leave this House.

• (1345)

Moreover, in 1981 the Prime Minister had also promised not to proceed to any nomination when his turn came to step down. Today he is breaking his word and Canadians feel cheated. For some members, these nominations of two, three or four persons, this type of thing, may be of little importance.

Compared to $31.5 billion this is just peanuts but it has to do with trust, because when the Canadian people cannot trust their Prime Minister, who is making appointments despite his solemn commitment not to do so on Canadian television nine years ago, how can they trust the Conservative government in other matters? In my opinion, despite all the hoopla about a leadership race, the Conservatives will not regain the confidence of the Canadian people.

This kind of cynicism leads people to wonder who they can trust. This is sad because it gives a bad name to this institution and to all of us. We should stop and think about that today.

At this very moment, the hon. Leader of the Opposition—I almost said the right honourable, but it will come soon—is making a speech before the Sainte-Foy Chamber of Commerce to annonce the research and development program of the Liberal Party of Canada. I want to take this opportunity on behalf of most, if not all members in this House to congratulate the Leader of the Opposition and member for Beauséjour on the excellent program he announced in Sainte-Foy. This program is designed for the Canadian people and its goal is to update our way of looking at research and development not only in the decade already under way but for years to come.

The Leader of the Opposition said and I quote: "A wind of cynicism is now blowing over this country's institutions in which we used to take pride." He then added: "It is time to bring back that pride. But how can we speak of pride to an unemployed of 45 whose employer had to close his business under the combined pressure of a free trade agreement without a transition program and a GST that needs an army of accountants to administer". That is well said, Mr. Speaker.

It is not enough to criticize, and the intention of the Leader of the Opposition is in no way to limit himself to that. We must do it because we must make this government accountable for its actions and we do so with all the necessary vigilance. Moreover, my colleague and my leader, the hon. member for Beauséjour, wants to propose a proactive program in the field of R&D, namely the Liberal Party program. He says, and I quote him again: "It is through this network of new links that a Liberal government will create a national apprenticeship program to help young people complete their studies and be better prepared to enter the work force".

Just a few days ago in this House, we debated a bill which would impose a 3 per cent tax on student loans. Moreover, the students would be subject to an additional six months of interest payments. Is this the way to help our young people complete their academic training? This is a backward approach.

Imposing additional charges will not encourage our young people to finish college or university. As the Leader of the Opposition rightly said, we must do everything to better prepare our youth for the labour market. Of course, a very good way to prepare them better is to have them stay in school long enough to acquire a better academic, technical or professional training, so that they are not condemned to low-paying jobs for the rest of their lives or, even worse, condemned to losing their jobs whenever the economy declines.

The Leader of the Opposition also said in his excellent speech: "I would call on the Canadian banks to be more flexible and understanding with them, so that they can obtain the financing they need". Of course, he was talking about small and medium sized businesses. He added: "In addition a Liberal government will continue the reform of the Small Businesses Loans Act, make access to risk capital easier, support our export potential and ease the regulatory burden on small and medium-sized businesses".

These are some of the things that the Leader of the Opposition is proposing to us and to Canadians. Representing a riding like Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, I can attest to this need for better academic and occupational training.

I would like to conclude by urging the government opposite to provide the necessary funds, with the Government of Ontario, for building the Cité collégiale here in Ottawa, as well as the satellite campuses in Hawkesbury and Cornwall, so we can train the people of our region and encourage them to stay in school and upgrade their skills, as others already have, but which our people have not always had a chance to do.

The federal government has been negotiating with the province for a long time. I encourage both parties to conclude these negotiations and build this Cité collégiale, so long awaited by the people of my riding and other parts of eastern Ontario.

[English]

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who is a member I have respect for. He is a very hard working member and is certainly very sincere in his approach to handling matters with respect to the House and his riding.

As he will know there are many people in this country who have been critical of the federal Liberal Party with respect to the fact that it has not been clear on many issues. It has been vague. Having looked at the Leader of the Opposition's speech I must say that I have been unable to find the specifics.

I would like to ask the hon. member something specifically with respect to the future of the economy, which is going to be germane to any advances we are going to make on social and other issues in this country. What is his party's position with respect to the NAFTA agreement? Is his party opposed to the NAFTA agreement? Will his party, if elected, announce that the NAFTA agreement will not go ahead on January 1, 1994?

With respect to the GST his party has made comments that it was going to remove the GST. What is his plan to replace the GST? What will take its place? Will there be another tax? Will there be a different approach as to how Canadians are taxed? Finally, what is his position and his party's position with respect to an economic plan?

It would be interesting to hear some specifics because, with due respect, we are not getting an awful lot of specifics from the Liberal Party. We would like to hear some specifics now if the hon. member would oblige the House.

• (1355)

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am being asked to explain the economic, fiscal, monetary and trade policies and skills training of the Liberal Party in the next three minutes. That is not going to be an easy job. I will attack some of these topics. I will gladly send him much of the material that the Liberal Party has put together so far.

The hon. member knows, in spite of what he says, that there have been several pronouncements in that regard. The Leader of the Opposition, for instance, gave an extensive speech at the University of Ottawa on the economic recovery in our country. He also gave another speech in Toronto. I have just quoted from the one in Ste. Foy, Quebec today with regard to trade. I will gladly forward him a copy of it.

I want to address a couple of things specifically, however. The first is on trade. There is no doubt that the cornerstone of any trade policy has to be the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. In terms of the North American free trade agreement our position is that this agreement should only proceed once Canada is satisfied that through parallel accords we have corrected the shortcomings of the original deal. Our trade critic has expressed this many, many times in the House. He asks very responsible questions every day in expressing what we need.

What do we need specifically? First of all we need to improve the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement in reference to the subsidy code. We need also to recover some of our losses in the energy area. We all know that. We have spoken on those extensively in the past. There is insufficient protection for the environment in the North American free trade agreement as it is. The Americans have recognized that and the new administration wants a parallel accord. The problem is that the government across the way says it does not need anything and the accord is fine as it is. We do not agree.

The member asked about the goods and services tax. Here is the position we have taken. We know as a government—which we hope to be very soon—we are going to need the funding necessary to function and to continue to provide for the social programs that we as a party invented a number of years ago. We know we will need the money from some place. It is not just swell to say we will abolish the GST and not replace it with anything. That is not very responsible or cute. Of course we do have to replace it with something.

The Leader of the Opposition has stated that he will appoint a committee of this House to travel right across the country to develop a program within 12 months after the government is sworn into office so we can replace this tax. Yes, there will be another tax but it will be one that works and does not take an army of accountants to figure out and does not provide the burden that this present taxation regime does on small and medium sized businesses in my riding and elsewhere in Canada.

I am also supposed to respond to economic policy but I think my time has run out.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, it is important to point out for people who are listening to our debate this Friday afternoon what it is we are debating.

We are debating a government that says it is interested in reducing the debt and the deficit that is borrowing a new $31.5 billion. That is adding to the debt instead of reducing it. I do not think anybody out there needs to be reminded that it also means adding to the deficit because we are going to have to pick up the interest on that $31.5 billion of new debt.

For a government that says it wants to stay the course on reducing the debt and the deficit this must seem to ordinary people out there watching us, and to those of us who like to think we have some common sense in here, just a little bit contradictory not to say hypocritical. However, sometimes we all borrow money because we have important purchases to make and important things to do. We want to invest in our children's education. The time has come to buy a new home and we know we are going to be building up our capacity to enjoy the future and to enjoy more security in the future. Let us have a look and see if that in fact is what the government is going to do with this $31.5 billion it is borrowing today.

First, where is it going to borrow the money? Is that borrowing going to help Canadians and Canada?

We know it has increased our foreign borrowing to the point where $22 billion in interest is going out of this country every year, outside Canada, out of the Canadian economy, away from where it can stimulate economic growth, job creation, research and development for Canada and for our economic future.

This government has us to the point where we are now sending $22 billion of that annual deficit outside Canada. That is bad enough, but another interesting point is that on the $22 billion nobody in Canada is paying tax. Not only are we sending $22 billion outside the country, but assuming a 50 per cent income tax rate we are also giving up $11 billion in income tax we could be earning on that $22 billion of interest. We have a further drain on the Canadian economy.

As I said sometimes it makes sense to borrow money. It depends on what is to be done with it. What is the government going to do with it? What is the biggest problem confronting Canada now? What is the biggest problem confronting Canadians? What is the biggest worry of our young people or of people in middle age who suddenly find themselves without jobs and not knowing how they are going to pay for their mortgages or rent or put food on the table?

A job, I think, is the biggest worry of most Canadians. Turning to unemployment in this country, 11.6 million Canadians are without jobs. There five million Canadians in total either on unemployment insurance, welfare, or living in a household where the income earner is on unemployment insurance or welfare. Where is the government's job creation program? Surely that is what it wants this $31.5 billion for.

It does not have a job creation program. It thinks this level of unemployment is just fine and that somehow Canadians will have to struggle through it and survive as best they can. It has just finished telling those same Canadians who are without jobs that the unemployment insurance they have paid into all their lives is not going to help them out much and is going to help out fewer people.

Is it going to help our young people who have never yet had jobs because they happened to come out of school at a time of high unemployment? Is this government going to be using this $31.5 billion to invest in more student loans and student grants to help young people get better education and better training so they have a future? No. In fact it is planning to give up all responsibility for the student loan program.

We all know that this past year the government started charging young people who are poor enough to qualify for student loans a fee for the loans. They do not have enough money to go to university so they qualify for the loans but now they have to pay a fee to get the loans.

Older people in our country are worried about the future of medicare and about the future of their pensions. Is this government planning to use this $31.5 billion to ensure the security of the old age security scheme or to ensure the future of medicare? No, that is not in its plans either.

Is the government planning to reduce taxes? Is it planning to do anything about those 37 different tax increases it has imposed on Canadians in the last nine years that have created a large part of the economic difficulty we have by taking purchasing power out of the hands of consumers? No, that is not what it is planning to use this $31.5 billion for either.

Is it planning to improve government services so that people are not waiting two, three or four years to have a family member join them from the country they emigrated from?

Is it planning to improve services to Canadians so seniors are not waiting six months? After spending weeks on the telephone unable to get through busy signals, they are forced to go down to visit an office because there are not enough staff and there is not enough equipment to give Canadian seniors the pensions they are entitled to. No, that is not how it is planning to spend it either. It is not planning to add more public servants to deliver the service seniors really want. It becomes pretty difficult to go downtown three or four times, since they cannot get through on the phone, just to try to qualify for pensions they are entitled to because they have contributed to them all their lives.

Is the government planning to put this money into solving the problems of the environment? No, it is not. It has just gone through cutting the green plan. In fact the green plan has been a better example of cutting than of curing. From the time it was introduced in 1991 it has been steadily drained and bled of funds to solve our environmental problems. The estimates tabled just a few weeks ago show further cuts to the green plan.

Is the government planning to invest in research and development? No. It has been a steady slice away at research and development, slice away at the opportunities for the future for this country and slice away at our ability to compete internationally because we are in the forefront of key sectors of new knowledge.

As I said at the beginning sometimes it makes sense to borrow. It makes sense when we have good, positive, important things we want to accomplish. In the four years I have been in this House I have yet to hear one good positive thing that the government wants to accomplish for Canada. I have seen the cut of this, the destruction of that, the ruination of the other, and I wait yet to see one positive thing.

That is why I will say no to borrowing $31.5 billion. I do not think the government needs it because it does not have a plan to use it for the benefit of Canada.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, I would have a question for my hon. colleague. I have been listening to her for a while and have heard nothing but negative comments. She said since she was elected to this House four years ago she has found nothing positive. But would she not say that one of the biggest problems facing this country—I agree that unemployment is probably the biggest but this is a big problem too in our country—is this propensity to complain about just about anything.

From listening to her speech one would believe that no more R and D is being done. That is not true at all. The people watching us deserve better information than that. There are great things being done in R and D. Some things are happening through the green plan. There are things going on everywhere. But the best job creation plan may not be to hire more civil servants to answer the phone, but rather a plan to put the economy back on track again, an economic recovery plan to restore Canadians' confidence in the economy. That is what we are doing and I find it regrettable that she would have negative things to say about that. I am not expecting praise from the other side, but it will not be said that everything is going wrong in this country. All that the younger generation watching us on the Parliamentary Channel can hear is moaning, not unlike what I am doing right now as a matter of fact.

Mrs. Catterall: I could not agree more, Madam Speaker, that there is a need to restore confidence in the economy and in the future of our country. That is not what I am blaming this government for, this government that has destroyed the confidence the people of Canada had in their country by failing to ensure proper prospects for the future. Confidence in the economy must be restored, but this cannot be done by borrowing an additional $31 billion when the deficit already stands at $500 billion or so. Canadians would only feel more disperrate.

[English]

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, I was interested in the comments of the hon. member opposite because she and I share responsibilities on one of the House of Commons standing committee.

Generally speaking I have a great regard for her comments. However some of the statements and innuendoes in her speech are worthy of a response. With regard to the money being borrowed, most fair-minded Canadians realize the money is being borrowed to pay the interest on the Liberal debt. Most people also realize the entire national debt of Canada is the original debt in 1984 the Liberals created in addition to the compound interest. Since 1984 the Government of Canada has accumulated an operating surplus of $33 billion. If it were not for that surplus our debt situation would be quite a bit worse.

With regard to the comments of the hon. member about interest rates and about foreign borrowing, would she recommend as a policy of the government that interest rates be increased to encourage domestic borrowing, increased to the rate the Liberals had during their term of government of something in the order of 22 per cent? Would it be her recommendation to encourage domestic borrowing to service the Liberal debt?

Mrs. Catterall: Madam Speaker, the member knows perfectly well the debt of the early seventies and eighties was paid off many times over in the time he has been in Parliament. It has been reborrowing by the member's government that has more than doubled the debt.

Some hon. members: No, no.

Mrs. Catterall: Madam Speaker, would you like to bring order or perhaps I should do it. None of us in this Chamber has not been in debt. We know that when our income rises, as the income of the government rose dramatically—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Fortunately the five minutes for questions and comments are up.

[English]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I cannot believe my ears. It is Friday afternoon and we are shouting across the aisle actually trying to—

Madam Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member will allow me I do not believe my eyes or my ears either. Shouting in the House, this week? No. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre.

Mr. Harb: You said it, Madam Speaker. We get to a point where we have to start looking forward and stop crying over the past. We have to shift our cars into full gear so we can move toward the next century and have a positive outlook.

I could not help but try to get involved in this debate somehow, at least from our local perspective at the national level in the Ottawa–Carleton region. The government obviously is talking about debts and deficit reduction, economic growth and so on. All those are wonderful things but sometimes action speaks much better than words and is a true reflection of what is happening out there.

I would like to share from the perspective of the Ottawa labour market what is happening in terms of the record of this government and what it has done to the industry in this region alone. If the industries are doing fine they are selling, employing people and paying taxes. Then we have a lower unemployment rate and a high productivity level and everybody feels good.

Let us look at some of the figures from the local industry in this region. I am going to share a few of those figures with the House. In 1992 the construction industry, for instance, pretty well followed the national trend. We have seen a decrease in that by 2,600 people. In terms of the over-all industry it is a reduction of over 23.9 per cent.

In the trade and commerce industry for instance employment has decreased by 1.8 per cent. It was 45,200 in 1992 and that is down from 56,800 in 1990. As we see there has been a tremendous drop in this particular area and that represents a rate of approximately 8.5 per cent. The construction and trade sectors have taken a big hit over the past three years or so. In our region's finance, insurance and real estate industry, while employment in 1990 was 22,900, as a result of the worsening economy and the bad politics which have taken place at the federal level and the provincial level in Ontario we have seen a decline to 19,600 in 1991. That represents a decrease in terms of the over-all number of people in the work force.

The management and professional administration group has lost 1.3 per cent in terms of the number of people who were employed in 1992. Service occupations is another sector in our region which was extremely affected by what has taken place. The food and beverage sector lost 2,600 jobs in 1992 while the unemployment rate was at 8.1 per cent, fairly low when we compare that to 1984 figures.

In the processing occupations again we have seen a downward trend. This group has lost 2,200 jobs in our region. The construction sector, as I indicated a little earlier, also lost 2,400 jobs in 1992.

Obviously if these people are losing their jobs there is only one thing for them to do and that is to claim unemployment insurance. It is interesting to note that in 1991 there were 22,337 who claimed UI benefits on a monthly basis. That is something the government should have noticed a long time ago.

People go on UI for a few months and then it runs out. Then what do they do? They move on to the social welfare assistance rolls. It is interesting that there are on average in this region over 3,500 cases a month of people who are collecting social welfare assistance.

These are the figures. I have to ask my colleagues on the other side of the House what the government has really done to help the people get back on track and to encourage them to move forward.

To be quite frank, the combination of provincial and federal politics has been a recipe for disaster over the past three years. It has failed. I can only say it is because of the mismanagement of the economy, nothing more, nothing less.

One would ask how we deal with the question of the deficit. There are two areas and the government can take note of them One of them is investing effectively and efficiently in the area of education and combating illiteracy. The other one is crime prevention.

Not too long ago we had a conference in Toronto. The public was informed that the cost of crime in our country was over $14 billion a year. Two years before that we were told that the cost of illiteracy in Canada, in terms of the cost to society as a whole, was over $10 billion a year. That is over $24 billion cut out of the economy annually. That is as a result of mishaps, lack of planning, and the fact that over the past few years we have been playing a reactive rather than proactive role when it comes to the economy and society as a whole.

Another extremely important factor is in our institutions, for example in our jails. I am informed that it costs us over $70,000 annually to keep somebody in jail. That is the kind of thing, as a government and as a society, we have to sit down and look at in terms of how we are doing things. We can no longer deal with the situation we are faced with today the same way we dealt with it 30 or 40 years ago. We have to change our ways and attitudes.

The government has had tremendous opportunities to get the economy back on track but has failed to do so. Month after month, year after year we have heard government ministers and the Prime Minister speaking out on the question of education and initiatives that will help the economy get back on track.

They have commissioned report after report. The latest report I am told cost over $20 million and deals with the question of prosperity in order to put Canada back on track. I have yet to see one single action plan coming out of this report that would put this country back on track.

We have been talking a lot but have not yet seen one single tangible action that the Canadian public can look at and say: "That does make sense. We should proceed with that proposal because it would help the economy".

We talk a lot about industry. What industry would want probably more than anything is to see the bureaucracy cleaned up and the red tape reduced. All industry would need is an understanding on the part of the government to help it just by eliminating or reducing the bureaucracy. But what do we see? We see a lack of co-ordination and co-operation by different parts of government, both federal and provincial, but to a large extent the provincial government.

There is no way in this day and age that, for example, one is going to see business people coming to the province of Ontario to set up businesses. They are frightened because of the government's attitude. They see the government as being the enemy of business. Why do they do that? It is not because the government said it wanted to be the enemy of business, but because what the government has been doing has made it the enemy of business.

What is lacking here is a cohesive plan on the part of the government to address the questions of deficit and debt. We do not see that cohesive plan.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I appreciated my colleague's comments and particularly those he made with respect to tackling increasing crime and how moneys might be saved in doing so. In the area of education, the member made some fairly insightful comments. I think they are extremely useful and we need to look at them.

I just wanted to make two points and then perhaps ask him to comment. Just a moment ago a colleague from the government side said we are always condemning government and never give it credit.

[Translation]

That is not quite true. We did admit they made some headway in controlling inflation, but we also had some questions. And the most important question is: at what price?

[English]

I just wanted to correct the record. When the government does have successes we are prepared to note them and we have done so.

I was wondering if my colleague might want to elaborate on the use of education, training, retraining, research and development in economic development. Perhaps as well he would like to comment on the following.

When this government came to power in 1984 the total debt accumulated since Confederation was almost $168 billion. Almost nine years later it is in excess of $450 billion, well over twice. I have that from a signed statement from the former Minister of Finance. That is in spite of almost 40 tax increases and a revenue increase from about $70 billion to $130 billion. The government has almost doubled its revenue so that makes it even worse. It has had this huge increase in revenues, and in fact it would have been greater if it had not caused the recession.

I wonder if my colleague would care to comment on any of those points, please.

• (1425)

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, one of the reasons inflation is so low is that people do not have any money. The unemployment rate has hit the roof. It is well over 10 per cent to 11 per cent and in some regions it is over 25 per cent to 30 per cent.

I would have liked to have given the government credit for that. I am sorry but I just cannot because that was not as a result of a cohesive plan. It came by fluke.

Simply put because the value of the dollar is so high, there are so many people out of the work force. It is to the point that if stores close down there will be zero inflation. Nobody has money to spend and nobody is working. There is chaos everywhere. Bankruptcy has hit at an all-time high.

We talk about tough economic times. My gosh, we have seen what has happened in the past two and one-half years or so. Definitely, if anything, what should have happened is that the government should have moved forward with a proactive plan like our leader. He came up with a cohesive plan with investments in infrastructure and investments in capital projects. Every country in the western hemisphere and all of the G-7 have a cohesive plan that deals with the question of infrastructure, investing in roads, bridges, sewage treatment plants and so on.

What we have seen here is a new park and the government throwing a couple of million here and there and calling it an infrastructure plan, when the provinces have said they would participate in a national plan. We would create in a matter of three years over 100,000 jobs as a result of that. That is what would revitalize the economy. That is one way there can be a spin-off benefit. For every dollar that is spent we would get $5.

It does not take a genius to answer that part of the question. It has been proposed and suggested by our party and our leader.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are only 45 seconds left.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I believe my hon. friend was involved in municipal politics when the Hon. Paul Cosgrove, the Liberal minister of housing, shut down in the middle of the 1981-82 recession, any federal government involvement in municipal infrastructure.

Since that was done by a Liberal minister of the crown at the time and he has since gone to his great reward as a federal judge, I wonder if my hon. friend would explain to the House what representations he made as a municipal politician to the Liberal minister of the Crown at that time?

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, I was not in municipal politics then. There is an act in the housing department for the minister to check. It is already on the books. We do not have to reintroduce a new act. We just have to do it through the existing act which is at CMHC right now.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, for the benefit of the Solicitor General, I was here in 1984. If he wants me to answer that question, I would be pleased to.

The situation was this. An agreement was signed with two provinces prior to the 1984 election to phase out what was called infrastructure funding under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. When the Tories took over in 1984, the remaining provinces were then convinced because the Tory government said it could no longer afford the 75-25 formula. It was the one that cancelled that particular agreement.

If the Solicitor General had been listening to both of the members from Ottawa who were speaking a moment ago, he would have learned something. I quote the member correctly. One of the members said: "There is $22 billion interest that goes outside of Canada on this debt, this borrowing, and that $11 billion is given up in taxes on that because it is not being borrowed from Canadians". This a borrowing bill. The government wants to borrow $31.5 billion today.

If the Solicitor General had been listening, he would have caught on to what these two members from Ottawa were saying. It is this: The difference between the Liberal government in 1984 and the Tories who took over in 1984 is quite simple. One borrowed from itself, the other borrowed from foreign nations.

In 1984 nine per cent of the total debt of Canada was owed to foreign investors. Today that figure has mushroomed to about 26 per cent of the total. The latest figures show 25.6 per cent and now I imagine it has gone up to 26 per cent. If one is going to borrow money it is better to borrow it from oneself than from Household Finance, is it not? If one is going to borrow money it is better to borrow it from one's mother than the Bank of Tokyo, is it not?

At least if one borrows from oneself through Canada Savings Bonds or the Canada Pension Plan, one is borrowing from Canadians who are willing to invest in Canada and one sets one's own interest rates. The Canadian government sets its own interest rates on the kind of money that is borrowed and it can also under certain circumstances decide on the repayment schedule.

What caused the Canadian government to create a situation in which at this very moment 38 per cent of all government bonds are held by people in Japan? In other words, when the Bank of Tokyo says jump the Minister of Finance says how high.

In this country the debt has more than doubled. The government has set up special teams of people to try to get money out of ordinary Canadian citizens. It set up a special team the other day with regard to the Canada student loans plan to try to collect what it said on the record were debts owed back to the sixties. It is a strange thing today for people to fill out their income tax returns and then be notified they cannot get the rebates, the Canadian government owes them, because it believes they owe Canada student loans from 1960. The people do not have any records from 1960. Neither does the law firm that perhaps acted on behalf of the government or the collection agency that probably bugged them to death at that time. That is what the Government of Canada is doing.

While it is cutting back on this, cutting back on that, and increasing taxes, what is it doing in the House of Commons? It is borrowing $31.5 billion today, this is Friday, and what is it doing Monday? What is happening Monday in this House? Guess. No, it is not borrowing on Monday, it is bringing back Bill C–92. That is the bill that, if we can trust the words of the dean of law of Victoria university quoted in the paper, a tax expert here in Ottawa and the associate dean of Osgoode Hall who appeared before the committee last week and if we can believe the columnists who have written in the financial papers, it is supposed to be the biggest give-away, according to them not me, to the wealthiest people in Canada perhaps in Canadian history. Billions of dollars are being put off—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Baker: The hon. member is grumbling over there. Let him grumble with the deans of the law schools and the financial experts. Let him grumble with the people who appeared before the committee. Let him grumble with the finance department officials who came before that committee and said: "We do not know how much money is being affected here. We do not know how much money is in trusts in Canada". We do not know how much money, and we are passing a bill to again delay the paying of taxes for another 40 years? We are doing that while we borrow $31 billion, while we bring in the GST and tax everybody to death, and while we have 36 tax increases in the last eight years?

• (1435)

Then we turn around and, according to the experts not the politicians, give the biggest tax break ever to the billionaires in Canada in our history. Make no wonder that the one sentence that the Prime Minister repeated in his speech was about how healthy the finances of the Conservative Party are. He took off his glasses and he even repeated it before the cameras. He talked about how healthy the finances of the Conservative Party are and about how he was leaving it in a very healthy position. It is too bad he did not leave the Canadian country in a healthy financial situation today.

Make no wonder the big contributions are coming in to the Conservative Party of Canada today. Make no wonder it is the richest party on record in the history of this country. Of course it is. It is no wonder when we examine the legislation that is going through this House today, which is the legislation that the experts say is the biggest giveaway to the 20 or so billionaires we have in Canada, the biggest giveaway in our taxation history.

Governement members ask where we are going to get money. How about some of those people, and the numbers have doubled, making over a quarter of a million dollars a year who pay zero income tax in this country? How about some of those? That is not from business losses.

How about some of those making over 200 grand a year who are getting the GST rebate? Figure that one out. There are about 100. I suppose they would need about 100 children under the age of 18 to do that.

As for the two standards, one is saying they do not have any money so they have to borrow it and increase our taxes. The other is bringing legislation before this Chamber to help out just a tiny group of people. That is according to the deans of law and the tax experts in this country, not according to the politicians.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism): Madam Speaker, I am always entertained by the hon. member's comments. I am delighted that I was able to get into the House to hear what he had to say.

I was disturbed by the content of what he said and I want to say that as an economics lecture this presentation we just had was totally misleading, although it was a lot of fun.

As a matter of fact, in the American basketball championships we are apparently down to the final 16 and it reminded me a little bit of these basketball coaches we see on the sidelines waving their arms around and so on. It is a lot of fun watching them but I do not know whether there is any content to it. It is really the players out there who are scoring the baskets.

What disturbed me about his comments was that he was completely misleading when it came to the debt. I think he believes profoundly in what he just said so I want to turn him around and see if he will confess to not understanding, and after listening to me perhaps he will understand exactly what happened.

He said when the Liberals were the government they had a $220 billion debt and they were able to fund it internally through Canada Savings Bonds and Treasury Bills. Through Canadians more or less buying the debt we kept the money funnelling within Canada. That was his basic argument and he is quite right. About 90 per cent of our debt was funded internally, and about 10 per cent of it was denominated in foreign currencies: Tokyo, New York, Europe, wherever.

Then he argued that what has happened now with the debt, which has occurred since we have been the government, is that we have had to go outside home, outside the household and get other people to finance our debt. That was his argument.

I want to tell my hon. friend that the reality is that when we borrowed $220 billion at home until 1984 to finance the excesses of the Trudeau government during very good times we had reached the limit of our capacity to borrow at home from Aunt Nellie, Uncle Oscar, mom and dad, and brother and sister. We had reached the limit. That is what happened. The trouble was the previous government had put all sorts of people on the payroll, had all sorts of projects under way and left us with a $38 billion deficit in 1984 alone.

If we had come in and the next day decreased that to zero then hundreds, thousands of people would have been left without jobs, projects, and contracts. Therefore we could not turn that around all in one year, so we have tried to decrease the deficit steadily. In fact in 1993 it is now half the size of what it was in 1984 in relation to the size of the economy. It is very important to remember that $38 billion in 1984 was in a pie, called the Canadian economy, half the size of the pie we now have. Therefore a $30 billion deficit is half the size of what it was nine years ago.

Here is the point. We have had to borrow offshore in order just to pay the interest on this home debt that accumulated until 1984. As a matter of fact, that is all the deficit is. We have really been paying for interest on the debt we inherited, and that adds up to today's deficit. With our own operations we have run a surplus. By running a surplus on our own operations we are able to pay down the deficit even more than we would if we just broke even. The hon. member has to realize the reason we have had to go offshore to finance our debt is because we have reached the limits of financing it only internally.

Then he mentioned interest rates and said when we are financing internally we can set our own interest rates. No economist believes that. We have always had to maintain interest rates internally, the same as they are internationally. My hon. friend knows that and I think he should go back to economics 100 and have the reality clarified for him. I am making this intervention so he can respond to it. I always look forward to his responses, but I hope he stands up and admits he made a fundamental error in understanding economics.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will allow the hon. member some time to answer.

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, if I understand the hon. minister correctly he said, to use his words, that we had to go outside of the family. In other words, we had to go outside of Canada because Aunt Nellie does not have any more money. We have reached the extent of Canadian borrowing. Perhaps it is because Aunt Nellie does not trust the government anymore. Aunt Nellie and many more Canadians are investing in bonds in the United States. They are investing in all countries throughout the world and the minister claims there is no more money left in Canada.

One further thing, to clear up this business of credit. Standard and Poor's announced its most recent credit rating for Canada. That is on paper money. Granted, we do not borrow much in that form but we dropped. The province of Ontario with an NDP government now has a negative rating. The province of Newfoundland, supposed to be the poorest in Canada but now with a good Liberal government that knows where it is going, is now positive.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to say a few words on this borrowing bill.

I wish we could get our statistics right. I have a written, signed statement from the former Minister of Finance, the Minister for International Trade, indicating that at the end of fiscal 1984 the total accumulated debt was less than $168 billion. I like that signed statement so much I have circulated it throughout my riding. Why did I circulate it throughout my riding? I did so because government members have a tendency to inflate that figure in order to make themselves look better.

Either the minister did not tell the truth or he told the truth, and I believe he signed a true statement. It was less than $168 billion, the hon. minister said so. He signed it.

Let us look at the situation as it is today. We say the deficit is much better than what it was. It was predicted to be less than $30 billion. It is in excess of $30 billion. The debt now is over $450 billion.

• (1445)

Our colleagues from the government would like to make us believe that if we took that less than $168 billion debt in 1984 and factored in the interest, it would now account for the debt today. It is not true.

I have had three independent sources do that and it is absolutely totally false. It is only recently that the government has been spending in such a way that their program spending is less than what they take in so I think it is very important.

A point that is often forgotten is that there have been almost 40 tax increases and the revenues of government used to be approximately $70 billion. It is roughly $130 billion and that would have doubled if it had not made a major fiasco of its economic policy, if the recession had not set in and if the GST had yielded what it thought it would. However there has been almost a $60 billion increase. We have to look at that.

We have to look at how much more money is being made today and not just the increase in the debt. If we look at how much more it is making today and how much more that debt has in fact increased over time then how can it possibly stand up there and pretend and say without blinking an eye that it has managed well?

[Translation]

Let us ask Canadians whether they think this is good management. The Conservatives came to power with a debt of less than $168 billion and revenues of $70 billion and today they have a debt of $450 billion and have nearly doubled government revenues. Is that good management? Certainly not.

[English]

Their financial predictions have been off time and time again.

[Translation]

If they are fair, and some of them are, my hon. colleagues will admit.

[English]

The government boasts of the control of its expenditure levels, particularly of late. It tosses out these figures of 2.4 per cent and up. These figures are probably correct. I have no reason to doubt they are but one must ask how this came about. It was by cutting back transfer payments to provinces. That has been one major way. It was with the clawback and with the eradication of certain universal programs.

Let us look at the reductions and cuts to health and education. Between 1986 and 1995 there will be roughly $30 billion fewer dollars for health and education: $20 billion less for health and about $10 billion less for education. That was put on the backs of the provinces and the provinces put it on the backs of the universities, the colleges and the hospitals and the taxpayers.

It is the same as if I were to say: I have debts.

[Translation]

I could go home this evening, and tell my wife and children: "We are going to divide these debts in two. You take half." Then I could start telling everyone: "I liquidated half my debts." Of course I did. I shifted the tax burden to my wife and children.

The government shifted the tax burden to the provinces, colleges, universities and hospitals. That is what happened. That is why it can say, with some measure of truth, it controlled costs.

[English]

I have a final point. I know that some other colleagues want to join in the debate and I am looking forward to the questions. In fact I would be delighted to receive the questions.

The government has undertaken cuts in a number of areas that I think are very serious: seniors' programs, official languages programs—les langues officielles, women's programs, programs for the handicapped and programs for aboriginal peoples. These are some of the groups that are the most powerless in society and I am offended by that kind of approach.

I will conclude my speech, because I think some of my colleagues would like to ask some questions and I would like to answer them.

I think there is an hon. member on my left who would appreciate the time to make some comments. Provided he does not pick on the Liberals, I would be glad to share my time with him.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, I do not understand why the hon. member says we cut transfer payments to the provinces. If we look at the government's record from 1984 to the present day, transfer payments have increased annually. They may not have increased as fast as the provinces would have liked, but they did increase.

We must not forget one thing. I have been listening to the debate since we started this morning, and they say we need a job creation program based on public works, because it will generate jobs.

Where is the money supposed to come from? We must not forget, while we sit here as members of the House of Commons in our well appointed chamber, that the taxpayers are sitting in the gallery. If we do not tax them at the provincial level or the municipal level, is the federal government going to tax them? Come on. In the end it is still the same taxpayer who watches us on television. When we have financial problems, the federal government has to tighten its belt and the provinces have to do the same.

A few years ago the government of Ontario thought it could deal with its financial problems by running up a horrendous debt. In the process it created a demand for dollars on the international market because it had to borrow. The money came from countries like Switzerland and Japan. This put pressure on money markets and had a negative impact on the economy. And the same taxpayer is still paying the shot. If public works or students do not pay back their loans and we have to do it for them, the federal government gets the money from the taxpayers, who do not want to spend that money on their education or pay their municipal, school or provincial taxes. We will have to give them a break sometime.

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, I definitely want students who have a job and have the money to pay back their loans. I want to make that absolutely clear. I asked a question in the House today about what could be done for students who don't have a job and who are being harassed by collection agencies that are trying to recover this money.

An infrastructure program has been proposed by the leader of my party. If these people were working, if I am not mistaken, it would pay them about $17,000 or $20,000 per year. If these people on unemployment insurance or welfare were put to work, they would pay taxes, contribute to the economy and not be a drain on the federal Treasury and other resources.

I would like to refresh the memory of the hon. member who is very fair and explained more or less that what I call a cut is actually a reduction. I can live with his definition, but on this Friday afternoon when the sun is shining I would like to say, with all due respect for the spirit of friendship within these precincts, that the Prime Minister of the party in power today said several times that he would never tamper with the transfer formula. But he did. Yes, it is right there in his public speeches. Not only did he tamper with it, he reduced it by 2 per cent and again by another percentage point. He froze transfers, and this has been a real nightmare.

[English]

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to join in this debate for the last seven or eight minutes of the time that is allotted to this debate. I have been listening to the debate for most of the day. I am always amazed to see the Liberals and Tories ram heads with one another over who is going to provide the best economy and who will be the best economic managers of the state.

The fact is that neither of them has done what anyone would call an admirable job. Certainly to be more realistic they have done a disastrous job of handling the economy.

It has not been the New Democratic Party in power that has run up a debt of some $420 billion, which is soon to be $451.5 billion as we pass this borrowing bill in the next few days. As I stated earlier in the day I am always surprised when I hear Tories and Liberals saying how the New Democrats cannot manage or handle an economy. In fact we have not created the problem in this country at all.

• (1455)

I am from a province that has been one of the hardest hit during these economic times and certainly over the history of this country. Saskatchewan has suffered dearly. When the CCF government of Tommy Douglas came to power in 1944 it was a time when the province could not even borrow a dime. It was the CCF, the reigning socialists, that brought the economic situation in Saskatchewan under control and provided opportunities for farm families, small businesses and education. It was Tommy Douglas who modernized the province of Saskatchewan. It was not the Liberals. It certainly was not the Tories. The record is very strong.

We lost power in 1964 and the Thatcher government took over. Ross Thatcher's Liberal government was in for seven years. Although it did not do as much destruction as the Devine government did later, it still left a mess.

The Allan Blakeney government came into power in 1971 and was in power for some 11 years. During that period Saskatchewan saw some unprecedented growth in that province. In fact it was in 1981 when Diane Francis—I am not sure which columnist it was but it was certainly one of the columnists on the right wing of the political spectrum—made a comment that the New Democratic government in Saskatchewan was not only the best managed government in Canada but was the best managed government in North America. It was a well run government and it was done on social democratic principles. He did it with a surplus budget besides that.

What happened in 1982? The Tory government came in under Grant Devine. People made ridiculous comments: "There is nothing wrong with this economy. One can afford to totally mismanage the Saskatchewan economy and still break even". That is what Devine said. He ran a deficit budget every single year he was in power. In the meantime he sold off Crown corporations, sold off provincial assets and cut funding to all types of organizations that were trying to help the disadvantaged and the poor and so on in that province. That was the Devine record.

When the Roy Romanow government took over in 1991 it had a situation that was a disaster. The province was $15 billion in debt. There were 980,000 people to pay off a $15 billion debt that was created almost exclusively by the Devine government that was supposed to have managers and Tories who could manage the economy. He has a masters degree in economics. My God. What a disaster.

Now the Roy Romanow government in power is faced with some very difficult situations. It is this government that has faced up to the fact that if the deficit is not cut in the province of Saskatchewan then we simply will not be able to borrow money. In fact we are so close to the precipice that in fact the federal government has put in a contingency plan in case we cannot borrow money.

The Roy Romanow government has cut the deficit from $980 million from the last year of the Devine government to $590 million last year. It is going to cut it to $390 million this year. In three years it is going to have a balanced budget. This is being done by the socialist hordes and the people who cannot manage an economy.

One simply has to look at the Saskatchewan government for an example of how to manage an economy. Even the Deputy Prime Minister has given some credit to Roy Romanow.

We have not been doing it the same way that right-wing Liberals and Tories have managed it. We have still managed to put money aside for the socially disadvantaged. We have actually increased payments to social assistance in Saskatchewan. We increased funding for a child hunger program. It is not enough. I must say that I have been critical myself of some of the things the provincial government has done but it is certainly miles ahead of anything any Liberal or Tory government has done in this country. It provided increased funding for low income seniors and it increased home care funding by 20 per cent. It has increased foster care rates by $2 million.

It set out a situation where it had some modest tax increases this year. It was not income tax. It has said that there will be no more tax increases unless of course the government decides to do some more off-loading on to the provincial government.

I sit here in the House and hear Liberals and Tories banter back and forth about who can manage the economy better.

I would say that both of them have set really poor examples. Neither of them has a very good record on handling the economy. I think both these members on the government side and members on the opposition side would do well to take a look at Saskatchewan and its economy and take some lessons from the Saskatchewan government, which is not perfect but is certainly way ahead of anything I have seen on either side of this House or in any other province in Canada.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being three o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

POSTAL SERVICES REVIEW ACT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved:

That Bill C-217, an act to provide for the review of postal rates and services and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to move Bill C-217 in the House of Commons this afternoon. I am happy to see the member for Manicouagan here in the House. He also represents a rural riding. I also see the member for Beauharnois—Salaberry. They will understand the need for such a bill.

Why do we need Bill C-217? Let me indicate what others said in the past.

[English]

I want to quote from a press release dated June 27, 1988 which says: "Setting up a system that gives Canadians a voice in the planning of postal rates and services is an idea whose time has come". I quote further from the same person: "Now that Canada Post is breaking even", as it was at the time, "and revenues are coming out of the pockets of postal users, customers have a right to a say in both national and local issues".

Do you want to know who said that, Madam Speaker? It was the government House leader of today. If the government House leader, for whom I have such respect, said this was right I know it has to be right because the member for Calgary Centre would certainly not lead us astray on an important matter such as providing this kind of a service to Canadians.

When the minister made this announcement on June 27, 1988 he did so with great fanfare, telling us how important it was for Canadians to have a postal services review committee.

On August 15, 1988 the then Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, today the government House leader, introduced the Postal Services Review Board Act. I must confess something here. Bill C–217 that I have introduced today is plagiarized. Yes, I know that it is a sinful thing but it is, word for word, the bill that was introduced by the now government House leader, the then consumer and corporate affairs minister.

Therefore the government across the way cannot say this bill is unreasonable. The government cannot say this bill is undesirable or unworthy of support, not after the quotes from the government House leader that I read in the House earlier today.

Why do we need a structure like that, apart from the reasons just invoked, that the minister said was a good idea? We need the bill because Canadians need to have an agency to review the activities of Canada Post. The government across the way tells us Canada Post is a Crown corporation and it cannot interfere with its operation. On the other hand, Canada Post has by law of this Parliament a monopoly on many of its services. The government does not control it by its own admission. Canada Post has a monopoly on first class mail and has a monopoly on many of the services it offers.

We have in effect an unregulated monopoly in Canada right now. That is wrong. That is not the fault of the employees and many of the officials at Canada Post. That is an error in judgment on the part of the government. That is why we need an agency of the Government of Canada, an agency of the taxpayers of Canada to oversee the operations of the post office and to provide the post office with some direction.

Let me give an example of one of the things that I find wrong. I received a letter just today. I finished answering the correspondence at the back only moments ago. A female constituent from Maxville, a senior citizen, wrote to me saying roughly the following: "Mr. Boudria, I live in a rural area just outside the village of Maxville. I used to get the postal box for $6.10 a year. Now they charge me close to $60 for the rental of that postal box. It is wrong".

I had a conversation with her and explained to her that Canada Post looks at it this way: "You are given an opportunity to have mail free at your gate if you want to install a box there". The lady quite appropriately answered: "What good does that do me, as a person living alone, a woman and a senior citizen? Am I going to go out there and shovel snow or put the mailbox back on the post when the snow plough knocks it off in the middle of winter?" That is not a reasonable thing for that person. Yet those rates for the mailboxes are approved with the input of no one.

The price of stamps goes up every year. It is approved by Order in Council of the cabinet. Four ministers sign a stack of these every morning and then it is gazetted with no input from Canadians at all. That is not right.

Then there is the whole issue of cross–subsidization. I brought proof to a parliamentary committee some years ago that Canada Post was using some of its monopoly revenue to cross–subsidize other services that it offers in which it is in competition with the private sector. That surely is not right.

It is wrong for two reasons. First of all, why should someone who is paying for a postage stamp be subsidizing some bigwig at Canada Post who has it in his mind that he wants to start up a new business for whatever reason? Why should we do that? Second, it is not fair for the competitors of that service.

Here is the instance I discovered about a year and a half or two years ago. I found evidence that Canada Post was sending letters to its customers, large mail users, saying roughly the following: "Fill up your postage machines now. In filling up your postage machines we will give you credit vouchers to be used for Priority Post courier". The courier service of course runs in competition with private enterprise and it is unregulated. By encouraging people to buy large amounts of postage stamps to load up their postage machines in their offices, some of the revenue of that was used to cross-subsidize the other. That cannot be right. There is no agency to review this.

Canada Post needs a form of CRTC of the post office. Maybe the member across does not think that is necessary. That agency exists in the United States. There is a watchdog to review its postal service.

• (1510)

With the present unpopularity of our Canadian postal system in Canada, if there were no other reason, that alone would be sufficient reason why we would want to avail ourselves of the kind of agency I am suggesting.

More than anything else, the Marchment committee report some years ago recommended the creation of such an agency. The Marchment committee report recommended in 1985 the creation of an agency like this.

In 1988, as I said, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs announced that there would be a third party review of Canada Post Corporation's rates and services.

I brought to your attention that on June 27, 1988 the minister responsible at the time indicated that this was "an idea whose time has come". Finally, on August 15, 1988 the minister actually introduced the bill, a bill which is identical to the one I am proposing to the House today.

This has been an idea heavily promoted by the Conservative government with the support of all parties in this House. Yes, some of us said we wanted the bill that the government proposed to be a little stronger and so on in order to ensure that it had all the strength possible, but we were in favour of the idea.

What this House may not know is that the postal services review board, as proposed in this act, actually was constituted and its first chairman was Mr. Alan Marchment. It was called the Postal Services Review Committee as an interim step until the act was passed. It even reported to a committee of this House.

I have in hand the February 6, 1990 report of Alan Marchment, chairman of the Postal Services Review Committee, to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations. It is quite a lengthy report in which he recommended a number of improvements to Canada's postal service.

What did the government do? In the next budget after that report, it cancelled the Postal Services Review Committee. I have to ask the question, why? Could it be that the committee told the government what it did not want to hear? Could it be, I ask the parliamentary secretary who I see waving to me, that the government did not have the money to continue it? If it did not have the money, why did it create the thing to start with? It was in operation for only a year.

Postal users pay a lot of money for their postage stamps. Are they not entitled to have a say? Right now they do not have any.

Here is the recommendation of our committee in April 1990. The Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations Committee of the House of Commons in its report "Moving the Mail" said, and I quote here from our report: "The committee also believes that it is necessary to balance the interests of the regulator and the corporation by supporting both the review agency's need for information and the corporation's need for protection for commercially sensitive data. At the same time, we are of the view that as much information as possible about postal rates and services must remain in the public domain".

We even made recommendations about how much information Canada Post had to give to this committee. I continue: "The committee therefore recommends that anybody exercising review powers of Canada Post have legal authority to compel Canada Post to provide all information necessary for it to conduct an effective review in accordance with its mandate. Secondly, while ensuring that as much information as possible remain public, provision be made where necessary to allow the review agency to receive information from Canada Post in confidence".

This is a recommendation that received the unanimous approval of a committee of this House.

I say today to the government that it should speak in favour of the bill, provide its unanimous consent to allow the bill to go to a legislative committee for review and enactment as soon as possible.

I ask this of our colleagues across the way. They know it is the right thing to do. They know such a structure exists for other kinds of monopoly services in Canada. They know such a structure exists for postal services elsewhere in the world. They know the same bill and the same structure have even existed under the present government.

I ask them to do for once what Canadian consumers want, to stop this nonsense, stop their partisan way of looking at things, and think of the best interest of the Canadian consumer who is paying handsomely for postal services that are administered in an arbitrary and sometimes most unfair way.

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I come to the debate today with some different feelings. I have as much concern for the post office service in Canada as the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, but I also see the other side.

I came here today with strong feelings about the bill. Yet the member's argument has been quite persuasive for me in terms of the many viewpoints. The history of the situation intrigued me. At one time the government proposed a board, had a board and ended that board's life. In fact the party the member represents today at one time created the new independent post office structure on purpose so that it could compete in the communications area freely and without government intervention.

In spite of the argument of the hon. member for Glengarry— Prescott—Russell I propose that we do not support the bill today. Canada Post is one of the major players in the communications field. If we put on more regulations that increase costs and create obstruction we will simply curtail its ability to function in the interests of the Canadian economy and Canadian businesses.

Most members will recall that in 1981 the previous government, with the agreement of all parties, converted the old money losing post office department into a Crown corporation. At the time the minister of the Crown of the day, the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel, emphasized that the independence of the management of the new Canada Post would be one of the most important elements of making the new organization successful. As reported in the Debates for April 9, 1981, almost 12 years ago, he said at third reading of Bill C-42:

> The Canadian public will be getting a better service and, above all, management will have a chance to give a full measure of their ability knowing that they are in full control of the situation and that they do not depend on decisions in other departments in order to provide an efficient management of the Canadian postal service.

It interests me that the hon. member speaking for his party today, or perhaps it is just for himself in Private Members' Hour, has taken a contrary stand to that of people in his own party 12 years ago as much as perhaps we have done in the time since the board has been in place.

The former minister also dealt directly with the question of setting regulated rates for postal services. He appeared to be quite satisfied, and apparently members on all sides of the House on that day were as well, that the arrangements in the legislation for establishing rates would allow for an adequate public input. The legislation which still exists to this day provides for a six-month notification of proposed changes. New rates are published in The Canada Gazette for everyone to see. Interested Canadians can forward their comments directly to the minister responsible for Canada Post. They take advantage of that right to a great extent. It may be because they are not effective in overturning the rates that they do not feel their requests are heard but I know they are. Certainly I see them coming through my office. Cabinet must still approve the rates. It is not totally done by the post office. There is an elected group of people who make decisions and exercise final control over postal rates.

The level of review of Canada Post rates at this time is already extensive. The hon. member now believes it is necessary to remove Canada Post's independence. He said in his opening statement that Canada Post was unregulated. He wants to impose more regulations. He wants to make it more difficult for Canada Post to function. In present circumstances his idea is not warranted.

The result of removing the management of the post office from interference by government has been to generate positive benefits for Canadians. We do not want to go back to the time when every postmaster was appointed on the recommendation of a member of Parliament. I understand there was one small community in the east coast represented by a Liberal cabinet minister of many years ago which had five postmasters for one town of 1,500 people. We do not want to see that kind of thing happen again.

Let me say a bit about the positive accomplishments of Canada Post. Hon. members are aware, because they will have been mailing many letters back to their ridings and perhaps across Canada, of the quick turnaround right now in Canada Post. We have had episodes since 1984 when I was first elected of it taking 10 days to get a letter to my riding in the centre of Ontario and 10 days to come back. It was a 20–day turnaround. Now the turnaround is so quick I almost wonder if the first letter ever went out. I will write it on a Monday, mail it to my riding and have an answer back in my office on the Hill before the end of the week. That is a very common occurrence.

Once in a while one or two letters take off or a bag of mail gets hooked up and those hit the headlines. The service from Canada Post for first–class mail has been very good in the last few years.

Postal rates have gone up, when measured in absolute terms by hours of work. The cost of a stamp compared to relative costs in other parts of the world is among the lowest in the industrialized world. This is a definite competitive advantage for Canadians.

On the labour front we have had many occurrences of difficult labour–management negotiations. Canada Post and major unions representing all the employees have signed settlements which will run for the next several years. We are into a period of calm and quiet where delivery can be the main objective of Canada Post.

Following several decades of losses in places where we had to pump in money to keep it going and where the general taxpayers as a whole covered for the users, Canada Post is now in a positive cash flow. Some of the money put in to cover deficits in the past is now returning to the Government of Canada. While doing this Canada Post has found new and innovative ways to expand service and make postal service available and affordable to more and more Canadians.

The hon. member might, through this legislation, take us back to the days when Canada Post was a department of government and introduce again the level of political interference which I spoke about a little earlier. The deliberate arm's length relationship with management as envisioned by the former minister might be destroyed if this legislation is brought in. A return to the old ways of doing things is simply another reversal of policy and an attempt to establish another level of costly bureaucracy.

I do not think the hon. member recognizes that competition in the marketplace has also been very influential in the progress Canada Post has achieved. I am told by constituents that because of electronic communication the post office is dead. Despite that, the amount of products delivered by the post office seems to increase yearly. Direct competition for parcel, courier, faxes and other products has forced the post office ahead. Technological electronics and the communication field have had a positive impact in motivating Canada Post to improve in all areas.

Canada Post competes and competition forces improvements. It has a stronger effect on its service than any board that would delay decisions and bring in committee style management could ever hope to introduce.

• (1525)

The member is proposing through this legislation to burden in this competitive field the business of Canada Post with the cost of a new regulatory regime. In trying to do this I am sure the committee would want to know the plans of Canada Post and in consultation with the board would expose the plans of Canada Post to its competitors. This would make it very difficult for Canada Post to respond rapidly to a changing market environment. The effect in Canada Post would be to eliminate it from competitive markets and increase the cost of postal service. The proposition is unfair and not in the best interest of Canadians.

Finally Canada Post has already seen the wisdom of consultation and has had a forum of postal services users express their concerns. The value to both the corporation and its customers is obvious.

The corporation decided to establish postal service customer councils. In preparing for this speech I learned about the councils today. I had not realized they were there. Perhaps that says they should be more prominent or more evident. I know through these councils, through approaches to members of Parliament which occur regularly, and through letters to the minister there is already an effective scrutiny of the tariffs charged by Canada Post. It also has a customer service initiative. Together with the 10 regional customer councils these are now a model for other Canadians companies.

Implementing the bill would be a step backward. The proposition of the Ottawa member would add a burden to the current postal services. It would not be in the interest of Canadians. Political interference, second guessing management, distorting competitive balances while adding unnecessary cost and bureaucracy are not conducive to a healthy and viable postal service for all Canadians. For these reasons I cannot support the proposed bill.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak on the bill put forward by my colleague, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I am the seconder of the bill.

Despite the comments of my worthy colleague from Perth—Wellington—Waterloo I am very much in support of the bill. I must say I have the greatest respect for that member. I listened very closely to his comments. I believe I detected in the thread of his presentation a certain willingness. If not to accept the major thrust of the bill, his preliminary comments indicated that he a certain sympathy. I do not know if these were exact words but certainly my impression from listening to him was that he understood where the member proposing the bill was coming from. He had certain affinities with the principle of the bill. Then he went on to say that because of government interference, political interference, and the possibility of regulatory agencies or review boards slowing down the service of Canada Post he could not support it.

I found that very difficult to understand. The organization is operating properly, professionally and with skill, alacrity and efficiency. The member gave it good accolades. I agree we do have complaints from time to time with Canada Post, but by and large compared with the postal services of other countries and their per capita expenditure relative to ours we fare pretty well.

That is not the point today. I do not believe there is any system in the world that could not be improved on. I believe that Canada Post can be improved on. I am going to give the reasons for the main principles of why I believe in this and why I feel the way I do.

I have had occasion, as I am sure every single member of Parliament in this House has, to deal with Canada Post on several issues. The most frequent and recurring one is the corporate plan of Canada Post to shut down 5,221 post offices, not in urban Canada, but in rural Canada.

I understand this year it plans to close down over 250 post offices and the principle being used is when a natural opportunity occurs. This means when the postmaster or postmistress of a post office serving the smaller rural communities is about to retire, the Canada Post plan is to bring in a system that will change the post office. It will bring in either retail post offices or supermailboxes as they are called. I think it is a terrible misnomer. I do not think there is anything super about them at all.

It is a paradox when the hon. member who last spoke said he was not going to support my hon. colleague's bill because of the possibility and fear of political interference.

If there is any time for a review board to have some authority and watch what is called the efficiency of this organization, it is called into here and I will give the reason.

The member says he is afraid of political interference. Only three days ago I received a response from Canada Post, a three-page letter in turn, responding to a request that I had made regarding a rural post office in my riding. It was going to close because of a natural opportunity. The officials came down from Canada Post in January. It was right after Christmas. They listened to what everybody had to say, paid absolutely no attention and went back and said they were going to shut the post office down.

I wrote asking them to hang on. I was looking for fairness and balance. The thrust of my letter was that in the area of the Prime Minister's riding there were five rural post offices in which the natural opportunity had come up. One served a community of 121 people. It had to go out not once but twice and it is still looking for a postmaster or postmistress to operate that post office. The hon. member has the gall to say he does not want to support this bill because fear of political interference.

Everyone can draw their own conclusions from that. If that is the principle on why the hon. member is not supporting my hon. colleague's bill, then I think it is a pretty weak principle. I think he is dealing from a very, very distorted deck of cards and as a fiddler is playing very much out of tune.

I have citations here. My hon. colleague has given me tons of substantiations. I could stay here in the House as long as I would be permitted and give the testimony of those people. Who should know better than members in the House that there is a need and a necessity for such a board? I am going to quote one and I believe he is an authority.

On February 6, three years ago, Alan Marchment, the chairman of the then Postal Services Review Committee made a statement to the Standing Committee of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations of which my hon. colleague is a member. He said: "It is in the interest of the Canadian public to have a forum where rate and service charges must be reviewed publicly. As the relationship between Canada Post and the government becomes more arm's length, the need for a public return process increases". I understand Mr. Marchment is saying that if this kind of a review committee is implemented, the possibility of political interference will be reduced, not increased.

What is the purpose of the CRTC? I do not have its mandate here, but the purpose of the CRTC is to look at how radio and TV stations are licensed and to make sure the government cannot politically interfere. I am a great believer in democracy like all of us, but I have witnessed in the last four and half years the closure and time-allocated debates on important issues. We had one recently on the unemployment insurance bill. When we get the situation in our country with a majority like the present government has, it can use its ramrod and jackboot measures as long as it wants. Our political system allows it. There are no checks and balances that would prevent it from happening.

This is the perfect example of a Crown corporation that has been the subject of considerable, and I would say sometimes acrimonious, discussion in this House, in correspondence, in town hall meetings and in political rallies. It is an excellent opportunity for the government to show faith and to say: "Okay, we have nothing to hide. We are quite prepared to allow a review committee to be established to look into the rate and service charges". It should do this in order to dispel any rumours that perhaps the postal rates are subsidizing an aspect of Canada Post that by government order should be precluded because it is in fact in competition with industry. God knows, industry needs every break it can get today.

I am not going to quote what they said, but in addition to that man who has credibility and recognition in the area on which he commented, there was the Nielsen task force, a considerable task force in 1985, the second year of the mandate of this government and consumer and corporate affairs in 1988. They also made recommendations.

How did the government respond to some pretty authoritative people and authorities in making proposals which essentially formed the core of my hon. colleague's bill? In 1990 the government did away with the postal service review board. To top it all off, the minister responsible for Canada Post said: "Oh, I favour this hands-off approach regarding the closing of rural post offices and mail delivery standards and the like".

However, I want to say that because there is no review board or other watch-dog I am going back to Canada Post and saying: "In your very learned three-page response to my question you did not address the question as to why in the Prime Minister's riding the principle of natural opportunity has not been applied in the same way as it is being applied in my area and in others".

I want to conclude by saying that everything my hon. colleague says about this bill I like, but the defence of not doing it I did not like. It did not make any sense. In fact the remarks of the hon. member from the other side convinced me even more that we should all support this outstanding and very timely bill.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, thank you for giving me the opportunity to address you and the Canadian people this afternoon on this bill presented by my hon. colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I respect him a lot, although I cannot support such a motion for now.

I do not know what makes us politicians want to stick our noses into something that is going better all the time or going well, except to make political capital, even if it is only for as long as we speak in the House of Commons.

Canada Post had two important governmental decisions to make since it was created. When André Ouellet was the minister responsible for Canada Post, he made the first decision to privatize the postal system. It was a good decision.

Why did the government want to privatize the postal system then? It was to take from the House of Commons all sorts of decisions that were to be made about postal services and rates and other matters.

The other good decision about Canada Post was made after 1984-85, when the minister, Harvie Andre, told them: "Too bad, but starting now, you will have to cover your costs and come up with a corporate plan so that Canada Post will not depend on the government every year for the $200, $400 or $500 million you need to balance your budget".

• (1540)

One thing is clear, Madam Speaker. Why do we have postal services? To take a product and send it somewhere else at the lowest possible cost. Before, we would send the product somewhere else, but sometimes that was expensive and this was discussed in the House of Commons. Taxpayers watching us said there was no way they would pay 45 cents, so we told them we would charge 20 cents for sending the item and the government would subsidize the remaining 25 cents. It still came out of the taxpayers pocket, but that didn't matter.

Basically providing postal services means taking a product and sending it somewhere else as quickly as possible and at the lowest possible cost. In 1985 the government told the Canada Post Corporation that the lowest possible cost of sending a product to Vancouver, for instance, was the real shipping cost. In other words, do not count on the government to subsidize potential deficits.

Of course there was a risk because Canada Post was practically in a monopoly position and people were afraid it would become a monopoly and would make decisions without regard for the interests of the general public. However that was not the case. It did not become a monopoly, on the contrary. Personally I think that soon we will have fewer and fewer post offices, unfortunately perhaps in terms of the federal presence. Why? Because it is not a monopoly. Look around Ottawa or Montreal or other major Canadian cities and see the services of priority post as well as those of other companies being used every day. I am thinking of Federal Express, Purolator and United Parcel Service, and they even have aeroplanes with their own logo to carry the mail. There is no longer a monopoly as there was before.

Second, we now have fax machines. Some post offices could close altogether and use fax machines to send the same letters, provided the addressee has a machine as well. We no longer have a government monopoly, but a Crown corporation competing with other companies with different prices and costs.

We are still sympathetic to consultation, but consultation is not necessarily what people will do because the decisions made concerning Canada Post always lead to emotional situations. Just look at what is happening right near Rivière-du-Loup, where the people are rising up against Canada Post because it wants to close the post office. Any platform is good. If there were an advisory board to review this decision, I am not sure the debate would be more elevated or more dignified because it would be in the House of Commons.

The place to do it is in the municipality concerned. That is an excellent forum for it. That is the only place for someone supposedly defending the rights of that community to seek a party's nomination and stand for election. Federal elections will be held very soon. All that is good for visibility.

Advisory boards lead to consultations, which often arouse appetites that cannot be satisfied. People do not want consultation but participation.

I must take my product and send it at the lowest possible cost in the least possible time. When Canada Post became a corporation and was told to cover its costs, it understood one thing. It realized that to cover its costs, it must provide better service. They now have a prestigious independent firm, Ernst and Young, that conducts surveys every two or three months, I believe, to find out how satisfied Canadians are with the postal service.

• (1545)

Madam Speaker, it is a good thing you are seated because what I am about to tell you could be quite staggering. This survey showed that 98 per cent of the mail is presently delivered on time. That is good. In fact, it is great. This means it takes two days within the same town, three between major cities of the same province and four to reach other centers across the country. That is excellent and cost is factored into it. There are people who complain about the cost of stamps these days. There are still people in this country who want to be able to mail a letter for five cents. That is just not possible any more.

If you examine the situation in industrialized countries that have faced up to their responsibilities regarding their postal systems, you realize that the price in Canada is among the lowest for a service which is fast in most cases. Granted, there will be problems and it is those we always hear about. Inevitably some time, some place a letter will get lost.

Last week I received at home a letter completely torn in two, probably by the machine. It happened to me once in the eight years I have lived at that address. It was an accident. I could have brought that letter to the House and said: "This is outrageous. Look at what happened to that letter". In a sense I was happy because it was the electrician's bill and the part that was torn was the one showing the amount payable. I called my electrical contractor, Paul Bouchard, and told him: "Mr. Bouchard, I received a nice apology from Canada Post but your bill has been torn to bits. You will have to send me a new one". I received the new bill as well.

I live in Beauharnois, a small town with a population of some 7,000. The letter carrier service was granted to Beauharnois at a time when the town was developing. It is simply marvellous to have someone bring your letters home five days a week. Beauharnois was promised a great development and its population grew to 10,000 before it fell back to 7,000. Saint-Timothée, a town located five or six miles from Beauharnois, experienced significant growth during the last five or six years. It is now bigger than Beauharnois and wants letter carrier service and cannot get it. My time is almost up? I could go on for at least two hours. They cannot get the service. Do you know why I have the privilege to have mail delivered at my doorstep five days a week, and the people in Saint-Timothée do not? It is often because of what is written in collective agreements. I would be happy to receive my mail only three or two times a week and share the service with other people. But that is not how it works.

Advisory committees or committees such as the one we will be creating to review services which are becoming more and more competitive and challenged could improve matters. Also, and I will conclude with this, when the project was developed, we had the money to pay for it. Nowadays we do not have that kind of money and we can only afford to increase the service. Quality is what we will be judged on and Canadians will support us on this.

[English]

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate. I want to say I am certainly in support of this bill put forth by the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

I have to take some issue with the member for Beauharnois—Salaberry who just spoke. I think that what he is saying clearly demonstrates his government's misguided view. Surely it is not going to be helpful to the people across this country, particularly in rural Canada. He talks about being from a small town of 7,000. In my riding I am talking about communities of 100, 200, 500, maybe 2,000. There was a time in this country when the post office was here to provide a service for Canadians.

• (1550)

That is no longer the case. It is here to make a profit. If the member thinks we should be having a—

Mr. Hudon: That's not a bad idea.

Mr. Laporte: He says it is not a bad but a good idea to run it at a profit. If we are going to have a progressive country that encourages competition and development there are some services that we need, certainly in places like Saskatchewan. Since this government has been involved with deregulation and transportation and with this attitude toward postal service, Saskatchewan has been suffering and businesses have been suffering in that province.

If we ran everything strictly on a profit basis there would not be anybody living in rural Saskatchewan because there would be nothing there to maintain them. It has been of economic benefit to this country to maintain a viable rural infrastructure in this country. One of the reasons this country has a problem now is because of the policies of his government that have caused much of the demise of rural Canada.

Just to make some comments. He says that it cannot afford the services. Canada Post is making a profit these days. Canada Post has come to communities in my riding and said it is going to give them better service. It is going to close their corporate post office and, although it says it will consult, they either get a retail postal outlet or green boxes.

Communities have told me that if Canada Post wanted to come into their communities and break even they would have been willing to work with it. Briercrest said it did not need service six days a week. It gets its post six days a week and would take it five days a week if it would then break even. The town of Simpson in my riding offered Canada Post a free building if it could keep its post office. Communities have offered the help of volunteers to assist the postmaster or postmistress. Canada Post has refused them all. That is because it is not interested in providing service for Canadians, but in selling Canada Post. That is what it is interested in doing.

If we are going to allow it to be taken over by a private corporation that is going to run it at a profit then it is not going to have post offices in many areas of rural Canada pure and simple. That is because it is a business that is there to make a profit. I understand that is the hon. member's view. If that is his view, I submit if we are to have a healthy economy that is going to develop and allow businesses to establish and communities to maintain themselves and grow then we need some services. It should be the responsibility of this government to provide those services.

I want to speak more specifically to the bill itself. The idea of setting up a services review board was introduced by the then Minister for Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the government House leader, who said in a news release back in 1988: "Setting up a system that gives Canadians a voice in the planning of postal rates and services is an idea whose time has come. Now that Canada Post is breaking even and revenues are coming out of the pockets of postal users, customers have a right to a say in both national and local issues". I agree with that. That is a good approach. They should have a say in those issues.

The body was actually set up for a period of time under Alan Marchment, who actually made some reports. When these reports came out they were very critical of the government. Suddenly the whole atmosphere changed, the committee disappeared and was gone.

If we are going to maintain some service in this country we cannot simply allow a government to tell Canada Post that its bottom line is to get rid of as many rural post offices and urban post offices as it possibly can and to privatize as many post offices as it possibly can in order to sell the Canada Post business.

It may be okay for the city of Toronto, I do not know. It may be fine there because there will be a lot of competition. Purolator will go into Toronto. Purolator will work in the area of southern Ontario and certain areas in Quebec. I would like the hon. member to go up to northwestern Quebec, to Abitibi, Normétal, Dupuis and those places, and see what they would think about losing their post offices up there. Go into rural Saskatchewan, go into any part of rural Canada, go into rural Newfoundland. These are areas that need a service. As Canadians we should have a right to expect some basic services in this country. Certainly Canada Post is one of them.

If the attitude of this government had been adopted in the history of this country, certainly places like Saskatchewan would not have developed the way they have. It was because of a desire to provide transportation, for example, that the Saskatchewan transportation company was set up by an NDP government because Greyhound would not go to some small communities. Yet these small communities where there are businesses, and service stations needed that service.

I know as a lawyer working in small town Saskatchewan I certainly could not afford to run my practice having mail two days a week. It would not work.

I think the bill put forth by the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is the right approach. I think the position put forth by the government some four or five years ago is a good approach. Everything in this country simply cannot run on free enterprise and bottom line competition. That is not how this country was built. It was John A. Macdonald with the national policy. If John A. Macdonald had believed in free enterprise we would never have settled the west because that was a program to encourage development in certain regions of the country, namely western Canada.

To have that sort of attitude simply is not going to work, especially when we live in a country that is the second largest in the world geographically. Thirty-three per cent of Canadians, one in three Canadians, live in three cities: Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver. Forty-seven per cent live in nine cities.

If we are going to maintain some kind of infrastructure, we have to be committed to providing services to rural Canadians through transportation, postal service, health care delivery, education, and a whole host of issues. That has to be the commitment.

Yes, we have to cut down our deficit. Yes, our debt is too high. Absolutely. We can do that and still provide some of the services. Certainly Canada Post does not have to be privatized. It is making a profit. It is providing a service. However, it is now taking an attitude that is ripping the heart out of rural Canada.

I want to say in closing that I support this bill. I think it is the right approach to proceed with. I just regret that we are only going to have one hour of debate on this bill. It will die on the Order Paper. That is a tragedy. It certainly deserves far more debate and far more interest than that.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario) moved that Bill C-363, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act (limitation on rebate), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise today with pleasure to lead off debate on Bill C-363. It is a very simple bill as members of the House will know by looking at it.

It is a one paragraph bill and I will read it for the record. It states that subsection 120(8) of the Excise Tax Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor under limitation section 8: "No rebate shall be paid under this section unless the application therefor is filed with the minister before 1993".

• (1110)

What does that mean? It is very simple. When the Government of Canada set out to change the old manufacturers' sales tax, the old federal sales tax, the replacement tax was called the goods and services tax. I know that all members of the House are aware of the new tax.

Part of the implementation of the the GST was a rebate mechanism so that businesses across Canada could look at their inventories and determine how much federal sales tax was in their inventory. In the old system of federal sales tax or manufacturers' sales tax, when a retailer bought merchandise from a manufacturer, built into the purchase price was the existing federal sales tax. The government established a rebate system. There were a few other numbers, but primarily 8.1 per cent of a retailer's inventory would be eligible for a rebate.

When the tax was implemented on January 1, 1991 the rebate was available to companies for their year-end inventory but they had to file within one year of year end. Basically they had to file in 1991 for their end of 1990 inventory. Businesses generally filed throughout 1991.

However, at the end of 1991, people checked their returns from previous years and discovered that some people had not filed for a number of reasons. Perhaps it was a very small business and its accounting systems were not up to the standards of large corporations. Or, if it was a partnership, one thought the other had filed the return when it was not done. Maybe it was found in a subsequent audit.

I should point out that in my constituency I had three businesses come to me concerning this situation. One was a very small business which was eligible for about $8,000 in rebate. They found, having done their own returns the previous year, business had grown a little bit. In 1992 they hired an accountant. The accountant looked back at their 1991 returns and mentioned to them that they had missed out on their inventory rebate because it had not been filed.

This company had an inventory just under $100,000 and its sales were in the range of $300,000 a year. It had missed out on its $8,000 inventory rebate because its owners did not have the expertise to file in the first year. The accountant filed on their behalf but they were not eligible for the rebate.

Another company had a larger inventory. Again it was not a huge company but was eligible for an $80,000 rebate. Its owners thought they had filed in May 1991 but it was nowhere to be seen. They inquired in October 1991 concerning their rebate. They thought they had filed for it in May 1991. There was no record of the rebate, possibly through some sloppiness within the company. In January 1992 they sent in their rebate application and missed the deadline by 12 days. This is another company that was unable to get a refund of that inventory rebate.

Who does this legislation affect? It certainly does not affect General Motors of Canada, the large manufacturing companies or the large retailers. They all have the accounting systems, the professionalism, to make sure their rebate applications were sent in on time.

This helps small business, those people who simply because of size did not have the resources to file their applications at the right time, or in some cases through sloppiness did not file, or they were too busy trying to deal with the recession, employ people and sell the goods they had to go back and file later.

The reason I am bringing this bill forward is to make it possible for an extension for all those who did file in 1992, only to be told they had filed too late. We have the records of who all those people are, I am sure, within the Department of National Revenue. This would provide an opportunity for all those small businesses to get an infusion of money they were eligible to have given back to them in the form of a rebate, to receive it back into their businesses as cash flow.

The government prides itself on its activities with small business. In fact the Minister of National Revenue, in releasing a document on March 18, 1992, talked about a tax fairness package. I would like to quote from a press release that was issued in relation to that tax fairness package.

> Speaking at the Macdonald Cartier Club, Mr. Jelinek noted that "the Fairness Package demonstrates my commitment to a simpler and fairer tax system. It will allow for common sense in dealing with taxpayers who, because of personal misfortune or circumstances beyond their control, are unable to meet deadlines or comply with rules."
> "We must now concentrate on making the system more open—We cannot expect Canadians to have to dig through our policies and directives to discover what their rights are. It is up to us to take the initiative to reach out and make sure people know and understand how to take advantage of benefits offered by these new measures."

My private member's bill fits right into the comments of the Minister of National Revenue. Some small businesses could not meet the requirements of the government. They were only given 12 months to apply for a rebate. In keeping with the minister's perspective, I think we should have made it possible for small businesses to apply for their rebate at least for another year.

I have another comment in June 1992 by the Minister of National Revenue. It is a press release as well, and I will quote from it:

> "Many of the improvements have been made possible through new technology, which has been a cornerstone in our ongoing effort to increase competitive opportunities for business and to improve and simplify service to all taxpayers"—

Again a lot of the companies I am familiar with that missed out on the inventory rebate were doing the kinds of things the minister was suggesting: getting more modern, getting more technology, getting more up to date. In doing that they discovered that in some cases they were ineligible for the rebate on their inventory.

If this bill were in isolation, if this bill said: "We are going to extend from one year to two years the returns that are eligible, and nowhere else in the system can you qualify for a rebate after more than one year", I could understand the government not being in favour of this kind of legislation. It would be a fundamental change. The fact of the matter is the change is in this legislation.

Look at some of the other legislation people take advantage of in Canada, for example the tax fairness package mentioned by the Minister of National Revenue. If someone is eligible for a refund on income tax and for some reason has missed a deduction, a credit, or simply has not filed, that person is eligible for a rebate going back to 1985. Some seven years in back taxes can be claimed if you are eligible for a rebate.

On the income tax side, businesses can file for three years back for their income tax return and be eligible for a refund of the income tax they owe simply by filing. They have three years to do this.

If a business pays excise tax in excess of what it should and in doing its auditing checks its accounts and discovers it has overpaid its excise tax, it can file for a rebate of that extra payment. It has two years in which to file a claim.

In fact, in the GST legislation if a business finds at the end of a year that it has overpaid the amount of GST or has not claimed back the credits it is eligible for, it can claim those credits as the legislation allows back four years. I appreciate the legislation is not four years old, but as this legislation improves or as it extends in time all businesses will be eligible for a rebate of the credits on GST for up to four years. Yet for some reason we have put in place a one-year limitation on the FST rebate.

My private member's bill changes that limitation from one year to two. Some might argue that we should go back three or four years, and certainly I do not have a problem with that based on the other record. It seems to me that the businesses with which I have had contact have missed the opportunity to claim the refunds.

My private member's bill is really quite simple. It does that. It allows businesses, basically small businesses, to go back for another year to claim a rebate on the inventory that they have truly paid for, that they can verify under all the rules and procedures that have taken place.

I hope that members will speak in support of this piece of legislation. Unfortunately I believe it will not be coming to a vote. Nonetheless the merits of the legislation are really very straightforward and I hope that all members of this House will see fit to support it.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-363. I support the idea that the rebate period should be extended on the manufacturers' sales tax, or the inventory portion of the FST.

I have to use this bill to illustrate again that the GST is a poorly designed tax. It is a poorly designed tax and this bill further demonstrates the point, because we are adding a further paper burden on small business.

I compliment the hon. member on the notion. It should be a standard procedure. I do not know why he does not go with the normal three years as people were converting from the old tax to the GST, which to this day I do not support. It created red tape and it made bureaucrats out of most of the small businesses in this country.

This is another example of where the government did not really realize the difficulties that small businesses have to cope with.

The hon. member kept talking about the Minister of National Revenue talking about tax fairness. Last week the deputy minister of revenue appeared before the public accounts committee. He talked about the fact that the gross GST revenue is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $30 billion but after the credits, the costs and the conversion from the old tax to the new tax there is approximately $15 billion in net revenue. That is what the net is on the GST.

The Department of National Revenue has no cost benefit analysis of the GST. The Department of National Revenue has no sectoral analysis of the GST; in other words how much money was taken in from the tourism sector in this country before the GST and after the GST or how much money was collected in terms of general revenue in the retail industry before the GST and after the GST.

I want to talk about the cost to small business. The Department of National Revenue mentioned in committee that the departmental work cost $150 per registrant. That is what it cost the Treasury for the 1.6 million registrants.

• (1125)

However it has done absolutely no analysis of what it cost small business. We have a bill this morning in which a respected member on the finance committee is recognizing the paper burden, the added work that is taken on because of the transfer and the GST.

I would not be surprised if the cost of the GST to small businesses was somewhere in the neighbourhood of $1,500 to $2,500 per business a year. I do not think that is an unreasonable cost.

If we multiply that cost by the 1.6 million registrants it would mean that there is effectively no net positive take from the GST. The GST has really been a big loser.

The bill this morning further illustrates that the design of the GST was not a good one. When they were taking into account all the transfer conditions and difficulties they should have understood that small businesses would not immediately understand all the complexities of the GST and would not understand all the forms and rebate mechanisms.

I also have had many small businesses in my riding—and when I say many I mean four or five—come to me in the last four to five months on this issue. With the GST they have to take on added accounting responsibility and their accountants have discovered that they have been short-changed on the rebate mechanism from their inventory.

The department right now is not honouring them. It is saying that they are beyond the one-year period of eligibility for the rebate. Needless to say, when we have an economy such as we have today our small businesses are having a heck of a time getting cash, especially from the banks.

I still have not seen anything from the government on advertising the Small Businesses Loans Act. The minister said last Thursday when it received royal assent that we would see something immediately, but I have not seen anything yet.

However here is another example where the government has at least had a bit of a deathbed conversion in the sense that it is recognizing that there are a lot of small businesses that missed the opportunity because of the complexity of the GST in converting from the FST and converting their inventory into the new mode.

I compliment the member for catching this. It is very important that we correct it. I cannot wait for the day when we can deliver to Canadians a system that is simple, fair and efficient. The government has designed a tax, the GST, from which the gross revenues are $30 billion and the net revenues are $15 billion. That is before a cost on the underground economy which is estimated to be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $20 billion to $30 billion.

That is not counting the cost of the damage it has done to the general lack of confidence in the country which has exacerbated the unemployment insurance and welfare conditions in this country. It is not including the fact that individual businesses must incur added costs as a result of the GST process.

When we figure all these things in my calculations show that the GST is the biggest loser in terms of a tax that has ever been perpetrated on this country. I cannot wait for the day when that GST is just washed away.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C-363. My party and I are pleased to support the member's amendment to the Excise Tax Act to ensure that there is a better break for small business. The small business community was caught somewhat short when the GST was brought in.

• (1130)

In his remarks the member pointed out quite well that it was the small business community, those who often do their own books or have to hire an accountant to do books, that had missed out on deadlines with respect to the inventory rebate. It is important we ensure that the small business community is given all the advantages it can be given in this time when we in Canada are looking for the small business community to lead the recovery after the long and deep recession we have been in.

The member has pointed out in this particular amendment, on the back of the bill we spoke to the week before last on more amendments to the GST, and there were almost 300 amendments to the GST bill in that particular bill, that there are many problems with the goods and services tax. These problems are starting to raise their heads. Perhaps they had not been thought of and should have been thought of through a more in-depth look at where this bill was going.

The cost of this particular legislation to the small business community has been devastating. While the member for Broadview—Greenwood has pointed out that there have been no studies done by Revenue Canada with respect to the cost to the small business community, a recent survey conducted in the past year by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business of its members pointed out that the cost to small business has been excessive.

If we are to continue with this foolish goods and services tax that over 82 per cent of all Canadians said they did not want and still do not care for, we have to look at the cost of administration to the small business community. Right now in almost every province the small business community gets an administrative fee back from the collection of the provincial sales tax.

In the case of the goods and services tax the burden of the administration of this horrible tax falls on the small business entrepreneur himself or herself. That cost is substantial. The cost to the small business community is not just in the administration of that tax but also in the fact that in border communities people go cross-border shopping to get their goods and services where they do not have to pay tax.

Recent studies done in my riding and in other parts of Canada by various organizations have shown that it is the taxation level that has to a great extent caused people to go across the border to shop. The burden of the added 7 per cent goods and services tax has been one that people simply are not willing to pay anymore. A study done in my riding showed that the majority of people going across the border were doing so to escape the goods and services tax.

This has fallen off substantially over the last little while because of the dropping exchange rate. It is a positive step to ensure that the exchange rate is lower. It helps our communities along the border to ensure they remain competitive among the people who would normally shop there.

The member for Broadview—Greenwood commented with respect to the public accounts committee on which I sit how in discussing the administration of the goods and services tax people in our ridings and across Canada often ask what has been collected and how much of this money is going toward debt reduction. From looking at the public accounts and speaking to the officials of Revenue Canada it appears that over $29 billion has been collected from the goods and services tax. Of that amount over $14 billion has been returned in rebates of various kinds and natures, bringing the level down to something in the area of $15.3 billion that is netted out.

Revenue Canada officials tell us that net does not take into consideration the administration costs for the government, so we are looking below the $15 billion mark; in other words approximately a 50 per cent recovery for the amount that we are collecting from the people of Canada on the goods and services tax.

It is not a very efficient tax. It has been pointed out that there are 400,000 small businesses that did not have to register for this, businesses with under $30,000 a year in gross revenues, that in fact have applied. There are various reasons why the small business community may want to apply to ensure that it gets tax rebates for major capital expenditures, but for the most part it appears that these people could be weeded out with a proper push by the Revenue Canada taxation people to ensure that they understand exactly what the tax is all about and whether in fact it is to their advantage.

In talking to a number of community organizations throughout the province of British Columbia, a number of them registered for the goods and services tax because they felt they had to do it. The misunderstanding of community organizations was with businesses grossing under $30,000 and in most cases not having major capital expenditures where they would be getting rebates.

This is a burden to not only them in filing but also to Revenue Canada taxation. I think we also have to look at that area of the goods and services tax to try to get the numbers of people who have registered down and get the efficiency rate of Revenue Canada up.

Over all I think we have recognized that the small business community is the community to lead us out of the recession. The government has taken steps toward this in the Small Businesses Loans Act, but I think the government must also look at the devastation that it has wreaked upon the small business community with legislation like the goods and services tax at a time when the government was warned that we were heading into a recession and that the goods and services tax coming on stream when it did would cause nothing but devastation, would increase the inflation rate, and would cause problems for the small business community with people not wanting to purchase from it. I think that has proven correct.

We have to look at what we should do in place of the goods and services tax to kick-start the economy with the small business community. We have to bring in fair taxation where all Canadians are treated on an equal basis of fairness. We have to look at a phase-out of the goods and services tax starting first of all with things like books. They should never have been taxed in the first place. Placing taxation on education is simply unbelievable. It was stupid at the time and it is stupid now.

I would suggest that with a proper phase-out of this tax we can bring in tax fairness to all Canadians, a tax that is progressive, not regressive, and ensure that the Canadian people get back on track, that the unemployment rate of over 11 per cent is dropped substantially to single digit numbers and that all people in Canada feel they are part of the Canadian economy and part of the recovery.

We have to go one step further than this member has gone in ensuring that the small business community has the opportunity of getting rebates by doing away with the tax totally.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to comment on the bill introduced by the hon. member for Ontario. On January 1, 1991 the new legislation on the GST came into effect. At the time, our government allowed businesses with inventories on which they had paid the manufacturers' sales tax a period of 12 months starting January 1, 1991 to file for the rebate which could then be passed on to the consumer.

• (1140)

I am referring to all businesses registered with Revenue Canada at the time that had already paid the tax. As a result of these claims the government paid out $2.5 billion in rebates. The government felt that during this 12-month period businesses had been given ample time to file their claims considering that the purpose was to enable businesses to pass on the savings to potential customers.

If today the government were to extend the deadline beyond December 31, 1991 I do not think that purpose would be served. I doubt the few businesses that failed, for whatever reason, to file for their rebate would pass the savings on to consumers who purchased the goods during the past 24 months. And that is not what the government intended.

The rebate was suppose to have the effect of reducing the price of certain goods, and that is exactly what happened. Finance Canada said when we were arguing in favour of the GST that there would certainly be a 1.25 per cent increase in consumer prices once the GST was put in place and, as you know, this included services. However, as a result of the business inventory rebates the increase was not 1.25 per cent but 1.1 per cent, an advantage for the consumer.

That was one of the benefits of the GST and I take credit for qualifying the government's position on proposals for changes. I would also like to mention that the GST has had a positive impact on exports of Canadian products to foreign markets. Before the GST was introduced the tax component of our exports was as much as 13 per cent. After the GST was introduced Canadian exporters, according to the Canadian Manufacturers Association, had a competitive edge equal to 1.6 per cent of their total sales. The result has been better penetration of foreign markets. This is one of the major advantages of the GST which is also responsible for increased sales of manufactured products to the United States since 1989-90 and during the present decade.

The same applies to capital equipment costs which are major inputs that must be recouped by Canadian manufacturers. The Canadian Manufacturers Association claims that the price of equipment used to manufacture products has gone down 4 per cent as a result of the GST. That 4 per cent represents $3.5 billion.

Retailers have confirmed that the price of most of the products they sell has gone down as a result of the GST. Because of the positive impact of the GST Canada's total GNP for one year increased by $9 billion, which means about 60,000 new jobs. According to an article in the Toronto Star of December 31, 1992—a newspaper that can hardly be accused of supporting the government's policies—even the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, which speaks for small business and fought the new tax tooth and nail, is starting to get used to the idea of a new tax system in Ottawa. The Federation says its members have spent millions of dollars to put the GST in place and are not prepared to accept any more changes.

It was also said that the GST would be an inexhaustible source of new money for the government and that was one reason why people should object to the tax. That is not the case. The GST has raised about 15 or 16 billion dollars annually, even less than anticipated. We are not seeing phenomenal amounts flowing into the Treasury as a result of collecting the GST.

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude my remarks with a comment from the Free Press of February 13, 1993, which says that although it is not perfect the GST is about the best tax we could have. It is visible. It is hard to evade. Even millionaires and their lawyers have to pay 7 per cent more on all goods and services. People said the GST would penalize the little man but the opposite is true. The GST penalizes on the basis of what you buy, and since the wealthy buy more they will pay the lion's share of the GST.

For all these reasons I believe it would be inappropriate to make these changes and focus the energies of an increasingly expensive bureaucracy on a new accommodation for the sake of a few businesses that had 12 months to take advantage of the opportunity given them by the government to file their claims. That is why I recommend the status quo.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, this whole matter of the rebate under the goods and service tax was discussed in the finance committee hearings during 1989. It would have been discussed more fully had the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party not boycotted the hearings dealing with the bill.

The boycott by the member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt indicates the attitude that created all sorts of problems in this legislation. The reason we need the changes we now have before the House in legislation is that we could have done a better job in putting the bill through had members on the opposite side of this House put their minds to the whole matter.

Mr. Whittaker: Shame.

Mr. Blenkarn: The member of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt is now saying "Shame". He is the member who came to committee meetings but did not do much in the way of input.

With the goods and services tax we changed one consumption tax for another. The new consumption tax called the goods and services tax came into effect on January 1, 1991. Prior to that all goods in the hands of retailers bore some degree of federal sales tax. It was difficult to determine what the federal sales tax was.

Some people bought from a wholesaler; some people bought directly from the manufacturer; and some people bought from a company that imported goods into Canada. In some cases the goods went through two or three hands before they came to the retailer. The goods were all taxed originally at the manufacturers' gates at 13.5 per cent by and large, but what the amount of the manufacturers' tax was on the shelf of a retailer was difficult to determine. After a great deal of discussion the government came to the view that 8.1 per cent of the gross inventory of a retailer could be said to represent the former manufacturers' sales tax. That was the rule of thumb.

In some cases there was substantially less tax. In other cases there was substantially more tax. In order to be fair in transferring the system, in moving from one system of taxation to another system of taxation, business people were given a year if they wanted to claim on a deduction basis, from their monthly or quarterly tax remittances 8.1 per cent of their inventory held for sale. Businesses were also given $1,000 to set up their books.

My friend speaks of businesses that did not bother doing all that. They should have done it, but they did not do it. The question is: How long should the system of government stay open to look after people who do not do what they are required under the law to do?

Remember this is a one-shot matter. This is not like failing to file income tax, not paying taxes on time, or not doing something on time where there will be penalties and so on, something that can still be done. This is a situation of determining what is the final amount one should get back, deducted from inventory, and inventory ought to be available for it to be proven.

When someone comes in a year later and makes a claim, how do we audit the inventory? How do we go back to check whether the claim is correct? What kind of staff is the government supposed to have, to keep on tap to look after problems that develop a year later or over a year later?

The problem is that when changing from one system to another we need fixed rules as to when the change takes place. The matter was discussed in the committee I chaired of making recommendations concerning the report of the government or working out the goods and services tax in the first place.

At one point the government's view was that it should not give any rebate at all, that the tax should be imposed and the old buried manufacturers' tax would stay in the system and we would not bother giving any rebate at all. We felt in committee that was unfair, that people ought to get a rebate, and the matter was argued out. The member who is proposing the bill was on that committee. We argued it out.

We came up with a year. We came up with this system. It is a rough and ready system. It did give a rebate for those who filed but they had to file. They had to claim. They had to claim the $1,000 accounting claim too. They had to do a lot of other things. They had to get a number. If they did not do that, too bad. There was a lot of advertising. There were lots of public discussions. The papers were full of it. The opposition made sure the papers were full of it day after day.

It is surprising how people could say they did not hear about it or they did not know they had to do it a whole year after the goods and services tax came into place.

This is a very important tax system. It is a tax system that works exceptionally well. It is one of the great advantages in our economic system that is leading us out of our recession. It has made it possible for our businesses to be more than competitive with the Americans. It indicates why the American ways and means committee is now studying our tax system and will be using it.

Mr. Mills: Fifteen years from now.

• (1155)

Mr. Blenkarn: It is too bad the member opposite does not understand the goods and services tax and how we do not add the cost of tax to our exports any longer or penalize people who manufacture in Canada any longer. But we do not. This system is working well.

I understand the desire of my colleague who has brought in Bill C-363 and the reason for the claim. However I have to say to him when changing over from one system to another there comes a time when one has to say: "That is it". Unfortunately that is it as the far as the one year is concerned.

Therefore, may I say that I do not believe we could accept the member's bill as a piece of legislation at this point. We have had a full two years of the goods and services tax. There have been very substantial rebates. The tax is in place and working well. It did not lead to the inflation that was suggested; indeed, that has been eliminated. After all, the rebate system was designed so that the money could be put back into the economy during 1991 when the change-over was taking place. 1992 is beyond the year period. By 1992 all of the inflation had been absorbed as a result of this tax and so the need for the rebate had also been absorbed.

Mr. Whittaker: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like to take this opportunity to set the record straight with respect to the comments of the member for Mississauga South where he advised that the members of my party had boycotted. We have not—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but it is a matter of debate. It is not a point of order.

Mr. Whittaker: I would like to set the record straight. We have never boycotted any committee meeting.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. I simply remind hon. members that differences of opinion expressed in the House of Commons are not necessarily points of order. Therefore, since little time remains in the debate, I must recognize as soon as possible another member who wishes to speak. The hon. member for Edmonton Southeast has the floor.

[English]

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I will stop before the time runs out on this debate so that one of the government members no doubt will get up to talk and debate the bill out.

In reply to the point we just heard from the member for Mississauga South, it was a biscuit maker from Toronto who pointed out to me that the GST was going to have a significant impact on their export sales. I remind the member that the manufacturers' sales tax did not apply to exports before.

He might be interested in hearing how it was going to adversely affect the export sales of this biscuit manufacturer. In just a couple of sentences, it was believed that if the GST hit domestic biscuit sales the demand for biscuits would go down an estimated 15 per cent. This would mean cuts to staff, cuts to employment. Therefore the cost per export biscuit would go up significantly and would make their sales to the United States in this case less competitive. This would be as a direct result of the goods and services tax which those opposite always cite as being a panacea.

Let us have no more of this drivel that the GST helped our export sector. For those who may not know it on that side of the House, as I said before the manufacturers' sales tax never applied to exports.

Just to pick up on the point made by the member for Broadview—Greenwood, we understand the GST is now raising about $30 billion a year. There are about two million registrants. I think I can fairly say that my friend from Broadview—Greenwood knows the small business community better than anybody on that side of the House. He estimates that it costs about $3,000 per registrant for having the privilege of collecting the GST. If we deduct the credits, the family credits and the input credits, the revenues are about $15 billion. If we take off the other $3,000 times two million registrants that is about $6 billion. Basically, in terms of being useful to the economy, we get down to about $9 billion which this abomination is creating for our economy.

• (1200)

The hon. member mentioned the underground economy which has flourished under this. I bet that a good number of the members on that side of the House know people who live more and more through personal corporations. They buy cars for personal use. I know Revenue Canada does not like that. However, they have a personal corporation and can buy a car, use it for personal use and claim the import tax credit. However, most Canadians do not have personal corporations for one reason or another.

This tax is making it harder for fairness, which has never been a concern for members on the other side of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

[Translation]

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the item is dropped from the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-92, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and certain related acts, as reported (with amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There are four motions in amendment set down on the Notice Paper for report stage of Bill C-92, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and certain related acts.

[Translation]

Motion No. 1, standing in the name of the hon. member for Sudbury, will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motion No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam, will not be selected as it is identical to Motion No. 1.

[Translation]

Motion No. 3, standing in the name of the hon. member for Sudbury, will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motion No. 4, standing in the name of the hon. Minister of Finance, will be debated and voted on separately.

I shall now propose Motion No. 1 to the House.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-92 be amended in Clause 42

"(11) Subsections (2) and (5) apply to the 1991 and subsequent taxation years."

[English]

She said: Mr. Speaker, I move this motion which deals with clause 42 of Bill C-92. It has to do with the 21-year rule on private trusts.

I was very careful to allow the part of the amendments to private trusts to stand. It is very important that the private trusts not be allowed to be refreshed so that the extension of the rules will not be allowed to go on in perpetuity.

On the other hand, it is very important that we keep the 21 years. One of the reasons it was put in place back in 1972 was definitely to ensure that at some point family trusts which had been set up would be subject to capital gains taxation. This was a way of deciding at what point the assets would be valued and capital gains taxation would apply.

The government was trying in many ways to remove this 21-year rule in committee. I studied it very closely. I became more and more convinced that in effect the government was trying to give a break to a class of wealthy Canadians. They certainly have already had a very good break on taxation by not paying any tax on substantial capital assets.

We know if the properties were to accede to the beneficiaries of the trusts they would not have to pay capital gains at this time. However many of these trusts were set up so that the parents could retain control. At the same time on their death no capital gains would be levied. In essence it would defer taxation on capital gains for a very long time; perhaps as long as 60, 70 or 80 years.

We believe that by removing the 21-year rule this is exactly what will happen. We do not think it is right. We think it is a massive tax loophole. In committee we were told there were other loopholes and we strongly believe that all tax loopholes have to be closed. The fact that there are still some around does not justify keeping, extending or creating a better tax loophole. Therefore we are very much opposed to extending the 21-year rule.

In committee we asked many questions. We wanted facts and figures. The finance department told us it did not have any. I have a great deal of difficulty believing it is impossible to come up with ballpark figures on the amount of revenue the government is deferring indefinitely if it strikes down the 21-year rule.

We all know that whatever the finance department decides to do it generally has all the statistics and all the facts and figures and can go on ad infinitum with facts and figures to back up its argument. Suddenly, however, for some reason when it comes to this particular clause it claims to not have any information and is extremely vague. My only feeling is that the finance department has somehow decided not to look into it because the revenue implications would be quite horrendous.

I ask the government to consider who it really should be representing. Should it be a handful of wealthy family trusts or should it be the people of Canada?

I was in Hearst over the weekend to attend a nomination meeting for one of our Liberal MPs and I met many people. Somehow I know they would not understand why a clause such as this one or a move such as this one would be made when they are suffering the bulk of taxation. They are, by and large, the ones who have been subjected to the GST and the many increases the government has put forward.

I really take offence at seeing a minister of this government make fun of what I am saying here today. It just shows a type of insensitivity to Canadians, that somehow these people have forgotten whom they represent. Do they represent the average Canadian out there or do they represent a select few? I do not wonder; I know they have somehow forgotten. It is high time they were reminded.

I am pleased to see the hon. minister acting a little bit more seriously while we are discussing these kinds of tax loopholes.

When I was in committee the Conservatives talked about setting up these trusts because some of the beneficiaries were disabled. I want to say that these trusts generally were not set up to look after disabled children. If a trust is set up to look after a disabled child one does not put in assets which appreciate so much as one puts in revenue generating types of instruments. This is so that the disabled person can have a good and adequate cash flow to keep them going.

At any rate, I know that if this government really wanted to look after disabled people it would not be worrying about this 21-year rule. It would be allowing these trusts to pay the capital gains on the appreciation of their assets. It would have substantial revenues whereby it could do things for some of the disabled people it pretends to be so interested in helping.

I fail to understand why the government is insistent on abolishing the 21-year rule. I want to ask every member of the House to consider the serious debt and deficit implications we have. After all the rhetoric we hear about dealing with the debt and the deficit, the government talks a great line, turns around and forgoes revenues at this time having to do with these trusts. These represent substantial amounts of revenue that would help address the problem of the debt and the deficit.

I can only ask once more for the government to allow my amendment to stand and to vote in favour of it so that the same people the government purports to want to help really can be helped. At the same time we would address the debt and the deficit. It is more than time that we stop just talking. We should actually do something about it. Closing this loophole would be a tremendous step.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, today we are addressing very serious legislation that exposes in many respects the priorities of government. I want to begin by saying that we are dealing with Bill C-92 which includes private family trust tax legislation.

To understand what we are doing we have to go back to the year 1972 when the Liberal government of the day introduced what is called the 21-year rule that required private family trusts be assessed capital gains after 21 years of the money being in family trusts. They would then pay tax on their increase in wealth at that time. In other words it was a method of deferring taxes on capital gains for 21 years.

We recognize that no capital gains tax has ever been levied under this 21-year rule and that all private family trusts that existed on or before 1972 would be subject to tax for the first time in January 1993. However, the government has introduced the legislation which we are debating now to eliminate the 21-year rule. It means that a trust set up today for a young child could go tax-free until the child dies, which could be 80 years from now. In other words it would defer the tax for up to 80 years in some cases.

What are we talking about here? What is an example of a family trust? Because of the privacy rules which we support naturally we do not have information on specific families or individuals. That is the way it should be. Available court records show the trust established by Samuel Bronfman for his daughter had a value in 1969 of $70 million.

Today that trust would have had a value of well over $600 million if it had been kept in very conservative investments for that length of time. What we are talking about here are massive amounts of money on which taxes are not paid until the end of this period. Any tax expert would tell us that this means taxes will not be paid, period.

I want to say what some professionals have said about the tax initiative raised by the government that we are debating today. Sidney Goldstein of Goldstein, Goldstein and Goldstein in Ottawa had this to say:

> There is no question that it represents a massive windfall for existing trusts.

Kathryn Bush of Blake Cassels had this to say:

> A cynical person might suggest that pressure from influential political supporters also should be listed as a reason for the draft legislation.

• (1215)

Neil Brooks, whom we all know, is the associate dean at Osgoode Hall Law School at York University. He had this to say:

> The government has given Canada's wealthiest families notice that it intends to give them a gift worth several billion dollars.

Arthur Drache of Fraser and Beatty had this to say:

> If legislation now before Parliament is not passed before the end of the year, thousands of trusts would be hit with massive tax bills.

It is helpful because a lot of us are not tax experts. We do not have degrees in tax law or belong to firms that are into estate tax planning and so on. We rely on experts and that is why we have committees. I look across the aisle at one of my favourite politicians, the hon. member for Mississauga South. He sat in on a very important meeting of the finance committee a few weeks ago where experts were invited to speak.

One of the two experts, Mr. Neil Brooks, had this to say, and I am quoting from the transcript of the finance committee hearings:

> First of all, this amendment will clearly result in a number of Canada's wealthy families paying less tax this year than they otherwise would. There just cannot be any question about that.
> The amendment will allow Canada's wealthiest families to defer paying tax on their accrued capital gains substantially beyond what any other tax avoidance technique now permitted by the act allows them to do. This change will usher in a new era of tax planning by the use of personal trusts to avoid the deemed disposition on death. Over time it will have substantial revenue consequences.
> Instead of creating one more loophole by which people can avoid or defer the deemed disposition of capital gains on death, the government should be closing the existing loopholes. The act now contains a number of loopholes which allow a person to freeze the value of their property, but maintain control over it and avoid paying tax on gains that accrued while they controlled that property. The government should be closing the existing loopholes that permit estate freezing.
> My final comment is that this amendment is bad tax policy because there is absolutely no theoretical tax justification for the amendment that is being proposed. It will only benefit high income people.

Professor Neil Brooks was followed by Mr. Sidney Goldstein. He is the senior partner in Goldstein and Goldstein, Barristers and Solicitors, and acts as a tax adviser and planner to his clients. He had this to say:

> Having said that and given the view that there was some affiliation with Tories, I too am questioning the appropriateness and purposes of this proposal.

In other words, he was saying that his usual dispensation is to be supportive of Conservative government initiatives as a friend of the government, but this was going too far to tax his comments that he simply could not speak positively about this initiative under any circumstances. He went on to say the following:

> I endorse most of the comments Professor Brooks has made. Deferral is a very powerful and very valuable benefit. One of the arguments that has been made here and in various publications is that the proposal just shifts when the tax is going to be paid. Whether you pay it now or later, the same amount of tax is going to be paid, but that is not true.

In other words, the usual explanation is that while this is simply deferring when tax will be paid, here is one of the most senior tax advisers in Canada saying that is patently untrue. This is not a fact. Again, humble people like myself simply have to take advice from these experts. He goes on to say:

> The proposal here, and I second Professor Brooks' comment, is more generous than any other proposal in the act. The deferral is until the last of a class of persons dies potentially. That is likely to be a significantly longer period of time than if each individual child received their own share directly and paid tax as each of them died, sold property or left the country.

In other words, he is just saying that here is the ultimate in tax loopholes and tax boondoggles. He goes on to say:

> In my own practice and based on my professional contacts and various direct information—ignoring the speculation of what major estates in the country might benefit—the potential tax benefits from this proposal are in the millions of dollars. I do not act for the Desmarais, the Bronfmans or the Thomsons, but I do act for people who have substantial real estate holdings and substantial portfolios of publicly listed shares and they will benefit significantly from this proposal.

• (1220)

I could go on reading from the transcript of the finance committee hearings, but perhaps I will simply wrap up by saying that two of the most experienced and respected tax advisers in Canada have said this has to be the loophole of loopholes. This has to be the ultimate granting of a gift to those who need it least. This is a tax giveaway to the most wealthy families in Canada.

On the one hand the government is saying it has to charge GST on children's books and Bibles. On the other hand it is giving the wealthiest families the ultimate tax loophole. Does it not tell us a great deal about how our tax system has evolved? It is a mess. It is a disaster. It is the disaster of disasters.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to say the amendment of the hon. member for Sudbury has some advantages in that it does not totally wipe out the tightening of the system concerning trusts.

The current act is so full of loopholes that it enables a trust to continue to roll over and over. Just by simply changing the trustees under the existing statute the 21-year period is revived. The government has settled that issue with people who have existing trusts by cutting back on the deferral period to the deferral allowed for the first generation removed from the settlor and the tax applies on the death of the first generation.

Currently, because of the ability to roll it over and over with each succeeding change in trustees, the 21-year rule that is supposed to be a terrible rule that will prevent the government from collecting all sorts of money is a massive loophole for the wealthiest families, as my friend from Kamloops said. We have closed that massive loophole. I am at least pleased that the member for Sudbury has recognized the government's positive action in that regard.

We have made arrangements for these trusts to terminate when the youngest or the last person or whoever is immediately the beneficiary related to the first generation from the settlor dies.

There are two kinds of trusts. There are trusts set up in wills and most of the trusts that are dealt within this statute really are trusts set up by people who die. When they die the capital gains is paid on their assets and then their assets are put in trust for the beneficiaries. The trust can run until the death of the beneficiary if the beneficiary is one beneficiary removed from the testator and that is the end of it.

It does not require winding up a trust in a 21-year period but it allows the trust to run its normal course. That seems to me to be very fair. As I said, most of these things are put together by people in their wills. They are testamentary trusts.

Some trusts, however, are set up by people who want to do major inter vivos settlements. When a person does an inter vivos settlement he or she has to pay capital gains tax on all assets that have been put in trust. To the government that is a bonus because it gets its capital gains tax in advance when the settlor sets up the trust. The government does not have to wait until the settlor dies.

Some people suggest this is a great advantage to the settlor. I suppose an advantage is an advantage if it is perceived to be an advantage. It may not be an advantage at all because the settlor is paying tax to the government sooner than he or she would normally have to pay it. To the government that is an advantage. To the government the sooner a person pays tax the better, as pointed out by my friend from Kamloops. This might be perceived by some to be a great tax loophole but frankly on balance it is no loophole at all. It is just the payment of tax perhaps earlier than the government might normally expect it.

• (1225)

I recommend this statute be left as is. We did not hear in committee, despite the evidence of Mr. Goldstein and Professor Neil Brooks, any real justification for changing it. The member for Sudbury who has made the amendment we are speaking to now recognizes the advantage of the changes proposed. I suggest we carry on recommending the advantages of all the changes rather than just being selective. I think the statute should pass as is and the amendment should be defeated.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, one of the problems the government does not seem to be recognizing is the perceived unfairness of the current tax act that exists in this country today. It is that perceived unfairness that is causing a great deal of difficulty.

There are many aspects of the tax regime which are not fair, but the perception is so much greater than the reality. It is that feeling or perception which is causing this malaise in attitude within our country that affects every aspect of a person's life. When people in a working environment do not feel they are being treated fairly it affects the quality of their work whether it is physical labour or creative work. The tax design of this country, the Income Tax Act, is one of the main culprits in causing this feeling that the system is not treating individuals fairly.

When people feel they are not being treated fairly it not only affects their work habits, but in the case of the Income Tax Act it causes a tremendous cash economy to develop. In 1985 the then Minister of National Revenue, the current Minister of Communications, said the underground economy at that time was close to $40 billion. He estimated—I am sure he got this advice from his officials in the Department of National Revenue—that the lost revenue to the Treasury on that underground economy was somewhere in the neighbourhood of $9 billion.

Today they say the underground economy is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $100 billion. If we use the minister's formula from that time we could say there is probably something in the neighbourhood of $15 billion to $18 billion in lost revenue to the Treasury because people feel they are not being treated fairly and the underground economy, the cash economy, is exacerbated.

These trust funds are one of the prime reasons why people feel the current Income Tax Act is not a fair piece of legislation. When we have an Income Tax Act where family trusts or trust funds have not had any tax burden over a 21–year period, how could anybody possibly think it is a fair system?

• (1230)

I realize this started off as a Liberal initiative. It has gone through successive regimes including nine years of a Conservative regime. It seems to me that they have a tremendous opportunity to do something special in tax reform, something that would cause people to think that even though they have been insensitive on the GST in the area of family trusts they have the courage to address a very tough issue.

The problem with the family trusts is that no one knows how much money is in those family trusts. We hear estimates ranging from $10 billion to $30 billion in trust funds that have been sitting around untaxed for 21 years. Now the government wants to extend it for an indefinite period of time.

I have been approaching the issue of comprehensive tax reform with a very specific idea, the single tax plan. Corporations and individuals would be taxed at a single rate of 20 per cent. After seniors, families with children and charitable organizations got their tax credit people would pay 20 per cent. Under the single tax system interest bearing amounts on these family trusts would be in the loop. It is an air–tight system. That is what Canadians want today. They want an air–tight system. They want a fair system. They want a system that is efficient. They want a system they can understand. More than anything they want a system where everyone is accountable.

This trust provision in the Income Tax Act is wrong if for no other reason than there is absolutely no accountability. No one really knows how much money is in the trusts and how much money is being made. The fact it has gone on for 21 years without any accountability is wrong and I certainly think it needs to be amended.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to the elements of the legislation that we are most concerned about in Bill C–92, and that is the whole question of the private family trust tax and the fact that the government has chosen to continue it for yet another period of time.

Changes to the legislation concerning taxation of private family trusts was first proposed by the Minister of Finance in draft legislation on February 11, 1991. Despite considerable criticism from the professional community, these technical amendments were introduced in draft legislation released in December 1991. Finally the legislation was brought to the House by notice of a ways and means motion June 19 last.

The legislation has been around for quite some time. We have been aware of it and have been watching it move through the process.

The current legislation which this seeks to amend covers private family trusts. It goes back 21 years to the 1972 tax reform brought in by the former Liberal government when the federal estate tax was eliminated and the capital gains tax introduced.

This change left a potentially enormous tax loophole. Capital gains taxes are levied only when gains are realized, usually when property is sold or at the time of death. Because trusts never die it means a private family trust could entirely escape paying taxes on assets held within the trust.

The Liberal government introduced a 21–year rule which required that private family trusts would be assessed capital gains after 21 years and pay tax on their increase in wealth. Clearly the government set the rules. It said for 21 years the trusts had a tax holiday but at the end of that they had to start paying their fair share.

• (1235)

Income tax is paid by the beneficiaries of the trust when property is distributed to them from the trust. No capital gains tax has ever been levied under this 21–year rule, and all private family trusts which had expired on and before 1972 would be subject to tax for the first time in January 1993.

Under this bill the government is proposing to essentially eliminate the 21–year rule. Trusts would be allowed to defer the 21–year rule until all the exempt beneficiaries have died. An exempt beneficiary can include a child, spouse or parent of the trust settlor but not any individual of generations subsequent to that of the child. In other words no grandchildren.

This means that a trust set up for a young child today could go tax-free until that child died, which could be 80 years or more from now. It means the billions that are presently sheltered in private family trusts will not have to be subject to tax until the last exempt beneficiary dies.

This constitutes a tax loss of billions of dollars. While trusts will be allowed to accumulate wealth tax-free for many more decades, the government will be deprived of those revenues to reduce the debt and deficit, let alone the revenues necessary to improve lives of all other Canadians.

We do not know for sure how much is held in private family trusts. Almost no public information is available about the amount of wealth that is held in these trusts. Tax privacy laws which we support prevent Revenue Canada from providing information about any single trust and it does not provide any information about the aggregate amount of assets held in private trusts.

Sources within the financial industry have estimated the total value of assets held within trusts at $70 billion. This estimate seems fairly reasonable as it represents only 3 per cent of the $2.4 trillion total assets held by persons in unincorporated businesses in Canada.

How much revenue does the government lose from this particular change with the extension of the trust? It is difficult to estimate just how much tax revenue the government will lose but a very cautious estimate demonstrates what potential revenue is at stake. If only 1 per cent of the $70 billion in trusts was subject to tax next year a marginal tax rate of 30 per cent would raise over $200 million.

It is only fair that people who have these trusts are expected to contribute to the running of the country because that is really what it is all about.

I have a number of quotes from tax professionals. Sidney Goldstein of Goldstein, Goldstein and Goldstein in Ottawa says:

> There is no question that it represents a massive windfall for existing trusts.

Kathryn Bush from Blake Cassels says:

> A cynical person might suggest that pressure from influential—

An hon. member: You just read those.

Mr. Angus: I know and I thought they were so good I wanted to read them back into the record.

Let me start again. She said:

> A cynical person might suggest that pressure from influential political supporters also should be listed as a reason for the draft legislation.

Again that was Kathryn Bush. Neil Brooks, someone who has been referred to in this House before and will be from time to time, said:

> The government has given Canada's wealthiest families notice that it intends to give them a gift worth several billion dollars.

Finally Arthur Drache of Fraser and Beatty said:

> If legislation now before Parliament is not passed before the end of the year, thousands of trusts could be hit with massive tax bills.

The government argues that these changes are necessary for a number of reasons. First, it has argued that the 21-year rule might interfere with trusts established by parents for the benefit of their disabled children.

The reality is that any trust set up for a disabled child will have annual allocations of the gains from that trust in order that the child may progress through school and through life. They would not be set up to provide a lump sum at some point in the future. Their needs do not get delayed for 21, 25 or 30 years. Their needs are now.

Any trust set up to ensure that the child of a wealthy person or a not so wealthy person is looked after financially will be designed in such a way that they would not require this particular rule.

As Sidney Goldstein argued:

> If the government were really concerned about the needs of disabled kids, a better solution would have been to declare a special exemption for the disabled.

• (1240)

Second, the government has argued that unless the rules are changed some trusts may not be able to pay the taxes without the selling of assets, perhaps including a controlling block of shares in a private company. This argument is probably the most valid of those offered by the government but it still makes little sense. Private trusts have had a full 21 years to plan for this tax, much more than ordinary taxpayers get.

One of the complaints we hear from time to time about governments of all stripes is that they change the rules. Here is a rule that has been in place for 21 years. Everybody knew what the rule was. A good financial planner would have considered that and have planned accordingly for the end of the 21-year rule this year.

Taxpayers in this situation could utilize the $500,000 small business capital gains exemption to avoid selling assets. The government also says that it is closing a loophole with this bill by preventing rollovers from one trust to another. It is true that a clause in this bill does close a potential loophole and we do support that, but it does not mean that the government has to create another massive loophole.

Although it may be onerous for the beneficiaries of some trusts to pay taxes in one shot after 21 years in capital gains, there is a provision to pay taxes from a 21-year deemed disposition in up to 10 annual instalments. That is in subsections 159(7) and 159(6.1) of the act. This will provide some relief for trust beneficiaries with modest incomes who do not wish to dispose of the assets at this time.

The law is clear. It provides some flexibility for those people who are not the wealthy family trust holders but of more modest means who perhaps could not afford to pay the kind of taxes that might be owed to the people of Canada.

In conclusion, this particular section of the bill indicates the reality of tax reform in Canada. It is tax reform for the very wealthy. It is tax oppression for the not so wealthy. That is why we in this party oppose the provisions in the extension of the 21-year rule. We want real tax reform which would ensure that those who have a lot of money begin to pay their fair share of running this country.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I never thought I would have to rise here to protest against such a flagrant government bill. It is the worst fiscal injustice I have heard of since I have been in this House.

In recent years there have been all sorts of tax increases, especially the GST, which hit the middle class. All these taxes hit the middle class hard and today Bill C-92 would exempt family trusts. This means that the richest families in the land, those with the most money who enjoy the best that this world has to offer, would be exempted.

Twenty-one years ago the government here in this House decided that it would change the tax system. Taxes would not be collected on family trusts for 21 years, but after 21 years all gains on the family trusts would be taxed. Indeed in the past few years the great law firms in this country representing its wealthiest families have been putting pressure on the government to extend this 21-year exemption until the youngest children have died. This could be 20, 25, 30 or even 40 years in some cases.

How do we explain this change in attitude? Twenty-one years ago it was literally a gift to the wealthiest families with huge fortunes.

Now it wants to remove it. I have great difficulty understanding what inspired this change. Look at the situation our country is in with our middle class saddled with the heaviest tax load in the industrialized world. Still we are now dealing with a bill that would exempt the richest families in the land.

How can such a thing be justified? In committee we had experts like Neil Brooks, vice-dean of Osgoode Hall law school, with whom I spoke several times. He has a great reputation; he is a great tax expert who knows tax law. As you know, Mr. Speaker, I do not claim to be a tax expert, far from it, not when there are thousands and thousands of pages written on it. It is really complex and I for one am convinced that this law is deliberately complex.

For example, take the experts who appeared before the committee. They showed that it was indeed a gift, literally a huge tax break. But for whom? For the richest families in the country.

We have so much data clearly establishing that it is not justified. As you know, the richest families have the services of great experts available to them. They can put tremendous pressure on the government, for example through lobbyists here in Ottawa, to defend their cause. They can afford it. A middle-class person who earns his daily living most definitely cannot afford the services of a tax expert. Earning his or her living takes all his time.

However, the wealthiest families in Canada enjoy advantages. I could quote figures; we do not know if hundreds of millions or billions of dollars could be saved in that way. At a time when we have an accumulated deficit of over $400 billion, we find a way to exempt the most fortunate class in our country. That is very strange and unjustified.

I hope Bill C-92 will raise many questions in Canada. The committee has already met, but I hope a great many people will start asking more and more questions as to why a government which has asked so much of the middle class would exempt the richest citizens. There is no justification for it.

The witnesses who appeared before the committee literally said that the government's arguments are phoney. There is no justification and these arguments are just stalling for time until they come to the House to pass the bill on third reading with their majority.

I know that on this side of the House the Liberal Party of Canada and the New Democratic Party will vote against it, that is sure. In a few months there could be a change of government, a hope I share with many Canadians. The Liberals will then form the government and we should rescind this bill which the present government wants to pass and tell the richest families in Canada: "You were exempt for 21 years. Now it's your turn to do your part. This country has been very generous to you; it is only right that you now pay your share".

I say to government members who cannot justify this bill that you will pay the price come election time. Canadians everywhere will ask: How can you justify Bill C-92 which exempts the richest families in the country? You have no justification. It is shameful.

I realize that we should always use parliamentary language, but you should be ashamed. If you are not ashamed, I wonder if we can expect the worst. I would like all those listening to the debates in this House to ask Conservative members the following question: How can you justify such a shameful measure?

• (1250)

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on this amendment to Bill C-92 as it pertains to the extension by the government of the 21-year rule for private trusts.

The context in which I would like to frame my remarks, which are in support of this Liberal amendment changing this piece of legislation, is that of ensuring that Canadians appear to pay and do pay their fair share of taxes. It is also in the context of the very real fiscal difficulties that we all know the federal government faces at the present time.

The decision by the government to extend the 21-year rule is one on which we are still being denied information that is necessary for us to have a full understanding of what exactly is involved. To many Canadians this decision appears to grant a very important loophole allowing the wealthiest in our society to continue to avoid paying tax on a very sizeable portion of their assets, namely their family trusts.

It is incumbent upon any government today that is serious about controlling expenditures and the deficit and that wants to ask Canadians to make a real sacrifice, as this government has done through the imposition of numerous and sizeable increases in taxation, to ensure that those in Canada who have sizeable assets are taxed appropriately on those assets, and in particular on the capital gains that accrue through the accumulation of those assets.

The 21-year rule was implemented 21 years ago to allow those families who fell into that situation a very long period of time to get their affairs in order and dispose of their assets. That 21-year period, in the opinion of members on this side of the House, was plenty of time for those families to deal with the business of financial planning.

This government has extended that period at a time when Canadians are generally feeling overburdened by taxes. There is a very strong suspicion afoot in this country that the wealthy do not pay their fair share of taxes and ordinary Canadians are being asked to assume, through increases in income taxes, through various forms of charges and through the GST, sizeable increases in their tax burdens. It strains the credibility of any government when this is allowed to happen.

• (1255)

It would be an act of good faith on the part of this government if it were to accept the Liberal amendment and the principle that this 21–year period has expired and the people who fall under the situation covered by this provision in the tax law should be required to deal with the inheritance or estate taxes which they are legitimately required to pay.

For the government to fail to do this will not only increase the lack of credibility it has acquired among Canadians over the last eight years but will strain the credibility of future governments because a main issue facing all Canadians is the apparent unfairness in the Canadian tax system.

That is a serious credibility problem for governments in Canada today. It is a problem of which all governments must be very mindful. Any provisions, and there are many in the tax laws in Canada, that appear to confer benefits to those who are wealthy and who have got gains through the accumulation of wealth or assets, while at the same time other Canadians are being asked to bear a higher burden of taxation, will put additional strain on the fabric of government programs and on the tolerance of Canadians to government demands to finance its operations through taxes and other forms of charges to the Canadian public.

It would be an act of good will and generosity, but more an act of credibility on the part of this government if it were to accept our amendment dealing with this trust provision. I hope government members will allow this amendment to be incorporated into this piece of legislation. It would make the legislation more palatable to those of us on this side of the House who support other aspects of Bill C–92, some of which were actually introduced on the recommendation of the Liberal opposition. We were pleased to see that the government paid attention to our suggestions.

In this day and age when Canadians are so distrustful of the additional financial burdens governments are asking them to bear we cannot allow this provision to go unchallenged. We cannot allow this 21–year rule to be extended to those families. We are still unclear concerning the amounts involved because we have not been told the relevant facts concerning the revenues involved in these trusts, but we certainly know there is enough suspicion out there. There are enough grounds for suspicion. We cannot allow the government to proceed with this measure without airing before the Canadian people what is involved in these trusts.

We on this side of the House urge the government to accept this amendment to Bill C–92.

• (1300)

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to speak to the amendment to Bill C–92 and to talk about family trusts. A great deal of public mistrust is befalling private trusts. If it is a matter of trust of which we speak here today. Certainly if the general public of Canada really knew what this debate was about cynicism and condemnation would perhaps best describe what is going on here.

Once again the people are not aware. It is not a simple issue. It has gone to committee. Despite the representations from credible witnesses the government has seen fit to proceed.

We want to talk about what this means and to which people in our country. Let me suggest that the 21–year rule pertains only to the very wealthiest people in our country. Our country has one of the highest concentrations of wealth in the hands of the fewest in the world. Comparisons are made. Even though one of the ministers previously said there are not enough millionaires in Canada, and I suspect that is an unfortunate circumstance, most people are not that concerned about the accumulation of millions of dollars. They are concerned about their everyday household expenses and in trying to cope.

The very wealthiest people in our country have been given 21 years to get their financial house in order. It came to roost that this legislation was going to run its course. The government said: "We had best extend that 21–year period because for the wealthiest of the wealthy in this country 21 years is not long enough. Let's give them another 10, 15, 20, 30 years to ensure that they can keep all of their assets in these private trusts". They are conducting business as usual but they have set aside these private funds that are not taxable.

How many are there? We are not sure. Some suggest there might be as many as 22,000 family trusts. We cannot be sure. Revenue Canada says because of privacy we are not allowed to track those statistics. Give or take a thousand or so I suppose there are about 15,000 of these family trusts.

The one example we have, I gather the only one that we could get our hands on, is about 20 years old. At that time it was valued at $70 million. That is not bad. I guess it has tripled or quadrupled in value now. The government is saying: "It is not time yet to force these people to pay any taxes on the accumulation of wealth in that private trust. Let's extend the period for another 10, 15 or 20 years".

The rationale given is cynical at the very best. It is particularly cynical to those average Canadians who every year have to get their house in order. They have one year. If they do not get it in order, the GST rebate will be taken from them. Any returns on their income tax in March will be taken by the government.

However, for these people the reason given is they might have to hire a lawyer. We all know that lawyers are expensive. For the very wealthiest people in the country it is a very sad story that they would have to hire a lawyer to get their house in order. Another reason is that they are not quite ready yet to pass on control of some of their interests to their children. The children are not quite ready yet to take possession of power and money, so we had best give them more time.

Another reason was that these people might have to sell some of their interests. Would that not be a shame. If multimillionaires had to sell some of the interests they had in different corporations that would be terrible, would it not? People in my constituency have had to sell their homes because they do not have jobs. It is not too much to ask these people to get their houses in order.

Finally, the most cynical rationale of all is what if these fabulously wealthy people have a disabled child? Should they not be able to provide for this disabled child? I say yes, absolutely they should be able to, but after 21 years and multimillions of dollars there must be another way of providing for that child. I wonder how many disabled children there are born of the wealthiest families. Maybe I best not dwell on this issue because I realize the sensitivity of it. The very fact that the government would proffer this as rationale for extending the 21-year rule makes it extremely cynical. It is cynicism at its apex for sure.

What did the witnesses say? I know the member for Mississauga South tried to discredit it. He said one of the witnesses has an NDP affiliation, God forbid. He could not have any expertise on tax affairs because he has some affiliation with the NDP. One of the witnesses said he had previous ties with the Conservatives, but he said he agreed with Mr. Brooks that there are some problems with this. He said that anybody in their right mind with $100 million would say if there was a chance for deferral they would defer their taxes for another decade. I probably would too. Most people are like that. They are a little bit full of self-interest.

There is a tremendous lobby by these people to say: "You are going to create a great deal of problems for us wealthy people, so you had best put the legislation in as quickly as possible. Don't pay attention to any tax experts who might come forward, regardless of their political affiliation, whether they are New Democrats or Conservatives". They say you should not hear there are loopholes. We consider this a loophole that you can drive tandem trucks through. Do not concern yourself with that, just go forward and put on a good face.

I listened to the member for Mississauga South. He put on an awfully good face because he has some expertise in this area. He used the appropriate vernacular, with which I am not familiar, and he used all the appropriate jargon. If people were watching they would ask: "What in the world is he talking about?" I am not so sure anybody would understand, nor would they want to understand.

It is sophistry at its worst to try to convince people that this is okay, don't sweat it. We are going to lose a couple of hundred million dollars of taxes every year from the richest people in the country. Do you think they would want to come forward and say they want to help? These are the people who are saying the debt in this country is going to kill us, that the government has to get its house in order. For sure, people in glass houses should not throw dollars. It is unbelievable. No doubt they are the loudest out there saying: "The government is out of control and it spends too much money. Canada is a hard country to do business in".

I would like the government to read Controlling Interest, written by Diane Francis, not a big friend of ours, but a very revealing book indicating that the country is controlled by a very few wealthy families. Here we are discussing legislation that will do nothing but protect them. We have protected and coddled them for 21 years. The government says: "It is not long enough, folks. Let's give them another 10, 20 or 30 years. We will collect the taxes at that time".

I am sure I have not shed a great deal of light on this issue, but I certainly feel better for it and I want to say this to any Canadians out there who might be watching: It is the absolute hypocrisy of cut, cut, cut on one hand and this kind of absolutely terrible, horrendous acceptance of a tax and the loophole—the word is used too often but you know what I mean—on the other. It is totally unacceptable tax legislation that this government is proffering.

• (1310)

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand in the House to speak at consideration of report stage of Bill C-92, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act and so on.

This omnibus bill includes numerous technical changes. There are quite a few areas of the bill that I definitely do agree with. There are some very positive aspects of it but there are two areas that I and my party disagree with.

We on this side of the House have put forward two amendments to Bill C-92. The first is a motion to amend clause 42 to remove the extension of the 21-year rule on private trusts and maintain present law. The second is a motion to amend clause 47 which is to remove the provisions that disqualify passive businesses from the capital gains exemption.

I will explain briefly what these two motions are about and why we are objecting to those two particular aspects of the bill.

The government's position is that it wishes to extend the 21-year rule because it wishes to remove the arbitrary nature of the 21-year figure. The government has tried to justify the extension of the 21-year rule for private trusts by emphasizing the plight of disabled children as the beneficiaries of these trusts. The government believes that this extension will not result in any forgoing of tax revenue. Therefore it sees this as a revenue neutral measure. Obviously we on this side of the House do not agree with the government on that analysis.

We heard testimony during the review of Bill C-92, more specifically with the 21-year rule on private trusts. Other members of this House have quoted Mr. Brooks and the five salient points he raised during the hearings. I would like to mention those too because I think they probably best summarize the main reasons as to why we are objecting to this clause in the bill.

The 21-year rule extension on private trusts will clearly result in a number of Canada's wealthiest families paying less tax this year than they otherwise would. Canada's wealthiest families will be able to defer paying tax on their accrued capital gains substantially beyond what any other tax avoidance technique now permitted by the act would allow them.

Instead of creating one more loophole by which people can avoid or defer the deemed disposition of capital gains on death, the government should be closing the existing loopholes that permit what is described in the trade as estate freezing. Not one reason the government has put forward for making this change holds any water.

The 21-year rule extension is bad tax policy in the sense that there is no theoretical tax justification. It will only benefit high income people. In addition, it is bad economic policy. It will in effect lock more investments into private trusts on which large capital gains will accrue. People will be reluctant to sell their investments even though they might indeed be bad investments because of the large tax liability that is accruing over time.

Those five points I just went through were made by an expert witness, Professor Neil Brooks, associate dean of Osgoode Hall Law School at York University. He is a tax lawyer and an estate planner. They were not made by someone who does not know what he is talking about. He is very familiar with the tax laws of this country and he is most concerned that this government would be moving in that direction.

I would like to move on to the Liberal Party's motion, the amendment to clause 47, to remove the provisions that disqualify passive businesses from capital gains exemptions.

This issue, unlike the other one, was not discussed extensively in committee. It has been put forward because the bill continues the capital gains exemption on ownership of foreign assets. However it discontinues the capital gains exemption on passive business which is real estate.

If this government were saying to Canadians that it wanted to eliminate all the capital gains in this country for everyone on every issue, whether it was stocks and bonds or offshore investments or real estate, then I could agree with that. Or, if the government were making it so that everybody would receive the $100,000 exemption, then I could agree with that. However, what it is doing is taking away the $100,000 capital gains exemption from that small real estate investor.

Let me use the example of a retired person who receives a pension and owns a $200,000 semi-detached home. He or she pays the rent on their own side of the house. They have the other side of the house rented and that is what is maintaining their lifestyle in their retirement years. If they decide to sell their whole unit they will not receive the $100,000 capital gains exemption. Therefore, when I say that the small-term investor is the one being hurt through the real estate market, there are many senior citizens in particular who will be severely hurt by this measure.

However, the argument put forward to support the Liberal amendment is that this capital gains exemption on passive business must continue to give ordinary Canadians a break. I feel very strongly about that. I have had representations from many people in Nepean. Interestingly enough they were all senior citizens. They are the ones who need it the most. Their investment in real estate and apartment buildings must be supported.

The government is favouring Canadian foreign investment as it tends to foster employment and generate greater revenues in passive business. That appears to be the whole reason for wanting to go that particular route.

I could go on at great length on this. I would like to support this bill, I really would, because there are areas in Bill C-92 that I can agree with. But in these two particular areas I just feel it is so regressive. If the government would consider removing these two clauses from the bill then I am sure most of us on this side of the House probably could support it.

It is a shame that I must vote against a bill because of two particular clauses. I urge the government to reconsider those two particular aspects of the bill and to consider removing them.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C-92 today and the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Sudbury. She has done a great job on behalf of our caucus in exposing some of the weaknesses in this bill.

Clearly in 1971 when the capital gains tax was brought in there was provision in it for private family trusts to be able to operate for 21 years without having to pay capital gains taxes on the appreciation of the assets in those family trusts. This was a very generous arrangement. However that time has now passed. It is time these family trusts were paying taxes on those assets. These are not trusts for the poorest and the weakest in our society, but they are family trusts for the strongest and most powerful, the richest families in this country.

The government has somehow suggested the capital gains on the capital appreciation in these trusts are being maintained to assist handicapped children. These are massive funds and estimates have been as high as billions and billions of dollars. Of course, the government keeps the exact amount secret.

The hon. member for Sudbury has put forward a proposal to end this arrangement and to have these very wealthy families pay taxes on the capital appreciation. Surely that is a fair and reasonable situation. After all, they have had the appreciation on these trusts for the past 21 years and now is the time that this should end. I would be very surprised if they have not had an opportunity to arrange for these circumstances during the past 21 years because until the government brought down its budget in 1992 there was no expectation that the government would knuckle under and extend this.

We have to look at what has happened in the last eight and one-half years. There have been 38 new taxes imposed on Canadians. It is interesting that most of those taxes, practically all of them, have been regressive consumption taxes.

The consumption taxes, whether it is the GST, the sales tax which raises billions of dollars, or the excise tax on fuel, hurt low-income families and are more onerous on low-income families than on rich families.

What we have here is a pattern of activity by the government where it is imposing more and more regressive consumption taxes on low-income families. At the same time these private family trusts, which are mainly held by the richest and most powerful families in our nation, get a free ride on all the capital appreciation on the assets in those trusts. Nobody is able to identify exactly what those assets are worth or at least the government will not tell anybody. Clearly this is a tax which is designed for the rich and the powerful as most of the policies of the government are.

The free trade deal was designed to assist multinational corporations. Parent corporations in the United States with branch operations in Canada could shut down their Canadian branch plant operations while keeping the warehouse, but maybe not even that. Therefore, the jobs are lost in Canada and the benefits go back to the United States.

The rich get rich and the poor stay poor or even get poorer. It is the same way with the GST. The government talks about the GST being there mainly to assist the manufacturing industry in this country. The one thing the government never talked about was the windfall profit of some $4 billion to $5 billion which the manufacturing industry gained. Still in spite of it many of them moved to the United States.

We have a clear pattern of regressive sales tax hitting low and moderate income Canadians while at the same time opening the floodgates for the rich and powerful.

• (1325)

The hon. member for Sudbury has proposed that this end. I hope the government will consider it. Clearly there has been a very generous arrangement for the past 21 years, ever since the capital gains tax came in. Even at that, tax is only paid on the income from capital gains. Only three-quarters of it is brought into income.

This is the time to pass the amendment put forward in Motion No. 1 to end this whole arrangement now and treat everybody the same. The rich and powerful would pay capital gains on those private trusts, the same as any other taxpayer in this country. Those with fewer resources and less means have to pay taxes on whatever capital gains they have. In most cases there is very little there.

It has been well documented that private trusts in this country are a way that rich and powerful families move from generation to generation and maintain the control of large corporations without actually having to pay the corporation tax, generation after generation. This amendment is designed to end this arrangement and have private trusts treated like any other citizen, on a fair and equitable basis.

I hope the government will accept this amendment. I think it is fair and just. It may not be in keeping with the government's general philosophy about taxpayers, but it certainly is one that would command the support and respect of practically every Canadian.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate. Listening to the hon. member's comments I will very quickly come to the 21-year rule in trust, but I am somewhat concerned.

He is talking about how unfair it is because it has created a special privilege for some, in his definition, high-income Canadians. He thinks everybody ought to be paying, but in the next breath he talks about the GST and how unfair that is. I guess it is unfair because everybody is paying and he would prefer that we establish some system whereby not everybody has to pay the GST. Therefore, he is going to have to decide: Does he want to treat everybody the same as we are doing under the GST, or does he want to treat everybody differently under different rules for different people? He is going to have to make that decision.

We cannot talk about it the way he was proposing. What we have here is this whole discussion of trusts and what has been established. If the member feels that the trusts which were established with the income tax changes back in 1972 were unreasonable or very beneficial—I am not sure if the member was in the House at that point but I would be interested in seeing how vigorously he voted in favour of that particular special privilege that had been put in place for these supposedly high-income Canadians.

What we are dealing with here is the establishment of some new rules on the trusts. The loophole was created in 1972 by the Liberals. If a trust was created 21 years ago and some time between then and now to avoid the 21-year rule you wanted to transfer the trust from one management group or one trustee to another, simply creating a new trustee and a new trust exempted you of the 21-year rule and you had another 21 years to deal with it. Therefore, what we are doing is taking away that opportunity to simply roll the trust from one trustee to another thereby avoiding the capital gains.

Somehow there is this idea that this is a massive scheme to avoid capital gains tax by the rich. However, what I have not heard mentioned today is that if any person in Canada wanted to establish a trust the rules that go into this can include people who own cottages. I live in the greater Toronto region and I know there are lots of people who own cottages. They would like to put a cottage into a trust so that should something happen to them their children would have a system whereby they could share the ownership of the cottage for their generation. This piece of legislation is going to allow that to happen without families having to reach into their pockets 20 years from now to pay capital gains.

How does this happen? In order for an asset to be put into a trust an evaluation has to be put on the asset going into the trust. The person establishing the trust has to pay the capital gains tax on the assets that are being put into the trust. Therefore, if there is one million dollars in assets that one wants to put into a trust, one has them valued. One discovers that one bought them for $500,000, one has now valued them at $1 million and you put them into the trust. In order to put them into the trust one has to pay the capital gains tax on the $500,000 increase in value. Therefore there has not been an avoidance of tax. In fact it seems as if there has been a prepayment of tax because normally one would not have to pay the income tax on that capital gain until such time as one actually sold or disposed of the asset.

What is happening is that if somebody wants to put an asset into a trust they have to pay the capital gains accrued to date up front.

There is this idea that once this thing is in a trust that one avoids tax. Let us come back to that million dollar asset that I talked about. We have now had the person pay capital gains tax on that. Let us presume that that is an income-generating asset. Whether it is shares in a company or a small business, that trust has to pay income tax on the money that the trust has earned every year. For argument's sake, they are earning $200,000 a year inside the trust so they have to pay income tax on the money that the trust is earning every year.

This idea that we are escaping the tax system by the creation of a trust is really very fictitious because in fact each and every year the income tax is paid by the trust.

Why would somebody want to put their assets into a trust? I have given you the example of someone who owns a cottage and who may want to put the cottage into a trust so that all the children can use the cottage for their lifetime and not have to worry about dividing it four ways and who is going to retain ownership.

It could also be a small business where one has three or four children who are working in a small business. Who owns the business on the death of the original owner? Here it is possible to put the shares of the small business into a trust for the benefit of the four children collectively but one does not have to divide the ownership. The ownership of the company is 100 per cent retained by the trust and therefore it is not a divided ownership. That is very beneficial. That ownership can stand there until, under these changes, the death of the immediate family.

Say that one wants to establish a trust for one's children. and say that the last child in the family dies at whatever age. Let us presume that they want to pass the company on or the trust on to their children. They have to again revalue all of the assets of the company and pay the capital gains tax on the revaluation. The business entity or the trust stays in but they have paid the tax. They pay the tax going in on the trust. They pay all the income tax that the trust should pay during the years of income and at the end of the trust they have to pay any additional accrued capital gains tax as well. They are caught all three ways.

What is not mentioned is that there could be a situation where someone of our age, Mr. Speaker, decides to put our assets in a trust for our children. You and I are certainly going to live another 40 or 50 years, we hope. What we are going to do is pay capital gains tax on our assets today that in fact we do not have to pay for 50 years if we simply kept ownership of them. What we are going to do as small-business owners is lend the Government of Canada, interest free and up front, the capital gains tax that we do not have to pay for 40 or 50 years. Nobody has mentioned that.

Why would a small business person want to do that? Again I have referenced the idea of trying to keep a small business holding together as one unit. I think it is a very important item that is on the agenda. If people want to take money out of a trust, if the trustee decides they are going to pay the beneficiaries, then of course there has to be some valuations and tax will be paid.

• (1335)

All the way through it seems that what has really been allowed with this rule is some reasonable asset planning for individuals from a small cottage holding to a large corporate holding. However, to suggest that this 21-year change or this trust is only for the benefit of the extremely well off I think is doing a disservice.

Yes, it is of benefit to them but in fairness this will benefit every Canadian who owns a cottage, every Canadian who owns a small business and every Canadian who may have some shareholdings that they would like to leave to their children as a unit rather than divide them up.

I am not sure why the opposition members would be opposed to this opportunity. They would prefer to leave the system the way it was 21 years ago when they created it where trusts would never have to pay tax, trusts would never have to pay capital gains tax and trusts would never have to declare their holdings to the government. At least here with this legislation some very clear time lines have been put in place and ultimately all Canadians are better served when the rules are clear rather than what existed prior to this legislation.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I too am happy to speak on this bill. I listened with a great deal of interest to my former colleague but still parliamentary friend from Ontario who gave a very learned dissertation in his most capable way on parts of this omnibus bill, Bill C-92.

The very lucid explanation he gave of parts of the bill is part of the problem that members face about Bill C-92. This bill is one of these omnibus bills which cover a multitude of matters. It is a regular smorgasbord of amendments to tax laws, unemployment laws, child benefit laws, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the pension plan and the income tax conventions.

Obviously in this bill there are an awful lot of good things that pose a dilemma to opposition members about confronting the bill as to how they are going to vote. One has the wheat with the chaff and it poses a dilemma. This is one of the reasons why my learned friend from Mississauga, when he used to be even more vocal and constructive in opposition, was so consistently against—this is the preamble to the report stage—these omnibus bills.

On this matter we are dealing with an amendment right now. There are other ways and there is another amendment that will take care of the problem outlined by my friend from Ontario in terms of protecting ordinary people's trusts in cottages and other matters like that. He spent the most time trying to explain away the pernicious part of this bill of extending this 21-year deferral to pay taxes another 21 years. That is a further generation.

I was in the House in 1972. I must say I would have to check the record to see how I finally voted on the bill because I was in Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and very much so. This matter came forward from the opposition that day which was then the Conservative Party. The records will show that the then opposition, the Conservative Party, railed against the amendment brought in by the then government, the Trudeau government, setting up this 21-year deferral on taxes on estates.

This is of course what poses so many problems for the public out there. They see a party being very vociferous against a provision when it is in opposition and then it gets into power and either the advice of the bureaucrats or the pressure of the interest groups becomes so profound that it does a fundamental parliamentary flip flop.

This is what has really caused disillusionment about the system. Here I am speaking but I have not checked on just how I voted in 1972 when this matter was brought up.

However, whatever I did then I knew it was a controversial section of protecting trusts of some of the heavy, large and very important people who are fundamental to the country but who get an unfair tax advantage. This was so controversial that certainly no matter how I voted or what I said in 1972 part of the reason that the matter flew in 1972 and got through the House was that it was only going to be a one-term deal.

At the end of 21 years, January 1, 1993, after it was brought in in 1972, all the people who had these heavy trusts would have had time to do their estate planning to make sure that when the law was changed in January 1993 they would not be able to complain of some unfair tax problems or disadvantages that they were going to be confronted with.

Lo and behold, the present government brings in this provision to in effect extend the 21-year rule. This defers for another 21 years this whole business of taxing estates and trusts. As I say, one can avoid the problem of ordinary Canadians trying to set something up to protect their families so that their children will not be confronted with certain taxes upon the death of the person setting up the trust. A cottage was the example used by my friend from Ontario.

We are talking about the fundamental trusts of an awful lot of important families and groups of people in this country control who a large part of it. Frankly I have been a little surprised that this has not received more attention in the media of the day.

Of course, not being completely a naive person in this House I started to put together the subject matter of the bill, especially its 21-year extension, with how it is going to help a lot of very important Canadians who happen to own television stations and/or newspapers. I started to put two and two together I suppose in an over simplified way. I can appreciate why something that is so fundamental to the trust structure and/or corporate family structure of this country has not received public attention. However, that may be one of the reasons.

I agree with some members from before and certainly with the member from Ontario who is a very competent tax expert and specialist. He has been a very important player in the committees, more so than I. There were experts who appeared before the committee who supported Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. There was the point of view of the member for Sudbury on this whole business of the 21-year extension.

That position was bolstered certainly by several professors. Sometimes one has to shake down the professors and the economists in their predictions and/or on tax law. When one gets something as precise as tax law rather than economies a layman has to pay attention.

There were professors who appeared before the committee when this matter was before the committee. They gave evidence on the 21-year rule. There was Professor Neil Brooks, an Associate Dean of Osgoode Law School at York University and Mr. Sidney Goldstein of Goldstein and Goldstein who is a tax lawyer and estate planner in Ontario.

Prof. Brooks had a definite confirmation without getting into any red herrings about family cottages and some little family trust that some responsible parent might try to set up to help make sure that his children do not get caught in paying for some estates. There are ways to do that. As I said, one of the amendments we are going to be debating after this one helps to do that in terms of protecting the children of ordinary Canadians to have a small asset.

We are talking about Canadians who are not ordinary who have many assets. Prof. Brooks along with Mr. Goldstein said unequivocally before that committee that the 21-year rule extension on private trusts would clearly result in a number of Canada's wealthiest families paying less tax this year than they otherwise would.

I see you are giving me the two-minute sign, Mr. Speaker and I always obey your admonition. There is so much one can say on such a large bill. The amazing thing about this in the last one minute and three quarters that I have left under this 10-minute rule is that there have been no figures supplied to the committee or to this House on how many millions or billions we are involved with here.

The range goes anywhere from $10 billion to $20 billion. I have to agree with my friends in the NDP from time to time on several matters. The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona asked the Minister of Finance months ago about the omnibus bill and this section on the 21-year deferral. It was the first time I fully appreciated that the matter was back on the floor of the House and we were again going to try to perpetuate trusts of very important people for another 21 years down the road.

Goodness knows what the then government might have done to it then. The change was supposed to have taken effect 21 years later in January 1993. This bill of course makes it retroactive and extends it for another 21 years.

There are good things in the bill but there are many other matters in it which I have some question about. I was here in 1972 when the bill was sold on the basis of only 21 years and the family trusts were going to pay the same basic tax as other Canadian taxpayers. That is why I had no reason to vote against it. If this was so fundamental, surely the government should have told us how many dollars were involved.

In conclusion, there was something else that was strange before the committee. I am not a member of the committee but I read some of the committee evidence which said this change was not going to cause the problems and would not really be that much of a fundamental change. It was just shifting it down the road for another 21 years.

Mr. Speaker, you have indicated my time is up. I frankly think with this type of provision going in as silently as it is today for the members who support it their time will be up if they do not watch out.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, this amendment has been moved to strike out the section of Bill C-92, which extends the 21-year rule for family trusts.

There is no question this is one of the most important pieces of legislation that will face this House of Commons this year. The extension of this family trust provision represents a colossal give-away to some of the wealthiest families in this country when the government is talking about its deficit problems and claiming it has serious revenue difficulties.

Here we have something that hands out millions and millions of dollars to those who are already wealthy. This has no logic economically or in terms of fiscal management. If we thought there might have been some logic associated with it all we had to do was listen to the arguments of the Department of Finance and the assessment of those arguments, not from Neil Brooks but from Sidney Goldstein.

He noted at the start of his comments as a witness in committee that he was speaking as someone who had supported the Conservative Party, yet here is his assessment of what the Department of Finance had said: "The rationales given by the Department of Finance are very strained". He went on to say: "Many of the arguments presented relating to this proposal somehow don't hold water as soon as you look at them. There are other far simpler ways these problems could have been solved. There are other ways of drafting these proposals that would have resulted in a more limited impact. That leads to the question of why this proposal is being put forward in this fashion".

Mr. Goldstein is a man who works with people who frankly are trying to use the family trust provision to avoid paying tax. This is his assessment, honestly put to the people of Canada by somebody who has no partisan axe to grind, put as a Conservative testifying to this committee. I quote again from the committee testimony:

> In my own practice and based on my professional contacts and various direct information—ignoring the speculation of what major estates in the country might benefit—the potential tax benefits from this proposal are in the millions of dollars. I do not act for the Desmarais, the Bronfmans or the Thomsons, some of the large family holders of wealth in this country, > but I do act for people who have substantial real estate holdings and substantial portfolios of publicly listed shares, and they will benefit significantly from this proposal.

So much for the myth which the Conservatives are trying to put to us that this is simply a housekeeping measure to try to stop people from shifting from one 21-year trust to another 21-year trust. Here is an expert in the field who calls himself a Conservative and says very clearly to the people of Canada that this is going to cost all of us as taxpayers millions of dollars.

We also saw testimony from Neil Brooks, one of the foremost tax experts in this country, to that same committee. I know my friend the former finance committee chairman has quarrelled with Mr. Brooks every time Mr. Brooks has appeared before the Finance Committee. I find it interesting, however, that my friend from Mississauga South did not say anything with respect to the comments of Mr. Goldstein. Those comments came from a Conservative. They came from somebody who deals in the area and they made it very clear that this particular provision is a waste of millions of dollars to the people of Canada.

Mr. Brooks went somewhat further. He said and I quote his final comment:

> This amendment is bad tax policy because there is absolutely no theoretical tax justification for the amendment that is being proposed. It will only benefit high-income people.

In other words, there is nothing here that is going to help growth in the country. There is nothing that is going to lead to extra jobs for people in Canada. There is nothing that is going to create greater fairness in the burden of taxation for people across this country. Instead, this is the extension of a give away which the Liberal Party started. It is now being extended so grossly that it will give millions of dollars of extra benefits to some of the wealthiest families and some of the families who are simply wealthy in this country.

Why did things like this happen? Why should such a piece of legislation be brought before the House of Commons? The tax system is messed up badly and as we who talk to our constituents know it has increasingly hit middle income, working income people. Instead of correcting those problems in our tax system the government is bringing forward a set of proposals to help those people at the very top whose share of national market income in this country in the last six years under this Conservative government has gone up from 23 per cent to 26 per cent. They are already very wealthy. They have already received tremendous tax breaks and the government is giving them more tax breaks.

I am afraid there is something fundamentally rotten at the heart of our political system that it gives tax benefits to those who are wealthy instead of those who really need them. It concentrates the benefits at the top instead of among middle income, working Canadians who are so hard pressed.

The people on the Conservative side must surely now recognize it is time to change such an unfair, rotten, unjust approach and withdraw this amendment.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, this party is going to oppose Bill C-92. There are things in it which we agree with but we disagree with the part of the bill we are talking about now.

Bill C-92 is a measure of a government that believes Parliament should not help the weakest members of society do better but make life easier for the richest members of Canadian society. We should perhaps call it the comfort bill for family trust holders in Forest Hill Village, Rosedale, Upper Westmount, Park Lane Circle and perhaps parts of Shaughnessy in Vancouver. Sorry, I forgot the British Properties.

We believe the government is being deceitful by including this change in an omnibus bill which includes measures we support. The vast majority of our fellow citizens are subjected to an inheritance tax in the form of a deemed capital gains tax on death. There is no reason why those very few Canadians who are fortunate enough to have family trusts should have preferential treatment.

Those Canadians who are fortunate enough to take advantage of the 21-year rule were given 21 years to get their affairs in order, I put through you Mr. Speaker to the member for Mississauga South. Was it not enough time? There is no reason to extend what was more than generous deadline. Of course extending the 21-year rule is unfair to all of those who do not have family trusts.

We heard a lot this morning about Neil Brooks and what he said. He basically raised five points to the committee. The 21-year extension on private trusts will clearly result in a number of Canada's wealthiest families paying less tax this year than they otherwise would.

Second, Canada's wealthiest families will be able to defer paying tax on their accrued capital gains substantially beyond what other tax avoidance techniques now permit and the act would allow them to defer paying tax on capital gains.

Third, instead of creating one more loophole by which people can avoid or defer the deemed disposition of capital gains on death, this horrible government should be closing existing loopholes that permit what is described in the trade as estate freezing.

Fourth, the government has not put one reason forward as to why making this change holds any water.

Fifth, said tax expert Neil Brooks, the 21-year extension is bad tax policy in the sense that there is no theoretical tax justification. It will only benefit high-income Canadians.

In addition, this bad economic policy will in effect lock more investments into private trusts in which large capital gains will accrue. People will be reluctant to sell their investments even though they might be bad investments because of the large tax liability that is accruing over time.

Mr. Speaker: I regret I must interrupt the hon. member.

It being two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5) the House will now proceed to statements by members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, this government has just passed new legislation that will encourage banks to increase their participation in small business financing.

This bill, which will make it more enticing to lend to small businesses, includes an increased ceiling on loan size from $100,000 to $250,000.

As well, businesses with yearly sales of $5 million will be eligible to apply, as opposed to the previous limit of $2 million. Even better, the federal loan guarantee has now been raised from 85 per cent to 90 per cent. A new addition of a retroactivity clause will make it possible for owners of small businesses to apply for loans six months after making a purchase.

Once again this government is taking positive steps to encourage entrepreneurship. I am hopeful that the banks will recognize these efforts and participate fully in this respect.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of this House the plight of the people in the Annapolis basin area who are seeing their way of life threatened by actions of the minister responsible for ACOA.

The minister gave an ACOA grant without seeking any input from the people who already use the Annapolis basin: the clam diggers, the scallopers, the ground fishermen, the weir fishermen, the lobster fishermen, and the rockweed workers. These people do not need aquaculture, they need policies that will protect the existing industries in the Annapolis basin.

The minister obviously listens to the provincial minister of tourism when there are grants to be given out in Annapolis West, as was seen with the rock quarry and now with the announcement of a grant for aquaculture.

Giving out grants without knowing the effects shows the total disregard this Tory government has for the existing rights of those who live and fish in that area.

I call on the minister responsible for ACOA to put on hold the grant for aquaculture until public hearings have been held to determine the effect of such a grant on those people who earn their living from the Annapolis basin.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the construction association of Prince Edward Island has joined the growing number of people and organizations urging the government to meet the requirements of the recent court decision regarding the fixed link and then begin construction without delay.

The association points out that a full 80 per cent of its workers, 3,700 people, are currently out of work with little hope for the future.

Islanders for a Better Tomorrow, another group representing business, labour, industry and the views of a clear majority of Prince Edward Islanders, has said: "Our main industries, our businesses, our working people, our unemployed and our children cannot afford to have this opportunity slip away due to the misguided efforts of a small and dwindling minority. Their supposed concern for the environment has proven to be selective and opportunistic. Decisive leadership and immediate action is therefore required on this project by the Minister of Public Works and the Parliament of Canada".

I once again add my voice to this call for action to proceed with this project which is extremely important to all of Atlantic Canada.

MAGIC TUESDAY

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to announce that tomorrow, Tuesday, March 30, is Magic Tuesday in my riding of Broadview—Greenwood. On Magic Tuesday all the proceeds from food sales in local restaurants go to the Children's Wish Foundation, a foundation that looks after kids who are terminally ill.

Tomorrow if people are in Toronto or are going through on a business or tourism trip they should go to the Danforth and go to either the Astoria Shish Kebob House, the Athenian Garden, the Ilissia, Mr. Greek, Omonia, Ouzeri, the Palace Restaurant on Pape, the Pappas Grill, the Patris Dining Lounge, or Philoxenia. All of the great Greek restaurants in Toronto welcome people on Magic Tuesday.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend the government on its progressive attitudes toward regional development.

It was only three weeks ago that I rose to voice my concerns about the direction the Community Futures Program was taking. As a result of a meeting between the Minister of Employment and Immigration and representatives of the Triple S group from Selkirk I can tell the House that cause for concern has changed. The minister listened to a fair and balanced presentation which has resulted in continued funding for the Triple S community futures group.

• (1405)

As I said in the beginning, I commend the government for funding success and working to eliminate failure.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, almost five years ago the Minister of Agriculture closed the border to imports of American honey-bees.

This move was a surprise for many bee keepers who had relied upon imports of queens and starter colonies from California on an annual basis. The varroa mite and the tracheal mite were found in U.S. bees. As they had not existed in Canada to that date the closing made sense. Chemical control is being used in the United States but mites have since found their way into several regions of Canada.

The border closure order is in effect until this fall, which is too late for next year's planning. Bee keepers need to know now what the government's intention is. Will the border be allowed to open when the five-year closure order dies this fall or will the ministry extend the order to keep it closed?

The futures of jobs and a competitive honey industry in 1994 depend on an early decision.

HARASSMENT

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House to address the problem facing women who are persistently harassed, intimidated and threatened by men.

Men who are former partners or social friends sometimes pester or threaten women to the point where they become confined to their homes in fear of the harassment that awaits them when they go about their daily lives.

Over half of the states in the U.S. have laws giving police a tool with which to lay serious charges against anyone whose pattern of harassment poses a credible threat of physical or psychological harm.

Police officers who deal directly with persons involved in stalking incidents throughout the U.S. and Canada support such legislation because it gives them a more effective tool with which to protect women.

I think it important to note that this is an issue that overwhelmingly affects women. I understand that the Minister of Justice is considering a number of legislative options. I urge him and the government to act quickly and address the issue of stalking before the problem increases.

NESTLE CANADA

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, management and factory workers at the Nestle plant in Chesterville are currently involved in a legal lock-out.

Last Thursday workers rejected a contract offer from the company which included a proposed continental work week. On Saturday the company implemented a lock-out.

As negotiations have currently ceased, management and labour are now faced with a situation which may impact on the future viability of the plant which employs 220 people in this community of 1,500 people.

Seventy per cent of the plant's production is exported to the U.S., and various economic pressures are being placed upon the plant to remain competitive in the U.S. marketplace and maintain its presence in Chesterville.

It is hoped that the management and workers at Nestle's Chesterville plant will be able to reach a mutually acceptable resolution to this dispute at the earliest opportunity.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the whole concept of the environmental panel review of major national programs is on the line because of the refusal of the Government of Canada, particularly the Minister of Transport, to follow the decision of the environmental review panel dealing with the Pearson airport expansion.

That environmental review panel rejected the government's view concerning the location of the north-south runway and the extent of that runway. Notwithstanding the total rejection of the government's proposal, the Minister of Transport has decided to proceed with the government's proposal in the government's way.

If the government is going to put the country to the expense of environmental review programs then the government has an obligation to follow through on them. If the environmental review panels will only be followed if they suit the government then the whole concept of the environmental review process is a ridiculous waste of taxpayers' money.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, almost nine years ago the Prime Minister said the words that will haunt him to his grave. He said the Conservatives believed that Canada's social programs were a sacred trust.

Eight years later, Canadians have witnessed an unparalleled assault on the social programs by this government, on every front. The Tories went on a search and destroy mission. They whittled away at everything from medicare to unemployment insurance and penalized the poor, the weak and the sick.

We know where the PM, that is the puppet master, stands. But where does his hand-picked successor stand on Canada's social programs?

• (1410)

The Minister of National Defence told journalists on the weekend, and I quote: "It is time to recognize that we must target our social services". What does that mean? Which programs does the minister plan to target?

For the past four years she sat at the cabinet table cheering on the GST, the Mulroney trade deal and the de-Confederation of Canada. The minister is for multi-billion-dollar cold war attack helicopters and against our social programs. That is her sacred trust, and it is a disgrace.

EDUCATION

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, during the government's consultation on the prosperity initiative one subject that came up many times was the need to reconcile our educational system with a rapidly changing world.

One man in Red Deer is already grappling with this problem. Dr. Joe Freedman became involved in the educational system the way many of us do, as a concerned parent, but his concern about the quality of education prompted him to go one step further and undertake a comprehensive study of the Canadian educational system.

Dr. Freedman's report, entitled "Failing Grades", reviews major studies in the field of education. His conclusion is that Canadian students perform poorly in comparison with students in other industrial nations. He says that part of the solution is national co-ordination of educational policy.

Dr. Freedman's report deserves a serious second look. He has sent his video and report free of charge to every school superintendent in the country. Hopefully, they will receive it in the spirit in which it was delivered, as the work of a concerned parent who wants what is best for our country and its children.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, last weekend at Laurentian University there was general consensus among economic experts that the government has its fundamentals all wrong.

Pierre Fortin from the Université de Québec à Montrèal charged that through its pursuit of zero inflation the Bank of Canada has driven the dollar too high so that foreign investors demand compensation in the form of higher interest rates.

John Smithin from York University said: "Experience seems to show that the economic slow-downs required to reduce inflation to a very low figure are much more severe and long-lasting, particularly in their impact on unemployment, than the public was originally led to believe".

Lars Osberg from Dalhousie blamed the Bank of Canada for costing the Canadian economy $70 billion per year with its pursuit of zero inflation.

When will this government leave this path of economic destruction and look seriously at the full employment solutions proposed by the New Democratic Party?

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women recently announced that as a result of a Canadian initiative the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women adopted the "Declaration on the Elimination of Violence Against Women".

The declaration states that violence against women impedes women's enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms and calls on governments to exercise due diligence to prevent and punish acts of violence, whether perpetrated by the state, within the general community or within the home.

At the United Nations several delegations praised Canada's recent adoption of guidelines on women refugee claimants fearing gender-related persecution. These guidelines are the first of their kind in the world.

UKRAINIAN CANADIANS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in 1988 the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship indicated his willingness to negotiate with Canada's Ukrainian community for redress of its claims arising from internment during World War I.

To date, the minister and his cabinet colleagues have procrastinated and delayed, notwithstanding the adoption of a resolution by this House urging action by the government. Today Mary Haskett is in Ottawa. She is the last survivor of the Spirit Lake Internment Camp in Banff National Park.

She has written an open letter to the Prime Minister and I quote from it: "I may be the last survivor of Canada's first national internment operations. What happened to our family, to many of our friends, can never be undone. It was unwarranted. It was unjust. But

I believe that you, Mr. Prime Minister, have a unique and historic opportunity to show understanding and compassion for those who fell victim. Before you leave office I appeal to you to honour the Ukrainian Canadian community's request for acknowledgement and redress. Do what is right and just".

I urge the Prime Minister and his government to listen to these pleas and settle this issue.

EDMONTON SURVEY

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, recently I sent questionnaires to my constituents to get their feedback on federal issues. Already thousands of surveys have been returned to my office. The high rate of response demonstrates my constituents' awareness of federal issues. They care about what goes on in Ottawa and they keep themselves informed.

• (1415)

When asked what federal issue is currently of greatest concern, one of the most common responses is the debt. Other issues of concern include the Young Offenders Act, the environment, and accountability of elected officials.

The overwhelming sense I am getting from these surveys is that the federal government must continue to reduce its spending. Edmontonians are prepared for the hard decisions that must be made, but they want their elected officials to share the burden. In particular my constituents think that the MP pension plan should be reviewed. They also feel that too much financial support is given to special interest groups.

Finally, the majority of respondents support the GST. They recognize that the GST is necessary but they insist that revenues continue to apply exclusively to debt reduction.

My constituents clearly want to be involved in the political process. We must make every effort to be responsive to their concerns.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, from March 28 to April 18 the Body Shop retail chain will be conducting a national campaign to combat child poverty. Its 105 stores will be displaying giant posters declaring that child poverty is a national disgrace. Their staff will be initiating letter-writing campaigns and encouraging community schools and city officials to become more involved in alleviating child poverty. In short, they will be devoting money and time to help reduce child poverty in Canada.

All of this comes at a time when the federal government has been busy looking at ways to redefine poverty rather than to solve it.

In 1984 over four million Canadians were living in poverty in this country and more than one million of them were children. According to the most recent statistics, still more than four million Canadians live in poverty and still more than one million of them are children.

The Body Shop is to be congratulated for its efforts to broaden awareness of poverty issues in Canada and for taking concrete action where the present government has only provided rhetoric.

This government should listen very carefully to this socially conscious business and act now to alleviate child poverty.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

On the weekend two of his colleagues implied that the government and the party they may lead some day plan to cut social programs, especially medicare. On the other hand, on Friday the Minister of Finance, who was touring the country, announced that the government did not intend to drop the helicopter purchase program which to date will cost $5.8 billion.

I would like the Minister of Finance to tell me if he had a choice between cutting social programs and maintaining the $5.8 billion helicopter purchase which option he would choose, helicopters or maintaining social programs in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have been attempting to put in place the appropriate fiscal measures so that we can preserve and maintain the social safety net that we and Canadians have all been very proud of and wish to retain.

The difficulty we have is with the growing percentage of our revenues being allocated for debt servicing costs. It imposes very direct pressure upon our ability to finance social programs.

We have been attempting to take steps to stimulate growth, to encourage investment and to encourage job creation while at the same time contain expenditures and reduce the deficit as a percentage of GDP. That is what we have been doing and we have been quite successful in that regard.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): It is apparent, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Finance has no intention of commenting on the choice that the government has to make and that he does not want to cancel the famous helicopter program.

On Friday the Liberal Party indicated that there is a very urgent need at this moment for the government to get involved in the conversion of the national defence industry. Commenting on that proposition the Minister of National Defence said that it was a very "poor excuse for policy" and full of "bogus terminology".

I would like to know from the Minister of Finance if it is the view of this government that making sure there is a smooth transition from the military industry to a peacekeeping type of industry is not the priority of this government. The Americans have been moving into that field for some time now.

• (1420)

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): The hon. Leader of the Opposition is commenting on why the government is not following the American example.

One of the reasons of course is that 60 per cent of the U.S. industry in the general defence sector is actually on defence projects. In Canada 70 per cent of our defence industry sector actually is in civilian production, not military production.

The Liberal Party said the DIPP program should be diverted to civilian use. In fact 80 per cent of DIPP expenditures are now diverted to civilian use. The reality is the problem that he is addressing is not the same problem in Canada that it is in the United States.

This is an important industry. As long as we are going to have an Armed Forces, and we will require one for the foreseeable future, I think it is appropriate that Canadian industry be able to supply at least some of the equipment the forces need.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, is the minister aware that there was a subcommittee of this House that produced a report last October indicating the need to move in that field quickly? Five members of that committee were members of his own party. They presented a unanimous report to the House of Commons. Why is the government not listening to the House of Commons rather than just dismissing some very important problems in Canada?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Not at all. We take reports of committees of this House of Commons very seriously. An example is the unanimous report of the House to get rid of the MST and replace it with a GST.

Another example is the unanimous report of a committee of this House, including Liberals and the NDP, to go ahead with the EH-101 helicopter contract. In terms of the report the hon. member was talking about, we do concede that primarily as a result of the referendum campaign this was put aside in view of other priorities, but it is the intention of the government to table a response to this report very soon.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

In his financial statement last December the government made a number of major defence cuts which severely limited our capacity to provide full-time professional peacekeeping forces. As a result 50 per cent of our peacekeepers are now reservists who have had to have a rush training.

Now the Minister of Finance says he refuses to cut helicopters but he is going to make other defence cuts, once again clearly endangering the capacity of this country to provide full, effective and efficient peacekeeping sources. In fact, we do not have a defence policy.

I ask the Minister of Finance if this government will table a new relevant defence policy before it brings forth a budget so that we will have a defence policy made for defence priorities and not simply by the Minister of Finance?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, to begin with, as I understand the position of the Liberal Party the EH-101 should not be proceeded with and instead we should update the ancient Sea Kings and Labradors.

The EH-101 calls for an expenditure of $350 million a year for 13 years. Updating the Sea Kings and Labradors would require about the same annual expenditure each year for the next six or seven years, after which we would end up with 40-year old helicopters nowhere near the equivalent of the EH-101s and unable to go out in really bad weather for search and rescue.

In terms of reservists the hon. member should take some time to meet some of our reservists because our reservists are first class, well trained and are not put into positions where they are in danger for lack of training. We have had a total force concept in place for a number of years and it is working rather well.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it may come as information and I am sure it does to the hon. minister that in fact the United States marine corps and air force and the Japanese defence force are now flying updated Sea Kings with adequate and efficient capabilities to provide for search, rescue and anti-submarine warfare at one-tenth the cost of the EH-101 helicopters. It is about time this government began to understand the real priorities of this country.

I come back to the Minister of National Defence. Six months ago after extensive hearings the committee reported that there should be a major program of defence conversion. I want to quote from that committee: "The aim is to foster a leading edge, civilian as well as military, high technology in areas such as surveillance monitoring, verification, sovereignty protection and peacekeeping". That report was endorsed by Conservative members of the committee.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Why did the Minister of National Defence speaking on behalf of the government reject this report in her statement on Friday? Why does this government not listen to a committee of the House of Commons including its own members?

• (1425)

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there was no rejection of the report. As I indicated, the report has not been responded to yet by the government.

In terms of conversion, as I indicated in response to the hon. member's leader, the Liberal Party has not even identified the problem, let alone the solution.

When it comes to the question of whether government should decide what industries should be pursued, we happen to believe the private sector can make those decisions better than government. We do not think there is any evidence anywhere in the world to show that governments do a good job of selecting winners as opposed to the private sector.

The hon. member might define what peacekeeping technologies are other than spy satellites. We are already involved in the satellite business to a high degree. How much more does he want?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): It's in the report, Harvie. Read the report.

Mr. Andre: The report has been read.

If the member is talking about environmental industries, he should check the record. He will see that the Canadian private sector is responding very vigorously to the opportunities in the environmental sector.

What the world has learned, but apparently not the hon. member, is that the private sector makes better decisions on priorities than governments.

DAYCARE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Today Statistics Canada published figures showing there is a real crisis in daycare in this country. More than half our children urgently need quality daycare. Parents can find none at an affordable price. Nevertheless this government remains adamant about not wanting to establish a national program that would provide quality, affordable day care and it remains intent on spending $5.8 billion on helicopters. Why not spend this money on our children? Do it, and do it now.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, to listen to the hon. member one would draw the conclusion that the government is not spending any money on children and does not consider children as a priority.

For the record and for all hon. members, perhaps it is timely to put on the record the kind of support that the federal government is providing to support children. Income support programs for 1993 in the form of a child tax—

Mr. McCurdy: You cut it out in B.C. and Ontario.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, they ask the question and if they do not want the answer—

Ms. Mitchell: Talk about child care.

Mr. Mazankowski: I will get to that. In terms of income support the child tax benefit provides $5.1 billion; social assistance, $1.5 billion; CPP child benefits, $280 million; GST credit, $750 million; the employment support program, UI maternity and parental care, $1.4 billion; child care expense deductions, $300 million; child care under the CAP training program, $400 million, for a grand total of $9.3 billion per year. That is the amount for this year.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that this government backed down on its promise in 1984 and 1988 to bring in a national child care program. The only conclusion Canadians can make is that this government agrees with the Conservative MP for Fraser Valley West who said essentially: "I see day care centres as little more than temporary orphanages".

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he is in agreement with that and if he feels that having over 600,000 children in unlicensed child care facilities is building a future for this country.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister build a real legacy for Canadian children and make sure that in the next budget his government brings in a national child care program?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Even the hon. member acknowledges the fact that we have a serious fiscal problem. It is encouraging to note that the leader in the province of Ontario is starting to recognize that fact.

Notwithstanding that, we have tried to appropriate a fair amount of money toward support of children, toward the support of maintaining the social safety net.

If the hon. member is suggesting that $9.3 billion which is directed to aid in support for children is an insignificant amount, then she and I are on different wavelengths.

• (1430)

While the hon. member suggests that she can spend $130 billion over the next five years and still bring the deficit down by $11 billion, I cannot follow her mathematics in that regard.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Well, Mr. Speaker, I cannot follow this government's logic.

This government says yes to cold war helicopters, yes to not taxing the wealthy's private trusts, yes to a business lunch deduction that costs Canadian taxpayers $1 billion but it says no to the children of Canada. By not putting in real programs it says no to making sure that Canadians get back to work.

Why give the rich a free lunch while there are children with no lunch? Will the Deputy Prime Minister look seriously at addressing the needs of children in this country and at the need for a national child care program so that their parents can participate in training, education and the work force?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this government is not turning its back on children. It has improved the programs for children step by step. A $9.3 billion program in support of children is certainly not an insignificant amount.

In terms of creating opportunities for job creation and new economic activity and growth, the hon. member is criticizing the small business sector. We have provided a number of initiatives and a number of incentives to help the small business sector. We have provided a number of incentives and initiatives to advance infrastructure and improvements in our infrastructure system. We have advanced a number of initiatives in terms of skills upgrading. All of this is in the name of providing an investment in people, in plant and equipment, and in an invigorated economy.

WESTRAY COAL MINE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Approximately 11 months ago, 26 miners lost their lives at the Westray coal mine. A provincial inquiry has been stalled. The Nova Scotia government has lost $12 million. The federal government has lost $80 million. The families of the deceased miners are without answers as to how this tragedy occurred.

In view of the importance of the subject matter I ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he has now sought a progress report on the investigation from the commissioner of the RCMP. If so, will he share that information with the House? If not, why not?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am not at all sure that would be an appropriate thing for the government to do in terms of trying to direct the RCMP or to put pressure on it with regard to the matter. I am sure the RCMP will do its usual diligent job in that regard.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, as usual the hon. minister opposite wishes to twist the question.

What we are seeking from the Government of Canada is to ascertain from the commissioner of the RCMP where this investigation is going. Twenty-six men have lost their lives.

In point of fact, when we asked for information on the Westray disaster we received very little. The government would not tell us its role in the funding of this particular disaster. We had to go to the access to information provisions. We got 18 blank pages, 18 censored pages. That is what we received from the Government of Canada.

Will the minister responsible explain to Canadians why the government is covering up the information contained in those documents?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows the Access to Information Act contains restrictions on what can be released.

For example, personal private information cannot be released because of the protection of the Privacy Act. There is commercial information which again is covered by other pieces of legislation and we simply cannot release it.

However, as the hon. member should know, all of this information has been given to the commission of inquiry in the province of Nova Scotia. The government is pleased that the legal obstacles to that commission have been removed. The commission will now be able to perform its function with access to all of the available information.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the same minister on the same subject.

• (1435)

The minister knows that with respect to the Westray file $80 million of public funds have been lost by the federal government. Twelve million dollars of public funds have been lost by the Nova Scotia government. More important, 26 lives have been lost. Eighteen pages have not been lost; they have been hidden. They concern not personal information but public information about what cabinet knew, when it knew and what advice was made available.

Does the minister recognize a year later, a year after 26 lives were lost, that now is the time to come clean and give the people of Canada, and more important the people of Pictou county, all the information with respect to this terrible and tragic mine disaster?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): As the hon. member knows, it was indeed a terrible disaster. This whole House was very sympathetic with the losses suffered by the families. The mine was proceeded with at the strong urging of everybody in Pictou county because of its economic benefits.

The disaster occurred. The mine is regulated by provincial jurisdiction, as the hon. member knows. The province has decided, I think quite properly, to proceed with an independent commission of inquiry. This government is co-operating 100 per cent with that commission of inquiry. It has provided all the information available to the commission of inquiry. I am sure the hon. member would not want to be accused of taking partisan advantage of a tragedy that has occurred and will let due process establish the truth.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, there are the 18 pages missing under access to information on the request for information on financing, on funding, on cabinet information, what information was in its hands when it made decisions about providing $80 million. Not only is that information missing, but specifically the CANMET report which was made public by the government last June and which we understood at the time was a complete document is missing seven additional pages, as we now see under the access to information request. Seven additional pages are missing in the CANMET report dealing with the suitability and advisability of proceeding with development of this mine and in fact, safety issues.

Given that it is not the provincial government and not the mine but the federal government that is burying or hiding 25 pages of crucial evidence about what cabinet knew and what advice was given to cabinet before $80 million of federal public funds were made available, does the minister not believe now, one year later, that it is appropriate that all evidence be laid on the table and that the cover-up end?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, no matter how loud the hon. member may raise his voice, that does not permit the government to break the law in respect to access to information.

The hon. member would be suitably and quite properly outraged if the government were to release his income tax files. Why does he not have the same concern for the privacy that might be violated through taking the kind of action he is suggesting we undertake?

ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

I would like to question the minister regarding the ever-shrinking green plan. I would like the minister to explain why he has never publicly challenged the cuts from the green plan which has shrunk from the original Bouchard promise of $6 billion over five years to $5 billion over five years, to $3 billion over five years, to $3 billion over six years, to a 36 per cent cumulative cut for the coming year.

Would the minister tell Canadians why he has accepted these kinds of cuts to Canada's fragile environment in silence?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with the premise on which the member bases his question in terms of what had been said previously. One thing we have to establish is that the green plan itself, which is a sustainable development plan for Canada, is more than just the amount of money in the plan. Neither is it exclusively everything that we are doing in the area of the environment or sustainable development.

What we see in terms of expenditures over the last two years, for example, is that we have spent close to half a billion dollars in the area of sustainable development, specifically under the confines of the green plan. From year one to year two there has been a 36 per cent increase in spending.

If the hon. member wanted to look at the projected spending for the next year, he would also find there is a projected increase in spending of 23 per cent. That is a very substantial increase in spending in a period of fiscal restraint.

• (1440)

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the minister talking about sustainable development because I am sure he has now read with care the ruling of the trial division of the Federal Court in relation to the fixed link to Prince Edward Island.

Not just the people in P.E.I. or New Brunswick but I think Canadians generally would like to know the position of someone who aspires to be the leader of his party and is presently the Minister of the Environment and therefore responsible for environmental assessment. Will the minister rise in his place and say today publicly that at least he supports a full, proper, public environmental assessment of the bridge proposed between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that with regard to the environmental assessment process of the federal government which is now an Order in Council, we have had 54 court rulings over a period of time. The hon. member participated directly in the discussions. The government brought forward new legislation to deal with the issue of environmental assessment. In fact, we recently signed an agreement with Alberta for a one-window approach in this area.

That being said, we are actively discussing the ruling of the Federal Court in regard to the fixed link. We are going to have some discussions on how to approach it. There are legal considerations. There are two main points in the ruling: one relates to the environmental assessment itself and the other deals with a constitutional issue. We will want to examine those issues and come forward with a decision on how to proceed as rapidly as possible.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

No amount of creative accounting can disguise repeated cuts to the green plan. In December last year in the mini budget the Minister of Finance announced and the Minister of the Environment confirmed there would be $440 million this year in green plan spending. We now know that the government plans to spend only $351 million. That is another cut of 20 per cent, $90 million from the green plan.

Will the minister now confirm that the $90 million has gone out of the green plan and into a slush fund for pre-election spending?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, only my Liberal friend could in the same question accuse us of cutting and creating slush funds at the same time or simultaneously.

What I can answer and offer in terms of a response to my friend is a report we put out today, as we had committed to do, on the progress of the green plan itself. The numbers speak for themselves.

For the first year $210 million has been spent. For the year ending in a few days $286 million extra has been spent. That is close to half a billion dollars. If you project that in terms of its increase, it is a 36 per cent increase. If we look into the next year, we have an increase in funding of 23 per cent. That is the expenditures of Canadian taxpayers' money in the area of the green plan and sustainable development. I think it is a very, very substantial increase in spending.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The figures do, indeed, speak for themselves. When the green plan was announced in December of 1990, the government promised $3 billion over five years, or $600 million a year. In the plan's first three years the government has met less than half of that commitment.

I refer to the C.D. Howe Institute report of 1991 where it predicted that: "The green fund is likely to be used as a war chest for the Progressive Conservative government's campaign plans".

I ask the minister, why is the green plan left dying on the vine to store up a pre-election spending binge by his government?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the green plan, which is Canada's sustainable development plan, is recognized throughout the world as being one of the most innovative sustainable development plans that has been produced. There is good reason for that; it is in our interest to do that. Given the fact that our economy is based on natural resources, we are one of the industrialized countries in the world that lives the most off our environment.

In the area of the environment over all, the government is recognized as having done a lot. That is what President Clinton was able to recognize. I am sorry that my hon. friend cannot do that. Just in the last year we dealt with the issue of CFCs and climate change. New regulations came forward in the area of the pulp and paper industry. We also brought forward new legislation, Bill C-42, the Wild Animal and Plant Protection Act. Bill C-13 came forward in the last year. We increased surveillance over the last year 40 per cent from where it was the year before.

• (1445)

We attended the earth summit in Rio de Janeiro. My hon. friend was there with us. We signed and ratified two international conventions, one on climate change, one on biodiversity, the first country in the world to do that.

I know you are very interested in this, Mr. Speaker, and I am glad you are asking me to go on. All of this was done by the government in the last year throughout the—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of the Environment, whom I wish well in his bid for the leadership of his party.

There is a widening gap between the government's preaching abilities and its actions. Both at home and abroad there has been a litany of broken promises.

Why has the government broken its commitment made in Rio by cutting and suspending aid to the poorest of the poor nations of this world? Why is the government so reluctant in refusing to ratify the Law of the Sea Convention? Why has the government missed the deadline for assessing 33 persistent toxic chemicals listed in the Canadian Environmental Protection Act? Why is the government failing to produce a national strategy for stabilizing greenhouse emissions? Why—

Mr. Speaker: That is certainly a collective question. I hope that the minister will be able to answer it expeditiously.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, let me address a few of those issues.

As far as toxic substances are concerned we have a priority substance list that includes 44 substances. An agreement was reached after an extensive stakeholder period dealing with that. We have dealt with 20 of those substances. We published reports on six.

In the area of climate change we have signed an international convention and ratified it December last. We have also made a commitment to producing by next spring our national report on climate change. We are working on an economic instruments paper concerning tradable permits to be able to put forward the solutions and the tools we need in the area of climate change. We have maintained our commitment to stabilization of 1990 levels.

Mr. Speaker: I think we will try another question.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister may want to answer the following supplementary question.

Why does the finance department review the environmental regulations from a competitive perspective? Why is the government of which he is a member not allowing the environment department to conduct a review from a sustainability perspective as well?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think my friend is referring to a process by which different departments were reviewing the regulations from a competitiveness perspective.

I want to stress that in our department we have worked a lot on the regulatory process. There is a recognition that we have to regulate better. Among the things we have to do for example is complement our regulatory approach with a voluntary approach and also through economic instruments.

We do have a stakeholder process assisting us to develop regulations so that they are presented in the most sustainable way possible for our economy.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of immigration. It concerns procedures for applying the new guidelines for women refugee claimants who face gender discrimination.

The minister is aware that 35 women who fear persecution as a result of their gender are to be deported because they arrived in Canada before the new immigration rules took effect. Will the minister declare a moratorium on the deportation of these women and their children and allow them to remain in Canada on humanitarian and compassionate grounds?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, when we review a case all factors are taken into account. That includes the principles behind the guidelines on gender persecution which were issued on March 9, as well as any new information which is available concerning a rejected claimant's current situation and the situation in his or her home country. This is the process that takes place and it ensures fairness to all rejected refugee claimants.

• (1450)

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the minister, instead of just rubber stamping the previous opinions of local officials, which is what happened last week, would re-evaluate cases according to these new guidelines.

For Canada to deport women back to countries where they and their children face discrimination, depravation and danger is both cruel and inhumane. Why will the minister not use his ministerial powers and discretion to allow women like Amina Mohamed and these 34 other women who face gender discrimination to remain in Canada on humanitarian and compassionate grounds? Why will he not do this?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, between myself and my office literally hundreds of immigration cases are reviewed on humanitarian and compassionate grounds each year.

Some of them are accepted and some are refused. I have no intention of listing those cases. For this fiscal year, the policies and decisions of the government have resulted in more than 73,000 cases being approved on humanitarian and compassionate grounds alone.

That is almost equal to the total number of immigrants that the Liberal Party of Canada let into Canada in 1984.

FISHERIES

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of fisheries. It refers to the lobster fishermen in the Northumberland Strait.

For more than two years the lobster fishermen in the Northumberland Strait have voluntarily accepted a larger carapace size for lobsters. During that time they have asked the DFO to also accept that larger carapace size in regulation.

Last week DFO announced that it would not accept the larger carapace size. Would the department reconsider its decision and if not, why not?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the question of lobster carapace size is one of divided opinion in the maritime provinces, particularly between certain lobster fishermen located in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia as compared to lobster fishermen in Prince Edward Island.

About one year ago, with the agreement of the three provincial governments involved, we appointed a firm of consultants to do an in-depth study of the situation, whether this is a step that should be taken. We have the report of that study now but we have not had sufficient time to consult with all interested groups before the season opens on April 30.

While over all the report recommends that we should allow an increase in the carapace size—

Mr. Dionne: Time.

Mr. Crosbie: This is an important issue before anybody in the Liberal Party bellows time. Although the report points out that there are positive advantages to proceeding in this way, there would be a short-term decrease in employment in processing.

Mr. Speaker: I think we really must press on.

CHARITIES

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and it deals with the annual minimum disbursement quota of registered foundations where they have to spend 4.5 per cent of their assets.

As everybody knows, for the last two years interest rates have been very quickly dropping, to the point where the income of these charitable foundations is very low. They do not have the resources they normally would have.

Is the minister planning on making changes in the way the government directs these foundations to disburse their assets?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct in what he says, the allocation of 4.5 per cent of the value of the assets of charitable organizations are to be devoted to charitable purposes.

I should tell the hon. member that there is no direct relationship between this formula and interest rates. In other words, this formula does not track interest rates. I will take the hon. member's submission as a representation but I am not contemplating any changes at this time.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister of health, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Last week aboriginal leaders met in Ottawa at a National Suicide Prevention Workshop to discuss the growing crisis of youth suicides in their communities. Tragically at the same time two youths in one of the communities that I represent committed suicide within a day of each other.

The minister of health heard that the communities need both human and financial resources to design and implement their own crisis intervention programs.

We have been talking in this House, at least myself and many others, since 1988 about the crisis of youth suicide in aboriginal communities. I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if it is time for action or is it still time to talk and talk and study the issue some more?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer our deepest sympathies to the families of the two youths who took their lives last week in northern Ontario.

This cannot be resolved just by governments. There is a major problem with suicides specifically in our aboriginal communities. We are working with the aboriginal communities, the people and the band leaders to resolve some of their difficulties.

However, all we have to do is just look back at the last few decades where most of the programs have been government-driven and have not succeeded. We have to work with the families and the band leaders to put in the necessary social services to give those youngsters some hope for the future.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): I must say, with all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I have stood in this place many times and asked the same question and I continue to get the same answer, that we cannot just throw money at the issue and we have to let the communities do it themselves. The communities are still waiting for the government to make up its mind whether the issue of teen suicide, of mental health for aboriginal people, is truly a priority of the government.

If this were truly a priority of the government it would have already made up its mind to put this issue to the communities in order for them to create their own crisis intervention program.

I ask the member one last time before we go to the polls: Are we going to talk about it and talk about it or are we truly going to do something about this major crisis?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will see that this is at the top of our agenda. We take it very seriously.

As I said before, we will offer social services for mental health and suicide treatment which is what the community wants and what the band leaders want. We will not act unilaterally, as has happened in the past, and see this fail. We are going to succeed. The only way we can succeed is through teamwork. That means the youngsters, the families, the bands, the governments, the communities and all the agencies working together to give those people hope.

BEEF INDUSTRY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Agriculture.

The U.S. market takes about 40 per cent of all beef produced in Canada and about 95 per cent of our beef exports. The Canadian Cattlemen's Association is now very worried that the Price Stabilization Program put in place by the government since 1985 is going to endanger these exports severely.

Will the government tell us if it is prepared to accommodate our beef producers by changing the nature of this program?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice, Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, first of all, the National Tripartite Stabilization Program, which has been in place for several years, meets national standards for bilateral trade with the Americans as well as international trade standards. The U.S. government appeared three times before a binational panel on free trade but its claims were rejected. The program meets international regulations.

However, the Stabilization Program is now being reviewed by the parties involved. The provinces are also involved in the program. It is a tripartite program involving the provinces, the federal government and producers.

We are all working together to find ways to improve the program. We have never rejected it. However, any changes should not be considered in the light of problems we have with the Americans because there is absolutely no connection. We have stood firm so far. The program legally conforms to international regulations. We were successful in our claims before international tribunals, and this will happen again.

• (1500)

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton—Southeast): Mr. Speaker, that is not an answer to my question.

[English]

The minister knows that the Dunkel proposals at the ongoing GATT negotiations call for an end to price-based support for farm products.

Can our beef producers across Canada be assured that their proposals which are compatible with Mr. Dunkel's will be accepted and put into place this year?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice, Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, we have had meetings with the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture. We are meeting on a very regular basis. The Liberal Prime Minister at the time never met farm producers during the 16 years he was in power, but we are having meetings on an almost monthly basis now. We do not need any advice on how we should deal with these representatives.

We have introduced two national programs, NISA and GRIP, which are an adequate response to existing needs. We have the stabilization program, in place and these programs are being reviewed regularly. If we can make any improvements in response to current needs we will do so. We will not act unilaterally but in consultation with producers.

PRIVILEGE

COMPREHENSIVE RESPONSE TO COMMITTEE REPORT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, as you know under Standing Order 109 the government is required within 150 days of the presentation of a report from a standing or special committee to table a comprehensive response.

On September 16 the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade tabled The Future of Canadian Military Goods, Production and Export. It is 195 days or six and a half months since it was tabled. It is far past the required deadline. The government is in breach of the privileges of the members of this House and I would ask them to respond immediately and fulfil its commitment under the Standing Orders.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question in Question Period and acknowledged we are behind on that and gave the reason. It had to do with ministers being very occupied with the referendum debate and simply not getting to it. It will be coming in shortly.

Mr. Speaker: The House may know that I am seized with a similar problem which I am considering. I think on this I will reserve because I may want to deal with it all at once.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 11 petitions.

GENERIC DRUGS

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have two petitions to present. The first one is signed by a large number of people from my own riding and other parts of British Columbia. They point out that generic non-brand drugs are cheaper than brand name drugs.

They call upon the government to repeal Bill C-91 and Bill C-22.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a very large number of petitions pointing out that the new NAFTA agreement will prevent any future government from bringing back generic drugs. This will result in a harmonization of our social policies with those of the United States and will increase our health care costs in Canada.

The petitioners call on this House to reject the North American free trade agreement.

• (1505)

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of British Columbia in a variety of communities. I will not name these individually.

The petitioners point out their concern regarding the announced intention of a firm in Vancouver to divert the North Thompson River in an effort to sell a million cubic feet of water in the San Diego, California, area. They notice that President Clinton is negotiating a number of side deals and that water was never an exempted commodity in the trade deal.

They ask the Government of Canada to either negotiate a side deal or point out conclusively that water is an exempted category in the FTA and NAFTA.

CROATIA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting petitions on three different subjects this afternoon.

First, I have a petition signed by several thousand Canadians from coast to coast to coast pointing out that the Republic of Croatia and the Republic of Bosnia-Hercegovina have been recognized as independent states by Canada and that they have both met all the necessary conditions for the establishment of diplomatic relations.

The petitioners point out that a number of countries and the United Nations have established diplomatic relations and that in the case of Croatia 61 countries have established diplomatic relations. They point out that the Croatian community in Canada is denied the benefits of diplomatic relations, including representation, trade and export programs and immigration programs while residing in Canada and visiting the Republic of Croatia and the Republic of Bosnia-Hercegovina.

Therefore, they call upon Parliament to establish full diplomatic relations with the Republic of Croatia and the Republic of Bosnia-Hercegovina.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have another group of petitions, signed by residents of British Columbia, including my own constituency of Burnaby—Kingsway, which notes that the federal government, through Immigration Canada, is in the process of eliminating services now available to the public. The petitioners have expressed particular concern about central processing units for immigration.

They note that the New Westminster Canada Immigration Centre provides good local service and this will be withdrawn to a less efficient, less accessible and already overworked Vancouver Immigration Centre. They note particularly there will be problems with accessibility.

Therefore, they call upon Parliament to demand that the government not eliminate in-person services and not close local Immigration Canada offices across the country.

CHRISTINE LAMONT AND DAVID SPENCER

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, finally I have the honour to present a petition which is again signed by hundreds of residents of British Columbia.

It notes that two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, who have been sentenced to 28 years each in a Brazilian prison have suffered miscarriages of justice, cruel and unusual treatment in Brazilian prisons and discrimination in sentencing and parole. The cumulative effect of these irregularities provides ample ground for the government to seek a remedy and that the remedy in question is expulsion in accordance with Brazilian law.

Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is in the House today, to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada

I certainly hope this plea will be listened to by the minister.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN AND CHILDREN

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of presenting to Parliament today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, petitions that have been duly signed by citizens of my community who are calling upon Parliament to provide a remedy for the incidence of violence against women and children.

The petitioners state that the present social climate is such that many women feel intimidated or afraid to report incidents of assault or abuse, that aboriginal, visible minority, immigrant, disabled, lesbian and poor women face additional overwhelming barriers in reporting violence or abuse and receiving help.

Therefore, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to accept legislation designed to eliminate violence against women and children and to encourage and support women to report incidents of assault or abuse and to provide assistance and support for women reporting assault or abuse.

They are also asking the government to develop a law that will concentrate special efforts on the training of police, lawyers, court workers and judges to become knowledgeable about women and child abuse and also to focus public attention on this very important and long-ignored problem.

QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 471 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 471—Mr. Proud:

With respect to the Department of Industry, Science and Technology, does it administer any grant programs to companies or individuals and, if so, (a) what are they (b) what do they cost individually?

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-92, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and certain related acts as reported (with amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance and Motion No. 1.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in the debate this afternoon.

I had quite a bit of time to consider the remarks that I am about to make. Upon lengthy reflection, I want to address a few points. In particular, I want to support my colleague's Motion No. 1, concerning the infamous 21-year rule.

I want to offer my sincere thanks to the member for Sudbury who I know has been very active in condemning this issue as have several other members. The 21-year rule is the Robin Hood in reverse rule. It is designed specifically to give help to those who least need it, which sounds like government policy right away.

As my distinguished colleague from Algoma says, we all remember the GST, which is another example of laws designed to benefit the rich. Let us get into this 21-year rule. What will it do?

Professor Neil Brooks addressed the committee. He is associate dean of the Osgoode Law School. He said that this rule would provide an extension on private trusts that will clearly result in a number of Canada's wealthiest families paying less tax this year than they otherwise would. Let us get all of this straight. What are we doing here?

Many clauses in the bill are good. Some clauses are totally offensive, namely this one, which gives a tax break to the absolutely wealthiest people in Canada. Why does one want to give an additional tax break to billionaires?

I do not know about you, but I do not even know a billionaire. Why do we want to give them this kind of a tax break? I am looking forward to the 10-minute speeches that we are having now on report stage for a government member to stand in this House and tell us why this is good for Canada.

• (1515)

Let us have none of this nonsense of saying this is a bill designed to help children or something like that. This is a bill designed to help the wealthy get a tax break at the expense of those at the other end who have been subjected to no less than 37 or 38 tax increases.

Mr. Foster: Thirty-eight now.

Mr. Boudria: My colleague from Algoma says 38 now, and he is always correct on this. We have been subjected to 38 different tax increases by the Conservative Party.

How does it work? It works roughly like this: Canada's wealthiest families will be able to defer paying taxes on the accrued capital gains, substantially what is beyond any other tax avoidance technique. In other words, once they have run out of all this other tax avoidance stuff they can invoke this particular rule. It is kind of like having two goalies in the net. In case the puck misses the first one the rich have this extra large hockey stick which can deflect anything right at the back of the first one. This would allow people to defer the paying of tax on capital gains. This has been described in the industry as estate freezing.

Not one reason for having this bill thus far invoked by the government even addresses, at least not in a substantial way, why it wants to have this clause in the bill or why it is necessary for us to retain it.

This is simply bad policy. It is bad policy because it tells Canadians at the lower end and medium end, and even some at the upper end, of the tax scale that there are ways around taxes providing people can establish these trusts and they are rich enough to know how to make them work.

There are other issues in this bill. One which I want to address very briefly is the capital gains exemption. I happen to be a person who thinks that there should not be capital gains exemptions, period. Even if the government and I disagree on that point the least we could agree on is that the rule be applied consistently to everyone. If the government is going to have the capital gains exemption rule, so be it. However, why does it exempt particular kinds of assets the way it has?

Let me give a parallel. If one plays the stock market on speculative stock on the Vancouver Stock Exchange, for instance, penny stocks and the like, that is capital gains exempt. Any accrual of capital gains is exempt from tax, up to the maximum of $100,000 providing it qualified. On the other hand, a small investor at home who buys the apartment block next door, or who wants to build an apartment building with three units in it—not one with a bunch of employees that can be written off as a business but just one building next door to that person's house, and we do have a housing shortage in Canada right now—later on when that person sells the triplex then that person would pay capital gains on that.

This is at the same time as we have exempted the investor that I just described a few moments ago and we have exempted someone selling his horse in Kentucky or his painting somewhere in a gallery, perhaps not even in Canada. The accrual of capital gains on the horse or painting I have just described would be tax exempt, but selling the vacant lot or selling the triplex apartment building next door would not be exempt. Why? Why are we doing this to people involved in that particular industry?

Personally I do not own any kind of real estate other than my own home. My constituents are complaining about this. Yes, people in the real estate business are complaining as well, and I have good reason to hear what real estate agents say, with two of them in my own household. However, this is not designed to benefit real estate agents but to plug up a perceived loophole for investors in real estate, not for people who sell it.

Those investors in small real estate units no longer can have this deduction. I and my colleagues say: Have one rule and have it for everyone. If the government wants to do away with the exemption, there was none when this government came to power in 1984 so I cannot criticize that. However, it should not pick selectively as it is doing now because that is wrong.

My colleagues have made all these points in our representation at the committee level. We have introduced amendments and we feel that they are important. Many measures in this bill are good measures but those two, the ones I have just described, are not. In particular, the frozen trust issue or the 21-year rule is bad. It is simply bad and we should not renew those provisions at all. We are clearly sending a bad message to the people of Canada, particularly at a time of record debt and record deficit, mostly caused by this government across the way. We are sending a message to Canadians that we want to tax the poor more and tax the rich less. That is the long and the short of it and I want no part of it.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to stand today and speak in support of the amendment of the member for Sudbury with respect to clause 42 and the provisions of the private family trust legislation, bringing the family trust to a close and making family trusts taxable at the present time.

Let us start by looking at what a private family trust is. It is a legal instrument used to pass on assets to beneficiaries of the trust, who are often spouses, children or grandchildren. Even a simple private trust costs thousands of dollars to set up, so it is apparent from this definition that private family trusts are set up by those who are eminently wealthy, those with lots of money behind them who are specifically looking for loopholes and ways to legally avoid taxation.

Let us look at the history of this legislation. The current legislation, which is presently drawing to a close, covering the private family trusts goes back 21 years to 1972 during the Liberal administration when it eliminated the estate taxes and the capital gains tax was introduced. This provision then exempted from being taxed for the period of 21 years assets put into a family trust, the idea being that they could escape paying taxes on the assets held within the trust itself for that period of time until maturity of 21 years when taxation would be paid on the capital assets of the trust itself.

What the proposal in this legislation does is extend that exemption from 21 years to the lifetime of the person for whom it is held in trust. The arguments by the government side for doing this are varied and many.

• (1525)

One of the arguments used is that this will help those people who are disabled and that it would be unfair to tax them now. To contradict that particular argument it is very clear that over a 21-year period of time there is a lot of time to have set up the alternatives to paying lump sum taxation. There are provisions within the Income Tax Act allowing the income tax to be paid over a 10-year period.

It is fairly clear that if people have 21 years, which is more time than most of us have for various tax provisions, to set up and get ready for a tax it is only reasonable to think that after that period of time provision would have been made within the trust to pay it out. It seems that this change is simply a method of once again rewarding the wealthy and the supporters of the government.

Let us look at some things that some professionals are saying about these particular changes. I would like to quote three of the professionals who have appeared before the committee or who have had things to say about this. The first one is Sidney Goldstein, of Goldstein & Goldstein in Ottawa, who said simply:

> There is no question that it represents a massive windfall for existing trusts.

Kathryn Bush of Blake Cassels said:

> A cynical person might suggest that pressure from influential political supporters also should be listed as a reason for the draft legislation.

Neil Brooks, the associate dean of Osgoode Hall Law School, said:

> The government has given Canada's wealthiest families notice that it intends to give them a gift worth several billion dollars.

Let us look at some of the evidence that was given before the legislative committee on Bill C–92. I refer specifically to the evidence given by Mr. Sidney Goldstein, who said in his introductory remarks:

> —given the view that there was some affiliation with Tories,

Referring to himself he said:

> I too am questioning the appropriateness and purposes of this proposal.

He then went on to state further in his evidence:

> The proposal here, and I second Professor Brooks' comment, is more generous than any other proposal in the act.

He was referring to the Income Tax Act. He continued:

> One of the propositions that was raised here in this committee was that it was really no different from deferring tax by giving everything to your children. Here you're just deferring tax until the last of your children dies, or that's the theory.
>
> The fact is that's not what's being done. The deferral is until the last of a class of persons dies, potentially.

He went on to state:

> —the potential tax benefits from this proposal are in the millions of dollars.

Toward the end of his testimony he stated as follows:

> There is no suggestion here that any particular use of these funds for any particular benefit is going to be encouraged as a result of this proposal.

It is clear that this is a tax windfall to these people. There is a cost to the federal government, to our revenue coffers, that amounts to a substantial amount of money.

It is not unlike the arguments of the Ministry of Finance when it is asked about the tax havens and the tax loopholes uncovered by the Auditor General of Canada, which we in our party have been pointing out for a long time. The government simply says that to be competitive we must allow them to exist. Yet when we talk to the officials from Revenue Canada they tell us that there are many ways of closing those tax loopholes. They say there are many things that can be done that will not impede the competitiveness of our international corporations but will make billions of dollars.

It has been suggested to me by one Revenue Canada tax official that billions of dollars in taxes are flowing out of this country as a result of these tax havens. This is simply another example of the government refusing to bring in fair taxation, of the government refusing to attack the wealthiest in this nation to ensure they pay their fair share.

• (1530)

Let me turn just briefly to the comments of Dr. Neil Brooks, associate dean of Osgoode Hall. He said that the amendment in this particular bill, Bill C–92:

> —will clearly result in a number of Canada's wealthy families paying less tax this year than they otherwise would. There just can't be any question about that.

In Dr. Brooks' final comment to the committee he stated that the amendment:

> —is bad tax policy because there is absolutely no theoretical tax justification for the amendment that's being proposed. It will only benefit high–income people.

That is why I must support the member for Sudbury in her amendment to ensure that the trust provisions that were brought in have a termination point which is the same as when it was set up back in 1972. The time to end that is January 1, 1993. It should be ended. This particular provision should not be allowed to go through to give the wealthiest families in Canada that further tax break. They have had 21 years to prepare for their taxation.

Now I say to those wealthy families in Canada: "Pay the piper. The time has come to help Canada and the rest of Canadians get a fair taxation system on the ground now".

Mr. Hawkes: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Although I have not been a party to it, I understand that there have been some discussions among the parties and there is a willingness to adjourn the debate on Bill C-92 at this time and move to Bill S-8 as the subject matter before the House. That is what I have been informed, and I think there would be unanimous consent for that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill S-8, an act to regulate the manufacture and importation of motor vehicles and motor vehicle equipment to reduce the risk of death, injury and damage to property and the environment, as reported (with amendment) from the Standing Committee on Transport.

Hon. Doug Lewis (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Lewis (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

• (1535)

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to add my comments to this debate today after having been a part of the debate for about three years actually through consultation with the Department of Transport, officials and various ministers.

I have taken an interest in this bill because I have a little history in the transportation business having been an auto retailer for almost 20 years and a manufacturer of travel trailers and other kinds of trailers. I have been very much involved with the Motor Vehicle Safety Act in both the retail and manufacturing areas.

For about three years we have had exhaustive discussions with the industry, consumers affairs organizations and organizations representing all aspects of the automobile industry. I do believe that we have as a group exhausted all possible permutations and combinations of possibilities for this bill. There have been many people and organizations involved with this and I was just one of them.

I had a chance to express my views here in the House on several occasions. I think it was nine altogether. I testified at a Senate committee on the bill. I have spoken to three separate ministers of transport on the bill and I spent virtually endless hours with officials explaining my position and my concerns with the bill.

Basically my concerns were that there was a double standard. It resulted from U.S. cars being allowed to be imported into Canada and qualified under a separate standard than cars brought through the Canadian system. There were two sets of rules. One was for imported cars and the other was for non-imported cars. That had a serious effect on consumers and their safety. It also had an impact on the business community where there was a double standard and not a level playing field.

To make a three-year story a little shorter, I would just like to say that through the good work of the committee in amendments and discussion they have come through with some amendments that address all my concerns and resolve them all. They create an opportunity to develop further regulations to implement the principles as outlined in the amendments to the bill. Generally speaking I come away very satisfied with the system. It works. All the organizations that expressed their concerns about the bill have been heard from and certainly there has been a consensus on the result. I think it will satisfy most of the participants.

I personally would like to express my own appreciation to the Department of Transport officials who have spent virtually endless hours with me on this. They have had a great deal of patience and a great deal of understanding in trying to see my point of view, which I did my best to express. I eventually was successful in explaining to them my concerns in such a way that they were able to agree to the amendments that would correct any problem I had with Bill S-8.

The officials have taken a great deal of time to understand my position and also the positions of all the organizations both from the business community and the consumers groups that have expressed themselves.

They have asked me actually to thank the organizations, associations and officials that have taken a lot of time to develop briefs and to make presentations both to them individually, to them as Department of Transport officials and also to the committee. They appreciate the input and the briefs from all aspects. I too appreciate the industry and the associations that have taken a lot of time and trouble to develop these proposals and briefs.

With the amendments to the bill certainly there will be a lot more input required and a lot more co-operation from consumers, consumers' associations and the industry to make sure the principles outlined in the bill and the amendments are implemented in the best possible way with the least possible paper work. This is so that they will affect the industry and consumers in a positive way and in reflection of the principles outlined.

I and the department officials and the Minister of Transport all look forward to that continuing co-operation with the associations. We are most anxious to get on with it when the bill passes and receives Royal Assent.

I would again like to thank the officials for their patience in dealing with me over the years with this issue and I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to speak my piece on the bill.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on behalf of the national Liberal caucus on this bill.

• (1540)

I want to congratulate the hon. member for Ottawa South who is the Liberal transport critic as you will know, Mr. Speaker, and as I am sure as all Canadians know. I congratulate him for his fine work and other Liberal colleagues both in this House and in the other place who have worked toward this bill.

I want to indicate first of all our support for the current piece of legislation. I recognize there is a need to have rules with regard to the importation of vehicles that will be beneficial to Canadians, will not harm trade and certainly not cause major inconveniences for Canadians.

We know that at the present time, particularly since January 1, 1993, it is possible to import from the United States, at least theoretically, any car no matter how new. Prior to the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement cars that were less than 15 years old were effectively barred from entry into Canada. Cars that were older than 15 years were designated as antiques, I think. They were permitted to be purchased providing the duties and so on were paid.

With the advent over recent years of rules with regard to motor vehicle safety such as emissions and so on, it became clear that the newer cars being imported could still have other problems at the border even if they were allowed into Canada under the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. There is the situation where for instance many U.S. cars do not have metric odometers although some of them do. They have different rules on child restraint devices. It became difficult for people who were importing the vehicle to ascertain whether or not the vehicle they had already purchased could even be made to conform to these new rules.

Now with the national safety mark and with the passage of Bill S-8 there will be a framework at least by which this will be made possible.

Of course we are still concerned with ensuring that cars that come into this country whether new or used—I say that on behalf of my colleagues—are as green as possible. I am not referring to the colour of the dashboard or the paint job but to the requirement for emission standards to be such that they ensure that cars will provide for the cleanest environment.

There is also a section of this bill which provides for what is known as an emission credit where companies can actually bank on the fact that they have produced a large number of efficient cars and then they can trade in some of these credits for a few gas guzzlers every now and then.

That is not such a bad thing in a way providing that these rules are progressively tightened. This is so that even if one does sell a gas guzzler, the over-all incentive is to produce more and more environmentally friendly vehicles. The idea is acceptable as long as that remains part of the understanding. It must remain not only the over-all objective but it has to be paramount in what is permitted in the legislation.

• (1545)

As one who has sat on the consumer and corporate affairs committee and the government operations committee of the House, I have long been concerned with the actions of some people in Canada whereby the new price stickers are removed seemingly by the retailer or perhaps by middlemen—or middle people if we cannot say that anymore in order to be politically correct—from the vehicles prior to arriving on the lot.

The difficulty with that is that the consumer is given the so-called retail price by people in the industry. He or she has no way to ascertain whether that information is authentic or whether one is getting an alleged $2,000 while the real discount is only about $10 or something.

It is very hard to get that information here in Canada. Increasingly we find cars on lots—I have had the experience many times—where someone very neatly with a razor blade removed all the amounts but not the motor vehicle description.

At the consumer and corporate affairs committee a couple of years ago I had occasion to question an automobile manufacturer who was there. I asked this manufacturer why it is that dealers do this in Canada. In the United States it is an offence to tamper with those stickers prior to the automobile being purchased by a customer.

He said: "Well, they were probably just cleaning the windows". I said: "Is it not ironic that people clean windows in a strip about one and a half inches wide just where the numbers are and do not clean the rest of the window or the part of the sticker that has the description of what the car has except for that part which has the amount?"

That was just a little hard to believe. I even suggested to that witness at that time that he should speak at a committee as though he were under oath, not putting too fine a point on it. In other words, I did not believe him.

I want to bring that to the attention of the House. As the automobile industry becomes more and more of a trans-border one—like it or not, that is done—I think it is important for us to ensure that at the very least the consumers on this side of the border get the same kind of protection that the consumers are getting on the other side. This is particularly so when as soon as a car is one day old one can sell it across the border with relative ease at the present time.

It is important that our consumers be given every benefit that consumers are getting south of the border as well. I thought it was a good occasion to bring this issue to the attention of the House. Perhaps there is an off chance that automobile manufacturers are listening to the debate this afternoon. I hope that when they clean windows in the future they do not clean them in strips one and a half inches wide where the numbers are and leave the rest of it there.

In future all the people interested can have a look at what was the manufacturer's suggested retail price. Then they can compare that with the alleged discount that any dealer says he or she is giving on the car. They can find out whether or not the so-called deal or savings they are getting is the one that is being announced by the dealer as such.

With that I will conclude my remarks and again add my words of appreciation to the hon. member for Ottawa South and other colleagues for their fine work at the committee stage and at earlier stages of this bill.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in third reading debate of Bill S-8, the Motor Vehicle Safety Act.

I am a member of the Standing Committee on Transport which reviewed this legislation. We took the bill out of this House and sent it to committee. We thought perhaps one or two witnesses might deal with the specific elements contained within the bill, such as the new rules regarding imported automobiles, the emission credits or the consolidation of the legislation. What surprised me was the number of people who came in to talk about the question of wrecked vehicles being brought across the border and the interprovincial trade of wrecked vehicles. That followed a concern I had raised during debate at second reading, which in turn was prompted by some work the Thunder Bay Automotive Trades Association did in terms of making me aware of the issue.

• (1550)

I want to spend my time today talking about that aspect of the legislation. I think we saw a real willingness by the government and the departmental staff to work with the committee to find the appropriate way to deal with the concerns within the context of federal law. Obviously there are certain matters that are beyond the purview of the federal government. Once a vehicle has been manufactured and sold for the first time at the retail level it becomes the responsibility of the provincial authorities. One of the dilemmas we faced was how to do something in federal legislation that we genuinely wanted to do but found there were some very real barriers to doing.

I think the regulations prescribed by this bill will ensure that used vehicles coming across the border will be brought up to the appropriate safety standards. That is clear in the bill. They will also ensure they are also brought up to standard structurally.

The committee amended the bill. There was some wondering ahead of time whether a bill that started out in the other place would be easily amended in the House of Commons, knowing full well that once it was amended it would have to go back to the other place. But to the credit of the government members on the committee that was not an obstacle. In fact the amendment I am going to read was put forward by them in response to a number of issues that had been raised by me and witnesses before the committee. The amendment provides for some greater flexibility, but also greater certainty with the regulations. I just want to read it into the record.

The bill was to be amended by striking out lines 21 to 33 on page 5 and substituting the following therefor:

> (2) except as otherwise provided by the regulations, a vehicle that has been sold at the retail level in the United States and that fails to satisfy an applicable requirement of section 5 or 6 may be imported into Canada, notwithstanding that section, if the person importing the vehicle makes a declaration in the prescribed form and manner that before the vehicle is presented for registration under the laws of the province the vehicle (a) will be made to conform to that requirement; and (b) will be certified in the prescribed form and manner to so conform by such person as may be designated by the regulations.

The second part of the amendment was that after line 44 on page 5 the following is added:

> (4) a vehicle that is imported into Canada must conform to the standard prescribed for the class of equivalent non-imported vehicle or made to conform to the standard prior to the presentation for registration under the laws of a province.

It sounds complicated but the committee decided—and these amendments were supported by all members in the committee—to make it clear there has to be a process. People cannot just bring cars to the Canada-U.S. border and promise to repair them. The government cannot just hope they do. The government has recognized there needs to be some degree of certainty there.

As members will know, we normally do not see regulations when we are dealing with legislation. One of the problems we have from time to time is ensuring the regulations are actually going to do what they are supposed to do. We have a commitment from the officials of the department that before the regulations are finalized with regard to the question of automobile imports they will come back to us in the transport committee and ask for our reaction.

• (1555)

They have gone even further than that. They have already given us a broad outline of the kinds of things they want to do which will go a long way toward meeting a lot of the testimony we heard from the witnesses.

I just want to report to the House on those specifics.

Safety and emissions regulations governing importation are under the Motor Vehicle Safety Act administered by Transport Canada.

Transport Canada will establish a network of registered certifiers operating under the supervision of a national registrar. The system could be linked to existing manufacturers or dealer networks established independently under a third party contracted to Transport Canada or be a combination of these options.

Just as an aside, one of the concerns we raised was about the person who lives in Red Lake who wants to bring in a vehicle. Does he or she have to come back to Thunder Bay, Dryden or Kenora where there is an authorized dealer, or can he or she have that work done in Red Lake and certified by a licensed authority or designated authority in that community? That is one of the things we are going to be looking at when the regulations come back to us.

A list is published quarterly of U.S. vehicles eligible for importation. Most vehicles will be included. Exceptions will be those U.S. vehicles not meeting Canadian occupant restraint standards and specialty vehicles such as limousines or recreational vehicles where compliance with U.S. or Canadian standards is unsubstantiated.

Canadian entry will require (a) proof of compliance with U.S. safety standards, either by statement of compliance label or letter from original manufacturer; (b) eligibility for importation based on compliance with specified standards, for example occupant restraint systems; (c) completion of Transport Canada documentation requirements including a vehicle description and an affidavit to bring the vehicle into compliance with required Canadian standards.

In addition, one of the items raised because of the testimony before the committee was the little known fact that any Canadian wanting to import a vehicle from the United States must give the U.S. authorities 72 hours notice of his or her intention to do so. We are told that very few, if any, people actually do that. Currently when somebody brings that car to the Canadian border—we all know one does not stop first at American Customs and then cross the river and check in at Canadian Customs, one just starts at the Canadian side—we do not ask about that.

We have asked the departmental officials to take a look at that specific item to see if we can require importers to show proof they have complied with American laws. That is one way to deal with the question of thefts. That is one way to deal with the question of vehicles that have been written off because a number of states can provide a description of the history of that vehicle. That would assist the Canadian authorities in determining the appropriateness of that vehicle coming across or, at the very least, the degree of work required to bring that vehicle up to Canadian standards.

Getting back to the draft provisional list of possible regulations or the broad concepts, vehicle modifications are performed or may be performed by the importers' choice of company or by registered certifier. Notices of defect may be handled at no charge by a Canadian representative of the manufacturer or by the national registrar for a fee.

Vehicle modifications are inspected and approved by a registered certifier and documentation sent to the national registrar.

An approved copy of the documentation is provided to the importer for the proof of compliance necessary to have the vehicle licensed by a province.

One of the other areas we raised in committee is the question of vehicles that have been structurally damaged. We are hoping the regulations will be some kind of trigger mechanism that will require a licensed mechanic to at the very least take a look under the vehicle to see whether anything has been welded into the vehicle that should not be in a particular place, or whether there have been any welds to the frame. I want to come back to that in a moment.

That is the general direction the department is going to take in terms of the regulations. It has indicated it believes it can be back to us within approximately a month to run through the actual wording to see whether or not we feel it is suitable as it relates to what we have heard.

I want to turn to the question of wrecks. I do so in the context that in part this legislation does allow the federal government to take a look at those things coming across the Canada–U.S. border. Under Canadian constitutional law it really is difficult for us to deal with anything domestically. We know from testimony before the committee by the department officials that a committee of the Canadian Council of Motor Transport Administrators is attempting to develop a protocol nation-wide so that when a wrecked vehicle comes across this information is recorded and distributed to all provinces so they are aware of it. That is the second part of it.

There is a national committee made up of representatives of each of the provincial jurisdictions as well as the federal jurisdiction which is trying to come to grips with this.

Looking at some of the testimony presented to us in written form, this group was unable to appear. It is the Automotive Retailers Association of British Columbia. Its document was endorsed by the National Automotive Trades Association of Canada. The association which is an affiliation of regional and provincial associations representing Canada's retail automotive service industry in part says: "Our provincial affiliate in British Columbia has forwarded to you a brief which is representative of all of our member associations across Canada. We therefore wish to make you aware that NATA gives full endorsement to the brief submitted by ARA, the Automotive Retailers Association of British Columbia. It speaks on behalf of all of us".

I would like to read the section that deals with what is called rebuilt write-offs. It is entitled "The Nature of the Problem".

> Insurance companies classify collision damaged vehicles as "write-offs" when the estimated cost of repairs exceeds the remaining actual cash value of the vehicle, or is greater than the cash value less the salvage value. The term "write-off", therefore, does not necessarily denote an inoperable wreck—nor a piece of junk! Frequently, it refers to a good, late model, low mileage vehicle which has suffered extensive collision damage that an insurer estimates would be uneconomical to repair. If properly rebuilt, such vehicles can provide adequate transportation and good value.
> Insurance companies sell write-offs to the following classes of customers:
> a) Licensed auto recyclers or wreckers and used parts suppliers, who dismantle cars and sell undamaged used parts to body shops and other businesses, as well as to private customers.
> b) Licensed auto body shops and professional rebuilders.

And this is the key one:

> c) Private individuals—often amateur rebuilders.
>
> The vehicles sold to body shops and rebuilders are repaired and returned, in most cases, to our roads and highways. Many of these units are rebuilt by qualified technicians using proper repair equipment techniques. As such, these vehicles once again may become an economical and safe mode of transportation.
> However, many other rebuilt write-offs are rebuilt in dangerously unsafe fashion—either for private use or resale, by private individuals or amateur mechanics—who may be unskilled and ignorant and use inadequate tools and equipment. In such cases, frames may be spliced in unsafe places, such as beneath doors or in torsion boxes, which means welds result in rigidity in areas where manufacturers and designers intended a degree of "give" or yield. Also, steering and suspension parts, rods and spindles which are bent and which should be replaced are instead heated and hammered back into shape. The result is crystallisation and metal fatigue—leading to breakage. For example, cast steel spindles which have been heated can shatter on impact! The workmanship involved in so-called repairs of this sort is often of a quality which can only be described as horrifying!

They also go on to talk about the extent of the problem and they sort of ask rhetorically:

> Are these examples of shoddy workmanship simply isolated incidents? Just how serious can these shoddy repairs be? Why is this problem receiving so much attention now?
> The answers to these questions have a common bond: the changing technology used in the manufacture of today's automobiles.
> As oil prices climbed in the early 1970s, auto manufacturers scrambled to produce smaller and more fuel efficient automobiles. Engineers developed new models which employed front wheel drive technology, used high-strength low-alloy steel in structural components and utilized "unibody" or "monococque" construction.
> Today's automobile is a radical departure from those found on our highways even 10 years ago!

Those that I suspect all of us at one time tinkered with in our backyards trying to keep them on the road.

> No longer are we seeing the classic sedan, with its frame construction and heavy sheet metal panels. Today's car employs unibody construction, with no frame in the traditional sense and with considerably lighter sheet metal. With unibody cars, the sheet metal is attached to a subframe and the subframe and sheet metal form the "unibody". This represents the structural integrity of the vehicle.
> Tolerances are more closely defined. Repair technicians must now work to tolerances that are within millimetres—with little room for error!
> Many collision shops have made large investments in sophisticated measuring and pulling equipment, which allows them to repair vehicles to tolerances defined by the manufacturers. The extensive use of high-strength low-alloy steels has necessitated the use of Mig welding equipment, to retain the integrity of these critical components after welding.
> Unfortunately, most amateur rebuilders possess neither the equipment nor the training necessary to properly repair today's unibody vehicles. When proper techniques and procedures are not used in the repair of these highly sophisticated automobiles, the result is often a vehicle which could be described as a potential "death trap"!

• (1605)

We saw some examples of that. One of the witnesses came before the committee with a video tape of a 60 Minutes program. They had taken a crew to a number of automobile retail outlets in the United States where people were buying cars that in fact were two cars. The cars had been wrecked, the front end had been chopped off and another one welded in its place. These were totally unsafe vehicles. They were not telling their customers that these had been recycled vehicles. In fact it was shown on the tape that people were saying: "It has never been scratched. It has never been repainted". It was more than scratched and it was more than repainted. It was totally rebuilt using the front end of one car and the back end of another. That is the kind of vehicle we are concerned about.

I certainly know from the testimony we heard that members on all sides of the committee were quite concerned about what was happening. But they were also frustrated that we as a federal Parliament could only do so much and that it was really up to our provincial and territorial colleagues to put in place the kind of legislative regime that is possible.

The province of Quebec has a regime in place. If you take a vehicle to the motor licensing branch of the province of Quebec, if it is a used vehicle you have to bring with you a picture that shows it has been examined on a full body frame. That is a special piece of equipment which is available in body shops. The licensing branch knows that it has been inspected by a qualified body mechanic who has an understanding of the structural integrity of the vehicle and therefore can indicate whether the vehicle has been recycled.

We need to have that kind of approach adopted right across the country. I would encourage the Minister of Transport to press his provincial colleagues through the committee of the Canadian Council of Motor Transport Administrators to do that very thing, to really accelerate their work. They will be meeting some time in the next month or two to accelerate their work and to bring together a national standard.

Certainly we have seen in the area of the environment where the federal government has adopted a policy after consultation with the provinces and then the provinces have enacted it in law.

It is important that we do that. It is important that all members in this House contact their respective provincial ministers of transport to put pressure on them to go along.

Finally, and I know I only have one minute, there are a number of other areas where the federal government can take a lead. For example, although it does not have legal jurisdiction there could be a national data bank to which all provinces could send their vehicle registration information and where all police departments could easily pull it out.

We need to work with the provinces to ensure that the environmental controls we put in cars are maintained because at the federal level we can only decide what the starting quality is. We have no jurisdiction on ensuring that they are repaired and maintained. That is up to the provinces. We need a national standard so that we can adopt basically what B.C. has done in terms of its clean air controls and its mandatory inspections, as I understand it, of pollution equipment.

There is a lot more work to be done. My compliments to my colleagues on the committee and my compliments to the government for its willingness to address these areas.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

INCOME TAX ACT

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-92

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the House an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) or (2) with respect to the report stage and third reading of Bill C-92, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and certain related acts.

Under the provision of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allocating a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the said stages.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, I just reflect back to when the hon. member was the House leader and we always had agreement. I do not know what has happened in the meantime.

CONFLICT OF INTERESTS OF PUBLIC OFFICE HOLDERS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Doug Lewis (for the Prime Minister) moved that Bill C-116, an act to provide for greater certainty in the reconciliation of the personal interests and duties of office of public office holders, to establish a Conflict of Interests Commission, to amend the Parliament of Canada Act and to make consequential amendments to other acts, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise on the second reading of Bill C-116, an act to provide for greater certainty in the reconciliation of the personal interests and duties of public office holders, to establish a Conflict of Interests Commission, to amend the Parliament of Canada Act and to make consequential amendments to other acts.

As hon. members will know the bill is really a response to the joint committee's report on conflict of interest that was received by the government in June. That was a unanimous committee report of the Senate and the House working together. This bill to a large extent reflects the unanimity of that committee report.

Each one of us understands the task before us is important, not only because of the direct impact this proposed legislation will have on us personally as parliamentarians but also because of its implications for the operation of parliamentary government in Canada.

As parliamentarians we have all sought office in this place for one principal reason: to serve the interests of Canadians so that their hopes and desires and those of their children and their children's children are properly and fully realized.

It has been sadly unfashionable and all too common to criticize and call into question the motives of politicians. Unfortunately there are always some people who abuse public office for their own personal gain and do not live up to the trust bestowed upon them when they are elected or appointed to public office. These few individuals are rightly the object of public criticism and censure.

It is nevertheless distressing to all of us as parliamentarians to work within an environment where every action we take as we carry on the duties of our offices is subject to scrutiny in the expectation that we are sinners and we are going to do something wrong and that in everything we do we are hiding something. That is the reason for this legislation.

• (1615)

The problem of conflict of interest is a perennial one. It dates back to the origins of democracy itself. There were such problems in ancient Greece and Rome. These difficulties have persisted over the centuries. Nonetheless the problem of conflict of interest is perennial as are our obligations to overcome it.

Political leaders if they are to act effectively must have and deserve to have the trust and confidence of the people they represent. This trust, which is not to be given lightly, can only be fostered in a political situation where there is a system of openness and accountability.

All the players in such a system must know and understand the rules of the game. The rules therefore must be as straightforward and as direct as possible. To illustrate this point I will use an analogy which Canadians will understand.

Conflict of interest rules should be like the rules in the game of football. Everyone who enters public life seeks to reach and cross over the goal line at the end of his or her career. The goal to which we aspire is to carry out one's duties of office fully, effectively and responsibly and conclude one's career on a high note without becoming involved in conflicts of interest, without casting doubt on one's motives and intentions, without ruining one's good name and reputation or that of one's colleagues.

Unfortunately over the years the playing-field has become more complex and the yardsticks keep moving. We often find that our job is to represent Canadians in a responsible manner but we are often attacked as we carry out those responsibilities. As parliamentarians we are busy people with many responsibilities and demands on our time. In such an atmosphere it is often difficult to be aware and reflect on every nuance of a situation to make sure that no conflict might arise.

However we all understand that constant vigilance is required to ensure that we know and understand the rules that will help us avoid conflicts of interest so that we do not stray out of bounds. We must always be scrupulous because the penalties are very onerous. The loss of reputation alone is a very strong incentive not to become involved in a situation where one's conduct of public office or behaviour can be called into question.

Parliament has learned about that reality over the years and in particular about what will and will not be tolerated by Canadians in public life.

The boundaries of the political playing field have become more apparent and real to all of us because of what we have learned and understood from the shortcomings which act as lessons of what not to do.

The bill before us today is intended to make those lines even clearer and to give all members of Parliament, senators, ministers and parliamentary secretaries mechanisms to assist them to keep their personal affairs in order so that these personal concerns will not interfere with their public responsibilities.

In tabling the legislation the government realizes that proposed legislation is not perfect and that Parliament has an important responsibility to examine it carefully to determine if any improvements are required.

Government welcomes the process because government wants more than anything else for Parliament to give this whole problem its greatest and fullest consideration. This is so that Parliament can produce a piece of legislation as quickly as possible on this most important public matter.

Before we begin this work I would like to therefore describe briefly the main provisions of the bill and its importance.

We are aware that very high standards of public conduct are rightfully expected by parliamentarians from all Canadians. Upholding the public trust is a clear priority of this bill. An illustration of this commitment is the obligation of parliamentarians, ministers and parliamentary secretaries listed in the purpose clauses in both parts of the bill. I want to say at this stage that unlike the parliamentary committee report the bill is a two-stage bill. There is a stage of the bill designed for ministers and parliamentary secretaries and the Order in Council appointments made by the cabinet of senior public servants, deputy ministers and the like. That part of the bill goes to a commission and the commission reports to the Prime Minister. The reason for that is that the Prime Minister is responsible and the officials, his parliamentary secretaries and ministers, are responsible to him. He has to make sure that their conduct is above reproach. He has a commission to look after that and it is separate from the actions of parliamentarians, senators and ordinary members of Parliament.

• (1620)

Ordinary members of Parliament will report to a jurisconsult. The jurisconsult will be a person to whom they can report their activities and who will look after their conflicts and who will adjudicate their concerns and will report to the Speaker. The jurisconsult reports to the Speaker who reports to Parliament. The commission reports to the Prime Minister.

Both sections of the statute are similar. In both sections the standard under which people are judged is essentially the same. There are rules which govern parliamentarians in both Houses. Both parts of the bill make it clear that no parliamentarian should advance his or her private interests or those of a spouse or dependents on the basis of information that is not available to the public or use his or her influence to obtain by reason of public office a personal benefit or personal gain.

Both parts of the bill have rules of disclosure of gifts and benefits which will apply to all members, senators, ministers and parliamentary secretaries and of course those other persons who are covered by the bill in terms of the commission part of the bill.

All members and ministers and parliamentary secretaries are required to admit to meet basic requirements; to report and disclose their private interests and those of their spouses and dependents to either the jurisconsult in the case of members and senators and to the conflict of interest commission with respect to parliamentary secretaries and ministers; to establish in conjunction with either the jurisconsult or the commission a personally tailored regime taking into account their responsibilities for arranging their assets to avoid conflict; and finally to prepare a public declaration of these interests as either the jurisconsult or the commission sees fit and, in the case of spouses and dependents, relevant.

These rules reflect the political reality that any member of Parliament, senator, minister or parliamentary secretary can appear to have or actually be involved in a conflict of interest. The bill, therefore, represents a comprehensive approach to the ethics of parliamentarians and public office holders and will ensure that Canadians can have confidence in all of their representations.

I should, however, point out that the bill provides that ministers and parliamentary secretaries must satisfy more stringent requirements because of the positions they hold. The government recognizes that potential for conflict of interest is greater for ministers and parliamentary secretaries than for regular members and senators.

Accordingly those who hold these offices will have to disclose their private interests and, where the commission deems it necessary, make a public declaration according to stricter standards than members and senators.

In addition, ministers and parliamentary secretaries will not be permitted to engage in any employment, business or in the practice of a profession outside their official duties. Ministers and parliamentary secretaries will not be permitted to accept any fees.

Finally there are specific rules on post-employment which will apply to ministers and parliamentary secretaries but of course not to parliamentarians.

• (1625)

These different requirements for ministers and parliamentary secretaries reflect the political reality that those members of the ministry exercise broader responsibilities of office and could experience opportunities for influence that do not go beyond those of private members and senators.

I want to take the opportunity in this context to discuss another important aspect of the bill that has in the past given legitimate concern. It is the requirement that spouses and dependents participate on the same terms as members and ministers in relation to the disclosure of their private interests and the treatment of gifts, personal benefits and hospitality which they receive.

The government does not view spouses as mere appendages. The government thinks that the disclosure to the jurisconsult or the commission of private interests required in respect of a spouse might be identical in scope to that required of a member or public office holder.

This is a recognition of the reality that marriage is an economic partnership and that husbands and wives have a direct pecuniary interest in each other's financial affairs.

I want to say though that this matter was a key issue in the debate of the committee. As far as the members and senators are concerned, the disclosure of what is the interest of a spouse will be made by the member or the senator to the jurisconsult. The spouse will not be required to file anything with respect to a minister or parliamentary secretary, on the other hand, because of the higher degree of responsibility. One does not have to accept a ministry or accept being a parliamentary secretary. A spouse will be required to disclose to the commission. The spouse does not have to disclose to the member but they have to disclose in that case to the commission.

This is a difficult and very exacerbating field. The joint committee had a number of sessions and heard a number of representations on the matter. I think that the committee will examine that issue again. I think the committee will find that this way of approaching it is probably realistic.

The declaration by the member with respect to his or her spouse's assets to a jurisconsult is fine but when it comes to a minister or parliamentary secretary then a separate declaration is important.

In extending the provisions of the bill the government wants to preserve as far as possible the privacy of spouses and their dependents. I think particularly as we move forward with a society where both spouses have their own separate and independent careers that it is important that this conflict of interest bill protects the independence of spouses.

We will perhaps have to examine the legislation again. I believe that the bill sets forth a pretty good regime. It is on that basis that the government has put it forward.

The bill is really an attempt to have the jurisconsult and the commission balance the public interest in disclosure with the right of the minister or private member to privacy and to safeguard against unnecessary public disclosure. After all there is no need for people to know exactly whether one has 100 shares of the Bell Telephone Company or 1,000 as long as you do not have a controlling, significant or major interest. These are very small amounts. To say that a person has a minor interest in certain shares was judged to be sufficient by the committee that reported.

The question of what is disclosed will be in the hands of the commission and the jurisconsult that will make public disclosure. That public disclosure will be available for those who really want to read it.

• (1630)

The concept is that the commission and the jurisconsult will make sure that the public has confidence that members, ministers, parliamentary secretaries and senators are not hiding something, that they are not trying to feather their nests by hiding that nest somewhere. It will be disclosed because disclosure really represents the essence of control on conflict of interest.

My remarks are relatively short today. I believe we can move this bill forward. We intend to have a committee study it in joint consultation with the Senate. It is important that the matter move forward as quickly as possible through the House so that we can get going on the committee work.

It is no secret that this Parliament is drawing to a close. I believe it is absolutely essential that this legislation be in place before the next Parliament. Therefore we have to move ahead. That being the case, I am going to turn the floor over to someone else to make a speech on the matter and perhaps we can get it completed today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby—Violence Against Women; the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Immigration Offices; the hon. member for Halifax—Economic Statement; the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan—Public Works; the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond—Westray Mine Disaster.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate.

As the Official Opposition critic for government operations I want to indicate that this bill is very long awaited. This is a debate which I had hoped we would have had long ago. I am pleased that we are finally having it today.

I want to indicate that on behalf of my colleagues we have no intention at all of delaying this bill. We want it to go to committee as early as possible. We want to co-operate because we feel this issue is important.

I am one of those who believes that what we do as legislators does not only consist of the bills that we pass, it consists largely in the trust that Canadians have in those who occupy the seats in this great institution.

[Translation]

The hon. Leader of the Opposition, in a speech he gave over a year ago right here in Ottawa at the Congress Centre, when he asked me to prepare a report on public morality, told us how proud he was the day he was elected to Parliament. He told us about his father's even greater pride in seeing this son, the 18th of his 19 children, which the Leader of the Opposition is, elected to the House of Commons. The father of the member for Beauséjour felt this great honour and pride.

The member for Beauséjour wondered whether his father would feel as proud today, given the debates that have gone on in recent years. He concluded that unfortunately his father probably would not feel so proud, but that it was important to restore the pride people once had in our parliamentary institutions. That is what the Leader of the Opposition said and I agree with him.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker, a former Prime Minister, some years ago said that there was no greater honour for a Canadian than to be elected by his or her fellow citizens to sit in this, the highest court in the land, the Parliament of Canada. How true that is.

When I was elected on September 4, 1984 how special that day was for me. A week or so later when I came to Parliament Hill, I walked in through the main entrance, the one under the Peace Tower. For me that was symbolically important because, as you may know, I had been a staffer on Parliament Hill. I do not know whether that is still the case, although I should know, but as a staffer there was one entrance that we were prohibited from using. It is not permitted for a staffer here to use the main entrance to Parliament, the one under the Peace Tower.

The day after I was elected it was a special privilege for me to walk in through that entrance, and I walked across that threshold into Parliament as an MP.

Notwithstanding some of the things that have happened over recent years, I still feel this way about this great institution. Perhaps in my case being an MP was a boyhood dream. It is ironic that I came into this building for the first time not as an MP but as a busboy in the parliamentary restaurant. I worked my way up a number of rungs in the ladder, was elected to municipal office and then to the provincial legislature of Ontario. I resigned my position here when I was elected to Queen's Park.

I came back in 1984 to become an MP in this same building where I had once served as a busboy in the parliamentary restaurant. Maybe that even adds more to my pride in the great privilege that was given me by the electors of the great riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

It is important for all of us collectively and individually to do everything we can to restore confidence in this great place. I will not go into all the things that have happened because I do not think today is the day that we should have that partisan speech. I make it often enough when it is my role to question the government on various issues.

Today is the day we should all be getting together to ensure that we do whatever it takes to amend our rules, yes, but also to ensure that those who will be elected in the next Parliament, and those who are here now who will continue to serve in the next Parliament, will do their best to restore integrity in Parliament. That is the first premise. That is what all this is about.

Here we have Bill C–116. How did we get started on a conflict of interest bill? Well, you will remember, Mr. Speaker, that we had a set of rules better known as the conflict of interest guidelines.

[Translation]

In 1985 the Prime Minister replaced these rules with a conflict of interest code. In 1987, unfortunately as a result of the circumstances surrounding the resignation of a minister, Judge Parker recommended that Parliament pass a law. I have here the report of the Parker Commission which recommended conflict of interest legislation for the Parliament of Canada. Of course Judge Parker made several other recommendations and concluded that the minister in question had broken the rules many times, 14 times, if I remember correctly.

• (1640)

For the purposes of our discussion today it is important to note that as the starting point for having a law.

[English]

This bill is actually our fourth tentative try at conflict of interest rules. I believe the first bill was Bill C–46, the second one Bill C–114, and the third one Bill C–43.

I must say in retrospect, and I share these comments with the member from Mississauga South, that I am glad Bill C–43 as originally drafted was never enacted because some of its provisions were outright ridiculous. Frankly, I do not know how it was put together but it could not have worked. I am not even sure that it would have accomplished what we were trying to do in the first place. Certain of its provisions were absurdly strict and in other areas it did not even do the job.

Our committee looked at that. When I say our committee I mean the committee under the co-chairmanship of the member for Mississauga South and Senator Stanbury, a member of the other place. We had extensive deliberations and it is important for the House and all Canadians to know that we came up with a unanimous report.

It does not mean that everything in the report was the absolute best and what I wanted. I guess the same could be said for the member for Mississauga South or the member for Oshawa. It means that there are some things on which we could unanimously agree, and at least we made those kinds of agreements.

I want to refer to a few things in the bill, notwithstanding my agreement with the bill in general, which I hope we will seek to amend at committee.

First of all, there is a drafting error in the title of the bill. The bill is referred to as the Conflict of Interest of Public Office Holders Act. While of course the member for Mississauga South, the member for Oshawa and I are not public office holders, we are parliamentarians. Because we are not public office holders, the bill should be renamed and the word parliamentarian has to be added to that because it is wrong just from that standpoint.

There are certain provisions in the bill that I would like to see changed slightly, for example the two-year purgatory for civil servants and public office holders generally to lobby their own departments. Under the bill that is proposed it is to be shortened to one year. I know it was the unanimous recommendation of our committee, but we proposed to shorten that to one year and at the same time we proposed to keep the clause whereby cabinet can shorten it even more. The combination of the two means that in many cases the cooling off period or purgatory could effectively disappear.

We should make a choice whether we keep one year hard and fast. I do not think that is the best way. I think the best way is to have it two years with a possible application for exceptional circumstances which is what is there now. That gives a little bit more flexibility, yet gives a cooling off period that will be seen by the public, and will be in reality as well as one which is more meaningful.

I also want to say a word here to those members of this place who serve on the Board of Internal Economy and perhaps to our good clerks at the table because I understand that they are also clerks of the Committee of Internal Economy.

• (1645)

I think it would be important for us as parliamentarians as we start our committee work to ensure that the definitions that we use in the bill are similar to those used by the Board of Internal Economy. For instance, the definition of a spouse in the bill and the definition of a spouse as the Board of Internal Economy sees it for benefits of parliamentarians and so on is not exactly the same.

We should do our best to ensure that there is uniformity all the way through in both Bill C-116, our conflict of interest act, and the rules as administered by the House and perhaps by the other place as well.

The committee has not yet been officially named, but I hope to be a member of the committee. If we had that, as members of the committee we could have those definitions and reconcile them in the best way to ensure that we have workable legislation.

I guess I have officially informed you, Mr. Speaker, that I would hope the Board of Internal Economy would do this. Perhaps our good clerks could take note of that and consult the Speaker about it. I for one would love to have that kind of information. It would assist me in doing my work as a member of that committee. I hope to be a member of the committee.

This bill is not quite the same as our report. The member across the way has identified the major changes. First, as we will all know, we agreed in our committee that instead of conflict of interest rules administered by an officer of Parliament, known as a jurisconsult, there should be four MPs and senators. That is what is in the bill.

On the other hand, we also agreed that we need other rules for the Order in Council appointments administered by the government.

In the middle is another group of people. They are the public office holders who sit in Parliament, namely the cabinet ministers and the parliamentary secretaries.

What do you do with them? They could go either way because they are both public office holders and they are parliamentarians.

We thought in our committee that they should be dealt with by the officer of Parliament. The government in producing the bill says no, we will put him in the other category. As I say, I do not think I am married to that principle but I do have a concern. The concern is more particularly with the parliamentary secretaries. There are a few of them sitting in the House as we are speaking now.

I see our colleague from Burlington. I think he is a parliamentary secretary. He will understand that parliamentary secretaries tend to change perhaps more quickly than ministers. If you have a parliamentary secretary who will go into that parliamentary secretaryship, if I can call it that, and out of it, and perhaps change over many times in the term of a Parliament that person could have the rules that apply to him administered by the jurisconsult and the conflict of interest commission and his or her file could be going back and forth between the two officers depending on how often he or she enters or leaves the parliamentary secretary position.

You could almost have someone walking back and forth with boxes of files between the officer of Parliament, the jurisconsult, and the commission that will be dealing with the conflict of interest for the public office holders. There is an area there which is of concern to me as to how that will apply.

I have another area of concern as well. Because we are going to have both a commission and a jurisconsult, what happens in the event that someone receives a punishment? For the purpose of my argument, we have a minister who receives or is subjected to some sort of punishment from the Prime Minister pursuant to something that was declared to be improper by the commission. Does that mean that the jurisconsult cannot have a parallel inquiry of the same individual because the individual in addition to being a minister is also a member of Parliament?

What happens in those cases? I am a little unclear as to that. The bill does not describe it well enough or I have not been briefed well enough. I am concerned about what could happen in those cases.

• (1650)

I think the member for Mississauga South will agree with me that there are areas where it could be confusing at best. I hope that officials from the justice department or wherever who are taking notes as we are debating this will note and as much as possible address them when they come to speak at our committee to ensure that we do not have someone either being— pardon the expression but it is not quite that— almost tried twice for the same offence using two different court systems.

Also there are grey areas in a case where a person was a public office holder and may have committed an offence at the time that he was a public office holder but the offence is discovered by the jurisconsult when he ceased to be a public office holder.

I do not know how that will work. I do not want to throw a can of worms in all of this. I only want to indicate to my colleagues areas of concern so that we can improve the bill and have it work as well as possible.

I want to say a word as well on spousal declarations. Here I am going to give a personal view. My view is that for individual MPs and cabinet ministers it should be obligatory for the spouse to register. That is my personal view and I am going to leave it at that.

I accept what has been decided, that in the case of a parliamentarian the parliamentarian reports incomes and so on for the spouse to the best of his or her ability. If his knowledge of the spouse's interest is negligible we are not going to get much. As I say it is with reluctance that I accept that, great reluctance.

In the case of a cabinet minister it becomes obligatory. That has to be paramount. The reason that is important is the following: We are all here today as members of Parliament. If new rules are applied to us while we are already here as MPs in the case of a cabinet minister it is going to be very easy to make the decision I think. The day after the next election when the new government is elected, and needless to say I hope it is a government led by the now member for Beauséjour, soon to be member for Shawinigan and Prime Minister, he may phone a colleague of mine, say the member for Saint-Léonard, and says he would like that member to be a cabinet minister. The member for Saint-Léonard can say he would like to take a moment to discuss it with his spouse to see if they are both willing to file the conflict of interest forms. If one of the two refuses to sign the member can then say: "Sorry, Leader, some other time".

If they both agree that that is going to be the rule then they live by it.

That is why I think it is particularly important for those who are public office holders to be subjected to that kind of rule. I happen to think, and perhaps I am a voice in the wilderness, that should apply to all MPs and senators as well, but I will leave it at that.

In order to ensure that everyone can live with these rules I have a suggestion. Make the date of proclamation the date of the next election. If someone cannot live with these rules they can pack it in and go home. We can say we do not want them here if they cannot live with the rules. They cannot say they were applied retroactively and they did not know about them when they came here. If you cannot live with the rule then go home. If you can live with the rule run again, be a candidate. When you come here, prior to being sworn in as an MP or within the requisite time after, file the appropriate declarations so that Canadians know that at least there is that level of good faith in living within the rules.

Let there be no mistake. Conflict of interest rules in themselves do not necessarily mean good behaviour.

• (1655)

What you need first and foremost is good intention. I am sure most of us have good intention, but I hope that all of us have the intention to live with these rules.

Some may ask: Is it going to be hard to recruit candidates having these rules? Justice Parker addressed that in the report in which he said that the Centre for Responsive Politics in the United States had undertaken a study of this issue some time ago.

What the centre discovered at the time was that in fact stricter rules actually attracted, by and large, better candidates because people knew that they would be sitting in a parliament or in a legislative body together with other people who were willing to live under tougher rules and who had the intention, at least stated, of living under those rules.

Therefore, Justice Parker had concluded that you are not going to have a problem finding good candidates if you have tougher rules. Providing that the rules are reasonable, you may find it easier. I have just found a quote here from page 350 of the Parker commission of inquiry report. It said:

> I was particularly interested to learn that the disclosure requirements have not discouraged "good people" from entering politics or running for public office. For example, a study of members of the U.S. House of Representatives and Senate conducted by the Centre for Responsive Politics in 1985 found no one who felt that financial disclosure affected his or her decision to seek public office.

Even having said that, it does not mean that we can make all kinds of unreasonable rules. I see our colleague from Oshawa here today. He has served and so have I in another legislative assembly, namely the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Ontario.

I know he chaired a committee after I left which dealt with an issue involving the financial interests of a certain cabinet minister. He and I have talked about it in the past. While I will not pretend to speak for him at this moment, the job of serving on the committee reviewing that was no picnic. I do not think that the member for Oshawa would be the first to rush in and volunteer his services to sit on a committee like that again after the experience that he lived through.

It is tough to sit on a committee involving disciplining one's own peers. It is not something that members will be rushing out to perform. It is a difficult task, perhaps a necessary one. I think the experience of our colleague from Oshawa is rather unique in this Chamber. I look forward to the contribution that he will be providing to our committee.

He has the option of giving us sober second thought from the House because he has dealt with this issue before having chaired such a committee in the Ontario legislature.

I want to take two minutes and speak about those who have said that this bill is a watered down bill on conflict of interest. I beg to differ. This is not watered down compared to the present conflict of interest code. No way. This is as strict and certainly much stricter in the case of MPs. They are not even affected by the present code.

Some will say: "Oh yes, but it is watered down compared to Bill C–43". Some provisions did not make sense, perhaps. Over all, no, it is not watered down. I submit it is not.

• (1700)

Let me give an example of a clause of Bill C-43. I will give this one from personal experience because when I read the bill the first time it struck me rather strongly. Bill C-43 said that every time a spouse of a parliamentarian received a fee the spouse would then have to disclose that to the jurisconsult. I looked at my own situation. In my wife's job she does not get a salary, she gets fees. That means every time she received her paycheque she would have to come and register. She is a real estate agent, and as such she is paid fees. I understand that the same would apply to lawyers and perhaps many other professions as well. In the case of people who are even more active in private enterprise they could be registering daily.

What would that have accomplished?

Mr. Gagliano: My wife is an accountant.

Mr. Boudria: There we go. My colleague from Saint-Léonard says his wife is an accountant. She would probably have been one of those people registering daily because every time one fills out somebody's income tax form one is paid a fee, not a salary. Therefore she would have been registering all the time.

There were major errors in Bill C-43 and we have corrected them. That does not mean we have watered down the bill. I hope it means we have corrected some of the mistakes. That does not mean that this bill does not have mistakes. We will discover things that are wrong with it at committee. I am sure we will and I hope we do. If we do we will have an opportunity to improve the bill.

Even with everyone's best intentions I am sure there will be mistakes after we have gone through the bill. Hopefully the next Parliament can correct those as time goes by. Perhaps we should do what was done with the Lobbyists Registration Act and have a three-year review put into the bill. We did that with the Lobbyists Registration Act. It was a triggering mechanism that incited all of us to look at the bill again. That is not a bad idea and possibly those of us who hopefully will be reviewing this bill at committee level should consider that.

I want to conclude my remarks on that by thanking my colleagues who served on the committee that produced the report on Bill C-43. I also want to indicate that my colleague from Saint-Denis will be speaking shortly. He has given an immense contribution because although he is not the dean of MPs he is the next one to it. He has been here the second longest of all MPs in the House. He is more experienced than many of us, even though he is still a very young MP of course. He will be proud to read in Hansard that I said that about him. The member for Saint-Denis has been an MP for a very long time and his contribution at the committee level was quite impressive and will continue to be. Many members, and members of the other place as well, made excellent contributions at the committee level.

I want to close by thanking the member for Beauséjour for making this issue an important one for our party. I happen to think that the issue of reconciling members' interests and the trust that we have in this institution is important for us. I want to thank the member for Beauséjour, the Leader of the Liberal Party, for having identified that issue as being a priority issue for him. I say the same as well to the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, who is the House leader and ultimately has many decisions to make in terms of the interventions we make on various issues, and the Whip, the member for Saint-Léonard, who permitted me to be one of the Liberal members doing the report on Bill C-43. I appreciated that opportunity as well.

[Translation]

I want to say to all hon. members that we must not let this bill die on the Order Paper of the House of Commons. I think we have a duty not to rush this bill through without examining it because it is an important bill, but to give it thorough consideration immediately within the next few days or weeks and to report back to the House before Parliament adjourns in June.

• (1705)

I expect, as do other members, that when Parliament adjourns in June for the summer recess, there will no further sitting of this Parliament. There will be an election so I do not think we will come back in the fall. According to most parliamentarians, Parliament will not come back in the fall and an election will be called. It is important for us all to adopt this bill so the next Parliament will have an instrument that will prove to be very useful for parliamentarians.

As I said earlier, good rules do not necessarily guarantee good behaviour. The rules however are there to help us and, more importantly, to restore the confidence of Canadians in this great parliamentary institution, the highest court in the land, the Parliament of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say that we support the principle of this bill. We had a little bit of discussion back and forth about how quickly it ought to be processed. The only thing I would like to say on that is that it deserves due consideration by all the members here. It is not something that should be done quickly. It should not be a one-day wonder but it should not be stalled either.

It should have a reasonable amount of debate. For our part, we have two speakers on second reading. We would be quite happy to go off and work through the committee stage of the bill. For what it is worth, I believe, as others have already said, that this is a bill that ought to be completed some time before the end of June and it ought to be in place and in operation before the next election is held.

I want to start by doing something I never do. I want to thank the member for Mississauga South and Senator Stanbury, in the other place, for restoring my faith in the fact that this process works, as someone who has been in politics for a while but is new to this place.

I was somewhat taken aback by what I saw here in my first year or so. It struck me that much of what happens here is not very productive and is not very useful to the Canadian people. In fact, it is downright stupid.

In sitting on this joint committee I had my faith in the parliamentary process renewed somewhat because I found there people from all political parties, from the two Houses, who did what I think Parliaments are supposed to do. They sat down, looked at the problem and tried to find a reasoned and reasonable solution to it. That does not always happen in Parliaments. Sometimes Parliaments do particularly silly and stupid things. Watching this place on television it is sometimes hard to explain just exactly what is going on here at any given moment.

One of the tragedies is that while people see Question Period on television, which I am kind of ashamed of, they did not get to see the work of this committee, which is what a Parliament really does.

Conflict of interest legislation seems to bring out the best and the worst in people. I do not know why that is. For all those who have a tendency to be pompous, it seems to bring out the absolute worst in them. They give great speeches about the integrity of public office holders and how wonderful everybody who ever got elected is, how they have no faults, how they live hard lives, everybody makes great sacrifices and what a noble privilege it is to serve.

I have been in politics for 20 years at every level and I do not subscribe to any of that. People in public life are people first and last: good ones and bad ones, smart ones and stupid ones, honest ones and dishonest ones, and people who work hard and people who do not deserve five cents for their day's work. They are people and they are in a sense what the original Parliament was on the fields of Runnymede. At Runnymede it was a good idea to watch where one was stepping because it was an open field. They came there on horseback. It is my experience today in any Parliament that I have ever seen that it is not a bad idea to keep an eye peeled for meadow muffins because they are still there. In part that is what conflict of interest legislation is about.

• (1710)

For many in the public I suppose the impression is left that all one has to do is pass a bill like this and all the problems are resolved. I think those of us who have been in politics for a while know that that is not very close to the truth at all. This bill for example does not stop any criminal allegations against anybody nor should it. If somebody is elected and breaks the law then they should expect and get no favour from anybody. They should be treated before the courts of Canada as any other citizen would be treated. This bill is not about that kind of activity. If someone steals or commits a crime under the Criminal Code of Canada then they should be treated exactly the same as every other Canadian citizen. That is the first thing that I think needs to be put on the record.

A conflict of interest bill at its very best tries to define the grey areas of politics. Where did someone exercise a little undue influence? Just exactly how did they do that? Of course it is almost impossible. As someone who chaired a committee at the Ontario legislature and studied every conceivable version of conflict of interest legislation, there are all kinds of varieties out there and none seem to do the job much better than any other.

Some jurisdictions I have looked at put a heavy emphasis on paperwork. They seemingly believe that if one fills boxes and boxes of declarations about this and bank accounts about the relatives doing likewise then somehow that alleviates conflict of interest. I do not think it does.

Some jurisdictions that I looked at really went in hot and heavy for great police investigations. In the United States for example it is fairly common practice to have the FBI, the CIA and everybody else go out and conduct field interviews. In other words if one is accused of something or going to be appointed to some great office in the United States then it is common practice that the FBI will knock on the door of your neighbours and ask what kind of a person you are. That information is gathered and then put into files. The files are shown to some members of Congress and not necessarily to others. We have all managed to watch televised proceedings of some of their hearing processes where the flavour of all this kind of comes out. Does it result in a better system than what is proposed here? I am not sure that it does. It certainly has to be more expensive but I am not sure it provides a better system.

Some would advocate that a great bureaucracy should be built up to examine the records of all members of Parliament, everybody who is a parliamentary secretary and everybody who is in the cabinet. I am not sure what useful purpose would be served by that.

I do know this. What has happened in this House is almost the same as what I have seen in every other jurisdiction. Parliaments and legislatures do this kind of stuff reluctantly. It is usually after there have been a series of allegations laid against the members. Frankly it is not usually the ones where there are Criminal Code violations that cause the problem because generally the courts pick that up, go to work and do their job as they normally would. It is the grey areas of influence peddling and who helped make some decision and might profit by that. Allegations in Ontario led to that law. I am someone who chaired one of the committees that heard the conflict of interest allegations there.

It kind of comes down to this: A gentleman who was a good friend of mine was a minister of natural resources and he wrote cutting licences for timber firms in northern Ontario. He happened to belong to a family that operated a lumber company in northern Ontario in Kapuskasing. He sat down beside me on the first day and said privately: "Mike, what was I supposed to do? My family runs the only lumber company in town. I am the minister. Why would I not sign the licences? I did not make any money off that". On the last day of the hearings he said much the same thing to me. I do not think he got the message all the way through.

The husband of another friend of mine borrowed some money from the Government of Ontario and she was in charge of a ministry that administered those funds. She did not see the conflict either.

In my household, and I suspect in most, if my spouse borrowed a million dollars and I did not know about it then there would be more than a conflict of interest involved in this. If I borrowed a million dollars and did not go home and tell my spouse about it then there would be a little discussion at the Breaugh's kitchen table that night. However, not every household is the same. Part of what a conflict of interest bill has to try to do is to take the perception of everybody and find a way to sort it all out. Very often the perception of a conflict of interest is just as important as an actual conflict of interest. In other words, it really does not matter if somebody made a million dollars that they should not have. If the rest of the world thinks they made a million dollars then it hurts the process.

• (1715)

It hurts the process in this way. All members of this Chamber are damaged when an allegation is made that somebody here made some money that they should not have. That is unfair. We all know that. There is something that I think is true when those allegations are raised. I have had some interesting discussions over the years with colleagues who love to make these allegations. I have often said: "Do you know that something is wrong here?" They would say: "It sure looks like there is something fishy". The end result was: "Let's go fishing and see if we can destroy somebody's reputation". I am not so sure that is a useful exercise for anybody.

One of the reasons that I am an advocate of conflict of interest legislation is that in my books and having studied it in a number of places there are some simple, straightforward things that have to be done. First and foremost there has to be a law such as the one that is being proposed here. Rightly or wrongly and whether it is imperfect or not, at least it lays down in legal form what is expected of the members.

Never mind the rules or guidelines or advisers. Never mind how fancy it gets. What I want is a law. If one believes in it then write it down. That law in my books should be put together in somewhat the way this one was. I am choosing my words a little carefully here.

Say the government had said: "We have had a special joint committee of the House and the Senate study it and draft a bill". Then it brought that bill in here. I would say the obligation is on the members here to read the bill, to understand it, to know what it means and go forward with it. That is exactly the way I think it should be done.

This bill was not done quite that way. I want to make this distinction. This bill is based in part on the report of the joint committee and in part from somewhere else. Most notably I would ascribe it to the cabinet submission called Bill C-43 which was brought forward previously. That is I think one of the problems. The good side is that there is now a law being proposed.

The second thing—I think most experts in the field would advocate this—is some form of disclosure. What do I mean by disclosure? It is public disclosure in particular. It gets a little sticky. It is not quite as simple as it first appears. There is no polite way to say this. Members ought to have a public record of what they own and what their interests are. I have done that and other members in this Chamber have done that in other places at other times. It is no big deal for most of us. For those of us for whom it is a big deal, it is probably even more important that they do a public disclosure statement because they will have more opportunities and more areas where disclosure could be found.

My experience in Ontario unfortunately was this. We insisted on disclosure on a fairly broad basis by every single member of the House. The first year those disclosure reports were made public the press wrote reams of stories. They were not all factual, sensible or worth really writing about but they wrote them anyway. The news was that here is public disclosure on Ontario's politicians. The second year they wrote a few less stories. By about the third year it hit the norm.

The purpose of the exercise is not to provide The Toronto Sun or The Ottawa Sun with new fodder for columns. It ought to be to provide the public with some access point where they can find out where there might be conflicts for the members. This is a little stickier that it first appears to be.

There is the matter of privacy for the members and privacy for their spouses. I would advocate that somebody who is not elected to this place—a male or female spouse of a member—is someone on whom this House has no right to lay a law or a rule. It is bad enough that they made the fatal error of getting involved with a politician. It is worse yet that they should have to make public every sense of their business dealings. That is wrong. I believe it is wrong. There are some who advocate that they ought to, but I fail to see that. If you leave it up to the member to make the declaration where he or she has knowledge of a conflict or where one might exist, I think those of us who are elected deserve to bear the heat. That is as far as I am prepared to go.

• (1720)

If I know that my spouse has a conflict of interest in some way, the fact that she is married to me makes it a conflict. The woman deserves sainthood in the first place but in the second instance, she does not deserve to be punished again. If there is a conflict, it is my obligation as an elected member to point it out. I think that covers as much as needs to be covered there, but disclosure is important.

The most important thing—this is difficult, and we are going to argue about this a lot—is a clear, straightforward process for resolving conflict. It is not easy to do. It will not be done by burying it under tonnes of paper. It is not done by setting up a huge bureaucracy. It is not accomplished by trying to bamboozle the public.

The jurisdictions where I saw it working well had this as a hallmark, a simple straightforward system with not very many people involved. It had one clear set of rules being given out, one set of advice being given, one person telling the members what they can and cannot do.

It is as simple and as straightforward as that. It must be able to deal with problems efficiently.

We have a criminal court system which is elaborate to deal with criminal charges and that is fair. I agree with that. What we are talking about is something quite different.

I know that in many places they use some version of what is called in the committee report a jurisconsult. This bill calls for a commission as well. Let me give my version of that.

This is not a person who has to be all-wise or all-knowing. It is a person who must have a reasonable amount of common sense and an understanding of what the public expects from people who are elected. In other words, it must be a person who knows what is right, what is wrong and what is reasonable. That is the hallmark of the job, not an elaborate staff, not a complicated process. In fact, in my experience, it is a fairly straightforward process.

That brings me to the first major problem I have with this bill. I do not want to vote against it because this process may work but I frankly will be surprised if it does. It seems to me it sets up two levels of advice, two sets of rules, a commission on one side and a jurisconsult on the other. I always find it dangerous in politics to set out dual tracks.

This may work. It may be possible that the Government of Canada will do something that no other government in the world has ever been able to do; create two bureaucracies that do not at some point collide like mad.

I think they will. In addition to what is written in this bill there will, of course, be regulations. There will be interpretations of regulations. There will be rules. There will be interpretations of rules. There will be advice to the members. There will be memos written to the members. There will be rulings given. If the rulings are not the same for everybody, this bill is in trouble. That is the first thing where I think this bill may be in trouble. It may not work.

I am willing to give it a shot. I understand, as everybody does, that there is a big difference between a little guy like the member from Oshawa sitting over here, just about Perth, Ontario, in the Chamber and the big wheels who sit right at the front and make all the big decisions in cabinet. Behind the big wheels are the little wheels, the parliamentary secretaries.

I do not give out government contracts. I do not decide national policy. I do not decide who gets all the jobs. The opportunities for me to have a conflict are pretty rare. People in the cabinet face an entirely different set of circumstances. Sometimes parliamentary secretaries do. Sometimes they have even less influence over things than I do. But every jurisdiction that I know of which has looked at conflict of interest legislation recognizes that there are some of the players who are going to be in conflict positions much more often than others.

This bill tries to do it by dual tracks. I think the dual tracks are going to collide at some point and will cause a major problem.

To conclude fairly quickly, a couple of things do need to be said. Mr. Justice Parker in a very elaborate report gave us his opinion on the matter. One of my constituents, Michael Starr, and one of his colleagues in the Parliament of Canada, Mitchell Sharp, had their version of what should be done. The joint committee had its version of what should be done. The government has now brought forward a bill.

• (1725)

No matter what might happen, it is better to have an imperfect law than no law. I offer my support, tentative though it might be in spots, because I believe very strongly that whatever the rules are, as long as you write them down, we will all live with them and we will work our way through them.

It is going to be critical that we go through these things on a regular basis. If somebody gets off the hook because a definition put in this bill does not quite cover the act he is alleged to have committed, then the whole thing is a failure. That is one of the reasons why I advocated in committee, as did others, that there be no tight little definition of a conflict of interest, that it should be as broad as possible.

Those of us who worked on the joint committee have an obligation to say our little piece. Nobody wants to delay this process. I hope it is the government's intention to proceed with this legislation and to make it law now. If it has flaws we will try to pick them up as it goes through committee.

I hope the government will listen to members with other points of view and see if it can do what I thought the joint committee did an excellent job of doing; not trying to find everyone's theory of it all, but something that is practical and will work and will assist us all in restoring a little bit of confidence. I concur with what some others members have said. I am not a great believer in a magic bill that can be passed which will make the world change its view about this place. However, there are things that members here can do, and this bill is one of them.

Mr. Blenkarn: I believe you will find consent for the following motion:

That when no further members rise to speak today on Bill C-116, the debate shall be deemed adjourned; and

That notwithstanding any Standing Order on Tuesday, March 30, 1993 the House shall sit between 1 and 2 p.m. for the sole purpose of the continuing consideration of the second reading stage motion of Bill C-116; and

That not later than 1.55 p.m., all questions necessary to dispose of the said motion shall be put without further debate or amendment;

And that any recorded division be deferred until 5 p.m. on Tuesday, March 30, 1993.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): May I suggest to the House that we suspend the sitting to the call of the Chair? Meanwhile we will try to move up the proceedings on the adjournment motion.

The proceedings are therefore suspended to the call of the Chair.

At 5.28 p.m. the sitting of the House was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 5.37 p.m.

IMMIGRATION OFFICES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, this question arises out of the recently announced policy of the government to replace face to face interviews for immigration applications by the mailing in of complex forms to centrally located offices and in particular, to a new centralized office in Vegreville, Alberta which will open in April 1994.

This government proposal has already led to the closing of many local immigration offices which were accessible to people all over the country. They will be replaced as I say by fewer employees in fewer far away offices, in particular in Vegreville.

Faced with that new policy, on February 24 I asked the minister why the government was proceeding with this plan when the pilot projects were a failure and when they showed that this system would be extremely inefficient and would open the door to criminality.

I am informed by some of the people who took part in some of these pilot projects that what used to take three to four days in face to face interviews, getting the appointment or sitting before an immigration officer and going over the immigration application now takes three to four weeks in the pilot projects.

One of the major problems is that many of these people do not speak English or French as their mother tongue. In filling out these forms they make mistakes. The forms are sent back. They are returned again to the centralized office always by mail. Very often it takes a long time to settle the problem and get the application form dealt with. These are application forms for work visas, visitors' visas, family class applications and so on.

While it makes it more difficult for legitimate refugees in this new mail-in centralized system, it makes it easier for the criminal element because it is easier for the criminal element to defraud the documents. They do not have to face an immigration officer across the table and it is easier to get through contrived and falsified documents in order to have illegal immigrants enter this country.

What is going to happen as a result of this policy is that more and more of a burden is going to be shifted to the offices of members of Parliament, to agencies, to NGOs and to churches. They will have to help immigrants fill out these complex forms and send them into the offices. In many cases the immigrants will probably turn to lawyers and immigration consultants which will cost them a lot of money.

I ask once again for the government either to cancel this project which is inefficient and leads to criminality or at the very least to postpone it for one year while we have a parliamentary committee look at it objectively and see if it really is in the best interests of the country.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the government announced a series of initiatives for the reconfiguration of the points of service network for the future delivery of the immigration program. These initiatives are totally consistent with the fiscal constraints announced by the President of the Treasury Board on December 2, 1992.

With fiscal restraint messages recently being announced by all levels and political stripes of government, Canadians understand there is a growing need to manage more wisely our limited tax dollars.

The restructured Canadian Immigration Centre network will provide effective client service in an efficient manner while saving the taxpayers money. The advanced use of technology in the case processing centre scheduled to begin operations in April 1994 and the efficient mail-in forms are the key to saving $6.5 million.

Some of the resource savings realized will be allocated to enhance the enforcement aspects of the immigration program thereby strengthening its integrity, something for which many Canadians have long been calling.

Even though it saves taxpayers money, our strategy maintains client service at a high level. Of the existing 64 points of service we will maintain a community presence with full-time immigration staff in 51 locales. This is not a rampant reduction of the inland delivery network but a refined structure that maintains a presence in small communities where appropriate, while placing the bulk of our resources in larger communities where there is a high demand for service.

In conclusion, after two years of processing case work by mail in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver surveys confirm a client satisfaction rate of 84 per cent. Our monitoring has shown no increase in attempted misrepresentation or document fraud over personal service.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in December of last year I questioned the minister of employment regarding changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

In particular, I asked him to set out clear guidelines for proving just cause as it relates to sexual harassment. The government it is true has broadened the definition of just cause and has given the board of referees clearer powers to protect the privacy of victims. While this is fine these measures do not change the procedure for proving just cause and in consequence not much has changed for women victims.

• (1745)

Sexual harassment has been grounds for just cause for quite some time but the process of proof is where the failure of the system lies. As I said in December I spent four years as chair of the unemployment insurance appeal board in Halifax. I know what it takes to prove just cause. It is a long and tortuous and potentially costly endeavour and frequently it is very degrading for the female victims.

The system works against voluntary quitters and not for them. All it takes is a telephone call to the employer who will obviously deny that he sexually harassed his employee and that is it. A woman may appeal the decision to the Board of Referees but Employment and Immigrations figures show that the board only overturns the decisions of the UI officer who made the original decision 0.4 per cent of the time.

I am happy to say that when I was chair of that appeal board my ratio of overturning decisions was 25 per cent but gone are those days.

To add insult to injury the employer is not even compelled to go before the board. He cannot be compelled to go before the board. His appearance at a separate hearing is by invitation which he is of course free to decline.

Under the old rules the complainant could still receive a portion of her UI claim. Under the new rules that this government so typically rammed through this House this will no longer be the case and women victims will lose their UI right off the top.

May I remind this House and the minister in particular that I am not as he said: "spreading lies" by stating unequivocally that women will not be protected under the new legislation any more than they were protected under the old. I suppose that if a woman has the strength, the courage and the money she can hire a lawyer and go through the process of appeal to a judge of the federal court. However, we are talking about women in this particular category most of whom make $20,000 a year or less. They are hardly the kind of clients who can afford to hire a lawyer for this kind of case.

May I remind the minister of another given that women are poorer than men. Women earn on average 30 cents less than men according to the most recent Statistics Canada report on the earnings of men and women. Do I need to again state the obvious? The wage difference between men and women will all but preclude further action by women if their UI claim is rejected.

Mr. Speaker, this piece of legislation is a disgrace.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows it was this government that first incorporated sexual harassment in the UI Act as just cause for leaving a job. This was done as part of the changes to the UI Act through Bill C-21.

I might add that the hon. member was one of many Liberal members who on October 25, 1990 voted against the government amendment which enshrined sexual harassment in the UI Act as just cause for quitting a job.

The hon. member also knows that CEC employees have a long history and an excellent record of dealing fairly and sensitively with all UI claimants including those who may have quit their jobs due to sexual harassment.

We will be building on this record of fairness by providing awareness training to reinforce the sensitivity of EIC staff to the issue by issuing guidelines that will ensure that staff continue to give the benefit of the doubt to the claimant and by adopting administrative policies that allow sexual harassment cases to be handled by UI agents of the same gender and by having appeals held in private.

Bill C-113 is about fairness. It is not fair that Canadians should pay UI for people who choose not to work for no good reason. However, if just cause such as sexual harassment does exist one can be sure that the claimant will receive UI benefits. Bill C-113 is also about responsibility. It is irresponsible to continue allowing the UI deficit to increase and we must act on this.

Bill C-113 is about fairness and responsibility and I urge the hon. member to support this bill.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, earlier in this House I raised a question with the Minister of Public Works with regard to what I can only call either Tory mathematics or now the missing $7 million.

The matter arose because of the dispute over the proposal to build the fixed link to Prince Edward Island. As members of this House will know, P.E.I. is currently serviced by Marine Atlantic. As the courts have confirmed, as part of a constitutional requirement ferry service must be provided.

The current funding of Marine Atlantic provides for some revenue from the fare box, in other words the people who use the ferry, and another element around $23 million, $24 million or $25 million a year which comes as a subsidy from the taxpayers of Canada. That is the shortfall between the cost of the service and the fare box.

I rose in this House and raised with the Minister of Public Works the question that if it was only costing the taxpayer $23.5 million to $24 million a year to subsidize the ferry operation, why was the Government of Canada prepared to provide up to $42 million a year to subsidize the owner and operator of a bridge.

The minister responded in the House. When Bill C-110 went to committee, I pursued the matter there with the minister. He gave me sort of a general response and then left it to the officials from Transport Canada to respond in more detail. This is where it really gets interesting. The Director General of Marine Policy and Programs, Mr. André Pageot, responded to my questions. Basically what he said was that the $7.7 million was a figure that they made up.

That is not money that goes to Marine Atlantic that it can put away for a day in which it needs to re-equip the fleet or replace a particular ferry. No, the Government of Canada does not put it in a special interest-bearing account so that when Marine Atlantic needs a capital infusion of the $50 million to $60 million that a new vessel would cost the money would be there. No, it does not exist there either. However, it is there to use as a basis for justifying a $42 million subsidy to the owners and operators of a bridge.

The reason that we raised objections to the fixed link is not just because of the environment, although that is a very, very important element. As we saw, the Federal Court agreed with members of the New Democratic Party and with Friends of the Island and ordered a new and proper environmental assessment.

We saw in the House earlier today the Minister of the Environment skating around the issue and not coming out and saying: "Of course we will ensure that there is a full and proper environmental assessment". He sidestepped the issue, just as the Minister for Public Works refuses to recognize the reality that this bridge project is going to cost the taxpayers more than the current ferry service does today or will in the future.

That is what this government has to be held accountable for and that is why we will continue to oppose this foolish waste of taxpayers' money.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, we want to say that much has been made of the annual subsidy that would be paid to the developer of the bridge between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. He should know that the subsidy represents the avoidable future costs to the federal government of maintaining the Borden ferry service that is projected over the next 35 years.

The amount of money available, as he mentioned, is $42 million calculated in 1992 dollars. This $42 million includes not only the estimated costs of operating and maintaining these ferries, but also the capital costs that would eventually be required to replace these very expensive vessels, a cost, as the hon. member would know, that is escalating year by year.

The member should know that the replacement cost is not assumed by Marine Atlantic and is not included in its subsidy.

• (1755)

Nevertheless it is a very real cost to the federal government, no matter which pocket it comes from. It was and is a future expense that must be taken into account when considering the value of the subsidy for the fixed link.

I thank the hon. member for raising the question.

WESTRAY MINE DISASTER

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on December 1, 1992 I raised once again on the floor of the House of Commons concerns that I have had with regard to the Westray coal mine disaster that took place in Nova Scotia.

At that time I repeatedly asked the Prime Minister and ministers of the Crown if they would conduct a federal inquiry. The answer was in the negative, the rationale being that the Government of Nova Scotia was going to proceed with an inquiry.

The fact of the matter is that what I had asked for was a federal inquiry with regard to the role of the Government of Canada and in particular the funding that the government gave to that particular operation.

We now know today, as a result of information made public, that the Government of Nova Scotia has lost $12 million, the Government of Canada has lost in excess of $80 million and 26 miners have lost their lives. As I speak in this Chamber their families are without information, which is presently in the hands of the government, as to what has happened and what is likely to happen with regard to possible criminal charges.

This is a tragedy of national and international importance. What we found out today is that the government, under the auspices of the Freedom of Information Act, has made available to me a document from 1990 entitled The Funding of the Westray Coal Mine. It is 18 pages in length, but it is censored.

I remind this Chamber that a former President of the United States had an 18-minute gap on his tapes. What we have here is an 18-page gap with regard to the Westray coal mine. It is high time that the parliamentary secretary opposite and all members of the cabinet come clean with the people of Pictou county as to what is contained in that particular memorandum.

There was a CANMET study which was referred to in this House by ministers of the Crown, which the opposition was led to believe was the conclusive information concerning CANMET. We found out today that there are seven additional pages that have been censored by the Government of Canada. Twenty-five pages of important information have now been hidden by the government.

I want to ask the parliamentary secretary to make this information available to shed light on a tragedy in Canadian mining history. He should not stand in his place and give us that holus-bolus argument that somehow it has to be protected because of privacy. Twenty-six men have lost their lives, $12 million has gone down the tubes in Nova Scotia, and $80 million has gone down the tubes federally. Canadians have a right to know. Who is this government trying to protect, and why is it hiding this information from taxpayers in this country and from families who have been distressed over the last 12 months?

On behalf of those families I ask the parliamentary secretary opposite to provide that information so that Canadians will know exactly what happened.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs) Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond who I know has a very deep and concerned interest in this subject.

What I am going to say to him in some cases I think he probably already knows. For the record, under the Constitution the regulation of the mines is a provincial responsibility. The responsibility pertains to all aspects of mine plan approval, amendment and ongoing monitoring, including health and safety. The only exceptions are Devco, which is a Crown corporation, and uranium mines.

Following the accident at the Westray coal mine in Pictou county the Government of Nova Scotia established under its jurisdiction a commission of inquiry with a mandate to determine the cause of the explosion and to examine events leading up to the accident. The federal government co-operated with the commission up until the time it was found to be invalid on constitutional grounds. That decision was successfully appealed by both the miners' union and the Nova Scotia provincial government.

In January the status of the inquiry was confirmed as valid by the appeals division of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court, although public hearings were delayed until the provincial charges and the criminal investigation were complete.

Originally, as the hon. member would know, 52 charges were laid by the province under the Occupational Health and Safety Act. In December, 34 of those charges were stayed in order to avoid jeopardizing any criminal charges.

Recently, on March 4, the remaining 18 provincial charges were stayed for similar reasons. Once the criminal investigation by the RCMP is complete and any subsequent charges have been dealt with the commission is free to resume hearings into the cause of the accident.

For its part, the federal government will continue to co-operate with the commission of inquiry established by the province of Nova Scotia to examine events leading up to the accident at the Westray coal mine.

To do more than this is not possible without infringing on the jurisdiction of the province.

WESTERN ARCTIC INUVIALUIT CLAIM IMPLEMENTATION REPORT

1991-92 ANNUAL REVIEW

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, copies of the 1991-92 annual review of the Western Arctic Inuvialuit Claim Implementation Report.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to eight petitions.

BILL C-102

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-102, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Act, the Criminal Code and a related act, with amendments.

PETITIONS

HEALTH CARE

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of presenting several petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36.

Taking into account that Canadian universal medicare is a principle of our Canadian identity, recent cutbacks to health care have undermined the principle of universality in Canada.

Consequently the petitioners request that Parliament take all necessary measures to enshrine in the Constitution the obligation to provide universal publicly funded hospital and medical care to all citizens.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, petitioners from my riding in Manitoba say that today's pensions do not adequately meet the needs of the elderly. They say that the present system is inadequate and that a distressing number of seniors are living at or below the poverty line. They therefore call upon the government to review its policies in this area.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, in this second petition, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to ensure that steps are taken by the CRTC to reduce and even eliminate inappropriate language and violence on radio and television.

They say that these acts of violence are often in direct contradiction to what our families are trying to do. They also point out that it is unnecessary to use inappropriate language or show acts of violence to inform people.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have as well a petition from individuals who ask that the GST be removed from books and reading materials. They point out that there has never been such a tax since Confederation and they underline that it goes against certain government objectives of increased productivity and competitiveness.

They believe this is counter to a fundamental principle in a democracy, and that is to have an informed citizenry.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present petitions on behalf of a number of people throughout the province of British Columbia, mostly in mainland British Columbia.

These people suggest that the proposed North American free trade agreement has resulted in even greater trade concessions being demanded of Canada and, if implemented, will result in further restrictions being placed on the ability of Canada's federal, provincial and territorial governments now and in the future to assist Canadian industry in conserving Canadian natural resources for Canadian benefit and advancing native social programs.

They call upon the House of Commons to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and to recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I too have the privilege pursuant to Standing Order 36 to file two groups of petitions.

One points out that the proposed North American free trade agreement will result in greater trade concessions being demanded of Canada. It particularly points out that future Canadian governments will not be able to reinstitute a generic drug program in this country.

They call upon the House to reject the North American free trade agreement and to terminate the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the second petition I have is signed by a large number of residents within my riding of North Surrey.

It points out that the closure of the Surrey and New Westminster immigration offices will mean that people will have to travel to Vancouver in order to secure service. It also points out that there will be a loss of jobs in New Westminster and Surrey and that there will be a reduction in service in spite of the fact that this office made $4 million last year.

It calls upon the minister and this government to reverse this policy decision and keep the offices open.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I rise to get some direction if possible with respect to my question on the Order Paper dated December 10, 1992 wherein I request totals for procurement by the federal government from the province of Manitoba as well as from the United States for the last number of years.

I want to remind the House that this is the 100th day. The House will perhaps recall that I had another question on the Order Paper that took it well over a year to respond to. That was on the goods and services tax.

I am very anxious to receive the information as quickly as possible on procurement from Manitoba by year and from the United States by year.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made his point. I am sure it will be duly noted by those who will be following the matter. I thank the hon. member.

Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-92

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I move, pursuant to Standing Order 78(3):

That, in relation to Bill C-92, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and certain related acts, not more than one further sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of report stage and one sitting day to the consideration of the third reading stage of the bill; and

That, fifteen minutes before of the expiry of the time provided for Government Orders on the day allotted to the report stage consideration and on the day allotted to the third reading stage consideration of the said bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question necessary to dispose of the stage of the bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, March 29, consideration of Bill C-92, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and certain related acts, as reported (with amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance; and Motion No. 1.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak on this legislation today.

There is growing concern right across Canada that we are having a problem with the fairness of our tax system. Over the last number of years Liberal and Tory governments have introduced a series of tax loopholes and tax measures that have made it inequitable for people across Canada.

Many of the tax policies that have been brought in over the last 15 years to 20 years have resulted in a dramatic shift of taxation from corporate structure to personal structure. At one time the tax bill in Canada was shared equally between corporations and people, about 50 per cent. Over the last number of years through successive tax measures by Liberal and Tory governments this has now shifted so that the income tax burden is being paid approximately 80 per cent by individuals and only 20 per cent by corporations.

Tax policy has also been largely responsible for the increase in the shifting of financial resources from the middle income people to the very wealthy. This has accelerated particularly since the mid-seventies where increasingly there is a group of rich people at the top, a shrinking middle income group in the middle, and a growing poor at the bottom.

The most recent information shows that the top 10 per cent of earners in the country increased their share of the total income from about 23 per cent to 26 per cent over the last two or three years. The share of total income of the bottom 40 per cent has been steadily declining.

The GST was one tax mechanism that Canadians know is blatantly unfair. It is particularly unfair for working families. A big bite has been taken out of their income to pay for the unfair GST. Now we have the government again stepping forward with a tax measure that will help only a few wealthy families in Canada by extending the 21-year rule on family trusts.

It is very difficult to get exact information on family trusts in Canada because of the privacy provisions of the Income Tax Act. Therefore we do not know a great deal, either on a cumulative basis or on an individual basis, about what is involved in family trusts and what kinds of funds are being held within family trusts.

However there are some people within the industry who have made some very good and solid calculations. It is now estimated that there is over $70 billion held in these kinds of trusts. This is not a large amount as a percentage of the total assets held by persons and unincorporated businesses in Canada, which amounts to about $2.4 trillion. The family trusts are only a small percentage, about 3 per cent.

We do not know very much about individuals but there are examples that have come out through court records. One example is the family trust established by Samuel Bronfman for his daughter in 1969. At that time court documents showed that it was valued at $70 million. It has been exempt from the capital gains tax since 1969. Today it is estimated that the trust is worth in excess of $600 million.

It seems to me when we are asking single parents who earn less than $20,000 a year to pay taxes and when we are asking old age pensioners with incomes of less than $1,000 a month to pay taxes, we could ask wealthy families who hold assets in the area of $600 million to pay their fair share of taxes and not give them any further extensions or exemptions.

This exemption or extension costs the average Canadian money because we have to increase taxes on working families in order to make up for the loss of revenue. As a result of the fact that we do not have details on family trusts the loss of revenue can only be estimated. A conservative estimate is that if only 1 per cent of the $70 billion in trust was subject to tax in a year at a marginal tax rate of 30 per cent it would raise over $200 million.

To make up $200 million we have to increase the taxes on working families or forgo vital programs in this country, programs that would create jobs or benefit people, such as day care. This $200 million would pay for half of the estimated cost of a universal day care program in Canada. We are all paying for this kind of tax policy.

This is not only the opinion of people in the New Democratic Party. There are also a number of tax professionals who share this view. Sidney Goldstein of Goldstein, Goldstein and Goldstein in Ottawa has said:

> There is no question that it represents a massive windfall for existing trusts.

Kathryn Bush of Blake Cassels has said:

> A cynical person might suggest that pressure from influential political supporters also should be listed as a reason for the draft legislation.

That is influential political supporters who have large assets. Neil Brooks, associate dean of Osgoode Hall Law School, has said:

> The government has given Canada's wealthiest families notice that it intends to give them a gift worth several billion dollars.

• (1115)

I am pleased to be able to support this amendment but I find myself smiling a little because the 21-year rule was introduced by the Liberals. It is obvious from reading Hansard of February 23, 1993 that even in the last two months the Liberals have done a flip-flop.

At that point the member for Sudbury made it quite clear that the Liberals supported the government's extension of the family trust beyond the 21-year period and was quite critical of the fact that the NDP would oppose it.

Now the same member is the one who has made a motion to delete this section. I am sure it is like many other policies that the Liberals expound in that if they really sat down and looked at it they would understand that the NDP position is the correct position.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, it is truly amazing that we are sitting today in the House of Commons and we have a government that puts closure on a bill just a day after it was introduced. The closure it has put on the bill is very significant.

This bill amends the Income Tax Act. According to the experts, a couple of deans of law schools in Canada, from the University of Victoria and the associate dean of Osgoode Hall, tax experts who appeared before the committee, this piece of legislation will give the biggest tax break to billionaires and multimillionaires that some of them can think of in our entire history. This bill that is going through the House would give the biggest tax break to multimillionaires and billionaires.

The government stands today and puts closure on it. In other words, we have one day, today, for report stage and one more day on third reading. Why would the government do that? If any Canadians who are today filling out their income tax returns knew what we are doing in this Chamber they would be so shocked that if they could only organize themselves, 14.7 million ordinary Canadian taxpayers, they would march on this place.

Mr. Allmand: It is going through too fast.

Mr. Baker: That is right. It is going through and nobody knows, but if they only knew what the Government of Canada was doing they would march on this place. This is the same Parliament which sat down just recently, and what did we do? We changed the Income Tax Act so that if the income tax department owes people money after April 30 the interest does not accumulate until 45 days after the date they file or April 30, whichever is later. However, if people owe the department money their interest comes due on April 30. This Parliament did that. This sitting of Parliament did that.

If people do not put their social insurance number down or supply it to somebody making out an information slip they are liable to a $100 fine these days. If they do not have one they have 15 days to apply and 15 days to produce it. As a result of a law passed by this Parliament if people file and have it postmarked May 1 they are given a penalty of 5 per cent on top of the taxes they owe, plus 1 per cent for every month after that up to 12 months.

This is the same Parliament that sat down and is today giving this incredible tax break to the wealthiest people in Canada. This is the same Parliament that approved a rule just recently affecting people who owe money to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Every week now the unemployment insurance offices are sending a list of names over to the Department of National Revenue. Any rebates owed by the revenue department to those individuals who owe money to the Unemployment Insurance Commission beyond two years, if they are not drawing unemployment insurance and in the past year if they are drawing unemployment insurance, is deducted from what they have due to them from the tax department.

That would all be fine if the system that judges whether people owe money to the Unemployment Insurance Commission was fair, but it is not fair. The Parliament that is today giving this incredible tax break to billionaires in Canada is the same Parliament that changed the rules this year so that if people owed money or the student loans people claimed they owed money from 1960 or 1970, it is now automatically deducted from any rebates that they have coming back to them from the income tax department.

All those measures we have dealt with in this Chamber changed the Income Tax Act to really sock it to ordinary people, to add on as much interest as we can, to get to ordinary taxpayers and really slam it to them, without telling them what is available under the Income Tax Act, without suggesting to the students in Canada who are working, who went to work for the summer, that they can actually get moving expenses claimed on their income tax returns. There is no mention of that.

This year, on April 1, old age pensions, guaranteed income supplements and spousal allowances will be decided on the basis of last year's income. A lot of people are going to get a shock because of what we did in this Chamber, in that we approved a government measure to make payments to people; for example, in the fishing industry to buy back their salmon licences. We approved a measure for $8,000 to buy back people's licences, and now they are going to discover that it is going to be taken off the spousal allowance and the guaranteed income supplement this month. The government has done all those things to save money.

The government has introduced the GST. It has done whatever it could to cut back, to grab more money and to tax people more. The rich are getting richer; the poor are getting poorer; and the middle class is getting the shaft. Here it is today in this House passing a bill and putting closure on it. In other words it is saying we are not allowed to debate it any more today or tomorrow.

This is a bill that according to the experts in Canada is a big giveaway. It is not according to the politicians and we have to make that distinction. The standing committee had its meetings and they were a total embarrassment. The Standing Committee on Finance of this House of Commons had hearings that were to most Canadians a total embarrassment. The headlines in The Gazette of Montreal said: "Officials rush to committee meeting because experts say big giveaway to billionaires". That was on the business page last Friday. The story explained that some of the experts in Canada appearing before the committee said that this is the biggest giveaway to the biggest corporations, all those multi-multimillionaires and 20 or so billionaires.

It is mentioned many times in many documents that we are very fortunate in Canada to have one of the highest numbers of billionaires per capita in the industrialized nations and we have a system in which it is possible to make a lot of money. These witnesses were saying that this is the biggest giveaway to them.

• (1125)

Then we had the revenue department and the finance department rush into the committee to try to contradict what was being said. That is what was in the newspapers. That is what is true. Do we know what they said to the committee? The finance officials of this government and Revenue Canada had to turn around and say that they did not know how much money was involved in this bill. They do not even know.

Members of Parliament standing on the government side do not know how much money is involved in this bill. All we can do is take the word of the experts that this is the biggest tax giveaway probably in our history, putting off the paying of taxes for another 30 years for a select group of people in our society.

This bill is putting off the payment while we bring people into the Tax Court of Canada, sock it to them and then we try to develop a defence for some of these people while this is going on in the House of Commons. This is a total embarrassment. I would like government members to stand and explain why they are changing the law.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the changes in Bill C–92 to the 21–year rule for trusts are intended to ensure that the original purpose for the rule is in fact achieved. The purpose is to ensure that the wealth accumulated during an individual's lifetime cannot be transferred from one generation to another without first being taxed.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, let us talk a little bit about the purpose of the 21–year rule. The 21–year rule was introduced in 1972 as part of the capital gains regime. It is a necessary part of the income tax rules which tax accrued gains on death, intended to ensure that wealth accumulated during an individual's lifetime cannot be transferred from one generation to another without first being taxed.

As the Minister of Finance indicated at the time the rule was introduced, the 21–year rule was necessary to prevent the indefinite postponement of capital gains tax through the use of long–term trusts. The postponement of such tax would otherwise be possible using trusts under which individual beneficiaries have the right to trust income during their lifetimes but no interest in trust capital. No gains on death would arise in respect of such life interests since they have no value after the holder dies.

Why are changes needed? On February 11, 1991 draft legislation was released proposing changes to the 21–year rule. These changes, together with minor revisions resulting from subsequent consultations, are contained in Bill C–92. They address two serious problems with the existing legislation while ensuring that the original purpose underlying the rule is met and the related tax revenues are secured.

First, for many trusts it is possible to defeat the intent of the 21–year rule by transferring property from one trust to a newly created trust with a new 21–year period. Second, the existing 21–year rule penalizes those trusts which cannot because of their particular terms distribute their assets before 1993. This is particularly the case with trusts which were settled before the rule was introduced.

I would like to say a few words on what are the changes. The proposed changes will ensure that the 21–year period cannot be refreshed by transferring trust assets to new trusts. They will also allow a trust which has been settled for an individual's children to elect to defer the deemed disposition that would otherwise occur under the 21–year rule until the death of the last such child.

Where a trust elects under the new rules gains which have accrued on assets it holds at that time, as well as gains which subsequently accrue on all trust assets, it will become taxable on the death of the last beneficiary who is not more than one generation removed from the trust settlor, or on the earlier sale of such assets. A trust that elects will not thereafter be permitted to distribute trust assets on a rollover basis, as described, to beneficiaries who are more than one generation removed from the trust settlor.

With this election the capital gains tax consequences will be the same whether an individual makes a gift of property directly to his or her child or makes the gift to a trust for the benefits of such child. In either case there will be a recognition for tax purposes on any accrued gains on the property at the time of the gift, and there will be a recognition of future gains with respect to the growth in value of the property gifted no later than the death of the child. This is consistent with the principle that wealth accumulation should be taxed in the hands of each generation.

I will say a few words on how the rule operates. The 21–year rule requires that the value of trust assets be determined every 21 years, beginning in 1993. Any accrued capital gains in excess of accrued capital losses on assets which are in a trust at that time are subject to income tax in the year in the same way as realized capital gains and losses. As a result the 21–year rule subjects to capital gains tax only those gains which have accrued after 1971.

It is important to note that the 21–year rule was not intended to prevent the distribution of trust assets to the beneficiaries of the trust before the 21–year period expires. Such distributions are consistent with the objective of the rule itself. Specific income tax rules provide for a rollover of trust property to the beneficiaries in accordance with the terms of the trust. These rollover rules recognize that because trust assets are simply being held for trust beneficiaries, their subsequent distribution to beneficiaries should not be a taxable event.

Later, when a beneficiary dies or actually sells the assets, any gains which have accumulated while the assets were held in the trust, as well as in the beneficiary's hands, are taxable at that time.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased I am back today to speak on this clause of the bill.

It is one that has caused most Canadians who understand what is going on in this omnibus legislation dealing with taxation a great deal of concern. As usual, when the government is trying to do some favours for its friends, who normally are not the poor or the destitute or those who have to rely on food banks to feed their children because of this government's policy, it tries to hide it. That is exactly what the government has done in this legislation.

It came in with a paper about two years ago and in the paper was a press release. It was pretty innocuous and hardly anybody picked it up at the time. The government said in the release that basically by regulation and now by law it was going to exempt some of Canada's wealthiest families from paying taxes on assets that have been in trust for 21 years. What does that mean to the average Canadian?

Most people did not understand. Most people were worried at that point, as I said, about trying to feed their kids. They were worrying about whether or not they were going to have a job next week because of the recession. During that period the government tried to sneak in a regulation, a change in the law which was not going to put them back to work, which was not going to shorten the lines at the food banks, which was not going to address the whole range of structural problems in the economy caused by Tory economics. They were simply interested in helping their friends, not just the friends who have a few thousands of dollars, not the friends who have a few hundreds of thousands of dollars—they had already looked after them—not their friends that had a few million dollars, but their friends in some cases who have billions of dollars in assets which are shielded effectively from taxation by regulation in the tax law.

It is a regulation that expired. The provision expired. The 21-year rule expired. The growth in value of the assets that were in family trusts were supposed to be taxable. As my friend from Gander just said, that was not good enough for the government. It has done this at a time when it is going around cutting and slashing every program of which it can possibly think.

Let us look at what the government has done in the last few years. It says there is no money out there. It has had over 40 tax increases, most of them affecting disproportionately the middle classes. There have been over 40 tax increases since this bunch opposite came into power. The average Canadian family in constant dollars is paying more than $2,000 in additional taxes because of all the changes this bunch opposite has made.

The government has assaulted the middle income, lower middle income and low income groups. The middle income group to which most Canadians watching this belong, the working class that tries to keep one step ahead of the sheriff, that tries to keep the kids clothed and fed in a modest home somewhere, the people who work hard for a modest living, count for about 37 per cent of the wealth in Canada. Under this bunch opposite, the government has increased the tax burden on this particular group, the average Canadian, so that the group which has control of 37 per cent of the wealth in the country pays 52 per cent of the taxes.

The government says that everybody has to suffer because there is no money out there. This is the same group which has told us it will no longer be participating 50 cents on every dollar for health care.

What does that mean? It means the impact of four successive Tory budgets on my province of Nova Scotia has been tremendous. The federal government has withdrawn, just this year past, health care expenditures of $111 million from a province of 885,000 people.

It has cut back on its cost sharing on post-secondary education in the province of Nova Scotia by $47 million. It says it does not have money. It has increased taxes. It has hiked them. It has decreased its level of participation in programs because it does not have the money and generally it has been going around telling everybody that we have to do more with less but we have to give them more to do it with.

When it comes to the wealthiest of Canadians, individuals that have established family trusts, they are given another tax holiday. The government is giving a tax holiday on billions and billions of dollars that are in family trusts. As my colleague said, there are up to 30 years of additional tax holidays. I was outraged when this issue first came up, as were people in my constituency.

There was an article by Neil Brooks about a year and a half ago. One of the problems we have is that the government, which has information about the value of these trusts that would allow us as members of Parliament to figure out how much taxes would be owed if it had allowed the 21-year rule to expire and had not tried to replace it with this new law, does not want to tell us the information. In this article by Neil Brooks it is indicated that one of the items that was removed in 1972 was the federal inheritance tax. That action resulted in a lump sum gift of about $12.5 billion to Canada's richest families. That is according to a calculation by John Bossons, University of Toronto economist. That was back in 1972.

These trusts are now probably worth $50 billion, maybe more. The government says: "Sorry, if you are on social assistance in British Columbia, Alberta or Ontario which used to be have provinces but not any more that is too bad".

• (1140)

The federal government has frozen its rate of participation on social assistance. It has capped CAP. So if you are out there, sorry. The poor are going to have to do with less. If you need health care in Nova Scotia you may not be able to find a hospital bed because these guys have cut back. If you are a university student in Newfoundland your tuition will be higher because the federal government has cut back by about $32 million on its cost sharing of post-secondary educational institutions in that province.

However, if you are one of Canada's richest Canadians you are going to have another 30-year tax holiday. Just keep rolling that money around within the trust, taking all the benefits from it and we are going to keep away from it. At this very time that the government talks about the need for restraint and the need to increase revenues it is allowing billions of dollars, not thousands, not millions, in tax revenue to be legally avoided by Canada's richest families. This is an affront.

It is an affront to the senior citizen who might be living on an income of $18,000 a year. I had somebody say to me the other day: "I am mad as hell. I make $18,000 per year. I put some money away. I get a little annuity. And the government tells me that I have to pay the government quarterly instalments on income tax. When I tell them I do not have the money to pay at the end of the year they charge me interest on the quarterly instalments that I did not make. Mr. MacDonald, I do not have enough money to live. What in the name of goodness, this government does not just want my money at the end of the year. It is taxing me all through the year for the money as it comes in. I have worked hard to build this country. I have put a little money aside; I salted some money away. Why are they coming after me?"

That is a good question. About six months ago a lady came to see me. Her husband had died. She had never been in the work force. She had a small pension. She never had to look after the bills, never had to do the books. She did not file her deceased husband's Revenue Canada forms on time. When she did she was billed $750 for the fine and interest. She did not know what to do with it. She was making $972 a month to live on, to pay for her mortgage, food, heat and lights. However, an order was put against her pension. The government took $200 a month from her $900-plus pension. Is that the type of fairness this government thinks Canadians want in their tax system?

I think Canadians are outraged that the government has this particular clause in this legislation. I hope the government is taken to the cleaners when it goes to the electorate for this type of activity, this type of legislated unfairness which is for those who have at the expense of those who have not. We will not be supporting this bill because of it.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to my hon. friend from Dartmouth and he accused the government of doing things. He says the government is doing things for its friends with this bill. That is what he said.

The friends of the government are the same friends of the Liberal Party. Who initiated this trust fund in 1972? The Pierre Elliott Trudeau government of 1972. The Eatons, the Molsons, the Bronfmans, the Seagrams and the Irvings from down east all put the pressure on the Liberals when they were the government. Now suddenly they are going to vote against the bill. They are going to vote against the Frankenstein which they created. Mary Shelley would be appalled. At least you do not destroy your own creation. This was their own creation in 1972.

What do we have? Twenty-one years. For 21 years the wealthiest families in this country were able to put aside in trust accounts what we now estimate to be somewhere in the vicinity of $70 billion.

We hear it every day from across the way: "We are in tough times. We have to put our economic house in order. We have to watch our credit rating. We are living beyond our means. We have to cut back services. The people have to pay more because we have to reduce this deficit".

• (1145)

The member for Halton—Peel who is running now for the Tory leadership even had the little newspaper delivery boys put in their $2.40 a week toward debt reduction. Is that not the most ridiculous thing? There is a clock showing the debt and deficit reduction and this little boy has finished his paper route and is bringing his offerings up to the altar of the privileged. He is offering his $2.40 to reduce the deficit.

Then we have people who have money. Why is the government always taxing people who do not have money? There is a trust fund with approximately $70 billion in it and we cannot get one plug nickel out of it to help pay the costs of running this country and to help reduce the deficit. That is a phoney argument.

Let us draw a contrast with how the government treats another trust fund. With respect to family trusts, it will exempt them for another 21 years, probably another 38 years. How does it treat another trust fund? I will talk about another trust fund.

It is called the funeral trusts. Older Canadians in particular in making arrangements to pay for their burial put money into a funeral trust fund. It is usually run by the funeral parlour. What is this government proposing to do? It is proposing to reach right into the funeral trusts and tax the interest accrued on the funds in the funeral trust fund. It is financial necrophilia. That is what it is.

Mr. Nystrom: It is what?

Mr. Rodriguez: Financial necrophilia. I know there is the common saying that you cannot take it with you, but this government every day is proving that it is going to take it off you before you go into the next world.

Here we have the prospect of one family trust with a considerable amount of money in it, $70 billion. Approximately $400 million is in the accumulated funeral trust in the province of Ontario. The government is going to reach into this trust fund and tax the interest accruing on the funeral trusts. This is money set aside by individuals so that they will not be a burden on their families when they die. Their funerals will be paid for. The interest that accrues in that fund is to offset inflation and to pay for their burial costs. How tough this government is with the ordinary folk, but how soft it is with the rich and the powerful and the famous.

What has been said about this family trust? What do the trust tax professionals say? After all, we in this House are not necessarily tax professionals.

Here is what Sydney Goldstein of Goldstein, Goldstein and Goldstein in Ottawa said:

> There is no question that it represents a massive windfall for existing trusts.

Here is what Kathryn Bush of Blake Cassels said:

> A cynical person might suggest that pressure from influential political supporters also should be listed as a reason for the draft legislation.

Those are the kinds of people who would normally support the Tory government. Here is what Neil Brooks, an associate dean at Osgoode Hall Law School said:

> The government has given Canada's wealthiest families notice that it intends to give them a gift worth several billion dollars.

Here is what Arthur Drache of Fraser and Beatty said:

> If legislation now before Parliament is not passed before the end of the year, thousands of trusts would be hit with massive tax bills.

Does that not just make your heart burn? Does it not really hurt the old heart-strings?

An hon. member: Poor old Conrad Black.

Mr. Rodriguez: Gosh we have to bleed for Conrad Black. We have to bleed for all those very wealthy Canadians who have not paid their taxes since they have put them into these trust funds.

Mr. Speaker, you should see how tough Revenue Canada is on the people in my riding who earn maybe $15,000 or $16,000 a year and owe a couple of hundred dollars. You should see how tough Revenue Canada is. It has to collect every penny of tax. Revenue Canada phones them and writes them and is pretty effective in collecting taxes from poor people. But boy does it curl up and purr when it comes to the wealthy as in the case of the family trust. Now what has the Department of Finance said?

The question is: Why can we not stop that? Why can we not say that they have had 21 years? They have had 21 years to make arrangements to pay the taxes. That is what burns my toes. They have had 21 years. That was the purpose for the 21 years, to work out arrangements to pay the taxes.

Well they did squat about all that because they know and they knew then that they would have a friendly government. It did not matter whether it was Liberal or Tory; they had a friendly ear on the other side and they always have friendly ears collectively.

What are the arguments? Can we believe this? One of the arguments used as to why we could not do this was because of what would happen with the trust established by parents for the benefit of their disabled children. Oh my. Oh my. The very wealthy that have disabled children.

I have never heard exploitation of disabled children by a government such as we are hearing in this particular case. To use provisions for disabled children to avoid paying taxes on a fund that was set up by a Liberal government in 1972 so that they can avoid paying taxes, surely that argument holds no water. Surely there is a better way to make provisions for disabled children than to put a tax loophole like this in place which would rob the Treasury of billions of dollars in tax revenues. This is at a time when every Canadian has to pay their fair share of taxes if we are to get ourselves out of the economic mess we are in.

I see you are giving me the sign of the hook, Mr. Speaker. One last point is that if we ask them to pay the taxes on this they would somehow or other have to sell off their assets to pay the taxes. Well is that not hunky-dory. They have had 21 years to make provisions to pay what they owe, and if they have not taken steps to do that then so be it. That is the way it rolls. That is what the folks in my riding who owe a couple of hundred dollars in taxes are told. They are taxed on a daily interest rate and it accumulates and runs and there are penalties attached.

In closing I want to say it is not fair what this government is doing. It is not fair. Everyone has to pay their fair share of the taxes and when the government does this it calls into question every other tax measure it proposes.

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I too want to say a few words about the bill before the House today regarding tax changes in our country and in particular the question of family trusts in Bill C-92.

As my friend from Nickel Belt has said, the whole question of family trusts began back in 1972 when we dealt with estate taxes and capital gains taxes in this House. The Liberal Party was in power with then Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau.

There was a tremendous lobby at that time from some of the wealthiest families in this country to set up a tax loophole for them and for their families. It was to give them 21 years of protection during which they did not have to pay taxes.

• (1155)

Over the years billions and billions of dollars have been put into these family trusts. We have privacy laws in this country so we are not sure how much money has accumulated. Of course we need those privacy laws. The estimate we have from people in the field is that around $70 billion has now been accumulated in family trusts by higher income families and is tax exempt under present law for 21 years. After 21 years arrangements were to be made where taxes would be paid in the appropriate manner on the money by some of the wealthiest families in this country.

The 21 years are up. It is now 1993 and what has happened? Lobbyists have gone to the government across the way and said: "These poor families in this country are going to have to pay some taxes. We need an extension of the 21 years". The government has now tabled Bill C-92 before the House to extend that 21-year period until the last exempt beneficiary of that trust passes away.

What does that mean? It means now that instead of 21 years those trusts may run for 30, 40, 75 or even 80 years or more if a young child has been made part of that trust. That child may not pass away until age 80, 90 or even older. Now the wealthy in this country are being given hundreds of millions of dollars by the government across the way because of extension of this exemption on family trusts.

It is not fair, just or proper that the wealthiest families shall now be paying hundreds of millions of dollars less in taxes than they would be if we kept the law in place with the 21-year limitation. Even the 21-year limitation is something I certainly fundamentally disagreed with. It was established by our friends in the Liberal Party back in 1972 as they tried to cater to the rich.

I am sure my friend from Gander—Grand Falls, being a populist progressive Liberal from Newfoundland, is embarrassed that former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau and former Minister of Finance Allan MacEachen had the audacity to present this law to Parliament and to use their majority to force this law through Parliament back in 1972. I am sure the member for Gander—Grand Falls would like to get up in this House and differentiate himself from what the Liberals did in 1972. Now it is being made even worse by dropping the 21-year limitation and allowing the exemption to the wealthiest people to continue until the last exempt beneficiary shall pass away.

If we did not have the family trust we would be collecting literally billions of dollars more over the years in taxes from the wealthier people. Why do we let the wealthy people get away with an exemption when the ordinary people have to pay more taxes all the time? The ordinary person who makes a few dollars an hour, a few dollars a week or a few thousand dollars a year, is expected to pay his fair share on the national debt. Yet wealthy people will be left with another loophole.

How will this be done? My Liberal friend from Ottawa South is very much in support of this kind of loophole for the wealthy, it appears, and asked how it should be done. Some experts appeared before the finance committee a few days ago. Neil Brooks, an associate dean of law at Osgoode Hall, Toronto, talked about how this was a transfer of more money to the wealthy. I am sure my friend from Ottawa South has a great deal of respect for Mr. Brooks who said:

> The government has given Canada's wealthiest families notice that it intends to give them a gift worth several billion dollars.

It is giving several billion dollars to the wealthiest people while ordinary citizens in many cases are lining up at food banks because they do not have enough money to pay for food for themselves and their children. The government across the way, supported by some of our Liberal friends, is giving millions and billions of dollars to the wealthiest people.

There is another interesting quote from Sidney Goldstein. In his testimony he said he had been a supporter of the Conservative Party in the past and had served on the Conservative task force. He was therefore sympathetic with its general direction and thrust. Despite that, this is what he had to say:

• (1200)

> There is no question that it represents a massive windfall for existing trusts.

This was from Sidney Goldstein of Goldstein, Goldstein and Goldstein in Ottawa who has been involved in the past with the Conservative Party.

Kathryn Bush, another tax expert, said:

> A cynical person might suggest that pressure from influential political supporters should also be listed as a reason for the draft legislation.

Arthur Drache of Fraser and Beatty said:

> If legislation now before Parliament is not passed before the end of the year, thousands of trusts would be hit with massive tax bills.

If we do not pass this legislation to extend the 21-year period many wealthy people will finally be paying a few million dollars more in taxes. About $70 billion is sitting in these trust funds escaping taxes today. If we do not pass this bill a lot of that money will be collected. If we collect that money from the wealthy people, from the Eatons, the Bronfmans, the Seagrams and people of that sort, then the ordinary people in my riding of Saskatchewan might get a bit of a break in their tax bill. Perhaps medicare would be better protected for the ordinary people or the family allowance program would not have had to be abolished. The old age pensions could be adjusted to give our senior citizens a better income to live their last few years in our land.

There are many ways we could use the money from the trust funds. We now have a debt of about $450 billion. It was about $200 billion when the Conservatives took office some eight or nine years ago. It is now $450 billion and we are at the point where about 30 cents on the dollar that we pay in taxes now go to pay the interest on the national debt.

One of the many reasons our national debt is so high is that the wealthy have not been paying their fair share of taxes for too many years. If people make $1 million a year or more why should they not pay their fair share of taxes? Why all the loopholes for the wealthy?

I suggest if one looks at the income tax returns year after year one finds that many of these wealthy Canadians and big corporations are very generous contributors to the Conservative Party of Canada in terms of their electoral funds and funds for the ongoing operations of the Conservative Party. It comes right down to the old saying: "He who pays the piper calls the tune".

These people are now saying that 21 years is over when they have been exempt from taxes and they want it extended. They lobby the government. It is an election year and of course the government brings in Bill C-92, part of which is to extend the 21-year limit of tax exempt status to family trusts. If this bill passes which it will because of the Conservative majority, it will abolish the 21-year limitation and allow these family trusts to sit on tax until the last exempt beneficiary dies. In many of these cases that will be 30, 40, 50, 80 or even 90 years.

The time has come when this government should start taxing the wealthy and giving some tax breaks to the ordinary citizens. If it did that, we would have a much stronger Canada for each and every one of us.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add a few comments to this debate because a lot of comment from the other side of the House has distorted some of the elements of the question of trusts and what they do.

I am not here to speak in support of trusts or say who should or should not be taxed. However, I think we should try to put this in perspective and understand what we are dealing with. We should not allow too much misinformation so people think trusts are something they are not.

• (1205)

It is important to recognize that trusts are created for a variety of reasons and in some cases have tax consequences. Putting assets in a trust does not mean that all of a sudden no tax is paid. Income from those trusts is taxed every year just like other taxpayers. If there is income from regular sources or capital gains trusts are treated the same as any other taxpayer and, for that matter, are taxed at the top rate of income tax every year.

They do not necessarily get the benefits of an individual taxpayer who would have other benefits which would reduce that top rate of income tax. We are talking about assets that have been put into a trust for one reason or another and when they should be taxed just simply because they have been accumulating wealth for an individual during his lifetime.

Prior to 1972 there was an estate tax. When people died they were taxed based on the value of their estates or the assets they had at that time. In 1972 a capital gains tax system was implemented. That means when people sell or dispose of assets those gains are taxed. They are taxed when the person transfers those assets to the trust. It could be said that the person has chosen to have died earlier because by transferring those assets to the trust those assets are then subject to tax at that time. Otherwise those assets would have remained not subject to tax and not taxed until the death of the taxpayer.

Setting up a trust advances the time of the tax and the tax applies when the trust is set up. The change in this rule allows those trusts to continue to be reinvigorated and transferred from one trust to another without tax being paid. In some cases it prevents this.

In the case of beneficiaries this change deems that where the assets are in a trust they will not be taxable or can be chosen not to be taxable until the last beneficiary of the person who set up the trust dies. In other words the treatment becomes the same as if the person distributed his or her assets directly to the beneficiary.

We are not saying tax is never paid. First, tax is paid when the trust is set up as if the taxpayer setting up the trust had disposed of those assets at that time. Second, trusts are taxed on an annual basis just like any other taxpayer. Finally we are saying they will be taxed when they are either distributed to the beneficiary or the last beneficiary of the trust dies.

It has been suggested that billions of dollars are involved here. That is simply not true. Most of the trusts affected by this rule in the absence of these changes would simply distribute their assets in any event. Income taxes will be paid by the beneficiaries when the assets are sold or when the beneficiary dies. In such cases the new rules do not change either the amount or the timing of the tax paid.

We could revert to a system of inheritance tax on death and eliminate the capital gains tax where in many cases we tax people in advance of dying. That was the objective of the Benson tax reform at that time. As has been pointed out, the Liberal government of the day did not want to allow capital gains to build up for years and years. It decided to tax them on an interim basis such as when people sold them. If they did not sell them they would become taxable on death, or in the case of transferring them to a trust they would become taxable at that time. We chose to collect taxes sooner than the pre-1972 system. That is the result of some of these changes. What we do not do or seek to do, however, is tax them twice, tax them both on the distribution to the beneficiary and on an annual basis or every time the gain is realized. We could choose to do that. We could double tax them but I do not think anybody here is suggesting we do that.

What is being suggested is that somehow these trusts avoid taxes and no one ever pays any tax on them. That is simply not true. What it does in most cases is it advances certain taxes that are paid to a time prior to when they would otherwise be paid.

We should try to determine whether these rules are appropriate or whether we should change to some other form such as an inheritance tax. If that is what is being suggested by the opposition parties then I think it is a fair suggestion. In my view it is probably a good idea and one we should examine.

I do not think we should allow the misunderstanding to be perpetuated, that somehow trusts simply are vehicles by which wealthy people avoid tax and never pay any tax. They are part of the over-all tax regime. In a number of cases, including the changes in these rules, trusts are forced to pay taxes every 21 years rather than only when the person setting up the trust dies. In other words, in many cases with the 21-year rule trusts will be taxed every 21 years. We will be taxing those benefits or those accrued gains sooner rather than later. When later comes there will be less tax payable because they will have been taxed on an ongoing basis.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to engage in this debate, not so much as a matter of the rhetoric of tax reform and the partisan differences but to try to get a few concepts clear.

Perhaps because of my background I find it very offensive when some speakers, such as the last speaker from the NDP, the second to last speaker in the House, stands and flagrantly misrepresents the nature of the taxation regime that exists and the changes that were introduced in the reform of 1971-72.

I understand that some of these issues are complex and difficult but a few points should be made. First, and the speaker who spoke previously mentioned this, trusts are a fundamental part of our system of law, not just tax law but private law.

When I practised law most of the wills I prepared for people with children contained trust provisions, not because they were rich, not because they were some kind of an elite wealthy group, but because they did not want their children to inherit, usually life insurance proceeds, before they were old enough to manage the money. So a trust was set up in the will. Very often it required that the child reach age 25, sometimes older, before he or she received the capital assets of the trust. They could be quite considerable, even for somebody of modest means who invested heavily in life insurance in the event of their death.

These trusts exist in many cases. They are carrying on, they are continuous, and they are taxed just as all trusts are taxed. When the NDP member from Saskatchewan gets up and says that the Liberals brought in a law whereby trusts were not taxed for 21 years, he is simply not stating what is true. It is not correct.

I am sure it is difficult for people to understand the difference between taxing income and taxing capital. But if we do not have some understanding of what that means, we cannot understand what the provision is that we are debating here.

Income is the amount that we earn on a continuing basis. If a person has a Canada Savings Bond, the bond itself represents capital and the interest received on it is income. The income of trusts is and always has been taxed. It was taxed prior to 1972. It is taxed subsequent to 1972. If the trust is set up between people who were alive that income is not taxed the same way an individual's income is taxed. It is taxed at a higher rate. It is taxed from the first dollar at the maximum rate of tax for individuals.

• (1215)

If the trust is one such as I referred to in my example in a will, the income is taxed every year just as an individual's income is taxed. The difference is the trust does not get the personal and dependent exemptions that an individual has to rely on. Either way, income earned on an annual basis is and has been taxed.

What about capital gains? What is a capital gain? Perhaps a person owns a piece of land, a small apartment building, a duplex or shares in a corporation that can be sold on the stock exchange. Any time one of these is disposed of and there is a profit over and above what was paid for the asset, there is a capital gain. It is taxed as income in Canada, subject to the fact that we reduce the total gain to 75 per cent for the purposes of determining taxable income. The lower rate reflects the fact that we do not take inflation into account. If a property was bought in 1971 and sold this year, 22 years later, there is a gain on it. We do not take into account inflation. We only require the person to include 75 per cent of the gain in income.

There are debates about whether it is fair, whether it is the right number, whether it should apply to all gains or whether it should be long-term gains as opposed to short-term gains. I will not get into that today. The principle is this, gains are taxed.

When my friend from the NDP says that the Liberals introduced a loophole in 1971, what he is failing to mention is that prior to 1972 capital gains were not taxed at all. Zero per cent of the gain was included in income, not just for trusts but for individuals and corporations as well. Capital gains were not taxed. In 1971 under the tax reform of that year, for the first time capital gains were included in income for taxation purposes. This was a major reform, arguably the most important reform in our income tax law since income tax was introduced in 1917.

What do we do with trusts? It is very easy with individuals. We determine the capital gain either when they dispose of the property, when they give it away to somebody or when they die. That is easy, no problem. What do we do with trusts? A trust is a legal concept which has permanence in our British system of law. It has some correlations in the French civil code but it is not exactly the same. It is an ancient concept. Trusts do not die. Trusts do not die, so how do we determine their capital gains?

If the property is sold that is when they realize a capital gain. It is taxed. There is no difference there between a trust and an individual. The problem is this. Some trusts, depending on their terms, can literally go on forever. What is the answer? The answer that was proposed in 1971 is to say 21 years is a long enough trust and every 21 years whether the property is disposed of or not it will be deemed to have been sold even if it has not and capital gains tax will have to be paid.

It did not seem unduly harsh at the time and I have to say it does not seem unduly harsh to me today. That is why I oppose the amendment that the government is proposing. People need to understand what the concept was that this rule was trying to get at. NDP members like to say it is a big loophole. The fact that there is a 21-year delay they allege is a loophole.

• (1220)

I asked the member from Saskatchewan earlier what he would do. He did not have an answer. Are they proposing that all capital gains realized or unrealized in trusts be taxed on an annual basis? Is that what they are proposing? If so, why do they not say so? Why do they not say that they want all those little trusts out there—many of them are not very big—which are established for the benefit of children, to hire appraisers every year, to hire expensive accountants every year to figure out a complicated tax return every year for these trusts that are really only going to be set up for five to ten years?

Why do they not admit that is what they want to do? Why do they not admit that they want to bring a system of market value assessment on an annual basis into our income tax law so that every year we are having to appraise all of our assets? That is the kind of inter-meddling stupidity that the NDP has become famous for in the province of Ontario. They are not honest enough to admit that is what they want to do.

The proposal put forward in 1971 made sense. It gave the trusts a lot of time to make their arrangements. To plan 21 years is a long time in anyone's lifetime. I do not understand why the government feels that at the last minute it has to say it is going to grant a reprieve. I simply do not understand.

I do not agree the numbers that have been spouted by some members on how much is out there are valid. I do not think there is any way of knowing how much tax might be generated with the 21-year realization. I think it is fair to say it is a considerable amount of money.

With the current fiscal situation the government is in and the reasonableness of the test passed in 1972, I fail to see why this amendment has been brought forward by the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 1 standing in the name of the hon. member for Sudbury. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury) moved:

That Bill C-92 be amended in Clause 47 by striking out lines 3 to 41 at page 111, lines 1 to 48 at page 112, lines 1 and 2 at page 113, lines 13 to 38 at page 115, lines 1 to 48 at page 116, lines 1 to 51 at page 117, lines 1 to 37 at page 118, lines 1 to 39 at page 119, lines 1 to 48 at page 120, lines 1 and 2 at page 121, lines 12 to 48 at page 123 and lines 1 to 21 at page 124.

She said: Mr. Speaker, this motion deals with the clause which would force all holders of passive real estate not to have a capital gains exemption.

In 1985 the Conservatives brought in capital gains exemptions. In essence they were very much a gift to the Canadian people in that they were a very nice tax loophole. There was the $500,000 capital gains exemption for small business. There was the $100,000 capital gains investment on any kind of share profits or real estate profits Canadians might have.

As a result many Canadians did cash in and paid no taxes on that $500,000 capital gains or the first $100,000 capital gains on the profit from the sale of shares or the profit from the sale of properties.

Bill C-92 says in its provisions that from February 1992 the capital gains exemption for $100,000 on passive property will no longer be in place, that the only people who will qualify for the $100,000 capital gains exemption will be those who are operating what they call active businesses.

In committee I asked what was an active business. I wanted to know about a Canadian who had invested in an apartment building. Many Canadians may build a house, a duplex or a triplex. They may live in one part of the house or rent the whole thing. They might have three or four apartments that they rent. Generally they build them, work at them, collect the rents and do most of the maintenance work. This, for many Canadians, is a way of putting aside money for the future.

I was very much interested whether this particular kind of individual would still qualify for the $100,000 capital gains exemption. I was told no, this particular individual would no longer qualify for the $100,000 capital gains investment because he did not pass the test of an active small business. The test is that it would be a business employing a minimum of five persons.

I fail to recognize why this government would choose to single out the owners of small apartment buildings and deny them something that they are allowing other members of the Canadian community, namely to realize a capital gains of $100,000 tax-free.

I often wondered whether the government was doing this on purpose. Was it really aware it was doing this? It was very much aware that all these ordinary Canadians would now be fully taxed on any gains on their small apartment building. However, if someone wished to invest in a race horse in Kentucky and sold that horse at a profit, the first $100,000 could be used as their $100,000 capital gains exemption. Is it not wonderful? If they played penny stocks and made any kind of gains, they could use that first $100,000 and not pay any tax on it.

I thought to myself there is something wrong here. We have just been through the discussion on extending the 21-year rule for trusts. Why would the government on the one hand take away the 21 years and allow Canadians in some instances to defer taxation indefinitely on assets in these trusts and then turn around and apply a rule which would penalize ordinary Canadians and which would take away something that they might benefit from if it were left in place?

I had a great deal of difficulty coming up with any real answers except that it is looking for revenues. We know that there is a debt-deficit crisis or at least there is a serious problem in our country, but I say we have to treat all Canadians the same. If we are going to have capital gains exemptions then we should have them for all Canadians. We should not pick and choose: "Well, because you choose to work hard, build an apartment or fix up your own apartment, when you sell your apartment you cannot have the tax-free $100,000 exemption on your capital gains, but if you want to buy a horse somewhere you can have it".

It just did not make sense to me. That is one of the reasons I oppose this particular measure. If the government wishes to say that there will be no more capital gains exemptions because it can no longer afford this gift to people, that is fine.

• (1230)

If that is what it would like to do then do it. However it should not pretend that it is just being fiscally responsible and say: "We want to channel the moneys in investments versus having it sitting there doing nothing". When people invest in a small piece of property or apartment building, they are doing something to help themselves.

These same property owners have been dealt some very serious blows in our economy. Rent controls have caused them extremely serious problems. Most people now would not buy an investment property because it just is not worth while.

The NDP in Ontario has made it extremely difficult for the ordinary apartment owner to function and make any kind of a profit. If he can sell his building at any kind of a gain, he certainly deserves that $100,000 exemption. This says no. This will not happen with those people.

What I want this government to do is to come clean, not pretend any more. If it does not want capital gains exemptions then it should say so and have absolutely no exemptions for anybody. Otherwise it should treat the average Canadian fairly. That is not happening here.

It is a case of representing the people of Canada, being up front about it and saying to them: "I believe that what you are doing is worth while. I can afford to give you a tax break" or "I cannot afford to give you a tax break". I say to this government that it should make up its mind which way it wants it. Then it should come forth with some proper laws which will treat all Canadians fairly.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words in support of my hon. friend, the hon. member for Sudbury, and the amendment put forward by her.

The member put it quite well. On one hand the government says it is going to give a capital gains break to somebody who buys a race horse in Kentucky, Texas, or in any of the other states in the United States where they are in the business of breeding race horses. They buy the race horse. If there is a gain realized from the race horse, the government says: "That is fine. We will give you a tax break". On the other hand, there is a different type of capital gain, namely something that pertains to property in Canada, on which it will not allow that same exemption.

A moment ago members of the NDP were making reference to me, saying that I was embarrassed about this entire question of capital gains that was brought in by the Liberals. I want to thank the hon. member for Ottawa South for explaining what happened in 1972.

As we know, Canada did away with the inheritance tax, the estate tax as it was called at the time, in 1971. We had an inheritance tax just like they do in the United States today.

If one dies in the United States today and one has any amount of property, by law it all has to be assessed. If it is found that the market value of the property is worth more than $600,000, it is taxed. I do not know what the rate is now. It used to be 55 per cent of the value of property that was judged to be in excess of $600,000. It is called the inheritance tax.

We had such a tax in Canada prior to 1972. The tax kicked in at somewhere around $150,000. If the value of all property was judged to be in excess of that, it kicked in at a rate of 15 per cent or 10 cent and went up progressively from there.

That was the situation prior to 1972. The law was changed in 1971, taking effect in 1972, to replace the inheritance tax.

• (1235)

Canada does not have an inheritance tax any more. It was replaced by the capital gains tax, which in 1972 when it was brought in was 50 per cent of the normal rate of taxation.

When the Canadian government brought in that law instituting the capital gains tax and doing away with the inheritance tax, it did not create loopholes; it tried to plug the loopholes. The 21-year rule was in my humble opinion an effort to plug a loophole. As the previous speaker from Ottawa South pointed out, a trust does not die. An individual dies but a trust just does not die.

The problem was what to do when somebody had their assets in a trust and the deemed value of those assets would normally become taxable upon death. What if it is put into a trust prior to that moment in time and of course the trust cannot die?

One must lay down a law so that at the end of every 21 years all the assets in that trust and the accrued value of the capital gains on the assets would come due. One would say that the trust would have been deemed to have died at that moment in time at 21 years.

That was not a loophole created by the Liberals. That was a plugging of a loophole by the Liberals that would have seen, according to the testimony before the committee, vast sums of money now coming into the public Treasury because of that capital gains provision in 1993.

This would have been very handy for the Government of Canada at this moment in time when it is trying to get money here and trying to get money there. That is why quite frankly we are puzzled as to why the Government of Canada would forgo that kind of revenue at this moment in time.

I wish to raise on this particular amendment proposed by my hon. friend a serious problem relating to capital gains and the capital gains exemption. The Government of Canada has throughout the past two years given certain payments to individuals in Canada that have been judged to be capital gains and that qualify for the capital gains exemption under the $100,000 exemption.

A lot of these payments have been given in our agricultural industry, farming industry and fishing industry. They are the primary industries. The payments have been for people to get out of the business they are doing.

In other words the Government of Canada has come along and said: "Look, we are going to give you a payment". In my particular case on my coastline of Newfoundland it says: "We are going to give you money for selling your licences back to us so we can get you out of the fishery". In this case it was in particular salmon licences. However, it says that it qualifies for the capital gains exemption that we are talking about today because it says it is property. That is what it was judged to be.

However, in offering the money to Canadians and saying to Canadians: "Look, we will judge this to be a capital gain to qualify under the capital gains exemption", they forgot to tell those Canadians 60 years of age or older that the Department of National Health and Welfare has a rule. It says that if one receives money in the previous year as a capital gain that has to be subtracted from the guaranteed income supplement and the spousal allowance in the following year.

This means that right now under the capital gains and the capital gains exemption which was granted last year, hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of people over 60 years of age are receiving notification this week and next week that their spousal allowance has now been cancelled because of the capital gain and the capital gains exemption last year and that the guaranteed income supplement has been reduced accordingly.

I raise the point in discussion today about this capital gains exemption and the subject of the capital gains and the capital gains exemption as it relates to this particular bill. Hopefully somebody in the ministry will see the light and pass a minute of cabinet that says persons who received this money and who had an income that normally gave them the spousal allowance and the guaranteed income supplement would be exempt as far as capital gains and the capital gains exemption of last year is concerned in their guaranteed income supplement and in their spousal allowance, both of which are about to change in April.

I will get back for the minute that I have left to the proposal put forward by the representative of the Liberal Party. Why would one bring in a change in one's capital gains exemption that would say that one is not going to encourage people to build buildings, homes or apartment buildings, but one is going to encourage people to buy race horses in Kentucky? That is the essence of the amendment we are talking about today.

On that basis I would have to strongly support the proposal put forward by my hon. friend.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the amendment, just to put it in context, proposed by the Liberal member for Sudbury would retain the $100,000 capital gains exemption for people who invest in real estate.

In a way this amendment gives me some problem because I personally feel that the $100,000 capital gains exemption should be abolished altogether. I support the capital gains exemption for farmers and for small business people who dispose of the shares of their small business because this is one of the key ways in which people in those categories are able to provide for their own retirement.

With respect to the $100,000 capital gains exemption this has been in operation since 1985 at a lower rate and then was gradually built up to where it is now. I think the minister of the day proposed to bring it up to $500,000, but it was finally stopped at $100,000. The evidence is that this benefit accrues only to those who are in a high income category and therefore have lots of cash available to put into investments. I do not think the government has been able to produce any evidence whatsoever that it has stimulated investment or, in other words, that it has caused people who would otherwise have consumed their savings to have instead directed it into an investment which would go to create jobs in Canada.

In the absence of that evidence I do not understand really the rationale for having the $100,000 capital gains exemption at all. However, if we are going to have it, is it not peculiar that the government has decided to exempt investment real estate from it?

Let us make another thing clear. This proposal from the Liberal member for Sudbury does not suggest including real estate in the exemption that is not investment related. In other words, this is not a way of reopening it for second family homes to get into the exempt category. It is a proposal for people who want to invest in a duplex, a triplex, a little apartment building or a little commercial property, to give them the same benefit as the government is permitting to continue to accrue to those who go to their local broker and buy shares in a company.

• (1245)

With respect, I do not understand that rationale. Very often it is the small real estate investor, often a first-time home buyer who buys a duplex and rents out the other half, a small business person or a corner store operator who rents out an adjacent apartment or has some investment in real estate involved in their assets. They are not usually incorporated. They are usually small, low end and unincorporated.

The NDP in Ontario has done everything it can to destroy the real estate investment market in the province of Ontario. If one wants to find commercial real estate for a bargain price, I suggest Ontario and especially Toronto.

What the NDP has done cannot be offset by permitting a $100,000 capital gains exemption for investors in real estate because frankly there are no capital gains in real estate at the present time in Ontario any way. Perhaps times will change and things will improve.

However, to put it in the most cynical way possible, it seems to me that the government in bringing in this amendment is favouring the brokerage industry by permitting people to get the capital gains exemption if they invest through a broker in listed stock but not if they buy a small piece of real estate and try to make a little bit of a gain on it by renting it out and hoping that it increases in value over time.

If I had my way I would get rid of the exemption altogether, but if we are going to keep it for some kind of investment why target it for the blue chip stock and not for the little investment in a real estate property that so many small investors look to for the way of building a little bit of savings for their future?

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to speak on the proposed amendment of my colleague in our party from Sudbury with respect to the capital gains exemption.

I would like to touch on two areas that I think my colleague from Ottawa South pointed out. It was the philosophical issue as to whether or not one needs capital gains exemptions at all. However, I think one ought to look at the fairness of the tax system and the removal of this capital gains exemption as proposed by the government in this Bill C-92. Of course the Liberal amendment is to change that and to allow those exemptions to occur.

I guess I want to deal with two aspects. One aspect is with regard to the fairness of the government's move to eliminate the capital gains exemption from real estate. I think my colleague from Ottawa South touched on the reason why the government would only want to look at real estate and not at other opportunities where the capital gains exemption would remain.

I am in favour of the capital gains exemption at all levels. I believe there is a purpose to those capital gains exemption, that is to allow citizens no matter what income stream they are in to invest in various opportunities such as business, stocks, real estate, farming or a number of other areas. I think that is an important policy matter for any government, but I believe we ought to encourage people to invest in their country in an indirect way by investing in business, real estate, farming or in other ways.

The incentive of capital gains exemption to the tune of $100,000 allows people to directly invest in their future and the country's future in opportunities not only for themselves but for their families and again their communities and their country. Therefore I think philosophically we ought to look at why one should have a capital gains exemption at all. I believe that those capital gains exemptions are there for a purpose, that is to stimulate investment, savings, activity, growth and job creation. One could make a very good case for those capital gains exemptions.

Therefore I believe it is punitive and unfair for the government to essentially say that capital gains exemptions are all right except for real estate. It is looking at one class of business and saying it will no longer be considered for the capital gains exemption. That should be taken into consideration. Our amendment tries to put everybody on the same footing in the same class.

Unlike the member for Ottawa South who might say for instance that we should get rid of all capital gains exemption, I come at it the other way and say that I believe in capital gains exemptions as an opportunity for job creation as well as wealth creation. That is fair. We approach the situation differently.

With respect to the specific benefits of this capital gains exemption, as the housing critic for my party I think it is fair to say that looking at the profile of the average person who invests in a duplex or triplex or a small apartment building the country and communities achieve a social benefit by those people investing in those kinds of properties.

We get a supply of housing stock which becomes affordable housing. If it is only left to the big guys, the big developers and contractors, the ones with the land to develop the apartments and so on, and not allow anybody else into the real estate market, I suggest we will not get affordable housing but the market will essentially be driven by very few people.

Members of the middle income group for a great many years have primarily been investing in these duplexes and triplexes. They want to provide for their own pensions, their own futures and those of their children, and do so by investing in real estate. They have also provided this country with a great supply of affordable housing. I believe the Canadian Real Estate Association and others have indicated that if this opportunity for people to invest in real estate is taken away, this country and its communities will be worse off in terms of affordable housing.

Before we go about trashing this capital gains exemption just because we want to get to the speculator, the person who in better times in an overheated inflationary market was able to take advantage of buying and selling, we can put in place certain safeguards to make sure that kind of speculation does not occur. But let us not take away a fantastic financial incentive mechanism for the average person to be able to invest in real estate.

Just like they will continue to be able to invest in stocks or businesses, let them continue to invest in real estate. The side benefit to the country and the community will be the great supply of affordable housing. We know how tragic it is that a lot of people are finding it very difficult to afford shelter. In fact, over 1.5 million people are putting over 30 per cent of their income toward housing. There are 500,000 people who are paying at least 50 per cent of their income toward housing.

There is an opportunity in having the average individual invest in rental income, be it another house, duplex or triplex. At the end of the day this country benefits by that investment. Yes, they do benefit themselves because of the tax write-offs and tax advantages, but they are also investing in their future, the creation of wealth and the future of their children.

I suggest this particular capital gains exemption which this government now wants to take away will be negative for the economy. It will not do anything in terms of creation of jobs or the creation of wealth in this country.

I support the amendment put forward by my colleague, the Liberal member for Sudbury. We should try to convince this government that if it wants to take away the speculative aspects of this particular exemption because it feels it may have been abused in the past, there are other ways of doing that other than trying to take away this exemption totally.

• (1255)

Again on the fairness aspect, why pick on the real estate or property end when in fact stocks, bonds and business investments are allowed to remain intact?

I believe in the whole concept of capital gains exemption. It is a great opportunity for people to invest for themselves, for their future, for their children's future and for this country in providing the prosperity and jobs the country needs.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the particular provision in the statute has caused me considerable problems, but I think on balance there is some good rationale for the provision and the amendment ought to be defeated.

It is fair to say that of the capital gains claimed tax-free by the $100,000 exemption, over half of the gains for filing purposes have been claimed on small amounts of real estate. By and large, those items of real estate have been vacant land and property which is non-income producing.

The whole purpose of the exemption or allowance of $100,000 for capital gains was to direct investment into something that would spin the economy along. Investing in a vacant lot or investing in a cottage site, or just having an extra family home is not something that spins the economy along. The real question is: Should that kind of investment somehow be tax-free to the extent of $100,000?

It is the government's view if we are going to have allowances that reduce people's taxable income made by capital gains provisions it at least ought to be income derived from investment that is of a go-go nature. Therefore if one buys and invests in a mine or a business or buys shares that have some input into the job creation activity of Canada and there has been a risk taken, then there is some justification. My friend from Bird's Hill will agree there is some justification for giving a bit of a break.

But surely if one just buys a piece of land and it goes up in value, that is a different matter. There is no gain. No jobs are created. There is nothing done there. There might possibly be a job for the lawyer handling the purchase, possibly a job for the lawyer handling the sale and possibly a job for the real estate agent, but there is really nothing that makes Canada grow. It is a static investment.

My friend from London though is speaking of the small investment like the duplex or the store, something of that nature. He will know that under the other provisions of the Income Tax Act capital cost allowances, mortgages and all the rest of it are deductible from the earnings of those businesses to the extent that an income can be made, losses can be claimed and tax is not paid on the losses. There is a profit in that business, albeit small, but it is a profitable business.

That type of business is a business purchased for that reason and when the assets are sold gains tax should be paid on it. If it is incorporated, gains tax is paid. If it is held as an unincorporated amount then the $100,000 has previously been allowed. But surely that $100,000 exemption ought not to be allowed here because the property only goes up in value by the speculative increase in the market, not by anything that is done to the property to make it go up in value.

• (1300)

Real estate is different from investing in stocks or shares in a market oriented company. In a market oriented company shares can go up in value because the company produces profits. It moves ahead. The company retains growth because it does not distribute its earnings to its shareholders but retains those earnings. The company ploughs those earnings back in and it makes things grow.

Real estate is not like that. You buy a duplex and you rent it out. You maintain it presumably, but it does not grow in value. It may increase in value because of the general inflation in the area, but it does not grow in value by the work, the effort, the energy of the company like a stock does. It grows in value only for one reason. That is because of inflation and that is because the location may be more desirable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it being one o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made Monday, March 29, the House will now proceed to resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Prime Minister for the second reading and reference to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope of Bill C-116, an act to provide for greater certainty in the reconciliation of the personal interests and duties of office of public office holders, to establish a Conflict of Interests Commission, to amend the Parliament of Canada Act and to make consequential amendments to other acts.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, March 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mulroney that Bill C-116, an act to provide for greater certainty in the reconciliation of the personal interests and duties of office of public office holders, to establish a Conflict of Interests Commission, to amend the Parliament of Canada Act and to make consequential amendments to other acts, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few things about Bill C-116. I served on the joint committee that looked at Bill C-43, which was the previous bill introduced by the government to deal with conflicts of interest as it applies to members of Parliament and ministers.

Let me start by saying that the House of Commons represents the people of Canada. Those who are elected to the House of Commons do so through a process which involves their political parties. In the case of independent members, the independent will go directly to the constituents.

I want to stress that at no time has it been my experience that the people in any riding across this country have ever put a gun to the head of an individual and said: "You must run". I have never known of anyone, and it is not in the historical experience of this House that any individual was ever forced to be a cabinet minister.

No one is forced to seek office in the House of Commons. In fact, in order to come here candidates actually court the electorate in elections. Therefore it is at the disposition of the electorate that we sit in this House. It is at the behest of the people of Canada that we are elected. It is a privilege for us to be here representing the people of our country and, in my case, the people of Nickel Belt.

I want to say that because when we deal with conflict of interest we have to recognize there is a tendency and temptation to suddenly become very righteous once we become members of Parliament.

• (1305)

When we are running for office it is not unknown to have a family portrait and to include the dog in the family picture. They say every politician should have a dog. They try to portray themselves as wonderful family persons.

Candidates do that. They are very open when they are running for office. They will tell anything about themselves. They will tell how many times they smoked paper and inhaled it. One of them said: "I smoked paper, but I did not inhale it". The other one said: "I did. I cannot tell a lie. I enjoyed it". They are very open, want to disclose everything. Nobody asked them to and they are willing to disclose.

It is positively indecent. Some of them should be arrested and charged with exposing all these things that one would consider before they sought office as private. Sorry, it is a family show.

They are elected to the House of Commons and suddenly the curtain of secrecy descends. No more willingness to disclose. The prevailing principle is for me to know and for the public to find out. That is the prevailing principle once elected to the House, and when they get into the cabinet do they ever do things.

We had one fellow here. He put all his holdings into a blind trust. The only problem was the blind trust was his wife. That was permissible. I know love is blind, but how can a blind trust be blind when you sleep with the same person who holds your blind trust.

Mr. Blenkarn: As long as the lights are out.

Mr. Rodriguez: No, I am sorry, that is not true. No, it is not true. The hon. member said that we are all a bunch of crooks. No, it is not to say that. How was it when we were running for office we were so willing to disclose. Now we are elected and suddenly a curtain of secrecy has descended.

I want to put the Prime Minister on the record. In 1987 the Prime Minister warned would-be MPs, those who would be MPs: "You had better be ready to open your life and books to the public. We are going to be as clear-cut and brutal as we can". That was the Prime Minister. He established a very high standard. Then we got Bill C-46 and before it we got Bill C-114. Then we got Bill C-43 and now we have Bill C-116.

There is no doubt being in the House of Commons, being a minister of the Crown, being a parliamentary secretary, that on occasions conflicts will arise. We recognize that, but the question then has to be asked: How do we deal with situations (a) to avoid the perception of conflict and (b) when there is a conflict how do we deal with it? It is where the private interests of the member interfaces with the public interest. When there is a conflict it must be resolved in the public interest. It means that we must put in place a regime to avoid as much as possible the possibility of conflicts arising.

The government once again in the dying days of a Parliament introduced Bill C-43. A joint committee was struck to look at that bill and it was lead by the member for Mississauga South as one of its co-chairpersons.

When we started out it was very interesting. There were members on the committee who subscribed to Mitchell Sharp's position that we should return to the era of C. D. Howe. It was a kinder, gentler era. Nobody accused C. D. Howe of having a potential or possible conflict when every day while he was a minister of the Crown he would take out his stocks and bonds and see how they were doing on the market at the same time he was minister for everything in the government.

There are members sitting in the House who subscribed to that, but to give them credit and to salute them I want to say that as we proceeded through the witnesses there was a very perceptible change. There was agreement that we could do better than Bill C-43. We came to an agreement and submitted our report to the government which was in effect a rewriting of the bill.

To start we did not see two regimes in the House of Commons. We did not see two regimes for resolving conflicts of interest. We did not see two regimes for reporting assets and liabilities of members. We saw what? We recommended a jurisconsult and that all members be subject to the jurisconsult. We would have one set of rules that applied to all members, parliamentary secretaries and ministers. We felt that was the way to provide some uniformity in the rules.

What have we discovered in the creation of Bill C-116? We see the creation of two bureaucracies, a bureaucracy called the commission with a commissioner for ministers, parliamentary secretaries and public servants, and for the ordinary garden-type member of Parliament, a jurisconsult.

There is a problem here. This is the Siamese twins of conflict of interest except they are not joined at the head. They are joined at some other part of the anatomy because from time to time there is an overlap. From time to time a minister would have to consult with the jurisconsult, not with the commission or the commissioner.

This would be creating a conflict of jurisdiction. The bill as we know it is riddled with terminological conflicts and definitions that do not mean the same thing to the two bureaucracies. For example, we had the minister check to see if he had a possible conflict of interest when an issue comes up in cabinet or within his jurisdiction. He then comes to the jurisconsult. He does not go to the commission.

How would the jurisconsult know if the minister has a conflict when the minister did not declare his assets and liabilities to the jurisconsult? He declared them to the commission. He has a problem.

• (1315)

The committee did not recommend that. We also have a problem with the question of recusal. The committee recognized that we should create the atmosphere in which the public has the assurance that we are acting in the spirit of the legislation which is the avoidance of a conflict or of the appearance of a conflict.

I will use these interchangeably because when Justice Parker looked at the Sinclair Stevens case he said even if there is an appearance of conflict there is conflict. In other words, if there is smoke there has to be fire.

Therefore on the question of recusal it is very important to honour the spirit of any conflict of interest law, the spirit of trying, attempting and satisfying the public that the public office holder has attempted to avoid the appearance of conflict.

Recusal means that if an issue comes up in committee, in the House or in the cabinet, a member may have a conflict because for example we are dealing with the Bank Act and he owns more than one-third or 10 per cent of a bank. He then has to declare the interest. He has to declare the conflict. He has to remove himself or herself from the discussion of that particular change to the Bank Act and avoid voting on the issue.

It is not difficult. When I was a municipal councillor I did it. It is incumbent upon municipal councillors all across this country when an issue comes up to declare a conflict and remove themselves from debate and voting on that issue.

We recommended recusal for members and for ministers. We do not know what is going to happen behind the curtains of secrecy that shroud the class of ministers, public servants and parliamentary secretaries. We know for ordinary members there is no requirement for recusal.

It is interesting to note that in the conflict of interest laws in the United States, Ontario, Manitoba, la belle province and in many other jurisdictions, there is requirement for recusal. When a matter comes up where there is a conflict between a minister and the issue, between the member and the issue, that minister, that member, that parliamentary secretary, that public servant must recuse, must declare the interest and remove themselves. We do not have that in Bill C-116.

When we drafted our recommendations for the government we were even-handed in the way we treated those who held cabinet positions and those who were ordinary garden-fry type MPs. In this bill, it seems to be tougher for the MPs than the ministers, the parliamentary secretaries and the public servants. Let me explain what I am talking about. It is the question of disclosure.

Justice Parker said in his report on the Sinclair Stevens affair that full disclosure is the cornerstone on which any modern conflict of interest bill is built.

When we did our report on Bill C-43, the member for Mississauga South will remember we wanted disclosure and everybody treated the same. In Bill C-116 ministers, parliamentary secretaries and public servants will report to the commission. We do not know what they will report. It is not spelled out in the bill. Then the commission will draw up a summary and it may or may not be available for public scrutiny.

• (1320)

On the other hand, it specifies what the disclosure is going to be for the members. Certainly we never envisaged anything other than those assets that are purely personal. Justice Parker recommended that personal things such as your mortgage, RRSP funds and car loan ought to be excluded from disclosure. That is in line with what Justice Parker recommended with respect to the Sinclair Stevens affair.

When it came to spouses, there was a co-extensive disclosure for spouses of MPs.

An hon. member: You would treat them as chattels, would you?

Mr. Rodriguez: No. Once again, nobody twists your arm when you want to get into the cabinet. You have to know the rules of the game. We recommended that the spouses of the MPs and ministers would be required to declare what their holdings were and those of their dependent children.

What does this bill say? It does not require—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Your time has expired.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): In all fairness to my friend and colleague, I will make sure I do not use all my time so one of the senior members can participate in the debate. I am referring to the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants, a good friend.

It is a conflict of interest because I have known his father for so many years that I owe it to him to give him some time during the debate. I do not want to make any comments. I would just like to participate in the debate.

[Translation]

I sat on that committee, which I consider to be a very important one. For the sake of our listeners, perhaps I should explain what we mean by committee. It is a place where members can work in peace and quiet, or at least in as much peace and quiet as they can muster, on very important legislation. For instance, I am now on the electoral reform committee, which has been sitting for hundreds of hours so far. This kind of thing does not make the headlines. It is a serious business and it is the same kind of work we did when a government bill, Bill C-43, was submitted to us on December 12, 1991. In any case our first meeting was held on that date.

We met 26 times. We examined the bill and called experts who appeared before the committee for long hours at a time. We met witnesses, dozens of them, and I may add that one of the members of our committee who did excellent work was the newly elected Premier of Prince Edward Island. Yes, Ms. Callbeck, my colleague, was a member of this joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons.

• (1325)

Perhaps I should explain as well that in French comité mixte does not mean a committee consisting of men and women, but of senators and members of the House of Commons. There are several senators and several members of the House of Commons, and one of those members was Ms. Callbeck who finished her work on the committee and who yesterday was elected Premier of Prince Edward Island. I am sure all my colleagues will want to congratulate her.

[English]

As I was saying, Ms. Callbeck, a lady of great experience was elected premier of Prince Edward Island yesterday. I am sure the co-chair, the hon. member for Mississauga South and the hon. Senator Stanbury will join with me in giving her our best wishes.

[Translation]

I explained more or less what a joint committee is and what a committee does, which is serious business, unlike the circus we often see in the House, which tends to give Canadians a poor impression of the kind of work federal members of Parliament do, five days a week and almost ten months a year. Now our sitting days have been shortened, but we are still sitting five days a week. That compares very favourably with the schedule of provincial legislatures.

We sat on this committee because we felt it was not any easier to legislate the honesty of parliamentarians than to legislate morality. Since some people, as soon as they see members in a position of strength—and even more so in the case of senators, ministers and parliamentary secretaries—imagine that all these people are there to get rich. We had to restore public confidence through legislation. These bills will not eliminate the problem altogether, however, and the public has a responsibility to remain vigilant.

As I have always said, the national media have a watchdog role. They must ensure that parliamentarians do what they were elected to do: pass good bills for the people of this country, although occasionally they may be tough, and that they do not in any way take advantage of their position to increase their personal wealth or that of their spouse or dependents.

I have seen quite a bit in the course of my political career, and I must say I feel uncomfortable, as a member of this committee, drafting a bill that says that from now on there will be fewer temptations. The temptations will always be there. But who often puts us in that kind of position? The people who hope that we can use our position to fill their pockets.

This bill is not perfect. I must make that clear. It is our fourth try. The hon. member for Sudbury and the hon. member for Nickel Belt, from northern Ontario have pointed out there had been another bill before. For those who are interested in that sort of thing, we had Bill C–46, Bill C–114 and Bill C–43, which we examined and scrutinized and on which we made some major recommendations to the House. The government based Bill C–116, the bill we are considering today, on this report by the parliamentary committee of the Senate and the House of Commons.

I support this bill. Whenever I travel abroad on official duties and have a few hours of free time I take advantage of that time to study, for instance, the question we are talking about today, the conflict of interest legislation. On another occasion it might be the Canada Elections Act, since my whip appointed me to that committee as well and I have a special interest in the matter. There is also the matter of parliamentary associations, because I am a firm believer in the principle that parliamentarians should know what is going on in the world. So at no cost to the state I use my free time, rather than for shopping or sightseeing, to visit different legislatures in the world where my duty calls me and to study them.

In Australia, I discovered a simple bill. I am one of those who want this bill to be clear, simple and straightforward, so that people can understand it on first reading, take it in and say, "I am satisified; it is reasonably acceptable."

That is why Australia, for example, has a bill requiring all parliamentarians to own up. After they have confessed in private, the official in charge, called a jurisconsult or commissioner, tables in Parliament in the usual way the potential conflicts of interest that parliamentarians may have so that the public and the press can be aware of them.

I have never believed and never will believe that we shoul qualitatively describe any fortune parliamentarians might have or put figures on it that would unduly excite people who might make comparisons like "my MP is richer than another" or "my senator is richer than someone else". I do not think that is what the people want to know. People want to know about any apparent conflicts of interest.

What we are doing is distinguishing between the quantitative and qualitative aspects. It is unnecessary for the public to know the exact figures, but it is very important for the commissioner and the jurisconsult to know exactly what a member might have and what he or she might owe, because debts are always dangerous; they can lead to conflicts of interest.

In an ideal world, it would be better not to have such legislation, and I am very conservative on this subject. Unfortunate incidents have occurred, but in spite of everything, I still say how proud I am to be a parliamentarian. When people ask what I do, I do not hide that I am a member of Parliament. I do not have to apologize. I am not ashamed because some Canadians these days are annoyed with us. They have to take it out on somebody and they go after the most important institution, in my opinion, the parliamentary system. That is bad. Just because unemployment is too high or people are unhappy about inflation, the sales tax, some government policies or certain leaders, does not mean that they have to take it out on the system which governs us. It is still a good system. I often regret that people get it all confused and destroy the credibility of the parliamentary system.

I urge my colleagues, in a non–partisan way, to read yesterday's Hansard because I find that it summarizes our thinking very well. For members and other people who want to read it, it is Issue No. 229 of Hansard for Monday, March 29. I would like them to read the excellent presentation made by our committee chairman, the member for Mississauga South, and the statement of my friend and colleague, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, who was very generous to me in mentioning my work on the committee. Of course the press does not know about it because we sit quietly without making a noise. As you know, making noise does not always do the most good. Those who shout the loudest are not necessarily right. I also suggest that they read the remarkable presentation of the hon. member for Oshawa. I think that those three speeches yesterday summarize very well the work that was done.

We have concerns, we hope and believe the time will come to consider in committee.

[English]

I hope the House will accept the recommendation of our able chairman, the member for Mississauga South, and create a special committee of both Houses, the Senate and the House of Commons. We worked together for a long time and produced a report. The report gave birth to Bill C-116. It has a long title. I am told it could be shorter by saying it is a bill that will try to avoid conflict of interest of ministers, parliamentary secretaries and hon. senators in one group and elected members of Parliament who are not in responsible positions in another.

• (1335)

I hope the government will still be open to polishing it up at the committee level. I see our chairman, the hon. member for Mississauga South and hon. Senator Stanbury, the co-chair. It is not always easy to work with the chairman but it is very exciting to be a member of any committee he chairs. He is a tough man but some of us are equally tough and can endure it. I wish to thank him for the good job he did. He sometimes tried to stampede us, but those who like to be stampeded are just stampeded and those who can resist do resist. I hope to qualify in the last category.

I would like to take two more minutes to make something clear in the minds of the press and the people. The press is the intermediary in our parliamentary system, the power of the people. You have to understand that my colleague and I do not want to put the members of Parliament above the law. It has nothing to do with that.

[Translation]

As the member for Oshawa said so well yesterday, and you should read what he said, members of Parliament must not be above the law for anything of a criminal nature. I would never support a bill that would treat us differently from the rest of the population in criminal matters. If any of us commits a crime, the law is there to come down as hard, not necessarily harder, but as hard as for any crime someone might commit.

This is a special situation here, because we are elected members of Parliament or senators. Some members, because of their position as a minister or parliamentary secretary, might hear some things or see some documents or be able to use confidential information that they obtained through their position here in Parliament. This bill is to ensure that these people do not profit unduly to enrich themselves or their family and friends. Naturally it is called the Conflict of Interests Act.

I am very serious when I say that I do not like to hear about all those wonderful laws in the United States, as my committee chairman knows. I get annoyed every time I hear about them. I say: "Please do not talk to me about a system that may not be the best example in the world to follow". If anyone has conflicts of interest it is our southern neighbours. I do not like comparisons about the Elections Act, campaign spending limits and especially the famous conflict of interests legislation. I have the feeling that they always have conflicts of interest, so I do not like the comparison. I want something that is essentially Canadian and draws on the best of other political systems in the world. Then I think we can honestly come back to the House and say that we have done our duty in an honest way and produced a bill that will be revised over the years.

I admit that what we will produce is better than what exists. I admit that what we will produce will not be as good as what our successors can do. But it is a start in the right direction and I hope that people will stop being cynical about politicians because, after all, we were all elected from various political parties by the people and the time is coming when you will again be able to choose your representatives. I would like this bill to be implemented and I hope that we do not give up this work.

[English]

I hope the chairman will be tough if he is chairman again and he should be chairman again. He should be tough to make sure this law becomes law before the end of this Parliament.

[Translation]

In conclusion, we have an excellent system in Quebec to deal with conflicts of interest.

• (1340)

Again, I say in all modesty that what we are proposing is a good imitation of what the provinces are doing. We are suggesting a jurisconsult, just as the Quebec National Assembly has, and a commissioner, like Mr. Evans in Ontario. I want to pay tribute to him and to Mr. Justice Mayrand as well. They are above suspicion. I think that is the key to success in applying this law. The first jurisconsult to be chosen, who will become an officer of the House of Commons, should be above suspicion and earn the immediate confidence of the public. That will be a good beginning.

In the parliamentary committee and in my first speech I suggested having someone with the reputation of Mr. Justice Mayrand or Malouf or former senior officials of the Department of Justice who, once they are appointed, will inspire the confidence that the public is asking or seeking from Parliament.

I hope that the commissioner who will be chosen—and I will have some suggestions to make about that—will be above suspicion. I hope that the system will be administered impartially, in the same way for all. I am not too fond of the dichotomy which seems to come out of this bill, but I really hope that when we review it we can make improvements and the government will agree to receive amendments.

[English]

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I too want to share in some of the thoughts expressed here earlier. Certainly I can relieve the anxiety of the hon. member for Saint-Denis, who is one of the more venerable members and certainly second to the dean of the House. I was interested in his comments.

I think part of my problem with this bill is that my colleague and I have been here a few years and came in under totally different regimes when there was certainly a different reflection of the public will on the thoughts of members. I will come to that later. The hon. member complimented the co-chair of the joint committee that produced a unanimous report earlier on Bill C-43. Then the government came up with this bill which is a blend of aspects of Bill C-43 dealing with public office holders and another part in Bill C-116, which we are now dealing with, which affects members of Parliament.

The hon. member for Saint-Denis was hoping the chairman and government would not move so quickly. I know the issue of conflict of interest has been around for a long time. The public feels there is a fundamental flaw in the whole system because somehow members and/or ministers have got in trouble, as they have historically since Confederation in this jurisdiction and other jurisdictions across the way. As members have said before me "you cannot legislate all the time to cover the sometimes innate sin and guilt of mankind" although churches preach about it often on Sundays across the nation. But that does not mean we do not need a conflict of interest law in terms of public office holders.

It has not been mentioned here today that the Parliament of Canada Act has a section which deals with members of Parliament who may not vote on matters where they are personally going to benefit. They have to declare their interest and/or abstain. This comes from the British mother of Parliament system. That seems to work over there and it works pretty darned well. There is a character and integrity involved that somehow we as a younger country have not quite inherited.

The member for Mississauga South showed very interesting parliamentary diligence when he had the House agree unanimously yesterday to a motion on Bill C-116, which just came on the floor of the House yesterday afternoon at 4.10 p.m. and the House adjourned at 5.28, that between 1 and 1.55 today all debate and matters are to be disposed of in terms of Bill C-116, which affects every member of Parliament and every senator. The Senate will have its time, of course, to debate it.

• (1345)

In effect, as I compute the matter in old-fashioned arithmetic and not the computer, that is one hour and eighteen minutes yesterday and 55 minutes today for a total of just two hours and a few minutes on a bill that affects us all.

I agree with the member for Saint-Denis. I hope all members and/or the secretaries who may be tuned in to this television look at the debate yesterday on the generalities developed by the hon. member for Mississauga South and the spokespersons for the opposition, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and the spokesperson for the NDP, the member for Oshawa, who taunt the generalities.

I hope members will go further so when this matter gets to a committee, be it a joint or whatever, they look at a document I got out of the library prepared by Margaret Young of the Law and Government Division of the Research Branch of the Parliament of Canada. It is a legislative summary of this bill and she covers the generalities well. There are many good works done in the Research Branch of Parliament. I commend this 31-page document that reviews the general problems of this issue of balancing public duty with the privacy of the person when you are in the public domain.

I know the potential co-chair of the committee touched on the issues in a very general way in his comments yesterday, but this document deals with many specifics, some of which put a higher onus on the member than the office holder. The old C-43 was drafted onto the new 116, and there are some elements in there which I think all members would be concerned about. I certainly hope the committee knows that the member from Mississauga South shows interest in this and he has been at this for some time. He will look closely at this legislative review done by our impartial library and hopefully redress some problems there that I think even he may be unaware of at the present time.

I know the member for Mississauga South, under the rule, has a motion to help move this along. All members want this moved along, but quite frankly there can be a delusion in this conflict of interest bill. Fundamental good work is not developed in members if there is some cancer in their moral id that is going to permeate their public business. You can have all the rules and regulations you want.

I have been in this Chamber for over 25 years and you can pervert or prostitute any rule of procedure and/or almost any rule or regulation that is not in the criminal domain unless you have some character, integrity or common good sense. I have heard what the members have said here and I know the members spent a lot of time on this in the committee, but we are developing two parallel bureaucracies that the member for Saint-Denis touched upon, to try to define the ethics and morals that members are supposed to follow. We are doing this in reaction to the public and/or media negative element that has cast a cloud over members of this House.

I am not going to get political, but in my 25 plus years as a member of Parliament, I honestly do not know where I have run into a potential conflict of interest. I would like to know from the member for Nickel Belt, as a member of Parliament, what conflict he has run into in discharging his duty. The member for Mississauga South is a lawyer and has business interests. I still would venture that he has not run into potential conflicts but one is never to ask a question unless one knows the answer so I am only asking rhetorically at the present time.

The point is that the tone and the climate of the House of Commons and how members and the government discharge their duties is really set by the Prime Minister and/or the cabinet and there is a world of difference between a member of Parliament and a cabinet minister or a parliamentary secretary. Something that is not even covered in this bill is deputy ministers or heads of some of the important government agencies. These individuals along with deputy ministers and/or ministers and parliamentary secretaries do have information and do come across facts that could further their private interests.

I know this is perhaps not the politically correct thing and the member for Nickel Belt cast aspersions on this on another day when the Hon. Mitchell Sharp gave evidence before the committee. I was in this House of Commons when the Hon. Mitchell Sharp was not only the then Liberal government House leader but he was the Minister of Finance. To me he was one of the more—and he still is because he is still very much alive and with it—honourable ones in the days when I used to believe that the Liberal government was infallible. The days of infallible Grit rule were forever because they had not been beaten for 20 or 30 years.

When I first came here as a young pup there they all were, not C. D. Howe, but Mr. Pearson, Mr. Sharp, Mr. Winters and many others. They were all fine Canadians. I do not know what happened then but the element of conflict of interest did not seem to make all the headlines because the Prime Minister of the day and the cabinet of the day stayed out of trouble. Even then there is a world of difference between cabinet members and their responsibility and their potential power of advancing themselves with confidential information over the rest of this House.

I will read in effect what Mr. Sharp said among other things before the committee: "I was a senior civil servant for 16 years and privy to inside information from which I could have benefited if I had put my private interests ahead of my public responsibility. For another 13 years, I was a minister of the Crown. Again I was an insider making decisions and aware of decisions being made collectively by the cabinet from which I could have benefited if I had put my private interests ahead of my public responsibilities. For a couple of years after I left cabinet in 1976, and before I resigned my seat in 1978, I was generally regarded as an ordinary MP. I was no longer an insider. I did not have access to any information on future government decisions from which I could have profited that was not publicly available."

I will just conclude this part of what I want to say. What Mr. Sharp said before the committee with his vast experience both as a distinguished public servant, a very distinguished minister of the Crown and then in effect a backbencher before he got out of the whole business was that there was in effect a world of difference. What we know here we find out almost the same way as when he says one reads it in the paper or hears it over the news.

That is one of the philosophical problems I have with equating this even in the one bill. I know there are two regimes. Perhaps there should be two bills, one to look after ministers, parliamentary secretaries and public office holders, including deputy ministers and heads of government organizations, and then one for the members and senators who do not have the same access to information to in effect have the conflict.

The other element of the bill that I really seriously hope the committee takes a very close look at in the closing two minutes I have is the whole question of the spousal declaration of her or his interests. I know they have wrestled with this. I am still unsatisfied with the way this bill is. It just boggles the mind on this International Day of the Woman or International Year of the Woman and all this advancement quite properly of the woman to make that person equal in society in every which way, that we are going to put into a bill a part that says that in effect a member can do what he wants to do but if the member is a man then his wife must disclose whatever interests she may or may not have.

Mr. Speaker, as you well know, there is a reverse side to this that organizers getting ready for the next election might run into. We all know that there are a lot more women who should be in this House. You are going to have the interesting situation in effect of campaign organizers going to the woman of very eminent Canadians who may have business interests to ask them to run.

• (1355)

Some parties have quotas. They want 25 per cent or 50 per cent as women. They go to that lady and they say: "Mrs. Brown you have to run for us". She talks to her husband over supper that night and Mr. Brown says: "Well, Matilda, I would like you to be a member of Parliament but there is no way. You do not know what I do. You know I am a big business man. You have not seen my books. You do not know what my finances are. You do not know that I may be in a state of personal bankruptcy that I do not really want to tell my competitors about. I would rather that you would not run. I do not understand why as a member your declaration that you are not going to commit any crime or have a conflict of interest should affect me".

I seriously hope that the committee gets to this. I could give many chapters and verses of how this is a complete negative reaction to what we have tried to do here to make the genders equal. Here we are putting them right back in the Dark Ages with this type of regime.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you might find there is consent for the following motion:

> That, a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed for the committee stage consideration of Bill C–116, an act to provide for greater certainty in the reconciliation of the personal interests and duties of office of public office holders to establish a Conflict of Interests Commission, to amend the Parliament of Canada Act and to make consequential amendments to other acts;

That the Order for resuming second reading of Bill C-116 be amended by having the bill referred to the Special Joint Committee rather than a Legislative Committee in the Departmental envelope;

That the said Special Joint Committee be composed of 14 members of the House of Commons, and 7 members of the Senate;

That the Standing Committee on House Management appoint the membership of this House of the Special Committee and present its report no later than five sitting days after the adoption of this order, which report shall be deemed concurred in upon presentation to the House of Commons;

That changes in membership of the said Special Committee be effective immediately after notification signed by the Member acting as the Chief Whip of any recognized party has been filed with the Clerk of the Committee;

That the said Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons; to send for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses; to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That a quorum of the Committee be a majority of members, whenever a vote, resolution, or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, I just have a question for the hon. member. Will independent members be able to put questions to this committee? Will they be allowed a certain period of time or will that apply only to the Official Opposition and to government members?

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, there is no particular problem. I suspect that the committee suggested will be the same joint committee that sat on the original study of Bill C-43.

I would hope the hon. member will come to that committee and be part of that committee. There is certainly no limitation on members coming to a committee.

Indeed, I personally believe it would be helpful if the member from his group in this House, while not a recognized party, will come and be part of that committee meeting. I think it is important that we represent well in this committee the whole House and the Senate because we are all going to be affected by this resolution.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to remind the House that every member of this House has the right to sit in on any committee meeting and participate in that meeting after the normal order of questioning. The member is quite free to participate.

• (1400)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 1.55 p.m., pursuant to order made Monday, March 29, 1993, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings now before the House and put forthwith, without further debate or amendment, every question necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of Bill C-116.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a special committee.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m. we shall proceed to statements by members.

WAR CRIMINALS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, in 1986 the Deschenes commission recommended the Criminal Code be amended to allow for the prosecution of war criminals.

I sat on the committee for Bill C-71, which led to the establishment of the war crimes investigation unit, and I looked forward to justice finally being served.

I am sorry to report more than six years later that although 300 people are under active investigation not one person has yet been convicted for crimes committed.

Today a delegation from the Jewish Students' Network is meeting here in Ottawa to discuss the government's commitment to pursuing war criminals and bringing them to justice. We would do well to emulate the dedication of these young people in their determination to ensure Canada is not a safe haven for war criminals. The wheels of justice must move faster.

We owe those who died in the Holocaust and the families and friends who survived to pursue the perpetrators of these heinous crimes. We must not forget.

LOBSTER INDUSTRY

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency. The lobster industry in southern Nova Scotia at the height of the season suffered the worst damage to gear since 1976 as a result of the storm of the century two weeks ago. As a result of the winter weather assessment of damage by the fishermen has been difficult.

I met with close to 50 fishermen in Yarmouth last Saturday. I have received 73 assessments of damages totalling $850,000 from Shelburne to Digby counties, and I am sure that there are many more.

The minister of fisheries has in the past provided assistance to fishermen: the weir fishermen in the Bay of Fundy, assistance for gearing up in the northern cod and lobster fishermen in P.E.I.

With more than two months to fish the lobster fishermen in southern Nova Scotia find themselves with reduced gear. These fishermen need help today. I call on the minister of fisheries to provide assistance so that they will not suffer more financial losses by not being able to go lobster fishing.

DUGALD COSTUME MUSEUM

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to commend the efforts of the Dugald Costume Museum, which is now celebrating its 10th anniversary.

The 10th anniversary is a little misleading in that this volunteer group actually started over 40 years ago. Its desire to preserve and display different types of clothing is unique and is also world leading in concept. The 15,000 volunteer hours annually demonstrate the depth and conviction of this community-based group.

I would like to invite all members of the House to visit the museum's 10th anniversary display, "Let's Dance". I know the time spent will be most enjoyable.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, in 1870 the Americans prevented the Canadian ship Chicora from entering into Lake Superior through their lock system.

An 1871 article in the Toronto Globe stated: "It is quite plain—that the Dominion of Canada cannot allow the Americans to have exclusive control of the means of water communication between Lakes Huron and Superior".

• (1405)

Thus a $4 million Canadian Sault Canal was built in 1895. Owing to a structural failure the canal has been closed to navigation since 1987. Attempts at obtaining funds for its restoration have been difficult.

However I am optimistic that a $5.9 million commitment from the Ontario NDP government, a commitment from the city of Sault Ste. Marie to do landscaping and road work and continued expressions of support from the Minister of Public Works could lead to the restoration of the lock.

Public Works has selected a recreational lock costing $11.75 million as its first choice option.

I call upon the Minister of the Environment to respond positively to this most significant initiative in Sault Ste. Marie.

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday I had the privilege of accompanying the Minister of Indian Affairs and the Minister of State for Transport to the launching ceremony of the $350,000 expansion of the Vancouver International Airport.

The Vancouver International Airport Authority, a not for profit corporation which took over operations from the federal government last year, has developed plans to build a new international terminal building and a new runway, both to be completed by 1996.

Full consideration is being given to the environmental impact of construction and special efforts will be made on the issues of noise reduction, habitat preservation and the maintaining of green spaces.

In addition, the federal government, through Transport Canada, will complement these new facilities by constructing a new control tower and an instrument landing system at a cost of just over $20 million.

It should be noted that the airport authority has devised a method of paying for the runway and terminal building improvements without depending on government grants, subsidies or guarantees.

Congratulations to Chester Johnson, chairman of the airport authority; David Emerson, president and chief executive officer of the authority; and all of the other people who have contributed to these plans to prepare Vancouver International Airport for the 21st century.

FIGHT AGAINST RACISM

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to congratulate members of Network Canada, an organization of Jewish young people who are here today to tell us about their fight against hate crimes and their concern about the growing number of groups that promote hate.

[English]

According to Klanwatch, an organization dedicated to monitoring racist groups, there are 46 known hate groups in our country. In fact their operations are so prevalent in Canada that Klanwatch dedicated an entire issue of its magazine to hate activities in our country.

Members of the network know that groups like White Aryan Resistance and the Klan are actively recruiting in our schools. We cannot sit back and do nothing.

It is about time that the new Minister of Justice and the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship concentrate their efforts on finding an effective means of controlling hate groups and eliminating them from our society.

BUDGET OF MEMBER FOR ABITIBI

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on February 18, 1993 I asked the Speaker of the House of Commons to freeze my member's office budget. On February 22, 1993 I declared in Parliament that I had refused to accept the 3.16 per cent increase in my main budget for 1993-94.

Today, to my satisfaction, I received a reply from the House of Commons that should be welcomed by Canadian taxpayers. My budget has been frozen at its 1992-93 level. On behalf of my Abitibi constituents, I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for accepting my request, and I will maintain the same services.

In Bill C-113, the government decided to make cuts in a number of federal programs and freeze the salaries of certain groups.

Today, I urge my Conservative, Liberal, NDP and Bloc Québécois colleagues to follow suit and help reduce government spending and the federal deficit.

MANOTICK LODGE 295

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, on March 27, 1993 I had the distinct honour of celebrating the 100th anniversary of Manotick Lodge 295 with members of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

It is with pleasure that I salute the present and past Grand Nobles, as well as their brothers and sisters of the Manotick Lodge, for their continued devotion in assisting their fellow persons in need.

The worthy causes they give aid to include the Osgoode Care Centre, the Canadian Guide Dog for the Blind, the Kars Fair Youth and the Arthritis Association, just to name a few.

I commend the Independent Order of Odd Fellows for giving its best efforts to the needy of the community. Odd Fellows of Manotick, thank you.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, if there is still any question about how the people of Prince Edward Island feel about the fixed link there was a very clear answer in yesterday's provincial election.

• (1410)

Ninety-five per cent of voters voted for parties in favour of the fixed link. Five per cent voted for the one party against the project. That is 95 to 5 in favour of the project.

Obviously, there were many other issues involved in the vote, but if there existed strong opposition yesterday was the opportunity for people to register their concerns or even stop the project.

During our legislative committee deliberations witnesses indicated that support for the link was growing. Yesterday's election seems to support that position.

With this clear message I again urge the government to make a determination under the recent court decision and proceed with the project.

CONSERVATIVE LEADERSHIP

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, you will remember that two weeks ago I entered my horse Slip Chaser into the Tory leadership stakes to be run in June.

Last Friday at the London fairgrounds Slip Chaser held a press conference to declare that he has been eating grass since he was born three years ago and he enjoys it, but he cannot understand why anyone would smoke it. He questioned his opponent's judgment about something so basic and suggested that delegates ought to seriously consider a candidate who knows what grass is for.

As for the GST, Slip Chaser declared it to be discriminatory on the grounds that it exempts medical services to humans but not horses. He would therefore abolish it.

In response to a question from reporters about his chances of winning the Tory leadership race Slip Chaser replied: "Given the opportunity to vote for the whole horse, I am confident that Tory delegates will elect me Prime Minister, the first whole horse to occupy the position".

CANADIAN NATIONAL INSTITUTE FOR THE BLIND

Mr. Ross Reid (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join today with people from across Canada in commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind.

Since 1918 the CNIB has been providing services to the blind and the visually impaired to ensure that they can be meaningful and contributing members of our society. Disability should be no limitation and the CNIB has led the way.

This morning in St. John's, Newfoundland some 400 people came together to celebrate the 75th anniversary of the CNIB. I know that all members of the House would want to join with them.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, while the UN gambles on the possibility of a negotiated settlement in the former Yugoslavia more than 120,000 people have been murdered and 20,000 women have been raped, some as young as four years old.

The confession of a Serbian soldier describes one of the 20,000 rapes. He said: "What I remember about the first woman I raped was that she was pretty. I only remember some of their names. Fatima was a nice woman. After raping her, I took her at gunpoint to the mountains. I stopped by a small bridge and I told her to get out. She walked about three metres away from the car and I just shot her. My commander told me it was good for morale to rape and kill Bosnian women".

This account is horrific. As a leader in the international community the Canadian government has a moral obligation to do more than just condemn these barbaric acts, it must lead in forcing the United Nations to take all steps necessary to stop these atrocities.

Why does this Parliament justify its silence by pointing to sanctions which have been insufficient and a no-fly zone that goes unenforced? When women and children are being raped and murdered, why has Canada lost its courageous and leading voice on the international stage?

God and history will judge us all very harshly for inaction in this matter.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the grave situation in war-torn former Yugoslavia.

For months now Bosnia-Hercegovina has been engaged in a bloody war, the details of which we are all unfortunately familiar with: the heinous ethnic cleansing, the rapes, the torture, the concentration camps, the famine and the wounded. The much vaunted sanctions seem to have no impact at all on the aggressor.

Canada has denounced the acts of violence and terror. We are providing peacekeeping troops and we are supplying emergency humanitarian relief.

Diplomatically, we have recognized the independence of Croatia, Slovenia and Bosnia-Hercegovina, and we believe that the people of the former republic of Macedonia have a legitimate claim to recognition.

At this time peace may be pending in Bosnia. The Muslim and Croat leaders have signed a UN-mediated peace plan, but the Bosnian Serb leader has not yet signed.

I suggest that the government's top priority should be to strengthen diplomatic relations with all peace-seeking parties and to further isolate the outstanding party in order to pressure the Bosnian Serb leader to sign.

Once peace has been achieved in the region then the Canadian government should establish diplomatic agencies in all recognized former republics.

FOOD AND DRUG REGULATIONS

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, when members of Parliament read their mail they will be well aware that the health food community does not like what Health and Welfare Canada is doing.

• (1415)

Specifically, they do not like schedule 705 of the food and drug regulations which will arbitrarily remove 64 herbs and botanical foodstuffs from health food stores. They do not like the harmonization article of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, article 708, restricting the availability of herbs they have used safely for many years.

They especially do not like restricting these foodstuffs to prescription use only as their availability and price will be taken over by the multinational drug companies.

Multinational drug companies have dictated that generic drugs be eliminated and now they are taking control of herbs and botanical foodstuffs.

ISRAEL

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, leaders of Canada's Jewish community gather in Ottawa today to welcome Israel's Minister of Foreign Affairs, Shimon Perez, and to strengthen the ties between Israel and Canada.

Israel, a dream for over 2,000 years, became a reality only 45 years ago in the aftermath of the holocaust. Its transformation from an arid desert to an advanced nation, in spite of wars, non-recognition by neighbouring states and continuing hostilities, is testimony to the ingenuity and commitment of the Israeli people.

Canada must continue as an enthusiastic partner in Israel's future by expanding our ties of trade and investment, fostering human rights and development and condemning the Arab boycott of Israel. We must not tolerate hate literature, neo-Naziism or any form of racism, and continue to pursue and bring Nazi war criminals to justice in Canada.

Above all else, a cornerstone of Canada's foreign policy must always be the security of Israel, the only democracy in the Middle East, and Canada's close ally and special friend.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

NATIONAL DEBT

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, last Sunday, the Minister of Finance again told the country there was one deficit and one taxpayer, thus continuing his alarmist comments about the size of provincial deficits.

[English]

The minister will know that the $5.8 billion he is planning to spend on helicopters is enough to clear the deficit of his home province of Alberta with enough money to spare to write off the combined deficits of Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and P.E.I.

If there is one taxpayer and one debt, why is there still a big spender across the floor?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is somewhat misleading in her assertions.

She is suggesting some $5 billion—and I correct her, it is $4.4 billion—is going to be spent in one year. That is not true. It is $4.4 billion spread over 13 or 14 years of which there are significant and positive economic spin-offs, benefits and jobs for Canadians. Most important, it will allow our Canadian servicemen and women the kind of equipment they deserve to carry out their important duties and missions.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, the government would rather borrow money to buy its choppers than chop its borrowing.

[Translation]

I have a supplementary question. Bill C-91, the drug patent bill, will increase costs for provincial health plans, making it even harder for the provinces to cut costs as required by the minister.

Will the minister cover the additional costs arising from the drug patent extensions he is imposing on the provinces so that Canada can maintain the universality of its health care programs? Will he end the universal indifference of this government to Canadians?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we have answered this kind of question many times before in this House.

The hon. member raises the issue of universality of health care programs. The government has never considered challenging the universality of medicare. On the contrary, I have stated many times that the government was standing by its commitments in this respect.

• (1420)

As usual the party opposite is trying to raise doubts in the minds of Canadians. However, I do not think the provinces or Canadians in general are concerned. This has no connection with Bill C-91, which was warmly received by Canada's research community, because it will finally give Canadians the ability to develop research skills, especially in the medical field, that will make it possible to keep Canadian researchers in this country. I believe that when you consider this aspect, Bill C-91 is well received by the country as a whole.

[English]

Ms. Guarnieri: Mr. Speaker, the minister must take his advice from Aunt Jemima because he sure loves to waffle.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Recently published Immigration Canada statistics reveal that in 1991 this government brought into Canada 56,000 immigrants who are listed as having no intention of working in this country. At the same time many highly educated and motivated young applicants are still being routinely rejected.

I ask the minister why he continues to claim that thousands of jobs are left unfilled for lack of skilled applicants when his policy is to import record high numbers of people who want no job at all.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, these are the very people who opposed the amendments we made to the Immigration Act in order to try to get into Canada the kind of people we need to help our economy. These people are talking about skills development yet they opposed Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, which has seen the activation of a massive amount of money to train people to get jobs.

I think we are on the right track. I take her question as an admission that they were wrong all along.

HELICOPTER PROGRAM

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

This government is in the fifth year of what the Prime Minister has referred to on many occasions as a four-year mandate. Even before the tabling of the budget in the House of Commons the government says it has no money.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister who is also the Minister of Finance why he is allowing his cabinet colleagues to hand out billions of dollars of contracts with the EH-101 helicopters, thereby committing future governments to these expenditures? Why is he doing that?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, talk about inconsistencies and contradictions. Every day members across the way get up in the House and ask us what we are going to do about jobs and the creation of new economic activity and employment.

Here is a classic example where we are not only going to improve our defence capability, but we are going to create jobs and economic spin-offs, skills in high tech and a world product mandate. Why is the hon. member arguing about that?

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I guess there will be lots of jobs for Tory lobbyists.

[Translation]

I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. A number of leadership candidates in his own party want the EH-101 helicopter contract cancelled. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether today he is prepared to announce a moratorium on all new contracts for EH-101 helicopters, as requested by a number of his own colleagues.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I made my position abundantly clear in the House on Friday, yesterday, today, and I will make it again right now.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, several groups representing rural Saskatchewan are in Ottawa today. They have brought concerns and frustrations that are reflected by all rural Canadians.

Despite the fact that the federal government has spent $12 billion to $15 billion in agriculture in the past eight years, 1,500 farmers are leaving the farm in Saskatchewan alone every year. The average farm income is expected to fall to about $5,000, a level not seen since the 1930s. Whether it be cuts to the Canadian Wheat Board or unilateral cuts to the Crow benefit, this government's programs have failed. Rural Canadians should be upset, urban Canadians should be upset and taxpayers should be upset.

I ask the agriculture minister: is the government planning to change its course? What plan does it have to bring about a new approach to developing programs that will bring hope instead of misery to Canadian farm families and to rural communities?

• (1425)

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I had a chance to attend not all but most of the submissions this morning. There is no question that there is a serious problem in Saskatchewan. I was impressed with the tone and some of the substance of the submissions. People were saying that they want to solve their problem within their fiscal means. There was a willingness to work together and to take a look at improving farm programs that we have. We have always taken that position as a federal government.

People were suggesting that they needed more education and more real training. I think over all there is a general recognition that no one group, whether it be federal or provincial governments or the producers by themselves, can do it all by themselves. That is the tone and that is the approach we have taken in this government to try to address this problem. That is the approach that we will continue to take, to work with many of the groups that appeared this morning before the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, one of the things that these groups all called for was co-operation. One of the things that groups from the western Canadian wheat growers to the National Farmers Union called upon was the need for a third line of defence payment. In fact this government once promised Canadian farmers that if a crisis developed in farming it would bring in a third line of defence payment to help farmers in crisis.

We need long-term programs to help farms and rural communities. We have to keep those farms and those rural communities around until such programs can be put in place.

I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if he plans to announce today whether he is planning to bring in a third line of defence payment for Canadian farmers now.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I said, there is no question that there is a need. But we are not going to solve the problem, and I think it came out this morning in committee, simply by throwing money at it. Some of the witnesses made that almost as a direct observation.

I say again, we want to continue to work with people. I would suggest that he encourage the government of Saskatchewan, his province, to work with the federal government to see if we can develop better financial assistance for farmers, better over-all security programs for income.

I do not think it is useful in Saskatchewan simply to stand up as a provincial government and say that the GRIP program is flawed and withdraw from it without coming forward with some ideas on how we can make it better.

We are going to try very hard to work with the Government of Saskatchewan. In the meantime, we should take some hints from what was said this morning at committee and realize that we have to work together and that there is a limit to the amount of money with which we have to work.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, since the minister is having great difficulty coming to grips with the third line of defence payment program, I wonder if he would reconsider some of the policies the government has announced recently. Would he agree to defer the 10 per cent cut to transport payments to railways, which means the farmer has to pay over $2 a tonne extra this coming year? Would he increase the initial prices, which was one of the proposals that was put in front of the meeting this morning? Also, will he promise to continue with interest-free cash advances, something that his government cancelled two or three years ago?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as a farmer the hon. member should know better than to make the last statement. Cash advances are still in effect for farmers. They were put in late. To listen to that member you would think that in fact they were cancelled, when in fact he knows better than that. He knows they were not.

Mr. Althouse: They are not in legislation. One year at a time.

Mr. Mayer: He wants to yell from his seat, Mr. Speaker.

With regard to initial payments, we are always willing to look at increasing initial payments. We have done it twice already this year. We said from the beginning when we formed the government over eight years ago that that was an ongoing policy. We will continue to do that.

He also talked about other things. Just let me say again that if he wants to make representations to the federal government he should go to his own province. Witnesses this morning said that the changes that were made in the Saskatchewan GRIP cost Saskatchewan producers something like $200 million to $300 million. If he wants to make representations to the federal government he should do it through his own ilk in Saskatchewan and see if he can get some results there.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): The same question on the same subject to the same minister, Mr. Speaker.

Members of this House learned this morning about the severe plight of many prairie grain producers in my part of the country. His own department now projects net farm income in Saskatchewan for this year at less than $5,000 per farm—$5,000 per farm. It is the lowest since the annus horribilus of 1938.

Will the minister tell us today about the timing and amount of his third line of defence deficiency payment? Will he be making that announcement before seeding begins very shortly?

• (1430)

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, most of us who follow this issue do not need to go to a committee to find out there is difficulty in the Saskatchewan farm economy. Some of us have been there for a long time and know some of the difficulties.

With regard to what we intend to do, let me say again, there is a considerable amount of money on the table put there by both the federal and provincial governments and the producers. The tone and the substance that I heard this morning of some of the things that were suggested are dead on. We have to work together to solve the problem. We need more education and training and we need better long-term planning. Nobody was in favour of ad hoc programs. That is the approach we intend to pursue.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, if I am correct, the minister was not present for the brief given by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool which is the largest farm organization in Saskatchewan and has been around the longest.

Is the minister assured that the tripartite stabilization program is compatible with the Dunkel income base proposals at the GATT? If not, will he indicate to the House today that he will implement an income base program this calendar year?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, just to correct him on the nuance, the longest serving farm organization we heard this morning was the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities. It came into being when Saskatchewan was formed in 1905.

I say again that we intend to pursue the course we are presently pursuing. That is to work with farmers and organizations together to develop the best possible farm program to support farmers in this time of need.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister.

The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool has estimated that the net farm income in that province will have a shortfall this year of $1 billion. That slashes in two the net farm income of 1992 which spawned the rally of 13,000 farmers in Saskatoon in January.

The minister is talking about co-operation. What the farmers need is cash. Is the minister going to bring forth an emergency assistance program before spring seeding this year?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I say again that we intend to do what we have been doing. That is to work with the amount of money that is presently on the table, that is contributed by both levels of government and by the producers, to see if we can design a program that will be of maximum assistance to producers. That is exactly what we intend to do.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the major farm organizations from Saskatchewan that made presentations today outlined the deficiency of the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, the government's major stabilization program. They outlined how net farm income is going to drop from over $650 million to some $238 million this year. They outlined clearly that this program is deficient.

Is the minister prepared to make major changes to this program so that these people can stay on their land and so that they can survive at this time when major trade wars are causing this tremendous slump in net farm income? Is he prepared to bring in changes to that program so that it will be adequate?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have said all along that we are prepared to consider any kind of changes. I do not know what he means by major changes. We would have to make a judgment on that, but certainly we are prepared to make changes and some pretty significant ones if everybody could agree on the changes and everybody could agree that they were going to be in the best interests of the people we are trying to serve.

If the hon. member has some specific ideas, we would be more than happy to hear from him. It is very easy for people to stand up and say that they find the GRIP program flawed and it has major deficiencies in it, but I have yet to have somebody come forward and tell me how they could improve it working with the same amount of money that we presently put into the GRIP program.

TRADE

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

This government has never fulfilled its promise to bring forward legislation that would ban large-scale Canadian water exports. Protection of Canadian water is a major concern to Canadians, particularly in my province of B.C.

Will the minister give an unequivocal answer today? Is this government prepared to introduce legislation that will prohibit outright large-scale freshwater exports and strictly regulate small-scale water sales such as those by tanker?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I thought we had dealt with that question through her colleague, the member for Kamloops. He asked the question on a number of occasions. I gave him some very clear answers which basically said that the large scale exports of water are not covered under the NAFTA. They are simply not covered under the NAFTA and that is made absolutely clear by the legislation that is before the House now.

• (1435)

My hon. friend is suggesting that we should go and negotiate something that no one else wants to negotiate. If that is what my hon. friend wants to do then I would say to her that she is trying to give away something that needs not to be given away.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the minister's confusion on this issue is distressing to all of us.

It is a fact that water is a tradable commodity under the free trade agreement with the U.S. and in the proposed deal with Mexico. His government refused to introduce domestic legislation to prevent water exports, yet the Conservatives have signed two trade agreements that will allow large scale water exports.

Will the minister finally come clean with Canadians and admit it is Tory policy to export Canadian water to the U.S.?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker let me quote if I might from the free trade agreement: "For greater certainty nothing in this act or the agreement except article 302 of the agreement applies to water. In this section water means natural surface and ground water in liquid, gaseous, or solid state, but does not include water packaged as a beverage or in tanks".

In other words, the only water that is covered in the free trade agreement is water that is in a bottle, water that is in a glass, water that is in a truck and water that people want to drink on the other side of the border that is not going in any other way except in a container like a bottle, a glass or a truck.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my friend the minister of fisheries. It has to do with his proposed fisheries reforms. His plan to create one board for the Atlantic fishery pits one province against the other, pits one sector against the other. What is even worse, the board is going to be accountable to absolutely no one.

I want to know what the minister is up to. Is he simply trying to insulate himself from criticism for fishery decisions? Why the mad rush to wash his hands of responsibility for the fishing industry?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, it certainly has taken some time for the hon. gentleman to catch on to what is up because this started with a discussion paper issued in November 1991. We are obviously not trying to railroad anything through either the House or the governmental system.

What is proposed is a board to undertake some of the responsibilities of the minister of fisheries of Canada with respect to issuing licences to allocations and as an enforcement agency so that we can better enforce the rules in the fishery. Rather than proceeding through the courts, enforcement will be done with respect to conditions that are violated by fishermen if they violate such conditions including conservation decisions.

The policy will still be made by the minister of fisheries and the department, but the board will undertake certain activities which up to now have been done by the minister who has complete and arbitrary power over these matters and who no longer wants it. He wants to be accountable and open to the public.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows full well despite what he just asserted that this board is not going to be accountable and open to the public. It is going to be accountable and open to no one.

The first thing this board needs if it is going to be useful is some kind of a process for redress. It would also need to be structured along provincial lines where the various fisheries are very different from one province to the other.

On this one would the minister swallow his pride of authorship, go back to the drawing-board, back off this demented twisted scheme and come up with an arrangement that better reflects the concerns of each of the Atlantic provinces and Quebec and the concerns of the fishing industry itself?

• (1440)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, there have been extensive consultations with provincial governments, all of whom support this with the exception of one, the Government of Newfoundland, the Edgar Bergen for whom Charlie McCarthy is now speaking. That is the only government opposing this on entirely fallacious grounds. Otherwise the industry generally is supportive of this. We have had a dialogue with them.

I just met with the industry of the Atlantic coast an hour ago. I met with the B.C. industry last week. Believe me, they all think this is a step forward, with the exception of Uncle Charlie Wells down in St. John's who is opposed to it. He wants something he calls joint management which has nothing to do with this topic at all, but which he hopes to use as an election ploy.

I am sure the hon. gentleman would not encourage him in that.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the minister of fisheries.

This past weekend I met with the chairmen of 14 fisheries committees on the Baie Verte peninsula. The chairmen of those fisheries committees on the Baie Verte peninsula unanimously asked me to convey to the minister of fisheries that they reject this proposal for a management board. They are not interested in elections and they are not interested in ploys.

In no other resource sector, be it forestry, be it mining, be it agriculture, does the minister responsible turn over his responsibilities to a board that is not accountable to anybody.

I want to ask this minister whether he believes that the capacity of fishermen affected by the northern cod moratorium to get justice this past year would have been fully utilized had there been a board rather than a minister who was answerable to fishermen to put in place a proper compensation program.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman received these suggestions from the fishermen that he says he received, then obviously they did not understand and he did not enlighten them as to what the true purpose of this board is.

This board is simply to undertake questions of licensing for example. Should the minister of fisheries be deciding on his own whether John Brown or John Smith should get a licence and not have to give any reasons for that? It would be much better to have a quasi-judicial board which will be able to see to these processes. After having hearings it will give its decisions in writing where everything will be on the public record, rather than some hoary old minister of fisheries, h-o-a-r-y by the way, making these decisions.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the minister of fisheries may think this is a laughing matter, but we are talking about a resource that is absolutely crucial to the economy of the province, in this case Newfoundland and Labrador, and the other Atlantic provinces as well.

The proposed new licensing policy of this minister would have the effect of eliminating from the fishery the fishermen who participated on the basis of a family partnership and have been in the industry for 25 or 30 years because of technical details. As it now stands those fishermen can appeal their being caught up in that web of bureaucratic red tape but under a new board they would be lost.

Does the minister recognize that fishermen, just like people in the agricultural industry, people in the forestry industry, people in the mining industry want to retain the ability to appeal directly to their elected representatives and to their government and not to some unaccountable board about their very livelihood?

Will the minister put aside this foolish and cowardly idea?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is confusing two matters. With respect to licensing there are going to be major changes made for the future. In the groundfish fishery we will license professional full-time fishermen who have a permanent attachment to the fishery. We can no longer afford the luxury of allowing anyone to go throw their nets in the water and fish. They will have to be certified and professional.

At the present time to whom do they appeal if they are turned down in a licensing application? To the minister. Does he have to give any reasons for his decision? No, he does not. To whom will they appeal in the future? To a quasi-judicial independent board which will have to give written reasons for its decision. I suggest they will be much better off out of the political circus and before quasi-judicial process than they are today.

• (1445)

Might I just say that we had Charlie McCarthy in the House and now we have Mortimer Snerd on the other side.

TRADE

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade.

While Investment Canada has been made a virtual toothless tiger in protecting Canadian high technology industry, the Americans have protected theirs well.

I want to ask the Minister for International Trade whether he would confirm that under provisions of the United States' trade law which are not subject to NAFTA or the FTA or to any challenge or any dispute settlement processes, the United States can block virtually any Canadian investment in the U.S. high technology industry by invoking even the slightest relationship to national security?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is grossly exaggerating the point in the question he has just asked.

There is a provision under U.S. law which is used very sparingly that relates to acquisitions which could be characterized as affecting national security. My understanding is that it has been used in a handful of situations.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I guess the Minister for International Trade has never heard of Sematech which is the United States' semiconductor consortium that controls 35 per cent of the international market. It is supported by the Pentagon and therefore excludes Canadian investment.

Maybe he has heard of the American high resolution television industry also supported by the Pentagon from which Canadian participation is excluded.

An hon. member: TV.

Mr. McCurdy: Television. Is it not clear to the minister that what we have is a very asymmetric deal? Canadian high technology can be bought left and right. The Americans just invoke national security which is everything and we are out of the game.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has used two examples. I think that counts as something like less than a handful.

If my hon. friend looks at the balance in the free trade agreement he will see there is a considerable degree of protection for large Canadian companies with assets over $150 million that the United States does not have.

We have that element of protection through Investment Canada. The United States does not have that.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

One way my community and other communities are trying to stimulate economic activity is by helping local people start their own businesses through entrepreneurship programs and training programs. However when these individuals go to banks and traditional institutions they are told that they do not fit within the traditional lending formula. The Small Businesses Loans Act will help, as will other measures.

I would ask the minister if he will consider this difficulty in his upcoming budget and take some steps to help communities such as mine establish community equity funds or venture capital funds which can be used to help finance existing businesses or new businesses that are innovative and can help our local economy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I particularly thank him for making reference to the changes that have been introduced to the Small Businesses Loans Act for which I thank all hon. members. I think everyone will agree that it is a vast improvement.

In so far as his question about community venture capital funds is concerned, I will take that as a representation. I should remind him that we have made changes to the way we treat RRSPs and also the activities related to the labour sponsored venture capital corporations which I believe has gone a long way in helping the important small business sector in providing capital for investment.

I appreciate the hon. member's interest and I assure him I will take his representation seriously.

TAXATION

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. As the minister knows labour unions in this country collect tax subsidized dues and earn tax-free income on their investments.

In 1990 Canadian and international unions collected $796 million in tax deductible dues. The cost in lost tax revenues to the federal and provincial governments could exceed $300 million a year. These same unions enjoyed $52 million in revenue on their invested assets all tax free.

Does the minister agree that the unions' tax status should be reviewed so that the tax system will be fairer and more equitable for all Canadians? Surely this tax loophole should be closed.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, union dues are deductible for much the same reasons as other professional membership fees.

The tax exempt status of unions is treated in much the same way as Canadian non-profit organizations. I appreciate however the hon. member bringing this to my attention.

I have noted the article in the newspaper outlining the very point which the hon. member raises in the House today. I will certainly examine it and get back to the hon. member.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House I tried to ask a question of the minister of health. He was away and I would like to try again today.

The suicide rate in the Nishnawbe-Aski Nation territory continues to be alarming to the rest of us. In the last year alone there have been over a dozen suicides in the Nishnawbe-Aski Nation.

From the beginning of this year until now there have already been seven suicides in the Nishnawbe-Aski Nation. The minister has received a proposal from the Nishnawbe-Aski Nation to put in place an inquiry into the suicide crisis in northern Ontario.

I would like to ask the minister who is in the House today whether he could tell us if he is prepared at this time to look at this kind of inquiry into this very desperate situation in northern Ontario?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe that all members of the House share the member's concern about the Nishnawbe-Aski Nation's problem of suicide.

The proposal made by Chief Morris, who I met with last week, talks about an inquiry with a format that would include disclosures by young people and would provide a safety net for these young people to assist them to cope with the potential effects of public disclosures.

It is a very delicate operation. We understand that when we ask young people to expose the problems they face, such as sexual abuse or that kind of issue, it can make it very difficult for them.

This morning I had a long discussion with the officials of the department. I decided that with the collaboration of the Government of Ontario and the nation itself I would be ready to move ahead with an inquiry if I had the guarantees that a few conditions are respected, that the young people involved will be assisted and it will be done in light of the consequences they face.

If it is fact that once again it will be the Government of Ontario and the nation itself I would be ready to say yes to the proposal.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer.

I would like to ask a very important question which relates to the inquiry and the effect it may have on the present crisis that we face.

It is well known that an inquiry could take up to 18 months. During this process it is incumbent upon the House and the department of health to understand that there are programs available now that we can put in place, if the resources are available, so that the crisis we are dealing with will not be delayed for 18 months as the inquiry is going on.

Would the minister be prepared to continue to fund and look at individual proposals from communities for crisis intervention programs so that we can continue with the work that we started last week at the suicide prevention workshop in order that the situation we are dealing with, the crisis of the suicides, will not go unresolved until the inquiry is over?

• (1455)

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, obviously the work being done will continue to be done.

I would like to correct something that Chief Morris said last week. He said that we have not done anything to alleviate the problems in the communities. For 1992-93, we have provided $1,400,000 to help the communities to deal with the problems and we will continue to do that.

As I said to Chief Morris last week, he should recognize the work done by the Government of Canada to help the community to deal with the suicide problem.

WESTRAY COAL MINE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government House leader.

Yesterday the minister stated that the reason for not releasing 25 pages of censored documents was because of the Privacy Act. We now know that that is not true.

Second, the minister said that the Government of Canada was co-operating 100 per cent with the commission of inquiry in Nova Scotia.

Earlier today the chief legal counsel of the Westray mine public inquiry said: "The federal government has not released all of its Westray mine documents to the inquiry".

Why has the government House leader and other members of the federal cabinet continually told members of the House that all of the documentation and co-operation was forthcoming from the Government of Canada to the commission of inquiry in Nova Scotia when in fact it was not?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, let me first deal with the hon. member's comment about the 25 pages.

How can we believe there are 25 pages missing when in fact yesterday the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte said that seven pages were missing from the CANMET report. That is quite untrue. All pages of the CANMET report were tabled with the commission on June 13, 1992. The whole report was tabled. How can we believe the hon. member when he says that there are 25 pages missing when he was wrong on this particular matter.

Concerning the commission, the federal government has co-operated fully with it. We have tabled over 7,000 pages with regard to this matter. We are going to continue to co-operate further. When the commission meets again we will be tabling further documents with it.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the government House leader.

The chief legal counsel of the Westray mine public inquiry goes on to state: "Specifically the inquiry does not have a copy of the memo to Energy, Mines and Resources' Minister, Jake Epp, entitled Federal Funding of the Westray Coal mine. The inquiry does have an incomplete copy of the CANMET report which was obtained from a source other than the federal government".

If that is not clear, unequivocal evidence of a cover-up, I do not know what is. I want to ask the government House leader or the minister responsible why they have misled the House by not giving us all of the information?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is talking about misleading the House.

He must listen to me very carefully. He is misleading the House if he says that the CANMET report, the nine-page CANMET report, was not released last June. It was, all nine pages of it were. For him to allege otherwise is to mislead the House.

TAXATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue.

The minister of health has been quoted extensively as saying that he favours the reimposition of the export tax on cigarettes to prevent the rapidly increasing smuggling of Canadian cigarettes back into Canada.

Will the minister respond yes to such a request, given that the first export tax of $8 a carton resulted in cigarette exports and therefore smuggling dropping 80 per cent in the month of March last year?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I just want to put before the House that what I said about the export tax on tobacco was that it was one of the possible options.

• (1500)

I did not say that I was for or against it. I said it was an option and it should be treated accordingly.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue knows that the tobacco companies are not helping in the fight against the smuggling of cigarettes.

Will the minister confirm that contraband cigarettes seized in Canada cannot be traced because all the tobacco companies are now shipping all cigarettes to one warehouse in Syracuse, New York to hide the real destination?

Why are tobacco companies allowed to give tacit support to illegal smuggling?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not totally agree with the premise to the hon. member's question.

It is true that the distribution system in the United States has been altered in recent months. As a result of that, the government as a whole is looking at various options to deal with the serious matter of tobacco smuggling into Canada. One of these is to call the cigarette tobacco manufacturers to the table once again to consider various issues and sundry matters.

In so far as the export tax is concerned, we have always kept that on the books as a condition of replacing it should the co-operation by the tobacco manufacturers not be there.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

It has become public that a number of government employees in the Department of External Affairs submitted false travel claims. It is estimated that the difference between the real and the submitted claims is in excess of $300,000.

Most recently it was reported that there will be no criminal charges laid in these cases of fraud. I would like to ask the minister why, with these very serious allegations against some public servants, charges are not being laid.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. friend that these are very serious allegations.

The government is obviously concerned when there is any allegation that taxpayers' dollars are being misspent. The RCMP completed a full investigation of the matter.

I am advised that the RCMP recommended that charges be laid. However, the Department of the Attorney General of Ontario has carriage of this matter and it has decided it would not be in the public interest to pursue charges.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of members of the Committee on Justice and Human Rights of the House of Representatives of the Kingdom of Thailand led by Mr. Prasob Butsarakam, first vice-chairman of the committee.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PRIVILEGE

CANMET REPORT

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The minister of tourism and small business during Question Period suggested to the House that I had misled the House during my comments. I hope when provided with all of the information the minister for small business will withdraw that allegation because it is false.

Yesterday I stated in the House and I read from Hansard that the reference to the CANMET report which I said was made public by the government last June and which we understood at the time was a complete document is missing seven additional pages as we now see under the Access to Information request.

In fact, with the request made under the Access to Information legislation we were provided with the nine-page report as is referenced by the minister.

We were also provided with a 10th page. The 10th page provided by the Access to Information commissioner states clearly that an additional seven pages of the CANMET report are excluded.

• (1505)

It says that all pages are excluded. It says that only item three of attachment is relevant to the request. The remainder is not relevant, excluded under 69(1)(g) and (a), pages 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, and 34. That is the statement I made yesterday in Question Period and this may be helpful to all members of the House.

Mr. John Merrick, QC, counsel to the commission of inquiry in Nova Scotia, has just completed a press conference in which he said—

Mr. Speaker: The difficulty the Chair has is that this is sounding very much like a question of different views of things. It is a matter of debate. I am having some difficulty in finding the question of privilege. If the complaint that the hon. member has is that somebody said that because of something a member said he was misleading the House, I have always had to draw the line between whether that was intentional or otherwise.

I notice the hon. member has not gone so far as to say the minister was saying he was intentionally misleading.

Mr. Tobin: He did say that.

An hon. member: Check the "blues".

Mr. Speaker: I may have to. If the hon. member is advising the Chair that his allegation is that the minister claimed that he, the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, intentionally misled this House then I will listen further.

Mr. Tobin: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think the "blues" will show in the context of the discussion back and forth that it is precisely what the minister said. I hope that with the additional information he will withdraw.

I will conclude because the matter is self-evident to anybody who looks at it reasonably. The legal counsel of the commission of inquiry, not the opposition, not a journalist, not a pundit, but the legal counsel of a judicial commission of inquiry has found it necessary today to call a press conference to respond to answers given yesterday by the minister responding on behalf of the government.

The legal counsel said today with respect specifically to the CANMET report, which is the report in question, that the inquiry does have an incomplete copy of the CANMET report that was obtained from a source other than the federal government. Regrettably the inquiry recently concluded that it had no option but to consider formal proceedings to resolve this matter of incomplete reports.

I am merely reporting the facts to the minister. If he has been misinformed by his staff I will accept that. However, I ask the minister, as an hon. gentleman, to withdraw the allegation that I have misled this House, deliberately or otherwise.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to respond to this question of privilege.

First of all, earlier in Question Period I said very carefully, because I wanted to make sure the House was not being misled, that if the member was saying we did not table the whole CANMET report then he was misleading the House. My understanding is that the whole CANMET report is nine pages. I can table the nine pages right here, Mr. Speaker, if you like.

Now he is saying something that surprises me. He is saying there are pages beyond the nine pages. I am not led to believe that there are any more than nine pages to the CANMET report. I would like to know the title of the tenth page that he is reading because it may be another document attached to the CANMET report.

Mr. Speaker: The issue here is clear enough and the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte has made it clear to me. I will check the "blues", and if the minister has said or imputed that the hon. member intentionally misled the House then I shall have to deal with it. I am going to check the "blues" very carefully.

There is another debate here which may very well be factual, or at least a disagreement on the facts. That is debate and I am not being asked to rule on what the facts are. I will take the hon. member's representation, along with the representation of the hon. minister, and consider it and return appropriately. Is the hon. minister seeking the floor further?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend and I do not usually disagree on things even though we are on different sides of the House on all sorts of matters. I would also like to take into consideration the fact that he accused me of misleading the House.

• (1510)

In fact I stood up in full knowledge that the CANMET report is made up of nine pages, and I said so. I am not trying to mislead the House when I say that.

Mr. Tobin: Point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Is it on the same point or another point?

Mr. Tobin: Point of order.

Mr. Speaker: This is not a point of order of course.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I will make your job easier. I did not accuse the minister of misleading the House anywhere in my comments. If the minister thinks I did then I have no hesitation in saying that I have not accused the minister of that and shall not accuse the minister of that. What I have accused the minister of is being ill briefed or misinformed. I am saying now that he has all the facts an honourable member would do as I am doing now and quickly jump to his feet to withdraw any allegation that a member opposite is acting in a dishonourable fashion.

Mr. Andre: You said misleading.

Mr. Speaker: I think hon. members on both sides will understand that this is now for the Chair to settle.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 83(1), I wish to table a notice of a Ways and Means motion to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act, and I ask that an Order of the Day be designated for consideration of the motion.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–92, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and certain related acts; and Motion No. 3.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mississauga South has six minutes remaining.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I was saying prior to the break at lunch time that this particular statute change is one which will remove the right to all of the $100,000 exemption with respect to speculative real estate or with respect to non–producing real estate.

• (1515)

This is a budgetary measure. The effect of the $100,000 allowance applied to real estate that is a static investment reduces the revenue of the government very considerably. Over a five–year period the result of the tax change will increase the revenues of the government by $980 million a year, and will probably slightly increase every year from then on.

It is difficult to determine how much it is really going to work out to because it is a tax on the increase in sale value of real estate. If real estate prices do not advance then perhaps it will not be as much. If real estate prices advance more then the gain may be even more.

The concept here is to take away a break in the tax system that was designed to encourage effective job producing investment and make sure that investment break is only toward effective job producing investment. In other words, at the present time this benefit can be used for any piece of real estate a person might hold, and dead real estate, even if it is rental real estate, is not an effective job producing investment.

In terms of rental real estate, the Income Tax Act is still very favourable. Rental real estate is able to take a capital cost allowance and deduct that against rents received. The same applies with respect to the deduction of mortgage interest applicable to the investment so that there is a profit in holding rental real estate. The fact is that rental real estate is not a job producing investment and therefore it is felt by the government that in future that type of investment should not receive the $100,000 advantage.

The proposal by the government being contested in this suggested amendment by the member for Sudbury is that this restriction on the use of the $100,000 be eliminated. This is an important restriction. It is a very necessary restriction in terms of income to the government from the tax system and it is inappropriate for the House at this point, certainly in view of the fiscal status of the country, to expect that this benefit continue.

Those who presently have static real estate can continue to claim the $100,000 deduction against their existing real estate holdings but they can only claim it as a proportion of the period of time they have held the investment. For example, if they have held a piece of static real estate from 1972 forward, this year being 1993, they would be able to have a 21 fraction of the $100,000 tax-free gain.

As years go by the percentage of tax-free gain goes down, but nonetheless they will still be able to have a very substantial tax-free advantage applicable to the gain on non-producing property.

With respect to producing real estate, which is real estate property held as part of a business, if one owns a store and is running a hardware store from it then that is real estate that is part of the business. That can be sold as part of the business and the $100,000 applies. In the case of a small business the $500,000 allowance would apply on its shares. We are not affecting businesses as businesses. We are affecting static real estate investment.

I am indeed surprised that members opposite would want to make sure that benefit is still in the Income Tax Act. I think on reflection they may agree with the government that the $100,000 allowance is not proper in this particular case and ought not to be allowed and that the government's change in the statute ought to proceed as the bill indicates.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I just want to pick up on the comments of the member for Mississauga South. He put forward the notion that we should do an analysis of this in terms of it being an effective job producing investment. I like that idea of analysis. I wish the government would be consistent with that notion in all the tax expenditures it has allowed to go into the act over the nine years it has been in power.

It is my contention that one of the reasons the tax act is so inefficient and unfair is because we have built up a number of tax expenditures within the act where we have had no analysis as to whether or not they are meeting the job objectives they were originally put in the act for.

When we talk about singling out this particular amendment, the disallowance of the capital gains exemption on capital gains accrued after February 1992 on real estate held for investment purposes, I think the government is not being totally fair when it says there may not be a job creation effectiveness within that particular exercise.

I know in my own riding many people invest in a second home. They are constantly hiring people to do renovations and upgrades. It is almost an industry in itself. I think when the government disallows that exercise it is hurting a lot of small people. We call it the panel truck trade. The carpenters, electricians, plumbers, gardeners and all of the people who are in the renovation business in my city of Toronto are being hurt by this particular amendment to the tax act. It has effectively shut down the incentive for people to get involved with that second home, that second piece of property.

The member for Mississauga South comes from the same community, although he is from Mississauga where there are a lot of large, brand new homes and there probably would not be as much renovation. However, in the downtown areas where there are constant renovations and renewals there is a whole new industry developing where people are working in a craftsman-like way, renewing and renovating these homes. A lot of that industry comes from individuals who take on a second property as an investment.

• (1525)

I do not think the government has in fact really done an analysis as to whether or not this is effectively producing jobs. I think if it did a proper analysis it would find out that there are a lot of jobs being created. In fact this disallowance is another measure whereby the government is once again shutting down the entrepreneurial spirit of Canadians. It is shutting down the opportunities for a lot of crafts people who like to work on small projects of renovation.

It is a funny thing with this government. It has managed to put forward the image that it is a great fiscal manager with its lean, mean machine approach to our deficit and our debt. However, since this government has been in power, is it known that between unemployment insurance and welfare disbursements we have spent close to $170 billion? This government has spent an amount almost equal to half of the national debt in disbursements to people who have not been doing productive things.

This is where the Liberal Party is totally different from the Conservative Party. When we go through a global recession just like the one we have been through and the one in 1981–82, we made sure we had programs because we believed that it was more important to take people off welfare and the unemployment insurance rolls and put them back to work. At the end of the recessionary period, yes, we would have a debt and a liability, but we would have something to show for it at least. We would have roads. We would have bridges. We would have upgraded airport facilities. An illusion that this government has managed to perpetrate upon Canadians is that it is a much better fiscal manager.

We have to get the message out that in fact this government has spent close $170 billion, almost half of the national debt, on unemployment insurance and welfare payments where there is absolutely no concern for the dignity of people.

I know that 99 per cent of Canadians would much rather have the dignity of a job and be working on some special project that was in the national interest.

My leader has been putting forward this notion of infrastructure projects and the NEED program that the member from Winnipeg operated in 1980, 1981 and 1982 when we had a recession. In 90 days during that period we put close to 200,000 people back to work. We used the engine of small business to hire people in a way that supplemented the small businessman with money that would have otherwise gone to unemployment insurance or welfare.

This particular motion is another example of where the bean counters over there in finance have said: "Oh, if we disallow this exemption in the interest of fiscal responsibility, then we are much further ahead". The fact of the matter is that in my city of Toronto, and I am sure it is the same as in other major cities across the country, when people buy that second piece of property or invest in that other piece of property, they hire what I call the panel truck tradesmen. They employ people to renovate, whether it is carpenters, bricklayers or interior work that has to be done on homes.

I know of at least a half dozen people in my own riding whose spirits will be dampened once this particular amendment comes into place from the government. Their incentive to buy a second property or upgrade a second property which ultimately leads to more employment in the community will be held back. Once again the government under this illusion of fiscal responsibility has put more people out of work.

Ms. Roy-Arcelin: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, simply to tell the House that the member for Québec-Est is 50 years old today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): That is not a question of privilege, but I gladly join the hon. member in congratulating the hon. parliamentary secretary and offering him my best wishes.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, those who thought I was much older than 50 are amazed when they hear such kind words.

[English]

The lifetime capital gains exemption was introduced in order to encourage investment, risk taking and broader individual participation in equity markets. These are all goals to which the government is as committed today as it was when the exemption was first introduced in 1985.

However, as with any legislation, it is necessary to continually assess the effectiveness with which the exemption meets these objectives and to weigh these objectives against the need for fiscal responsibility.

In keeping with this, the government is proposing—effective for 1992 and subsequent taxation years—to amend the rules governing the availability of the lifetime capital gains exemption.

Specifically the exemption will no longer be available in respect of most gains of an individual on the sale of real estate purchased after February 1992 that is not used in an active business carried on by the individual.

Individuals who purchased real estate before this date will, however, still be eligible to benefit from exemption in respect of a pro rata portion of any gain that they realize.

The portion of the gain that will continue to be eligible for the exemption will be determined on the basis of a formula that notionally allocates any gain over the ownership period. That portion of the gain that is allocated to the period prior to March 1992 will qualify for the exemption.

Thus, if an individual realized a $15,000 capital gain on land that was purchased in March 1990 and sold in February 1993, two-thirds of the gain or $10,000 will be eligible for the exemption.

These changes are in no way a reversal of the government's original intention in introducing the lifetime capital gains exemption. Rather, they are intended to help direct resources toward those investments such as equities that will best enhance Canada's ability to compete in international markets.

In this manner they respond to the economy's growing need for investment funds and will ensure that the lifetime capital gains exemption will continue to represent a major incentive for Canadians to invest.

Finally, it is not clear that these changes will have an adverse impact on the provision of private rental accommodation. It is clear that speculative real estate ventures will be less attractive thereby easing the upward pressure on real estate prices. This, in turn, could potentially increase the yields on investments that may be realized through rent as opposed to capital gains on real property.

I would like to recap what I said earlier today just a few minutes ago and make some comments on four major objectives.

First, the objective of the capital gains exemption is to encourage risk taking and broader and individual participation in equity markets.

Second, it is necessary to assess the effectiveness with which the exemption meets these objectives and to weigh these objectives against the need for fiscal responsibility.

Third, by restricting the availability of the exemption, the government is responding to the economy's growing need for investment funds. This will help direct resources to those investments that will best enhance Canada's international competitiveness.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 3. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Hon. Pierre Blais (for the Minister of Finance) moved:

Motion No. 4.

That Bill C-92 be amended by adding immediately after line 28 at page 242 the following new clause:

"137. (1) Subsections 241(1) to (5) of the said Act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

241. (1) Except as authorized by this section, no official shall

(a) knowingly provide, or knowingly allow to be provided, to any person any taxpayer information;

(b) knowingly allow any person to have access to any taxpayer information; or

(c) knowingly use any taxpayer information otherwise than in the course of the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan or the Unemployment Insurance Act or for the purpose for which it was provided under this section.

(2) Notwithstanding any other Act of Parliament or other law, no official shall be required, in connection with any legal proceedings, to give or produce evidence relating to any taxpayer information.

(3) Subsections (1) and (2) do not apply in respect of

(a) criminal proceedings, either by indictment or on summary conviction, that have been commenced by the laying of an information or the preferring of an indictment, under an Act of Parliament; or

(b) any legal proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan or the Unemployment Insurance Act or any other Act of Parliament or law of a province that provides for the imposition or collection of a tax or duty.

(3.1) The Minister may provide to appropriate persons any taxpayer information relating to imminent danger of death or physical injury to any individual.

(4) An official may

(a) provide to any person taxpayer information that can reasonably be regarded as necessary for the purpose of the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan or the Unemployment Insurance Act, solely for that purpose;

(b) provide to any person taxpayer information that can reasonably be regarded as necessary for the purposes of determining any tax, interest, penalty or other amount that is or may become payable by the person, or any refund or tax credit to which the person is or may become entitled, under this Act or any other amount that is relevant for the purposes of that determination;

(c) provide to the person who seeks a certification referred to in paragraph 147.1(10)(a) the certification or a refusal to make the certification, solely for the purposes of administering a registered pension plan;

(d) provide taxpayer information

(i) to an official of the Department of Finance solely for the purposes of the formulation or evaluation of fiscal policy,

(ii) to an official solely for the purposes of the initial implementation of a fiscal policy or for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of an Act of Parliament that provides for the imposition and collection of a tax or duty,

(iii) to an official solely for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of a law of a province that provides for the imposition or collection of a tax or duty,

(f) provide taxpayer information solely for the purposes of sections 23 to 25 of the Financial Administration Act;

(g) use taxpayer information to compile information in a form that does not directly or indirectly reveal the identity of the taxpayer to whom the information relates;

(h) use, or provide to any person, taxpayer information solely for a purpose relating to the supervision, evaluation or discipline of an authorized person by Her Majesty in right of Canada in respect of a period during which the authorized person was employed by or engaged by or on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada to assist in the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan or the Unemployment Insurance Act, to the extent that the information is relevant for that purpose;

(i) provide access to records of taxpayer information to the National Archivist of Canada or a person acting on behalf of or under the direction of the National Archivist of Canada, solely for the purposes of section 5 of the National Archives of Canada Act, and transfer such records to the care and control of such persons solely for the purposes of section 6 of that Act;

(j) use taxpayer information relating to a taxpayer to provide information to the taxpayer; or

(k) provide, or allow inspection of or access to, taxpayer information to or by any person otherwise legally entitled to it under an Act of Parliament solely for the purposes for which that person is entitled to the information.

(4.1) The person who presides at a legal proceeding relating to the supervision, evaluation or discipline of an authorized person may order such measures as are necessary to ensure that taxpayer information is not used or provided to any person for any purpose not relating to that proceeding, including

(a) holding a hearing in camera;

(b) banning the publication of the information;

(c) concealing the identity of the taxpayer to whom the information relates; and

(d) sealing the records of the proceeding.

(5) An official may provide taxpayer information relating to a taxpayer

(a) to the taxpayer; and

(b) with the consent of the taxpayer, to any other person.

(2) All that portion of subsection 241(6) of the said Act preceding paragraph (a) thereof is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

(6) An order or direction that is made in the course of or in connection with any legal proceedings and that requires an official or authorized person to give or produce evidence relating to any taxpayer information may, by notice served on all interested parties, be appealed forthwith by the Minister or by the person against whom the order or direction is made to

(3) Subsection 241(10) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

(10) In this section,

"authorized person" means a person who is engaged or employed, or who was formerly engaged or employed, by or on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada to assist in carrying out the provisions of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan or the Unemployment Insurance Act;

"court of appeal" has the meaning assigned by paragraphs (a) to (l) of the definition "court of appeal" in section 2 of the Criminal Code;

"official" means any person who is employed in the service of, who occupies a position of responsibility in the service of, or who is engaged by or on behalf of,

(a) Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province, or

(b) an authority engaged in administering a law of a province similar to the Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985, or any person who was formerly so employed, who formerly occupied such a position or who was formerly so engaged;

"taxpayer information" means information of any kind and in any form relating to one or more taxpayers that is

(a) obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act, or

(b) prepared from information referred to in paragraph (a),

but does not include information that does not directly or indirectly reveal the identity of the taxpayer to whom it relates.

(11) The references in subsections (1), (3), (4) and (10) to "this Act" shall be read as references to "this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act".

[English]

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised that the government that is proposing Motion No. 4 is not standing up and speaking to Motion No. 4.

I want to say that this motion concerns employees of the government and I believe it should be embarrassed. This is a clause which would allow the personal tax returns of tax and Revenue Canada employees to be used in a way which obviously worries them very much and in a way that most Canadians would not be subjected to. They feel if this particular clause is moved forward that their employers will be able to access their personal tax returns and use the information in the particular tax return to harass them in their work if it is absolutely the case.

I cannot say that I am convinced one way or the other because in committee we did not have a chance to completely study the question.

The committee system is meant for us to have a chance to study all the clauses at the committee and when we do that we have a chance to speak to different witnesses. Certain witnesses from a union of public employees came forward and addressed the committee stating that they were very worried about this clause. We had requested perhaps that the privacy commissioner, who had also written to the committee, appear before the committee.

The committee chairman was very anxious to get Bill C-92 through the committee and it was decided in the interest of facilitating the bill that this clause would be taken out. For that reason the bill moved through committee.

Now here we are back in the House. The clause has been reintroduced absolutely word for word in its original form. It is a despicable way of behaving for people who are going around the country saying they wish to have a reform of the parliamentary institutions. What kind of reform is it going to want when the only thing it understands is that if it makes a decision, it has to be its way and that is it. The government reintroduced this clause with absolutely no changes, without answering the questions and the fears of employees. This is a serious matter. The government should withdraw the motion which reintroduces this clause in order to facilitate and to open up the debate and to make it a more honest approach.

I would ask the government to at least defend its position. Members should explain to the people of Canada, to their employees, why it has reintroduced this clause in word for word fashion without answering the fears of its employees.

Nobody else will have the same kind of rules apply to them. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, if your tax return information could be accessed by your boss to be used in some way against you if it is thought that you are not performing your job properly. No one else has that privilege.

If an employee does anything with his own personal tax return which is not right, he should be subjected to exactly the same rules as all other Canadians. In effect, this clause will remove that.

It is a serious matter. Perhaps there are reasons for doing this. It certainly was not clear at committee and there was not a lot of discussion on it. I would ask that this motion be withdrawn.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, you know how much I respect the hon. member for Sudbury. I did not want to precede her; I just wanted to offer her the floor before me on report stage of Bill C-92.

The amendment in question would put back in Bill C-92 the clause deleted by the finance committee. This clause, former clause 137, amends some rules on the confidentiality of information in section 241 of the Income Tax Act. Section 241 forbids officials to use or communicate information obtained under the act unless expressly authorized in one of the exemptions provided in that section.

I think that the former clause 137 should be restored for three reasons.

First, in addition to the amendment considered by the finance committee, this clause makes some improvements to section 241 of the act. For example, one of the improvements is that rules on the confidentiality of information do not apply to information that does not directly or indirectly identify the taxpayer.

This would confirm Revenue Canada's ability to publish summary data or statistics needed to develop social and fiscal policy. These data are also very widely used by the business community.

Another important amendment would allow Revenue Canada to use a taxpayer's address to send him information. Thus Revenue Canada could provide a service like the mail service available through the American tax authorities in medical or legal emergencies.

Another amendment says that confidential information can be provided to provincial governments for evaluating or formulating tax policy. This amendment would also allow providing confidential information to provincial officials responsible for applying or enforcing a federal tax law. That is important, for example, when the Quebec Department of Revenue collects the GST for the federal government.

• (1545)

The second reason for reinstating former clause 137 is that without this clause certain amendments to another clause in the bill would no longer serve any purpose. More specifically, clause 136 introduces a number of amendments to section 239 of the Income Tax Act which arise from amendments made under former clause 137. Unless the clause is reinstated some of the amendments provided under clause 136 will not make sense. In fact, the relevant provision of section 239 of the act provides that contravening the confidentiality of information rules described under section 241 of the act constitutes an offence. If former clause 137 is not reinstated it would be impossible to enforce this provision in some cases, which could seriously undermine the application of the rules on the confidentiality of information.

These references to certain clauses may be confusing to some, but all members who sat on the finance committee know very well what we are talking about right now.

The third reason for reinstating former clause 137 is that most of the concerns about this clause, based on the right to privacy, have been laid to rest. These concerns arose from the amendment that would allow the use of confidential information for the purposes of surveillance or evaluation of Revenue Canada employees or of disciplinary measures imposed on these employees.

I would like to explain briefly why it was necessary to introduce this amendment.

Until recently senior management at Revenue Canada, Taxation, considered that the department's mandate for applying tax legislation allowed it to use confidential information for the purpose of supervising and evaluating its employees and taking disciplinary action in their regard. For instance, if a Revenue Canada employee used information concerning another taxpayer for his own purposes or if the employee falsified information in his own tax return in order to take advantage of insider information on the department's assessment and audit practices, Revenue Canada managers assumed they could use that information to take appropriate disciplinary action.

However, in 1987 the Federal Court maintained that this particular use of information by management contravened the rules on the confidentiality of information. Consequently it is impossible to submit confidential information to support the disciplinary action proposed in a particular case. The fact remains that relevant confidential information can always be submitted as evidence when charges are laid, as is sometimes the case. However, in other less serious situations it is more appropriate to take disciplinary action than to lay charges, and even in cases where charges are laid Revenue Canada managers must be able to take temporary disciplinary action, pending the outcome of the case, in order to safeguard the integrity of the tax system.

The proposed amendments would allow the use of confidential information in the case of disciplinary proceedings, as was the case before the decision handed down by the Federal Court in 1987. This particular use would however be qualified by new safety measures to make sure that only relevant confidential information is used and to prevent disclosure of information submitted before a disciplinary tribunal. The person chairing the proceedings would be authorized to order a hearing to be held in camera and to impose a ban on publication of the information or measures in question in order to protect the identity of the taxpayer.

Many of the concerns about this amendment were raised by privacy commissioner, Bruce Phillips, who was afraid that the amendment would impinge on the right to privacy of Revenue Canada employees and that it would give departmental managers undue authority over their employees. However these fears were allayed after discussions and exchanges of letters between Mr. Phillips and national revenue deputy minister Pierre Gravelle.

• (1550)

To prove my point I would like to read a few paragraphs from a letter written by Mr. Phillips, which the deputy minister of national revenue was kind enough to give me. The finance committee did not have the opportunity to see this letter before voting on Bill C-92. The letter is dated March 23, 1993 and it is addressed to Mr. Gravelle. With your permission, I will read some excerpts of this letter, which I was kindly given. I am making an ad hoc translation.

> Thank you for your letter of March 23, 1993 on the proposed amendments to the Income Tax Act and the Excise Tax Act, as well as the concerns which I raised in my letter of March 18.
> I first want to tell you how pleased I was with the tone and the substance of your letter. Indeed, you readily recognize the importance of issues related to privacy and you propose to hold consultations to develop safeguards for protecting the right to privacy when disciplinary action is taken.
> You mention that I did not disagree that you have the right, indeed the obligation, to ensure the total honesty of your employees, and particularly to make sure that no employee uses insider information for his or her personal benefit. I am convinced that all Canadians support this objective.
> My concern has to do with potential abuse, and I proposed, as a possible approach, setting strict criteria for the disciplinary review of employee files, such as defining what constitutes reasonable grounds.
> I am therefore pleased to see that you have undertaken to develop guidelines on this issue and that you are willing to discuss them with people from my office and others concerned. I am very pleased with this proposal and I am confident that together we can come up with a satisfactory solution which will protect the employees' right to privacy.

As I said earlier, this is an excerpt from a letter dealing with Bill C-92, which was addressed to Mr. Gravelle, the deputy minister—

[English]

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member speaking just quoted excerpts from a letter. He repeated it three times. I heard him say that he had the full letter in his hand. According to the rules of procedure the member must, if called upon, table the complete letter forthwith. I ask Mr. Speaker to make that ruling.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I have before me the whole letter from Bruce Phillips to Pierre Gravelle, dated March 23, to which I was referring. This letter is in English and I translated it as I went along. My comments apply to the whole letter. I will be pleased to include with my notes the full text of the letter, which is a public document in any case.

With your permission, I will now carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I first want to remind the hon. members of the usual practice in the House. A member can ask for the tabling of a document by a minister, however, in the case of a member, even though he or she may be a parliamentary secretary, it is up to that person to comply. I understand that the hon. member has no objection to tabling that document.

Mr. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the minister will object to the tabling of a letter which is already a public document.

The Privacy Commissioner of Canada is convinced, as I am, that by holding consultations with his office and with others concerned, such as the Public Service Alliance of Canada and other unions representing Revenue Canada employees, this department will be able to develop guidelines for protecting the legitimate privacy interests of its employees.

• (1555)

I maintain that these guidelines, along with the legislative proposals included in the former clause 137, will ensure a fair balance between the different interests involved.

Since my time is running out quickly, I recommend that the House adopt the motion to amend Bill C-92 by reinstating the former clause 137.

[English]

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the letter that the hon. member was quoting from was a letter in response to Mr. Phillips from the deputy minister. The member stands up in the House and says:"Oh, I have a copy of a letter here from Mr. Bruce Phillips who is the privacy commissioner to the deputy minister". He quotes from one letter and then claims he has the other letter in his hand. I do not want the other letter. That was in the news media. I want the letter that he was quoting from. I would maintain that a parliamentary secretary has the same status in this Chamber as a minister.

It is important to see what has happened here. What has happened in this House is this. Let me just take us back a week. There was a national news story across Canada. The national news story said that the privacy commissioner had concerns about what was in this bill. The committee voted to take out the clause relating to the so-called invasion of privacy. The clause says that certain people can have their income tax returns examined. There have been no criminal charges laid because of course once you do that you can get it examined anyway. This allows a specific employer to take somebody's personal income tax return, namely an employee of the Government of Canada working at Revenue Canada, and it allows the boss to look at his income tax return to discipline him. That is why the committee took it out.

It made the news right across Canada. The committee decided to take out that clause. Then the committee, having seen a victory, shortened its hearings because no witnesses were called. The privacy commissioner was off the hook and the bill went through the committee. Now we are back in the House of Commons and they are reintroducing the clause they took out in the committee to shorten the committee hearings.

What would you call that? It is an interesting study in parliamentary procedure. I am sure that the clerks at the table and people who write in such magazines as The Parliamentarian and political science students will be able to do a masters thesis on this one. This is a precedent I would say in the British tradition of parliamentary procedure to have a clause taken out in a committee. The committee then reports back the bill, satisfied that it has done its job. There were no hearings on that clause at all, no hearings from the privacy commissioner who said: "You are violating the rights of people in Canada to have their income tax returns taken and looked at by your boss to discipline you".

It was taken out and the bill passes because the clause is out. It comes before the House with a majority vote in the House of Commons to reintroduce the clause during closure and have it passed. The privacy commissioner, Bruce Phillips, was absolutely correct in his judgment. The government is doing something against what the privacy commission made a big fuss about in the media last week. There is such a thing on the back of every income tax return called the "Declaration of Taxpayer Rights".

• (1600)

You will see it on the back of every single booklet for income tax purposes. It says: "Declaration of Taxpayer Rights". It has been there, my goodness, ever since I can recall. It is a declaration of taxpayer rights in dealings with Revenue Canada, Taxation. You have important rights.

In a section of the declaration of taxpayer rights, it reads: "Privacy and confidentiality". Let me just read the sentence. It says: "You are entitled to expect that we will use the personal and financial information you provide us only for purposes the law allows". The law allows.

This is the law that we are passing today. This is the amendment that we are sticking into that law that we are passing today. That will be the law of Canada. It will be that which the law allows. What will the law allow?

It will allow an employee of Revenue Canada to have his or her personal income tax return taken out to be examined for "surveillance purposes" for "disciplinary actions" without laying charges. As the law presently stands if you do not lay the charges you do not get to look at the income tax return.

This will allow them to do it without any other reason except the boss having an inkling or a feeling. If he does not like the looks of a person, if he does not like the way a person is acting in Revenue Canada, all those employees now can have their personal income tax returns looked at and examined.

We have a division of Revenue Canada called the audit branch. There are 14.6 million returns filed in Canada. There are 35,000 returns on average that are re-examined. They are audited. If you work it out that works out to one chance in 430 years of having your income tax return examined in a manner that we are prescribing under this new clause.

In other words, for you to be audited it is once every 430 years if the law is not discriminating against you if you are an ordinary Canadian. If you have done something wrong in your income tax return of course you can be liable. If some little thing is wrong there are fines of up to $25,000 and jail for one year.

Now we will have a new class of people in Canada whose income tax returns can be taken out at any time. They can be judged as to whether or not they can get a promotion. Their personal finances are looked at, who they are paying money to and which educational institution they support. What are their deductions? What are their personal and financial circumstances? What are people doing in their families? Exactly what is the condition of each person in that family? What are they doing? Everything.

We are passing this on an excuse. The minister says: "For possible disciplinary actions without laying charges", "for surveillance of employees at Revenue Canada", "to allow supervisors to obtain the private information of somebody's income tax return", "to allow the government to give surveillance to employees of Revenue Canada".

Can you imagine what the employees of Revenue Canada are feeling today having this special law just for them?

• (1605)

They will now be under a microscope because the Parliament of Canada has decided to defy what the privacy commissioner said last week publicly in the newspapers in this country. Members of Parliament decided when they went into their standing committee that somebody behind the scenes was going to pull a fast one and they were going to get the thing out of the public view by withdrawing the clause. All the government members sat there and refused to vote.

If I am wrong on this let me be corrected now. They supported it by their silence because they knew that it was going to be brought back in a sneaky fashion and reintroduced through the strict majority of this Chamber.

This is an outrage. We should have a hearing by the privacy commissioner before the House of Commons.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Have we totally abandoned the way we normally do business here? We have had a government member and two Liberal members. It is about time we had an NDP spokesperson on this.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have no problem giving the floor, but in the tradition of this House the Speaker watches the two sides of the House. After this side, I have my eyes on the other side. It is the tradition. If the hon. member wants to speak absolutely, I have no problem.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, perhaps inadvertently I changed what might have been your normal procedure because I was simply getting up, not because I had been planning to, but because I wanted to respond to what the hon. member who just spoke stated. I wanted to do that in a timely fashion. I was completely prepared to allow the hon. member from Winnipeg to go ahead if he wishes. Perhaps I could just intervene here on this point.

The member has just talked about a process which included a committee of which I was the chairman. I think perhaps I could elucidate slightly about the procedure that was followed because perhaps inadvertently he has heard about the procedure. As I recall he was not there so he must have read or heard about it or otherwise got his information.

We are dealing here with a bill with probably 200 to 250 pages that incorporates many different changes to the Income Tax Act, what we often call a technical bill. Basically it is a bill which is picking up all kinds of different things which have accumulated over the course of a year and putting them into a bill.

One of those things happens to do with the matter that the hon. member is speaking about in the question of the utilization of tax returns of Revenue Canada employees in the evaluation of their work or in cases which may involve them in terms of their own personal tax liability.

What happened in committee was that this matter was brought to our attention very late in the committee process. The bill had been referred to committee. We had examined the matters that had been raised and of interest and in particular the one spoke of here earlier today about trusts where we invited some people to come and talk about that.

This matter only came to our attention at a point in time when we were doing clause by clause. Given the fact that this matter was not necessary in terms of the remainder of the bill, at the time the thought was that we could proceed with the remainder of the bill and allow this matter if you like to be defeated or to stand aside because it did not have anything to do with the integrity of the rest of the bill. We were in fact conceding this matter in order to pass 99 per cent of the bill.

What happened is that the union representing Revenue Canada employees had raised the matter. It raised it with the privacy commissioner as well. He wrote a letter to me advising of his concern. We were going to deal with that. We were interrupted that day because of a vote in this House. We discovered after that that in fact there had been subsequent action. The deputy minister of Revenue Canada had responded to the letter of the privacy commissioner and subsequently the privacy commissioner responded to the deputy minister for Revenue Canada saying that he was satisfied with the response and the process and that his concerns had been alleviated. All those letters are a matter of public record and if anybody wishes to have them I can make them available because I have them. I have circulated them to all members of the finance committee. I believe members of his own party should have them, but if not I can make them available. Those letters outline the exchange.

The understanding of many members, including myself, was that over the course of time between the passing of the bill and its returning to the House, members would have an opportunity to examine the issue, see the exchange of correspondence that had taken place and then come to a proper conclusion.

Whether the idea of incorporating or allowing the tax returns of employees of Revenue Canada to be used in cases where they were involved to be entered into evidence is a matter on which members can come to their conclusion. However I just want to speak to the process.

The process was not that members in some way defeated this. The expectation at the time was that members would apprise themselves of the exchange of correspondence and any other facts that they might not be aware of at that time. It was a way to let the bill proceed expeditiously.

On the question of whether this information should be allowed to be used for the purposes of Revenue Canada in its administration of the Income Tax Act, this was the practice at Revenue Canada for many years. It was a court decision a couple of years ago. The Revenue Canada Act states that this information can only be used for the purposes of the act. Revenue Canada had always interpreted that to mean that administering the Revenue Canada Act included administering its own employees and on that basis could use this information. The courts defined more narrowly.

This measure seeks to suggest that where a Revenue Canada employee may have been involved in a matter that may have involved a taxpayer and there may have been a fraud, a breach of trust or some other matter, that the income tax return of that employee could be relevant to the particular case and could be used in evidence before a tribunal that involved this employee.

Again it is up to members to debate the merits of that, but that is what this matter seeks to do. It re-establishes a practice that had been there in the past. The process used was to expedite the passage of the bill. There was no objection to most of the other measures.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION ACT

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-115

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): On a point of order, I beg the indulgence of the House, Mr. Speaker, to give notice that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) or (2) with respect to second reading of Bill C-115, an act to implement the North American free trade agreement.

Under the provision of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the second reading stage.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I wonder if you could rule whether it is permissible for a motion to be put on a point of order when dealing with a separate motion before the House?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I want to remind the hon. member that this is only a notice. This does not necessarily mean that government will act on this notice. For the time being, it is nothing more than a notice given to this House. Therefore, no motion per se has been put before this House.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-92, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and certain related acts, as reported (with amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance; and Motion No. 4.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the notice given by the minister just previously may be procedurally acceptable, but it is certainly not acceptable in any moral or parliamentary way.

We have only just begun debate on the North American free trade agreement and already the government is moving time allocation. It is certainly something on which I have made representations to the Chair. I hope now that the government's intentions are clear that the Chair will respond to my letter of Thursday last week with some expedience and with favour I hope.

• (1615)

In any event, I appreciated the intervention of the chairman of the finance committee. He has a reputation of being a fair-minded person. I think he gave a reasonable account of things except that it is also fair to say that opposition members have good reason to feel somewhat betrayed by the process.

I know that I as the NDP member on that committee had the impression at one point that when clause 137, which is the motion we are debating now, was defeated it was for the purposes of either leaving it out altogether or amending it in a way that may have proved acceptable to the opposition or may have proved unacceptable. But I certainly did not expect the government would simply reintroduce it at report stage without any changes at all.

It is perfectly within the government's right to do that but that was not my expectation. Certainly we could have kept things going that evening had we thought that all we were going to be faced with, having done what we did, was the reintroduction of the clause unchanged.

There was some disposition on the part of the government at that time to find an amendment that would meet some of the concerns that were raised by the Public Service Alliance. When the government members said: "Why don't we just defeat the clause and we can deal with this later", I think there was a reasonable expectation on the part of the opposition and of the Public Service Alliance people who were present that there was a willingness to try and deal with it.

The chairman of the committee may argue that it has been dealt with in the sense that the privacy commissioner has dealt with it by saying that the objections which he raised in his conversations and exchange of letters with Mr. Gravelle of Revenue Canada have been dealt with to his satisfaction. However, just because the privacy commissioner is satisfied that there is a willingness to develop safeguards, et cetera, does not mean that the issue simply disappears. The issue did not rely solely on the intervention of the privacy commissioner in the first place. In fact, we did not hear from the privacy commissioner, we heard from the Public Service Alliance of Canada.

It is in that sense that I think the government, even though it is operating within the rules, has not acted in good faith, perhaps not even in a way that the government members on the committee thought it would act. I have no way of knowing exactly what they expected, but my reading at that time was that there was a willingness to try and find some accommodation.

Instead we are faced with the reintroduction of clause 137 exactly as it was. One wonders about the integrity of the committee process in the final analysis. If a committee can defeat a clause only to have the government—the government in the big brother sense of the word—say presumably to the committee members: "That was a fine, independent act you were responsible for in committee but we are sorry, we are going to reintroduce exactly what you permitted to be defeated".

For me, it was one of those times when I really felt that committee work mattered. We got together with the government members and said: "Look, there is a problem here. Let's defeat it". If we had time maybe we could have developed an amendment, but I thought that was forthcoming. There we were working like members of Parliament are supposed to work in the public mind. What happens is the government steps in at some point after and says: "Sorry, we want our way and we want our way exactly the way we want it".

• (1620)

From a kind of political process and parliamentary process point of view, this is an awfully disappointing thing. I am somewhat—I do not know if disappointed is the right word—in the privacy commissioner who in some respects seems to have retreated from his earlier concerns.

Perhaps retreat is a pejorative way to put it. Maybe it is just that he understood things that he did not understand before, whatever the case may be. The fact is that the commitment to develop safeguards is understandably not enough for Revenue Canada employees. For one thing, they do not know what those safeguards will be, whether they will actually be safeguards or whether they will just be phoney guards that safeguard the government in its introduction of this new and much more Draconian measure with respect to access to the tax files of Revenue Canada employees than anything we have ever seen before.

I was certainly persuaded by the testimony we heard and by my own reading of the issue that this is not something the government desperately needs. It has at its disposal other remedies when it feels that an employee of Revenue Canada is somehow using their position in a way that advantages them in terms of their own personal income tax. The government has ways of dealing with that.

I mentioned the court case that the member before me referred to and which officials before the committee referred to frequently in justifying this action. The one thing that they never mentioned was that the person who was the centre of that court case, if I understand things correctly, is not now an employee of Revenue Canada. It is not as if the government was unsuccessful in its dealing with that person. It did manage to get rid of that person, so to speak.

I think the government is making a serious mistake here. I have a great many Revenue Canada employees in my constituency. I happen to have located in my constituency, Winnipeg Transcona, the taxation data centre for western Canada and I know a great many people who work there. I have walked the picket line with them. I have fought on their behalf, successfully once and unsuccessfully the second time, when the government tried to introduce parking fees and a number of other things.

I find that I share their offence at having the government introduce a measure which puts them in a special category of Canadian taxpayers. I share their offence at being put in this special class of people whose tax files will be available basically at the whim of supervisors or senior management in Revenue Canada.

Maybe this is what the safeguards are intended to deal with, but we will believe that when we see it. When someone is in dispute with management, management will have this extra hammer that they will presumably in an unrelated way, if they so desire, be able to use. They will be able to look into that person's tax files in a totally unprovoked way, that is to say, as far as it pertains to their tax, the way that they are dealing with their taxes, and see if there is not something that they can get on that person, see if there is not something that they can use against that person.

That is a form of discipline and a form of management oversight or intrusion into the privacy of employees that no one else in the country would be expected to tolerate. That is the reason why people who are working for Revenue Canada take offence at this. I think they are justified in taking offence at this. I think that the members of the committee saw the offence that this was to them and to other notions of privacy that we all hold in common.

• (1625)

That is why they defeated it and hoped that it would be dealt with satisfactorily, presumably by an amendment or, failing an amendment that was satisfactory to all the interested parties, by leaving out clause 137 or reintroducing clause 137 without the offending language. I understand that clause 137 contains more than just what we are dealing with here. That was part of a concern expressed by a departmental official who did the very unusual thing of leaping to the table at the committee meeting as if he was a committee member and trying to prevent the committee from doing what it was about to do. Then he was reminded that he was not a member of the committee and that he should take his place as an official.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to extend the time of the hon. member?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Blaikie: I promise not to go on too long, Mr. Speaker, at the request of my own colleagues.

In any event, there was a way this could have been dealt with so that it could have satisfied the Public Service Alliance of Canada and it could have been an exemplary moment in the life of committees and the relationship between committee and Parliament. Instead, it has turned out to be kind of a dirty deal and one other occasion on which we feel that maybe we were a little bit naive. We should have dragged the committee on and been obstructionist and made absolutely sure that we got exactly what we wanted and done all of those things that we are sometimes condemned for in this place.

This time we did not do that. We said that it looks like there is some goodwill here and there is the possibility for a constructive solution. What happens? We get it in the ear. The clause is reintroduced exactly as it was. That is why we will be voting against it.

It is still the offence that it was in the beginning to the integrity and privacy of Revenue Canada employees. It is beyond that now. It is an offence against the appropriate relationship that ought to obtain with a committee that deletes a clause with the expectation that it will be amended and not reintroduced uncritically at report stage, as it has been.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few comments with respect to what happened in the committee and the reason this amendment is before us.

When we in the committee received the complaint by the Public Service Commission we had already heard all of the witnesses we intended to hear on this bill and were going to go immediately to clause by clause. We decided to break the pattern and call in the Public Service Alliance people to explain their concerns.

We then called Revenue Canada people and unfortunately the bells rang for a vote and we came back.

During the course of that vote period, Bruce Phillips, the privacy commissioner, had re-examined the entire matter and was going to appear as a witness at the committee. Unfortunately it was impossible to carry on the committee in that room much longer and it was necessary for the purpose of moving legislation forward that this bill be passed and this whole issue, which is really a very minor issue in a very large bill, be dealt with at report stage.

Everyone who has been involved in the bill has had a copy of the privacy commissioner's advice concerning the change. Indeed, if people take a look at the matter quite impartially they will note the rationale for the change. The change in the statute is brought about because of a case between the government and a woman by the name of Monica Lau, who is a tax assessor.

• (1630)

Ms. Lau was involved in tax gains in the years 1981, 1982 and 1983. In the course of a disciplinary matter the government used her tax return to fire her because the information on the tax return was essential to show the misfeasance that allowed a person to be fired from the Public Service of Canada.

The complainant took the matter to court and the court ruled that the government had no right to use Ms. Lau's tax return for the purpose of discipline and for the purpose of terminating her employment. That gave her the right to the damages that a public servant would have for being fired. She was fired for cause but she got damages for being fired for cause.

This change in the statute makes sure that people who have a special ability in the administration of income tax cannot use the tax system, their own tax system, to make money.

We have a situation in which disciplinary action is required and the tax return of an employee is relevant to that disciplinary action, and only to that extent can the tax return be used. The guidelines will specifically and in detail control that use.

It seems to me, and I am sure to other people here as taxpayers, that people who are employees of Revenue Canada and are in the business of examining tax returns and organizing the tax system have specialized knowledge and inside information in terms of how things work.

Therefore it is important, if we are going to make sure the system is fair and honest for taxpayers, that those persons who are hired for that specific purpose know that their own returns can be used should they play games with the system and benefit themselves through information they have gathered as a result of their employment with Revenue Canada.

One could say that we could fire her, and Ms. Lau certainly did get fired, but the question really is whether this is a dismissal with cause or a dismissal subject to damage. It is the government's view that when people are deceitful and dishonest in Revenue Canada and it is necessary to use their tax information to prove that deceit and dishonesty that they should not be able to hide behind the privacy of their tax returns so that their deceit and dishonesty cannot be legally shown and that deceit and dishonesty becomes a matter of employee discipline.

I think any fair-minded person would find that to be a fair statement and I suggest that the amendment is necessary. It came forward like this because we were not prepared to pass the bill and that section without the information and undertakings from the privacy commissioner. We now have those. We are now prepared to put the section before the House.

Therefore members on the government side in the committee deliberately did not vote on that clause when the clause was put by the chairman and consequently the clause did not pass.

• (1635)

Members of the committee did it that way because the most convenient way of doing the amendment, changing it and handling it was by not passing the clause at committee and reintroducing it at report stage so that it could be passed. That was the clean, easy and neat way of doing it.

Everyone who was at the committee that evening knew that was going to happen. There is no deceit or misrepresentation here. It was perfectly obvious to everyone who was there exactly what we were doing. Otherwise we would have introduced detailed amendments at committee in connection with the particular clause before us. We did not do that simply because the cleanest, easiest and neatest way of handling the matter was to reintroduce the clause at report stage and put it to the House.

That is why it is before the House now. It was a neat, clean way of handling the matter and it would have been introduced in part form or altered form had the privacy commissioner not reported as he had. When he reported as he had the only proper and effective way of bringing this matter back to the House was to reintroduce the entire clause the way it was when the bill was first brought before the House at second reading.

That is the reason for it and that is why this amendment should pass.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I was not at the committee and I have listened attentively to the member for Mississauga South. I do not want to debate his point on what happened technically to the clauses of the bill. I want to deal with the substance of what we are involved with here, and I am personally opposed to this.

To have a situation where—and it does not matter that we are putting the onus on the fact that they are Revenue Canada employees—managers or supervisors, by a law of the land, are allowed to have access to a person's tax return is obscene. If there is a suspicion by a manager that the employee is breaking the law then lay the charge. Simply lay the charge.

We all know that from time to time because of the nature of human beings there could be a moment of frustration or tension in which someone could use the tax system in a way that would not be just. They could use that tax system outside the actual basic law of treating someone fairly. They could use this as a way of harassment.

I do not think this is right in any way, shape or form.

I want to go back to the remarks put forward by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance because he was quoting selectively from a letter that was written by the privacy commissioner of Canada to the deputy minister of revenue, Mr. Pierre Gravelle. I want to read the entire letter because when I read it I think members will see that this is not a case in which the privacy commissioner is completely satisfied with what is going on here.

It says: "Dear Mr. Gravelle: Thank you for your letter of this date", this is March 23, "regarding the proposed amendments to the Income Tax Act and the Excise Tax Act and the concerns we expressed about them in my letter to you March 18. Let me say at the outset that I was gratified both by the tone and the substance of your letter. In the case of the former by your ready acknowledgement of the privacy interest in these matters, and in the latter by your proposal for a consultative process to develop proper privacy safeguards in disciplinary actions.

You noted that I did not disagree with the proposition that you have a right, indeed a duty, to ensure a high degree of employee integrity and particularly to satisfy yourself that no employee uses insider information for personal benefit. I am sure every Canadian supports that objective.

My concerns lie with the potential abuse. I suggested as a possible approach the establishment of stringent criteria for the examination of employee files for disciplinary purposes such as defining conditions of reasonable cause. It was satisfying, therefore, to learn that you already are in the process of developing guidelines with my office and other interested parties. I welcome this proposal, confident that together we can work out a satisfactory regime that protects privacy rights of employees.

Finally, let me acknowledge with pleasure that your interpretation of the "made language in the amendment to section 241" is the same as our own. Namely, that it is intended to enable Revenue Canada officials to carry out their duties under the Privacy Act.

I presume that your officials will soon be in touch with my office to initiate discussions on the guidelines mentioned above."

What we have here today is yet another example of this government's total disrespect for the House of Commons. It is another example where this government with its majority and its lean, mean machine approach to governing this country is trying to slide through an amendment that would give the management of Revenue Canada the right to look at their employees' tax returns.

There is not a person in this country who would support that kind of treatment. There is not a businessman or businesswoman in this country who would support an initiative where the boss can look or can get access to a person's tax returns. Once something like this is put into law with Revenue Canada where does it go?

One could use the same logic and apply it to judges, departments that give out grants for industry and to every public servant. Every public servant in this country is in a position of trust. Every one of us in this House of Commons is in a position of trust. If I am doing something wrong then someone can lay a charge against me or the employer or whoever it is can lay a charge against any public servant. However, to use the legislative process of the House of Commons of Canada to try and slide through just this little amendment so that the management of Revenue Canada could look at their employees' tax returns is totally and utterly wrong.

Something else bothers me about this as well. We had the deputy minister of Revenue Canada in the public accounts committee last week. He is a great public servant and a man who is dedicated to his job.

• (1645)

I want to say that I was so shocked to find out that the Department of Revenue has done no cost-benefit analysis on the GST. It has done no analysis. We know that the revenue of the GST is approximately $30 billion. We know that it put out this number of $15 billion after the social credits and the operating costs such as the GST police and so on. There is a net of $15 billion.

It has no figure for what, for example, the restaurant sector in Canada was bringing into the national Treasury pre-GST and post-GST. It has no idea how the GST has affected tourism pre-GST and post-GST. Tourism employs almost 12 per cent of the nation's work force. The tourism receipts in this country are down by almost 35 per cent. One cannot find a tourism operator in this country who will not say that the GST has caused the damage.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows:

[Translation]

The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—National Defence; the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre—Dairy Industry; the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast—Sovereign Life Insurance Company; the hon. member for Davenport—The Environment; and the hon. member for Saint-Boniface—Employment.

[English]

It being 4.45 p.m. pursuant to an order made Tuesday, March 30, 1993, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forward every question necessary to dispose of the report stage of the bill now before the House.

The question is on Motion No. 4. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Call in the members.

• (1705)

And the division bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The first question is on Motion No. 1.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

[English]

It being 5.25 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

CHILD CARE

NATIONAL OBJECTIVES

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should incorporate the following national objectives in all of its child care initiatives:

1. child care services should be licensed and regulated so that they apply the highest standards consistent with current knowledge of early childhood development;

2. cost should not be a barrier to access to child care services;

3. child care services should be universally accessible, irrespective of a person's income, employment status or geographic location;

4. child care services should be comprehensive enough to offer services for infants, pre-schoolers, school-age children, and children with special needs, and be culturally sensitive;

5. child care services should be flexible enough to accommodate the demand for full-time, part-time, seasonal, shift and occasional services;

6. child care services should be operated on a non-profit basis.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to call for a national child care program which is accessible, affordable, comprehensive, culturally sensitive, of good quality, flexible and non-profit. Yes, that is a tall order, but it is an essential goal.

• (1730)

Many may lead us to believe that such a program is impossible but that does not explain how a number of European countries have achieved comprehensive, publicly funded national child care programs, some of which even include allowances for homemakers who raise small children full time.

Unlike most other developed affluent nations, Canada does not have a system of child care. Child care in Canada has developed in a haphazard manner driven by market forces.

Child care is a women's rights issue. The royal commission on equality and employment reported in 1984 that child care is the ramp that provides equal access to the work force for mothers.

In our society women are primarily responsible for child-rearing. This has resulted in the incredible poverty of older women who do not have pensions built up in their own name. It has also resulted in inequality between women and men workers. Our society must come to terms with blending work and family responsibilities in a way that does not penalize either the mother at home or the mother in the paid work force.

In 1990 Canada signed the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. Child care is recognized in that convention as a significant children's rights issue. Every child has the right to adequate care either by a parent or by another caregiver.

France has an extensive and well-funded system of child care and women's equality is not used to justify it. They consider what is best for the children. Child care is a family issue. It should be there for parents who want or need to do paid work and to provide respite care for those at home who are child care workers 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

The Vanier Institute for the Family estimates that 1.3 million Canadian children are in need of child care. Yet there are only 300,000 licensed child care spaces in the entire country.

Child care is a social policy issue. Child care is a way to identify and to help abused children and to provide educational and other resources and opportunities for poor children that their parents are not able to afford.

Child care is an economic issue. It is an investment in a skilled and educated work force. It is about time government and employers realized that the majority of workers are parents and that the future workers and citizens may now be growing up with inadequate care that will have a major and long lasting impact on the future of our country.

Child care is an important issue, one which this government and the Liberals when in power have chosen to ignore. Even during these times of economic hardship the New Democrat governments in both British Columbia and Ontario have invested in the creation of new licensed child care spaces.

Canadian families have changed. Children are being raised in smaller families. This means fewer siblings and fewer aunts and uncles to care for children. Families are more mobile. Over 16 per cent of the Canadian population are immigrants. This means that parents and children may not live in the same city as their grandparents and other family members, or they may have no extended families or strong networks of people who can care for their children while they financially support them.

Before the 1980s the paid labour force participation rates for mothers of pre-school children were lower than that for all other women. Now the rate for mothers of pre-schoolers has surpassed the paid labour force participation rate of all women.

The 1992 Canadian national child care study found that over half the families with pre-school children were dual earner couples or employed sole support parents.

It is harder to make ends meet these days and it is becoming impossible to raise a family on one income. Wages have not kept pace with inflation. Taxes have increased while services have been cut. The number of women raising children on their own has risen, both due to divorce and to the fact that many young, unmarried mothers choose to raise their children themselves.

I want to go through each point of my motion. First, child care must be of good quality. Child development research shows that the quality of care children receive has a profound effect on their future development. Some unregulated, informal or private arrangements may suit all parties; for instance, sometimes a grandmother who cares for her grandchildren while her daughter or son is in the paid work force. Sometimes for some families that works and it is a positive arrangement. She may be a good, experienced caregiver who has a lot of love and wisdom to share.

We have all heard the horror stories of other types of unlicensed care such as the alleged sexual abuse ring, run from an unlicensed, unregulated child care centre in Martensville, Saskatchewan. Abuse can also be a problem in unregulated care provided by friends or relatives.

A child is most likely to be abused by someone they know, by a friend, a family friend or a relative, than by anyone else. We must ensure that all Canadian children are being cared for in conditions which do not hurt their health, imperil their safety or close their minds. That means good staff-child ratios so that caregivers can interact frequently with each individual child. It means fair wages, benefits and working conditions for child care workers so they do not burn out and a child can count on having the same caregiver for a period of several years. It means a physical environment which is safe and pleasant where kids can get fresh air. It means training in early childhood education for caregivers so they can structure programs appropriate for children's developmental levels.

When compared to France, Denmark, Sweden or Italy, Canadian child care is substandard on many counts and particularly deficient in staff training requirements. Not only must we have standards for care of our most important resource, our children, but those standards must be enforced.

Second, child care must be affordable. Since 1966 child care has been funded through the Canada Assistance Plan which is essentially a welfare program. The government has talked about giving parents choices, but currently many parents have no choice. They do not qualify for a subsidy, but cannot afford the full fees for care. Child care costs can take up almost all or a majority of a woman's yearly salary. A family with a pre-school child and one school age child can pay up to $12,000 a year for child care costs alone. It means a woman can end up working for $5,000, $6,000 or $7,000 a year after she has paid her child care costs.

The crying shame of this is that there are empty child care spaces out there that no one can afford and yet the line for subsidized child care spaces can be over a year long. That is a year when a parent must stay out of the paid work force or on welfare. Because of the shortage and ineligibility of many families for subsidized regulated spaces, many families are forced to turn to informal arrangements which can be unstable and for which they may not be able to get receipts to deduct on their income tax. Studies have found that unregulated arrangements have a high turnover rate which means the child is shunted about to a different caregiver every few months. People must have the option of affordable licensed child care.

Third, child care must be accessible regardless of income, employment status or geographic location. In Canada today, child care is simply not available in many rural areas, while both parents may be busy working on a farm or one is working in town while the other is working on the farm. Licensed child care is not accessible in Canada. Many families do not qualify for a subsidy and yet cannot afford the enormous costs of child care. The gap between the availability of licensed child care and the number of mothers in the paid labour force has been widening over the past decade until it has become a huge gulf. By 1990 there were 500,000 more children under 13 with a mother in the paid labour force for whom there was no more regulated child care than there was in 1983.

Fourth, child care must be comprehensive, culturally sensitive and be able to deal with special needs. Cultural sensitivity, training and screening should be a part of staff training and hiring. No child should go to child care and come out of that child care centre with a lack of self-esteem.

Aboriginal communities face a particular challenge in terms of instilling knowledge and respect of traditional language, customs, values and spirituality. Aboriginal child care must be controlled by aboriginal communities.

• (1740)

Fifth, child care must be flexible enough so that it can be used on a full, part-time or occasional basis or seasonally or by shift workers.

I had three children in two years. I know what it is like to be at home in a low income, one income family trying to deal with the needs of three very small children, one of whom was critically ill. Parents who are in that position must have the availability of respite so that they can have care for their children and continue to have their young children socially interact with other children and move out of their own home environment for the health of both the parents and the children.

The Canadian national child care study reported last year that 55 per cent of parents with paid employment did not have a standard work schedule, that is Monday to Friday with no evening or weekend work. Yet most child care centres are only open from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. or fewer hours. What care is there for children whose parents must work shift work? The need for flexible child care cannot be underestimated.

Why should taxpayers be paying good money for a child care centre's owner's profit rather than putting it directly into good nutrition and educational resources for children? There is a body of research that shows that commercial child care is on average of poorer quality than non-profit child care in the areas of child-staff ratios, staff training, staff turnover and wages and benefits.

Far from giving parents an increased choice most parents trying to find child care have little choice but to take whatever is available unless they are wealthy enough to be able to shop around.

Choice in child care is a myth. Many choices for families are constrained by economics in more ways than one. Some women who are in the paid work force would prefer to be at home with their young children. Some women who are at home being supported by a partner or on welfare or living on small savings would prefer to be in the paid labour force but are constrained by the lack of child care.

They cannot go to school. They cannot go for training or retraining. They cannot look for work. They cannot accept work because there is no alternative care for their children.

We are living in Canada in a society with a declining birth rate. The 1986 task force on child care known as the Katie Cooke task force reported that people wrote to them saying that the lack of parental leave and child care had directly affected their own child bearing decisions not to become parents. Our society does not acknowledge the work women do in the home and consequently underpays child care workers as well.

Many child care workers particularly in regulated non-profit centres have degrees or certificates in early childhood education, experience, patience, responsibility and love and they are paid much less than many male workers in jobs that require less education and certainly less responsibility.

This government and the Liberals when in power have chosen to avoid the fact of the increased need for affordable child care until it has now reached crisis proportions.

As a society we will prosper or decline based on how we collectively care for our children and on what opportunities they have to learn and to grow and to receive adequate nutrition and care. These early years are very important in shaping the health and abilities of our future society. We cannot afford to overlook it or to shrug it off just because pre-schoolers cannot write letters to members of Parliament or lobby or demonstrate on the lawns of Parliament Hill.

In 1970 the Royal Commission on the Status of Women said of child care that we are faced with a situation that demands immediate action. That was in 1970. Twenty-three years later nothing at all has changed except that federal child care funding contributions to the Canada Assistance Plan have been capped which is choking the ability of the provinces to pay for child care and a Child Care Initiatives Fund was set up to fund research in innovative projects only to be cut back twice by millions of dollars.

The Family Allowance Program was a way that Canadian society recognized albeit in a small way the contribution made to society by those who raise children. That program was eliminated.

• (1745)

We are still faced with attitudes like that of the Conservative member of Parliament from Fraser Valley West who recently said that child care centres are: "little more than temporary orphanages".

The Liberals had 14 years to act and they did absolutely nothing except study the issue. The time to act has long passed. Let us join together now with parents and with communities to build a comprehensive child care system which also recognizes and values the contributions of parents in the home and a child care system on which to base our future as a nation.

Canadian women and Canadian families are in desperate need of licensed child care in this country. They are very tired and very fed up with a government that continues to spend money on big-ticket items like $5.8 billion for 50 helicopters at the expense of our nation's children.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, children are our future. Everyone agrees on that.

How we care for children today, the support they get from their parents, teachers, community leaders and governments, will determine the success of our society later on. Today's children will be tomorrow's grown-ups. They will have to look after their own children's education while earning a living and paying taxes.

The family unit has changed considerably over the years. Nowadays, both parents generally have jobs out of their home. It is an economic necessity.

Statistics Canada 1991 census shows that 69 per cent of women with young children are in the work force, compared to 49 per cent a decade ago, in 1981.

This represents a radical change which has a major impact on how our society is organized, from business hours to flexible work schedules, from our social support networks to the kind of child care services available.

Child care and education are two of the most important aspects of a nation's social policy. We are glad to live in a privileged country. In most cases our children are raised in a loving environment and they are well fed. They are provided with the support and social skills they need to grow into responsible adults. Parents should be proud of their children's successes and accomplishments in spite of the increasing pressures being put on modern families.

Not all children live under the same conditions however. Some children suffer from malnutrition and infantile diseases and do not receive quality health care. So, government has to give priority to these children and situations.

Faced with limited financial resources and competing demands, government was forced to make a choice in 1992. It had to chose between providing a national child care program, investing loads of money in a government plan aimed at all the children or working together with its partners to provide immediate assistance to those who are the most vulnerable. The government chose the latter.

Last year the Minister of National Health and Welfare announced Canada's action plan for children entitled Brighter Futures. This is an extensive strategy dealing with prevention, promotion, protection and community action for our children.

The new child benefit was a major feature of Brighter Futures. This benefit combined the family allowance, the child tax credit and the dependant child tax credit and increased payments by $2.1 billion over a five-year period.

The child tax benefit also introduced a new earned-income supplement of up to $500 per family in recognition of the additional education costs faced by working families.

• (1750)

The child development initiative, Brighter Futures, is a $500-million program aimed particularly at vulnerable children. The federal government recognizes the importance of prevention. It wants to ensure that we look as early as possible after kids who are most likely to become sick or socially disadvantaged. The child development initiative is also targeted to parents at the community level. It enables them to acquire the necessary skills to raise their children even better.

Even though the government chose to direct additional money to children at risk rather than to child care services, it still supports the day care program. In fact, the amount spent by the federal government on day care services has quadrupled since 1984; it has gone from $250 million in 1984 to more than $1 billion last year. The government still supports this initiative.

For parents who work outside the home we have increased the maximum child care expense deduction on their income tax return starting with the current tax year. It goes up from $4,000 to $5,000 for each child under 7 or with special needs. For other eligible children the maximum deduction was raised from $2,000 to $3,000.

The government particularly looks after the need for child care services of parents taking training courses or trying to get off welfare. Employment and Immigration Canada makes payments totalling $75 million to trainees who need child care services.

Under the Canada Assistance Plan the federal government gives some $275 million a year to the provinces and territories to reserve day care spaces for low-income families.

Moreover, the federal government is a leader in national issues related to child care services through the Child Care Initiatives Fund. Since 1988 we have contributed more than $74 million for 468 national, regional and aboriginal projects.

All the programs which I mentioned, namely the child care expense deduction, the dependent allowances paid through CEIC training programs, the sharing of day care costs through the Canada Assistance Plan and the Child Care Initiatives Fund still exist. In fact they have been improved or expanded since this government came to power.

It is inaccurate to say that our government spends less on daycare. We may not be spending enough according to some, and we may not be able to take on all these expenses.

Just like today's families, the government is facing new realities. We cannot ask our children to bear the debt resulting from new spending programs. There should be a return on each dollar that we spend today.

This is why we are concentrating our efforts on vulnerable children. And let us not forget that the federal government helps children and their families through many other programs on protecting and promoting health, family violence, Canada's Drug Strategy and the environment. The federal government also supports the provincial and territorial programs on health, welfare and social services through tax transfers such as Established Programs Financing and the Canada Assistance Plan.

In spite of what our critics might say this government has not abandoned the children of Canada, their families or the day care program. We continue to meet the needs of all children. However we have increased our resources to help the neediest children especially.

We want to help those children and to do so we must reach their parents. Young parents, especially single mothers, must gain the necessary basic skills to be able to feed their children properly. These mothers need help to get training so that they no longer depend on social assistance. It is a mistake to believe that single mothers who are on welfare do not want to be independent and take care of their children on their own.

• (1755)

That is why we stress how important it is to help families to become financially independent. To this end, we have added the earned income supplement to the child tax benefit in order to further help the working, low income families.

One must also recognize that governments cannot bear the entire responsibility. The time has come to demand that employers take more steps to meet the needs of their employees. An adequate social policy would be greatly appreciated by their workers and their children and would be considered a good business decision.

We recognize that more must be done to allow all Canadians and in particular those who care for children to be able to be active members of society. We are committed to helping families escape the welfare merry-go-round.

It is probably the best hope we can give their children for a brighter future. These families will be able to state proudly that they can afford to support their children. In turn, their children will also feel that same pride and self-confidence which breeds autonomy. With the help of governments, social service agencies, communities and other partners this is the hope we can give all our children.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it is my very great pleasure to support this motion this evening. Before I get into my support of this motion, I cannot allow the remarks of the hon. member for Louis-Hébert to go unremarked. Indeed they were remarkable. They were remarkable with the greatest of respect for the hon. member in their sheer tommy-rotness if there is such a word.

I heard the hon. member say that one of the reasons the government has not instituted a national child care program is because it would cost too much money. I quote the hon. member, translating freely, that we cannot ask our children to bear the burden of the debt of the expenditures that we authorize today.

That is a noble sentiment in some categories, but when one million Canadian children today are latch-key children, are without care for a significant portion of their day, I bet if we asked them, they might not mind so much paying off that debt somewhere down the road. That is the disgrace we face in this country today.

The second thing I want to say about all this is I want to hearken back to the royal commission on employment equity chaired by, as she is now, Madam Justice Rosalie Abella of the appeal division of the Supreme Court of Ontario. There was a sentence in that report which should be carved in stone on every public building in this country. It perhaps should be carved in the stone of the heads of some of our colleagues. Those words are that child care is the bridge to employment equity.

I will go a step further because I suspect that most child care advocates, most women and most thinking men would agree with me that child care is the major bridge to gender equality in this country. Rightly or wrongly the major care givers for children are women. It is an unfortunate imbalance in the division of labour because both fathers and children would benefit greatly from more contact. That is a topic for another debate on another day.

In our society, indeed in western society and in the world society today, women are the care givers for children. If women are going to be able to take their full place in the labour force, if women are going to be able to work with a sense of security about their families, what great leap of logic does it take to say they must have adequate, accessible, affordable child care. I do not think you need an Einstein to set out that particular premise. We all know that is the case and the time has come to do something about it.

I realize my time is truncated. I have one minute so I will make the best of it. I will say that I agree with every single one of the six segments of my colleague's motion, but I want to speak most particularly, in the limited time available to me, about the question of child care services operating on a non-profit basis. This is something that we have traditionally done in this country—

Mr. Shields: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hate to interrupt my friend but I have to do this before six o'clock. I would ask consent of the House, and I think there have been discussions, that if during the late show we are called to the other place for royal assent that we suspend the late show to accommodate this and then resume the late show after royal assent is completed. I wonder if I could seek the unanimous consent of the House for this.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a follow-up to a question I asked the Minister of National Defence on February 22. It was a question on peacekeeping of great concern to me.

The point I made in my question was the concern I had at that time, in consultation with other members of Parliament and as a result of some hearings in the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs, with the growing dependence of the Canadian forces on reserve forces. It was the result of what I believe was the overcommitment taken on by the government for peacekeeping around the world.

This is a very judgmental thing. I raised the question with the minister and she really did not answer it. She gave me a lecture on what the Canadian forces were doing and talked about the perspective of international affairs. I am going to quote here what she did say. She said:

> In some instances we have deployed people where the United Nations has regarded our services of greater urgency than where they were at that particular time.

I was not sure what she meant by that. The minister went on to say that the Canadian forces were designed to meet domestic concerns and security concerns. I did not need the minister to tell me that. She continued:

> When they are not needed on active deployment we make them available to the United Nations. This incurs costs to the Canadian people.

The minister was not entirely right there. My understanding is that there is a commitment and a contingency in the planning process to commit x number of peacekeepers. I know at one point in time that was roughly 2,000 when we had a larger force of soldiers by 4,000.

I realize that we are going to reduce our commitment to Cyprus and there is some juxtapositioning going on regarding the deployment of troops. However, there are two points I want to make in this late show.

It is now March 30 and I am seeing more and more experts saying that a 50 per cent ratio—in fact in the case of the battalion relieving in Croatia which is under way right now—we are looking at 55 per cent of the force being reservists. I have the greatest admiration, belief and faith in reserves. I have always been for the total force concept. In fact I was very much involved in making the naval reserves part of the over-all total force concept in the navy. However in this particular case 55 per cent is way out of whack.

It is not me saying that. I was saying it on February 22, but in the latter days of this month of March no less than four experts are saying that 50 per cent is too much. They are saying that we are endangering our peacekeepers and we are doing things that we should not be doing. A recognized expert says that 10 per cent is about right. Whether it is 10 per cent, 5 per cent or 20 per cent, the fact is that 50 per cent is too much.

We have 60,000 peacekeepers deployed in the world today. Canada has 4,800 and that represents 8 per cent. We make up one-half of 1 per cent of the world's population. I think we are doing at least our share. One could argue we are doing more than our share.

My talking in the late show is not going to really achieve very much. I will get a response from the parliamentary secretary and then we will get on with other business. However, before we have any further commitment to United Nations peacekeeping operations, as they are not necessarily the old, low intensity peacekeeping operations that we knew in the past, we need to have a debate in this House. That is the point I was making to the minister and she missed it.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of National Defence, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question. As is his custom, the hon. member has once again shown his interest in the welfare of those who serve in the Canadian forces, a concern shared I am sure by all members of this House. First of all, I would like to talk about some specific points and then comment on some more general ones.

Although important, our participation in United Nations peacekeeping operations in only one aspect of our defence policy. It is an aspect of our activities that is a source of great pride among members of the Canadian Forces and contributes every day to increasing Canada's international reputation as one of the greatest supporters of the United Nations.

The Canadian forces now have sufficient resources to meet their obligations in peacekeeping operations. Although we are near our limit, the Canadian forces are still able to do their duty with the same professionalism and dedication that we have witnessed over the past 40 years.

Canadian troops are deployed in United Nations peacekeeping operations with the same care and attention that we have always shown in deploying our troops, whether in exercises or operations abroad. Canada maintains command of all its forces that are deployed in United Nations peacekeeping missions.

The question of our troops' safety was also raised, particularly concerning the type of armored vehicles that we use in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (1825)

[Translation]

And being returned:

The Acting Speaker (M. DeBlois): I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

> Bill C-119, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1993—Chapter 9
> Bill C-120, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1994—Chapter 10
> Bill C-104, an act respecting an agreement regarding treaty land entitlement in Saskatchewan entered into on September 22, 1992 among Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada, Her Majesty the Queen in right of Saskatchewan and the Keeseekoose, Muskowekwan, Ochapowace, Okanese, Piapot, Star Blanket, Yellowquill, Beardy's & Okemasis, Flying Dust, Little Pine, Moosomin, Mosquito Grizzly Bear's Head, Muskeg Lake, One Arrow, Pelican Lake, Red Pheasant, Saulteaux, Sweetgrass, Thunderchild, Witchekan Lake, Canoe Lake and English River bands, and respecting an agreement regarding treaty land entitlement in Saskatchewan entered into on September 23, 1992 among Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada, Her Majesty the Queen in right of Saskatchewan and the Nekaneet band—Chapter 11.

The Acting Speaker (M. DeBlois): The hon. member for Louis-Hébert has twenty seconds at most to complete her answer.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I doubt that I will be able, in 20 seconds, to briefly answer all the questions raised by the hon. member, though I am willing to try, if he is willing to listen.

SOVEREIGN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek answers from the Minister of Finance regarding what would appear to be a serious injustice done by his office and officials to the Sovereign Life Insurance Company, its employees and policy holders.

Last February 5, I asked the minister to tell the House precisely why the government had shut down the only federally regulated life insurance company in Calgary. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary will respond today. The junior minister certainly did not adequately answer then.

It would appear the minister's seizure of Sovereign Life on December 21, 1992 was based on grossly defective and irresponsible information his office received from the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, OSFI.

The Minister of State for Finance was present on November 30, 1992 when the company asked for an 80-day extension to produce audited 1992 financial statements and an unqualified actuarial opinion. He also had an independent actuarial opinion that the extension was warranted.

The actuaries, both highly respected individuals and one of whom used to be a member of this House, concluded as follows: If Sovereign were seized and liquidated, thousands of policy holders would incur losses; the company's position at the end of 1992 would be more favourable than indicated in the provisional actuarial opinion of November 11, 1992; and the only signed opinion the minister had before him on December 13, 1992 was that by the OSFI's own solvency test, "the MCCSR", Sovereign would be solvent at the end of 1992 and would improve its position during 1993. The OSFI significantly refused to provide any signed actuarial opinion.

The December 31, 1991 financial statement of Sovereign contained a $40 million error which was later adjusted in Sovereign's favour. At all times there were excess resources of $52 million. Does the minister or government dispute this? I think not.

The finance minister was not even present when Alan Graham, the former owner of Sovereign Life, made his presentation to the junior finance minister.

Despite a requirement of the relevant legislation, the senior finance minister subsequently ordered the company to be seized. It is the first time in 100 years a federal life insurance company had been brought down by Ottawa.

The seizure will affect about 240,000 Sovereign policy holders, 1,000 Sovereign brokers, 250 head office employees in Calgary, 300 in-house Sovereign agents. It will also affect about $810 million in company assets.

The minister's decision to take Sovereign over was appealed to the federal government on December 23. Has the government failed to file a response because there is no real response?

Sovereign was supposed to have its day in court today, but when an Alberta Court of Queen's Bench justice ruled to delay the legal action of the federal government until next September, Mr. Graham reportedly decided to turn to the Federal Court.

Why did this government attempt to have dismissed the shareholder action in Calgary seeking the right to represent Sovereign Life in the Federal Court in pursuing a claim for damages against the government agencies involved? Is this government afraid of the truth on this matter?

Finally, whatever might transpire in the courts will not alter the fact that the government has made another grave public policy error. What does the government intend to do to minimize the damage this grossly irresponsible action has done to a major financial institution in western Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to answer the question asked on February 5 by the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast on the Sovereign Life Insurance Company.

On December 21, 1992 the Finance minister, after a report by the Superintendent of Financial Institutions to the effect that the assets of Sovereign were not adequate to properly protect its policy holders and creditors and, after the company was given the opportunity to state its case, ordered that the Sovereign Life Insurance Company be placed under the control of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

The minister and the Superintendent acted promptly to preserve the assets and the residual value of this company for the benefit of policy holders. They both acted in accordance with their responsibilities under the Insurance Companies Act.

• (1830)

Before deciding to shut down the company considerable efforts were put into finding an investor who would inject money to allow the company to carry on and provide coverage to all its clients.

Unfortunately no one made a firm commitment to invest a larger amount of money and the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Compensation Corporation, an organization similar to CDIC but financed by the industry, did not take part in an assistance program to make the merger easier. The main responsibility of the minister and the superintendent is to protect those who entrusted Canadian financial institutions with their assets.

The Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions regulates about 175 life insurance companies. It has been doing so for a long time.

As far as the Sovereign Life Insurance Company is concerned, the company's finances were assessed by the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions and its report did not match assessments made by the company itself. After going through the accounting records potential buyers were not as optimistic about the financial situation of the company. That would explain why no other prospective buyer was to be found.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, on February 11, when we were debating the Unemployment Insurance bill, the hon. member for Laval–Est said, and I quote: "I have reported some myself and I am still alive. I am fed up with paying taxes and giving to the poor. I want everybody to be rich because if I am surrounded by poor people, some day they will steal from me or kill me."

That was a remark, as I said before, supposedly made by the hon. member for Laval–Est.

He made another remark, speaking in English, and I quote:

[English]

"It is the cheapest way and it is the best way to police a system. We can keep it confidential. You do not have to identify yourself. You just report to the government a neighbour or a friend".

My purpose on that particular day was to try to determine whether or not those particular quotations attributed to that particular member of Parliament were in fact correct, whether or not they were in line with the minister's thinking and whether or not they were government policy.

It just so happened that for some reason the Speaker of the day felt that perhaps these should not be read into the record. I felt rather badly about it because certainly I had taken them from public documents. I was not charging the member. I was simply saying it was attributed to that member. In fact the member could have risen if they were incorrect and dissociated himself from them.

In the ensuing debate the minister who was a little hot under the collar indicated and tried to denigrate the questions by suggesting that I had prepared them ahead of time and they had not heard that he had decided not to have that particular 1–800 line, often referred to as a snitch–line.

My subsequent question to that minister was, in spite of the fact that he had decided not to have that particular 1–800 number, would it be the policy of this government to encourage people to report others.

I think you can agree, Mr. Speaker, that there are some people who would take that responsibility much more seriously than others. There are some individuals unfortunately who would probably do so with a certain amount of glee. I do not like the notion of trying to encourage people from reporting others, particularly when they do not have to identify themselves.

It is quite easy to pick up the telephone and make any kind of charge, particularly when you do not have to identify yourself.

[Translation]

We know that this bill has now been passed by the government. I hope the government will not ask people to report their neighbours or their next of kin. I think it would be useless and dangerous to encourage such a policy since there would be no need to identify yourself and it would be so easy to do it.

[English]

Therefore I await the response of the parliamentary secretary with a certain amount of anticipation. I am pleased that I have an opportunity to correct the record and I am anxious to find out what the government has to say about this particular matter.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that my hon. friend would bring forward and try to resurrect an issue that was a false issue in the first place because the minister at no time ever considered a so-called snitch-line. That should have put an end to all debate in this House of Commons about it.

• (1835)

I would like to take advantage of this opportunity to inform my hon. friend about some of this government's activities to get Canadians back to work.

In 1992-93 Employment and Immigration Canada is investing $3.55 billion in providing training and employment assistance for over 900,000 Canadians. For 1993-94 we are increasing the UI developmental uses budget by another $260 million, bringing it to a total of $2.21 billion and EIC's over-all expenditures on training and employment assistance to $3.8 billion. With that $3.8 billion we will be providing assistance to over one million Canadians.

In 1993 some 326,000 Canadians will receive skills training through UI developmental uses, $110 million in self-employment assistance will encourage participants in their efforts toward greater self-sufficiency, and $15 million will go to assist workers to move to other localities where they have found jobs. Over 11,000 Canadians will be assisted under these programs.

The $120 million that is now budgeted for UI job creation will assist over 31,000 unemployed workers to get back into the work force by maintaining and enhancing their skills, and $130 million in work sharing assistance will allow employers and workers to jointly manage periods of production slow-down without reverting to lay-offs. Some 160,000 Canadians will participate in this initiative.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, tonight this brief exchange is on the North American free trade agreement, and in particular on the question of the environmental agreement that will be required if this trade agreement is to eventually become a reality.

I would like to refer more specifically to the exchange in Question Period on March 18 when I raised with the minister the question of the role of the North American commission on the environment. I urged him during that exchange to let us know whether this commission, which would be in charge of environmental management, the environment being the basis of our economy, would have powers to enforce environmental laws and standards.

The minister was visibly preoccupied with the question of sovereignty and the violation of sovereignty should such a commission become involved with enforcement of environmental standards, for instance. As often happens in exchanges in Question Period we got nowhere. It was like two trains passing by in the middle of the night.

Therefore I would like to put forward some thoughts and some possible suggestions concerning this North American commission on the environment. I will draw heavily in the two minutes available from a colloquium sponsored by the North American institute in Santa Fe, New Mexico, from February 12 to February 14 of this year.

In this report, which resulted from this symposium on the North American environment, there are a set of recommendations, the examination of which by this government would certainly be worth while. They ought to be the object of discussions by those officials who will be in charge of further deliberations in Washington with the Americans and the Mexicans.

The North American commission on the environment could play a role in regularly reviewing environmental programs of the three countries with the specific goal of strengthening and harmonizing upward environmental laws and enforcement in the three countries.

• (1840)

The same commission could have an oversight function with the help of the environmental ministries of the three governments and could also report annually to the three governments and the public.

The proposed commission should form part of the North American free trade agreement dispute resolution process when environmental questions are raised. This same commission should be institutionalized through appropriate mechanisms and I will not go into the details of the mechanism because of lack of time.

This commission under the mandate given it by the three governments should receive references from the government to investigate and report on matters of trilateral concern. This commission in its environmental monitoring role should provide particular attention to migratory species and the protection of trans-boundary natural resources.

This is where we probably differ. This commission ought to go beyond performing a monitoring role and should have some teeth.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to repeat the question that was put before the minister and it was as follows: "Will the government give its unqualified commitment that the proposed North American commission on the environment will have powers to enforce environmental laws and standards?"

The functions of the commission are still being negotiated among the three governments. At the first trilateral meeting Canada put forward proposals developed following consultations with the provincial governments, non-governmental organizations and other private-sector interests including business and labour representatives.

Our starting point is that the North American commission on the environment should strengthen trilateral co-operation and development and the enforcement of regulations to protect the environment. Our aim is to encourage the upward harmonization of environmental regulations and standards.

We also want to be confident that our respective domestic and environmental laws and regulations will be enforced. We seek a commission that respects the sovereignty of each party and at the same time provides strong assurances that domestic environmental law will be enforced and even improved over time.

The use of trade sanctions to enforce environmental standards would be a mistake. The use of trade sanctions could seriously harm vital Canadian trade and economic interests.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, on December 7 of last year I put a question to the Minister of Agriculture regarding the cut in subsidies to Canadian dairy farmers. That cut, although not very large, justifiably angered many dairy farmers who, over the last few years, were very concerned about the Dunkel report and the GATT negotiations. This cut just added to their anxiety, and I can understand that.

Dairy farmers are very much aware that the quota system, which is fundamental to the Canadian dairy industry, is being eroded. Not only are subsidies reduced but we can now read in various articles that a new way of measuring quotas is being sought.

Naturally quotas are extremely important and they really determine the value of a farm. The land and the buildings certainly have value, but without quotas that value is greatly reduced. Faced with this cut in subsidies the farmers would like to have an answer to this crucial question: Is the government still committed to defend and maintain milk production quotas? It is essential that dairy producers be assured that the quota system will never be jeopardized and will be kept intact. Dairy producers have to be guaranteed a certain price and not be faced every year with a cut in subsidies. We know that our dairy industry is very efficient; notwithstanding its critics, proof of that was given in the past.

In brief, the question dairy producers are asking is whether the quota system which has now existed for years and years in Canada will remain untouched? Moreover, they do not want any change without being thoroughly consulted.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to a question that was raised in this House on December 7 by the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre concerning the cut in the subsidies to the dairy industry.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that in his economic statement of December 2, 1992 the Minister of Finance stated that as part of the government effort to control the budget deficit the processed milk subsidy would be cut by 10 per cent in the next two fiscal years.

It is important to mention that there are two markets for milk in Canada: the market for milk (milk and fresh cream) and the market for industrial milk, which is used to make milk products such as butter, cheese and yoghourt. Producers get direct support payments of $ 6.03 per hectoliter of milk only for the deliveries of milk and cream required to meet domestic needs. Since the majority of producers make both fluid milk and industrial milk the cut in the federal subsidy does not affect their total production in most cases.

In times of budget restraints, tough decisions must sometimes be made. The subsidy cut would result in a decrease in revenues of no more than 60 cents per hectoliter of milk, or about 1.2 per cent. That is what the Minister of State for Agriculture answered when asked that question on December 7, 1992.

Even after this reduction, industrial milk producers will continue to receive over $200 million a year in subsidies from our government for their production of industrial milk.

How the subsidy cut will be implemented remains to be determined. It could be done in two different ways. The first possibility is to reduce the producer's target income by an amount equal to the subsidy cut. Producers would absorb the reduction and the prices of dairy products would remain unchanged.

The alternative is to increase support prices for butter and/or skim milk powder, which means that consumers would pay for the reduced subsidy. The producers' income per hectolitre would therefore remain unchanged, but the resulting price increase could have a slightly negative effect on demand for dairy products.

A third possibility would be to have producers and consumers share the impact of the lower subsidy.

I see that my time has expired. I would have liked to talk about quotas but time does not allow it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion that the House do now adjourn is deemed adopted. The House therefore stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.47 p.m..

MINING EXPLORATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the mining exploration industry in Canada can play an important role in the economic recovery, especially in the resource regions of Canada. I ask the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Department of Finance in Ottawa to take seriously the demands made by the Quebec prospectors association in December 1992.

ABORIGINAL LANGUAGES DAY

Ms. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, today is Aboriginal Languages Day, a proud occasion to celebrate the survival and richness of the 53 aboriginal languages spoken in Canada.

I am proud to say that the Northwest Territories has six official aboriginal languages: Chipewyan, Cree, Dogrib, Gwich'in, Inuktitut and Slavey. All six languages have equal status, rights and privileges with English and French within the NWT, including use in government services and communications.

Statistics show that 50 of Canada's 53 aboriginal languages are declining, endangered or facing extinction. In this year of indigenous peoples this government should provide the funding needed to promote language awareness and the revival of aboriginal languages in communities which are most threatened.

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Slavey, translated as follows:]

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, through a number of legislative initiatives which all opposition parties have attempted to derail, the government has restrained public spending in five major areas.

It has done so by reducing the rate of growth of transfers to provinces, for instance Bill C-32 and Bill C-60; by streamlining the operations of government, for instance Bill C-20, Bill C-21, Bill C-56, Bill C-63, Bill C-69 and Bill C-93; through the privatization of Crown corporations, for instance Bill C-8, Bill C-13, and Bill C-38; by restraining the salaries of public officials, for instance, Bill C-26, Bill C-55, Bill C-76 and Bill C-113; and by restraining grants and contributions to organizations.

The result of our ongoing efforts is that since 1987 we have run the operations of government in the black.

DISABILITIES

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, using the most recent figures available, the Roeher Institute estimates disabilities cost Canada and Canadians some $19.5 billion a year. That is a lot of money and the bill goes up each year.

• (1405)

For this reason alone all levels of government, as well as business and labour, should be finding ways to co-operate in order to deal with and address these costs and the effects of disability in our society.

However we must never forget that disabilities affect Canadians where they live: in their families and in their communities. The Canadian Association of Community Living is working to ensure that mentally handicapped people can live at home, go to the local school and take a job. Allowing people with disabilities to take their rightful place as full members of our society ought to be our goal.

Independence and integration of persons with disabilities makes not only good economic sense but it respects the rights of citizens and promotes social and political values that will benefit us all.

THE LATE CLAUDE MOUTON

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all Canadians and all my colleagues in the House and in my own name, I wish to pay tribute to a great Canadian who died last night at the age of 61.

Mr. Mouton's contribution to the sporting and social life of Quebecers can never be forgotten. Last Saturday night, he was still behind the microphone in the Forum. When I saw him there I remarked to my wife how courageous he was.

[English]

It is with great admiration for him and for what he did that in the name of each and every one of us I thank him.

THE PREMIER OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate a former colleague in this House, Catherine Callbeck, who on Monday made history by becoming the first woman elected premier in Canada.

Under Premier Callbeck's leadership the Liberal team won 55 per cent of the popular vote in the election and won a landslide victory with 31 seats in the legislature. In a campaign based on positive ideas and a concern for the future the Liberal Party distinguished itself.

I wish to congratulate the many fine members of the Prince Edward Island legislature. After seven years of fine Liberal government Islanders can look forward to four more years of a strong Liberal administration.

The mandate from the people is clear, and I know that Premier Callbeck is up to the task.

NATIONAL DEFICIT

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, two days ago we in the Reform Party of Canada released our plan to eliminate the federal deficit in three years and save Canada's social programs from complete collapse.

This plan has met with favourable editorials across the country. Our zero in three plan is based on: first, fairness, that federal spending reductions should be distributed fairly across all major areas of federal expenditure; second, the principle of leadership by example; and, third, the principle of priorizing social spending.

The debt has increased under Tory mismanagement from $180 billion in 1984 to $460 billion today. Thirty-two cents out of every tax dollar is being spent on interest, leaving only 68 cents for funding government programs and services.

Yet the government says its hands are tied, that there is nothing it can do about it, and deficit reduction requires constitutional amendments. The fact of the matter is that neither the Progressive Conservatives, the Liberals, nor the New Democratic Party have any plan to reduce the deficit. In fact they plan to increase spending and increase the debt.

The Reform Party is the only party that can stop the haemorrhaging and save our social safety nets.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, Canada has just scored a coup. Canadians should take pride in Monday's announcement by the Financial Network Association that it had chosen Ottawa for its one-stop shopping financial data network.

The expertise of Canadian telecommunications is world renowned, and for this reason Canada is quickly becoming the nerve centre for financial information.

Telecommunications is one of the engines of growth in the Canadian economy, and the implications of this announcement are enormous. We have just been elevated to the forefront of this $30 billion a year industry.

This is good news for all Canadians and speaks well of our country's good standing within the international community.

THE LATE CLAUDE MOUTON AND DANNY GALLIVAN

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, last night, the Canadiens hockey team lost another of its spokesmen. Claude Mouton, the well-known announcer who worked in the Montreal Forum for the Canadiens, died at the age of 61. How can we forget Claude Mouton, in his well-known style, welcoming the Canadiens onto the ice?

Indeed, for over 21 years, Claude's voice stirred the Forum crowds.

[English]

Recently another legend at the Forum, hockey broadcaster Danny Gallivan, passed away. Together these two men were institutions in Montreal, and their association with sport and particularly the Montreal Canadiens was enjoyed by hockey fans across Canada.

It is only when people like Claude Mouton and Danny Gallivan leave us that we realize how much they meant to the game of hockey and to those of us who grew up listening to them.

As a former NHL official, I have fond memories of these gentlemen. I will always remember their contribution to hockey, their love for the game, the pride they took in their work and, most important, the enjoyment they provided to the fans.

FEED FREIGHT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, again I am urging the Department of Agriculture to accept the formula outlined by the Atlantic Farmers Council when the 10 per cent reduction is applied to the Feed Freight Assistance Program.

The current proposed formula contradicts the Feed Freight Assistance Act by abandoning the primary principle of the act, which is to ensure fair equalization of feed grain prices throughout Canada.

The impact on Atlantic Canada is 50 times as much as it is on Ontario under the present proposed plan. Also any change in the Atlantic subsidy should not take place until the same reduction takes place in the west.

The provinces do not agree with the present plan; the industry is against it; and it contradicts the principle of the act. I respectfully request that this plan not be implemented, and that it be replaced by one that is fair to all farmers.

ABORIGINAL LANGUAGES DAY

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Tansi. Mr. Speaker, today, March 31, is Aboriginal Languages Day.

In March 1989 Canada's chiefs attending a special meeting of the Assembly of First Nations unanimously passed a resolution declaring March 31 of each year Aboriginal Languages Day.

The chiefs did so to promote and enhance an awareness and revival of aboriginal languages and to celebrate the survival and richness of the 53 aboriginal languages spoken in Canada.

The Assembly of First Nations is calling for the recognition of aboriginal languages in Canada during 1993, the International Year for World Indigenous Peoples.

It is time for Parliament to accept the AFN proposal and recognize the unique contribution these languages have made to Canada, as well as the essential role language plays in the maintenance and development of culture and well-being among First Nations people. Tenaké.

Oral Questions

ABORIGINAL LANGUAGES DAY

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, thank you for your simply outstanding presentation this morning at the national prayer breakfast. Kinanaskomtin Daytapewkimaw.

In 1989, recognizing the need for a day to draw attention to the fact that aboriginal languages were at risk, the chiefs of First Nations in assembly declared March 31 Aboriginal Languages Day.

As our colleague, the member for Western Arctic, said today is a day when First Nations celebrate the survival and richness of the 53 aboriginal languages spoken in Canada.

I ask this House to recognize all aboriginal languages in this International Year for World Indigenous Peoples. I also call on all First Nations to continue their dedicated efforts to ensure the survival of our languages.

The manifestation of our spirit, mind and body, the development of our positive self-esteem and pride is through the use of our own languages.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, today the headlines are shouting what the Liberals have suspected all along, that Canadians are paying higher prices for drugs than most industrialized countries.

What a coincidence that this damning evidence was released after the government forced Bill C-91 through Parliament. What a coincidence that a public forum to look at this evidence was held five days after, and not before, Bill C-91 was given royal assent. What a coincidence.

I have a message for this government. Its mandate is to protect the people of Canada and our health care system. Drug companies work for profit, for the bottom line.

I urge the government to roll back drug prices, to start working for Canadians and for medicare, and not to let drug company bottom lines call the tune to which the government dances.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I am in the process of filing a petition with 150,000 signatures requesting that this government deal with the issue of penalties for child molesters and child murderers.

• (1415)

These individuals believe that the people's voice to reinstate capital punishment should be heard. This government has avoided dealing with criminals who commit such heinous and immoral crimes.

Mrs. Barbara Wiebe of Calgary and her friends and colleagues have done an extraordinary job in co-ordinating and collecting signatures. I would like to take this opportunity to thank Mrs. Wiebe and all those involved in this massive effort.

In memory of Shannon Dawn Morrissette-Bird and all children who have suffered at the hands of others, I urge the government to introduce legislation to deal with these criminals.

WESTRAY COAL MINE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on May 20, 1992, just a few days after the Westray coal mine blast claimed the lives of 26 men, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism stated: "What we will do of course is bring forward all the appropriate information as soon as possible". All the information. That is what the minister said then.

Yesterday senior legal counsel to the judicial inquiry in Nova Scotia was compelled to state publicly that this government, this minister, had declined to release the documents.

After almost one full year of stonewalling Parliament and hiding vital information from Canadians, will the minister now stand in his place, do the right thing and admit that he misled Parliament?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am going to stand in my place and make it very clear to this House that the hon. member has misled Parliament.

Yesterday the commission counsel made the following comment: "The inquiry does have an incomplete copy of the CANMET report which is obtained from a source other than the federal government". I stood in the House and said that this was not the case and that they in fact had received the CANMET report in its entirety.

I have just received a letter from the commission counsel. I will read it to the House: "I can confirm to you that the report identified by our file is the document which has been referred to as the CANMET report and that it was received from your client as part of the delivery of documents in June 1992".

I accept his apology and I hope to have the same from the hon. member.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on June 9, 1992 when asked about the disclosure of the Westray mine documents the government House leader stated: "The government has been forthcoming with all of the background documents necessary for people to examine what has occurred and reach their own conclusions".

On December 1, 1992 the Prime Minister stated: "The position of this government will be to a full and complete co-operation with the public authorities in Nova Scotia".

Senior legal counsel yesterday said: "The inquiry does not have a copy of the memo to energy, mines and resources minister Jake Epp entitled 'Federal Funding of the Westray Coal Mine'".

Will the minister stand in his place and tell the House that he has a second letter, that the inquiry has received that document and he is now going to disclose that to the Canadian public?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, we must remember. We must put this in perspective. We have to have a reality check here.

First of all the regulation of mines is a provincial responsibility. That is why there is a provincial commission of inquiry looking into it. Second, the federal government's role in this was only to give a loan guarantee. It is not to inspect the mine for safety but to give a loan guarantee which of course was our only participation.

What disturbs me is what the hon. member did yesterday. He brought documents in here. We are talking about the death of 26 miners. To get to the bottom of why they died is very important to everybody in Canada, including this House. The hon. member brought documents pertaining to this into this House. He has had them for three or four months and did not reveal it to the House until yesterday. If there is a cover-up, it is a cover-up by the hon. member.

• (1420)

The situation is this. We have co-operated with the commission and we are going to co-operate with the commission fully. We are going to co-operate fully because we want to get to the bottom of this matter. We want the Canadian people to know why these miners died. I think the hon. member should help us in that task.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, what Canadians want from the minister responsible and all members of the cabinet are answers to the questions which have been plaguing Nova Scotians and particularly the families of the deceased miners.

The minister will know that 26 men have lost their lives. The inquiry has been suspended. Curragh has closed the mine. The taxpayers in Nova Scotia and in Ottawa have lost $12 million and $80 million respectively.

I ask that the minister make available to the public today the document with regard to the Westray funding and all of its contents to date so that Canadians will know that this government is trying to protect the political hides of the federal cabinet and the premier of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am as willing as all members are every day to be partisan back and forth in this House. But when it comes to the death of 26 miners, the hon. member has gone far beyond what is appropriate.

He knows very well first of all that his facts are wrong and that $80 million has not yet been lost. The federal government holds title to the property that can be disposed of, certain funds of which could come back to the Crown.

More important, financial matters are not as important as these miners. What we want to do is get to the bottom of why they died. The commission of inquiry is going to do its work. It is going to be resuming its hearings in a matter of weeks. We will be tabling all of the relevant documents we said we would with them at that time.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister and concerns the Westray Mine case. On May 9, 1992, 26 people lost their lives in the tragic explosion at the Westray Mine. Nearly $80 million in taxpayers' money has now been lost.

If what the minister says is true, is he prepared to table the missing pages in the House today? Is he prepared to do so, yes or no?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, this government has co-operated with the commission from the beginning and it will right to the end of its inquiries.

What I want to know from the hon. member is whether he and his party are going to apologize for raising an accusation yesterday in the House which was totally false, which has been confirmed by the commission counsel.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the minister just told us that he was prepared to co-operate with the inquiry commission. How does he explain the fact that yesterday, March 30, 1993, commission member John Merrick stated that the government had not released to the commission all the documents dealing with the Westray mine case.

Who is telling the truth, the minister or the Nova Scotia commission? Who is the minister trying to protect? Himself, his cabinet colleagues or the Premier of Nova Scotia who is in trouble?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the truth is that the commission lawyer had the courtesy and good grace to apologize for making a mistake. The hon. member does not seem to be willing to do that.

The hon. member has also asked for us to table further documents with the commission. We will do so as soon as it resumes its hearings.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

A major study today of seven industrialized countries has found that Canada's drug prices are among the highest in the world. They are 56 per cent higher than the international average. The evidence is clearly contrary to what Canadians were told during the debate on the drug patent legislation. Clearly something has gone very wrong.

Given the figures that have come out today, will the Deputy Prime Minister announce an inquiry into drug prices in Canada which will include why the prices are so high, the effects of the high prices on provincial and territorial budgets, and indeed the effect of the North American free trade deal on making it impossible to change this legislation if it is implemented?

• (1425)

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we have to be aware of what has happened with drug prices since 1987. Before Bill C-22 the increase in prices in Canada was 7.9 per cent per year. They have decreased to 2.6 per cent, which is lower than the inflation rate. That is exactly what we said we would do in 1987 and it is exactly what we did. However at that time we did not have full control on the entry level prices with Bill C-22.

Bill C-91 had two specific purposes. One was to give protection in terms of intellectual property and development research and also to enforce the capacity of the PMPRB to control the price on entry and to control all prices.

We did exactly what we said we would do. The prices the member is referring to are prices which would be much higher if we had not done what we did in 1987 and 1991.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Sometimes I wonder if the whole government is inhaling.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. McLaughlin: The head of the government's own prices review board has said that these higher drug costs "are not consistent with the principle articulated in our mandate". Just last fall the government was told by Green Shield Inc. that the average cost of a claim for drugs after the government first protected the multinationals was more than double than before they did so. This change in legislation by this government is going to cost the provinces over $4 billion.

While this government is telling the provinces and territories to expect less and less health care and giving more and more profits to the multinational corporations, will the minister institute an inquiry into these unreasonably high drug prices?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly not comment on the premise that it is not the best question a member has asked since I have been in the House of Commons.

The hon. member is talking about an inquiry. She should first understand that the PMPRB is the board with the responsibility. It now works with the provinces to consider the prices of drugs and to act with regard to any price which is considered as unreasonable. That is what it did. That is what it will continue to do because its powers have been increased from what they were before.

Bill C-91 is a good bill. With regard to the question of the costs to the provinces, the hon. member should know because we have said time after time that patented drugs are 3 per cent of the volume of all drugs paid for by the provinces. If she would use the Conservative figures instead of the NDP figures maybe she would understand for once.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the final fact is that it is not working. Canadian drug prices are too high and are higher than international drug prices. That is a fact.

[Translation]

With the North American Free Trade Agreement it will be impossible for the Government of Canada to change this legislation. In that case, people have the right to expect this government to backtrack. Otherwise it will be too late.

Will the government order an investigation to determine the long-term impact on the price of drugs and on health care budgets across the country?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, what I said in English applies in French as well. We have no intention of conducting an investigation into the price of drugs, since we have the appropriate mechanisms to ensure that prices remain at reasonable levels for Canadian users.

As for health care costs, all provinces, including those with an NDP government, consider that the amounts invested in their health care systems are adequate. In fact, today, Quebec, Saskatchewan and Newfoundland have cut the amounts allocated to health care, because the amounts invested are sufficient. I repeat, we are not considering an investigation into the cost of drugs.

WESTRAY COAL MINE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to return to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism.

On June 8, 1992, recognized in Hansard, page 11571, the minister at that time stated that all the information necessary was tabled in the House.

Today we have the minister admitting that the key document outlining the federal role in the funding of the Westray mine has not been made public. It has been withheld.

I want to ask the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism why this key document has not been made public and withheld. Why has the government stonewalled on this key issue outlining the federal responsibility and role in the Westray mine disaster? Why has it stonewalled for 10 months? Who is the minister trying to protect?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member and his colleagues have been playing politics with this issue through the whole of Question Period.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hockin: He knows very well that we have already tabled 7,000 pages with the commission. We will be tabling thousands more when the commission reconvenes. We have committed to do this and we certainly will do it.

The only admission I have not heard is an admission from them yesterday that they were wrong when they said that we had not tabled the CANMET report. In fact, as their own commission's counsel said today, not only did we table it but they received it months ago. They apologized for making the mistake, but no apologies from the hon. members opposite.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to come back to this minister or the acting minister.

I think they both understand that in a mining accident of this severity where lives were lost and safety was compromised, any government or agency involved has the utmost responsibility for accountability.

Ten months ago the government was asked to produce all the documents. It did not do that. It has withheld a key document outlining the federal role in the funding of the Westray mine incident. Even now with the threat of a federal commission of inquiry the minister still says: "Well, we may or may not put it forward. We haven't put it forward". They rejected, stonewalled, stopped the opposition.

Who made that decision? Was it this minister? Was it the Prime Minister? Was it the former Minister of Justice? Was it the minister of energy? Who is responsible for the cover-up?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the only cover-up the House has heard in the last two days is material that the hon. member's colleagues had yesterday that they kept to themselves for three or four months. It affects the lives of these 26 miners. If they cared about it, why did they not release it before yesterday?

The other point is that the hon. member makes the premise that there was a safety problem. We do not know. That is why the commission was struck by the provincial government, to look into whether there was a safety problem and, if so, who was the cause of it, what was the cause of it.

We want to co-operate with that. It is provincial jurisdiction. It is a provincial inquiry. We are going to co-operate fully with them as we have in the past and will in the future.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism.

Eleven days after the blast that killed 26 men at Westray the minister said in this House, and I quote him: "These Westray documents are coming together very quickly. I hope that we will be able to get them before the public shortly". That is what he said.

As we know nothing has been put before the public, although we do have a document with everything wiped out, censored, except the title and we have another one that was obviously censored by some Tory in a back room.

Mr. McKnight: Order. Withdraw.

Mr. Simmons: What I want to ask the minister is this. When will he release untampered documents—

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Simmons: —so that the Canadian people can see if the Prime Minister is interested in miner safety or the careers of his justice minister and his good buddy, Donny Cameron?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member makes two mistakes. First of all he is politicizing in a very big way what is basically a human tragedy. Second, he has failed to do his homework. He has failed to do 7,000 pages worth of homework. We have already tabled 7,000 pages on this subject and we have thousands more to come when the commission reconvenes.

• (1435)

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows politics is written all over this one. That is the point he is trying to skate around.

My colleague, the House leader, wrote the government just four days after the tragedy advocating that every document which may touch directly or indirectly on the Westray case be preserved and protected. Now a federal judge tells us that the federal Department of Justice had deliberately and consistently withheld information about Westray from the provincial inquiry and that documents had been censored and altered in back rooms.

My question is for the Minister of Justice. Why did he or his predecessor think it necessary on this case to muddy the waters, to fudge the record?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, members of the party opposite are having a terrible time listening to my answers. They are having a terrible time dealing with what I have already told them: not only have we co-operated with the commission fully but also the allegation he just made is patently false.

Let me read again the letter that I have just received from the commission counsel. It states:

> I can confirm to you that the report identified by our file IST 9 is the document which is being referred to as the "CanMet" Report and that it was received from your client as part of the delivery of documents in June of 1992.

The hon. members opposite said we never sent the report or if we had sent it we only sent part of it. The commission counsel is now saying they were wrong and we were right.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, the only thing certain about this whole Westray episode is that the government is confused, the opposition is confused, we are confused, and the public is confused.

We have to get something straight. Yesterday the commission counsel for the inquiry said in a prepared release that the document they had called the CANMET report was not supplied by the government.

Today the minister quotes a letter, part of which reads:

> In the Fall of 1992, we became aware of a document identified as a "CanMet" Report. On checking our documents, we found no reference to CanMet. We subsequently obtained a copy of a Report from another source which had a title page identifying it as "CANMET REVIEW".

The person who supplied the report to the commission of inquiry in Nova Scotia was Alexa McDonough, the NDP leader of the party in Nova Scotia, not the federal government. We have that from two independent sources within the commission.

I ask the minister to finally try to get the answers straight. Did the government supply the report to the commission or not? What report did it supply? When are we going to get to the truth of this matter? Will he table his letter?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed with the tone of my hon. friend's question. His party, to some degree, has not played politics with this issue as the Liberals have. Now he is doing that by mentioning names of prominent political people in the provincial legislature.

Let me tell the member this. If he reads this letter, and I invite him to read the letter, the commission counsel is saying that the reason they made the mistake is they did not get the title right. They now admit they had the document all along and they apologized for it. If the hon. member wants me to read all five paragraphs of the letter I will be glad to do it.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, to begin with I thought the usual practice in this place was for a minister, when he read from correspondence, to immediately table that correspondence. Since he has not yet done so I hope he will very soon.

The last thing I want to do is play politics with this issue, especially since 26 lives were lost. As I stated before, on a very brief supplementary, there is a lot of confusion and most of all the confusion is among the public, the miners and the people of Nova Scotia.

Last June my colleague from Edmonton East asked the minister that in view of the fact he agreed the commission of inquiry had no power to compel the federal government to supply documents and seeing as that has become one of the most uncertain and confusing issues in this whole affair, will the minister and the government now agree to hold a federal inquiry that will have powers so we can get at the truth? The government has the power to seek and demand the truth. Can we get this matter clarified, put politics aside and get safety in the mines of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member needs a reality check again.

What we have here is a provincial inquiry into a matter of provincial jurisdiction which is safety. Regulation of safety in mines has always been provincial. That is why, in fact, the provincial government quite properly is having an inquiry. We want to co-operate because I believe the commission can get to the bottom of this. We have already sent them 7,000 documents. We will be sending them thousands more when they reconvene.

Not only that, but the federal government's role in this was simply as a loan guarantor. This is very far from safety in mining, but as a loan guarantor we want to participate fully in the inquiry. We look forward to co-operating with the commission.

COMMUNICATION-QUÉBEC

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services or whoever answers for him.

The minister announced in February that he had asked his officials to end, at least for now, the interruption of the system whereby Quebecers can obtain information on government services from a single source. We know that this system is very convenient and practical for Quebecers and lets them obtain useful information on the services of the Quebec and federal governments all in one place.

Now that the minister has surely had time to consider this important matter, I ask him to tell us whether he can assure the House today that this single source system will be maintained permanently.

[English]

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact there is a mix-up in some of the information. A person from my department met with some public officials in the province of Quebec in December who made this request. The minister in Quebec, Mr. Cannon, made this a public matter at the end of January.

I have talked to my officials and an approach has been made to his department to see if we can extend the present arrangements, at least for another year and a half while we negotiate. We are not really thrilled with the idea that we go along with him, that we should increase our payments by 10 per cent each year for the next three years for a total of 30 per cent. We think we had better negotiate some of the cost factors involved too.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the answer and I am not sure whether the services will be maintained or not. This is the most popular service there is. It is one of the few successes in federal-provincial harmonization and I ask why the minister does not tell us today, clearly and frankly, that he will not end this single-source system but maintain it and make it an example for all the departments concerned.

[English]

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member did not hear what I said.

I said that I have contacted him within the last little while to see if we cannot extend the present services. That certainly seems like a continuation if we are going to extend.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

Senator David Pryor in a letter to U.S. trade representative Mickey Kantor indicates that the government sacrificed the Canadian generic drug industry solely at the request of President Bush, and I quote: "The previous Bush administration exerted significant pressure on the Canadian government to abandon their system of generic drug licensing", a move that will cost the Canadian health care system over $4 billion.

Why did the minister cave in at the negotiations? Why did he put the political interests of the President of the United States ahead of the public interest of Canadians?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): First, Mr. Speaker, as we already said and will repeat again, there was no pressure by the United States on the health care system and there is no pressure from ourselves either on the health care system.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, let me try it again. My supplementary question is for the Minister for International Trade, the individual who negotiated this deal.

Today the government's own watch-dog, the PMPRB, reported that as a result of the government's drug patent laws Canadians are paying some of the highest pharmaceutical costs in the entire industrialized world. Yet the Minister for International Trade will get up and defend the clause he agreed to in the NAFTA that will lead to even higher drug costs for all Canadians.

Given the report of the PMPRB, does the minister of trade now agree with Senator Pryor and will he agree to have these offensive clauses removed from the proposed NAFTA deal?

• (1445)

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is strange that the member referred to the patent drug legislation. All the countries which are supposed to have prices lower than Canada do not have any kind of compulsory licence system.

All the countries the member is talking about do not have a compulsory licence system. They have a mechanism to control, as we have in Canada. I said before, as he knows, that we have reduced the prices under Bill C-22 and that the PMPRB has all the authority to do the same if it considers that prices are not reasonable under Bill C-91.

We accomplished exactly the purposes we had in mind when we decided to put Bill C-22 and Bill C-91. He should read the bill very attentively and maybe he will understand.

CIGARETTE LABELLING

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The Liberal Party is not against the proposed new regulations regarding the labelling of cigarettes, but the pending new regulations are causing great havoc in the packaging industry.

Can the minister give me assurance that two concerns of the packaging industry will be met; number one, that the industry will be given adequate lead time to refit its production lines and, two, that the industry will be given adequate transition time to fill existing orders and dispose of current inventory in its warehouse?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first I want to correct something which appeared in the newspaper this morning in terms of the uncertainty about the law. There is no change in the law.

I said last week or the week before that by September 1 normally the companies would be ready to make the change because technically the drums used by the company to print the packs have to be changed every three months. They have five months and within that period they will have the opportunity to do what should be done. We gave enough time so that the companies would not have to pay more money to apply the regulation that the government decided on.

I believe it is fair and I believe it responds to the concerns we have about the tobacco problem.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, with layoffs affecting 200 to 300 employees at a packaging industry in eastern Ontario, announced just yesterday, there is a great deal of uncertainty in the communities affected.

Will the minister give me assurance that he will consult immediately with the packaging industry to work out a mutually agreeable time at which the new regulation will take effect so that the 200 to 300 employees who are now unemployed can get back to work?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the rationale of the company to have laid off people yesterday or today because it is not sure about what will happen. It should know. I was very clear about the date, September 1, and it was presented to the companies previously.

We consider it reasonable to believe it can be done. If there are many other reasons I do not know about to lay off people, that is fine, but it is not because there is uncertainty because there is no law which needs to be changed. It is regulations that have been passed by the government. They are ready to be applied. Everything is well known. The companies should know that.

COMMUNICATION–QUÉBEC

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services.

On February 1 and 2, I spoke in this House for maintaining the excellent service provided by Communication–Québec on federal programs and services for the federal government.

Can the minister tell us today if his department is implementing a new Info–Centre Canada service in Quebec and whether this service that Communication–Québec provides for programs will be eliminated by Christmas 1993?

If so, that is no gift.

[English]

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I believe the government announced back in the fall of 1992 that it was looking at a system of centralization for all federal information across Canada and that it was setting up some pilot projects to look at this.

I understand there are some pilots in place.

• (1450)

At the present time I am inquiring through Communications Quebec as to whether or not we can maintain the same arrangement we presently have, subject to price and availability, at least up until the end of December 1994 so that these things can be finalized one way or the other.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for small businesses. It has to do with the changes passed in this House to the Small Businesses Loans Act. Incidentally they were much needed changes. My question is simply this. Can we expect more and better co–operation from the banks in relation to this act?

The second part of my question is: When can we expect implementation of the working capital provision within this act, which is probably the most important provision within this new act?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. friend for his question. The new act is so different from the previous one that we should almost change its name to the super–duper loans act because it is a lot better than the previous one.

The banks, because of the increased guarantee and the increased commission, are very keen to promote it. They are already producing brochures. We are going to be producing our own brochure. Over a thousand will be sent to hon. members in the House of Commons and in the Senate to distribute.

We also are making sure that they are training their loan officers. Because they are under this act, the financial institutions will be limited on the amount of personal security that they can take against an SBLA loan. There will be many more funds left for working capital. That is the big advantage of these new changes.

WYETH–AYERST

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of industry.

Just months after the brand name drug companies promised more jobs to Canadians if they were given new patent privileges, one of the giants of this drug industry, Wyeth–Ayerst, yesterday closed its factory in Windsor, cutting 219 jobs.

We have now discovered that the Canadian operations of this empire received $4 million from the department of industry. I want to ask the minister if he will insist on getting that money back from this company given that it has broken its promise to Canadians and left long–term employees with a jobless future in a tough city in which to find a job in 1993.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I know my hon. friend did not do this deliberately, but he did neglect to say that Wyeth has merged with Ayerst, McKenna & Harrison as a result of a world–wide merger. The business of the combined companies will be concentrated in Montreal in their much larger Ayerst operations.

I am sure my hon. friend would want to correct the impression he left with the House that Wyeth was pulling out of Canada altogether. It is consolidating its operations under one roof in Montreal and creating a good number of jobs in Montreal as a result of that.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

When debating Bill C–91, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said that Bill C–91 would help provide new jobs, attract new investment in R and D, and provide new export opportunities. I do not think he said that they would be in Montreal. We received a number of letters in my office from employees of Wyeth expressing support for Bill C–91.

My question to the minister is: Would he blame those employees who have lost their jobs today if they regard the promises of Wyeth, of the PMAC and of this government as nothing but lies, lies and more damn lies, or does he have any solution for these people who have lost their jobs in Windsor? They do not care how many jobs are produced in Montreal.

• (1455)

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Domm: No NDP in Montreal.

Mr. Della Noce: That's a good way to elect PCs in Montreal.

An hon. member: Montreal doesn't have a socialist government.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the only point that I would make to my hon. friend is that I hope he regrets the statement that he just made. Montreal is a part of Canada and there is a combination of operations within Canada.

Jobs have been created in one part of the country. Yes, it is unfortunate that jobs were lost in Windsor. I am sure that my hon. friend would reflect on the fact that $1 billion of investment has gone from Ford into Windsor and that Chrysler had put $450 million worth of investment in the Windsor area. These are all things that are positive to the Windsor economy.

The last point I will make to my hon. friend is this. The point by him and his colleague from Windsor about this action on the part of these two companies having something to do with Bill C–91 is totally wrong. It has absolutely nothing to do with Bill C–91.

INTERNATIONAL AID

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Since 1989 the government has cut $4.5 billion from international aid budgets. Besides the devastating impact that this has had on the world's poorest people, one of the key affected groups in Canada is the non–government organization committee.

For three years this community has been trying to meet with the minister to discuss the cuts. Why has the minister not met with this community? Will he meet with its people now before the minister comes down with his budget in April?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have been engaged in pre–budget consultations for the last two to three weeks.

I have had seven meetings right across the country plus a number of bilaterals. We usually have 15 or 16 groups that come before the committee. They would certainly be welcome to come before that committee. I will see them whenever I get an opportunity. Obviously they meet with the minister responsible.

I simply want to tell the hon. member that if she looked at the growth in foreign aid, ODA, she would find that the growth in that particular sector has been greater than the over-all program expenditures.

I think she should be the first one to understand that when we are engaged in fiscal restraint, all areas and all sectors are going to be affected. This sector has not been affected as negatively as many other sectors, I remind the hon. member.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my second question is for the Prime Minister on another foreign aid issue. In his absence I will direct it to the House leader.

Yesterday the Prime Minister met with ex-Soviet President Gorbachev and restated his position that the west must move quickly to help Russia. Today he announced that an aid package will be announced as part of the Yeltsin-Clinton summit this weekend in Vancouver.

We would like to know if the government will follow through on the commitment made here last week by the Prime Minister that would allow us to have a parliamentary debate on this subject either tomorrow or Friday so that a strong statement of support can be made by the Canadian people through Parliament before President Yeltsin arrives in Canada.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure through the negotiation process of the House leaders such a debate can be arranged.

The hon member, since she is so interested in this subject, may want to suggest the use of a Liberal opposition day for this purpose since the House time is being very compressed. I think that is clearly an opportunity that the Leader of the Opposition and the Liberal members can seize upon.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The green plan promises that there will be an environmental assessment of every policy that goes to cabinet for a decision and that the environmental implications will be released at the same time as the policy.

As the minister knows, the major policy statement of any government is its budget. Is the government making an environmental assessment of the budget? Will the environmental review be tabled at the same time as the budget in April, as promised by the green plan and by the Minister of the Environment?

• (1500)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, obviously any policy initiative undertaken by the government takes into account the environmental impact. That is a general across the board policy of the government.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): My supplementary question is for the same minister, Mr. Speaker.

The green plan is very clear that the environmental implications will be made public at the same time as the policy. It was not done for the 1991 budget; it was not done for the 1992 budget. I ask the Minister of Finance to be very clear. Will it be done for the 1993 budget, the last budget his government will release before it is defeated at the polls?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The same answer, Mr. Speaker.

LESLIE JAMES BENNETT

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

On last night's Fifth Estate program Mr. Leslie James Bennett expressed dissatisfaction with his treatment by successive Canadian governments with regard to allegations that he was a Soviet mole. Could the minister clarify the government's position on this matter?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure Mr. Bennett and the House that the Government of Canada believes that Mr. Bennett was never a KGB mole. I was struck by his request that we make a categorical denial or statement to that effect and I am pleased to have this opportunity today to put that on the record.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

I would like to know the status of the European Common Market non-tariff barrier against the importation of Atlantic and Quebec softwood lumber into the European market which is slowly being taken away and is going to cost future jobs unless the government gets off its duff.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend had posed the question to me privately I would have told him that we were off our duff a long time ago.

We have been working on this issue with the European Community as recently as a meeting that I had with Sir Leon Brittan in Washington about a month ago when I raised it with him. I have since written to every trade minister of every member of the European Community. My colleague, the Minister of Forestry, has done the same with his counterparts in the community.

We have expressed a great deal of concern not only with the action but the timing of the action. This matter has the potential to cause a disruption in trade that could have an impact on the industry. So we are right on top of that one, Mr. Speaker.

PETITIONS

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I face a dilemma. I have 150,000 petitions that have to be filed during this session of Parliament. However it takes two days to have 600 certified. I would like to have your advice as to what I should do. You really could be helpful.

Mr. Speaker: I will consider the matter.

TABLING OF LETTER

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I wish to table a letter which I quoted from earlier during Question Period, a letter to a Mr. Colin L. Campbell from John P. Merrick, the commission counsel for the Westray inquiry. I wish to table this letter.

Routine Proceedings

PETITIONS

TRADE

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of presenting a petition from a fairly large number of my constituents calling on Parliament to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present two petitions.

The first one is with respect to Bill C–91, the patent drug act. The petitioners from various places in the province of British Columbia, from the north to the south to the coastal regions, are petitioning Parliament to repeal Bill C–22 and Bill C–91 so that Canadians will have the full benefit of lower priced generic drugs and that provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees and provide less coverage.

TRADE

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, my second petition requests Parliament to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and to recommend that government use its termination clause to end the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

SERIAL KILLER CARDS

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton) Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present four petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36 which have been certified as being correct in form and content.

Hundreds of petitioners from across my riding of Sarnia—Lambton call upon Parliament to enact legislation to prohibit the importation, distribution, sale and manufacture of serial killer cards.

As well, they say that producers of these cards should be advised that if their product is destined for Canada it will be seized and destroyed.

VIOLENCE

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise with pleasure to present this petition pursuant to Standing Order 36.

It is submitted by a number of residents from the town of Ajax and has a number of clauses dealing with the incidence of violence against women and children and the many problems experienced by these individuals because of that violence. I therefore submit their recommendations.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to accept legislation designed to eliminate violence against women and children; encourage and support women to report incidents of assault or abuse; provide assistance and support for women reporting assault or abuse; provide relief and support to women as mothers to protect their children; emphasize the need for abuser rehabilitation; concentrate special effort on the training of police, lawyers, court workers, and judges to help them become knowledgeable about women and child abuse; and to focus public attention on this very important and long ignored problem.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have over 1,000 names on a petition calling on this House to urge the government to take immediate action on gasoline prices in our region.

They are joining those who are calling on the government to make sure that any inquiries taking place be open to the public.

• (1510)

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first petition deals with the Canadian Forces base No. 5 supply depot in Moncton and urges the government to reconsider its untimely decision to close these military facilities as they have so capably served the troops and militia in bases throughout Canada and overseas over the last 52 years. They are calling upon the government to change its decision.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, the second petition helps the member for Ottawa Centre on his gas price problem because we have a similar problem in Moncton.

The petitioners call upon this government to correct the injustice associated with gasoline prices here in Ottawa as well as in other parts of Canada.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table a petition in which your petitioners call upon Parliament to ensure no inappropriate language is used or acts of violence are displayed on radio or television. They say that often what they see and hear undermines the way they are trying to raise their families.

They also stressed it was unnecessary to use inappropriate language or to encourage acts of violence in order to inform people, in either official language.

[English]

CANADA STUDENT LOANS PROGRAM

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition from petitioners in Saskatchewan who are part of the Canadian Federation of Students which represents over 450,000 students across Canada. They ask the government to remove the 3 per cent tax on student loans and not to permit Bill C–76, which would add 6 months interest, to go through.

They also ask the government to be particularly cautious about transferring the student aid program to banks. They would like to have a role to play in it. If that is going to happen they would actually prefer to see it abolished.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Finally, Mr. Speaker, I have another petition that asks the government to seriously consider the withdrawal of the GST on books and reading materials.

They point out that there has never been such a tax and it is contrary to what we want in a democratic society such as ours. As well it runs contrary to objectives such as increased productivity and competitiveness.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition from residents of Amos, Saint–Félix, Saint–Dominique–du–Rosaire, Senneterre, Rivière–Héva, Saint–Mathieu and Val d'Or, in the riding of Abitibi, who say that films depicting violence on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they act as a stimulus for violent behaviour.

The petition also says that all toys that incite children to play violent games are unacceptable and their manufacture should be banned. It is also pointed out that the repeated broadcasting of news about acts of violence on television, on all channels, and on radio may act as a stimulus for further identical violent behaviour.

Therefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass the appropriate legislation in order to eliminate violence in our society and thus protect our children and give all citizens a better quality of life.

BOSNIA–HERCEGOVINA

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have a duly certified petition from Egmont residents concerned with the oppression of Bosnian women.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to initiate an international team to investigate the atrocities of rape camps and to ensure that all such camps be dismantled and that a series of rehabilitation programs be put into place by the Bosnian government to assist the victims of rape camps.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the honour and privilege to present six petitions today which include the names of hundreds of constituents in and around the riding of Elk Island, from such places as Sherwood Park, Fort Saskatchewan, Edmonton and the surrounding area.

In excess of 3,000 people have signed petitions asking Parliament to strengthen or replace the Young Offenders Act with legislation that will be a stronger deterrent to youth crime.

These citizens generally want laws that make young offenders accountable for their actions. They are most concerned with repeat violent young offenders and recommend harsher penalties including work camps, and in cases dealing with theft or property damage they suggest financial repayment to the victims of crime.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to table this petition signed by residents of the Outaouais region. It concerns the difference between the price of gas in that region and in other regions in Ontario.

The petitioners wonder whether there could be a public investigation of the reasons behind these price differences.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that all Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION ACT

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-115

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture) moved:

That, in relation to Bill C-115, an act to implement the North American free trade agreement, not more than one further sitting day be allotted to the consideration of second reading stage of the bill; and

That, fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for Government Orders on the day allotted to the second reading stage consideration of the said bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of the bill shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I appreciate your willingness to hear me at this time on the appropriateness of the time allocation motion just moved.

My NDP colleagues and I are outraged that the government is bringing in time allocation on Bill C-115 after only a limited time of debate at second reading. As I did in a letter to you, Mr. Speaker, on March 25, we are now calling on you to use your personal and procedural authority to stop what we regard as an abuse of Parliament.

Bill C-115 is the implementing legislation for the North American free trade agreement—

Some hon. members: Debate.

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. I would hope that hon. members would extend the courtesies that are traditional in this place and allow the hon. member to put his argument. He is not proceeding on a question of privilege. He is proceeding on a point of order. It is a point of order that has been taken in the past and I have heard it. I am not anticipating what I shall do, but I am certainly going to hear it.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-115 is the implementing legislation for the North American free trade agreement. NAFTA, as it is otherwise known, is a major development in Canadian political and economic history by anyone's standards, regardless of their view on the matter, and needs to be debated adequately in the House of Commons, especially at second reading where the principle of the issue is to be debated. To dispose of second reading after only a few hours of parliamentary debate last Thursday and today is clearly an abomination.

• (1520)

As you said on April 14, 1987:

> It is essential to our democratic system that controversial issues should be debated at reasonable length so that every reasonable opportunity shall be available to hear the arguments pro and con and that reasonable delaying tactics should be permissible to enable opponents of a measure to enlist public support for their point of view.

NAFTA is certainly a controversial issue and should therefore be debated at reasonable length. It is, as the Action Canada Network said in a press release this morning, an international treaty which Canadians, through their elected members of Parliament, must have an opportunity to analyse and debate in an open public forum.

In your decision of April 14, 1987 you said:

> The fundamental rights of members can be violated by the tactics of obstruction as well as by the unreasonable restriction of debate.

I agree. On that occasion you were concerned about the deadlock that had been produced on Bill C-22 as a result of certain opposition tactics.

Today we are faced with the other danger to the fundamental rights of members that you correctly identified in that decision, an unreasonable restriction of debate. For if a day and a half at second reading on something like NAFTA is not unreasonable one has to ask the question: What would be called unreasonable? Would just a day be called unreasonable but a day and a half called reasonable? Both are an unreasonable restriction of debate and should not be tolerated. This is why we appeal to you as the guardian of the House, which you are, Mr. Speaker.

Since 1988 we have seen closure used 17 times, almost as many times as in the whole history of Parliament, and time allocation, which I am objecting to today, used even more often than that. Indeed, thanks to the unilateral changes in the rules of the House in April 1991, time allocation, which used to be regarded as the more moderate way of limiting debate, is now more convenient and easy for the government than closure itself, and the practice of using time allocation has accordingly become more attractive.

Surely there is a limit, a line beyond which the rights and responsibilities of Parliament itself are abrogated when important issues are immediately time allocated, without the opposition having time to debate such crucial issues and to take whatever political responsibility there may be for a certain amount of delay. The expectation of the Canadian people is that time allocation is something that governments enact in exasperation over a prolonged debate, not after a day and a half.

To enact time allocation without even allowing a reasonable debate on NAFTA violates every legitimate perception of how Parliament should work and the occasional need for governments to bring an end to debate.

I am fully aware that I am asking you to do something out of the ordinary, something new. But you are a new Speaker, new in the sense that you are the first to be elected by the whole House by secret ballot. You are a creature and servant of the House in a way that no previous Canadian Speaker has ever been, no matter how good previous Speakers may have been in their own right. You have the authority, I believe, if you choose to use it, to do what might otherwise be seen as unacceptable, at least by some.

The situation cries out for your intervention. Indeed, as you said yourself, in the decision of April 14, 1987: "there comes a time when the Chair has to face its responsibilities" and permit what in previous circumstances might have been ruled unacceptable by modifying or varying an earlier decision. I might add here, modifying or varying an earlier tradition.

An eminent parliamentary authority, Josef Redlich, which you have quoted yourself on occasion, has said that it is the duty of the Speaker to serve the majority and the minority "by maintaining the rules and the usage of centuries and by taking care that both majority and minority are not impeded in the use of the forces and the weapons which the order of business provides for the strong and the weak. Protection of a majority against obstruction and protection of a minority against oppression are both alike functions of the Chair".

In Parliament, as it now stands, the opposition is perpetually and chronically weak thanks to the unilateral rule changes brought in, in April 1991, and protection of the minority against oppression should now be your major concern. I submit to you that this time allocation motion is just that kind of oppression which you need to protect the minority from.

• (1525)

Mr. Speaker, in 1987 you asked the question reflecting on the manner in which you were elected as to whether or not the House of Commons had matured "enough to confer upon its presiding officer the discretionary powers necessary to control abuse and resolve deadlocks that the British House of Commons gave its Speaker over a century ago". You said then that you believed the Canadian House of Commons had matured to that point. On that basis you acted to break the deadlock.

I now ask you to act on the same basis to control abuse in a Parliament that has seen more time allocation in which the opposition is weaker and in which the idea of giving the Speaker such discretion has come into its own. Indeed, a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on House Management recently recommended to the full committee that such discretion on the part of the Speaker be part of the full committee's report to the House on parliamentary reform that could be tabled any day now.

There is a recognition that with increased government powers must come some other form of checking abuses of power. This checking mechanism used to be the role of the opposition but which is no more thanks to the rule changes that I mentioned before.

The time allocation now before us on NAFTA is in my judgment and that of my colleagues just the sort of situation in which the Speaker's role is crucial. Indeed, if this is not the kind of situation that demands the intervention of the Chair, it is hard to imagine what would be and therefore what meaning there might be in having the Speaker exercise such discretion.

Mr. Speaker, Parliament is in your hands. On April 14 you said: "Notice of time allocation motions after only a few hours of debate at any stage of a bill can also be an abuse". This is exactly what we have before us this afternoon. If the North American free trade agreement can be rushed through the House of Commons with just two days' debate then Canadians will have just cause to despair about their Parliament as a place where important issues are adequately debated. We in the NDP caucus call on you to exercise your discretion and refuse to entertain, or to call the vote, on the time allocation motion on Bill C–115 until you are satisfied that there has been adequate debate on second reading.

Finally, I appeal to that which you have often appealed to yourself, and that is common sense. It is that profound sense, as you once described it, of what is appropriate under certain circumstances and what is acceptable to reasonable people.

May I ask that at the very least, given what I believe to be the historic significance of the judgment you are being called upon to make not in terms of the North American free trade agreement but in terms of Parliament, that you take whatever time is necessary to reflect on the issue before you and ask the government to withdraw its motion until you have had ample time to consider the matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I endorse what my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona said.

[English]

He has made a very eloquent plea based on a past ruling of yours in another sense on another subject that I think is relevant to the debate today.

In 1988 when I was first elected to this House, the House of Commons spent almost two weeks debating a free trade agreement. This new agreement substantially modifies the original free trade agreement and in fact is a replacement for it.

The legislation this time is even more voluminous than what it was in 1988. In 1988 we had a lengthy debate in this House on free trade and closure was used by the government at every stage. The argument that was put forward to justify the use of closure at that time, as you will well recall, Mr. Speaker, was that there had been adequate debate on this bill before: the subject matter had been debated in the previous Parliament and then there was an extensive public debate throughout the election campaign. This time there has been no previous debate in this House on NAFTA except on opposition days when we have had the odd day.

There has not been a debate on this bill before in this House as there was with the previous bill. While we objected strenuously to the use of closure in 1988, the argument was not advanced that it was improper for the government to make use of it at that time in part because the government said there had been extensive previous debate. That is true.

This time there has not been. There has been one morning of debate on this bill and not even a full morning.

• (1530)

Now we have the government coming before the House again with time allocation. We have become accustomed to this abuse because it has been used repeatedly. It was used yesterday, it was used today, and it will be used tomorrow. It is constantly being used after very short debate. The government has frequently called a bill on a Friday morning for an hour and then applied time allocation so there is one more day of debate, in other words one day plus one day.

The hon. member scoffs. That is true. He can look at the record. He can look at last Friday and see what happened then.

I plead, as the hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona has, to look at the question of fairness in this case and whether the government majority is not abusing its position by using time allocation day after day, after very short debate on major bills of considerable public importance and debate.

Surely there should be an opportunity for this House to have a reasonable discussion on the principles of the NAFTA deal before this bill is approved. Yet we are being denied that opportunity by this motion. We are being limited to one morning plus one Wednesday afternoon. That is the effect of this motion.

I submit that is an abuse of the rules of the House. The government House leader should be hiding his head in shame at this abuse. I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to use your power to rule this motion out of order today without prejudice to the government's right to bring the motion in at a subsequent time.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in terms of the question of order, of course it should be pointed out that attempts were made with both opposition parties to seek agreement under Standing Order 78(1) or 78(2) for some appropriate time of debate and it was denied on both counts.

Second, the requirement of Standing Order 78(3) in terms of having the bill currently under consideration was done. Notice was given the day before as required under Standing Order 78(3). No less than one further day for completion was the requirement of Standing Order 78(3) and that is part of the motion. All of the requirements of our Standing Orders and in fact of this motion have been followed very clearly. It is very clear the motion is in order and should be proceeded with.

I want to comment on some accusations that have been made. For example, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands just talked about his experience since being here and what it has shown him about time allocation and so on. I thought he would be interested to know that from 1988 to 1992 time allocation was used on 13 bills; from 1984 to 1988 it was used on 16 bills; and from 1980 to 1984, when there was a Liberal government before his time, it was used on 18 bills. Therefore any accusation of escalation is in fact fallacious in terms of the record.

In terms of whether there has been adequate debate on this particular subject, the subcommittee of external affairs and international trade has been considering the NAFTA treaty since last November. It has toured the country and heard from some 119 different witnesses. The witnesses who were there did not laugh. It has been the subject matter of Question Period almost every day for months and months.

We commenced second reading debate. The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, who was the spokesman, under the rules provided for 20 minutes and 10 minutes. The House unanimously agreed to extend that to 40 minutes. On many occasions I offered to sit through the noon hour or the evening to discuss it but it was turned down on every occasion.

We are proceeding with second reading at this time in order to get it to committee. It is a very substantial bill. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for International Trade and my parliamentary secretary each put a motion to the House asking that the bill be referred, prior to second reading, to a committee so it could be examined. It was turned down on both occasions by the New Democratic Party on the floor of this House.

The apparent anxiousness of the New Democratic Party members to discuss this bill is a little bit inconsistent in their argument because when we provided an opportunity they chose not to take it.

I have to repeat that the Standing Orders are there. They are being applied properly and in the proper tradition. The question is: How much debate is enough? I have never been able to get a response to that question when I put it to the opposition repeatedly over the last month.

• (1535)

I would remind the House that the mother of Parliaments, Westminster, was able to conclude a vote on second reading of the Maastricht Treaty legislation, surely very profound legislation, after just six hours; but apparently this House is incapable of dealing with something like NAFTA in anything less than an unlimited amount of time, which is really not very credible when we think about it.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, for us in the Bloc Quebecois, it is not a matter of settling scores with the Official Opposition or the NDP, but we were not consulted by the government. Even if we agree with the principle of free trade with the United States and Mexico, we think that we must have the time required to debate the issue in this House.

I find this motion premature and I strongly endorse what my colleague from the New Democratic Party said to the effect that the Speaker should consider the great significance of this bill and give this House the time it needs to deal with it.

[English]

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the government House leader and know from whence he came. He and I shared the same side of the aisle in terms of Parliament, decorum, bills, debate and some of the figures he read out here about closure being used and/or allocation of time in a former government. I fully believe governments have the right to allocation of time, and certainly this government has been doing very well at exercising that right.

With this putative order that is before the House, the member for Winnipeg Transcona has so ably raised points in objecting to having it even put. As the member for Hull—Aylmer points out, the interpretation of that order in something so fundamental will actually limit the possibility of members or even registered parties being able to participate. It will certainly limit any independent member or any member of the Bloc Quebecois in speaking because of the way the House provides and/or rotates the time for speaking. That is not really my point.

This is a fundamental bill, and having listened to the government House leader talk about this issue being debated in the country, it shows the reflection he has about the House.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I think I have given a lot of latitude. I said I was going to hear this point. I do not think we need to get personal about it.

I have to make this decision on what the procedural law is and that is where I need assistance.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I will be very short. The member for Winnipeg Transcona quoted some reasoning to you that was very interesting and very just on earlier decisions. He quoted all the points. This is beyond the letter of the law or beyond the technicalities of the rule for allocation. There is the letter of the law, the rule of law, and the intent.

Mr. Speaker, you are a member of this House of Commons and know the reason for allocation of time. The debate started on Thursday and you were not in the chair, Mr. Speaker, but your deputy was so you may not recollect what happened. The debate started at 10.50 Thursday morning. It then became embroiled in very controversial discussions and statements so there was no debate.

It finally got back on the rail and after hearing only three speakers, the spokespeople for the three parties, the House rose at four minutes after one o'clock. The debate lasted two hours and 14 minutes. There is not a member on the government side who ever sat in opposition who feels comfortable with a government leader today moving an order to cut off debate with one more debate on something so fundamental.

Mr. Speaker, why did the member for Winnipeg Transcona appeal to you? You are the first among equals and the defender of minorities in this House of Commons. I totally agree with the member for Winnipeg Transcona. It is time to exercise your discretion, Mr. Speaker, in respect to the issue on behalf of all Canadians regardless of how we vote on this bill. I do not yet know how I am going to vote on the bill myself. I can tell you, though, I know how I am going to vote on this motion if it is ever put. If this is not the exceptional case that exercises the discretion of the Chair then we might as well throw away the rule book.

• (1540)

There have been some other rulings made here very recently that certainly caused disrepute to this House as far as this member is concerned.

I am winding up. Normally I would not get into this type of thing because I think the government has the right of allocation of time, but not on one of the more fundamental issues that is going to confront this country and should confront this House but which will not confront the House when in effect there is this type of guillotine hanging over one's head.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear a short intervention from the hon. member for Calgary Northeast. Please make it short.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I certainly support the intervention by the member for Winnipeg Transcona. He brought the real arguments to you and I do not want to repeat them. I think it is extremely important to have debate on this important issue. This is an important bill.

People in Canada today look at NAFTA and they ask themselves what it is going to bring. It is a big bill, a couple of thousand pages, and I think every member should be able to express the opinions of their constituents on such an important issue that brings changes to Canada in many ways.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, you are going to make the wise ruling that I know you are able to make.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, might I be permitted a few more comments that I hope will be helpful, having listened to what the government House leader said.

The opposition is under no obligation, it seems to me, in the rules or anywhere else to accept packages for dealing with particular legislation. We are under no obligation to accept those and therefore it is not a justification for time allocation that we did not agree to certain things.

Time allocation comes, if it comes at all, because there is a feeling that the House must now divide and that the decision must be taken. It is not because the opposition did not agree with the government House leader on certain things.

In case the government House leader has not realized it, we are not all on the same team. We have conflicting views of what is appropriate. The opposition is not here to be punished by time allocation because we have not agreed to the government House leader's predetermined idea of how long things should take.

Finally I would just say this, Mr. Speaker, if it is relevant to your decision at all, which it may or may not be, the government House leader has repeatedly used the members of the British House of Commons as an example in so far as the way it dealt with Maastricht.

As I tried to point out to the government House leader the other day, with obviously no effect, yes, the members did deal with second reading very quickly. They have a tradition of doing that there, but they also have a different tradition with respect to committee. Their committee process can be much more lengthy. In the case of Maastricht which they regarded as a quasi-constitutional issue—many of us regard NAFTA as a quasi-constitutional issue—they dealt with it on the floor of the House of Commons in Committee of the Whole.

I know that at least on March 11 the members had already spent 14 days on Maastricht in Committee of the Whole on the floor of the House of Commons and expected at that time to spend at least another week or more on the floor of the House of Commons in Committee of the Whole dealing with that.

It is quite misleading for the government House leader to suggest that somehow the example of the British House of Commons should be followed and something like Maastricht was only dealt with in six hours and therefore we should be satisfied that NAFTA should be dealt with in six hours. It is comparing apples and oranges, and I think that is something that everybody should understand so that we never have to hear this specious argument again.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to which I would like to add without repeating anything. In fact while we are concerned about the time allocation, a second reading debate is imperfect at this point simply because all three sovereign administrations have not completed their negotiations on the parallel accords that make fundamental changes relative to the debate at second reading.

We may find ourselves in a situation where we are debating something that is incomplete and as a matter of fact is complete at this point.

• (1545)

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I am going to respond very carefully to what has been said. The facts of the matter are clear, and that is that the bill is a very important bill. All members of the House agree with that and probably the country does too.

There have been suggestions that based on another time a few years ago when I had to exercise some discretion in a difficult situation I might be able to do it again in this case. I made remarks then indicating that as a parliamentarian it was important that matters were debated for a reasonable length of time. I think that is an appropriate attitude to take.

I do though have to remind the House, and I ask the House to have some sympathy with the position of the Speaker on this, that I also have to make decisions according to the law. Sometimes it is not always understood that the Chair is constrained in what the Chair can do by the rules which this House has passed.

It is not surprising that sometimes some hon. members, or even members of the public, feel that the rules we have set for ourselves may in some cases be unreasonable or even worse. However, it is extremely important I think that the Chair be bound by those rules until the House decides to change them.

I do not want to refer to what is in a committee report that I have not yet seen as tabled in the House. The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona suggested—in fact he stated—that there is a committee report coming that may be tabled in the House and may be dealt with by the House that addresses this question. I think he was suggesting that maybe in that report there would be some recommendation to give the Chair more discretion than the Chair has at the moment.

There have been suggestions made that in the British House under circumstances like this the Speaker does have a discretion, but it is my understanding that discretion, that power or that right is spelled right out in the British rules. The hon. government House leader has come back and reminded us of something which is also a fact, and that is that in the British House the time for debate is generally probably more brief than in this House. However, that is a matter of argument I think and is not very much assistance one way or the other to the Chair.

The rule that I have to consider is of course Standing Order 78(3)(a) and members are familiar with it. I think that it was passed in April 1991 by this House. The government House leader is correct, as I understand it, when he says that the government has followed exactly that rule. I think he is correct in that.

I should bring to the attention of the House a ruling I made on December 9, 1992. I am going to read it because again I was faced with the same difficulty that I am faced with today. I said:

> I know that the House would want me to respond to the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants who have raised an issue here which is, to put it simply, that it is inappropriate for the government to move now for time allocation. Some comments that I have made in the past have been quoted and I have listened very carefully to what I once said.
>
> The difficulty it seems to me that those proponents of the motion are in is that, as the hon. House leader points out, there have been changes in the rules and the government has followed exactly the course it must follow under the present rules which govern us.
> There has been some suggestion that when the present rules were passed it was without the full consent of all the members in the House and that may well have been the case. The Speaker's area of manoeuvre and acting on discretion is always somewhat circumscribed and in this case it is clearly very much constrained.
> I have to advise the House—

• (1550)

Then I went on to deal with that point. My situation at that time was that whatever I may have felt personally about the situation, I felt that I had to follow the rules that we have. If the House, which it has not done, were at some point to grant to the Speaker—any speaker—the power to judge the reasonableness of the use of this rule then I would have no hesitation in doing so. I hope I would do it on the basis of common sense on the circumstances.

Also I think I would reach back to over 20 years in this place and apply some of my experience in that manner. I have to advise the House that the rule is clear. It is within the government's discretion to use it. I cannot find any lawful way that I can exercise a discretion which would unilaterally break a very specific rule.

I have listened to this debate. I have listened to the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona and others. For very real reasons it is a matter that should have been discussed in the House today. This is especially because the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona was one of the active and very helpful members of the reform committee that was set up consisting of all parties some years ago and has taken a great interest in the reform of our rules.

I have to say, with I hope some sympathy and I hope some understanding from the House, that I feel I am not in a lawful position to unilaterally exercise a discretion in the face of the rule that is in front of us.

Therefore I have put the motion and I must ask the House.

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-115

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

(Division No. 454)

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from March 25, 1993, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-115, An Act to implement the North American Free Trade Agreement, be read the second time and referred to a Legislative Committee in the Departmental envelope and the amendment of Mr. MacLaren (p. 17560).

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, my distinguished colleague, the Minister for International Trade, before this House and throughout this nation has made a solid case for the North American Free Trade Agreement. It is the vision and the courage of the Prime Minister, and that of my colleague the Minister for International Trade, and all in our government, that has opened a bold opportunity and a new window for Canada in this hemisphere.

[English]

Let me say at the outset that it is regrettable that our friends on the other side, especially the NDP members, use every trick in the book to try to prevent debate on the real substantial issue of the North American free trade agreement.

I saw last week and earlier today where time was lost on procedural arguments instead of debating the substance about which I am sure Canadians want to hear, that is the NAFTA agreement itself.

• (1640)

[Translation]

This agreement will allow all Canadians to realize the rich potential of the world's largest trading market. It will further a regional alliance which shall grow even further in the future, to include other nations, serving our national interests and those of all others in this hemisphere and all in the global trading system.

Over the last eight years, our government has taken the right steps at the right time, from the outset of our mandate in 1984 to lay the foundations for economic growth. Inflation is beaten back, interest rates are at a 20-year low, exports are surging, and business has become increasingly competitive with our access to the global marketplace. And now we are taking one more step forward in a consistent, coherent, and, yes, courageous way with the North American Free Trade Agreement.

NAFTA will help us improve our economy in two ways: it will create more new and high paying jobs here than any low wage jobs it costs, and it will protect Canada's place in the U.S. marketplace, our most important customer. I especially rise in this debate to address the issue of labour adjustment. That question has become the focus of a great deal of attention, in some ways sidelining other issues which are also of great importance. As Minister of Employment and Immigration, I am aware of the tragedy of unemployment, and the personal trauma of finding that technology has made obsolete the hard-earned skills which served workers well in another era and generation.

Now technology and knowledge are replacing traditional industries as the building blocks of prosperity. You hear it everywhere, but it is a reality. Since the industrial revolution, old technologies and infrastructure have been forced aside by new technologies and the opening up of new markets.

Some industries decline, while others emerge as growth generators. As this happens, we see unemployment of displaced workers while employers in the new sectors complain they cannot find enough workers with the necessary skills. This is not a new phenomenon. The only difference today is that the change of pace has picked up dramatically.

By the year 2000, almost half of all new jobs will require more than five years of education and training beyond high school. Highly educated workers will be at a premium. These highly productive workers will receive high wages.

That is what we should be preparing ourselves for.

We should not be worrying about lower paying jobs moving to Mexico, because Mexico has not moved as rapidly along the path of development and industrial change as has Canada.

[English]

There is only one way to compete in this new age for jobs or business, and that is through learning, education, training, skills development and entrepreneurship on a lifelong, never stop basis.

Our economic success depends first and foremost on the cutting edge skills and forward thinking attitudes which people bring to the work place. We use technology to improve productivity. We have to be sure we have guaranteed access to a growing market for our goods and services.

• (1645)

As the world is forming trading blocs, access we have counted on in the past may not always be there. It only makes sense to reject the pleas of those who lack confidence in Canada and its workers, to put ourselves in a position to seize this unique moment and to move forward.

I am not saying NAFTA will not require changes in the way we do business in Canada, but I echo the sentiments expressed in the report of the Economic Policy Council of the United Nations Association of the United States. That distinguished labour-business forum explores the implications for business and labour on an increasingly interdependent world economy.

Its report entitled The Social Implication of the North American Free Trade Agreement states: "NAFTA will be only one of many factors causing structural change in the economy". I agree with that, and that is why I also concur with the EPC in opposing the creation of special NAFTA adjustment programs.

[Translation]

Moreover, the report urges consolidating existing adjustment programs as well as expanding these programs to cover most displaced workers. It points out that only a small fraction of eligible workers benefits from these programs today.

It says that adjustment assistance should provide health benefits and enough income support to enable displaced workers to enter retraining programs.

Finally, it recommends only business-labour certified retraining programs be eligible for government subsidy. Long before NAFTA was on the horizon, we began to make a number of moves in response to recommendations of the Advisory Council on Adjustment headed by Mr. Jean de Grandpré.

[English]

The Labour Force Development Strategy was established in part to respond to the key recommendations of the de Grandpré commission. One of the most significant moves was to begin the shift away from using our now $20 billion plus a year unemployment insurance program as a passive income assistance system to a more active investment program to access employment and training.

We must continue to move in this direction using all our social programs to empower people with solutions, knowledge and choices.

We talk about the need to create an opportunity society that offers the chance to be productive at every stage of every person's life. We are already dedicating vast resources which could be reoriented in this way. Our UI program is more comprehensive and generous than that offered in the United States, and 80 per cent of Canada's unemployed workers receive benefits as compared to 35 per cent in the United States. We spend three and a half times more on UI per capita than the United States. Government spending on training in Canada is twice that of the United States.

We now need to lever Canadian employers to increase training expenditures by dramatic proportions to at least match U.S. private sector levels.

The Canada Labour Force Development Board and regional and local boards are beginning, in partnership, to strongly encourage private sector training. In 1993–94 the government will spend $3.8 billion on labour market programs. That is 80 per cent more than we were spending in 1989–90. Training and adjustment, supported by the UI program in 1993, will account for $2.21 billion, four and half times the 1990 level.

We have a way to go. Canada is still spending more per capita on passive labour market measures than any other G–7 country. We rank 15th among all OECD countries.

• (1650)

Through our national sectoral human resources planning initiative we are furthering partnerships of workers, employers and other stakeholders to develop comprehensive development strategies. Over two million workers in Canada are benefiting from more than 900 planning agreements.

We are also implementing a new initiative aimed at providing training opportunities for workers with a demonstrated longer term attachment to the labour force. That is a first in Canada. No government has ever targeted these displaced workers to give them the kind of tailored programming assistance they need to reintegrate into the labour market. Of course no one on the other side wants to talk about these initiatives for longer term attachment of people to the labour force.

We have a program to promote the swift reintegration into the work force of workers displaced by economic changes of any kind. For non–UI recipients we have the Canadian Jobs Strategy which spent $1.6 billion to provide a wide range of services to help Canadians enhance their employability.

[Translation]

In short, we are using new skills, innovative approaches and new dollars so workers can rebound quickly and liberate their own potential, rather than creating safety nets which trap for life so many of those who land in them lost to the numbing grip of dependency. There could be nothing we could regret more than to let the NAFTA opportunity founder and then watch Canada sink behind, cut off from the potentially explosive growth of the nations of Latin America.

I invite my hon. friends, the members opposite, to reject short term political considerations, to reject appeals to unfounded fears, to face squarely the reality and opportunity of these times.

Join with the government in taking credit for having supported a progressive trade agreement which enhances the future for all workers, all Canadians.

On March 28 The Toronto Star quoted the hon. Leader of the NDP as calling for members to "kick butt" in opposing NAFTA. Honourable members will know that this is not the kind of language I usually choose to use, but if that be her call and those of her fellow travellers—the Maude Barlows and Bob Whites, et al—I suggest they have chosen the wrong butt.

Targeting the FTA and now NAFTA may gain a quick sound bite and a fleeting image of commitment to the unemployed or those fearful of losing jobs, but the evidence is simply not there to support these wild allegations.

I remember that Canadians heard during the 1988 election campaign prophets of doom who used absolutely every possible means to scare people in the different regions of the country, and particularly in my province of New Brunswick and in all of Atlantic Canada, among other things telling our seniors that they would lose their social safety net, predicting the sale of schools to Americans, telling people back home that their children would be drafted by the American army. It was unbelievable. Now they are at it again, trying to scare Canadians with the North American Free Trade Agreement.

Engaging in a phoney war in an attempt ot make political hay on misplaced fears and insecurities will back fire in the face of the facts and the only thing that will get butted, to use the expression of the NDP leader, is the purveyors of such distorted logic.

The window of opportunity today is momentarily open. Let us go ahead and use the solid agreement that we have, as well as the assurance and the confidence flowing from this new trilateral partnership, and also our own strength and our own ability as Canadians to face new challenges as well or better than anyone else in the world.

• (1655)

My colleague, the Minister for International Trade, demonstrated on several occasions in this House that the economic recovery and the current growth are the results of our exports. Yet these people would still want to isolate Canada, put up smoke-screens around our country and keep us here because, according to them, we are not good enough to be competitive.

[English]

We are not good enough to compete. We are not trained enough. We are not trainable. We should stay here. The island of Canada should close itself to the world. That message of our friends on the other side is a great misunderstanding of the Canadian population.

Canadians are a hard working people who have faced many challenges in the past. We were able to meet those challenges because we were there. We did not shy away from the challenge. I know that for business, labour and all those communities across Canada that want to move forward the North American free trade agreement will be a great success.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, let me say first that if this was not such a sad and shameful day in the history of this country I would be amused by the hon. minister's remarks.

This is a minister who says that things are coming up roses in Canada but as minister of employment does not acknowledge that there are 1.6 million Canadians unemployed. Next to Spain, that is the highest unemployment rate in the entire OECD community. He says: "Look, it is all these phantom fears that are out there. People are happy. They are thrilled at the opportunities being provided by this government under the free trade agreements".

The fact of the matter is there is not a household in this country that has not been severely injured and hurt by the policies of this government. It is the highest unemployment rate in the OECD world. Of course the problem is that we have ministers of the Crown who do not understand that. They never talk about it. It does not exist for them. What did the minister say? He said: "It is a smoke-screen out there".

There is no understanding of the real issue which is that people want to work. They want to do so with a certain sense of dignity and honour. This is what the debate is really about. It is giving those people a voice, trying as hard as we might to ensure they can be heard and to break through the wall and cloak of silence that has been put upon them by this government.

Madam Speaker, do you realize that with the vote this afternoon closure has been used in this House 25 times since 1988? That equals the number of times closure was used from 1913 to 1988. In four years this government has used closure more often than all the other governments going back to 1913.

That is a direct demonstration of the kind of disdain the Minister for International Trade and his colleagues have for the Canadian people. They do not want to give them a chance to be heard. They do not want to hear a dialogue or a debate. They simply want to close the door so that they cannot hear the real voice of the Canadian people. The real voice is saying that these kinds of arrangements concocted in the back rooms, in the wealthy eating clubs the Minister for International Trade frequents, are not working in the interest of Canadians. They are not working in the interests of other working people around this continent.

• (1700)

I found it interesting when I went back and read the remarks of the trade minister. It was fascinating how he attempted with all the skill of his public relations manipulators to try to put a gloss on what has been taking place. He said that exports in 1992 reached a record high of $157 billion. What he did not say was that imports also reached a record high. In fact our global trade surplus in 1992 is the smallest going back to 1981.

Our trade surplus in 1982—this minister loves to talk about the difficult times of 1982—was $17.7 billion. The trade surplus last year was $9.5 billion. Let us look at some other figures. The real imbalance—

An hon. member: You did not take the time to debate the matter.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Oh, the thin skin of the hon. member.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. I wish to caution my friend. We are talking about the NAFTA. He is using figures that relate to our total trade and not to the Canada–U.S. trade. If he used the Canada–U.S. trade figures he would know quite clearly that—

An hon. member: That is debate and not a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. members on my left will want at least to let me hear a sentence before declaring that it is not a point of order.

Probably the hon. minister will want to take the opportunity of question or comments to rise and put on the record whatever he wants on the record.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I hope you will not include the time taken up in this frivolous intervention of the thin-skinned minister who cannot stand to hear the truth as it comes out in this House.

Let us deal with something he talked about in the United States. Let me just go back to the figures from Statistics Canada that relate to our trade with the United States.

Our cumulative trade surplus for the four years before the free trade agreement was $69.1 billion, which was 14 per cent higher than the four years after the free trade agreement. Here is the minister saying what a great accomplishment it is, but the fact of the matter is that our trade surplus is far less after 1988 and the free trade agreement than it was before.

The minister is leaving the House. We now finally have won the debate and he retreats from the field because he cannot stand the heat. He cannot stand the heat because he knows that the figures provided by the agency of the government, Statistics Canada, totally refute the absolute nonsensical figures that he has tried to display in this House during this debate. He is certainly a stranger to the truth, a stranger indeed.

The minister tries to suggest that the global trade surplus does not matter somehow. What he does not want to recognize or acknowledge is that since the free trade agreement we have run a decline or a net deficit with every other trading area of the world except the United States. He has forgotten that Canada as a nation of international traders must have a diversified trade base. We must trade with the Pacific Rim, Europe, Central America and Latin America, but the fact of the matter is that our trade is going down with the rest of the world.

We have less of a surplus with the United States. Our trade is going down around the world and we have a Minister for International Trade who walks around with rose-coloured glasses and says that things have never been rosier and things have never been better.

Try telling that to 1.6 million Canadians because they are the living evidence of just how wrong this trade policy has become. The reason this government has used closure 25 times—more than in the entire history of Parliament—in the last four years is that it is the only way it can use its bludgeoning majority to get its neo-Conservative legislation through this House. It knows the Canadian people will not stand for it otherwise. Just like the minister who retreats from the House, it cannot stand the heat. It cannot stand the truth. It cannot stand to deal with the real facts.

• (1705)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Please, the minister is in the House.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): He is sitting in the back row, a position he will be occupying for the next four years once the election is called. He is just practising. He is warming up his seat in the back row where he will be sitting for the next four years. That is the best case scenario for this minister. If the people in his riding have a chance, he will not even be sitting in the House.

It is also important to point out something very important. This example of misuse of figures is an attempt to use the propaganda machine of the government to mislead Canadians. It is another example of how the NAFTA bill is really used to masquerade the kind of programs that only this government is left implementing.

Around the world governments are changing because they realize there has to be a more activist, public minded, public interest form of government. Their cronies in the old administration in the United States have now been booted out, which will soon happen here. That is the reason the government is rushing the legislation through. That is the reason we are into this crazy acceleration of legislation when the other partners to the agreement have not even begun to look at it yet.

Is it not interesting, is it not fascinating that the present U.S. administration said that it must begin to look seriously at questions dealing with labour standards and environmental standards to protect the interests of American workers, American plants and American businesses? Our own government is not prepared to stand and say the same for Canadians. It is not prepared to get up and say that it also thinks there should be serious safeguards on labour, serious safeguards on the environment, serious safeguards against the countervail duties and the harassment by the United States.

It says there is no need to think about changes. It is all driven by that maniacal desire to get this legislation through as the last cornerstone in the crown of this discredited Prime Minister, who is being booted out by public opinion in Canada because he is afraid to stand and take the heat just as the Minister for International Trade is afraid to take the heat.

What we are putting in jeopardy and danger once again are the interests of Canadians because we have no policy and no program to make sure they are properly incorporated in these trading arrangements.

What further evidence do we need than the kind of information now coming out in the United States on the question of the drug patent law? A senior senator of the United States, David Pryor from Oklahoma, has written to his trade representative and said they should not do NAFTA because within NAFTA are prohibitions to bringing in compulsory licensing arrangements that will allow them to keep our drug prices at a respectable modest rate.

Yet within this NAFTA bill Canada, which already has compulsory licensing, is taking it out. We see a report in today's paper that Canada presently leads the world in high cost drugs in 40 to 100 items. Is that something to be proud of?

I want to say this to members opposite. Are they really pleased when they go back into their ridings and speak to the seniors who have to use more drugs? Are they pleased when they speak to people on lower incomes who have to pay more for drugs? Because of this legislation, because of their initiative, they are now forcing people to pay prices which are the highest in the world.

Government members are going to vote for a bill that will entrench that in an international agreement so that a future government, a few months from now after the election, is going to find it more difficult to renegotiate. They are going to rush it through and hammer it through by means of closure and time allocation. Is that something that they can be proud of? Do they want to put in their householders that drug prices have escalated by 30 per cent or by 40 per cent and that they are going to entrench and prohibit any remedial action even though our partners in the United States are saying they had better start doing the same thing?

Senator Pryor is saying to the trade representative, do not sign the agreement the way it is because it will prohibit us from bringing in the kind of measures that the Canadians used to have. What a strange way of turning logic, truth and rationality on its head. What a terrible transgression this government is committing against the people of this country by pushing through this bill without any consideration of their interests.

• (1710)

It is fascinating watching the Tory leadership campaign. They are all out there saying they must bring down the cost of government and health care has to be amended, so let us bring in user fees. Yet by this very action alone, the vote they are going to take tonight on NAFTA, they will be pushing up drug prices and therefore causing every health care scheme in every single province in this country to pay 10 per cent to 15 per cent more.

Yet these are the same people, the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of the Environment, who are out there with all the fervour at their command saying they have to do something about health costs. The most important thing we could do about health costs is defeat this bill and defeat this government so we can at least keep drug costs down and not have them escalating to $300 million, $400 million or $500 million a year.

What a terrible travesty of justice and truth is being committed. How can anybody take this new politics seriously? The new politics is simply a smoke-screen for the old slimy, sleazy way of dragging and pushing people into the ground. That is what this bill is all about. Those members on the government side who have a scintilla of integrity left have only one choice, and that is to vote against this bill for the sake of the people in their own ridings.

The people opposite, and I heard the Minister of Employment and Immigration, like to say that they think Canadians can be competitive, they think we can run globally, and it is the other side who is trying to be protectionist. Not so, that is not the case at all. Mr. Speaker, do you know what this bill also does? Do you know what is contained in NAFTA? There are a number of discriminatory clauses in the NAFTA bill that prohibit and set up discriminatory clauses against other countries with whom we want to do business.

I come from western Canada. We are now beginning to do more trade with the Pacific Rim than with the United States. Yet it was not so long ago when I was on a trip to Japan and met with senior officials of the Japanese government who said to me directly that in the NAFTA arrangement there are at least five or six major areas that discriminate against other countries. We are trying to diversify our trade at a time when the world is changing so rapidly, with so many opportunities out there to trade with a wide variety of countries, and what are we doing? This government is bringing in a bill that builds a wall around the continent and sets up discriminatory trade arrangements.

I will explain what the result will be. This kind of trade bloc mentality will force other regions of the world to do the same. We will end up with a war between trading blocs, which is the worst kind of circumstance that we could possibly have.

Textiles, financial services, banking, and content rules all basically say to other trading partners in the Pacific Rim that they are not as equal as the Americans or the Mexicans. How do we go and present ourselves as an honest, open international trader when we are discriminating against those potential trading partners?

Contrary to the arguments, we are trying to say that the future of this country does lie in an international trading arena and in making sure there are fair, open trading rules that apply equally to all countries. We should not set up discriminatory trading blocs that compete with one another. As Canadians we should be looking to the wide world so we will not suffer the kind of trade decline in which we have a net decline with every other trading region in the world and our trade is decreasing.

That is why we have said time and again, we said it during the debate on the free trade agreement and we say it now, that the most important trading arrangement that Canada belongs to is the General Agreement on Trades and Tariffs. It is an international agreement. It sets out rules that apply to everybody equally. It has a dispute settlement system that is based upon a definition of subsidy that is not unilaterally decided by one country, as it is under the FTA. It resulted in Canada being able to lower tariff barriers, to escape from the kind of harassment that we have had for the past four years, and to ensure that there is equal treatment for north, south, east and west and countries around the world.

• (1715)

I cannot and would not want to represent the views of the NDP but I can tell you what are the views of this party. We are true international traders. We believe that the future of this country exists in broadening, diversifying and opening up all kinds of new trade options. One of the reasons why NAFTA does not fit the bill is because it closes off options and replaces the GATT with a regime that is not nearly as good. It sets up, as we have just seen with the drug patent law, prohibitions and restrictions on the rights of Canadians that do not exist under the GATT.

The true protectionists are these continentalists across from us who are trying to draw the Canadian trading option into one region, one area, one place and forgo the opportunities that exist around the world.

The real secret to Canadian economic prosperity, to recreating the opportunity for jobs and growth and development is to see a horizon that circumvents the entire globe, that sees the opportunities in the Americas, not through the kind of agreement that restricts but one that takes in the entire hemisphere, that opens up our opportunities in the Pacific Rim where we want to be honest, open and fair traders and not discriminate against them.

That is the real choice for Canadians. That is the choice that will be coming from the electorate. I say that NAFTA will not be a fait accompli because the Americans are not going to complete it by then. The only country that is having it rammed through its legislature is this country by this government. The rest of them recognize that their own people need time for debate, time for dialogue, time for proper examination. That is what we want Canadians to have. We think that if we had that time and that opportunity, we would have a trading policy and a trading strategy which would give Canadians that opening to the world we so desperately need.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my hon. friend and I am not accustomed to his using such intemperate language. When I hear him talk about slime and sleaze on this side of the House I cannot help but wonder if he was at Question Period today when some of his colleagues tried to take advantage of the deaths of 26 miners for their own political advantage.

But let us talk about trade, that is what the debate is about here today. My friend quotes statistics with reckless abandon. I might say he uses statistics the way a drunk uses a lamp post, for support instead of illumination. Let me give him some statistics. This is the result of the FTA. Increased merchandise exports to the U.S., up 19.2 per cent; record setting merchandise exports to the U.S.; increased share of the U.S. market; increased foreign direct investment in Canada; increased capital investment in Canada. These are the results of the FTA.

We have used NAFTA as an opportunity to accrue even greater benefits, an improvement to the fair and objective dispute settlement mechanism. It will facilitate greater business travel, security against new U.S. protection laws. I could go on, but I think the point and the facts are there. NAFTA is compatible with the GATT and I am sure my hon. friend with his knowledge of trade is perfectly well aware of that.

Nothing in NAFTA is going to prevent the initiatives that the government has taken to increase trade in Asia, the Caribbean and in other parts of the world.

I say to him, very simply, we know where this party stands; four square behind NAFTA. We know where the NDP stand; totally against it. Who speaks for the Liberal Party, that is my question to my hon. friend. Is it him, the isolationist; or is it his friend from Etobicoke North, the free trader? Who speaks for the Liberal Party? Or is that why the Liberal Party's position on this trade deal is wishy-washy, somewhere in between?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I guess that is a question.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that among that pile of voluminous verbiage we just heard, there may be a small inkling of a question and I will do my best to try to discern it.

• (1720)

Let us begin with the question of statistics. I hope my hon. friend will remain to hear this. Perhaps he was not in the House when we first spoke. I want to point out to him that if he looks at the trade performance with the United States prior to the free trade agreement and after the free trade agreement, he will see that we had a higher trade balance with the United States before the FTA than we have today.

If the FTA is so great, we should have been able to exceed that performance, but we did not. In fact, it is lower than it was in the four years prior.

Let me also point something else out. I do not think it is an inconsequential factor. I know the Minister for International Trade dismissed it because this is not a minister for international trade but a minister of continental trade. He does not care about what is happening internationally. I want to point out to him that once again our global trade surplus in 1992 was the smallest we have had since 1981. In a 20 year period ending 1992, we had the smallest global trade surplus of any year because we lost our trade option around the world.

Let me also point out, and I think it is very important to note, that most of our trade balance that the minister likes to talk about as being so exciting in 1992 was driven by the automotive trade which had nothing to do with the free trade agreement. That goes back to the Canada-U.S. auto pact which our government negotiated way back when. It was not affected by the free trade agreement, by the acknowledgement of their own errors.

I simply want to point out to the hon. member that when we use figures in the House, we use the real figures, not the kind of dream figures that the Minister for International Trade wants to use.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, it will be a comment with a brief question.

I would like to give the House the benefit of what is happening in Chesterville in the riding of Stormont—Dundas presently which I think is very relevant to today's debate.

Nestle Canada has a plant located at Chesterville in my riding of Stormont—Dundas. Last Saturday the company locked out its production line workers, 220 of them, after their union rejected a proposed contract offer from the company which included a continental work week.

The company states that its employees must accept a continental work week and give up premium pay for working on weekends if the plant is to be competitive in the North American marketplace.

The Chesterville plant exports 70 per cent of its products to the U.S. and it faces competition from other Nestle plants both in the U.S. and Mexico. In addition, those products made in Mexico are usually cheaper to produce, given the much lower wages paid to their employees there.

The Nestle situation is an indication of what is to come for Canadian workers if NAFTA goes ahead without any safeguards to protect Canadian workers. The current recession has crippled the Canadian industry. The Canada–U.S. free trade deal has taken its toll and now our workers will have to face NAFTA.

Workers at Chesterville are being told that unless they accept significant changes to their work schedules and give up weekend pay rates, they will not be able to compete with their own plants in the U.S. and Mexico.

It is obvious that with the precarious state of North American trade and the inequality that exists within free trade deals like NAFTA, companies like Nestle have no choice but to pit one of their own plants against other plants of their own.

For Canadian plants this means paring down employee wages, benefits and working conditions. Moreover, no matter what happens, it is highly unlikely that Canadian plants like Chesterville will ever have the opportunity to compete on a level playing field with plants in Mexico, given the low salaries and lack of benefits provided to workers there.

I want to ask my hon. colleague, the member for Winnipeg South Centre, if he can explain why the present government is pursuing NAFTA with such a vengeance and why the government is enforcing time allocation, forcing a vote on second reading of Bill C–115 today.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, your generosity is much appreciated.

I say to my colleague from Stormont—Dundas that we should not be surprised if the government uses closure on this bill because it has used it 25 times since 1988. It has used it more often in the last four years than it had been used in the previous 70 or 80 years.

It has become a way of life. They are narcotic. They know that they cannot take the heat and the pressure of an ordinary proper political dialogue in the Parliament of Canada so they shut the place down. They use it like a hammer to bludgeon Canadians into accepting without any opportunity for a response.

I want to say to the hon. member that I think he makes a very important point about what happened in his riding.

• (1725)

It is a point that all members of this party have been making unanimously, with one voice. We need to renegotiate this agreement. We need to find ways of ensuring that this kind of disparity in labour and environmental standards will not be used to provide for major transferences of companies from one area to another.

The companies will not have that kind of sink–hole to use to say: "We will move to a place where we do not have to make sure the water is clean, the air is fresh or that the workers get proper protection. We will go where anything goes".

You would have thought after the horrible experience of the free trade agreement when we had a haemorrhaging of jobs across the border that the government would have taken the opportunity offered to it by the Clinton administration to do the same thing.

Instead, the minister of trade gets up and says to the Prime Minister: "It is not in our interest to do that". No. They define their interests narrowly according to the very small group of power brokers who run this party across from us. They are dictating the economic life of this country. They do not understand that there is a broad range of Canadians out there who also have some rights, the right to prosper and the right to have a job.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak for a short time on the objectives and overview of NAFTA.

On August 12, after 14 months of negotiations, Canada reached agreement with the United States and Mexico on the North American free trade agreement.

This trade agreement creates the world's largest free trade zone. Contrary to what the opposition would have Canadians believe, it will make Canada more competitive and help secure Canada's prosperity.

Canada could ill afford to be excluded from a free trade agreement within the United States and Mexico. Some say we should have stayed away from the table, ignored what was going on around us, buried our heads in the sand. I ask these people, would our interests be served by letting the United States and Mexico go it alone? They would not and Canadians know this.

Canadians do not stand still and watch the world go by as some people would have us do. No. Canadians protect their interests, pursue opportunities and rise to new challenges.

Some say involving Canada in the North American free trade agreement comes at the price of missing other opportunities to expand our exports. This is simply not true. Quite the contrary. Participation in NAFTA extends and improves these opportunities. By competing successfully in an expanded and dynamic North American market, Canadian companies will be better positioned to compete in the markets around the world.

The NAFTA goes to the heart of Canada's fundamental interests as a nation that depends on trade. If Canadians did not sell the goods and services we produce at home to buyers in other countries, one out of every four Canadian jobs would disappear. It is as simple as that.

Canada got involved in the NAFTA to protect those interests and to take advantage of opportunities that will strengthen our global trading position. Globalization is something we have been hearing about for a while now. While it has become something of a buzzword its meaning is quite clear. Simply put, globalization describes emerging production and marketing techniques that take advantage of the best of the world. For example, a single aeroplane may be designed by engineers in the United States and Germany, use parts made in Ontario and Korea, be financed by banks from Tokyo and London and be marketed around the world.

By participating in the NAFTA Canada is signalling its willingness to take advantage of globalization. The NAFTA shows we are willing to continue changing and it shows we are looking to the future, ready to face the challenges and opportunities presented by the new economic climate in Mexico.

The North American free trade agreement will benefit all three participating countries by increasing trade and prosperity. In particular, the NAFTA will help the Mexican economy develop. It will allow Mexico to attract investment and it will provide new opportunities for the Mexican people.

The NAFTA ensures that Canadian knowledge and expertise will help Mexico achieve a higher standard of living while increasing Canada's own export trade.

• (1730)

The fuller integration of Mexico into the North American economy will reinforce economic, trade, monetary and fiscal reforms already undertaken by Mexico. This will result in a more prosperous Mexico, a Mexico better able to manage its debt and in a better position to import Canadian goods and services.

Mexico offers a market of over 85 million consumers. As Mexico's economy expands and its prosperity grows, so will its demand for increasingly sophisticated imports.

When we told Canadians we would participate in the NAFTA negotiations we set out three objectives: better access for Canadian goods and services to Mexico; strenghthening the benefits of the Canada–U.S. free trade agreement; and improving our access to the world's single richest country. This guarantees Canada's status as a highly desirable location for investors to serve the North American market. We met these objectives, each one. What we did in the NAFTA is what we said we would do all along.

Mexico is one of the fastest growing and most promising markets in the world. But in the past it has been a very difficult market for Canadians to penetrate. When Canada got the opportunity to secure access for our exporters it was only logical to pursue it.

NAFTA removes the tariffs and other barriers which made selling to Mexico tough. As a result Canada now has guaranteed access to 85 million Mexican consumers and their growing spending power. This means benefits and new opportunities for Canadians and Canadian businesses from coast to coast.

When Canada got involved in the NAFTA we were determined to build on the benefits of the free trade agreement without giving up any of the advantages we already had and we did that.

The NAFTA clarifies rules of origin and improves customs operations. This will prevent any unilateral interpretation of trading rules such as what happened in the Honda dispute. As a matter of fact, the NAFTA resolves the problem we had with exports of the Honda Civics produced in Ontario.

The NAFTA covers many services that were not in the free trade agreement. It makes it easier for business people and professionals to travel for work to the United States. NAFTA enlarges the quotas for Canadian textiles and apparels shipped to the United States. The NAFTA strengthens and makes permanent the free trade agreement's dispute settlement mechanism so that Canadian exporters will get fair and unbiased treatment if they are the target of a trade complaint.

These and other improvements mean we now have an even better system to ensure that Canadian businesses can compete with those in the United States. And we did it while protecting important Canadian interests such as cultural industries, agricultural supply management, medicare, social programs and the environment. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I said the environment.

Since 1984 the Government of Canada has worked diligently with all sectors of the Canadian economy to renew and strengthen our economic position. The government undertook a plan that looked to the future rather than to the past. We were determined to confront the emerging global business environment and maintain our position as a leader in world trade.

New patterns were arising. Companies were not just doing business in different countries, they were spreading their operations across continents and around the world. This brought new challenges to Canada. If we could not be competitive there were plenty of other economies ready and waiting to do business.

The government saw these changes and realized it could do two things. If we ignored them, they were threats to the society that makes Canada the envy of the world, but if we accepted them and used them to our advantage they would ensure the future prosperity of all Canadians. Canadians are already part of the global economy.

As a nation Canada was founded on trade. Our success in selling goods and services to other countries has helped make Canada one of the wealthiest countries in the world. It has paid for infrastructure and social programs that are the envy of the globe.

• (1735)

Today our prosperity still depends on the sale abroad of more than 25 per cent of all we produce. As a country with a relatively small population, we must continually look beyond our own borders for new markets and opportunities. Success does not happen overnight. Building our competitiveness will be a painstaking process requiring concerted efforts from all sectors of our economy.

It will not be an easy task, but it is a vital one if Canada hopes to maintain its secure position in the global marketplace. It is a task we are confident of achieving by building partnerships with all sectors of the economy.

Canada has not been immune from the global recession. We have endured tough adjustment to technological development and to the globalization of production and market. But studies by independent organizations such as the University of Toronto indicate that the free trade agreement has helped stimulate growth, lowered the rate of inflation and cushioned the severity of the recession in Canada. Without the free trade agreement the economic effects of the recession would have been much more severe.

The free trade agreement is providing Canadian business with the incentive to restructure, to prepare to meet global competition and to create the basis for our continued prosperity. The North American free trade agreement strengthens the foundation for global competition laid down in the free trade agreement.

Exporting is one of the main engines of growth and job creation in the Canadian economy. Exports account for one in four or over three million Canadian jobs. It is therefore essential that Canadians be able to compete effectively in international trade.

We guarantee our future not by running from global competition but by meeting it head on, by equipping ourselves to compete with the best by ensuring that we have in place the economic conditions needed to be competitive and by making world markets accessible to our products.

So the cornerstone of our plan was to ensure Canada became more competitive. This is happening. Lately Canada's productivity has seen remarkable gains and our ability to innovate and find smarter and better ways of doing business increases all the time.

Part of being competitive means having access to foreign markets and to be frank, it also means having to face competition. This is nothing to worry about because it will improve our performance. If you want an example, just take a look at the Olympic athletes. Any sprinter will tell you that the fastest times happen not in isolated practice sessions, but in the final heat when the world's best are racing side by side. By competing with other producers, Canada's industry will become better, stronger and more innovative.

I am confident that Canada can compete successfully in any arrangement that has fair and clear rules. That is what NAFTA is all about. By giving us access to foreign markets and establishing the rules of the game, NAFTA will help Canadians succeed and prosper in North America and around the world.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Guelph—Wellington): Mr. Speaker, everyone in this Chamber today will remember what I choose to call the great debate of 1988, when one of the things that seemed to be at issue was that we were going to lose all of our water if we proceeded with the free trade agreement. You will remember that all of our water was going to be diverted. The Americans could hardly wait to get their hands on it. All of our rivers and lakes, we were going to pump it all down to California. Remember, within a few months it was going. We know what nonsense that was.

I wonder if I might ask my colleague who has just spoken if she has some thoughts on whether the North American free trade agreement will protect our water the same as the FTA protects our water, the same as the Canadian water policy protects our water.

We have had this raised in the last few days. Can we not put it to rest?

Mrs. Anderson: Thank you very much for the question. The large scale export of water is not covered in NAFTA and it is not covered in the free trade agreement. It never has been and never will be because that is not a good to be transported. It has never been an issue at the GATT and there is nothing to force Canada to construct a canal. Since we do not sell water now there are no terms which would be subject to dispute.

• (1740)

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-115, the North American free trade agreement, is before this House today. Today also—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are two 10-minute speeches. The next was the Minister of Transport. I regret the hon. member for Mount Royal. I will recognize her next. The Minister of State for Transport.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend across the way for ceding the floor to me.

Four years ago when Canada entered the free trade agreement with the United States what we were actually doing was creating the largest bilateral trade relationship in the world.

Today there is clear evidence that the foresight shown by this government, and indeed it was foresight, has been of tremendous benefit to Canada. These benefits were confirmed in a study that was released by an independent group in October 1992. That group, the C.D. Howe

Institute, said that Canada's merchandise and service exports have thrived in most sectors that were liberalized under the FTA.

Canada has gained the most in exports of non-resource-based, high value-added manufacturing products to the U.S. These are the areas in which our future lies.

This government has taken the country out of its shell and has prepared it for the 21st century. All of the success has occurred during a world-wide recession. Just imagine what we can achieve during the recovery period in which we are now entering.

That is the reality of the situation. During a world-wide economic downturn Canadian exports to the U.S. grew not 1 per cent or 2 per cent and not even 9 per cent or 10 per cent, but nearly 20 per cent in the short time since the FTA has been in place.

Last year Canada enjoyed an all-time record in merchandise exports to the U.S. of $122.3 billion. In December 1992 the trade surplus—that is right, trade surplus—with the U.S. was $2 billion. That is an increase of over 26 per cent over the previous month.

Canada's exports to the U.S. even outperformed Japan. They are considered an economic powerhouse by everyone, even in the opposition, but Canada outperformed them and that is because of the FTA.

Like a great architect, this government knows that one must have a solid foundation before one can build a house. That is what the North American free trade agreement will do. It will add and build on the success of the FTA. It will not diminish what we have worked so hard to obtain but rather it will complement and strengthen what can be.

NAFTA incorporates many of the elements of the FTA and adds to them. Every decision in the deal is not perfect and we realize that in the end even politicians are human.

After four years of the FTA, the government identified certain mutually agreeable improvements and included them in the NAFTA. Each one of these went through the ultimate test: Will it benefit Canada? In every case the answer was a resounding yes. Some of the improvements that were made are the inclusion of fairer and more stable rules of origin, intellectual property rights, a significant expansion of the government's procurement opportunities and of course the inclusion of Mexico and giving Canada access to one of the fastest growing markets in the world.

When we entered into NAFTA talks in 1991 we had three broad objectives: first, to give Canada better access to the Mexican market; second, a trilateral agreement that would provide greater security for Canada's access to the U.S. market while maintaining the benefits that we achieved under the FTA; and third, it would be in Canada's interest if it preserved our status as a preferred location for investment. All of the objectives have been met.

The one thing that must be pointed out at the very beginning is that Mexico was already enjoying free trade with Canada but it was only one way. Roughly 80 per cent of Mexican products enter into Canada duty-free but Canadian exports to Mexico face an array of tariffs and other trade barriers. This is something many Canadians do not realize. They must know that the government was working for them to correct this imbalance, and we did.

• (1745)

As a result of the hard work undertaken by the trade minister and his staff Canada will be able to rebalance its trade with Mexico, especially in the automotive sector that is so very important to my province of Ontario.

Mexico has the fastest growing automobile market in North America. Due to the NAFTA Mexico will eliminate its protectionist auto policy, which has in the past restricted the importing of vehicles and forced parts and assembly operations to locate in Mexico, over a 10-year period.

This will go a long way in ensuring a viable future for the auto industry in Ontario. Evidence of this can be seen in the recent announcement by Chrysler Canada to put $600 million into its plants in Windsor, Ontario. If Chrysler believed the rhetoric that comes from the parties across the floor would it be investing $600 million in Ontario?

The auto industry and its workers are not the only winners in the NAFTA. There is a virtual plethora of opportunities in a number of different sectors.

Ontario's machine producers will gain from the NAFTA. Why? They will because Mexico relies heavily on imports to meet its capital goods requirement and Canadian products are already at the front of the line with Mexican buyers.

As Mexico continues to develop economically and upgrade its facilities opportunities for Ontario machinery and industrial equipment producers will increase. Mr. Bernie Halligan of Novenco Fans Canada Inc. in Cambridge said: "Free trade with Mexico is long overdue". His company makes large industrial fans and a 15 per cent to 20 per cent duty must be paid on their entry into Mexico. The trade deal will in time remove those duties and Mr. Halligan says this will help them a great deal.

Ontario's telecommunications and information technology is another sector that will enjoy expanded opportunities due to the NAFTA. Mexico is striving to modernize its economy and the government is dedicated to developing a more sophisticated telecommunications infrastructure. The Mexican government is also deregulating and privatizing its telecommunications sector. Who but Canada has better knowledge and expertise in telecommunications?

Put these factors together and they add up to fantastic growth in Mexican demand. By the year 2000 it is expected that Mexico will import 42 per cent more telecommunication products and demand for imported information technology will increase by more than 30 per cent in the next five years.

Ontario based companies such as Northern Telecom and Telesat are already active in the Mexican market. Systemhouse, an Ottawa based company, has already signed a $500 million contract with the Mexican government in the anticipation of growth. Yet the members opposite from both parties want to prevent these companies from taking part in that growth market in Mexico.

As well, the NAFTA improves Ontario's ability to attract investment dollars because it gives companies thinking of locating in Ontario the knowledge that they can sell their products to a market of 360 million consumers in North America.

These accomplishments were achieved while ensuring that important exemptions under the FTA will stay in place in the NAFTA. For instance, the auto pact was preserved as well as the supply management system for dairy and poultry products. Both of these exemptions were critical for Ontario.

The NAFTA also safeguards Ontario's fruit and vegetable growers by allowing Canada to take measures against any sudden surges in Mexican imports, which is very important for the farmers in my constituency of Lincoln.

The people of Ontario have more concerns than just the economic benefits that are afforded to them by the NAFTA. That is why it contains more environmental provisions than any other trade agreement and it forbids countries from lowering their environmental standards in order to attract investment.

Just as I must watch out for the implications of the agreement to my riding and province, as Minister of State for Transport I must think how this will affect the portfolio for which I am responsible. For the first time in any international trade agreement transportation modes are included.

In transportation services, the trucking industry has been opened up to allow greater freedom for Canadian shippers to carry cargo to other countries. Under the NAFTA an important issue was the ability to take on cargo in the U.S. for onward transportation to Mexico.

• (1750)

It also allows them to make the return trip, picking up cargo in Mexico and delivering it to the U.S. or Canada. This right will open up over a six-year period but Canadian carriers will maintain the exclusive right of carrying goods from one Canadian point to another Canadian point.

The North American free trade agreement is the most progressive in surface transportation, with provisions for bus, rail and truck modes. It provides detailed schedules for opening up Mexico's closed market for international bus and truck services. The standards regulating safety will be harmonized, also under a detailed schedule, to make sure that Canada's high standard of safety in transportation will be maintained.

As minister, I am keenly aware of the truckers' concerns and I know that Canadian truckers welcome this opening and are anxious to work the U.S. and Mexico border as soon as possible. Toronto is closer to Nuevo Laredo than it is to Edmonton or Vancouver. Imagine how Canadian truckers would feel if the Alberta–B.C. market swelled overnight to 85 million consumers from 8 million. Eighty per cent of freight shipped across the U.S.–Mexican border is carried in trucks. With the surge of trade between Canada and Mexico the truck traffic will also increase. As Mexico develops and purchases more goods from Canada, Canadian truckers will benefit.

With respect to railway transportation, one of the NAFTA's key advantages is the guarantee of no more restrictions at any level of government. The current degree of openness is locked in. Our major railways have become truly North American in trackage and international in outlook. This has happened in a logical response to shifting market realities, a reality that is confirmed by the NAFTA. I am pleased to see that our railways have recast their operations and are preparing themselves for an integrated North American market.

Transportation in Canada is undergoing historical changes which can only help it face the realities of the North American transportation picture. There is no question that the foundations of a fully integrated North American market with strong Canadian companies taking the lead were laid long before the NAFTA. The NAFTA builds on those foundations and opens up exciting new challenges for the transportation industry and Canadians in general. These are prospects that we should all look forward to.

I am not saying that the NAFTA will revolutionize the economy of Canada. What it will do is open new doors and take the tariffs off some of the old ones. Companies in my home province of Ontario are already looking into the Mexican market so they can hit the ground running once the NAFTA takes effect. In the end, Canada will be stronger.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment and ask a small question.

Approximately 30 years ago the Canadian government signed the Columbia River Treaty with the Americans. At that time we were told how wonderful it was going to be, how it was going to create these great lakes at the back of the dams and so on. Now, 30 years later, we have a situation where in my riding of Kootenay East the Americans are taking this water faster than it can run in. They are opening their dams. They have increased the flow on their dams below from 4,000 cubic feet a second to 22,000 cubic feet a second. Fish and everything are going through the turbines and are being chewed up. Dust bowls are created in the reservoirs behind.

At the time when the Columbia River Treaty was signed we told them that this was going to happen. They are now talking about diverting the Thompson River in Kamloops into the Mica reservoir to create some more water for those greedy Americans who are after our water. It was supposed to be for flood control and hydroelectricity. It is now being used by the Americans for many other uses, such as irrigation, fish enhancement, tourism and other things and we are paying the price with dust bowls and other kinds of things behind the reservoir.

My question is with regard to the water issue. What is to stop the Mexicans or the Americans 10 years from now from saying that it is unfair competition because Canada has all this water and it can create these kinds of fruits and vegetables and these kinds of things? What is to stop them from saying it is unfair to them that they are starving for water?

• (1755)

They have excluded raw logs. Why was that phrase, excluding Canadian waters, not put in there to ensure that there would not be that kind of a debate after we have signed the treaty, 10 years down the road, after everyone has made their changes with regard to their industrial structure and so on?

Then all of a sudden they will say they are going to take our water and I would like to see how we could stop them, because we cannot stop them now under the Columbia River Treaty. I would like to know how we will be able to do it under this treaty.

Mrs. Martin: Mr. Speaker, the Columbia water treaty was a water treaty. This is a trade agreement. In this trade agreement water is not considered as a good for trade. Therefore there is no danger in this trade agreement of opening it up for water. We are trading goods, we are not trading natural resources.

The agreement that the hon. member mentioned is one that was not a trade agreement but a water agreement. I think he is mixing apples and oranges, or perhaps beer and water.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question. While the subcommittee was hearing on transportation issues, Donald Reimer, chief executive officer of Reimer Express Enterprises Limited and chairman of the Sectoral Advisory Group on International Trade for Transportation Services, appeared before the committee. He explained that to complete the competitive picture, efficiencies not only have to be achieved in the production process but also in the transportation links in servicing the customer.

He pointed out that the NAFTA is the first international agreement that attempts to deal with transportation services. He also said that while the agreement also deals with the national treatment of investment and cross-border services, the biggest gain for the transportation industry was increased access to a market that currently totally forbids foreign ownership and operation of transport services.

It should not come as a great surprise that he is supportive of the NAFTA. I would like to ask the minister if she could add to those comments because I am sure they do not come as a great surprise to her.

Mrs. Martin: Mr. Speaker, Mr. Reimer is recognized in this country as being one of the leaders in the transportation industry. We see his trucks from coast to coast, across the border and down into the U.S.

Mr. Reimer is right in saying that this is the first time that we have had transportation included, both from an investment standpoint and a carrying standpoint. It is definitely going to be an advantage as far as Canadian truckers are concerned.

I might also add that it is not only on the carriage of goods but also the investment and working within the transportation industry. In fact, I was reading today that AMF, one of Montreal's largest manufacturing employers, which dismantles and remanufactures locomotives, has recently signed a $5 million contract with Mexico state-owned railway to remanufacture 23 engines with the promise of other components on the horizon.

This is another firm, this time in the province of Quebec, that also sees the opportunity in Mexico for additional business, which means additional jobs in Canada. That is another reason that this deal is good for Canada.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-115 that is before us tonight, on the North American free trade agreement, stands before us just after we put into place a few hours ago a time allocation for discussion on this very important next initiative in the free trade agreement.

The question really is: Are we facing a democratic process? Are we allowing the voices of the people to be heard and their concerns considered in the light of this Draconian move to close down the discussions in this House and summarily silence the voices and views that need to be heard with respect to the concerns, and they are many, that we find with regard to the free trade agreement being extended not only to the United States but also south to Mexico.

• (1800)

I would like to recall to members of this House that it was in the dead of winter after a long election campaign in 1988 that we sat late into the night while the government again pushed its agenda through at that time. The question is how many times are we going to have closure and how many times will the government stifle debate when it is determined to get its agenda on the Canada-U.S. agreement approved by Parliament? I do not think that that is the way democracy should work.

We have had closure 25 times. Closure stifles exchange, debate and hearings on major issues of concern that are affecting small, medium and large businesses in this country.

If one looks at the number of times that we have had closure I can say that we have had closure more often than we did since 1913 in this country.

We had this special session that I referred to on the free trade agreement. Little did we think back then that we would be here again today witnessing the same Draconian closure measures on yet another trade deal. It reminds me of that old expression: "The more things change the more they stay the same".

It is that I stand here with the Conservative government opposite shutting down debate, cutting off discussion and abbreviating the democratic process.

With respect to this NAFTA agreement, it is not that Liberals are not open and are not free traders. It is when the deal is right, when it is in the best interests of Canada and when it answers the questions we want to have answered that we support agreements that would enhance trade. I just remind this House that the automotive trade was a very good deal for Canada and it was carefully negotiated in a sectoral agreement and it has been in our best interests. We just heard the minister talking about how wonderful the automotive trade pact has been.

However, that is not the case with the free trade agreement. Unfortunately, this is not in Canada's best interests. It is not just some of the workers who are not going to benefit from this, it is most of the workers in Canada and not just the lucky few.

We said the deal was not needed in 1988 the way it was drafted because it was not the right deal. We said we needed adjustment policies and programs to ease the way into this new global economy. Little did Canadians realize that the trade deal was the government's adjustment program. That is a rather sad comment. It introduced its sink or swim approach to the economy without the benefit of help or assistance for anyone, without helping businesses succeed and most importantly without helping workers prepare for what was ahead. Survival of the fittest it professed. Sink or swim it said. Good luck it said. Canadians have suffered all these years since 1988 as a result.

Yes, there have been some success stories and some winners. However, they are very few and far between and not to the extent that was promised in the high and extravagant words that accompanied this deal with the government. They were not realized by the business community of Canada.

So I say again that we are free traders but on proper terms. The terms of this deal are not right. We say today that the NAFTA deal needs improvement. It needs amendments. It is not complete and it should not be approved in the way it stands.

Mr. Speaker, I draw to your attention that the minister has made some rather extravagant statements. He claims that Canadian exports prove the benefits of the free trade agreement and that the government's economic policies have been right. It is the trickle-down philosophy. I believe he said some things which I think we should examine a little more closely.

Let us take a closer look. The truth is that Canada's trade situation has been steadily declining under the Conservatives and particularly since the free trade agreement came into effect. The minister said that merchandise exports in 1992 reached a high record of $157 billion, 11 per cent higher than in 1991.

• (1805)

What does the evidence show? What is the hard evidence coming from Statistics Canada? It says that our merchandise trade performance is measured by the balance of exports minus imports.

The global merchandise imports for 1992 also reached a record high of $148 billion. As a result, our global trade surplus for 1992 which is $9.5 billion is the smallest in any year dating back to 1981.

Mr. Danis: So what?

Mrs. Finestone: Our trade surplus in 1982, $17.7 billion, was nearly double the figure for 1992. I hope the Minister of Labour can understand the difference in the figures. That is the "so what". We did much better before than we do today.

Second, the Minister for International Trade said that merchandise exports to the United States in 1992 reached a record high of $122.3 billion. He said that that was 13.6 per cent higher than in 1991.

What are the facts? The facts are that imports from the United States in 1992 also reached a record high of $104.6 billion. Our trade performance with the United States was undeniably better before the free trade agreement and before Tory economic policies came into full effect.

Our cumulative trade surplus for the four years before the free trade agreement was $69.1 billion. It is 14.4 per cent higher than our trade balance for the four years following the free trade agreement which is $60.4 billion.

I would suggest that before such extravagant statements are made, this government should give serious thought to the 1.6 million Canadians who are out of work, which is the highest number among the OECD countries—or perhaps the second highest. Second, it should put into place the kinds of promises about concerns for the work force and concerns for the industries so that they could adapt to what could be a proper trade agreement on a fair and level playing field.

My colleagues from Etobicoke and Winnipeg said that the government should take advantage of the parallel talks that the government is in the middle of right now on environment and on labour standards to press the United States for something that Canada needs badly, which is a definition of trade-distorting subsidies to head off trade disputes with the United States.

They recommended to the government that it could just take the GATT wording, insert it into the North American free trade agreement and that should work quite well. It is not such a difficult thing.

The NAFTA has failed to include a subsidies code. It means that we will continue to suffer U.S. trade harassment despite the government's rhetoric now on the two trade deals that were supposed to deliver secure U.S. access.

That certainly takes away from the "free" in these trade deals. It is certainly not the perfect world sold to the voters by the Conservatives or the massive third-party, big-business advertising in 1988.

Now, later, we have learned about these tricks, the trompe-l'oeil and the use of your big-business friends. Now when Canadians see a NAFTA campaign coming up they know to look beyond the slick packaging at the real substance.

To improve this trade deal we made it very clear. We have to have an anti-dumping safeguard put into place. This is another serious shortcoming of this agreement. One adds that to the need for a subsidy code.

Another issue raised of significance by the Liberal trade critic for making a proper trade deal was that we would need parallel accords in place on labour standards and on the environment before this House gives approval to this incomplete NAFTA agreement.

Can one imagine buying a house from a home builder who says: "Do not worry, I will finish the roof next week. Just pay me now." I think a lot of us would do far better than that. We would say: "I trust you, perhaps, but I will have a signed dotted line, thank you", or "I will have the completed house before I sign on that line".

That is just not good enough as one can well understand for Canadian people to buy essentially a pig in a poke. We are free traders. I have said that the terms of this agreement leave some pretty large holes on a subsidies code and on labour and environment standards. These make serious shortcomings in this agreement. I would like to briefly turn to the subject of culture and paint a bit of the picture which I have witnessed over the last four or five years in terms of how this Conservative government and the direct and indirect effect of its trade policies and trade deals have affected a precious Canadian resource that is not energy or minerals, although they are important, but culture which defines us as a people.

• (1810)

I find the NAFTA cultural debate a bit of a déjà vu because once again we hear the government itself asserting that it has protected Canada's cultural sovereignty. This is a country where three out of four books sold originate outside of it, where three out of four dollars earned through the film production industry and the distribution industry end up in foreign owned coffers, where more than three out of four magazines sold on the news stands originate from outside of it and where nine out of ten recordings bought are made from imported master tapes. This is not a culturally sovereign country. I would say that it is a culturally occupied land.

We ought to be speaking and protecting our right to become culturally sovereign to ensure that Canadians retain the tools to develop in that direction. Canadians must gain control of the production and distribution of our cultural products.

A couple of years ago on Morningside Peter Gzowski conducted an informal survey asking for the equivalent of the well-known phrase: "As American as apple pie". The winner was: "As Canadian as possible under the circumstances". The answer may be amusing but it answers somewhat and points out the fragility of Canadian cultural expression and that government policy and programs are crucial to its development.

The problems are structural. Films, books, magazines and sound recordings are the key instruments in letting Canadians gain access to their culture. In the face of technological changes and market advantages of foreign multinational companies our home-grown industries face an increasingly difficult task in gaining access to our Canadian audiences. As a result, Canadians are not able to garner a fair share of the Canadian market sufficient to reinvest in the production of more Canadian materials.

While Canadians are filling more of their leisure time with cultural activities, the cultural products that they are consuming are from foreign countries.

It is unfortunate but foreign owned multinationals clearly dominate the most lucrative sectors of the Canadian cultural market. Through vertical integration of their corporate structures they often control both production and distribution. In short they have a bloc on the market and in the larger sense they see Canada as the backyard. The only tool that we have that can crack the lock and allow Canadian artists and consumers access to their own markets is government policy and partnership with business.

Canadian governments at all three levels have created a handful of government policies and programs that have significantly helped Canadian artists and companies to gain access to their own domestic markets.

I am not going to outline all the initiatives. We all understand the importance of Bill C–58, its impact on the magazine industry concerning Sports Illustrated and the whole argument that is going on about that. It underscores the sensitivity that there is to the undertaking through Bill C–58 which has helped us grow as an industry.

If we believe that creators play vitally important roles in our society, that they help us to see ourselves as we really are, warts and all, that they also stand as role models for future generations, then their success and the importance of promoting our young artists and encouraging them to blaze new trails and chase new artistic visions is very vital.

It is not that we want to silence other voices. We do not want to close ourselves off. We want to be open to the world but we want to have a choice. We have many, many artists crossing the borders and we need that. We want the flow back and forth. We are delighted with our neighbours but we insist on the right to be able to be present and be accountable for and to be perceived in this country. Is that so unreasonable?

What concerns me about this NAFTA text is that with respect to culture it is virtually a repeat of the Canada–U.S. text. The cultural exemption for cultural industries found in the free trade agreement is also in NAFTA. In addition, the definition of cultural industries has been expanded to include persons working in those industries, such as performers and writers.

• (1815)

I say to you, the case in the Canada–U.S. agreement, the cultural exemption, was not complete then and it is not complete now. It held its infamous notwithstanding clause, like a sword of Damocles over our heads then, when each country reserved the right to take measures of equivalent commercial effect in response to any action regarding cultural industries and that remains.

I want to talk about the dumping below the price it cost of films, videos and sound recordings into this country, but I think that is pretty obvious to all of us.

Five years after the FTA there are still many unanswered questions concerning that notwithstanding clause. For starters, how will commercial effect be measured? Will measures of redress taken by the injured party be directed solely to the cultural industries or possibly to other sectors?

Who will decide what actions are inconsistent and result in negative measures? Does this mean that Canadians will not gain control of their movie screens through much–needed film distribution legislation? What about raising the level of Canadian content on television and radio? What about buy Canadian textbook policies in our schools? Could all future cultural initiatives fall victim? Will our culture become stagnant and not be allowed to grow?

The government points to its success in keeping culture off the trade table, but the true measure of the cultural success of the government can only be in its cultural outputs and Canada is still a culturally occupied country. We incur an annual cultural trade deficit in excess of $1.1 billion to the United States through the importation of films, sound recordings, books and magazines.

There are initiatives that we can take that would be very helpful so that we have Canadian owned and controlled companies. We create our own distribution system separate from the Americans for the dissemination of cultural products and we can see other measures.

You are indicating that my time is almost up, Mr. Speaker. I would like to say to you that Liberals are free and fair traders, but I would like to know what this government's hurry is with respect to getting NAFTA done now rather than getting it done right. Is it prudent to push NAFTA through the House before the other signatories? The United States and Mexico, in particular, have signed off on it.

Is it not asking too much that our legislature deal with this agreement before the Clinton administration even submits it to its Congress? It is asking questions about the drug bill that is in there and the constraints of drugs.

Quite simply, this is not a done deal. It is not complete in terms of substance, in terms of process on both of these counts. I agree with my Liberal colleagues who have spoken in the House that the NAFTA legislation should not be approved at the present time and in its present form.

There are some serious worries in here and I would really like to ask the government to put this aside for the moment. Let us see what the Americans are going to bring in, what the Mexicans say.

On behalf of all my constituents I can promise them not only north–south trade, but east and west trade. It will be the best kind of trade with a well prepared work force, a well prepared industry, so that we can truly move forward in the interests of our people and certainly give some hope to the youth and the 1.6 million who are out there unemployed today.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the principle of trilateral free trade. However, something is bothering me in this whole matter. Why is government in such a hurry to sign this free trade deal, NAFTA, when we know that the American President Bill Clinton has requested a little more time to negotiate with Mexico in particular on the issues of labour standards and the environment? Why is this government in such a rush to ratify this agreement? It would put the US government in an awkward position if one of its partners had already ratified the agreement, as it were. I think that the US government would be in an uncomfortable position to negotiate with Mexico if we were to pass this bill as is without having had the opportunity, as Canadians, to negotiate the environmental and human rights issues. I say it would be rather embarrassing for the Americans.

To have a North American economic pact, I am all for it. But let us give the Americans the chance to negotiate or to bring pressure to bear on Mexico in the future regarding the environment and human rights.

We cannot interfere in Mexican government business. They can settle their own disputes. However, we can now pressure Mexico into gradually doing better in terms of environment and human rights.

• (1820)

Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the hon. member for Mount Royal why she does not come out and say straight out that she is for free trade, but that her support is conditional on the respect of human rights and the environment in Mexico. Why say that she is for global trade liberalization? Why not say straight out that she is against trilateral free trade, against having a strong North American deal allowing us to compete with the European Community and the ASEAN for instance? I think we need such a North American economic pact to compete with other economic pacts, I put the question to the hon. member for Mount Royal.

Mrs. Finestone: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but maybe the hon. member for Longueil arrived late while I was making my speech. What I said was that the Liberals have always been in favour of free trade, a free trade with equal treatment and fair play, and that we wanted arrangements to be made with Americans and Mexicans on the environment and labour standards and also on other issues that had to be settled before we could promote and pass this bill here in the House. Mr. Speaker, I totally agree that the Liberals have always been free traders. But I would really like you to be aware, if you are not already—and I will say it in my mother tongue of our global trade performance with respect to the way the Conservatives have managed our economy.

[English]

For the year 1992 we show a merchandise trade deficit with every one of our principal trading areas other than the United States. Our cumulative trade surplus in the four years before the free trade agreement came into effect was $47.9 billion and fell 26.9 per cent—that is 27 per cent—in the years following the free trade agreement to $35 billion.

[Translation]

The hon. member is absolutely right. We forgot our eastern and western trade partners, and we concentrated on programs that were harmful to Canada because we did not put in place the programs required to face global changes and to make our workers and our industries competitive.

I thank the hon. member who agrees with me. In its present form, the bill is not good. We must fix certain things before we can proceed.

[English]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I know others are looking to take the floor and I will not be very long.

First I would like to congratulate my colleague, the member for Mount Royal on her speech. I agree with a fair amount of what she had to say. A fair amount in Restigouche—Chaleur is about 99.9 per cent.

When I look at the NAFTA and when people out there look at the NAFTA they wonder if it can be simplified somewhat. Who can really say what is wrong and what is right with it.

The problem with the NAFTA is that there is no definition of a subsidy, no definition of dumping, it lacks environmental standards and proper labour standards. That puts it in its simplest form so that everyone can understand what is wrong with NAFTA. To me that is what is wrong with it.

• (1825)

I would like to ask the hon. member if she could maybe explain a little more of that aspect, whether she agrees with that comment or not and maybe to go on a little more.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I am glad that we are 99.4 per cent in agreement.

An hon. member: No, I did not say that.

Mrs. Finestone: I guess I did not speak clearly enough or else I have not expressed myself in the most succinct way. You said in the shortest and most succinct fashion exactly what it took me 20 minutes to say in my speech. I agree with everything you have said so I guess we are 100 per cent in accord.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it has been very interesting to listen to the debate on the NAFTA today. For better or for worse, we certainly know where the Conservatives stand. It becomes much more complicated when one listens to the Liberals. Some love it, some hate it, but it does seem at base, most love it more than they hate and would like it mostly to remain the same.

Let there be no mistake, there is only one party and one party only in this country whose opposition to the North American free trade agreement is unequivocal and that is the New Democratic Party. NAFTA is a bad deal for Canadians. It is impossible to renegotiate. No parallel accord can fix it. It must not proceed.

We are on record and I think have shown in our international affairs as well as nationally that this party is a great believer in fair trade. NAFTA is not fair trade and believe me NAFTA is not free for Canada. Anyone who believes that has been sold a bill of goods.

Let us look at the agreement logically. If NAFTA were simply a free trade agreement, the text of the agreement would consist of one line and one line only. There will be no tariffs between Canada, the United States and Mexico. Instead it is not one line, it is thousands of pages. It is not just a simple commercial agreement about tariffs. It is an economic constitution and it is changing the economic constitution of Canada and of North America. It is a constitution that diminishes the rights of Canadians, that exports our jobs, that sells off our resources at bargain prices and weakens the ability of our governments to do what they are elected to do, serve the people.

Canadians deserve a clear voice that says: "We do not accept these unfair trade arrangements and we believe they must be stopped".

[Translation]

What in NAFTA is really destructive for Canada? Since I have only 10 minutes I will keep the list short.

First, the changes in the rules of origin as they apply to textiles are going to play havoc in the clothing industry where tens of thousands of jobs are going to disappear.

Secondly, there is no Canadian content rule for cars, only North American, not Canadian. The Auto Pact does not mean anything anymore and jobs will move south.

Third, NAFTA is going even further than the free trade agreement in the elimination of price and export controls on our energy resources.

Fourth, there is a real danger that our water might be exported in great quantities. Water is not excluded from the agreement.

Fifth, NAFTA prevents the Canadian government, in the case of foreign take-over, from negotiating conditions such as, technology transfers and keeping Canadians as executives.

[English]

Sixth, NAFTA accelerates the destructive policy of deregulation that we have seen in the air industry but particularly in cross-border trucking and in telecommunications.

Seventh, NAFTA enshrines forever this government's bill that sold out to the multinational drug companies. The drug companies are in for a windfall while prices for consumers go up and we are told to cut back on health care.

Eighth, under NAFTA a Crown corporation set up by a province or federally to promote non-commercial objectives such as energy conservation or an airline service to remote communities could be forbidden. NAFTA restricts the government's ability to ensure secondary processing of our resources, an absolutely essential prerequisite to developing our regional economies and moving into the 21st century.

• (1830)

Ninth, the NAFTA restricts government's capacity to promote regional development.

Let us be clear what we are talking about. We are talking about a deal that takes the power out of the hands of people and their democratically elected institution and puts it into the hands of multinational corporations that are unelected and unaccountable to the Canadian people.

I say with regret that the government in power, the Conservative Party, did everything it could do to destroy government and to diminish the democracy in this country. This time it will not get away with it.

I briefly mentioned some of the objectionable elements in the NAFTA but equally dangerous is what is not there. There is nothing to prevent continued U.S. trade harassment. U.S. trade law will continue to prevail. There is no definition of subsidies or process to define them. There are no minimum labour standards. There are no minimum environmental standards. There is no addressing of human rights issues.

[Translation]

There is nothing in the agreement to keep firms leaving Canada from exploiting Mexican workers who work for starvation wages under horrendous conditions and in a life threatening environment.

The time has come to make it perfectly clear that people have not been put on this earth to serve commercial interests but rather that trade must serve the interests of the people.

[English]

We have to ask the question why the Conservative government is so intent on ramming through this legislation. It is not finished in the United States. Questions are being raised in caucus. Some of the signators have raised many questions—human rights in Mexico, rights for workers, the environment—and yet this government pursues and says in Canada we want to get this legislation through right now.

There can be only one answer: an outgoing Prime Minister wants a monument; an outgoing trade minister wants a monument. Mr. Speaker, we will build them a statue. It will be cheaper.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: It is absolutely ludicrous to proceed with this legislation when NAFTA is not even complete. There are discussions going on about parallel accords, some of which would fundamentally affect the NAFTA as it is now and yet the Canadian government is saying it is going to pass it in Canada. We are brave in Canada. We will not even wait until it is finished to pass it. We just rush right in and pass it. We do not even wait to see the finished product. That is bad business. It is bad democracy.

I would ask what kind of bargaining power it gives us with our partners in the NAFTA. We go to the table. They are negotiating perhaps parallel agreements or other changes to the NAFTA and we say it is okay because we have already passed it in Canada, but we would really like to negotiate this. It does not make any sense. It is ludicrous, not even logical. It is certainly bad bargaining. It is definitely bad logic.

Finally, I want to raise a question that is puzzling to me. Why does this government not want to allow a full debate on this issue?

I find it interesting that last week as this government was shutting down debate on the NAFTA legislation a candidate for the Tory leadership talked about the politics of inclusiveness. I guess that candidate felt that six hours of debate on the second reading of a bill is adequate. I should explain for those who are watching that second reading is the principle of the bill. It is extremely important because people have a chance during that debate to talk not just about what is in the bill but the very foundation on which that bill is built, the very ideology.

We know that the trade deal is there to entrench Tory policies. The Liberals agree so it entrenches theirs too and it is easier for them to have a Conservative government than to do it themselves. We understand that.

There really can be no reason for ramming through a bill which is so fundamental to the future of Canada. To talk about the politics of inclusiveness is a joke. As I said, we will have had about six hours of debate on this bill. We have had longer debates on bills that certainly were important, but not as fundamental to the future of this country and of our children and grandchildren than this bill. Yet the government says six hours. That is it; it is closing it down.

• (1835)

If these are the the politics of inclusiveness from a member of this government that has invoked closure and used time allocation to shut down debate more than any government in the history of Canada, it will not work and Canadians will not let the government get away with it.

This bill deserves a real debate. Canadians deserve the opportunity to see a full debate, to participate in a full debate, to have all the information and to know that their representatives have had the opportunity to express their views and had the opportunity to explore the alternatives, to explore on what the bill is based as well as the contents of the bill. It is not good enough to stop the voices and views of Canadians. There is no rush and we on this side of the House say, Prime Minister, step in, give democracy a chance.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to raise a couple of questions with my hon. friend, the Leader of the New Democratic Party, who I must in beginning my remarks compliment for actually debating NAFTA, unlike so many of her colleagues who, it would seem, would prefer to engage in histrionics and take up the time of the House debating parliamentary procedure instead of getting on with this important topic that we are here to discuss today.

She asked the question:"Why is the government putting this legislation through?" I am sure she has given a lot of time to studying the bill and she, along with her colleagues, realize that this is enabling legislation. This is enabling legislation that puts things into place such that the government can bring it into effect when they are ready to do so. This deal is complete. Both the Presidents—

An hon. member: How can you say that without laughing?

An hon. member: Pose your question, has it come yet?

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I find it amazing my hon. friends do not want to take this opportunity to be enlightened on the topic of NAFTA, which I am doing.

This legislation puts in place the procedures that mean when the agreement is ratified in all three countries, it can be declared. My hon. friends think that the Canadian public support their position on this. Maybe they will win the next election. If they win the next election, they do not have to use the declaration of this and bring it into effect, but it is there and it is ready. We will be ready, just as the Americans and the Mexicans will because they have agreed as we will that NAFTA itself will not be reopened.

My question that I would like to raise is this. My hon. friend says that her party supports trade and yet it wants to build barriers around this country and not provide us with the opportunity. Is she not aware of the fact that the world is changing? Is she not aware of the fact that trading blocs are developing around the world?

If we look at the outcome of the FTA—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Will the hon. member please put the question?

Mr. McCreath: My question very simply is this. Does my hon. friend not have the confidence in Canadians that this government does? Does my hon. friend and her party not think that Canadians can compete with Mexicans, Americans or anyone else?

Ms. McLaughlin: The answer, Mr. Speaker, is yes, we have confidence in Canadians. I just wish this government did. Does it have more confidence in Americans than it has in Canadians? We are not at all talking about putting barriers up around Canada and the member knows that very well.

We are talking about having fair trade deals that will work in the interests of all countries that are party to them, that are not based on exploitation, that are not based on selling the ability and sovereignty of this country to care for its own citizens to develop our own regions. Now the member says it is enabling legislation. He has it wrong. It is a disabling legislation. That is what the problem is.

• (1840)

I have a final point on the hon. gentleman's question. He said that we are taking up time debating points of procedure. I want to correct that. We are taking up time debating democracy which this government has attempted to gag. We are standing up for democracy because we think that members of Parliament on all sides of the House have a right to put forward their views and the views of their constituents on this piece of legislation. If the government had real respect for the Canadian people and really honouring them it would say: "We will have all the debate you want. We are not afraid". Well, we are not afraid either. This government will not get away with this.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would like to just take the final five minutes left to me to put this on the record. The member from Winnipeg had talked about one of the impacts of the NAFTA.

The Western Canadian Wheat Growers which represents some 7,000 farmers made a presentation before the subcommittee. It was interesting to learn that exports of agricultural commodities account for 50 per cent of their farm revenue. In the grains and oilseeds example they said that in 1991 they exported 62,000 tonnes to Mexico. It was only 62,000 tonnes because of restrictive import licensing requirements. But in 1991–92 the requirements were eased somewhat by the Mexican government. For crop year 1991–92 exports went up to 492,000 tonnes. What will happen under NAFTA is that the licensing requirements will be eliminated entirely and immediately.

Members may wonder what the duty rate is now on wheat going to Mexico. Currently, the maximum duty is 50 per cent. What will happen after the signing of NAFTA is that tariff rate will be reduced to 15 per cent immediately and will be phased out over 10 years. I was surprised that the Liberal member from western Canada would not be supportive of NAFTA when indeed it is most beneficial for wheat farmers, as they indicated when the subcommittee was in Winnipeg.

I have a few other points I would like to put on the record. People should understand how important exports are to Canada, because Canada does not have a large population. The population of Canada is currently 27 million. Everyone talks about exports coming in from Japan, but everyone forgets that Japan has a large domestic economy. Therefore, in actual fact about 13.5 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product is exported from Japan because of its large domestic market. The United States with a population of 250 million obviously has a lot of consumers. Therefore only about 10 per cent of its GNP is as a result of exports. But in Canada, with only 27 million people, Canadian manufacturers produce more than we can consume. Therefore almost 30 per cent of Canada's Gross Domestic Product has to be exported.

The issue becomes on value added. Everyone says that the only things Canadians can export are the raw resources so why trade with the United States, why do we not trade with other countries, why do we not trade with Japan?

The facts are that of our trade with Japan, 5 per cent of it are finished goods and 95 per cent of it are semi-finished goods and raw materials. Japan is not a big consumer of value added products. About 25 per cent of our exports to the European Community are value added products and 75 per cent of it are semi-finished or raw materials, but to the United States a large amount of our exports indeed are value added.

• (1845)

My time is short and I wish I had the opportunity to give all the statistics. The C.D. Howe Institute did a study of Canadian exports from 1989 to 1991 which was the first three years of the free trade agreement. It looked at those areas that were not included in the free trade agreement and those areas that were included in the free trade agreement.

Exports to the United States in those areas exempt versus trade with the rest of the world stayed about the same. They decreased about 2 per cent. However, in non-resource based things, in value added, Canada's exports to the United States increased 34 per cent and during the same period for those value added goods to the rest of the world, our trade decreased 5 per cent.

If trade to the United States went up 34 per cent and down 5 per cent to Europe in those areas, one has to see clearly that the statistics show the free trade agreement is working in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

It being 6.45 p.m., pursuant to order made earlier this day, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of the bill now before the House.

The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time and referred to a Legislative Committee in the Departmental envelope.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 30(6) the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

CANADA POST

ADVERTISING MAIL AND FLYERS

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should ensure that Canadians have the legal right to refuse postal delivery of advertising mail and flyers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. We are now in Private Members' Business. Would those who are not participating please leave the House.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I presented this private member's motion because a growing number of Canadians have committed themselves to taking personal initiatives in their own environment to assist with solving the very serious environmental problems that face our world, not just our nation but our world. I wanted to address the issue this raises concerning our treatment of waste.

The green plan identified waste as one of the most serious problems facing industrialized countries like Canada, particularly, that have the luxury of being able to waste.

The first of the four *r*s is reduce waste. After we have done all we can to reduce then we should reuse, recycle, and recover.

However the solution to Canada's environmental problems will not be solved by blue boxes alone. Canada produces over 30 million tonnes of garbage annually. That is more than a tonne of garbage for every man, woman and child in Canada.

We recycle only 10 per cent of our garbage and send most of the remainder to rapidly filling land sites. In Canada collection and disposal costs of waste exceed $1.5 billion annually.

The green plan gives a great deal of attention to the treatment of waste and to how we can reduce waste. It says that Canada's goal is to cut waste by 50 per cent by the year 2000. Managing waste inefficiently imposes an economic burden on Canadians. It goes on to say that Canadians are well aware of their poor waste management practices. They recognize that one of the more important challenges we face in moving this country toward sustainable development is reducing the volumes of waste we produce.

In October 1989 the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment adopted as its goal the reduction of waste in Canada by 50 per cent by the year 2000.

• (1935)

We are getting very close to halfway toward 2000 since that target was set by all the environment ministers of our nation and we have not in fact made a great deal of progress.

This motion before the House asks us to take a strong position on a major component of the waste stream, and that is paper. Paper products account for 1.4 million tonnes of Ontario's annual residential waste. That was in 1989 so we can be sure it is significantly higher now. Newsprint, fine paper and magazines alone account for close to one million tonnes.

We are worried about our forests. We are worried about forests at home. We are worried about forests around the world. If we recycled 50 per cent of our waste paper then almost 50 million trees would be saved each year.

This motion addresses an important portion of the paper waste that goes into our dumps every year. It is an important portion of the tens of millions of trees that are needlessly cut and wasted every year. This motion addresses itself specifically to unaddressed advertising mail. Many people across this country call it junk mail because they do not want it in their mailboxes, they do not want to be left with the problem of disposing of it, they are tired of receiving material that they do not want in the first place and even with the greatest conscientiousness they cannot even recycle it. There were 14 billion pieces of unaddressed advertising that were distributed in Canada last year. That is 560 pieces—close to two a day—for every man, woman and child in Canada. That means several thousand pieces of unwanted unsolicited mail coming into Canadians' homes every day.

Not all of that is delivered by Canada Post Corporation. However, Canada Post Corporation is delivering 25 per cent of it and is the largest single deliverer of junk mail to Canadian homes.

We are not talking here about addressed ad mail or appeals from charities for contributions. That is not what this motion talks about. However, of the 14 billion pieces of junk mail delivered every year in Canada, 25 per cent or 3.5 billion pieces are delivered by Canada Post. Unaddressed junk mail counts for 36 per cent of all the mail pieces that Canada Post delivers but only 6 per cent of its mail delivery revenues.

The volume is going up by 500 million pieces every year. It has gone up from 23 per cent of Canada Post's mail deliveries barely four years ago to 36 per cent in the last full year of reporting. That is an increase that is very dramatic. Remember that every time Canada Post delivers one of these flyers to your home—and it delivers an average of 140 pieces a year for every person in your household—it means that trees have been needlessly cut down.

There was a previous motion in the House to deal with the issue of whether there should be a requirement for advertising mail to be both on recycled and recyclable paper. Regrettably, that was not a votable motion.

• (1940)

There is another aspect to this which perhaps is not directly related to the environmental concerns that prompted me to bring it forward. Clearly the growing intrusion of Canada Post into the delivery of advertising mail is becoming a serious problem for many smaller dailies and weeklies across this country which were receiving a substantial portion of their advertising revenue from delivering advertising mail.

Canada Post getting into this at such a massive rate has had an impact on them. It is taking away from private newspapers across this country, whether weeklies or dailies, and is seriously inhibiting the ability of many small dailies and weeklies to survive, to bring the news to their communities in a way that is responsive to local community information, local community events, as well as giving a local interpretation of regional, national or international events.

A second question I think we should be asking ourselves in this House is why is Canada Post still a public corporation, however temporarily, competing with private sector distributors in their own business area? One of the claims Canada Post made is: "We deliver your mail to your mailbox". Why is it going out and hiring people other than the usual postal workers to deliver mail?

I am sure other members of Parliament have had the same complaints as I have had in my office about people walking across their lawn on a Sunday afternoon and dropping material in their mailbox, usually junk mail. They are astounded to find out that this is somebody who has actually been employed by Canada Post to deliver advertising mail to their home.

I want to quote a bit from the report on the first two years on the green plan that was issued just a few days ago by the Minister of the Environment. It states: "The office of waste management will continue to develop communications products to support the promotion of the four *r*s and the waste campaign under the umbrella of environmental citizenship. A primer on waste management and fact sheets will be produced. The office will work toward developing partnerships to promote the concept of environmental citizenship".

I think we all know that the green plan depends very heavily not only on government and private sector action to achieve its goals, but also on the involvement of citizens. It puts great emphasis on Canadians in all walks of life taking environmental responsibility in their daily activities.

This motion addresses precisely that desire of Canadians to be responsible for their environment. In growing numbers they are saying: "I don't want this material in my mailbox. I don't want the public corporation called Canada Post delivering advertising to me. I want to have the choice". The government talks about environmental choice programs and consumers are saying: "I want to have the choice. I want to be able to say do not drop this on my private property".

When I wrote the minister responsible for Canada Post well over a year ago, it was to ask that he consider amending the legislation to give Canadians that choice, to give them the right to put a sign on the mailbox that they provide for Canada Post's convenience saying: "I do not want any unaddressed advertising mail left at my home".

• (1945)

The minister did not reply but referred it to Canada Post. Of course, Canada Post said that the legislation obliges it to deliver every piece of mail that is consigned to it by its customers. Of course it does. That is why I had written to the minister asking him to consider changes to the legislation to allow households or businesses to refuse delivery of bulk mail, unaddressed advertising mail by affixing a notice to the mail receptacle. The minister still has yet to reply to that request.

We adopted a national waste reduction plan several years ago. We have made minimal progress on achieving the objectives of that plan. We continue to cut trees unnecessarily because we refuse to use the legislative authority we have in this House to pass the kinds of laws that allow Canadians to exercise their commitment to good environmental citizenship.

If we as parliamentarians are not prepared to give Canadians the tools to act responsibly toward the environment, then I am not sure why we should continue with programs to encourage environmental citizenship. Far too often we do with one hand something to encourage a certain kind of behaviour or to discourage damaging behaviour with respect to the environment. Then with the other hand we undo all that effort by refusing to co-operate with our citizens in exercising that citizenship, in exercising the awareness that we have attempted to create for them.

This is not a revolutionary motion. It is not going to greatly disrupt Canada Post. I know some would say that 6 per cent of Canada Post's revenue is significant. What is more significant is whether this is generating revenue for Canada Post, generating profits, or whether in fact it is being subsidized by the first-class mail rates which we know have increased significantly in the last couple of years. Certainly some of the small community newspapers in this country would claim that Canada Post is competing unfairly by cross-subsidization within its other services.

The motion is to allow us to at least have a committee look at the various ways in which we could assist Canadians to do what they want to do. That is to be better environmental citizens and to control the amount of paper coming to them and to influence the market through their consumerism.

We talk about economic instruments. Consumerism, the power of the consumer, is one of the greatest of those economic instruments. However, if we continue with legislation that does not allow consumers to exercise those choices and therefore to influence business in a positive way to the benefit of the environment, then we can hardly blame Canadians if the amount of garbage generated, if the amount of trees cut down every year continues to increase while our environment continues to deteriorate.

I ask for the favourable consideration of the House of this motion. I seek the unanimous consent of the House to have the subject matter of the motion referred to a committee of the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity today to speak on a matter which is becoming very important for all Canadians.

• (1950)

We are becoming more and more aware of the environmental problems around us. We are more concerned about the state of our environment and what the future holds for us. Canadians are trying harder to improve the situation. Individuals, businesses and all levels of government have recognized their greater responsibility towards the environment. Canada Post acknowledges its responsibility and acts accordingly.

I would like to talk about initiatives Canada Post undertook to play a more active role in the protection of our environment. The corporation realized that the protection and conservation of the environment are crucial to the welfare of its employees, its clients and the communities it serves. That is why it came up with an environmental policy in 1990.

Needless to say, it was not easy for such a big business to implement that kind of program throughout the country. It represented an enormous task which could not be carried out overnight. Canada Post was able to instil more respect for the environment in its everyday operations. For example, paper consumption in its administrative services has been reduced by almost 30 per cent. Publications intended for its employees are printed on recycled paper, using vegetable inks, and its energy and fuel consumption has also been reduced.

Those are only a few of the initiatves taken by the corporation and they show how conscious it is of its responsibility toward the environment.

The media are warning us more and more often of the dangers threatening our environment because of our thoughtlessness, and that is starting to work. It is at our own risk that we ignore them.

The responsibility toward environment does not fall to only one person or one organization. All those who contribute to the problem must do their share to find a solution. Looking for a culprit among all those responsible will not help us deal with this crisis.

Just think of the convenience stores for example. They sell products intended for consumers in a hurry. They carry packaged products such as potato chips, chocolate bars and so on. We do not blame this type of retailer for offering too many packaged products; they are only selling them. The solution rests first with those who design the packaging.

The same can be said about a product Canada Post is offering to consumers. We sometimes blame it for distributing this kind of mail, referred to as junk mail by many. For Canada Post, it is Mediapost.

For its customers, Mediapost is an accurate and cost-effective means of transmitting their message. People like David Love, vice-president of the World Wide Nature Fund, stated that: "For charities, mail advertising is not junk mail but the most efficient, personal, ethically acceptable and important of all fund-raising methods."

Mediapost is an important part of postal activities with an annual volume of over 4.7 billion items and some $500 million in annual revenues. It is also an efficent and viable way to deliver a message whether it be from a small corner store owner or a national retailer or charitable organization like the World Wide Nature Fund.

Mediapost is useful, and studies also show that people like to receive direct mail advertising. Mediapost has interesting features. Let me list a few. It can be printed on paper that can be or has been recycled thanks to vegetable based ink. Mediapost is included with your mail so that the wind cannot blow it away. It is delivered directly in the mail box. It is also possible to target a specific group or area. In that way, it can be delivered only to those who should receive it, thus minimizing waste.

• (1955)

Direct-mail advertising is a big business in Canada. It is an effective and profitable means of communication which provides great benefits to the Canadian economy.

Judge for yourself, Mr. Speaker. Every year, direct mail generates $7.86 billion in sales in Canada. Canadian consumers spend $170 a year on average for goods and services advertised by direct mail. Direct mail accounts for $1.9 billion or 22 per cent of net advertising revenue. It employs over 200,000 Canadians. It is an industry that is growing at a rate of 8 to 10 per cent a year.

Direct mail is an attractive form of interactive communication with many commercial spin-offs. We have nothing to gain and much to lose by eliminating it. What we must all try to do is to find a balance between this economic reality and our environmental responsibility.

Canada Post is a distributor and only one link in a long chain, which begins with an advertiser, someone with a message to send. It could be a retailer, a politician or an organization seeking funds.

The chain continues with an advertising agency that designs the message, and a printer who reproduces it on paper made by a company that processes forest products. Then a direct mail house prepares the message for distribution. Finally, Canada Post, which is near the end of the chain, distributes the message.

Quite a few steps are involved before we can even start distributing an advertising flyer. After delivery it reaches the last link in the chain, the consumer who eventually recycles the flyer, or at least we hope so.

Canada Post is mindful of environmental issues. It has responded to the concerns raised by this kind of advertising in a way that takes into account both environmental and economic factors, but it cannot act alone. It needs the help of all concerned. To find practical solutions, Canada Post must work in co-operation with all advertisers.

That is why the corporation is trying to bring together all industries that have a stake in these issues.

It has set up a committee consisting of announcers, advertising agencies, paper producers, printers, publishers, direct mail advertising companies, distributors, recycling companies and municipal representatives. Together they are trying to develop responsible ways to use paper in advertising. By working together with the other players in this sector, they hope to get products and services that are environmentally friendly.

It is the kind of integrated and systematic approach we need to deal with that all important question facing us today: How do we protect and preserve the environment? If we are to meet the challenges of the future, we must take this comprehensive approach as solutions emerge. We know they will not be lasting solutions unless all parties are prepared to co-operate.

In conclusion, I want to say that I am totally opposed to this bill in its present form.

More and more businesses and industries are trying to find solutions to environmental problems by promoting civic-minded actions. The Canada Post Corporation is no exception. It is a leader among businesses committed to playing an active role in environmental protection.

Canada Post has implemented an environmental policy. It uses recyclable products and it is also engaged in recycling activities. It has reduced its energy consumption as well as the volume of paper used by its employees. The corporation has also limited its fuel consumption.

Those are only a few of the initiatives which demonstrate how serious Canada Post is about the environment.

I conclude by saying that environmental responsibility is up to everyone, including producers, suppliers, distributors and even consumers.

The involvement of individuals, business and all levels of government is crucial. In many instances, solutions to environmental problems are found in a co-operative approach committing all parties to maintaining the delicate balance which exists between environmental and economic factors.

A co-operative approach to the challenges ahead of us will mean that whatever effort we make today to protect our environment will help build a stronger foundation for the environment of tomorrow.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

PRESENTATION OF PUBLIC REPORT

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the public report of the director of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. I do not have it to formally table now. It is available and I can provide a copy if the Table does not have it. Both lobbies should have it for distribution to members.

What I had intended to do was to make a statement.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I think I understand what the minister is suggesting, that we proceed with statements by ministers and thereafter we would revert to the tabling of documents whereby he could table the report which he refers to. That is my understanding of the minister's request.

TABLING OF PUBLIC REPORT 1992

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table in both official languages two copies of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service public report 1992.

I want to thank my hon. friend, the Opposition House Leader, for assisting me in that procedure which I seem to have forgotten over the last two years how to do.

NATIONAL SECURITY SYSTEM

STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, my statement today marks the second occasion on which I have provided Parliament with an overview of the three main elements of the national security system for which I am responsible.

These elements are security intelligence, security enforcement and protective security. As last year, my remarks will complement the release of a public report by the director of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

This statement and the public CSIS report form part of an effort by the government to provide Canadians with information about their national security system and about the threats that it works to counter. Together with the annual reports of the Security Intelligence Review Committee, not only ministers and parliamentarians but all Canadians are afforded a window on security intelligence issues.

Canadians receive daily from many points around the world reports of unrest and upheaval, witnessing a constantly changing geopolitical landscape. They want to know what their government is doing in constantly tracking world events for an evaluation of their possible effects on Canadian interests.

At the same time, they know that the cold war is over and that allies such as the United States with its vast intelligence and defence systems have in consequence begun a re-examination of their priorities.

I am keenly aware that here at home there are expectations for this government to adjust to rapid change and shifting circumstances. Being asked are questions such as: How is the Canadian Security Intelligence Service moving to respond to rapidly changing world circumstances and the emergence of new risks?

As I announced last year in this place, I asked the director of CSIS to prepare for me an assessment of how the evolving security environment might affect the service's mandate over time. The director was to consider future security intelligence needs, examine how the service ought to be structured to meet those needs and determine the resource implications of any recommended measures, mindful of the budget realities and the government's commitment to improve the efficiency of organizations.

[Translation]

The Director of CSIS has assigned this job to a working group. I would like to tell you about the findings of this group and the decisions I made accordingly.

The working group has requested the input from 28 departments on the security threats facing Canada in the years ahead.

The group has also called upon the expertise of CSIS by asking its employees for ideas on the best way to carry out the mandate of the organization.

Finally, the working group has conducted an in-depth analysis of resource requirements in the context of the budget realities and the situation of the intelligence community in 1993.

[English]

This analysis has confirmed that since the end of the cold war a progressive reduction of resources which are typically allocated to traditional counterintelligence services and operations which are quite labour intensive was warranted.

An analysis of the global security environment has presented the government with the opportunity to now make over-all reductions while ensuring that the security intelligence mandate has met an acceptable level of risk.

Therefore, the government is reducing the number of positions for CSIS from 2,760 to 2,465. That is a reduction of about 11 per cent. These reductions are being achieved primarily through attrition and by tight control of the staffing process.

As many may know, the government expanded the service's personnel complement in response to a very thorough review in 1987 which was carried out by an independent review team led by Gordon Osbaldeston. This team found that the new service, bearing in mind that CSIS came into existence in 1984-1985, was understaffed and underfunded to meet the changing security intelligence demands of the government. I refer to the CSIS public report for an informative, detailed discussion of resource issues as they have evolved since 1984.

• (1015)

Equally important is that the director's review has identified a range of activities and best management practices that emphasize the importance of intelligence analysis and operational flexibility.

We in this House realize that forecasting is an imprecise art. I want to share the general long-term outlook for those areas of particular concern for national security. I want to make it clear that my number one consideration in directing the service and the RCMP in its national duties is public safety. Canadians expect no less.

CSIS projected five years ahead to identify the kinds of national security risk that we might face. The implications for Canada were examined with reference to the service's responsibilities to investigate threats associated with espionage, foreign influenced activities and politically motivated violence.

First, the nature of espionage will certainly change in years to come. Hostile intelligence services will be paying more attention to economic and technological targets. Although economic espionage is not new and existed regardless of the cold war, some countries will likely increase their efforts to obtain our considerable industrial and technological expertise the fast and cheap way.

I personally intend to do my utmost to ensure that Canada's economy does not suffer because others want to take unfair advantage and gain at our expense. As a result CSIS will continue to ensure the protection of information and assets of national economic significance through assessment of potential threats and warning to government.

In line with this responsibility, I am pleased to advise that the service has established a liaison program with the private sector to enhance understanding and awareness of the vulnerability of information to clandestine acquisition. I will continue to pay close attention to CSIS activities in this area. I wish to emphasize that the service's role in economic security is defensive; that is we play an advisory and precautionary role.

Our mandate is to monitor and advise on state sponsored economic espionage. CSIS does not and will not concern itself with private sector industrial espionage. This is strictly the responsibility of the private sector.

In the area of proliferation, this government's commitment to the promotion of international peace and security obliges us to monitor the deadly traffic in weapons and technology of mass destruction, particularly when Canada and Canadians are involved. CSIS will continue to play an appropriate role in that effort.

As we know from recent events, terrorists remain active in many parts of the world, some of them close to home. Canada is used regrettably for fund raising, procurement of weapons, planning and as a safe haven by a number of extremist groups. CSIS has a vital role in monitoring these activities, as does the RCMP in investigating and apprehending those who conspire to commit criminal acts.

Regrettably the continued existence of international state sponsored terrorism is a cause for concern to all states which follow the rule of law. The director's task force found no expectation that international terrorism would diminish. The recent bombing in New York City underlines the vulnerability of free and open democratic societies to terrorism.

Global trends, including growing movements in pursuit of ethnic nationalism in various regions of the world, the growth of religious fundamentalism and increasing ideological extremism among certain right-wing groups, clearly warrant continued vigilance by the service. As the Secretary-General of the United Nations has warned, the new danger that will appear is more state fragmentation. He notes that rather than 100 or even 200 countries in the world we may well see up to 400 countries by the end of the century.

• (1020)

Canadians are largely a nation of immigrants. It is our heritage to give refugees and immigrants the opportunity to build new lives. As Canada becomes home to more refugees and immigrants—almost one million have arrived here since 1987 and one million more by 1997—foreign influenced activities and homeland quarrels are likely to be a growing concern.

Émigré populations in Canada may be coerced, manipulated or exploited by homeland based interests. By the same token, insurgent or terrorist groups may try to use Canada and the local expatriate population as a source of aid and comfort.

Nevertheless I have a responsibility to help ensure that old quarrels are not brought to Canada by those few newcomers who cannot leave behind the political violence of their homelands.

I should also note that we have recently amended our immigration legislation to strengthen its control provisions. These provisions will help authorities deal more effectively with potential threats from terrorists and violence-prone individuals seeking admission to Canada.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police is an essential element of my national security mandate and it continues to be responsible for the protective security and enforcement of laws relating to security offences. The RCMP plays an extensive role in security enforcement with respect to the Security Offences Act and other laws but also in providing protective security to VIPs, federal properties, airports, embassies and missions.

CSIS works in close co-operation with the RCMP, ensuring the exchange of criminal extremism and terrorism information relevant to law enforcement. As Solicitor General it is my job to emphasize the continued co-operation between the two agencies.

On a personal note I would say that Director Ray Protti and Commissioner Norman Inkster have given me every assistance in my task as Solicitor General for the past two years. There is a good working relationship between the personnel of the two forces and specifically between Mr. Protti and Mr. Inkster. I believe the difficulties of the past are not our concern now.

[Translation]

To conclude, the national security system in Canada has demonstrated its impressive capacity to adjust and change in response to changing circumstances.

I think that the findings of the Director's working group and the ensuing decisions will be indeed the tradition of excellence in dealing with major national security issues.

Other democratic nations have noticed how successful we have been and are now asking Canada for advice on balancing individual freedoms and effective national security measures.

[English]

In a discussion last year with the British Home Secretary I explained the Canadian experience with a new Security Intelligence Act and the Security Intelligence Review Committee process.

I have encouraged both the RCMP and CSIS to discuss with their eastern European counterparts how police and security agencies function in a democratic society. This is surely a sign of how the times have changed.

At home and abroad change is overtaking and transforming many things we once accepted as fixed and immutable. I want to assure Canadians that we are alert to the potential effects of change, and we are working to ensure the continued safety and security of Canadians through an effective national security system. I am confident that Canadians can continue to enjoy a degree of safety and security that places our nation in the ranks of a fortunate few in the world.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to respond to the Solicitor General's second annual statement based on the public report of CSIS.

The annual statement has evolved out of a process of review of security and intelligence, as the Solicitor General has indicated, that began a number of years ago and which culminated in the five-year review of CSIS by Parliament a couple of years ago. It is hoped that the annual statement and the annual public report of the CSIS director will add to Parliament's understanding of the role of CSIS in national security.

I want to point out, as I did last year and as I think should be pointed out for the next while, that Parliament's five-year review involved 117 recommendations. I sat on the committee and, while it certainly was not our belief that the government would immediately adopt all 117 recommendations, all of us who participated in the committee were disappointed that at the end of the day only one or two recommendations were actually formally adopted.

However, the government and CSIS have responded in other ways to those reports, not just the parliamentary report but others, and one of those responses is this annual statement which we all agree is constructive.

For the record I want to point out that the role of monitoring CSIS and other players in the national security field is a job that has been given to the Security Intelligence Review Committee. This is a body appointed by the government which reports to the House of Commons as it sees fit, but at least once per year. The other structure that monitors is the subcommittee of the House of Commons justice committee which monitors SIRC and the other players as best it can. I see the chairman of that committee smiling at me from across the floor today.

In any event, the task of monitoring our national security agency is not one that parliamentary systems have taken to easily. We hope that we have found some of the right tools and are doing the job properly.

I want to make reference to portions of the annual report as discussed by the Solicitor General. From our perspective in Parliament we invest large sums of money in gathering security intelligence from many perspectives, including counterintelligence and counterterrorism. I think all Canadians would agree that the moneys we spend on those functions are actually moneys spent as a kind of insurance policy which permits our country to adapt, respond and prevent certain types of occurrences that would be very negative to our public interest. I think by and large we are getting value for our money but our job in Parliament is to make sure that we get value for money. That is one of the focuses I bring to my remarks now.

One of the newer areas of concern and focus for CSIS and other elements of our national security establishment is economic security, the potential for theft of our economic secrets, our technologies, most of which is in private hands but some of which is in government hands. As the Solicitor General pointed out, the role of CSIS now is only to monitor, do surveillance and protect against economic thefts of the nature that are sponsored by foreign states.

There are in existence all around the world many initiatives in the private sector where companies steal from other companies. At this point I do not believe that CSIS is authorized to chase those, but the Solicitor General has pointed out that CSIS is now liaising with elements of the private sector in an effort to make the private sector aware of the context of the risks, of the background of the players and of those against whom the private sector should be protecting itself. That is a useful taxpayer paid function.

However, not just in Canada but in other countries in the west there is now an issue being debated publicly as to how much the taxpayer should invest in protecting private assets and the technology of private companies. That is a legitimate concern. We have not fully debated or answered the question, but it is one that we, CSIS and the Solicitor General, will want to address in the months or years to come.

I want to point out what I believe may be omissions. I realize that the annual statements of the Solicitor General and the public report of CSIS will build year after year. We cannot knock off all issues in one sitting but there is one item of unfinished business that I will only make reference to, which is the Air India investigation that is still outstanding. Many Canadians are very concerned about that. We are awaiting a conclusion of the investigation and a decision by the government as to what will be done with the evidence it has accumulated on that situation.

Another omission to date, one that I hope will be dealt with in the future by the Solicitor General, is the security and intelligence operations and surveillance done by the Communications Security Establishment, known as CSE. That particular agency, while not under the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General, does gather intelligence information, electronic signals intelligence information. That has not as yet come under the proper ambit of this Parliament. We have not yet put in place procedures to monitor as we should.

I note that with the Supreme Court of Canada decision in Duarte and the provisions of Bill C-109 currently before committee and this House there may be occurring an inadvertent circumscription of the activities of CSE. Its electronic monitoring involving electronic signal surveillance, which is now done without warrant, may come under the ambit of Bill C-109. The comments of the Supreme Court of Canada in Duarte signalled that the state may not routinely monitor its citizens and invade their privacy without authorization or warrant. That is a matter that I know will come up in the future as well.

I want to raise another matter that I do not think the Solicitor General made reference to but which I am sure he would if I had placed it before him first, and that is we want to continue to remind CSIS to continue to be sensitive to Canadians born in other countries who are now full-fledged Canadian citizens, particularly when incidents involving our national security arise. These people have to be treated as Canadians and not be assumed to be risks simply because they were born in other countries.

There is a grey area here. I know that CSIS is aware of it. We have dealt with it at the national security subcommittee. I hope my remarks will encourage CSIS to be very vigilant and sensitive to the positions of these many Canadians as CSIS does its work attempting to deal with counterintelligence and counterterrorism within the context described by the Solicitor General.

• (1035)

I also want to acknowledge the staff reductions indicated by CSIS in the counterintelligence area. They are probably a function of the reduction in cold war intelligence battles that went on for many years. The need to engage in that whole round of activities with the former Soviet bloc is not as vital as it once was and may continue to diminish.

I hope those staff reductions would allow cost savings to the taxpayer. I am not so sure I saw it in the estimates. The budget appears to have continued on at the same level, notwithstanding the proposal to have staff reductions. It is hoped we can take a closer look at that issue at the subcommittee.

Finally I want to reconfirm for all of us in this House that the structures of the Security Intelligence Review Committee and the national security subcommittee will hopefully continue to do their jobs in monitoring our security and intelligence establishment in this country throughout the dénouement of the cold war and this period of an apparent increased threat of terrorism emanating from the various conflicts around the world.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, as a member of the House subcommittee on national security I am pleased to respond to the minister's statement today with respect to his second annual report on the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. I thank him for giving me the information ahead of time. It came to my office late yesterday afternoon.

First I congratulate the minister on making an announcement that calls for a reduction in staff. Many of us on this side of the House over the past few years have been somewhat critical of the increase in the funding to CSIS, when other departments were being cut back at a time of restraint, and the proliferation of staff.

I realize a report was done a number of years ago by Mr. Osbaldeston that called for an increase in staff. We accepted that as having been necessary at that time. It is a good move at this point, now that the cold war has wound down or is winding down, to reallocate resources within the intelligence community and in doing so to find a way of actually reducing staff. I believe this mainly will be done through attrition and fortunately not through lay-offs.

The whole area of economic intelligence, espionage, counterespionage and so on is something, as the previous speaker and the minister have said, that has been with the world for a very long time. If we read about the historical antecedents of the intelligence world we find that it was essentially economic in the first place. As empires developed, governments felt they had to protect their foreign interests. Usually those foreign interests were economic and material. They were not so much political because the old trading companies controlled the monopoly on foreign trade. It was not really a government initiative in those days, although governments did open up avenues of exploitation through political processes and military processes.

The military intelligence and the economic intelligence went hand in hand to develop commercial empires. In effect we are actually returning, in a historical perspective, to some of the origins of the intelligence world.

The difference today is the obvious difference in technology. Quite frankly the minister, or any minister in his position, has a dilemma here.

It is one thing to say that the intelligence community, in this case CSIS, will liaise with the private sector. That is a duty. It has to perform that exercise. However it is much more difficult and confused to say this is where liaising ends and this is where participation begins in the process of protecting economic interests, in this case technology, technology transfer, research and development and so on.

Canada, along with the United States and western Europe, is a country that is on the leading edge in many of these technological fields so obviously we are prime targets.

• (1040)

I do not know how we can solve this problem. We cannot really solve it today or even this year because it is a growing problem. It is going to be an expanding problem. With high technology, computers, and information technology growing at such a rapid rate when government institutions such as CSE and CSIS become involved in finding out how they can protect Canadian economic, industrial and technological interests I am quite certain, just as certain as I am that I am standing here today, that will involve us somewhere down the road with active participation, not just passive.

That is the time that very serious considerations will have to be made and decisions taken. As the previous speaker said it involves taxpayers' money. We are going to have to ask the question: Should government or its agencies which are funded by taxpayers be out there gathering information to protect private sector technological developments, research and development and so on? This is something that cannot be codified today. It cannot be regulated because it is moving so quickly. The whole process is moving quickly.

I call upon the minister and his senior advisers in this area to keep a very close watch on how deeply CSIS, CSE and the RCM Police actually become involved in what I would consider a private sector problem, even though I would argue that the state has not only a right but a duty to protect economic interests in a general way.

Just to repeat myself for a moment, it is a very murky line. It is a very blurred area between liaising on one hand and actually, before we know it, becoming directly involved in the protection of private sector economic and technological secrets and so on.

That is an area to which we are going to have to give ongoing consideration. I would hope that the subcommittee of this House on national security and intelligence would have as one of its prime subjects over the next several years working with SIRC, the Security Intelligence Review Committee, and the minister and his staff on an ongoing basis.

The minister also made reference to international terrorism and the fact that Canada is used from time to time for fundraising for these various groups. The IRA is one glaring example, one hideous example, but there are several others.

Canada is also used as a haven, a safe house, for international terrorists. They can come here and sleep it off for a few days, a few weeks or a few months in relative peace and tranquillity. To say this is irritating is to put it mildly.

I recall that a number of years ago previous governments were warned that certain elements were coming in from Asia, that the Asian gangs were arriving in this country. I know it was extremely difficult to try to survey them, to try to investigate and determine who were legitimate refugees and who were gangsters, political thugs and so on.

The boat people are a very good example. Many of these people came in with no identification. There was no way to trace their origins or their country of nationality. Many of them were ethnic Chinese whom the Chinese authorities forced into North Vietnam in the 1960s. Ho Chi Minh did not want them.

When the Vietnamese war was over they flooded south into South Vietnam and joined the legitimate refugees, the boat people. Eventually they ended up here in Canada. A lot of these Asian gangs, Vietnamese, Chinese or from Hong Kong, have been coming into Canada with great regularity. We have not really made the effort we should have made to sort these people out, detain them and hold them until we are perfectly satisfied they are not members of these gangs.

I have made reference to Asian gangs. There are political and criminal undesirables from all over the world coming into our country. I am not saying they are coming into Canada in vast numbers, but we have to keep up our surveillance. This is where CSIS, along with the immigration department, plays a very important role.

If it takes longer then we should take longer to investigate these would-be refugees, or immigrants for that matter, if there is any doubt as to whether they are related to these gangs, political terrorist groups and criminal organizations. Quite frankly legitimate refugees and immigrants to this country and indigenous Canadians do not want that political and criminal riff-raff from the world coming to poison our society. We have to do everything we can to get a handle on this and to keep these thugs out of Canada.

• (1045)

There was another reference to the foreign nationalist political groups in the country. I realize that the world is in a flux right now. We are speaking of course of countries such as the former state of Yugoslavia, but there are many other examples. On the one hand we want to accept legitimate refugees. We want to give them a safe haven. We want them to come here because we know they will make useful, productive Canadian citizens and will add to the great cultural mosaic of our country. On the other hand, however, we have to be extremely vigilant in making certain that we are not setting up little nationalist political groups transplanted overseas in order to carry on the same nefarious activities they did back home.

The Liberal spokesperson just before me made a passing reference to CSE and Bill C-109. We finished the bill last night without amendment. I was chair of that committee and I will be presenting the report in a few minutes. I just want to say in passing that I sincerely hope that Bill C-109 will relate to the activities of CSE.

I would like to ask the minister, although he cannot respond at this time, if he would consider checking to see how that bill will impact on the Communications Security Establishment. CSE is such a secret organization. It has been extremely active without any parliamentary control, as far as the House of Commons is concerned at least, since its origin.

On the one hand I realize we need surveillance and increased technological surveillance in this highly technological age in which we live, but on the other hand the protection of private citizens' activities must also be considered as well.

I am going to close on this last note, which is not in the report for obvious reasons. We appreciate what the minister had to say yesterday with respect to Leslie James Bennett who is now and has been for many years living in Australia. I am not going to go into all the details. The minister said yesterday in the House I believe that the government does not and never has considered Mr. Bennett to be a spy, a mole or disloyal.

I would ask the minister today in the House if he would seriously consider some kind of monetary recompense for Mr. Bennett. Mr. Bennett left this country in disgrace in the eyes of the public. Although he was innocent he lost his career and his family. He went to Australia to try to start a new life. He went, I believe, with a pension of $4,500 in 1972. To the best of my knowledge he has no other source of income or had no other source of private income at that time, and I do not believe he has to date. He sat there and suffered in the Perth area of western Australia all of these years trying to get redress.

The minister went a long way yesterday and I thank him for that. However, I call upon him now to try to come to some kind of monetary solution to assist this man. He is getting on in years and will not be living for that much longer. I believe he has lived in relative poverty all because he was under suspicion in an intelligence community that almost thrives on suspicion at times. I think he was dealt with by the RCMP and his superiors in a very unfair way.

I am happy to have responded to the minister's statement this morning. I look forward to the work of the House committee on national security and intelligence getting deeper into these issues that the minister has raised and that we have raised on this side of the House.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

REPORT OF CANADA-EUROPE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the report by the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association of a meeting with the Council of Europe Standing Committee on Agriculture, held in London, Middlesex, March 1 to March 4, 1993.

That meeting came as a direct result of a report given in this House by the association where we found that European parliamentarians in the main were not knowledgeable about Canadian policies and practices in areas such as agriculture, forestry, environment, et cetera, to the detriment of Canada in its world trading possibilities and things such as the GATT. It became apparent that a meeting of this order was necessary and 34 parliamentarians responded. It was a good opportunity.

I thank the government for its involvement. I urge the government and all parliamentarians to keep up the knowledge of Canada and express it around the world.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

81ST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the 81st report of the Standing Committee on House Management concerning parliamentary reform. If you will allow me, Madam Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on that report.

The report I am tabling this morning contains about 30 recommendations for parliamentary reform. It is the result of innumerable hours of work, discussions and compromises on the part of all members of the committee; it is also the result of the patience and efforts they have devoted to it over the last 18 months.

[English]

I would like to take a few minutes to acknowledge the special contribution of the members of the subcommittee on parliamentary reform who have participated since the beginning of the exercise in the fall of 1991.

I would like to mention the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, and my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Peace River who not only presided over the subcommittee's work but also chaired the committee for 18 months and steered its deliberation on parliamentary reform until the very end.

[Translation]

I would like to stress the tact and leadership of the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest who from November 1992 until last week has guided our work and, as committee chairman, skilfully piloted the project to a successful end. As you all know, the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest is Mr. Jim Edwards.

[English]

Finally I would like to give special thanks to our staff who worked with us during the whole process, our clerks, and in particular the outstanding support and drafting skill provided by Jamie Robertson, our research officer who rendered our task possible and our work feasible.

I have sat at many meetings and deliberations of the committee on House management on parliamentary reform. I would like to pay special tribute today to my colleague, the member for Peace River. Throughout the deliberations he led our discussions. He has been the lightning rod, if I can use that term, behind the work that has been done.

We are tabling today a report that will help streamline the work of the House of Commons. It will bring in several significant changes to the work of the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Therefore, it is with great pride and with gratitude towards all the members of the committee that I table this major and innovative report which I submit to the House today.

JUSTICE AND SOLICITOR GENERAL

13TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the 13th report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

Pursuant to the order of reference of Friday, February 12, 1993 your committee has considered the 1993 proposals for a Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act and your committee has agreed to report it without amendment.

BILL C-109

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-109, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radiocommunication Act without amendment.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-419, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Customs Tariff, violent cards and games.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Vanclief: Madam Speaker, it is an honour today to present this bill, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff.

The purpose of the bill is to prohibit the production, sale and circulation of cards and games of a violent nature and to prevent their importation into Canada.

I propose this legislation in response to the outrage many Canadians and many of us in this Chamber felt and still feel after hearing of the importation into Canada of the so-called serial killer cards and games and the production in the United States of those board games as well.

The minister of revenue has said that he would prohibit the importation of these products into Canada but his department told him that he could not under the present laws. Rather than wait for the government to amend the law to permit the banning of this offensive material I am proposing the appropriate amendments in this bill.

Thousands of signatures on petitions have been presented in this Chamber calling for a ban on this type of material. I am confident colleagues on all sides will agree this type of material which glorifies mass murderers and heinous criminals is inappropriate in our society.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Vanclief moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

TRANSPORT

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence) moved:

That on behalf of the Standing Committee on Transport, one staff person be authorized to travel to Toronto on April 6, 1993 to attend the Canadian Short Line Railroad Conference.

Motion agreed to.

SENIOR CITIZENS HEALTH ISSUES

AUTHORIZATION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence) moved:

That four members of the subcommittee on senior citizens health issues and two staff persons be authorized to travel to Washington, D.C., from April 27 to 29, 1993 in relation to their study on elderly abuse.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I have the privilege to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 signed by hundreds of people within my riding of Surrey North.

The petition points out that the planned closure of the immigration office in Surrey and New Westminster will result in people having to travel to Vancouver to receive service. There are severe processing delays at the Vancouver office. This is going to result in diminished service in spite of the fact that the office in Surrey took in over $4 million in fees last year.

The petitioners call upon the government to reverse its decision and leave the immigration offices in Surrey and New Westminster open.

VIOLENCE AGAINST CHILDREN

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a series of petitions in memory of all children who have suffered from the hands of others.

The petition states that this petition has been formed to stress our beliefs that the penalties in retrospect of child molesters and child murderers are far too lenient in this country. The petitioners strongly request that this petition be heard as the people's vote to reinstate capital punishment for child murderers and stiffen penalties for child molesters. If we cannot protect our children from the people who commit these heinous crimes then who will?

Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to enact legislation against these types of offenders.

• (1100)

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from a number of people in the Ottawa area who bring to the attention of the House the fact that retail gasoline prices are significantly higher here than they are in other parts of Ontario.

The petitioners state that the pricing differential is discriminatory and unfair. They call upon Parliament to ask the government to correct this disparity.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have a petition to present to this House on behalf of thousands of citizens of London with regard to the Mohammad Doleh family in its quest to be granted landed immigrant status.

This family obviously has influenced and been a main part of life in London, as witnessed by thousands of their fellow Londoners who want this family to remain in Canada and be part of the quality of life that we have in London and London—Middlesex.

I urge the government and its minister of immigration to listen to these Canadians who have told us what other people they want in this country. I urge that the Mohammad Doleh family be considered.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I suggest that all the questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Marcel Danis (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-92, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canadian Pension Plan, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and certain related Acts, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to begin the debate on third reading of Bill C-92, which amends the Income Tax Act and various other laws.

This bill will implement some important measures announced for the first time in the 1992 budget. It follows up an important promise made by this government to reduce spending so that we can lower taxes and promote growth and competitiveness. This bill also includes some technical changes to the Income Tax Act.

These technical changes are the result of constructive comments we received from taxpayers and their advisers in recent years. The purpose of these changes is to maintain and increase the fairness and efficiency of the tax system. This is an important element of this government's commitment to strengthen the Canadian economy by eliminating barriers and distortions in the tax system.

Let me first of all discuss the proposed tax reductions.

Above all, Bill C-92 would assure legislative approval of the reduction of 1 per cent in the surtax on individual income which took effect on July 1, 1992 as well as the additional reduction of 1 per cent which took effect on January 1, 1993. With these measures announced in the February 1992 budget, the surtax falls to 3 per cent of basic federal tax; 14.6 million Canadian taxpayers will benefit from these reductions. The total impact of federal revenues is expected to amount to $6.6 billion over the period from 1992-93 to 1996-97. I should point out, that these reductions are being covered by cutting expenditures elsewhere in government.

• (1105)

In addition, the House is being asked to consider a number of changes in the tax treatment of Canadian businesses. We propose to reduce the tax rate on income derived by corporations from manufacturing and processing from 23 per cent to 21 per cent, in two stages. The first decline takes effect on January 1, 1993. The second one, a one point reduction, is scheduled for January 1, 1994.

The goal of these initiatives is to assist companies in the manufacturing and processing sector as they restructure their operations and take advantage of new opportunities. This legislation also implements a number of other tax measures announced in the February 1992 budget.

The Income Tax Act will be amended to no longer provide the $100,000 life-time capital gains exemption on real estate purchased after February 1992. The exemption will apply only to real estate purchased before March 1992.

The rules concerning labour-sponsored venture capital corporations are amended to increase the maximum credit for investments in these funds, increase the size of the company in which the funds may be invested and relax the eligibility criteria for the fund sponsorship.

The Income Tax Act will also be amended to implement the Home Buyers' Plan. This measure allows homebuyers to withdraw up to $20,000 in existing funds from registered retirement savings plans and to use the money to finance the purchase of new or existing homes. Where the home is being occupied as the buyer's principal residence, there is no tax on the withdrawal. So far, there have been 130,000 withdrawals since the plan was announced.

The tax system will be modified to treat common-law couples in the same way as married couples. The broader definition of "spouse" that is currently used in the Income Tax Act for provisions relating to pensions and other retirement plans will be extended for all other purposes under this act. Under this broader definition, the term "spouse" will include both married and common-law spouses.

After discussing the measures in this bill that were announced in the 1992 budget, I would now like to return to some of the technical amendments we are proposing to the Income Tax Act.

First of all, we propose to reverse the ordering of the credit currently provided for the large corporations taxed in the special Part VI tax on financial institutions against the corporate surtax and income tax. This will allow foreign parents of Canadian companies to obtain recognition abroad for a larger portion of the Canadian taxes for which they are liable and provide an added incentive for them to continue investing in the Canadian economy.

Second, we propose to amend the Income Tax Act so that once the bill is enacted, the government can collect a portion of the taxes in cases where there is a dispute. This provision will apply only to disputed taxes of companies that are liable to the tax on large corporations. Individual taxpayers and small companies will not be required to pay over disputed taxes until a court has ultimately ruled on the question of liability of those taxes.

Finally, we are proposing certain changes to the 21-year rule for trusts. When the capital gains tax system was introduced in 1972, the then Minister of Finance said it was necessary to tax cumulative gains at the time of decease, to prevent perpetual deferment of income tax and indefinite deferment of capital gains tax through the use of long-term trusts. One of the measures introduced for this purpose was the 21-year rule. This rule provides that the value of trust assets be determined every 21 years, beginning in 1993, and that any accrued capital gains on the assets in the trust at that time be taxable.

However, the 21-year rule had some flaws. Trusts were able to avoid the application of that rule by transferring trust assets to a newly created trust, thus benefiting from a new 21-year period. Moreover, the legislation then did not recognize that the conditions applicable to certain trust arrangements did not allow the distribution of trust assets to beneficiaries before the end of the 21-year period.

The proposed changes were initially announced on February 11, 1991. A provision will ensure that the 21-year period cannot be renewed through the rollover of trust assets to new trusts; in other words, it will no longer be possible to start from the beginning again and thus avoid the deadline set by the 21-year rule.

The second change will extend, for eligible trusts, the 21-year period, that is the date for reporting capital gains which have been accrued but not realized. We proposed this change so that the capital gains tax consequences will be essentially the same whether individuals give property directly to their children or to trusts for the benefit of such children.

Some members of the opposition suggested that the rich can avoid paying taxes by setting up trusts. This is simply not true. When assets are transferred to a trust, the accrued capital gains on those assets must be reported at that time.

Moreover, trusts or their beneficiaries are taxed each year on the income of the trust, just like any other taxpayer. The capital gains realized on assets held in a trust are treated as accruing to the beneficiaries of the trust, thus taking into account the legal reality of these arrangements.

In spite of the fact that the proposed changes to the 21-year rule prevent the indefinite rollover of taxable gains, they have been perceived as a giveaway. Nothing could be further from the truth.

I want to make it clear that trusts are not designed to be tax evasion schemes. They mainly serve to ensure the orderly transfer of assets in a family planning context. This concept should pose no problem to the members of this House, in that parents must be allowed to distribute their assets to their children and other heirs as they see fit.

The proposed changes will ensure that each generation will pay its fair share of tax on the accumulated wealth.

Madam Speaker, as you certainly know, an issue was raised in committee concerning proposed changes to the provisions of the Income Tax Act on the confidentiality of taxpayer information. The issue has to do with the implementation of these arrangements and of the proposed changes for Revenue Canada employees.

This issue has already been brought to the attention of the senior managers of Revenue Canada by the Privacy Commissioner, Bruce Phillips. I have here a letter from Mr. Phillips in which he indicates that he is confident that the proposals can be integrated in a regime which will adequately protect the right to privacy of these employees.

In conclusion, the tax measures announced in the February 1992 budget, including those being implemented through this bill, are part of this government's action plan to set up an economic program supported by Canadians from all regions of the country. This plan includes measures to stimulate economic activities through personal income tax reductions, measures to stimulate the construction industry through the Home Buyers' Plan and measures to promote productive job-creating investments.

The bill also includes necessary technical amendments to the tax system.

In view of the above and in the interest of all Canadians, I urge the members of this House to support Bill C-92.

[English]

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak against the passage of Bill C-92 and against this government.

• (1115)

The people of Canada have to realize this is a bill to implement measures brought forward in the February 1992 budget. That was over a year ago. Pray tell why it would take over a year to bring forward measures that were to be implemented in 1992.

The bill was introduced for first reading on November 26, 1992. It took a full 10 months for this government to move on this major tax bill. In England, when a budget is brought down, the bills implementing the measures in the budget are introduced almost simultaneously.

Why would it take 10 months for this government to bring forward this bill when it claims it is such a wonderful and terrific package? That is the first question I asked. Is it because the government could not ram it through its bureaucrats? Is it because this government was trying to be devious and bring forward measures in this package that were not particularly good for the people of Canada, along with some that were? It was a way of making the people forget and taking the heat off some things contained in this bill. It galls me to see some of the ways this government treats Canadian taxpayers, Canadian people.

It has taken 10 months to bring forward this bill. We had first reading on November 26 and second reading on February 23. Then we were in a big hurry of course. We had to hurry it through the committee. We had to rush and get everything all set up, because the government has to have this bill now. Now it is really urgent. The government has an opportunity to bring in closure, shut off debate and try to stop any kind of opposition there might be to some of the measures contained in this bill.

One of the things that happened particularly galls me. I was on the committee studying this bill. There was a clause in it having to do with personal tax returns. Frankly to this day I am not convinced whether the government was right in bringing forward this measure or not. I do know there was a lot of fear at the snooping powers that particular provision was giving the supervisors and employers of tax data employees about their personal tax information.

At committee stage that particular clause was removed from the bill. I have some press clippings here. At the time it sounded quite good. It said: "Ottawa drops plan to boost tax man snooping powers". One has to realize this happened on March 23. Opposition MPs and the committee convinced the government that the Public Service Alliance of Canada had raised sufficient concerns to warrant deletion of this clause. There was no debate on this clause and it was deleted from the bill.

Lo and behold, report stage started on March 29 and the clause was reintroduced completely as is. There was no debate on whether it should be there or not. Just ram it through.

• (1120)

This government believes in top down democracy. It is its way or the highway. That is why the people of Canada are so disgusted with what is happening here. They feel so left out of any debate or any kind of consultation. They feel they cannot get their opinions through.

If we feel that way how can the people of Canada not feel that way? It is absolutely the most despicable, duplicitous way of behaving. It carries on and on.

I have to oppose this bill on the grounds that this government is doing things with this bill that are absolutely wrong for large numbers of Canadians. On the other hand, being as duplicitous as it is, it does things and proposes things in this bill which are quite good. Actually,the government has things in this bill we have asked for. It is its way of playing the political game so it can go to Canadians and say: "Look at those terrible Liberals; they oppose everything we do, even when it is things they have asked for". The government plays its crazy political games with the lives of Canadians and that is absolutely, unequivocally wrong. I do not want to be a party to this kind of deviousness.

It continues. Look at the newspapers today and pick out some of the headlines about the way this government operates. This headline is dated today, April 1, from The Ottawa Citizen and states: "Tories Force Vote on Free Trade Bill". We all know the U.S. is probably not going to move forward on this North American free trade bill. There is no rush for us here because there are a number of areas in the negotiations that have not been clarified and should be reworked. There are parallel agreements that have to be brought in.

Are the Conservatives interested in hearing what the Canadian people are saying? Absolutely not. They would not hold any hearings if they could get away with it, but they will not get away with it.

I must remind the Canadian people that second reading of the NAFTA bill occurred during one-half of a short day, which was yesterday afternoon. That is a very limited number of hours of debate on an extremely crucial piece of legislation that the people of Canada are very worried about. They have suffered from the effects of the free trade agreement which this government also rammed through without regard to the kinds of programs that—

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, I would point out to you that there is no government member in the House while we are studying a money bill. I think that is unacceptable. I ask you therefore to take a quorum count.

And the members having been counted:

Madam Deputy Speaker: We have a quorum again, so the hon. member has the floor.

• (1125)

Mrs. Marleau: Madam Speaker, I must take a moment to thank the member for Longueuil, because I did not realize there were no Conservative members in the House during my speech. I know that they do not like to hear what I have to say because I denounce these Conservatives who use the people of Canada and try to put things over them that are not good. It is called pulling a fast one. I know that they do not like to hear such things, but one of the reasons we are here is to represent Canadians and listen to them and do what is good for them, not the Conservative Party.

Excuse me if my language is a little strong, Madam Speaker, but it is disgusting to think that the Conservative Party's coffers are full—I must say that I cannot get over it. It angers me and all Canadians to think that Canadians' pockets are empty but the Conservative Party's coffers are full to overflowing.

That sends a message to people. Who is being served here? Is it the Conservative Party or Canadians? With all I see now and all that has gone on, I wonder if the people of Canada have been well served by this Conservative Party. I do not know whom they have served, but it is certainly not the average man and woman.

If they do not like what I am saying, then they should do something, but they should listen.

[English]

I find it very difficult to be a member of this House of Commons when this government continually treats Canadian people with disgust, thinking they have no heads on their shoulders and do not know what is going on.

I have news for the members of the Conservative Party. Canadians know what they have done and they understand it. This particular bill is a classic example of what they do continuously. They pretend to give with one hand to ordinary Canadians when they really are not. They are just looking after a few of their rich friends and that has to stop.

I have a feeling this Conservative government has been doing things to further the cause of the Conservative Party and not the people of Canada. I believe it is time we started representing those whom we have been elected to represent and that is average Canadians. It is essential.

Madam Speaker, you are going to say: "Well, maybe Liberals in the past were not that great". That bothers me because I have often heard a lot of accusations. As you know I have only been a member of the House of Commons since 1988. The other day I was in this House and questioned one of my colleagues who has been a member of Parliament for 25 years. I wondered if it is because I am in opposition. Is this a disease that happens to governments in power? It worries me because I know we will form the next government and I want to make sure we do not succumb to a disease such as that. I want to make every effort to make sure I do not succumb to that kind of disease.

I asked the member of Parliament who has sat as a Liberal for 25 years: "Was it that way when we were on the government side? You were there, tell me".

• (1130)

He said: "Diane, I have to tell you. We were always so worried about doing the right thing for the people of Canada. We always tried and went back to the drawing table and consulted. We did not bring in closure this way. We co-operated with other people in the House of Commons".

This is coming from someone else. I do not know but I hear the Conservative government saying that it is going to reform the institution of Parliament. Believe me, the only way to reform this institution of Parliament is to get rid of this Conservative government because it does not know what it means to have democracy. It does not know the definition of democracy.

It certainly does not believe in anything that has anything to do with what ordinary Canadians feel and think, or else it would not have stifled the debate on the NAFTA.

There have been two half-days of debate on this crucial issue of free trade. Madam Speaker, you tell me I should not be speaking on NAFTA. What I am trying to say is that the government does the same thing over and over and over again. It is doing it with Bill C-92. It has brought in closure on Bill C-92 because suddenly there is a big rush. There was not a big rush a year ago but now there is a big rush.

It does the same thing in every other thing it deals with. These are all today's headlines. This is again in the The Ottawa Citizen of April 1, 1993: "Tory slams PCs 'shirking' lobby review".

There is a committee looking at the lobbyists in this country. No one is showing up at the committee so it cannot do its work. No one wants to look at what is happening with these lobbyists. What is the fear? The fear is that these are their friends and, hey, maybe we better keep our friends outside because that keeps us rich and healthy. It does not keep Canadians rich and healthy but it sure keeps the Conservatives rich and healthy.

That is another headline from today. Another one is The Globe and Mail of April 1, 1993: "Inquiry may get censored memo". This of course concerns the terrible tragedy at the Westray mine where 26 people lost their lives. There is an inquiry going on as to whether the governments knew of the safety problems at the mine when the project was approved.

We have had all kinds of statements that all the documents were made public and were given to the inquiry. Of course they were not. Who are we serving there? The government is serving itself. That is what it is doing. It is serving itself. More things will come of that.

Then I have this other one which concerns of course the one clause that the government reintroduced at the report stage stifling total debate. It is again from The Ottawa Citizen of April 1, 1993: "A government of snoopers".

At a single stroke about 20,000 taxation employees will lose a right of privacy guaranteed to every other Canadian: the right to keep their financial affairs confidential. How disgusting and insensitive. Why does this government intend to do this? Why does it insist on having this power? Of course we cannot get any answers because it rammed the thing through and it refuses to do anything about it. I notice that once again it cannot stand the heat of my speech here. Those members have all left again. I appeal, Madam Speaker—

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): This is unacceptable. On a point of order, Madam Speaker. For the second time, there are no Conservative MPs in the House right now. This is totally unacceptable. There are about ten of us here. I know there is a leadership campaign going on, but they still have to deal with the affairs of the state. I call for a quorum count.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

• (1135)

And the bells having rung:

Madam Deputy Speaker: There being a quorum, the debate shall continue.

[English]

Mrs. Marleau: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to see that we again have a large number of Conservatives in the House of Commons to listen to my sage advice. However, let me remind the Conservatives on that side of the House that we are opposed to this bill. It is not our responsibility to have and maintain quorum and to have a large number of members here. It is their responsibility to have their members sitting in this House to ensure that this piece of legislation passes. They claim they absolutely have to have it and that is why they imposed closure. They hold it near and dear to their heart.

I have a feeling that these people are embarrassed by some of the things they are doing and therefore it is very difficult to sit in the House and be told that this is not a good way to proceed. I would ask them to continue sitting here and I will try to limit my speech to the content of this particular tax bill.

I will speak to the 21-year rule on trusts. We have heard a lot of things from this government on the reduction of debt and deficit. We have heard ad nauseam how great it was at reducing the debt and deficit. We all know that it does not know how to do it because the debt and the deficit are extremely large and it has been running this country for almost nine years. Obviously its talk is cheap. Its actions are what we have to watch.

Look at what is happening with the almost indefinite extension of the 21 years. Look at when capital gains were introduced. We have to remember that prior to 1972 capital gains or appreciation in value of any assets, whatever they were, were not taxed. When that was brought in it was decided that because trusts in essence never die—they are not human—there should be a way of taxing the capital gains held in them. At that time it was felt that 21 years was really a reasonable time.

Let me remind this House that this particular extension of the 21-year rule is extremely important to those trusts that were already set up prior to 1972. Remember that these assets have never had any kind of capital gains taxation. These assets, many of which are very large, have been held in these trusts for longer than 21 years but there has been no deemed realization. The only way not to have capital gains at this time, if they wished to avoid them, would be to distribute the assets to the beneficiaries. However, it is far better for those people who control those trusts to keep them as is.

This government has decided that these people would be allowed to defer taxation on the capital gains held in those trusts almost indefinitely. It is saying that they will be taxed some day. Yes, they will be taxed some day. We do not know when exactly. However, we do know that any kind of a tax deferral is generally a benefit. It is a huge benefit if it is deferred for a year, but if it is deferred for 50 years many things can happen and many laws can change. In essence it is as if there is no taxation on that for a very long time. This government that needs those tax dollars is saying: "We are going to allow them not to pay taxes now on capital gains in those trusts for perhaps another 30 or 40 years".

When we were in committee we asked the finance officials if they could give us any kind of an estimate. Of course they could not. I have said this before. I have never heard of financial officials who could not give us an estimate on whatever it is they wanted. I am convinced that there are some facts and figures somewhere that would give a ballpark figure of the kind of tax revenues that are being forgone for the immediate and maybe the next 20 years. I think they are very substantial.

I want to believe when this government goes down to defeat that this will be seriously looked at and that this exemption will perhaps not be allowed to sit as it is being proposed today. It is a serious matter. The debt and deficit of this country are serious matters. Trusts by and large are a tax shielding mechanism.

I want to denounce this particular part of that bill. It has been trying to bring this in, trying and trying to bring this in. I will say that it is going to do it by ramming it through and not letting too much debate go on. It thinks the Canadian people are going to forget about it because there are good things in this bill and things that they might want. As usual the government carries on doing what it wants at the expense of ordinary Canadians.

• (1145)

It brings to mind what is happening in another area and that concerns the poverty line. A committee of this House is being boycotted by all opposition parties. The Tories do not like the statistics on poverty in Canada. They do not like the sheer numbers they see and have decided to redefine what it means to be poor so that they can have statistics that will favour them more.

How horrible to think that rather than address the real problems of joblessness and hopelessness, they would change the definition of poverty to suit their ends. How low can they go? I hope they cannot go much lower than they are going now and I hope it does not last much longer.

I wait, and I know that Canadians wait, to have an election so that they can voice their opinions and let the politicians know just how much they have had it with their policies, with their lack of consideration of ordinary Canadians.

Another section of the bill concerns the taxation of capital gains, the $100,000. We know that capital gains exemptions were brought in by this Conservative government. We also know that by and large it is mostly wealthy Canadians who have been able to take advantage of the exemption on capital gains. The government told us that the excuse for bringing in the capital gains taxation exemption was to allow more investment in business.

We also know, we have the facts and figures to prove it, that it actually did not generate anywhere near the kind of investment in business that the government thought it would, not even one-half. I believe it is in the neighbourhood of perhaps $6 billion, but we know that it cost the government in tax revenues $20 billion and up. Those figures go back to perhaps 1991.

Now the government has decided it really should get out of capital gains exemptions, but rather than make a decision and treat all Canadians the same, it has decided to pick on one segment of society. It happens to affect those who can least defend themselves. It almost appears as if the government does it on purpose, attack those that cannot defend themselves. We see it over and over again.

Who does it attack? It attacked the seniors back in 1984-85 but, lo and behold, the seniors were better organized. They fought back and the government had to backtrack.

Just this year, at a time of total despair in the Canadian work force, we know the loss of jobs has been monumental. We know the unemployment rate is extremely high. We know those who have jobs are worried about keeping their jobs. We know those who have jobs have to work twice as hard as they have ever worked before just to make sure they can produce. We know all of that. Yet this government decides it is going to try and blame the woes of this country on the unemployed. It is going to try to make Canadians believe that large numbers of Canadians quit their jobs and go on holidays.

I do not know very many Canadians who quit their jobs these days because if they leave a job without really good reasons they are not going to get another one, and living on unemployment insurance is not the way most Canadians want to be.

Again the government is picking on those who really cannot defend themselves or have a difficult time defending themselves. When we look at the $100,000 capital gains we know that once again it is using the excuse that it wants to keep capital gains exemption taxation for those people to invest in business. Does a person who builds a small apartment building and who works very hard not contribute to the well-being of the business community in this country? I believe he does.

In Ontario the NDP has done everything in its power to kill the small investor. That is a shame. These people work very hard and perhaps have built a duplex or a small apartment building for income for their retirement. It is their retirement insurance. They have mostly built it themselves, maybe using small subcontractors. Maybe they bought an old house and converted it. If any capital gains at all is to be made by these people they are going to be hit by the federal government.

When I introduced the motion my feeling was that we should consider whether we want to have capital gains exemptions in the tax system. Perhaps we should not have them. However we should not pick on one group that tends to be the most defenceless versus the other, the friends of the Conservatives, the Bay Street boys, the brokers. If they make a gain because they have gone to their broker and played the stock market, that is all right. If they have not taken their 100,000 capital gains already, they can still use it.

I find it despicable that we play this kind of game with the ordinary people of Canada. It has to stop. That is one of the reasons I am totally opposed and will not support this bill even though there are measures in it that I support.

I know that in the past this same Conservative Party, when the Liberals had tried to bring in a many faceted tax bill, caused the bells to ring in this House for two weeks non-stop until the Liberals broke the bill apart and agreed to present it in different sections. That is what should happen to this bill.

Of course the Conservatives being in power have changed all the rules. Now members of the opposition have very few ways of delaying or stopping anything that goes through this House. What is happening here is by and large the death of democracy. The committee system does not work the way it should work, not if we look at what is happening with this bill and what the committee did. Then the government turned around and reintroduced it as is.

That should send a message to people. Those members do not care. They just want their way no matter. They are told. It does not matter what kind of information is brought forward they choose to ignore it and go on to impose their will on average Canadians.

I want to stress that this bill contains some measures that if they were not passed would help bring down the deficit. They would help bring down the deficit this year. Perhaps we could then be somewhat closer to reaching the deficit targets that have been set previously. We could come somewhat closer.

Every year the government tells us in its budget that it is going to have these wonderful reductions in the deficit. It never happens. It does not happen if measures such as these are brought forward.

• (1155)

I beseech you, Madam Speaker, to let me address the people on the other side. Let me tell them that for all that is sacred in this democratic country and for all that we are facing serious financial problems, to delete that section of the bill. The government cannot allow these trusts to go on for another 20, 30, 40 or 50 years without getting the capital gains taxation, without those revenues which could help fund this debt and deficit. If the government does not want to use the money against the debt and deficit, perhaps it could use it to create some jobs, to do some of the infrastructure programs, to help Canadians get back to work and to help those in real despair in this country.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement Government Orders will be extended today by 39 minutes beginning at 1 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(a).

[English]

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I might begin by telling the hon. member for Sudbury who just spoke that the Conservatives did not ring the bells on an income tax bill. They rang the bells back in the spring of 1982 over an energy bill. It was an omnibus energy bill that prompted them to act in that way. It had nothing to do with income tax.

In any event there are a number of things I would like to say at third reading on this bill and some of them relate to the hon. member for Sudbury, particularly with respect to the question of trusts.

The member said, and quite rightly, that the government acts as if it does not expect the Canadian people to notice what it is doing and that it assumes it can get away with certain things. Extending the capital gains tax exemption for these trusts was one of the things that it thought it could get away with.

I guess what I would like to say to the hon. member for Sudbury is that the Conservatives got away with it with her. At second reading of this bill, when I was making the very same arguments that she made this afternoon, she was on her feet siding with the government. She was saying that the NDP were making a big deal out of nothing and that she was thankful to the minister at that time for clarifying the matter. There was no willingness on the part of the Liberal Party to deal with the offence that this extension of the exemption for the trusts actually constitutes.

I raised this matter in the House time and time again in the months leading up to the time when we had the opportunity to debate this legislation. Not once, never, on no occasion was this ever raised by the Liberal Party. Thus, I found this whole debate about the trusts passing strange.

The best face that I can put on it for the Liberal Party is that some of them are teachable or that the hon. member for Sudbury was taking the party line on second reading and, to her credit perhaps, was persuaded in committee that the Liberal Party position on this, which was one of silence and collaboration, stunk and that maybe she should do something about it. You could see her mind changing from one of acquiescence to one of scepticism, to finally one of opposition, which is what we see here today. That is the kind of thing you like to see. We should not all come here with fixed positions and closed minds about issues.

I do not think it should go unmentioned that there has been a development in the Liberal position, not unlike developments in Liberal positions on other things. The NDP raised a fuss and managed to get some attention paid to the issue. The Liberals hoped it would go away. Then they said: "It is not going away. We better change our position. We do not want the NDP to outflank us on this one".

Then we had the spectacle of the member for Sudbury moving an amendment at report stage to eliminate the very measure which she had thanked the Conservative Minister of Finance for clarifying and defending at second reading debate. Fair enough, people learn and we are glad to see that, but we think that people ought to be aware of how these things sometimes unfold.

Another matter that the hon. member for Sudbury mentioned, and quite rightly so, concerned time allocation and the fact that we are debating Bill C–92 at third reading in the context of time allocation.

I might mention, before I even touch on the larger question of time allocation, one of the things we need to look at. It seems there is never any end to the things that we need to look at in terms of rule changes to cover a new development or new combinations of the ways that rules interact with each other.

We had a quorum call earlier, and quite rightly so because the government could have shown the decency to maintain at least one person in here to listen to the opposition arguments on this bill. It now has more than that and we are glad to see that.

What struck me when quorum was called was that we were using up the time of the opposition, whose time was already limited by time allocation. Perhaps we need to look at ways in which the government can be prevented from further using up the time of the opposition by not maintaining its own responsibility for quorum and forcing opposition parties or members, or for that matter backbenchers of any sort, into the position in which they have to choose between using up time which is limited because of time allocation and forcing the government to live up to its responsibilities to maintain a quorum.

This was never a problem before because we never had time allocation in the same routine way that we now have it. Nothing could be more routine than the fact that the government moved time allocation on Bill C–92.

This is not a debate that would have lasted a long time. It is a bill that the government took 10 months to bring forward. It is a bill that only had two committee meetings. Wow, boy, did we ever hold things up. There must be a real need to get this through third reading after that lengthy, exasperating, frustrating, and never–ending process that the opposition forced the government through in committee.

It is a joke. The government across the way is turning this place into a joke by constantly moving time allocation when there is no need to or moving it when it is totally inappropriate, as it did yesterday with respect to the North American free trade agreement.

An hon. member: Talk about the bill.

Mr. Blaikie: I am talking about time allocation. We are under time allocation right now so it is perfectly relevant to talk about time allocation.

I want to say that again the hon. member for Sudbury, or at least her party, displays strange ambiguities when it comes to her and her party's outrage about time allocation.

Today the Liberals when debating Bill C–92 are speaking out against time allocation on NAFTA, which happened yesterday. Where were they yesterday? Why was there no point of order raised by the House leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition with respect to the motion of time allocation on NAFTA? Why were there dozens of Liberals absent from the vote last night with respect to the vote on the North American free trade agreement? Why is the outrage saved for the day after on a bill that has nothing to do with NAFTA?

• (1205)

Maybe these two things are linked. Maybe they are linked in that both with respect to the trusts and NAFTA the Liberals are playing the same political game. They want to be on the record as being opposed to these things so they are not vulnerable to criticism from the NDP and from others that they are taking the same position as the Conservatives. Yet they do not want to make too big a deal out of it because they do not want to raise the ire of those who in the final analysis call the tune for the Liberal Party as well as the Conservative Party. The corporate elite are the same people who have the trusts and who support the North American free trade agreement.

It is no surprise to me or my colleagues that no fuss is raised about what has happened here in the last little while with respect to the North American free trade agreement and that what fuss there has been with respect to the trusts has been last minute and very minimal.

I would like to speak about two or three elements of the bill that is before us. It is a large bill and there are things in it that we could have given a lot more attention to, but we would not have been allowed to pay attention to them anyway. Had we indicated in any way that we wanted the committee to look at other significant elements of what was in the bill the committee would have been shut down and we would have been back here anyway.

The issue of trusts was the main thing. We did succeed, and this happened because the NDP requested it, in having some witnesses before the committee with respect to the 21–year tax exemption for trusts. We had some excellent testimony from Professor Neil Brooks and from Mr. Sidney Goldstein, a practising tax lawyer.

It was interesting to watch because by the time the witnesses finished not only had the hon. member for Sudbury seen the light but the members on the government side had been quietened. Their former exuberance, their former uncritical defence of this measure was silenced. Even the member for Mississauga South, and it is hard to imagine, seemed to be a bit on the quiet side by the time the witnesses got through explaining just what a real tax benefit this extension is for all the people who will be affected by it.

The Revenue Canada officials who appeared tried to argue that there is no tax benefit in trusts, no tax advantage. Amazing. People go to all the trouble of setting up these trusts for nothing, just because they like trusts. In some cases they may set them up in order to maintain control over certain assets, et cetera, but they certainly also do it because there is a tax advantage to be had. This tax advantage is extended and made more offensive by the measure that is before us in Bill C–92.

I am glad, even though we have not succeeded in defeating Bill C–92, that we have played a role over the last year or so in making sure that Canadians actually do know just what is going on here.

• (1210)

Had we not raised this, and for that matter had I not raised it as the NDP tax critic over the last several months, it would have just happened and it would have continued to have been what I called it once in this Chamber: a dark dirty secret about what the government was doing for the rich in this country.

It is not a secret any more. It is not as widely known as I would like, but it is not a secret any more. The government will have to answer for this. It will have to answer for the lie that this gives to its rhetoric about deficit reduction. How are ordinary Canadians to believe that the government is serious about deficit reduction when it sees that in spite of its rhetoric about deficit reduction it persists in maintaining and extending certain tax loopholes for wealthy Canadians?

If it was willing to close these loopholes and then say that it has closed a lot of these loopholes, closed them all, and its back is still to the wall fiscally then all this rhetoric about tough decisions might have some credibility. In the absence of that action that kind of rhetoric does not cut it with ordinary Canadians, even though they might be concerned about the deficit, as we all should be. People want to know that if governments are going to address the serious question of deficit reduction they are going to do it in a way that is fair, that calls upon everyone to sacrifice according to their means, and that does not exempt certain classes of people from contributing their fair share to the over–all common good.

That is what we have here. Certain classes of people are being exempted. In the meantime the poor are getting poorer and the middle class, as an hon. member said in this House the other day, is getting the shaft. That is certainly the way the people in my riding feel. They feel they are the people who are paying the bills in this country, who are obeying the rules in this country, who do not expect any special favours from government, who are working and contributing to their community, raising families, and going to work every day. Their income tax is coming straight off their cheques. They do not have any fancy pants lawyers and accountants to figure out how not to pay taxes.

There is a whole industry out there devoted to cheating the Canadian public. It is led by a host of lawyers and accountants, most of whom should wind up at the bottom of the sea.

Mr. Lewis: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. I know that comment was made in the midst of debate, but as a lawyer and an accountant I resent the inference that there is a whole industry out there dedicated to cheating. I think my hon. friend might better review that remark to see if he might want to think better of it in terms of the way he approaches entire professions.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona might want to review his remarks. I am sure he did not want to impugn the motives of the entire legal profession.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I will think about it and if I think better of it I will let the hon. member know. The fact is that there is an entire industry in this country devoted to advising people on how to avoid taxes.

Mr. Lewis: You are a poor excuse for an ordained minister.

Mr. Blaikie: Yes, I am an ordained minister. I think there are a lot of people who should be driven out of the temple with a whip, and lawyers and accountants are a good place to start, particularly those who make their living advising people on how to avoid taxes, on how to avoid paying their fair share. If the member is offended by this I am sorry, but it is perfectly within my purview to attribute motives to certain professions. I can tell I have really hit a nerve here.

• (1215)

The other issue that came to the fore with respect to this particular bill was raised by the hon. member for Sudbury. It has to do with the way all the people who work for Revenue Canada are going to be in a special class of taxpayers now. Their employer is going to be able to look through their personal tax files and use whatever information it can find there to pursue disciplinary or other management related objectives.

I think this is an invasion of the privacy of these employees. It is a violation of a longstanding tradition with respect to taxpayers' files and it was quite rightly protested by the privacy commissioner.

The privacy commissioner is now satisfied that the government will provide the appropriate safeguards and in some sense has withdrawn his objection. But this has not satisfied the people who work for Revenue Canada. They continue to be concerned as are members of the opposition. That is another reason for Canadians to be very concerned about some of the precedents being set in this bill.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to stand to ask a question of the NDP member. He said I thanked the Minister of Finance for clarifying his position when he spoke to this bill and explained how trusts were taxed and just exactly how the laws were applied. I did thank him because I was about to clarify it as well.

I have seen householders going out that were totally, grossly wrong and misleading. They were actually telling the people in different ridings in this country that trusts paid no income tax whatsoever and that is false.

I was pleased that the government was also on the track of making sure it understood what trusts were all about because it had absolutely no idea.

I can say once more that trusts do pay taxes at the top marginal rate on any earned income within that trust. If they have Canada Savings Bonds they pay the top tax rate on whatever interest is earned, so I had to clarify that.

I also want to know whether the NDP members now understand that this was about capital gains and appreciation of assets that have been held in trust.

When I spoke at second reading on this bill I did state that I wanted more information. I wanted to know the rationale behind what the government was proposing to do because I like to be informed before taking violent stands one way or the other.

I did not get the information I was seeking from the Conservatives. I did not get the facts and figures. The information I did get led me to believe this would be very unfair and we actually need the tax revenues now and not 20 or 50 years from now.

Has the NDP finally learned what is in trusts and what it all means? I want to know this because it is essential. If it wants to pretend it knows how to run the economics of this country, it had better be informed.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, we understood from the very beginning the difference between income tax and tax on capital gains.

I challenge the member to produce a householder or anything from any member that says these trusts pay no income taxes, because that was not what was said.

• (1220)

We were saying these trusts paid no capital gains tax and it was to have been paid at the end of the 21-year period that existed from 1972 to 1993. They paid no tax in that 21-year period. They were expected to pay tax at the expiry of that 21-year period and they were now not going to have to pay tax after the expiry of the 21-year period.

The hon. member may have been offended by some of the estimates that were used, but they were received from one of the witnesses whom she quoted in this House. I wish the hon. member would make up her mind. The only information we have been using when critcizing this is estimates given to us by the very same witness the member has quoted herself in this House, Professor Brooks.

If the hon. member is intent on exposing this, I do not know why she would try to muddy the waters by making false accusations about what the NDP has been saying about this.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a question. It relates to his last point, which I do not think he had time to complete.

It concerns the use of people's income tax returns, which is a major change in this legislation. I want to refer him to the fact that the final change in this bill is quite different from what was explained in the standing committee. I do not know whether he or the Public Service unions have picked it up.

I just want to read it for him very briefly. It says:

> —taxpayer information solely for a purpose relating to the supervision, evaluation or discipline of an authorized person—employed—to assist in the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan or the Employment Insurance Act—

It includes all the employees of Employment and Immigration Canada and Health and Welfare Canada who deal directly or indirectly with Canada Pension Plan, as well as the employees of Revenue Canada. I spent three years as a law clerk in a provincial legislature just reading bills. I know what is in the bill.

This has now expanded to three government departments. All these federal government employees will now be supervised and evaluated by their income tax returns. That is what is in the bill. Do not tell me it is not in the bill because I know it is. I just read it. It is on page 248 of the bill. How does the hon. member think the Public Service unions are going to react to this?

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member knows how the members of the Public Service unions will react to this. They will react to it with outrage. By reintroducing exactly what was defeated in the committee, the government not only did not take the committee process seriously, as the hon. member points out; it may have actually extended the reach of what was found offensive in committee.

This is a new twist on how not to pay attention to committees. The committee defeats something because it thinks it goes too far. The government agrees and says it will solve the problem; get it defeated in committee and then when it comes to the House, it will bring in something that goes even further.

Whatever the case may be, a horrible precedent has been set that will provide a real and unjust imbalance in the relationship between labour and management at Revenue Canada and any other place where this might apply. I thank the hon. member for making sure I had an opportunity to comment more on this as my time had run out.

• (1225)

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, to continue along that same line of explanation for the bill presently going through the House of Commons, I draw the attention of members to page 248 of this bill.

It says:

> —the supervision evaluation, or discipline of an authorized person—employed by or engaged by or on behalf of—to assist in the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan or the Unemployment Insurance Act—

It is quite an infringement to judge somebody for supervision or evaluation purposes.

Would the employer find out how much money the person does or does not have, whether or not he or she is supporting children somewhere, what charities he or she gives to, or what political parties he or she contributed to? That is all information available under the privacy of a person's income tax return to the entire Public Service of Canada now. It would involve employees of employment and immigration who deal indirectly with the Unemployment Insurance Act in employment measures such as section 25, all employees of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, all employees who deal directly or indirectly with the Canada Pension Plan, and all employees who deal directly or indirectly with Revenue Canada.

What is this? The Public Service Alliance of Canada must immediately act and demand a hearing because there is closure in this place. This bill will come to a vote in this place without having any hearings on that section of the act. It will come to a vote this evening so there is nothing the unions can do. There is nothing the employees can do. There is nothing members of Parliament can do. The only option, I suppose, under our system is to go to the Senate and ask it for hearings.

That is what we are passing in this bill. Just imagine when all the employees in the McCurdy conference in Gander, Newfoundland, are being looked at for promotions or salaries. They will have their income tax returns examined. That authorization is given under this bill. All the employees in Grand Falls, Newfoundland, working with employment and immigration can have their income tax returns sent to their bosses to evaluate. That is what is in the bill. That is what we are passing today in the House of Commons.

The member for Mississauga South stood in this Chamber the other day and gave the rationale for this change. Somebody in Revenue Canada appeared before the Federal Court relating to a case in which the person's income tax return was necessary but could not be obtained in advance of the charges being laid. This is why the change was being made in the law because this person could have been disciplined before the case came to the Federal Court.

That member stood and said it and another member stood and said it. Imagine. Because of a case before the Federal Court involving somebody at Revenue Canada, the bill is being changed to give the income tax return of everybody working for the federal government to their bosses for supervision and evaluation purposes. That is not the only change made in the bill.

• (1230)

There is another change here that I just noticed. It did not receive any discussion in committee. It is for people who expect returns from Revenue Canada. Ordinary taxpayers have to pay interest from the time they file or April 30, whichever is later. The government has now changed three sections of the bill: clauses 77(1), 78(1) and so on. Interest will not be paid back now until 45 days after April 30 or after the date filed plus 45 days, whichever is later.

In the fairness package introduced by the Government of Canada last year in this Chamber, it said under fairness that Revenue Canada would pay interest back to the taxpayer just as the taxpayer had to pay interest to Revenue Canada. Now it has changed under this legislation.

This is most incredible, mind-boggling and baffling. We talk about lawyers. There were two members arguing a point a few moments ago. A legal opinion was given in this Chamber and it was given before the committee concerning the reason for the change in the trust law. All people had to do was to use the member's reasoning.

The member for Mississauga South says that all one has to do is to change the trustees. Imagine, all one has to do, he said, was to change the trustees to get around paying the tax. I hope the people in the auditing section of Revenue Canada were listening to members of Parliament when they stood in this Chamber and said that all one had to do was to change the trustees.

We have people employed in the Government of Canada. When one files a return on a trust, a T-3, and it comes up that the trustees are changed there is a little light that goes on in the computer. They want to know why. If it is found that those trustees were changed to avoid the taxes then somebody would be in trouble. GAAR, the General Anti-Avoidance Rule, would be after them. That is the law of this country.

There is a law in this country so that one cannot intentionally avoid paying taxes by simply changing the trustees in a trust. One cannot do it. If one can then a lot of people should be fired in Revenue Canada. I suppose there is something even more alarming than that nonsense that all one has to do to get around paying taxes is to just change a few trustees.

Apart from that, there is the incredible rationale used by the Government of Canada. Here we have the dean of law of the University of Victoria, the associate dean of law of Osgoode Hall and two tax experts, one in Toronto and one in Ottawa, claiming that this is a giveaway to some of the wealthiest people in Canada.

Members of Parliament did not say it. Some members of Parliament have said it over the years. One can read it sometimes in books that have been written to analyse our income tax system. Here we have the experts saying that this is a big giveaway. At the same time we have cut back our transfers to the provincial governments. We have not only cut back to the province of Newfoundland but we have demanded money back.

Imagine this. On the same day that one says one is going to forgive $145 million to two foreign banks that have nothing to do with trade with this nation, there is a bit of diplomacy.

• (1235)

One says to the Government of Newfoundland: "You have to pay back another $100 million because we believe you were overpaid". "Because the system has changed in counting people and we miscounted the population, you have to pay back money, province of Newfoundland, province of Saskatchewan, province of Nova Scotia and province of Prince Edward Island".

It brings in the GST and it taxes people and now it has the experts saying: "But it is giving the biggest tax break that we know of to the wealthiest people in Canada". How does one rationalize that? How does one rationalize putting off the payment of taxes that would have come due this year in 1993? How does one rationalize putting off the payment of those taxes while one puts the GST on ordinary people?

There is no rationale to any of this. There is no reasoning that the Government of Canada can come up with to do what it is doing here today.

A lot of new things happened to our income tax system in 1993. For the first time in 1993, for example, if somebody owes money to the Unemployment Insurance Commission they now have their rebate attached for the first time in Canadian history. It was never done before. If one owes money to the Unemployment Insurance Commission, if one is not on claim, if one owed it from two years ago or more, or if one is on a claim from a year ago or more, then one can have it attached from one's rebate that is due from Revenue Canada.

Somebody might say: "Oh, yes, but a lot of these cases are fraud cases". However, what is fraud under the Unemployment Insurance Act? I will say what fraud is. I represented a group of carpenters before a federal judge one day. These three carpenters had incorporated themselves—there were other people involved—into a company for what they called bidding purposes, to do bids on jobs. It was judged by national revenue that their unemployment insurance contributions were not for insurable employment because it was not, what is called under the act, at arm's length from the administration of the company.

We had to prove that the company was not formed for the purpose of collecting unemployment insurance. A judgment is given by the judge in this case. Therefore one is left with having to determine whether or not they formed the company just to collect unemployment insurance. One of the chaps was on the stand and the judge said: "Did you form the company so you could collect unemployment insurance?" The fellow says: "Yes, sir, of course that was one of the reasons. I would be a fool not to. What can one do in the middle of winter? Of course one is going to claim unemployment insurance". The judgment came down against those three carpenters. They have to pay back money now from about the last five years. There are endless numbers of these cases.

However, under the meaning of the Unemployment Insurance Act they committed fraud. They fraudulently obtained unemployment insurance. It was unknowing but it is fraud. They will not get a Revenue Canada return until all that money is paid back. It will just be seized now. All the arrangements that were made for pay back are all cancelled. All their returns from Revenue Canada will be seized. Not a week goes by that it does not happen. The unemployment insurance offices throughout this country supply a list of names to Revenue Canada in that province and the action is taken. That is every week.

• (1240)

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baker: The hon. member says: "Hear, hear". There is a real Tory talking: "Hear, hear". Sock it to the poor guys. The rich get richer, the poor get poorer and the middle class get the shaft. That is Tory philosophy and that is what has happened under this bill.

Just imagine our country in the state it is in financially and with the debt up. Just examine the debt. The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood just did an analysis of the cost of collecting the GST versus the revenues. Everybody is in a situation where they are examining taxes. They are examining what to do to cut and they are examining what to leave out. What are we doing in the House of Commons? We are passing a bill that experts—two deans of two law schools, one associate dean of a law school and two tax experts—claim is the biggest giveaway to the wealthiest people in this country in a long time. That is what we are doing in the House of Commons.

Throw in at the same time these facts. For people in Employment and Immigration connected with the Unemployment Insurance Commission, people in the Canada Pension Plan offices connected with Health and Welfare Canada and all the employees of Revenue Canada, their bosses will be able look at their income tax returns through evaluation and supervision measures. This is quite a day.

All of this is being done under closure. The hon. member has criticized the Liberals for closure. There is an interesting number that he should remember. Closure has been moved in this Chamber since 1988 under the Tories more often than it was from 1933 to 1988. In the last four years in this Chamber it has been moved more often than in those 50 years. Talk about closure. That is what was done. It is no wonder the Tory coffers are so filled with contributions. It is no wonder.

As the Liberal critic, the hon. member for Sudbury, said in this House a few moments ago, the Prime Minister in his resignation speech said: "I have left the Tory party in an extremely good financial position". He took off his glasses and he repeated it: "I have left the Tory party in an extremely generous financial position". Too bad he did not leave this country in the same position.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, thank you for giving me the floor.

I congratulate the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls for his excellent speech. He underlined the fact that this bill is meant for the wealthy, for the very rich, to allow them to accumulate even more money, to grant them even more tax exemptions, while hitting the other people, the less well off and the medium income citizens.

We have only a few hours, not several days, to consider this bill. I find it surprising, even scandalous, that the government through this legislation will be able to assess the performance of its employees, in some areas, by looking at what used to be secret and sacred, namely their tax returns.

• (1245)

When Canadians fill out their income tax returns, they do it in all honesty, confident that the federal government will never use the information for performance assessment purposes such as promotion, demotion and even dismissal. This is surprising, but it is also shameful.

It is often said, in—

—Public Service 2000 that managers should manage a great bible of public service of the present government. Let managers manage.

Will this mean that from now on the managers in managing their employees in certain departments, certain sections, will now look at the income tax returns and in their nice human way decide whether or not someone should have a promotion, demotion or a transfer maybe across the country? Perhaps they made a contribution to the wrong party, perhaps they gave to the wrong faith or wrong linguistic group. That is abominable.

I would ask the member from Gander to perhaps elaborate some more on what I call a catastrophe in the faith we have in our government.

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, I will read the exact section: "use or provide to any person taxpayer information solely for the purpose relating to the supervision, evaluation or discipline of an authorized person who assists" in any way, shape or form "administration or enforcement of this act" which is the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan or the Unemployment Insurance Act. That is exactly what it is.

Yet when these employees fill out their income tax returns it will not be confidential. Of course I have this little old special tax guide. Oh how uncomplicated my financial affairs must be. This little guide, even a reduced form, shows a declaration of taxpayers' rights, privacy and confidentiality. It covers every taxpayer, but that goes right clean out through the window in these circumstances.

In relation to the hon. member's first observation, he is right because back in 1971 we had an inheritance tax. The Liberals cancelled it, threw it out.

It was replaced by the capital gains tax which at that time was half the normal rate of taxation. It was replaced. The members who were bringing it in, the Minister of Finance at the time upon advice of the finance department and the revenue department said: "Look, what about people who might not pay what was the inheritance tax prior to 1971, replaced by the capital gains in 1972 upon death, because their assets are in trust?"

The 21-year rule was passed. Some people call it an arbitrary figure but I do not think any figure is more arbitrary than death under this bill. The law was that every 21 years it would have to be paid. The money that would normally have been paid, that every small businessman pays, that every normal person pays, would have to paid in 21 years. Twenty-one years from 1972 is 1993, this year. Lo and behold, the government brings in a bill now to cancel the 21-year rule and to let it go for another 40 or 50 years.

Those are the undeniable, indisputable facts behind this legislation that not one member on the government side can deny. Nobody in Canada can deny that and that is why it is such an outrage.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate to try to refute some of the nonsense that I have been listening to from the other side. There are two particular points I would immediately like to address, one from the speaker who just sat down commenting about how our Prime Minister has left our party in great shape.

I guess I would only compare it to the prime ministers who preceded our Prime Minister, who not only left our country in absolutely terrible shape but left the Liberal Party virtually bankrupt. Not only did the Liberals wreck the country financially with their profligate spending methods, after they lost the election federally they transferred all those people who used to work for the Liberal government in the early eighties to Ontario where David Peterson gladly said: "Join us; we would love to have you". They then proceeded to increase spending in the province of Ontario at a rate of about 15 per cent a year and did exactly to the province of Ontario what they had done to the whole country. But so much for the Liberal record of the past.

I find it somewhat disturbing that an opposition member would stand and say that because there was a quorum call; we are using up debating time. They are the ones who called these things. I can assure everybody there are lots of Conservatives listening to what they have to say. However, they choose not to speak; they would just as soon choose to count.

I would like to get to the subject matter of Bill C-92 because I am sure that is what members would like me to comment on. There are a number of factors in Bill C-92. The first I would like to deal with is this issue of the $100,000 capital gains exemption.

I understand the concern that exists with removing the $100,000 exemption on passive investments. Passive investments such as real estate are probably the most well-known example. An individual may decide to purchase a second house or a third house and because of inflation it increases in value after a given period of time, whether it is two months or two years, sell it and take the capital gain.

Under the old system they could generally have a capital gain of up to $100,000 and not have to pay tax on it. Under this system they are going to have to pay tax on that income. Some will argue, what about those people who take that second property and use it as a rental property, possibly help provide low cost housing or rental housing in a market that desperately needs it? Yes, those people are looking for capital gains to accrue on that particular property.

What usually happens on those properties is that the person who owns the property is depreciating it through wise accounting methods to increase, if there is any profit in the rental business, that profit by taking capital losses or by depreciating the property value.

They are in fact trying to avoid paying taxes legally. It is not an illegal thing to do, and is very appropriate for those who wish to invest. They can still do it and have their capital gain on the property if they set themselves up in a small business with shares. The shareholdings of that company will increase in value. That becomes an active investment rather than a passive investment.

They have injected some capital into a small business. They have gone into the rental business and at the end of whatever period of time they think is appropriate to take their capital gain, they can take it. It is not just on $100,000, but since they have set it up as a business and the business has some equity and assets, they could potentially go up to $500,000 in capital gain because they are going to be actively investing and promoting a business.

• (1255)

That is what this legislation is designed to do. It is designed to reward people who invest actively in the creation of wealth within Canada; the creation of wealth through the creation of rental properties, if that should be the decision of the investor; or the injection of capital into a small manufacturing company or a small service company. At the end of the period of time it can be sold and they can have up to a $500,000 capital gain.

We on this side of the House are saying, if they are going to have a capital gain it is because they have actively invested in an enterprise that is creating wealth and economic activity rather than a passive investment which is simply sitting on a house and because it has gone up in value through inflation, they have a capital gain.

Certainly in my riding, back in 1988 and 1989, in fact in most of the greater Toronto region and in fact probably in a lot of Canada, people were being, shall we say, junior Reichmanns. The idea was to buy a property because it was going to go up in value. They would then buy a second and a third property, not because they had invested anything in increasing the value of that property. They simply wanted to take a capital gain because of inflation.

We know what has happened to the Reichmanns. It is fair to say that a lot of that has happened to the small Reichmanns. It does not make me happy to see people losing money they have invested, but in this world when they invest money they have an opportunity to make a gain. Similarly because of our system of free enterprise there is also an equal opportunity to lose. People will just have to be very cautious about how that works.

Another portion of this bill deals with trusts. The trust rules were established back in 1972 to deal with the change in the tax structure, as was mentioned by members of the opposition. We were going to replace an estate tax with a capital gains tax. There was a transition period where trusts had been established and there had to be some mechanism to deal with those trusts.

We have heard a lot of comments about witnesses who appeared before the committee. Certainly they are very knowledgeable people, I do not question that at all, and very talented in their particular fields. But as always happens, as I have found, Madam Speaker, and I am sure you have found in your experience here in the House, on any given subject we can have a whole series of expert witnesses each saying something totally opposite to what the other expert has said. It is our role as members of Parliament to listen to all the expertise that is available to us and arrive at a decision, a conclusion.

Some members of the opposition have listened to Professor Neil Brooks, who I might add is very closely tied to Bob Rae and his friends in Toronto, who have accepted the advice of Bob Rae. We know what Bob Rae is doing to the province of Ontario. We know that he is a profligate spender. We know how he loves to tax. We will accept that Neil Brooks in his reflections to the committee had a point, very knowledgeable in his own right, but not a point that I would necessarily agree with.

I think we will find as we look at all these committee reports that we each have to make judgment calls. I am not suggesting that the NDP judgment on Professor Neil Brooks is right or wrong. Suffice to say it is different than my judgment on what he had to say and I prefer my judgment over theirs in this particular instance.

What we have is a problem of this perception being created that trusts are created for the wealthy only and that there is some huge pile of money, billions and billions, sitting there untaxed.

First off, trusts are not created by the wealthy only. They are created for almost anybody who would like to take advantage of them. Let me give some examples because undoubtedly we can reference some large, wealthy families who would establish trusts. However we do not really know who has all these trusts.

There can be circumstances where a family owns a family cottage. The parents have four children and would like to make sure that this cottage stays in the family for all the family to use in the future. They establish a trust so that the family does not get into a squabble over which of the four kids owns the cottage. Do they each have 25 per cent? What happens when the bills come in? Who pays? All those things can happen. It is possible for couples to establish a trust to oversee the management of assets such as a cottage. In order to establish that trust they have to pay capital gains tax on the cottage.

• (1300)

Today we are going to take this cottage from the private ownership of this couple and put it into a trust. They have to value the cottage and to pay capital gains on the cottage. We have eliminated the $100,000 capital gains so we will assume that this is a second home for the people. They have to pay the capital gains on the increased value of the cottage as they put it into the trust. It was not free of tax going in.

For argument's sake the cottage is rented out all year round and it generates revenue to the trust. That revenue minus the expenses—we will assume that there is a profit at the end of the year—each and every year is taxed so that any profit accruing to the trust has income tax paid on it.

That trust under these rules can run until the death of the last of the four children. At that point if the trust or the children who are in a sense the beneficiaries of the trust have decided they are going to leave the cottage to their children, the trust should at the death of the last of the original four children value the cottage, declare the capital gains that have accrued from the day the cottage went into the trust to the day the cottage went out of the trust because of the death of the last child, pay the capital gains and a new trust is therefore created for the next generation.

All the way through there is avoidance or delay of tax. In fact one might argue that this couple who put the cottage in trust 40 years before they died and declared capital gains at year one lent the Government of Canada the tax they paid at that point interest free for 40 years because they would not have had to pay it until they died.

I realize that is an argument that is not being made by others on the other side, but the fact of the matter is that the trust is paying, up front, the capital gains accrued which it would not have to pay under normal circumstances until the death of both parents.

I have used the cottage as a very simple example. It could be a small business where there is an entrepreneur with a local hardware store, a grocery store or a corner store. The entrepreneur could be leaving the business to his or her children. The same rules apply. This idea that it is for the rich is nonsense.

Yes, they can take advantage of these rules just as well as anyone else can. Yes, they may have a greater interest in doing so. The fact of the matter is that these rules are not just created for them.

There is this perception that there are these huge sums of money out there. The fact is that simply because one owns an asset does not mean one has to pay capital gains on it. One only has to pay capital gains when one sells the asset. They would lead one to believe on the other side that one has these trusts sitting with $6 billion, $8 billion, $10 billion or $12 billion worth of assets tax free.

There is no tax owing on them. It is no different for you or I. What is our asset value? For argument's sake we would possibly own a house. We may have some minor investments. It does not matter what they are worth. There is no tax owing on them. It is the same with a trust. Simply because the trust has $100,000 in assets or $1 million in assets or $100 million in assets does not mean there is any tax owing on that money.

The only time a trust owes tax is when the trust generates income. They pay income tax at one of the highest going rates in Canada. A trust is not some way of sheltering income because the trust pays income tax invariably at a rate higher than an individual would pay. All the way through for 5, 10 or 15 years, every year, the trust must file a tax return and pay the tax owing on the income it has generated that year. Of course at the end of the time, if the trust is closed down, if it is transferred to other beneficiaries because of the death of the last beneficiary of the trust, a capital gains tax must be paid on the increase in value of the assets. This idea that trusts sit there tax free outside the rules is really not correct.

There is concern raised about the 21-year rule as it was created in 1972. Now we have come to 1993 and 21 years is up, and these trusts that were a function of 1972 all of a sudden owe a fortune in taxes.

First, they may owe a fortune in tax if there was any capital gains. There is no knowledge of whether there was or was not. There have been an awful lot of companies in this country with assets that have shrunk tremendously over the last 21 years and are technically bankrupt. There is no argument that says they owe a nickel. They may. That is true.

What is not mentioned is that under the rules created in 1972 if a trust ran the entire 21 years it would have to pay the tax. However, it is possible after 18 years or 19 years for the trust to owe a lot of tax in two years' time so it creates a new trust with a new trustee. All the assets from the old trust will be transferred to the new trust. No tax would be owed on that transfer. Lo and behold, what do they have? They have another 21 years to go.

The idea that tax was owed after 21 years is absolute nonsense because it was possible based on the 1972 rules to simply transfer from trust to trust to trust ad infinitum. In 500 years from now one could have these trusts still going and never paying capital gains.

That is why I am surprised that the opposition would be opposed to what we are doing. We are saying no longer can one go ad infinitum transferring from one trust to the next trust to the next trust. We are saying there is a beneficiary recognized in the trust. When that last beneficiary dies, which can only be immediate members of the family, the trust has to declare and pay its capital gains even though the trust may in fact be putting the money into another trust for the grandchildren or great-grandchildren. The fact is that every time there is a transfer of the trust from generation to generation there must be a payment of capital gains, whereas under the existing rules of 1972 there never needs to be a payment of capital gains because the trust can go on ad infinitum for as long as it wishes.

One can see I do not have any problems supporting this particular requirement because we are bringing into force some regulations on trusts and their ability to avoid paying taxes.

If assets are put into a trust, which is obviously what has excited most members of the opposition, then capital gains are paid going into it, as I mentioned. Income tax is paid on the increased valuation based on income earned rather than on inflationary valuation. Income tax is paid as the years go by. Let us presume that a trust, instead of going for 21 years or going to the next generation, simply goes for five years. At that point they decide they are going to take something out of the trust to give to the beneficiaries and pass the value to the people, usually children, who are looking for some cash so they can meet mortgage payments or whatever.

Under the rules the trust would have to value the assets, pay capital gains at that point and then make its payment to the beneficiaries.

From my perspective on the trusts there is every control to make sure that taxes are paid all the time all the way through the system. In fact we closed what I think was a major loophole in allowing the trust to continue to be rolled from one trust to the other.

• (1310)

I just want to make sure I have covered all the major points in my presentation. I see that I have hit everything I wanted to raise. I only have one minute left anyway. I will sit down and that will give the opposition another minute to ask a question or two.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, we on this side of the House are concerned about the protection of estates in trust. We are very concerned about that both from the point of view of the taxpayer and fairness in the taxation system. I will be speaking shortly on subclause 137(1) and specifically subparagraph (h) of that clause on page 247.

The member who has just spoken on behalf of the government will be well aware that this clause was not reported from committee. It was removed from the bill. It has now been reintroduced and even expanded by the government at this stage.

I was quite surprised since this clause deals with the right to have private taxpayer information for the purpose of the supervision, evaluation or discipline of an employee of the Government of Canada not only in the department dealing with taxation but in two other departments.

The President of the Treasury Board, who is nominally the employer of these employees to be supervised, evaluated or disciplined, knows nothing about this clause. That is understandable because this is a bill arising from another minister.

I wonder if the member who has just spoken on behalf of the government could explain why this clause is here and why the government wants to be able to dig into people's personal tax forms for supervising, evaluating or disciplining employees of the Government of Canada.

It already has very strict guidelines, regulations or even legislation as to how supervision, evaluation or discipline is to be carried out. It has just expanded the discretion that the employer has with respect to discipline. I am at a loss. No member of the government has yet explained why the government feels it needs this excessive power.

Mr. Soetens: Madam Speaker, it is evident as I made comments in my opening remarks about how experts appear before committee. Individuals make an interpretation of what they have to say.

The fact of the matter is that the government has very clearly said that it does not need to go through each and every income tax return of Canadians in establishing a case for or against a Revenue Canada employee.

Again I believe it is simply a matter of interpretation as to what is being mentioned. I understand the interest of the member. She certainly campaigned very hard to make sure that the Public Service of Canada had all the rights and that the Government of Canada had no rights. That has certainly been my observation of her interventions on behalf of her constituents.

I guess I would just say that somewhere there has to be a balance. This piece of legislation creates a balance that gives the Government of Canada and the people who work in Revenue Canada an opportunity to make sure that they have access, without going through the personal income tax return, to decide whether an employee in Revenue Canada should be disciplined or not based on work habits or whatever other reasons may be appropriate in the fulfilment of his or her employment with the Government of Canada.

Mrs. Catterall: Madam Speaker, I would like to comment on the reply just given by the hon. member for Ontario who obviously is not aware that I am the critic for the Public Service.

A small number of public servants live in my riding. Some 70 per cent of the 250,000 public servants in fact do not even live in the region of the national capital. He might want to be aware of that. I commented from the perspective of public policy with respect to the Public Service and not from parochial concern for my own constituents, which I carry into everything I do in this House.

• (1315)

I am afraid we have not had a terribly good explanation, considering this is really an exception to our normal rule of privacy about people's income tax returns. The member for Ontario might want to try to explain again why the government feels it needs this authority. It has substantial authority, which he seems not to be aware of, under the Financial Administration Act, the Public Service Employment Act, policies of the departments and codes of conduct of the departments, to discipline, supervise and evaluate. It has almost total discretion to do precisely that, far more than in the private sector.

In light of that I would like to give the member another opportunity to explain why the government feels it needs this authority. Clearly this makes it possible for the government to release personal income tax forms to other persons, such as somebody's supervisor, director or chief, for any purpose relating to supervision. To me that means any supervisor can ask to see the income tax form of a certain employee for any reason and it may be released to him or her.

I would really like the hon. member to try to clarify why it is there. It was removed at committee so why did the government seek not only to reintroduce it but expand it to include anybody working on the Canada Pension Plan directly or indirectly and anybody having anything to do with the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Mr. Soetens: Madam Speaker, I would first like to state I was not being negative about the efforts the member makes on behalf of her own constituents. I would hope we all take similar approaches to representing our constituents, but sometimes there is a fine line between the interests of our constituents and the interests of Canada as a whole.

The member for Mississauga South spoke extensively at report stage on the particular question she is raising. I guess I would encourage her to read the comments of the member for Mississauga South, which I think will quite adequately reflect and answer the concerns she has raised.

I would also ask the member to refer to the representations of the Privacy Commissioner of Canada, Mr. Bruce Phillips, who also issued both letters and comments to the committee on the matter she is raising. As the privacy commissioner Mr. Phillips is certainly not raising any major concerns as he sees it with regard to the bill, the particular clauses and reference.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, there are a couple of principal points I want to raise before I discuss the measures, some of which have been the subject of discussion this afternoon and some of which have not.

There are a number of things that bother me about this bill. First, we are now going back to measures that were passed on February 25, 1992. It is now April 1, 1993. Notwithstanding the closure we have discussed in this House and the slowness of doing business, and totally irrespective of the closure procedures this government continues to invoke, this is an unconscionable time to actually implement tax measures given the difficulty we have with our well-known public deficit and our federal and total national debt.

I want to put into perspective the background of my concern over the length of time it has taken and some of the measures that are contained in this bill as a result of the first 1992 budget if we discount the December budget.

We are now in a position where our national debt has become an instrument and an issue of great concern to all Canadians. It is very difficult to pick up a newspaper or a magazine or listen to any radio station, AM or FM, country and western or serious classical music, without a mention being made of the national debt of Canada within a relatively short time. Although it gives me no comfort that the national debt of most of the G-7 countries is a concern, I take no comfort in knowing we are second only to Italy with regard to this sad situation we are in.

As I have said in this House more than once, and I need to repeat it again as a backdrop to the presentation I have today, it is not just the amount of the national debt or the federal debt, and I differentiate between them. The federal debt is what the federal government owes and the national debt is what the federal government plus the provincial governments owe. To use a figure alone, although it might be startling, may not be the true measure of what it is we actually owe. Let me amplify that.

In 1984, which I am going to use as a benchmark when this government came to power, the federal debt of the country was $168 billion. I have heard $170 billion used for round figures, but I think, Mr. Speaker, you will find $168 billion is the correct figure.

In a speech given by the finance minister of the day when the government took over shortly after Labour Day in 1984, the deficit was in the vicinity of $35 billion. Through rearrangement of the figures and creative accounting within a short time the deficit went up to about $38 billion. In round figures the deficit in 1984 was around $35 billion. Whether it was $38 billion or $33 billion, through bookkeeping it was in the vicinity of $35 billion.

In four years not much has changed. In almost nine years we are left with essentially the same deficit of $34.5 billion projected on December 3. The finance minister is only too quick to point out they are 1993 dollars and are a lot less than they were in 1984. I will grant him that. That is a fair statement to make.

What the finance minister does not say is that the national debt has doubled. It was $168 billion and two weeks ago a clock in Vancouver showed the doomsday national debt at $450 billion, which is much more than double, and it is going up at the rate of over $1,000 a second.

The true measure of our debt is how much we owe compared to how much we make. In 1984 when we had a debt of $168 billion we owed 42 per cent of our Gross Domestic Product. In other words we owed less than 50 per cent of what we made. That is pretty high. If I owed 50 per cent of what I made I would be a little bit worried. If a business owed 50 per cent of what it made, generally speaking it would be worried about its cash flow and its future.

Almost nine years later where do we stand? We stand in a much worse condition because right now we are approaching a ratio of debt to Gross Domestic Product of 70 per cent. The closest figure I can come up with is 68 per cent. That means we are more than 50 per cent worse off than we were eight and a half years ago.

• (1325)

I do not care how one cooks the books. I do not care how one presents the figures. I do not care how one measures trade deficit imbalances and consumer spending. That is considered by most economists and most people in the business to be an accurate assessment of the financial ability of a country to continue.

Clearly the finance minister is worried about this and the government is worried about this. If one reads through his statements, and I believe he has as much as come out and said it, one will find that the December 3 mini budget, the financial statement of the government, was to calm and assuage the concerns of the foreign countries to which we are in debt.

This is much more of a problem than it was nine years ago, because nine years ago less than 10 per cent of that 42 per cent of our GDP that we owed was owed to foreigners. Today it is now 30 per cent and growing.

I would suspect that when the Minister of Finance comes forth in April, May, or June, whenever it is he is going to present his budget, we are going to be looking at not sorting out the problems of the country but once more assuaging and comforting those foreign interests that are watching us very closely with respect to our credit rating and our ability to borrow money as we continue to get ourselves more deeply mired in the situation.

It is my regrettable belief that we are living in a world of advanced disillusion. I used to think that with every budget the government would be able to sort this mess out.

I am now convinced that it has lost control. It has taxed as much as it can. There is no room for taxation. We have the goods and services tax. Services are being taxed. We have borrowed as much as we can borrow. Now we are in a position where all that is left for the government to do is to blame it on the Liberals nine years ago and to implement, I was going to use the expression nickel and dime but that is not a very sophisticated expression, measures like those measures being implemented in Bill C-92. It will barely scratch the surface of what we really need to get this country back in shape financially.

Let me speak to this bill. It went through first reading on November 26, 1992. It had second reading in February, started report stage on March 29 and resumed it on March 30, the day before yesterday, and it is now going through third reading.

There is another aspect of this bill that bothers me. I have found myself as a legislator, a member of Parliament and a parliamentarian caught in the dilemma of looking at bills put forward by the government. This one is over one inch thick. I would say it is about one and a quarter inches thick. I have been through it. It is very difficult to go through it in detail with the time one has, but I have zeroed in and focused on those parts of the bill with which I am concerned.

There are some very good measures in this bill, such as the reinstitution of the small business development bond program, and reduction of the manufacturing and corporate income tax rates which may be debatable. There is also the introduction of the homeowners plan which allows individuals to use up to $20,000 of their RRSP funds to purchase a home before March 2 of this year, a reduction of the individual surtax from 5 per cent to 3 per cent, and a measure to assist Canadians with disabilities. There are other measures of which I am very much in favour. They have been a long time in coming and I am very much in support of them.

However there are other aspects that have been discussed in this House, and I am not going to go through them all. The one thing that I find to be very inconsistent with the reported quest of the government to find every penny it can to retire the debt of the country is that it would implement such a measure concerning private trusts.

My hon. colleague from Sudbury has done considerable and excellent work in committee, in the House and in her role as a critic in bringing to the attention of the Canadian public the difficulties that we have with a clause in the bill that refers to the 21-year rule of private trusts.

If one reads what is in the bill, starting in clause 42, it would be very difficult for the average person to really understand what it was that was taking place here. Essentially what clause 42 does is continue the extension of the 21-year exemption. In effect this clause really opens a loophole to those Canadians who are in the highest income bracket and those who can afford to have million dollar trust funds set aside.

It opens a loophole which really allows them not to pay taxes until a time in the future, anywhere from 20 to 40 years from now. We do not know how long because it depends on the demise of the last member of a family who would be the recipient of the trust fund. It could be 80 years. Eighty years from now my grandchildren and perhaps my great-grandchildren, and the grandchildren and great-grandchildren of members of the House of Commons, will be looking at different problems.

Our problem with the national debt is a problem of today. The government introduced the GST at the most inopportune and difficult time, when more than 90 per cent of Canadians disagreed with the principle of the goods and services tax and with its implementation at a time when the country was about to go into a recession that was made by our own government, by its own admission.

I am told by the experts that in order to collect a dollar through the goods and services tax when the tax was implemented it cost the government 51 cents. In other words for every dollar that was paid by a consumer on goods and services only 49 cents went to retiring the debt.

Then I juxtapose that against the manufacturers' sales tax which it was supposed to replace, and which was not a tax on services. Maybe 20,000 businesses were subjected to the tax at 13 per cent, which was raised from 8 per cent over the years as part of the 38 tax increases that this government has imposed on Canadians. It took in $17.5 billion, $2 billion more than the net impact of the goods and services tax. More important, with that tax it cost only five cents to collect a dollar.

By anybody's imagination that manufacturers' sales tax, irrespective of its pros and cons, advantages and disadvantages, from an administrative and an efficiency perspective was 10 times more efficient than the goods and services tax. It was certainly a lot more popular too.

I am told by organizations in the business that the goods and services tax will cost businesses $3 billion to collect and around $5 billion to be compliant with. We are looking at $10 billion that businesses had to spend in order to implement this tax.

• (1335)

I cannot understand the inconsistency of allowing loopholes that will allow hundreds of millions of dollars, even billions of dollars, to escape the tax collector. I do not know what the figure is; nobody knows what the figures are. How do we know how much a trust is going to be in future years?

One of the figures that I have heard mentioned in a newspaper article is $10 billion. This would be an open loophole that would allow $10 billion to slide through the taxman's fingers at a time when we are looking for every cent from the lower class, the middle class and people without jobs. They have to pay GST on the very food they buy, that is taxable, and the services they receive, from a haircut to a mechanic working on their car to do required maintenance so they can provide transportation for a family. That is very unfair.

I heard three or four hon. members from the other side defend this tax, and I would expect them to defend it because it is part of the government's bill. I would say that I would not like to be in the position, at least in the constituency that I represent, of having to get on my feet and defend the passage of billions of dollars not being collected from those who could most afford it compared to those who can least afford it, those who have to pay over 90 per cent of their disposable income to the taxman in goods and services. It is grossly unfair and it is a measure of which the government cannot be proud.

While the Prime Minister may boast that his party coffers are in good shape financially, I do not expect that many members of the few who are running again on the other side of the House will be using this as an election issue. It is something of which I do not believe even those who speak in favour of it are proud.

There is another aspect of this bill that I find inconsistent. It is inconsistent with any government that supports its employees. I refer to the roughly 20,000 public servants who are employed in Revenue Canada.

I happen to have a great deal of respect for the Public Service of Canada. I think we have one of the finest public services in the world. I have had experience with many. I have worked with public servants and we should be proud of the work they do. They are not just in Ottawa; they are all throughout Canada. In my riding they operate federal offices from fisheries inspection offices to unemployment insurance centres. While we do not always agree on the way things should be done, I have found that in their application and their professionalism they are as good as there is. Their reputation will stand up against any in any country.

There is a lot of stress involved in working in the Public Service. Public servants are under a lot of pressure to produce. I would like to digress for a second with regard to the cod moratorium. While I do not always agree with the officials of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans I have nothing but the greatest respect for the way they have applied themselves in their jobs in an attempt to provide a service to people. Their package is not always acceptable to constituents who do not qualify, but nonetheless one has to have the highest regard for the amount of work they do in trying to deliver the service they have been asked to deliver by our government.

The clause to which my hon. colleague from Ottawa West made reference is inconsistent with fair treatment of government employees. I have been in this House for a relatively short time and I have been unhappy about some of the comments that have been made and some of the measures that have been taken. I do not want to open old wounds, but I cannot let this go without comment.

I want to make a point about clause 137, which was not initially there but was actually introduced. It takes away the privacy of these 20,000 public servants who are under pressure as it is and allows the system to look at their income tax returns in situations of supervision, discipline or something of that nature.

Those two aspects, the loophole for the rich and the business of lack of privacy for individuals in the revenue department, should be disallowed. It is because of those two negative aspects, despite the good things in this bill, that I will not be able to find it possible to vote for the bill.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

GORE BAY–MANITOULIN AIRPORT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago the Department of the Environment announced that it would terminate the contract this fall that has provided a manned weather station at the Gore Bay–Manitoulin airport and automate the system. This decision would cost the community six jobs in a district in which unemployment is already too high.

However the implications of this action go far beyond the provision of weather information and unemployment. An automated system will not provide the information on air traffic, airport runway conditions or personalized weather information to pilots and mariners in the north channel area and could jeopardize public safety.

Likewise, because the Department of Transport does not provide services at this airport, the weather station personnel have provided the refuelling of aircraft, parking, landing fees collection, and customs and tourist information at the airport. If these services were removed the airport's viability would be drastically downgraded to the point where the regularly scheduled NorOntair services could be put in jeopardy.

We intend to fight this wrong–headed decision with every means at our disposal. I call on the Minister of the Environment to reverse this decision and renew the contract for a manned weather station at the Gore Bay–Manitoulin airport.

ATLANTIC SALMON FISHERY

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention that the Government of Canada, by participating in the program to buy back commercial fishing licences for Atlantic salmon on the North Shore, is contributing directly to perpetuating this species and also contributing to the development of sport fishing in Quebec.

With the program, of which 70 per cent is funded by our government, more than 60 commercial licences in the riding of Manicouagan will be bought back. This will help the Atlantic salmon stocks recover in all the rivers between Franklin and La Romaine on the North Shore of the St. Lawrence. It will also emphasize the development of sport fishing, which helps stabilize the economy of isolated communities on the North Shore.

The program will treat commercial fishermen fairly by giving them reasonable compensation for their gear and for the loss of income that they will incur. This participation is made possible by the Federal Office of Regional Development in Quebec.

This is something concrete that our government is doing for sustainable development and the survival of the Atlantic salmon.

UKRAINIAN CANADIANS

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, Canadians were astonished to learn Monday that the government has now determined that the internment during World War I of more than 5,000 utterly blameless persons of Ukrainian origin was "not of national historic significance".

Therefore there will be no interpretive centre near the largest internment camp at Castle Mountain in Banff National Park and no markers at the other 25 camps, this despite the fact that it was the Ukrainian internees whose forced labour built much of Banff park.

By unanimous resolution this very House deemed the internments to be unwarranted and unjust and called on the government to mark the 26 camp sites and establish "a permanent historic educational exhibit" at Castle Mountain.

The entire NDP caucus stands by that motion. We call on the government to reverse the decision made public this week, build the interpretive centre, mark the other internment sites, formally apologize to the Ukrainian community, and speedily settle the other outstanding redress questions.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board gained tough new power under Bill C–91 that will allow it to review the prices of new patented medicines.

All medicines are not patented. In fact most drugs in drug stores are not patented. When the patent on a drug expires it can be produced by anyone. The Patented Medicine Prices Review Board does not have any power over drug prices once the patent has expired.

• (1405)

I would like to point out that some time ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare asked his officials to work with their provincial counterparts to develop a Canadian agency for pharmaceutical information assessment so that Canadian consumers would have the necessary information to compare the prices of non–patented medicines, ensuring that they could get the correct drug at the best possible price.

DOGRIB NATION

Ms. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, on March 18, 1993 the Dogrib people signed a $125 million agreement with the Northwest Territories Power Corporation for the development of hydroelectric power in the Dogrib–North Slave region of the Northwest Territories.

This historical agreement is a commercial undertaking that will balance the interests of both parties and will address the legitimate concerns and sensitivities of the traditional economy of the Dogrib with today's opportunities for development in the region.

This brave and bold move by the Dogrib has set an example for all Dene. In developing environmentally sound partnerships with industry they are providing economic security and meaningful job training for their people. It also gives them tremendous strength at the negotiating table for land claims.

I would like to wish the Dogrib nation a very happy and prosperous future. In doing so I congratulate Grand Chief Joe Rabesca of Rae, Chief Isadore Zoe of Lac La Martre, Chief Henry Gon of Rae Lakes, and Chief Joseph Judas of Snare Lake.

TRADE

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my strong support for the recent agreement by the governments in Canada to reduce internal trade barriers.

The principle that governments will now treat people, goods, services and capital equally, irrespective of where they originate in Canada, is indeed positive news for our small businesses in Canada.

The growth, development and encouragement of our entrepreneurs and small businesses have been seriously hindered by these unnecessary limitations to free movement.

An efficient, open and integrated market in Canada is a must. It will improve the competitiveness of our small businesses in the domestic market and in export markets as more and more of them look outward.

The recent agreement to reduce interprovincial trade barriers is a major step forward for Canadian small business.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, during the intense debate on the North American free trade agreement that would bind us to Mexico, a low wage partner, and threaten thousands of jobs here in Canada intensity was shown on all sides of the House.

The government was in favour of the legislation. The Liberals allegedly were opposed, and so were the New Democrats and some of the Independents. The crunch came after time allocation, which in effect was closure.

The moment came for the vote to be taken. The government stood up and supported its policy. The combined opposition was prepared to stand and defeat the government. When the vote took place we found that there were 113 members for it and 94 against. Half the Liberal caucus did not show up for the vote.

Everybody in this country who is opposed to NAFTA should recognize that the Liberals did not show up in the House. They could have beaten the bill. Only six members paired. They could have defeated the bill when they had the chance but they did not show up. Why? You figure it out, Mr. Speaker.

SENIORS

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, it is with enthusiasm and pride that I welcome the announcement of the renewal of the federal government strategy concerning the elderly that was made today by the Minister of State for Seniors.

Since 1988, when the first strategy was put in place, the quality of life of senior Canadians has been constantly improving. Indeed, many seniors from all over the country have, at one time or another, enjoyed the New Horizons Program or the Seniors Independence Program, for example.

The main objective of the renewed strategy is to build on the solid foundations of the first strategy in order to allow senior Canadians to take the place that they deserve in society.

The new elements of the renewed strategy, the Ventures for Independence Program and the development of a federal policy on aging, should largely contribute to meet that objective.

At a time when departments are asked to reduce their programs, the commitment and the investment that have just been announced are a clear evidence of the long-term vision of the government and its firm commitment to enhance the independence and the quality of life of seniors in Canada.

TAXATION

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, in the government's mini budget last December the Minister of Finance announced that there would be an indefinite freeze on increases in grants in lieu of taxes to municipalities.

Residents of the city of Scarborough object to the federal government downloading its tax burden on to local property and business taxpayers. The federal government benefits from municipal services as do all property and business taxpayers.

This unilateral decision not to pay any increase in municipal taxes has the effect of off-loading those costs on to the weakest of our government structures and into a tax structure that is the least flexible and the most regressive.

I call upon the Minister of Finance to reverse his decision to freeze these grants and pick up the federal government's fair share of the local tax burden on Scarborough's constituents.

SENIORS

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Seniors has announced today that the federal government will extend the Seniors Strategy for another five years.

This announcement shows our government's concern for the senior citizens of Canada. It is also an excellent way of helping our society prepare itself to meet the special needs of an aging population.

We are also introducing a new program called "Ventures for Independence". This program will give priority to innovative suggestions aimed at improving the quality of life and independence of seniors.

The development of a federal policy on aging is another new and important element of this strategy. By the year 2031, one in five Canadians will be over 65, and if we want today's and tomorrow's seniors to enjoy independence and dignity in their retirement, we can only be delighted about the renewal of the Seniors Strategy.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians should know that Bill C–91, legislation implementing the drug patent legislation, was passed back on December 10, 1992, thanks to the 21 NDP members who failed to show up for that crucial vote.

If the NDP had actually opposed giving multinational drug firms carte blanche with brand name drugs sold in Canada for the next 20 years, as it alleged, it would have demanded that every living, breathing member of its caucus show up. Instead, only half of the NDP caucus arrived for that final vote on what was described as the largest single affront to Canada's universal health care system since it was created.

Even the former B.C. premier, the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, who opposed that Draconian drug patent legislation, did not show up in this House.

As a result of the fact that the NDP did not demand full attendance of its caucus for that crucial vote Canadians are facing higher costs for patent drugs in Canada. By failing to demonstrate its resolve the NDP has helped the Conservative government to allow—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. I know that other members in the House will breathe a sigh of great relief.

TOBACCO SMUGGLING

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, this morning, CBC quoted a spokesperson for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as saying that only 5 per cent of proceeds from cigarette smuggling are seized. It was also reported that, without a stricter law, the RCMP cannot deal with the problem.

I would like to point out that Bill C–102, which is now at report stage in the House, is designed to provide our police forces with the tools they need in their fight against tobacco smuggling.

I want to remind the House that the government is open to discussions with the provinces in order to address the issue of smuggling.

LANGUAGE RIGHTS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the recommendations made yesterday by the Quebec Conseil de la langue française for the replacement of Bill 178 are not acceptable.

This Draconian law, which bans English on commercial signs in Quebec, will automatically expire this year because it was passed in 1988 by using the notwithstanding clause to override the charter of rights, the Supreme Court, the Quebec Court of Appeal and the Quebec Superior Court.

Considering the importance of this matter, not only for Quebec but for minority language rights throughout Canada, I ask the Prime Minister and all members of Parliament to approach the Quebec government and urge it to opt for a replacement law which fully respects the 1988 Supreme Court decision and does not require the notwithstanding clause.

Such a solution should also respect the principle set out in the Charlottetown accord that Canadians and their governments are committed to the vitality and development of minority language communities throughout Canada. Let us build respect and understanding between our two great language communities, not division and conflict.

DECORATIONS AND AWARDS

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, I find it extremely gratifying to draw your attention to a truly exceptional event I attended last week in my riding. More than 680 people came to show their gratitude and respect to more than 40 persons who received the Governor General's 125th anniversary medal, in recognition of their volunteer work and their involvement in the economic and socio-cultural activities of their community.

I want to take this opportunity to express my admiration and to thank these residents of Richmond—Wolfe.

RUSSIA

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, at the Clinton-Yeltsin summit this week the Prime Minister will announce, in his words, a considerable Russian aid package. The package will address most appropriately wheat shipments and technical assistance.

If Russia is to enjoy economic revitalization we must also support elements essential to industrial growth. One crucial area of unlimited potential is Russian oil and gas reserves.

Many Canadian companies have been negotiating contracts but due to political instability and lack of capital funding the deals are not finalized. One example, Algoma Steel of Sault Ste. Marie, a $50 million seamless tube order was announced by the Prime Minister, signed by our minister of trade and Russia's finance minister. A year later there is still no deal.

A positive development could be the expanded mandate of the Export Development Corporation which will allow it to become more involved in these deals. An example is to take on equity shares in projects.

I ask the Prime Minister to take this weekend's opportunity to finalize any pending Russian-Canadian contracts which will be mutually beneficial.

PATENTED MEDICINE PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board has released its report which says that Canadian drug prices are among the highest of those with which Canada was compared.

During the passing of Bill C-91, known as the drug patent legislation, the opposition argued that it was our generic drug industry and compulsory licensing that kept our prices lower. So much for that argument. Similarly the price of Canadian prescription drugs was supposed to be lower because in Canada we had only 20 years of patent protection and any change would make us pay more.

The Liberals are wrong again. Those countries that we were compared with in Europe have an average of 24 years of protection while in the U.S. they have an average of 25 years. Thus increasing the lifetime of a patent does not increase the price and in fact the opposite may be the reality.

The questions remain then: Has the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board been incapable in the past of controlling the price of prescription drugs and will the new powers given to the board because of Bill C-91 correct this apparent imbalance?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PHARMACEUTICALS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

When the government proposed Bill C-91 we were told that drug prices would not increase for prescription drugs. Now a study confirms that Canada has some of the highest prices in the world.

I would like to know from the Prime Minister if it is true that the government proposed Bill C-91 to please the Bush administration during the NAFTA negotiations, as it was alleged yesterday by the senior senator of Arkansas who said that the government caved in under pressure from the Bush administration.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the statement by the senator mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition. However, his question does come as something of a surprise, when I consider that his party and he himself voted against Bill C-91, which would, among other things, give the board additional powers.

If he had voted for Bill C-91, the board would have had additional powers more quickly to monitor the price of drugs.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister did not answer my question.

We want to know why this government always sides with the big multinationals instead of taking care of people who need drugs in this country, the poor and the sick. When will this government make it a priority to look after the weakest members of our society instead of siding with the multinationals who contribute to the coffers of the Conservative Party?

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, it is easy to be negative; however the hon. member forgot to mention the investments made in Quebec. He also forgot to mention the position of the Quebec government, something the hon. member does quite often. Investments that are being made thanks to Bill C-22 in 1987 and Bill C-91 today will ensure that research and development in the pharmaceutical sector takes place in Canada. That is good for Canadians.

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I cannot justify that the poor in our society, the sick in our society, have to pay these high prices which are higher than anywhere else in the world according to a report from his own department.

When will the government realize that a lot of those costs are paid by the provincial governments and the federal government and at this time the country cannot afford to deduct big sums of money for the big international corporations?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, once again, the hon. member overlooked something. He forgot that Bill C-91 applies to one category of drugs. He forgot to say that 80 per cent of the drugs used in this country have absolutely no connection with the legislation contained in Bill C-91, which was passed by the House.

Canadians will not be affected, although the Leader of the Opposition contends they will be, by a bill that, I repeat, will put Canada on the map as a good place to invest in the pharmaceutical sector, where we take a leading position.

Not so long ago, an article stressed how important it was for Canada to have this special niche in research and development with respect to Canadian pharmaceutical products.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of health.

Yesterday the minister of health claimed in the House that the government's policies have led to lower drug prices for Canadians. One of the government's own departments obviously disagrees with him.

In a letter sent to all Canadian veterans the department says: "In recent years the cost of health care benefits has risen sharply. The cost of prescription drugs has been one of the main reasons for this increase".

Yesterday the minister dismissed the findings of the regulatory agency, the PMPRB. I want to ask the minister if today he will stand in his place and accept the findings of one of his own departments, the Department of Veterans Affairs.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, the hon. member's question is much the same as the previous one. However, he failed to mention that it is important to have this board, which has the power it needs to review what is happening here in Canada. I would like to state more specifically the additional fines that can be imposed and the fact that the board may review whatever is going on with respect to pharmaceutical products in this country.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

I will give the minister one more chance. Green Shields, a private insurer, the province of Ontario, the province of British Columbia, the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board, and now the Department of Veterans Affairs are telling the government that its drug patent policy simply does not work for Canadians.

I want to ask the minister if he will finally wake up and realize that the policy he has been pursuing is not for the benefit of Canadians. It has been solely for the benefit of international pharmaceutical companies.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, if $500 million worth of investment in Canada does not benefit Canadians, I wonder what the hon. member expects and what he sees as benefiting Canadians.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I too have a memo from Veterans Affairs Canada in which Veterans Affairs Canada writes to veterans.

• (1425)

> In recent years, the cost of health care benefits has risen sharply. The cost of prescription drugs has been one of the reasons for this increase. The challenge for Veterans Affairs is to continue meeting your health needs at a reasonable cost. One way to do this is by filling your drug prescriptions with lower-priced generic drug products.

Yesterday when I asked this question of the minister in the House, he told me:

> We have no intention of conducting an investigation into the price of drugs, since we have the appropriate mechanisms to ensure that prices remain at reasonable levels for Canadian users.

I want to say to the minister responsible that here is further evidence that drug prices are hurting Canadians. They are hurting veterans. The government's own departments recognize it. Will the government reconsider and hold an inquiry into high drug prices in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, Canada has taken the necessary steps to ensure two things: First, that pharmaceutical industries come and operate in Canada— which is good for the country in terms of investments— and second, that a board be put in place to make sure that patented medicines are sold in Canada at a justifiable cost.

Bill C-91 gave more powers to the board, thereby guaranteeing that patented medicines would be sold at a reasonable price.

Therefore, I think that the hon. member's question is irrelevant.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Since its creation five years ago, the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board has initiated only one inquiry. One inquiry in five years is not what I would call an efficient way of monitoring prices. Drug prices in this country are 56 per cent above the international average. This is hurting senior citizens and chronic care patients who have to pay. Please, launch a ministerial inquiry.

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, what my colleague is forgetting when comparing Canada with other countries is that those countries do not necessarily have generic products and might have longer patent protection than the one we have recently had under the new legislation.

If I follow her reasoning, Bill C-91 should have given even longer patent protection to innovative companies.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the government's own Department of Veterans Affairs acknowledges that generic drugs are lower priced and urges clients to get lower priced generic drugs.

The cost to Canada of this awful legislation is tremendous. I just want to say to the government that we are asking Canadians to expect less and less in health care. Ontario estimates it could lose $100 million because of this legislation. Saskatchewan and Manitoba could lose $10 million a year and New Brunswick almost $15 million a year.

I want to say, while we are asking Canadians to take less and less and we are giving to multinational corporations, surely the government has a responsibility to stand and have an inquiry into high drug prices in Canada. Will it do it?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes, the Government of Canada has a responsibility and that is making sure that research and development is carried out in the pharmaceutical industry in this country. We need research and development activity in that field, and our government acted accordingly.

WESTRAY COAL MINE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House have been asking repeatedly for many months questions of the government to provide all of the documents, including the censored documents, in order to shed light on the facts surrounding the Westray coal mine disaster.

I have in my hand a letter addressed to me signed by Justice Peter Richard, wherein he states: "The order was served on the Government of Canada with notice to the Minister of Justice through an associate deputy minister. I was assured by the associate deputy minister that the federal government would co-operate with the inquiry".

I ask the right hon. Prime Minister if he would indicate to the House whether or not the then Minister of Justice was acting alone or acting in full concert and knowledge of the entire cabinet.

• (1430)

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises questions about this government co-operating with the provincial commission of inquiry.

He knows that we have co-operated right from the beginning, over 7,500 pages worth of documents. We will be tabling further documents with the commission. We have co-operated with them from the beginning to the end.

The previous Liberal government never co-operated with provincial inquiries. We are.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, it is clear from the response of the minister that not only was there no co-operation forthcoming, but the Government of Canada has deliberately withheld information, censored documents from the judicial inquiry and from the Parliament of Canada.

Yesterday the minister made mention in this House repeatedly about the families of the deceased miners. I have in my hand a letter from a brother of a deceased miner who states in a letter written December 2, 1992 and I quote: "Quashing inquiries and protecting the rights of those responsible only reinforce the prevailing opinion of a massive cover-up. We will not let the federal or provincial governments steamroller us on this one".

I again ask the right hon. Prime Minister: Was the then former Minister of Justice acting alone or with the full consent and knowledge of the entire cabinet? Yes or no.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I said yesterday, and I am going to have to say it again, the only cover-up that has existed with regard to this matter is the hon. member who comes in here with documents that he has had for three or four months which he says purport to reflect on why these miners died, and he does not table them before the House and he did not tell the House about them until two days ago.

I want to give my hon. friend three pieces of information that he should listen to very carefully. First of all, the CANMET report which he said had not been tabled with the commission was tabled with the commission six months ago and the commission counsel confirmed that two days ago; no apology from the hon. member for alleging otherwise.

There was an additional red herring. They said: "No, there are seven pages missing from the CANMET report". I received a letter from our counsel to the commission counsel confirming this morning that there are no missing seven pages. The CANMET report was nine pages yesterday, the day before, forever. It is still nine pages.

The third particular matter which I think the hon. member should understand is that we want to co-operate with the commission because we want to get to the bottom of why these miners died. Safety being a provincial jurisdiction it is properly the purview of a provincial commission. We are happy to co-operate with them.

Here is what Mr. John P. Merritt, the commission counsel, said late yesterday in a letter that I received from the government's counsel. He said: "All information which may be received or gathered by the commission staff during the period that criminal charges are outstanding will be kept confidential by the commission and not be released".

He has also said: "Parties with status will have access to that information once any risk of jeopardizing the criminal proceedings has been removed".

We are concerned about the criminal proceedings, about the RCMP inquiry. Because of that we were very concerned that tabling documents with the commission that were not confidential could impede that inquiry.

We are satisfied with this letter from John Merritt, the commission counsel. I asked my officials, pursuant to this letter that we received late yesterday giving us assurance to speak to the commission, to contact them so that we can transfer these documents most convenient to them as soon as possible at a time appropriate for them.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The minister who has just answered talked about everything but the question that was put by the opposition House leader. I want to quote again from the letter written by Justice Richard to the opposition House leader in which he says: "The order was served on the Government of Canada with notice to the Minister of Justice through an associate deputy minister. I was assured by that associate deputy minister that the federal government would co-operate with the inquiry".

The federal government has not co-operated with the inquiry. Evidence has not been forthcoming.

• (1435)

I want to ask the Prime Minister as the chief of cabinet whether or not the then Minister of Justice was acting alone when she withheld the necessary evidence from a judicial commission of inquiry, or was she acting with the knowledge and consent of cabinet, including the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion that a minister, the then Minister of Justice, withheld information either from the cabinet or from the commission of inquiry is of course false, misleading and should be withdrawn on the floor of the House of Commons by the hon. member.

Second, in regard to—

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Why? She withheld it.

Mr. Mulroney: Well now the member from Winnipeg is making an even more serious accusation. He is saying that the Minister of Justice knowingly withheld information from an inquiry, presumably with the view to undermining the integrity of that inquiry. That is very serious.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Have we got under your skin?

Mr. Mulroney: If my hon. friend wants to make that charge—

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. It might be easier if all hon. members listened to the question and then listened to the answer. The right hon. Prime Minister has the floor.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I am merely indicating, as the minister indicated, that the government has co-operated fully with the inquiry.

I am not acquainted with the particular correspondence that was cited by my hon. friend a few moments ago, and he may care to table it, from the chief justice or the justice who chairs the inquiry. Once we find out when that was sent and what it says we will take a look at

it. If there is any difficulty I or the minister will be happy to clarify any difficulties that may arise.

The allegation that has been made seems to be clearly a concerted one coming from the Official Opposition, directed against the former Minister of Justice, and suggesting that she deliberately conspired with someone to withhold information from a judicial inquiry. That is a very serious accusation.

Normally in this Parliament if you make that kind of accusation you rise and you put your seat in play and if you are wrong, resign.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister knows and it is an acknowledged fact that the counsel for a judicial commission of inquiry took the extraordinary step of going public to rebut the assertion by the government House leader that all of the information that had been asked for had been received. That extraordinary measure was taken.

The government has acknowledged repeatedly that it is refusing under cabinet confidentiality terms to release 18 pages of documents including specifically a memo written to the minister of energy. That is all acknowledged fact.

What is now clear is that the request for information was conveyed to the Government of Canada through the office of the Minister of Justice.

The only question being asked of the Prime Minister is this: Was the then Minister of Justice acting alone or was the then Minister of Justice acting with the knowledge and consent of cabinet? Was this a cabinet decision to withhold from a judicial commission of inquiry the very evidence it sought to investigate this Westray coal mine disaster, Prime Minister? Yes or no.

Mr. Andre: He apologized for it.

Mr. Hockin: It is acknowledged fact.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, one day they are after the minister of defence for helicopters and then one day they are after the former Minister of Justice on something else.

Let us examine this. The member just made a statement about the commission counsel of the royal commission in Nova Scotia. It is my understanding that statement by my hon. friend is one that he ought to have known had already been corrected by the commission counsel who apologized to the government. That information was conveyed to my hon. friend yesterday on the floor of the House of Commons.

Mr. Andre: Absolutely, absolutely.

Mr. Tobin: No.

Mr. Chrétien: She made the statement, not us.

Mr. Mulroney: I am not going to yell back and forth across the floor at my hon. friend. It seems to me it is a simple proposition. Either the commission counsel in Nova Scotia apologized to the government and acknowledged he was wrong or he did not. If I am wrong in making that statement I will be happy to withdraw it but that is the information that I have received. That is the information that has been conveyed to the House.

Mr. Tobin: It is wrong.

• (1440)

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says I am wrong. If I am I will be happy to examine the documents again. The information that we have is that the commission counsel so acknowledged his error; that the government had responded fully to the requests that had been raised by the Official Opposition.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): It's wrong. He didn't say that.

Mr. Mulroney: The second question raised by my hon. friend is in regard to the Minister of Justice. The question presumes and suggests that the Minister of Justice did something other than pursue her duties in an honourable and entirely appropriate way. Of course she did no such thing. She conducted herself at all times as Minister of Justice in a manner in keeping with the highest standards of the leading law officer of the Crown, which means that there was no such suggestion of any kind made by my hon. friend, and he would do well to withdraw that allegation right now.

CIGARETTE SMUGGLING

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General.

The RCMP today stated that cigarette smuggling has now been taken over by organized crime. On Tuesday the minister of revenue admitted in the House that tobacco companies are not co–operating in preventing cigarette smuggling and are in fact making it impossible for the RCMP to trace contraband cigarettes.

In view of these developments, will the minister now reimpose the $8 per carton export tax and cut the feet out from under organized crime?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I can advise my hon. friend that although the job of the Solicitor General seems to cover a multitude of things it does not cover raising taxes, so I will skip that one, if he does not mind.

I would say that he raises a very important point. There is no question that the smuggling of cigarettes is a serious matter, one that the government views with a great deal of concern. We are presently consulting internally and with provinces in an effort to mount an offensive to stop the smuggling.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General was present when the export tax was removed and took part in the press conference so I thought he knew something about it.

I want to give the minister every opportunity to get tough with organized criminals smuggling cigarettes, even though this government caved in last year when the tobacco lobby came calling.

The RCMP now admits it is able to only intercept 5 per cent of smuggled cigarettes. What new measures is this government prepared to bring forward to assist the RCMP? That is within his jurisdiction.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there is no question that we are going to develop as many new methods of dealing with this matter as possible. I am not prepared to deal with them on the floor of the House of Commons until they are finalized. Until such time as they are finalized I am only going to lay out in public those matters which it makes sense to lay out in public. The rest of them we use to get the smugglers.

FEDERAL PENITENTIARIES

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Yesterday we were informed that the government was considering raising the pay of inmates in federal penitentiaries.

I thought this was too silly to get too concerned about, until I read the newspaper this morning and saw that the leprechaun Sean Durkan from The Toronto Sun had stated that this was indeed a fact, that we were going to raise the salaries of inmates in federal penitentiaries.

I ask the Solicitor General to please stand in his place and state, at a time when Canadians are taking cutbacks in their pay, at a time when Canadians are having their pay frozen to aid us in coming out of this recession, that he will not go ahead with this ludicrous procedure of raising the pay of inmates.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's question and the concern with which he approaches this matter.

There have been considerations in terms of allowances and the way we deal with corrections and a draft paper has been circulated.

As part of the consultations in discussions that I wanted to have as Solicitor General I met with the Union of Solicitor General's Employees yesterday. I met with the Professional Institute of the Public Service and I also met with the justice committee which is composed of members from all sides of the House.

• (1445)

As a result of those consultations and the suggestions made to me, some very interesting suggestions as to how things could be approached and the temper of the times, I have decided that we will do a complete review of the matter.

WESTRAY COAL MINE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Judge Richard of the commission of inquiry on the explosion at the Westray mine said in a letter that he had filed a notice with the government and with the Minister of Justice and that the government had promised its full co-operation.

Given that some pages are missing from the document that the commission has, did the Minister of Justice hide documents with or without the consent of the Prime Minister and Cabinet?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a stupid question in English does not become an intelligent one in French.

This is nonsense directed at the reputation of a member of this House. Normally when someone makes such accusations, he has the courage or the decency to put his seat on the line if the assertion is proven false.

I asked his colleague in English to table the letter in question and we will see what the chief judge and the judge say. Furthermore, it should be noted that the minister responsible for this issue here in the House answered several times yesterday and again today that not only the minister but also the government had met their obligations to the commission of inquiry.

I can tell my friend that we are co-operating fully and fruitfully with the royal commission of inquiry and continuing to do so right now.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): With all due respect to the Prime Minister, the letter that the minister tabled in the House yesterday says nothing of the sort. I quote an excerpt from the letter: "The commission is still waiting for an answer as to whether the nine pages constitute a complete report." We know that there were 16 pages.

Bernadette Feltmate said this in a letter she sent to the Leader of the Opposition: "Please help us. We need answers so that we can tell our children in future that we did everything to find out what happened to their fathers."

So I will ask the Prime Minister once and for all: Why do the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice not table the missing pages today so that we can know the truth in this affair? Why?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday, we sent the CANMET report six months ago. The Commission confirmed that we did that.

Furthermore, this morning, we received a letter confirming that there are not more than nine pages but only nine pages, so I hope that the member will apologize for everything he said.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the acting minister of industry in the absence of the minister himself.

I want to return to the bitter pill of the closing of the Wyeth pharmaceutical plants in Windsor. In June 1992, speaking in support of Bill C-91 and speaking of the Canadian patented pharmaceutical industry, I am told the minister of industry said: "We will give the industry the incentive it needs to strengthen the Canadian base for international investment".

How does it strengthen the Canadian base of that industry to close the productive, efficient and profitable Wyeth plant in Windsor and instead of creating more jobs, to eliminate 129 jobs altogether and to transfer the remaining 90 out of the city? What sense does that make?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows, but of course is not willing to share with the House, the pharmaceutical research that has been conducted under Bill C-91 has produced hundreds of millions of dollars worth of research and jobs that ordinarily would not be there. That is because we have protected intellectual property in a way which encourages that investment.

• (1450)

In terms of this company in Windsor, I share my hon. friend's regret that the Windsor plant had to be closed. It is consolidating the operation in Montreal, making the company more competitive as a result. In addition, positions of the old Windsor plant have opened up which will be made available elsewhere for the employees.

What the company is trying to do is to become more competitive as it goes into the future so that it can expand further.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, in 1987 employees at Wyeth in Windsor were asked by the company and the pharmaceutical manufacturers of Canada to write to senators to support Bill C-22 and to say in their letters: "My job is protected only if Bill C-22 passes".

Well, Bill C-22 passed, but the jobs in Windsor have not been protected. I ask the minister: Will the government intervene now to keep the Windsor employees of Wyeth working at their jobs in Windsor so that their lives will not be destroyed by this Conservative government's policies? Will he act now?

Instead these firms generally are stronger. They are expanding. They are doing millions of dollars worth of research they ordinarily would not do. That is what the hon. member knows but will not share with the House.

I remind him that he fails to see the tremendous job creation that has occurred as a result of that bill.

An hon. member: They had to resign.

Mr. Hockin: Tell them to go to Montreal. Tell them to go to Toronto. Tell them to go to southern Ontario or somewhere else. What the hon. member has to remember is that to be competitive, we have to support intellectual property and encourage investment and this we have done.

DEFENCE INDUSTRY

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Expro chemical manufacturing plant has been forced to lay off some 200 workers. Expro is the only explosives and propellant powder producer in Canada, and 90 per cent of its products are for the U.S. market.

Since 1987, defence industry activity has dropped 20 per cent and 8,600 jobs were lost; that is 22 per cent of the work force in that industry. The situation is likely to get worse as President Clinton has announced an $88 billion cut in the U.S. defence budget. On the other hand, President Clinton also announced a $19.6 billion industrial reconversion plan aimed mainly at promoting civilian uses of military technologies.

I ask the Prime Minister: Will he consider establishing such a fund in Canada to preserve jobs for one thing and also to draw upon high tech knowledge to boost the economy?

[English]

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the Expro situation developed a number of years ago. We were able then to provide some funds in a working capital loan which maintained 550 jobs in modernizing the industry and putting it in a position where it could meet the environmental standards.

The industry, which generally has been going through some difficulty, has a fund of almost $200 million through the DIPP process in which it can modernize and change into a civilian type of work.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I know that the defence industry is slowing down because of the international state of affairs and that is a good thing. The fact remains, however, that there are still people working in that industry. I think President Clinton made the right decision in cutting the defence budget, but he had the foresight of creating at the same time an industrial reconversion fund to both prevent job losses and convert these military technologies to civilian uses for mankind instead of doing away with them.

I think it would be important, considering this is a major industry in Quebec, that the same kind of fund be created to prevent job losses and encourage profitable and long-term investments.

[English]

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I thought I was quite clear the first time.

I said yes, there have been some military reductions in its budget. We do have in place the Defence Industry Productivity Program which has been changed in its focus to help military industries transfer more of their work into the civilian mode.

I explained that in my first answer and it is the same answer now.

WESTRAY COAL MINE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. He recognizes our questions deal with the very important issue of public accountability and trust of members of the government.

We have a letter that was written by the commissioner of the inquiry last summer indicating that an order was submitted to the Minister of Justice requiring full disclosure of all information relating to the Westray tragedy.

Yesterday, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism acknowledged that not all information was given. There was still more to be given. We even have a letter again recognizing that not all the information was given. There was a gap of over 10 months in which an order was given and not fulfilled.

I come back to the simple question previously raised by my colleagues. Was this decision made solely by the Minister of Justice? Did the Prime Minister make the decision? Or was it the full cabinet that decided that the order of request submitted by the commissioner, Peter Richard, was not fulfilled by this government?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered two of the hon. member's colleagues and perhaps I will repeat it to him.

He indicates that he has a letter. Am I right in concluding from what my hon. friend said in his prefatory remarks that this letter from the justice in Nova Scotia is seven or eight months old? Am I right?

Mr. Hockin: Almost a year old.

Mr. Mulroney: The conclusion that was being conveyed was that this was something new floating around.

Perhaps my hon. friend could begin by tabling that eight, nine or ten-month old letter on the floor of the House. Then we will look at it, examine it and see if there is anything inconsistent with what the justice said in respect of the government's obligations.

The government views this matter with extreme seriousness, as I am sure do all members of the House of Commons. There was loss of life involved.

There was the question of a judicial inquiry having been constituted by a duly elected provincial government to determine areas of responsibility. There has been involvement by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in respect of possible prosecutions that might ensue. There has been the intervention of an appellate court in this matter holding in abeyance evidence that might have been adduced before this particular royal commission.

There has been a full and ongoing degree of co-operation by the Government of Canada, given those realities to which I have just referred. The Minister of Justice, as she then was, and all ministers of the government have co-operated fully. We will continue to do so with the justice, with commission counsel and with all appropriate officers of that commission.

If my hon. friend has something at variance with what I have just said I would be happy to listen to it, take a good look at it with him and make sure that the proper thing is done. So far, I can assure him that the co-operation of the Government of Canada has been full and complete. We want to continue to help that commission because we want the truth to come out.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, there was an editorial in The Chronicle-Herald this morning. Speaking about the matter of truth, I would like to quote it to the Prime Minister: "The truth is that Ottawa has not only embarrassed itself politically in this matter, it has also disgraced itself morally". That is from the newspaper that reflects the point of view of the people of Nova Scotia. That is an editorial of The Chronicle-Herald, a newspaper which this government quotes at length to support its position time after time.

The Prime Minister has not satisfied the question we asked. The letter I quoted from of last August indicates that an order was issued by the commissioner of the inquiry. It was an order to the Minister of Justice that all documents be provided.

We have had acknowledged in this House—

Mr. Speaker: Given the time, could the hon. member put his question, please.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am responding directly to the inquiry and to the Prime Minister.

Why is it that the Government of Canada, by the Minister of Justice or the collective entity of the cabinet, did not provide all the documents as requested last August and is still holding out on those documents today?

• (1500)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend surely will acknowledge the inherent unfairness in the question that he has just asked. He has not tabled the document that is now some nine or ten months old. We have not been able to compare this document against the allegations that he has just made. He impugns the integrity of a minister of the Crown without any evidence.

Moreover, regarding the information to which he refers as having been withheld, there is an apology on the record from commission counsel saying that is not true.

I just want to tell my hon. friend, Mr. Speaker, he is right in two areas. First, it is of course a very serious matter and the Chronicle-Herald is a very serious newspaper. I do not dismiss any views on this casually and we are going to co-operate very fully with the commission of inquiry.

If my hon. friend has any specifics of any kind which suggest misfeasance or malfeasance or improper conduct of any kind by any minister of this government, I urge him to bring it forward with specifics on the floor of the House of Commons and I assure him in the interests of the 26 people who lost their lives I shall follow through swiftly.

CANADA COUNCIL

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. Earlier this week Vanderhoof and Associates released a study which demonstrates that the cuts to the Canada Council will in fact increase the public debt. The study showed that the cuts will result in lost tax revenue and increased UI payments for a net loss to the Treasury.

Can the minister tell the House if this government conducted an economic and cultural assessment before announcing the cuts? If not, why not? Now that there is proof that these cuts in fact will actually result in an increased deficit, will the government restore the funding to the Canada Council?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. The department is looking very closely at the report in question. Certainly we will be glad to look at any of the recommendations that are made there. We want to put whatever money the taxpayers of Canada can afford to pay in support of the arts.

However, the hon. member takes the position that it is possible for Canadians to spend themselves rich. If we could do that we would not have had a situation where on the front page of the Toronto Star of March 2 there is a headline saying: "NDP premiers urge action to cut pressing debt load".

Mr. Barrett: You doubled the debt.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, you cannot have it both ways. If you want to control the debt, you cannot spend yourself rich.

SPORTS ILLUSTRATED

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is this government doubled the debt. In its attempt to reduce the debt this study shows it has in fact increased the debt. That is the point of the study.

My supplementary is for the same minister. Today Time Warner Inc. will place on the news-stands the Canadian edition of Sports Illustrated. Time Warner is clearly circumventing Canadian customs and skimming scarce Canadian advertising dollars. It plans to publish six Canadians editions during the year, yet this government refuses to act until a task force reports at the end of the year.

Why will the government not show some backbone, seize the Canadian edition of Sports Illustrated and enforce the laws of the land?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, it is hard for me to see how that question was supplementary to the previous one, but I am glad to respond to it anyway.

Mr. Barrett: You figure it out.

Mr. Beatty: The hon. member says I should figure it out. Anybody looking at the two questions would have a hard time figuring it out.

In so far as Sports Illustrated is concerned, the policy of this government is to ensure that the letter of the law is followed fully. What we want to ensure is that the policy that was put in place in 1965 is respected. We have created the task force to look into this sort of issue. There is no requirement that the task force wait until the end of the year. Any time the task force is prepared to make an interim report or a final report, the government will be pleased to receive it.

Our goal is to ensure that the Canadian magazine industry is fully protected.

POINT OF ORDER

TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, before I ask the government House leader and actually question the business of the House for the remainder of today and tomorrow, I want to co-operate with all members of the House and table a document which I referred to in Question Period. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that there would be unanimous consent for me to do that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question to the government House leader is with regard to the House business for tomorrow.

The House will be adjourning for approximately two weeks for members to return to their constituencies to do their constituency work. I am wondering if the minister could indicate to the House the business for those first few days back keeping in mind that we meet on a regular basis on each Tuesday of the week.

Second, while the Minister of Finance is in the House could he indicate the date of the next budget so that members can prepare accordingly?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we will be continuing with Bill C-92, the income tax technical amendments. On Friday we hope to get complete passage of Bill C-114 as well as complete passage of Bill C-83, the transport of goods by water act, and Bill C-97, the marine insurance act. These two companion pieces of legislation were passed through the House concurrently at second reading. Hopefully we can do the same for report stage and third reading.

I do not believe there are any particular partisan differences on that.

On Monday, April 19, when we return after the two-week break, it is my intention to call Bill C-62, the telecommunications act.

In terms of business for the rest of that week, I will have to get back to the hon. House leader and other members of the House to arrange details.

In terms of the question of a budget, it will undoubtedly be soon after we get back.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I am well aware of the rules of this House and I know the hon. member opposite is well aware of the rules as well.

On the basis of some degree of understanding so that proceedings in this House can move at more than a snail's pace, I think it would be in the interests of not only members of the House but also Canadians to know the date of the budget I am sure. As the minister can well understand, if we come back on Monday, April 19, to find out that the budget will be the following day or later that week, then I think members on this side would like to have notice in view of the fact that the government has attempted in the past to have a regular date for the setting of the budget.

If the minister does not have the answer immediately perhaps later this day or indeed tomorrow the House could be informed before adjourning for the Easter recess as to the date of the federal budget.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I certainly recognize that with the House not sitting for the next couple of weeks hon. members will want to know whether they should spend their time studying up on budgetary matters and so on.

I heartily suggest that that is a good way to spend the Easter break. I can suggest a bibliography of materials to read that would be very helpful in that regard. Perhaps they could start with the economic statement of December 2, 1992.

In fact I think the preparation for the budget is primarily the preoccupation of the Minister of Finance and undoubtedly he will be very busy over the next two weeks preparing for that budget because I would expect to see a budget soon after we return on April 19. Of course we will try to be specific on the date at a time when we can be.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, during Statements by Members the member for Hamilton West indicated that on the third reading of Bill C-91 there were 22 New Democrats absent.

An examination of both—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that is debate.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-92, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and certain related acts, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception had 10 minutes of questions and comments.

The hon. member for Brant on a question or comment.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Liberal member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception had used up almost all of his time. That is why I was rising. It is to continue with debate, not questions.

• (1510)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order please. Let me check with the Clerk.

The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception had used up his time but the question and comment period has not started, so I am therefore going to ask for questions and comments one more time.

The hon. member for Western Arctic on a question or a comment.

Ms. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, thank you very much for the opportunity for me to make a comment.

It is highly appropriate in the discussion on this tax bill that we bring to mind the whole plight of the disabled and the income tax system. A report was done by the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. It brings forward the issue of taxation and the disabled because disability involves costs. There were some very specific recommendations made.

The Department of Finance, for one, should become a full and active partner in the national strategy for the integration of persons with disabilities. In relation to the costs and the reintegration of disabled people into mainstream economy and society, there were a number of specific recommendations made. I would like to cite three very briefly and ask my hon. colleague to comment on them.

The changes to the tax system should reflect the following principles:

First, that taxes that people with disability pay should be reduced by measures that offset all their disability-related costs.

Second, the tax system should be used as a delivery mechanism for benefits to lower income individuals with a disability. This relates to income reform as well.

Third, the tax system should be used to remove or reduce the disincentives for disabled people to join the work force.

This is a fairly major issue and concern for people who are basically impacted on by the constraints produced by a person's disability. All programs have a social component, including the income tax system, and should be designed to alleviate the disadvantage experienced by people with disabilities in an equitable and fair manner. Bear in mind that these programs should enhance the independence and particularly the employment opportunities for disabled people.

I would like to ask my hon. colleague how he feels about the support there for these recommendations. This is highly appropriate because the Association for Community Living for the Disabled is meeting in Ottawa. I am sure that they have had contacts with many hon. members.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague from Western Arctic for that question. Indeed I want to thank her particularly for raising some of the positive aspects in this bill.

She and I have discussed this aspect in advance of her question and I am very much aware of the ongoing work and the work of the committee that had made the recommendations. I want to add that we may recall that I reflected on the nine or ten separate aspects of the items that are included in this bill. This is essentially a bill that includes numerous technical amendments and changes to the Income Tax Act.

It is regrettable that these very positive aspects such as the recommendations made in this report, many of which are incorporated in the bill, are overcome by some of the negative aspects of the bill with respect to essentially opening loopholes for the rich when it should be closing loopholes for Canada's most wealthy. The other somewhat inconsistent and I believe shameful aspect of the bill is that it does not permit the kind of privacy that we, in a Canadian society, would want for employees. These are the 20,000 members of the Public Service who are involved with Revenue Canada.

• (1515)

As a finale statement to this and on a personal note I want to tell the hon. member that for many years I have been a director of the Canadian Paraplegic Association and have worked with the community living movement which is a very important movement in my riding. That was the point that she made at the very beginning. It gives me great personal satisfaction to see that the disabled are considered in this bill. In my opinion I think the plight of the disabled is one of the most positive aspects of the bill. This is in response to the tremendous bootstrap work that they are doing in the Canadian Paraplegic Association and the Institute for the Blind, which has been in the public eye in the last few days, and other areas of community living. Again I would also say that I believe they are making great strides and this is another indication of that. Therefore I thank the hon. member for her question. I was pleased to be able to highlight that positive aspect of the bill.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that I am able to enter third reading stage debate on Bill C-92. It is an omnibus bill. I am only going to confine my remarks though to one part of it, the part dealing with the extension of the capital gains exemption for principally the very rich and the very powerful families of this country.

I think it is an absolute disgrace for this government or indeed any government at this time. We are in the depths of a recession. Middle income earners have been overburdened with tax increases for the past several years. User fees are going up. Provincial taxes are going up. Deficits are ballooning out of sight. There are poor, hard-working, middle income earners. There are those households where incomes are around $40,000 to $50,000 a year if they are lucky and two persons are working in that family. Now this Conservative government has to bring in an amendment to the Income Tax Act that would further exempt family trusts for up to another 75 or 80 years.

The history to this family trust debacle in this country goes back to 1972 when the then Liberal government decided to bring to an end succession duties and estate taxes, particularly estate taxes at the federal level. In place of the estate taxes they introduced a system of taxes on capital gains which hitherto had gone untaxed. At that time of course that was looked upon as being unfair as well.

In place of the estate tax, and when they brought on the capital gains tax in 1972, the government of that day—I was here in the House of Commons at that time—brought in the 21-year rule which said that family trusts would have up to 21 years in order to prepare for a capital gains tax on their private family estates. Most of them, believe me, took advantage of it.

Contrary to the impression left by some Conservative speakers in this debate, this family trust is not your ordinary, run of the mill kind of legal and financial arrangement that your average taxi driver engages in or that your average nursing assistant has or that your average truck driver is able to afford. For one thing, to set up a family trust costs several thousands of dollars so automatically most ordinary taxpayers of middle-income status are unable to set up a family trust.

Second, most families in this country, the great majority of them, have no financial reason to set up a family trust. They simply do not have assets large enough to warrant that kind of expenditure or legal cost that is required to set up the family trust.

What we are really talking about here is primarily, not exclusively, the very rich in this country. We are talking, for example, about the K.C. Irvings, the Reichmanns, the Bronfmans, the Westons, the Thomsons, the Rogers and the Blacks. We are talking about very, very rich and powerful families that have been able to shelter or avoid paying capital gains on their family wealth for 21 years.

• (1520)

This government through Bill C-92 has decided to let them go for another, as I said earlier, 75 or 80 years. It now says that when the capital gain is sold, it will not be taxed until the last beneficiary dies. Today, if I was very rich and I left the whole family trust to a child just born this week, the chances of that child living to be 75 or 80 is very great in this modern age in which we live, so in effect the capital gain accumulating over the years on that family trust will go untaxed for another 75 or 80 years.

What kind of a message is this sending to the middle income earner, to the low income earner, to people out there who are trying to make ends meet?

Since 1984 this government has increased just federal taxes alone on average Canadians by about $3,000 a year. Because it has off-loaded much of its financial responsibilities and deficit on to the provinces by cutting back the rate of increase in transfers, the Canada Assistance Plan and other financial devices or mechanisms that it has established over the years by which it sends or transfers funds to the provinces, it will just cut back on the increase caused by inflation over the past few years. The provinces are now having to cut back very drastically.

We see it in the province of Newfoundland. We saw it just this week in the province of New Brunswick. In Saskatchewan, after eight years of profligate Conservative spending in that province, the NDP government has had to slash expenditures, cut back on programs, having to borrow more money and in a very dire deficit situation.

British Columbia is not as badly off, but there are also cutbacks there I understand. The province of Ontario I suppose is the best example of all. It came into office in September 1990 with a ready-made deficit of $5 billion. Because of declining revenues due to the recession that was setting in at that time and also the profligate spending again, this time not a Conservative government but a Liberal government under David Peterson, which presided over Queen's Park during the five richest years of Ontario's history, Ontario still managed to come up with a deficit of half a billion dollars in the treasury.

Because of all these changes and because today civil servants are threatened with their jobs or pay freezes or cutbacks in wages and private sector employees have lost their jobs to a great extent—there are 400,000 or 500,000 jobs that have gone down the tube as a result of restructuring and the free trade agreement—and companies are going bankrupt, because of all of these reasons, private sector and public sector employees are finding it extremely difficult to cope with taxation and increased user fees and the cutback on government services at all levels, federal, provincial and municipal.

We then have to contend with this kind of easy soft treatment that this Conservative government is now offering the richest 200 or 300 families in this country whose combined total assets are in the neighbourhood of about $70 billion. We are not talking about hundreds of thousands of families here. We are talking about, relatively speaking, a very small number of rich and powerful families in this country that can yet again defer capital gains tax on their family trusts for another 75, 80 or 85 years.

This is an intolerable situation. How can a government on the one hand talk about restraint and cutting back on government expenditures and on the other hand increase taxes to ordinary Canadians and then let the very rich and the very powerful off the tax hook as far as their family trusts are concerned?

It just does not make any sense. Worse than that, it sends a signal to ordinary Canadians that this government does not care a darn about equity and fairness in the tax system, but will continue to protect those few rich families in this country who, probably without exception, support the Conservative Party either directly through funding or certainly at the ballot box.

• (1525)

Many, many people have made comments about the unfairness of Bill C-92 as it affects family trusts. It is not just members of the New Democratic Party who are opposed to it, it is not just labour, it is not just anti-poverty groups, but many professional institutions and professional people have also made comments. For example, Sidney Goldstein of Goldstein and Goldstein in Ottawa, who is a tax lawyer and consultant, says and I quote: "There is no question that it"—that is Bill C-92—"represents a massive windfall for existing trusts".

Why would a person with his knowledge and with his experience—he is not only a lawyer but he is also a tax consultant and tax expert—make a statement like that if it were not true? I doubt very much that he is a supporter of the New Democratic Party.

It is not just us here on this side of the House who are condemning this as an unfair and inequitable approach to an over-all fair taxation system that we are desperately trying to bring in in this country.

Kathryn Bush of Blake, Cassels & Graydon had this to say and I quote: "A cynical person might suggest that pressure from influential political supporters also should be listed as a reason for the draft legislation". This is when she was commenting on the original legislation when it was first drafted. It has not changed in respect of family trusts since then.

Neil Brooks, associate dean of Osgoode Hall Law School, said and I quote: "The government has given Canada's wealthiest families notice that it intends to give them a gift worth several billions of dollars".

These are knowledgeable people, an associate dean of Osgoode Hall Law School in Toronto and members of the financial community whom I have just quoted, who are putting it on the line and saying this is what the bill is all about. To paraphrase what they are saying is to say that this is a gift, a handout to the very rich people in this country. At the same time this government purports to have a deep sympathy for the hard working middle income earner who pays the bills, abides by the law and tries to look after his family. That is a mythology.

I just read a book by an American Republican, Kevin Phillips, a political analyst, called Boiling Point. It is a book which I suggest every Conservative should read. In that book he explains how Governor Clinton of Arkansas was able to overthrow President George Bush in the presidential elections of last November.

In that book he describes how Bush's predecessor, Ronald Reagan, the great communicator, was able through his eight years, two administrations, from 1981 to 1988 to constantly remind the hard-working middle income earner in the United States, the industrial worker, the truck driver, the taxi cab owner and operator and so on that the reason their taxes were going up was because those profligate states and those profligate welfare agencies and those profligate municipal governments all over the United States were spending more and more of their hard earned tax dollars to pay the welfare rolls for the lazy who would not work. As long as Ronald Reagan could keep the hard working middle-income earner convinced that that was why his taxes were going up and he was continuing to slide from middle class into poverty in many cases, the industrial middle class continued to support Reagan as they had done probably for the first time in the presidential elections of 1980.

When fumbling George Bush came along and discovered all of a sudden that he could not communicate quite as well as his mentor Ronald Reagan, the situation began to change and Governor Clinton and his brain trust who helped him run his campaign brought in a whole new set of statistics and figures and facts.

• (1530)

To make a long story short, they were able to show through those two successive income tax reform regimes under Ronald Reagan and George Bush that it was not the low income or welfare recipients who were causing the middle class to have to pay higher taxes and user fees at the federal, state and municipal levels. Rather it was because the Republicans had actually lowered the effective taxes that the very rich in the United States had to pay. Therefore he was able to cast the eyes of the middle class away from the poor and the helpless upward to the very rich and the powerful.

That sealed George Bush's doom. The middle class went back to the Democratic Party convinced it was not the poor who were dragging them into poverty but the fact that the rich were in a privileged tax position in the United States and they were not paying their fair share.

We can use the identical argument in this country because that is precisely what has been happening in Canada since this Conservative government, like its Republican cousins in the United States, took power.

If we look at the national debt in this country, we find that 50 per cent of that national debt increases as the result of compounded interest. Forty-four per cent of that debt is caused by tax avoidance. That is a legal term I know and I do not mean it in a legal sense. They are not doing things that are illegal, but the very rich families in this country at the personal income tax level and the very rich corporations all through the 1980s, and I am not talking about the recession years of 1991-92, I am talking about all through the 1980s, were not paying their fair share of taxes. Statistics Canada figures will show that 44 per cent of the national debt of this country came about as a result of those loopholes, shelters or deferments, whatever we want to call them. They did not pay their fair share. They did not carry their weight. Therefore, Conservative government after Conservative government in the United States and Canada off-loaded that unfairness on to the backs of the struggling and hard working middle-income earners.

That is why their taxes are going up in this country and have gone up over $3,000 a year since the Conservatives came into office. Only 6 per cent of the national debt is the result of government program expenditures. Of that less than 3 per cent is on social programs.

To listen to some of our Conservative friends and even some of our Liberal friends, one would think that all this massive government spending and overspending is the result of things like medicare, transfer payments through the Canada Assistance Plan to help the poor, those who are unemployed, the UI fund and all the rest.

The trouble is this government has been reading too many articles about Preston Manning and has probably even read his book. That is one of the major problems. If we look at the real facts and the real figures, we find that the debt in this country has accumulated because of compounded interest and unfair taxes that allow the rich corporations and rich individuals not to pay their fair share of the tax burden.

The situation in Canada is exactly the same as it was in the United States. That is why we on this side of the House look forward to the next election, knowing that the people of Canada are going to do the same thing that the people of the United States did. The middle-income earner is fed up with taxes. He is fed up with the increase in user fees. He is fed up having to pay out to governments at all levels every time he gets his pay cheque. Now he is being informed by many of us and other people in the country that the reason for this is not because his tax dollars are being wasted on the poor, but because there is unfair taxation in this country. If the rich individuals and rich profitable corporations were paying their fair share of taxes, he would not be paying nearly as high taxes.

This is the problem we have today. It is being exacerbated by this government through Bill C-92, where once again the family trusts are allowed to continue for as I said earlier another 70, 75, or 80 years or even more.

It was pointed out earlier today by one of the Conservative speakers in this debate that those trusts do pay income taxes on what they earn year after year.

• (1535)

Nobody disputed that. Nobody ever said they did not. This is the irony of it. They are not paying a tax on the accumulated trust, the value of the trust. Each year as that trust makes money there is income tax paid. They can still shelter that money. They have very rich lawyers, they have very expensive tax preparers that really understand the tax act.

Let us say a family trust generated $100,000. They may be able to shelter $50,000 of that through real estate, RRSPs and of course political donations. There are all kinds of ways this can be done so there is still unfairness built into the system.

I see that my time is up. I hope that this government will come to its senses if it wants to survive the next election. More important than the political aspect of it, it is about time the Conservative government came clean with the taxpayers of this country and brought in real tax reform that would create a tax fairness in the system that everybody could accept. Then we would understand that there is a need to tackle the deficit if the burden fell fairly and equitably on all of us, not just some.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to comment on Bill C-92, a bill to amend the Income Tax Act.

By reading this bill I have discovered on pages 247 and 248 that from now on any person can get taxpayer information if it is for the reason of supervising or evaluating or disciplining any personnel in the Public Service that work either at Revenue Canada to implement this act or works at Canada Pension Plan or works with the unemployment insurance.

I find it absolutely abominable that this is added, especially in the same year that the government passed a law to change the Public Service Act and also took great pride in talking about Public Service 2000.

I have received copies of the 1991 and 1992 guides to income tax. The 1991 guide talks about privacy and confidentiality. It states to the person filling in his or her income tax: "In addition to other constitutional and legal rights, you have a special right that personal and financial information provided to National Revenue Taxation will be used only for the purpose allowed by law".

In this year's 1992 guide, again it has a declaration of taxpayer rights. Under privacy and confidentiality I see that the restriction is stronger and words have been changed. I would like to read the wording: "You are entitled to expect that we will use the personal and financial information provided us only for the purpose the law allows".

It would be very interesting to get a legal interpretation of both of these comments that are given to people who fill in their income tax. It is very interesting that all of a sudden after passing this law today, it would be as the government says and has been saying "let the managers manage".

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, this year in the new public service law we now know that managers can discipline, can transfer their employees, can promote their employees and their recourse is about nil if there is any recourse at all. Now we see that these same managers in either supervising, evaluating or disciplining their staff at either Revenue Canada, Canada Pension Plan or at the Unemployment Insurance Commission, will now be able to call in the income tax returns of their employees to see how they filled in their returns, to find out if they gave to one party or another, if they gave to one lodge or that association. I wonder what the interpretations will be. I find that we are going more and more into a dictatorship.

• (1540)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not know whether there was a question there.

Mr. Bellemare: It was just a comment.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to start by saying there are some aspects of Bill C-92 that meet the test I have always used toward tax reform.

Specifically, when I test a particular tax measure I first of all ask, is it fair? Is it efficient? Is it simple? Most important these days, I ask: Is it a tax measure that will assist in putting people back to work?

I believe the sections in the bill that deal with the reinstitution of the Small Business Development Bond Program is a good part of the bill.

I believe the section in the bill that talks about the introduction of the home buyers plan which allows individuals to use up to $20,000 of RRSP funds to purchase a home before March 2, 1993 is a good part of the bill.

I know in my own community there were many real estate agents who told me when that aspect of the bill was announced it spurred a lot of activity in the real estate field, especially for young people. That part of the bill I support.

I also support the measure to assist Canadians with disabilities. Those are aspects of this bill that had the government lumped them together and put it through the House, it would have been a much different debate. Because other components were woven into this bill like the family trust and the amendment that allows the public servants to have their tax returns reviewed, how could we possibly stand up here and support this bill?

How could we possibly go home to our constituents and say: Oh yes, we supported a further extension of the unaccountable, unknown amounts in the family trusts that have not been looked at for 21 years. We now want that renewed for an indefinite period of time.

This is the problem I have with the government. It comes forward in a way in which it is preoccupied with its tactics, preoccupied with creating illusion but the reality is quite a bit different.

I listened earlier to the member for Ontario. He kept repeating during his remarks: "This bill is designed to put people back to work. This bill is designed to improve this aspect of the Income Tax Act." This word "design" seems to be the buzz word in the Conservative government. It has been using it for many years. The problem the government has is that the average Canadian knows there is a long way between the design and the reality.

• (1545)

I think specifically about the GST which really has represented the cornerstone piece of design work for the government. The GST was supposed to be a better tax, a more efficient tax. We now know as a result of the public accounts committee two weeks ago that the GST has been the most poorly designed tax that has ever been perpetrated on a nation.

I am going to be very specific to show in my remarks and to repeat to some government members what the Deputy Minister of Revenue informed us of last week in committee. The Deputy Minister gave us information last week. The facts are that the gross GST income last year was approximately $30 billion. After we subtract the cost of the low income tax credits and the cost of operation of the GST we are left with a gross net GST, not net net, but a gross net GST of approximately $15 billion.

My leader has stated repeatedly that we, the Liberal Party of Canada, are going to scrap or replace or remove, whatever word you want to use, Mr. Speaker—scrap means we are just going to get rid of it—the GST, the line comes out from the—

Mr. Thompson: A point of order, Mr. Speaker, you might question whether this is a legitimate point of order, but when speaking of the GST and scrapping or replacing, could the hon. member explain the difference between those two terms.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member may have that opportunity after the hon. member finishes his debate.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to clarify that. I was trying to make a point that there are many different words coming from different quarters, but scrap to me means abolish. It is going to be removed.

The line that comes out of the government side is: "Where are you going to get the $15 billion?" The government has created the illusion that there is between $15 billion and $16 billion after the credits, et cetera.

Mrs. Sparrow: Right, $15.2 billion.

Mr. Mills: Right, the hon. member for Calgary Southwest said $15.2 billion. I asked the Deputy Minister of National Revenue last week in the public accounts committee if the department has ever done a cost benefit analysis on the GST by sector and the answer was, no, it had not done a cost benefit analysis. He did admit that there was in fact a cost to the registrants.

I did a little bit of sampling and I would challenge any members on the other side to check my numbers. We have about two million registrants according to the Department of National Revenue. Most registrants will say that the cost of administration in their small business or big business, whatever it is, is approximately $3,000 a year. Most people do not argue with that. There are many small businesses that will say the cost is much higher because they prepay the GST sometimes when their receivables have not come in, and that puts stress on their cash flow.

There are many who argue that it would be much more than that, but the bottom line is that from that $15 billion we have to deduct the cost to the registrants. There is about a $6 billion cost to the businesses, or registrants, in Canada.

On top of that, there is not a person in this House of Commons who will argue against the assertion that the GST has exacerbated the underground economy in this country. In 1985 the then minister of revenue estimated that the underground economy then, which was before the GST, was around $45 billion and the cost to the Treasury on that $45 billion was approximately $9 billion.

A lot of people today guestimate that the underground economy exacerbated because of the GST is probably in the area of $15 billion to $20 billion.

Mrs. Sparrow: But that's hypothetical. How do you know that?

Mr. Mills: It is not hypothetical if it is happening, and we all know it is happening. There is not a member in this House of Commons who will stand up here and say there is no underground economy because of the GST.

The bottom line is—

Mrs. Browes: Get to the facts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. There will be an opportunity for questions and comments. Please allow the hon. member to finish his debate and then we will get into questions and comments.

Mr. Mills: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker. The members say I should give facts.

The point I am trying to make is that the government very rarely deals with the facts. It has been creating this illusion, this mythology with Canadians for the past nine years. If there is one thing we must do now, and we have to work with facts, and this came out of the public accounts committee, well the facts are that there is no cost benefit analysis. It has not even completed a cost benefit analysis within the department.

If we do a complete cost benefit analysis on the GST we are just dealing with the $15.2 billion, less the cost for registration, less the cost for the underground economy. We cannot even calculate the lost business confidence. There is absolutely no cost known to the tourism sector in this country yet tourism operators say the GST has cost their business.

Executives of the T. Eaton Company of Canada estimate that the GST has cost the retail business in Canada, clothing, refrigerators, stoves, et cetera, close to $10 billion. For food service and hospitality the number is incalculable. The point is that the GST is a net loser. There is no way anyone can prove to me there is anything on the plus side as a result of the GST.

My point is that this government says it designed this tax to achieve a better environment, a better competitive environment, a better environment for a whole litany of things. The bottom line is that the design of this tax has had no real benefit to any sector of our economy.

I would submit—

Mrs. Browes: How about exports?

Mr. Mills: I am going to respond. I knew the government would mention exports.

I would submit that our exports, and we must remember that the manufacturers' sales tax was not really applied to exports, are booming right now because of our lower cost of production and our lower dollar.

• (1555)

There is not an economist in Canada who will refute this. In 1987 exports were in fact higher than they are now.

Here is the point that I am trying to make. There is a long way between the design and the reality. I am shocked when Conservative members refute that statement because they talk to the same people that I talk to when they go home.

I cannot believe that their constituents are telling them that they love that design of the GST or the fact that the government is going to allow these trust funds, that are estimated to be worth anywhere from $15 billion to $50 billion, to go on for another unlimited period of time.

I cannot believe that their constituents love the fact that the government, ignoring what the parliamentary committee said in terms of how to treat income tax forms, is going to ram through a bill in which the management of not only Revenue Canada but also aspects of Health and Welfare Canada and Employment and Immigration can look at employees' tax returns.

If Conservative members' constituents are telling them that they like that kind of tax design then my constituents are totally different because they think it is unfair. The first point I tried to make was: Does it meet the test of creating new jobs?

I started off my remarks by citing certain aspects of this bill that I think will create jobs. However, there is no way anyone can convince me that by throwing the family trust section into this omnibus bill and rationalizing that extended untouched, unaccountable, and unknown amount in the family trust portion of the act, it should go on without any accountability. I defy anyone to prove to me how that will create more jobs.

Illusion and reality, myth and reality, design and reality, are different things. My community, and I believe every community across the country, has reached the boiling point, as the member from the New Democratic Party said earlier. He talked about the Canadian public's boiling point.

The Conservatives have had as their leader for the last nine years one of the best communicators as a Prime Minister that this country has seen for a long time. The problem is that he is no longer there to communicate, to schmooze and do all the things that he did so well in terms of the big sell. It is over.

People now realize that there is a distance between the design and the reality. The next election, which is only four or five months away, will certainly prove the point that if they are going to put forward a tax measure that does not meet the tests of fairness, efficiency and putting people back to work they are going to be blown out of the water.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the member just gave a wide-ranging speech. I will have no problem questioning or attacking certain parts of it.

Much of what he says flies right in the face of reality. He is talking about the GST, the hatred of the tax and the complications of the tax, et cetera. Let us accept that part of the argument.

What I cannot accept is that it is dragging down the Canadian economy, as he has implied. In fact it is doing just the opposite.

• (1600)

I have an article from The Globe and Mail on March 23 of this year, headlined: "Retail sales continue to climb in January". It lists the numbers, and they are very impressive. The Canadian economy is moving out of the recession, and some of that is showing up at the retail sales level.

I will quote one paragraph from this article. It states:

> On a year over year basis, January retail sales were up 5.6 per cent. Drug stores reported a 13 per cent sales increase to lead the pack——et cetera. Retail sales are moving forward.

In terms of the GST, because this is something that the member's party does not understand although I will admit that he understands economic policy better than his own leader does, there is a very real connection, as the member for Calgary Southwest tried to point out, between the GST and our export capacity.

I have another article in my hand that points out that our exports are at an all-time high. That is related to the dropping of that old manufacturers' sales tax which discriminated against our own manufacturing in terms of exporting out of the country.

The headline on March 19 of The Globe and Mail reads: "Trade surplus biggest since 1985". It lists the numbers, and they are very impressive. I might note that 1985 was just one year after we took power after successive years of Liberal mismanagement in the country. We had some big numbers to match, and match them we did. The numbers speak for themselves.

If the hon. member is going to get up in a rambling sense and cover as much territory as he normally does in debate he has to stick to the facts. They speak very well for this government in terms of economic management.

Earlier in the day one of his members from Newfoundland got up and talked about the national debt. I am not going to accuse the member of this one because he is smart enough to know that we do have a problem. I think he buys in to some of the things we are trying to do on this side of the House, but his party certainly does not. He is one of the few on that side of the House who understands what we have to do and do what we are doing.

I would be interested in listening to the member's response. I do hope that he is very specific when he mentions these numbers because the numbers are very much on our side.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by responding to the last part of the member's question relating to the national debt.

Mr. Thompson: The member's understanding of the economy would be a better point.

Mr. Mills: I think we should deal with the national debt. I want to make the point about how the government has managed to spin or create this illusion that it is a better fiscal manager.

The reality is that in the last nine years in the government's effort to ratchet inflation to almost zero it has put so many people on unemployment. Does the government realize how much money it has had to pay out because of the damage it has caused in terms of unemployment? Does the government think that Canadians realize that as a result of its economic policy it has spent on disbursements, between welfare and UI, close to $170 billion? That is money the government has paid out for people to be in unproductive roles. It has spent almost 40 per cent of the national debt to pay people who it has basically put out of work because of its obsession with an idea called zero inflation. Most economists are now admitting there has never been a precedent anywhere in the world that it really works to go that hard on inflation.

• (1605)

I want to talk about the difference between Conservatives and Liberals when it comes to debt management. We are not perfect and there is absolutely no doubt that we would have incurred a lot of the same debt. However, the difference between Liberals and Conservatives is the fact that we, when times are tough, have programs.

Conservatives talk about program spending being reduced to surplus in their operation of government, but at the end of $170 billion that they paid for welfare payments and UI, what is there to show for it? There are 3.2 million people who have lost their dignity.

We at least would have roads, sewers, bridges, airports. We would put money into high-tech industries. We would put money into training. Then at the end when we came out of the recession we would have a serious asset.

Aside from this poorly designed, ill-timed GST—and most members know about that and I am not going to belabour the point on the GST—the real legacy of this government—and it is certainly not traditional Tory thinking, I do not know how they got trapped into this plan—is that in its first five years the government incurred $50 billion worth of personal tax increases. On top of that, over nine years the government spent $170 billion, 40 per cent of the national debt, on disbursements to people on welfare and unemployment insurance, all in the name of zero-zero inflation.

I have said in this House many times that we must focus and keep inflation in order, but not to overkill to the point where there are so many people out of work and the level of confidence in this country shrinks the GNP. I cannot believe that there are not members over there who feel guilty about the fact that the government has spent $170 billion paying people not to work. Would they not feel much better having roads, bridges and airports?

Four months from now the people will decide which party has a track record of putting people back to work. I am pretty confident that our track record stands on its own.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret questions and comments are now terminated. On a point of order, the hon. member for Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, there might be unanimous consent in the House to allow me to ask a question of my colleague. I just wonder if there would be.

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Debate. The hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I will allow the member to ask me a question when I am finished with my remarks. I hope he stays around and takes part in the debate.

Again, there is a great difference between those parties over there and this party. There is no question about that. That is part of what we are talking about today when we speak of Bill C-92.

I cannot go any further without commenting again on what has been said on the other side of the House, particularly from members of the Liberal Party in terms of what they would do versus what we are doing. They left the country a burden of debt, as most of them will admit to, that put us in a very difficult position when we took the reins of government in 1984. In fact the record will show that many of the front bench members of the former Liberal government in 1984 bragged that they did indeed leave the cupboard bare. They left us with a mountain of debt, as some call it.

• (1610)

The mechanics of that debt, and just the sheer numbers of that equation, made it very difficult for the government at the time and it still does, but what is the sense in going through those numbers, which we do constantly in this House in terms of what was happening then and what is happening now. The fact is it is now 1993. We have to deal with 1993 and the future. If we want to continually go back and dig up what the Liberals did versus what we are doing, well I think it is pushing the argument in a direction which will not do any of us any good.

There is no magic on this side of the House when you take office and have the responsibility of forming a government and doing what is right for the country. I want to point that out because it is important that we focus on what is happening today in the various provinces, what they are doing in terms of taxation and reducing their debt load. We are always being blamed. I guess it is the role of the opposition to blame us for everything that happens, whether it is good or bad. Obviously however, the opposition does not credit us with having done a whole lot of good.

I want to point out what happened in the province of New Brunswick yesterday. It brought down a budget yesterday. I want to point out the difficulty of having the responsibility of forming the national government and the difficulties of working with the provinces to do the right thing.

One of the things we have done in this House is we have reduced income tax. I am talking specifically about the surtax which has been reduced from 5 per cent down to 3 per cent. It is part and parcel of Bill C-92, the bill on which we are speaking today. Average Canadians are going to be paying less tax because we have reduced the surtax from 5 per cent to 3 per cent.

I will step through the numbers and what this means to an average family, but do not let me forget to remind everyone that what the province of New Brunswick did yesterday basically flies in the face of what we are trying to do.

Bill C-92 reduces income taxes for 14.6 million Canadian taxpayers. The legislation we are debating now will confirm the one point reduction in that surtax which came into effect on July 1, 1992. There also of course was a one point reduction on January 1 of this year. Therefore, in the last two years this government has reduced the personal income tax.

Yesterday the province of New Brunswick flew completely in the face of that. It was announced in its budget yesterday in Fredericton. The provincial income tax rate now rises to 62 per cent from 60 per cent of the basic federal tax and it will go up another two percentage points next January to 64 per cent. That is the second highest rate in Canada. I am not talking about the rate itself, although it is high enough and it is too high. I know that in all honesty one could argue that our rate of personal tax is too high as well and I guess most of us in this House, all politics aside, would agree with that.

However, what is happening here is that we have given a tax break to the citizens of Canada, only to have the provinces come in on this side to take it away. It simply neutralizes any tax break that the citizens back home in our respective provinces have received at the hands of the federal government.

• (1615)

The province of New Brunswick is not the only province to have done that. It is being done from one end of this country to the other. We can argue here until we are blue in the face as to why they are doing it. We understand fiscal responsibility. Believe me, we do. We have had to bite the bullet on many tax issues as well. Some of them have cost us dearly in terms of public support. That is something politicians are obviously aware of.

The difficulty today in our system of government is that there is no co-ordination between us and the provinces in some of these tax matters. Therefore, what you give with one hand, they take away with the other. Does that really have anything to do with politics or political parties as such? I suppose it does. I can lay it clearly at the feet of the Liberal government in the province of New Brunswick.

The NDP is doing it as well in Saskatchewan, in Ontario and in British Columbia. When those NDP members get on their feet in this House they completely remove themselves from those premiers and governments back home. That is because they are doing the very thing that they have supposedly railed against for years and years in this House.

I bring that to everyone's attention because it is happening regularly out there. What do we do about it? I guess what we do about it is bring the premiers together with the Prime Minister, the federal finance minister and all the provincial finance ministers, sit them down and sort some of this nonsense out. It is not the first time that we have given a break only to have it taken away from Canadians by another branch of government.

I will mention what that reduction in the surtax would save the average Canadian family. In 1993 it would save a single taxpayer earning $30,000 approximately $76 in tax. It would be a $162 reduction for a one-income couple with two children with earnings of $50,000. Those are not insignificant numbers. We have to be conscious of them because there is a limit to how much we can tax.

The members on the other side of the House are famous for attacking us. The member for Broadview—Greenwood and I were engaged in debate a few minutes ago on the GST. The devil that the GST is and the difficulty it has created for us politically in terms of having to bite that very tough bullet, the problem when it gets to the floor of the House of Commons is that members on that side of the House do not want to tell us what they would do to replace it, scrap it or whatever word they want to use.
